“I told you that you should consider a comparative study. They analyze the same aspect in several languages and influences and reach a final conclusion. But, this involves a lot of work and having a high aspiration to find out the truth. This is where the problem lies: there are very few people who perform such complex and toilsome scientific studies. Instead, they prefer the laziness of an embarrassing acceptance of some ‘studies’ concerning the Romanian language and customs of our people that were performed in the past by certain scholars who are not Romanian. After that, the processing and spreading of the information is just routine because it’s much easier to talk nonsense, repeating what others say and even contributing to their stupidity, than to study, look for competent sources and judge for oneself these aspects that are based upon a profound and authentic background.”

“But, you could be influenced here,” I observed. “You could be accused of being subjective.”

“Not if you go to the origins. For example, the word ‘x’ can be found both in the Romanian and the German languages. Who gave the word to which language? It’s easy to say that Romanians are fools and have always taken from others. This is the very way I was talking about when I was referring to the dictionary. But, a very important element in the structure of the Romanian language has been discovered which proves the contrary, which is the truth.”

“What element are you talking about?” I asked, curiously.

“I’m talking about the fact that a language has two fundamental aspects: it has to be organic and must have its own roots.”

“What does this mean? What do you mean when you say organic?”

“I mean to say that the respective language can explain any element based on its own resources, without appealing to other languages or influences. And, the root is always assimilated with a basic element, with something primordial from which everything started and based upon which word families were formed. As far as we know, the Romanian language is the only language that has these essential characteristics. This gives us a unique complexity of the popular language; and, what is even more important, this complexity is based on its own roots, on the very roots which have formed the language. By comparison, in many other modern languages — out of which French is a good example — there are very few original terms which express their ideas because the respective languages don't have their own basis. Of course, this idea has been silenced or simply ignored.”

“No, they don't have basic roots. They can't be found in their own linguistic resources. There aren't any essential particles which started the formation of word families. We can only find them in the Romanian language. For example, the root bor, which doesn't exist in any other language, has generated almost 500 words. The same applies to the root ma, which is also very important, although it has generated fewer words. Other cases of greater importance are not known.”

“Do you mean that these roots have led to the formation of words?”

“Yes, the roots have led to the formation of both words and word families and these word families are classified in different categories. These categories are related to an immediate utility, such as digestion or storage. The root method allows the discovery of the basic language which led to the occurrence of a word in one language or another. This is how it was concluded that the Romanian language is the basis for all Indo-European languages. This is truly a ‘hit,’ but everyone seeks to avoid it.”

“It's only natural. They'll say that it is not the root for the respective word or word family. Maybe you drew the conclusion that it was so.”

“They can't do this because that root is the fundamental root in the peasants' language. Only the popular or peasants' language is authentic. The root bor means hole: bortă, burtă and so on.* For example, the word borcan, which also involves an empty space or an opening, is said to come from Bulgarian. What is the Bulgarian word family and how many words do they have which derive from the root bor? Maybe ten. Under these conditions, they practically don't exist in comparison with the almost 500 words identified in the Romanian language. The situation is hilarious. Not only did this Romanian word — and mine was just an example — not originate from the Bulgarian language, but it was actually the other way around. As we have hundreds of derivations of this root, this means they took it from us. Our peasants didn't organize congresses to invent words.” “It's not about inventing words, but there must have been a development,” I observed.

* Translator's note: the Romanian word bortă means hollow, hole, cavern; the Romanian word burtă means belly; the Romanian word borcan means jar..

“Of course. The development took place from simple to complex words. They started from monosyllabic roots: ma, la, ta, ba and others. As objects of activity and things were added to the universe they lived and worked in, they had to be named and people generally did this based upon what they already knew. It wasn't a science of inventing or composing words, but it was rather about the specific vibration of a thing, which ancient people felt much more clearly than we do nowadays. There is a huge difference between those times and now with regard to conception and spirituality.”

“But, how can you explain disagreements if the language isn't a scientific process?” I asked, curious to know.

 The reference to disagreements refers to subject-predicate disagreements

“The concept of disagreement doesn't exist. Peasants speak and distort words as they wish because, in the Romanian language, the meaning is retained. Actually, they do not distort words because they speak a tongue, not a language. A tongue has a much more complex meaning than the spoken language. It has more nuances and is more connected to the origins.

This can be explained only if the language is organic, if it fundamentally exists through itself. It's the same for word order in phrases. In Romanian, you can twist words as you wish and place them in any order because, after all, the meaning stays the same. This is not possible in any other language.

But, ever since the high language has been invented, we also have the concept of disagreement.”

“That is what I wanted to ask. Many states have come up with a ‘modern’ language over the old vernacular. Why was this necessary?”

“This wasn’t at all necessary. It was all about interests. There had to exist a so-called ‘common’ language for all of the people who made up a nation because, until then, on the territory of the respective country, there had been many dialects and people couldn’t understand each other from one region to another. When states started to centralize, this aspect started to create administrative problems because it was difficult to coordinate and make oneself understood in tens of dialects or idioms which were actually different languages.”

“Of course there was. They have a common origin, but it has been blotted out in time because dialects aren’t organic. They can’t be explained through themselves but are always based upon something which initially existed. This is why, in time, they are blotted out. They become distant from the original state which led to their formation. No dialect can be explained through itself, but they are all explained through each other. At a certain point, this causes problems and this is why they have artificially created a so-called high language which they have officially imposed. This means people could continue to speak their dialect but also had to know the high language. This is the case of French, German, English and so on. Many times, a high language had to be imposed by force because it was the ‘king’s language’ and those who didn’t speak it weren’t well regarded.”

“And by what manner did those people learn the new language? Take the French for example. It’s not easy to come and say, ‘From now on, you will speak like this.’”

“They learn gradually. First, the King’s Court learned; then, it was imposed in schools, universities, scientific environments and later spread, more and more, to all levels of the population. The French have only had their new language for a bit more than two hundred years.”

“So, they’ve simply been forced to learn the language.”

“There was a famous effort of the Greek government to impose an official language that is different from Demotiki, the name for the Greek popular language. They've tried to build up an artificial language called Katarevoussa, which is a dialect they tried to make similar to old Greek, in order to give themselves legitimacy as followers of the ancient Greeks. They've made huge efforts with money to teach the people and the children in schools, but they've failed to impose another language. The French have succeeded, but the process was different in their case. They haven't replaced a dialect with another one, but have distorted the Normans' language which was also a dialect."

"Well, in our case, they also say that our language has taken over the Latin language," I said.

"This Latinization of our language is a sensitive matter for many. First of all, Latin is a written language. It's an artificial language of scholars, but the Roman people spoke what is called today the Vulgaris Latin which was actually the Romanian peasants' language, the original primordial language. Roman locals didn't understand Latin as we know it today, which is the written Latin, because it had been created to separate the nobles from the vulg, to separate the rich from the poor."

"This is why they still say nowadays that the Vulgaris Latin is practically unknown," I said.

"Exactly. Because, in reality, it is the ancient Romanian language. They can't declare this; they can't even conceive it; but eventually you'll see that this idea will impose itself. It can't be any other way because this is the truth. The common European language is the Romanian peasants' language. There is no other peasants' language. Almost all word families from other languages come from the linguistic roots of Romanian. This is why they say that Romanian is the primordial language, the source language for all Indo-European languages."

"And, modern languages are in fact surrogates of the Romanian language," I said, rather for myself. "It makes sense because, otherwise, why bother to create an official language, as it was in the case of Greeks or others you've spoken about, if the language is independent and has its own origins?"

"From the point of view of ethnicity, today's Greeks are not the followers of the ancient Greeks. They don't know the ancient Greek language. It's like speaking Latin in Italy. You'd expect everyone to understand because everybody knows that the official language of the Roman Empire was Latin, and yet the people don't know this language. On the other hand, we Romanians understand everything. We can manage with all Romanic dialects. We even understand old French, the one spoken around the year 1000, even better than the French do. They need a dictionary for this. Even now, in certain areas of France, a primary Romanian language is still spoken. All that happened with the invasion of Western culture was caused by snobbery and facade. The bad luck of the Romanian people was that a couple of so-called 'intellectuals' have decided to adapt the Romanian language and culture to that of the French. They've tried to establish this relation without having a basis or a profound knowledge of the origins of our people and its multimillenary culture, preferring instead the French 'modern' civilization which is mostly an imitation."

"The fact that there were language fragmentations that made up different dialects on the territory of these countries and caused people to fail to understand each other is proof that they had no unity of language and culture," I said. "They can't impose that which does not exist."

"Romania is the only place in Europe where, on the whole territory, the people speak the same language and one which wasn't artificially created.

It's always been this way. For as long as we have known, inhabitants of Moldavia, Oltenia, and Ardeal* have spoken the same language. Where else could something similar be found? We have no dialects. We have accents, but not dialects. Everywhere else, this is a disaster. In Germany, there are a few hundreds of dialects; in Italy, a few thousands; and in England, the same. This is better, however, than in some African countries where people sometimes can't understand each other from one street to another due to the different dialects they speak. This is the reality. But, going back, I was telling you that here in our country, in the area of the Carpathians, we can find the only language unity in Europe. Such a case cannot be found anywhere else."

* Moldavia, Oltenia and Ardeal are regions of Romania.

"Do you mean that, in ancient times, Romanian was spoken everywhere?" I asked, dazzled.

“Yes, this was the situation. I am referring to the peasants’ language which is the original language. Of course, in the process of moving off from the source language, many linguistic elements have gradually changed; but even so, one could easily be understood almost everywhere by speaking Romanian. On Trajan’s Column, one can see how the Romans came and talked to the Dacians but without a translator. They spoke freely. So, there was a unique language in Europe. Ovid said about our ancestors, the Getians, that they were a bit foolish because he would come and talk to them and they would always laugh. Actually, the Dacians understood very well what he was saying, but they laughed at his altered idiom in comparison with the mother-tongue they spoke. It seems that Ovid later understood this and wrote a few verses in ‘Getian’ but they haven’t been found.”

“It’s unbelievable how this unity of language has lasted for so long!” I said.

“As you go farther away from this center, everything crumbles with regard to language, culture, and people. Only here in Romania does there remain a unity.”

“Does this mean that, if I were to travel back to the Dacians’ time or to Stephan the Great’s time, I could understand what the people spoke back then?”

“I told you, if you speak the peasants’ language as our authentic peasants know and speak it, your chances are great — but no weekend and fast food,” Cezar joked.

“What does this mean? That the language we speak today is no longer the original Romanian language? It is another language?”

“No, not at all. In time, of course, some linguistic constructions have changed, but a language shouldn’t be judged by these forms but by its roots which give meaning to words. These don’t change. This is precisely the distinguishing feature of the Romanian language. It has kept its own resources ever since families of words appeared, but something in these words, their root as I told you, has remained unchanged and this is what makes you able to understand others in any other part of the continent, even if millennia have passed.”

“Okay, but these roots can be marked by linguistic transformations until they become hard to recognize or cannot be recognized at all,” I argued.

“This hasn’t happened in the case of Romanian. Not only does it resist change for thousands of years and remain in its original form, almost unchanged, but even the small changes which are inherent to the passing of millennia are so small and have occurred with such difficulty that they are practically insignificant. For example, some of the strong consonants have turned into weak ones.”

“Why?” I asked, with curiosity.

“Because the Romanian peasants, the true carriers of the original language, had the tendency over time to change some words by weakening the consonants. For example, s is an extra effort to utter; it’s easier to pronounce ş than s. Then, why does b become v? For the same reason: because it is easier to pronounce; it is weaker. If you go to the countryside, you’ll quite often hear să aive, instead of să aibă.* The same for blahi – as they were initially known in the early Middle Ages — they later became vlahi, meaning the inhabitants of the southern part of our country. We also know about inversions of letters, especially at the beginning of words. But, all these are not basic changes but rather changes of the exterior form. The same applies to some ways of expression. They are all superficial and do not alter the basis for the language: its roots. It’s just like, over time, you paint your house different colors, add an arch, and tear down a shed; but the building stays on its initial foundation. You’ll recognize it no matter the color or the small exterior changes.”

* Both words mean “to have”

 Both words mean “Wallachians”

“But, they have introduced changes to the fundamental verbs,” I reminded him. “For example, they’ve changed săt (meaning, ‘I am/we are’) with sunt (also means ‘I am/we are’). Will this have major implications for the language?”

“Not at all. They’ve done so to be closer to Latin. These are forms introduced to better serve the political interests of the time. For example, communists came up with the word sănt and imposed it because, at that time, the language had to be more similar to the Slavonic language. But in Ardeal (commonly known as Transylvania) and Moldavia, they say îs, which is the short form for sănt. The people in the South, and I am referring to some inhabitants of the big cities, will say sunt out of snobbery, to show that they pronounce it correctly. Actually, it's nonsense because we can never say us as a short form for sunt because nobody would understand what you mean. But you do understand îs which is the short for sănt. Unfortunately, you can see that a certain effort is made — which actually lacks any substance — to change our language which is the origin of the other spoken languages when, in fact, these languages should be changed to be closer to ours."

"Well, efforts in this respect have been made by all of the others who came here; but you're right, they don't seem to have accomplished much," I observed.

"Not only did they not accomplish much, but they didn't accomplish anything," Cezar underlined with determination. "Over this country, tens of thousands of barbarian peoples have passed and conquered us in different stages of our history. They all came with their own language and culture which were more or less rudimentary. However, as even some foreign authors who are hostile to us admit, these peoples have all gone and left no traces of their languages and cultures. The Romanian language — or the Wallachian language, as it was known — has not borrowed any words from them even though it has always been in contact with these peoples' languages. For example, there is not a single Hungarian word which is common in the Romanian language. During 800 years of occupation by the Austrian-Hungarian Empire, they haven't managed to impose anything from the Hungarian language to ours. During the second world war, this was irritating for the Hungarian soldiers because they spoke Hungarian but the Romanians didn't know how to answer. They knew a bit, but Hungarians have never managed to make Romanians speak Hungarian and adopt their language, even if they remained under occupation for so long.

And, it was 1940. Under these conditions, how can you think that the Romanization of the Dacians might have been possible in only 160 years as history has confirmed? The Austrian-Hungarians tried hard for 800 years and have failed."

“The idea is that uneducated people, brought to be soldiers, couldn’t have made the Romanian peasants change their language,” I observed. “Without dictionaries, schools or much of anything else, how could they have caused the peasants to give up their language?”

“But, even if that had been possible, it’s proven that they’ve failed,” Cezar explained, “and this shows that their language is not organic while Romanian is. For this reason, the Romanian peasants have never felt the need, and this also applies today, to change their language as they have all the basics and resources in this language. They do not need to borrow anything from another language in order to express themselves because they already have everything in their own lexicon. When you are satiated, no matter how much or how tasty the food offered to you is, you’ll not want any more because there is no reason to want any more food.”

“Indeed. Our language hasn’t changed under the Roman occupation just as it hasn’t under any other occupation. One could argue, however, that we weren’t even here so there was nothing to change.”

“Then, whom have the Romans conquered?” questioned Cezar.

“The Latin chronicles call them Dacians. The Greek chronicles call them Getians, from ge which means ‘earth’ so the term means ‘the ones from the earth.’ This actually means ‘peasant’ which means ‘man of the earth, earth man, or Getian.’ We say in Romanian get-beget* which means ‘true Getian.’ Beget is just a fortifier. When we use this expression, we don’t even think about the Getians any more. We just use the expression get-beget which means ‘true, whole, precise.’”

* Translator’s note: This expression means “pure Getian.”

 Translator’s note: Beget means “pure” when referring to race or ethnicity.

“Okay, but they could argue that the Getians have disappeared and that we are another people,” I said, stating the famous hypothesis.

“This isn’t possible because the language is the same and still in its original structure, just as it was spoken by the peasants. We therefore have this incredible language continuity being transmitted over millennia. Even if we consider the possibility that the Romans had attempted to impose Latin, although I doubt it, they obviously met with resistance; but this was of no interest for them. They were very happy to confiscate the wheat and take the gold from the Dacians and then leave. It was not for any more than that because, otherwise, they would have left deep traces in our culture and tradition and there are no such traces. Furthermore, the Romans have made no similar effort to cultivate their language in a conquered region. They would come, build citadels and say ‘give us the money!’ During the first phase, they killed the locals. Then they plundered, and during the third phase they installed citadels. Of course, this view might seem rough; but in its essence, it remains a process of conquest which involves wars, violence, obedience, and plunder. You can’t conquer the world and say at the same time that you were willingly invited to do so while receiving all honors and riches. So, they couldn’t have changed the Dacians’ language, and this applied for the occupied territory which was only the seventh part of Dacia, not the third part as they usually say, in order to give more importance to these arguments. Under these circumstances, how could they have changed the language of the free Dacians from the other six parts of the territory?”

“What language did those free Dacians speak?” I asked.

“Of course, they spoke the Romanian language, the original language of the peasants. They lived on the same territory with the others. The so-called Dacian or Getian language was in fact the Romanian language. They were Romanians ever since the world was created, as we say in Romanian.”

“Did they call themselves Romanians? Did they say that they spoke Romanian?

“Our peasants say, ‘our Romanian language,’ but in the chronicles, they said that these people spoke the Roman language. In Latin and Greek, the letters î, â, ş, ţ, and ă cannot be transcribed so they wrote ‘Roman.’ Maybe they were split into communities and, at regional level, they would call themselves ‘men from Oltenia’ or ‘men from Vâlcea’ or otherwise.* But, they all spoke the same language because all who lived in the Carpathians area were seen as a single people: Dacians or Getians. The words Dacian, Getian and Romanian have the same meaning. Romanians have always considered themselves a single nation from the same ‘mother’ no matter if they called themselves Dacians or Getians in ancient times or Transylvanians and Moldavians in recent times.”

* Translator's note: In Romanian, these expressions translate as single words. Oltenia is a region in Romania. Vâlcea is a county in Romania, historically known especially for discoveries showing human life 2 million years ago and for the Dacian and Roman citadels found there.

"As it is commonly known, the Romanian nation was formed through Romanization," I said, "although now I clearly understand that the historical perspective is illogical."

"I've told you, Romanization couldn't have happened. The Romanian language is not a Neo-Latin language. Actually, they had nothing to change because the Romans spoke the same language, the Romanian language. And, I am not inventing all of these arguments. There are already many studies and references about this which confirm the truth. There continues to be a strong opposition, however, due to prejudice and especially to political interests which makes all of this information, which is essential to our identity as the Romanian nation, unknown to the public, especially in order not to 'bother' one state or another. There are also other kinds of interests, but it is not prudent to talk about this now."

"I think we are the only country where this has happened," I said with bitterness. "As I have noticed, a damaging practice of copying and imitating others has been imposed. It's always done in order to justify internal measures, by referring to the fact that we have taken this or that model from others, that we have taken a certain idea from others. We thus picture ourselves as silly children who let themselves be patted on the back by parents who are allegedly older and wiser than us. After all, it's also a matter of national pride. If we continue to copy others and bow our heads in front of them, we'll end up being copies of them. This is really disturbing."

"Of course it is. The problem is that such an attitude greatly facilitates the destructive intentions of some international organisms. You know what I'm talking about and how complicated things are in this respect."

"Sure I do, and it seems to me that, in order to make room for these evil intentions concerning our country, they have influenced the historical truth and the conception about the origins of our people as it's much easier to have a frail basis, which they wanted to impose, than a solid ethnic basis which has remained unitary and continuous throughout history.”

“It’s true, and this is how they introduced the idea of the formation of the Romanian people. The so-called ‘respectable people’ or ‘experts’ whom people listen to state that there were originally no Romanian people per se.

They tell us that the Romanian nation formed following the union of the Dacians and Romans. The history taught in schools doesn’t even mention that we were Getians. It only mentions briefly that the Getians had passed through our territory.”

“And, the union between the Dacians and the Romans led to the formation of the Romanian people. It’s just like that joke which says that everyone comes from Adam and Eve, but only we, Romanians, come from Decebal and Trajan,” he said, laughing.

“And, how can this aberration be explained?”

“As I said, it’s mainly the interest of foreign powers to acquire one territory or another. To accomplish this, they say that if you cannot prove that you were originally in the territory before, it means that you came later and should leave or obey. These are territorial claims with everything they involve. But, it was known that things were in fact different and that the Romanians are the only people in Eurasia who have resisted and survived on the same territory. This is when the fabrication of the story concerning the formation of the people and their Romanization started and was mainly based upon the ignorance or shallowness of some chronicle writers or famous historians. But, pay attention. During this process of manipulation, only those chronicle writers, historians and linguists who were famous and supported these false ideas were chosen. The first of these people consciously followed that preestablished plan. Those who followed were already fooled by the partial evidence which was many times inconclusive or even fake and perpetrated by dogmas and prejudice. Different types of pressure have also played an important part here. Then, in modern times, fear, servility, cowardliness and fear of losing one's function have added to these.”

“What I find amazing is that the others who knew the truth haven't said anything,” I said.

“Interests have taken a two-way action. On the one hand, they've introduced and spread this lame idea of the formation of the Romanian language and nation. On the other hand, they've taken care to stop and eliminate any study, proof or attempt to prove this forgery. There are people, not Romanians, who have burned wagons of documents and historical evidence of inestimable value to our country. Therefore, gradually, a kind of terror has been imposed in this field, a politics of the type ‘do as we tell you if you want to be all right.’ Unfortunately, many have given in to it.”

“They've practically imposed on us the idea that we ‘formed’ as a nation almost 2000 years ago and many have taken it for granted,” I said.

“The ethnogenesis can't have taken place between the 3rd and 7th centuries B.C. as historians tell us. There is no such thing. Each conqueror or regime came here with its own alternative. They say that the Romans Romanized us and gave us Latin. Stalin was here and it was said that the Slavs have played the most important part in the formation of the Romanian people because the Romanian language also has many Slavonic words. The Austrian-Hungarians said that we came from south of the Danube and actually had the same origins as the Albanians.”

“Why would they say that?” I asked with amazement.

“You can see that here lies the frailness and lack of common sense of such ideas that have been imposed on us. In reality, they have no support, unless you count a ridiculous notion. In support of the idea that the Romanians came from south of the Danube, from Albanian territory, it was argued that there are a few words in the Albanian language which are similar to Romanian words. The conclusion was therefore made that we had come from Albania. So, we couldn't have been here originally because we actually came from the South.”

“About 20 to 30 words. The problem with these words is that they don’t have the same meaning in both languages. This is one of the inconsistencies of their theory. The justifications and ‘evidence’ presented are simple matches and amateurish works which many times are absurd and even foolish. For example, Hungarian historians and linguists state that, for fear of barbarians, the population in the Carpathians area had all fled to the south of the Danube, leaving their country and that they remained there for approximately 1000 years, ‘borrowing’ words from Albanians. Thus, they conclude that the Hungarians were actually the first inhabitants of Transylvania and that we came back later, when they were already here.

These are purely propagandistic ‘studies’ and ‘ideas’ fabricated upon request in order to justify some claims and rights which, in reality, have no basis.”

“That’s impossible. What normal person could claim that we all left our country when it is known that our territory has been the most stricken and plundered by barbarians?” I asked without waiting for an answer.

“As you can see, some people could claim this. The population actually took a much easier refuge from the invaders by going into the mountains and woods of Transylvania rather than leaving the country completely. It has been suggested that these people went into an area which not only did not offer them more safety but to one that also lacked conditions necessary for living. This means that several million people are supposed to have left a vast territory which offered them a natural configuration unique in Europe and Asia, especially from the point of view of resources and living conditions. Further, they left this country empty in order to crowd into a very small and poor space south of the Danube. Not only is there no historical evidence of that or any other kind in this respect, but the very idea has a smell of intellectual imbecility, if I can say so. Just think about it.

The area of our Carpathians was known for its secular, unbreachable woods. Nobody dared to go in there because it was an unknown and dangerous area. After the fall of the Roman Empire, the Huns plundered many territories in Germany, France and even more to the south, in Italy, which are hundreds of kilometers away from here, but they didn’t dare to come a few tens of kilometers up to Transylvania due to these scary forests.

So, they had to invent something to say that they were here first and came up with the aberration about the population transferring from the Carpathians area to the land south of the Danube. In this respect, their only ‘proof’ that we returned from there are the 20 Albanian words in our lexicon and the fact that we couldn’t have had such words in our lexicon if we hadn’t lived south of the Danube with the Albanians. These statements are truly embarrassing. Apart from the reasons I already mentioned, there are other strong reasons. First of all, consider the fact that the depopulation of this territory would have meant depriving all Europe of its salt resources as our area gave salt to the whole continent through a complex process of human effort. There are no surface salt deposits anywhere else. Without salt, no people can support itself.”

“Salt? I don’t see the connection,” I said, amazed.

“There is a very important connection, but we will talk about it later. Without people to exploit the huge salt resources our country had and still has, how could the life and activity of people in other parts of Europe, and even Asia, have been ensured? Through its specific composition, salt is essential to man’s life. Without the Romanians’ continuity in Transylvania and the Carpathians’ area, nothing around the Peri-Carpathian region — which encompasses the other countries — could have survived. And, they say that we quickly left the country empty, running to the south of the Danube, to an area where we would have surely died because it didn’t provide good living conditions. So, we left the easiest and best living conditions of two continents to take refuge, for fear of the barbarians, to an area that provides almost nothing at all. In the case of the numerous invasions we were subject to, I’ve already told you how people acted. Part of the population fought against the invaders, and the rest gathered in the mountains, in the thick woods. No invader has ever ventured to go there.

“There are other historical inconsistencies claimed by Hungarian historians. They repeat that they have conquered us, but if the Romanian population was already south of the Danube as they state, then whom did they conquer in Transylvania? Even if this had been so, there is still no document or reference to a Hungarian conquest of this territory or its population. So, they came up with the ‘invention’ concerning the Albanian words which are actually Romanian words because, starting from the Romanian roots, they can be found in almost all Indo-European languages which does not account for their alleged Albanian origin. The problem here is that a large number of opinions have been expressed, but not a single rigorous study has been conducted to prove any of these claims. As I already told you, the same method of information manipulation is at work. A few famous linguists state an aberration with no proof or with a superficial and wrong justification. Afterwards, the others come and weave fantastic ‘scenarios.’

Thus, a historical and linguistic ‘background’ is ensured which is later invoked by might as clear evidence.”

“I’m curious. What Albanian words are they referring to?”

“Because they originated from Romanian, some words are similar, but many don’t have the same meaning. For example, the word baltă. In Romanian, it means ‘a surface filled with non-salty water.’ In Albanian, the word balte means ‘mud.’ Or, the word grapă, which means ‘to harrow’ here, is comparable to the Albanian word grep which means ‘fishing rod.’

Or, as one of our great contemporary linguists noted with fine irony, it could also refer to citrus fruit.”*

* Translator’s note: In some Romanian markets, the English word “grapefruit” is sometimes called “grepfruit” and thus the irony referred to here.

Cezar laughed with all his heart and made me smile as well.

“They haven’t conducted any etymological research covering the meaning or structure of the words. In fact, they haven’t done anything. However, they have spread silly conclusions which defy any form of intelligence.

There are many other sources and researches which prove the contrary of what the supporters of the “Romanian-Albanian theory” claim. These sources clearly prove the origin of entire word families from Indo-European languages which are related to the Romanian roots from which they have originated. For example, take the word gard.* You'll find it in almost all Indo-European languages, both in ancient and in modern times, but it is a Romanian word. It is the origin for all other words of its family which can be immediately seen after a study of its structure in other idioms.

Hungarian and other 'linguists' — and this quite unfortunately also includes some Romanian linguists — claim that this word comes from the Albanian word garth, but they don't have any means to prove this claim."

* Translator's note The word gard in Romanian means "fence."

I commented that such foreign "ideas" practically undermine our past and the true history of our people and language.

"Of course. This is a fact and it cannot be denied," Cezar approved. "Each of these 'theories,' let's say two or three, are actually what political regimes have attributed as being the origin to the Romanian people. But, nobody has ever said that we have originated here because foreigners don't like this. If they admitted this, they would immediately confirm the continuity of the Romanian people and of our language; and thus, any claim or ethnic pressure would stop. They would only be left with the alternative of military invasion which is difficult to accomplish because there are now completely different economic, military and geopolitical realities that are not the same as in the past."

"So, this is the main reason why they don't like it..."

"Yes, you can't just come and sweep off the Romanians, even if you really want to, simply by saying that Transylvania belongs to Hungarians, Muntenia (Muntenia refers to the southern region of Romania, known in the past as Wallachia) to the Bulgarians, Moldavia to the Russians and there you have it: there are no more Romanians. They can't say that Romanians were not here, that we are intruders. This would be an attitude like that of the Arabs who used to fight and win a battle and then plunder and destroy the cities. This happened until Mohammed's times. They did not, however, continue this practice afterwards. Essentially though, they had the same attitude of completely removing a population from the surface of the earth."

“What do you mean by saying a population? As far as I can tell, they used to destroy whole countries during their conquests.”

“There were no countries in ancient times. For example, how big was the territory of Dacia? Nobody knows for sure because Dacia didn’t actually exist. Countries were eventually created; but a long time ago, they didn’t exist. Actually, a country is an artificial limitation which lasts for a certain period of time. The etymological meaning of the word țară or țarină in our language means earth.* It refers to land, region, or living area. This is why we speak nowadays about Țara Bârsei or many other such areas in Romania.”

* Translator’s note: The word țară means “country” in Romanian while the word țarină means “ploughed field” or commune (including pastures, ploughed fields and forests).

 Translator’s note: This word is known in English as Burzenland. It refers to a historic and ethnographic area in southeastern Transylvania. The most important city in the region is Brasov.

“And, how did they draw the limitations? Did they just draw frontiers, as we do today?”

“No, they didn’t even have fences. They only knew that a certain garden belonged to one man or another. The ancient Romanians had no fences. In particular, they had no tall fences that would prevent people from seeing what they did in their own yard. This is in stark contrast to other populations who used such fences for privacy. There were no countries, but there were populations, and the Romanian nation has a continuity in the Carpathian-Danube area. There are many sources and documents which prove this. All that is necessary is the will to admit this and continue the research.”

“...if it hadn’t been for the prejudice you were talking about and the agenda driven interests.”

“I just wanted to underline the fact that we have a very complex and rich tradition here which clearly comes from a very distant past. The nature of our folklore and traditions is immemorial. If you ask a peasant ‘How do you know this?’ he will answer, ‘I learned it this way’ or ‘It’s been like that for ever.’ This is what they say. There is no motivation behind it. A response like ‘I learned it’ means that he was told by the family. Somebody has transmitted that information to him verbally and it has been preserved in such a manner until today, ever since immemorial times. One way or another, it has also been transmitted in other areas. After all, they all spoke the same language.”

“Something is still strange however. It is a huge area, more than half of Europe, where you say that people used to speak Romanian or dialects of Romanian. At the same time, we are talking about Dacians or Getians only in the Carpathians area where we live now. How is it possible that nobody has ever mentioned anything about this spreading of our language or tradition?”

“It’s not true. Many speak about this, but Romanian historians are mostly superficial and do not have the necessary training. They do not go to the sources; they do not read the Greek and Latin sources. Under these conditions, name confusions occur most of the time, false ethnicities are attributed and wrong conclusions are reached. For example, they speak about Dacians and Getians but also mention the Goths who are considered to be a separate people most of the time. Actually, thirty-six separate sources have been identified which prove that the Goths and the Getians are the same people. This is an example of the way in which rigorous research can clarify important aspects of history.”

“The Goths, the Getians, and the Dacians,” I said. “Then maybe there should be some more sources proving that we are in fact the Getians.”

“This identification has already been done. But, we don’t need sources because we already have the continuity I was telling you about. Peasants have had the same customs for ever. These are agrarian ancestral customs which have remained unchanged. They haven’t left their homes and their villages and haven’t spread into other regions. Fundamentally, they have remained on the same territory for thousands of years.”

“This is a rural community in its most accurate meaning.”

“It’s true. Only an agrarian civilization, with strong rural accents, has a chance to have a continuity. The later urban developments are perishable.

We can't even speak about civilization at this level. They come and go because they undergo a continuous transformation due to specific technological development which includes the life of consumption and competition. An agrarian community, however, is totally different. It is tied to the earth which it identifies as its home. This is why we are called Getians or 'men of the earth' which gives a more subtle meaning of continuity and very old age. This argument alone would be enough to solve the problem of our origin on this territory. Until 1900, generally speaking, people didn't leave their villages because they had no reason to leave. They had barely heard about Bucharest. Romanian peasants didn't leave.

Everything was transmitted verbally by parents. At that time, in Romanian villages, there was an archaic state of things; and even now, there are rural settlements of this kind, especially in our mountains. But, things haven't always been like this. In ancient times, they started to leave, but this departure wasn't a migration as it was the case with barbarian peoples. It was rather a departure of a part of the population from their original home to other regions. This was something like the flight of bees from the hive towards other areas, looking for pollen in flowers. Some return, others don't. In any case, however, the hive with a certain number of bees remains in its original place. I hope it is a good example for you to understand the phenomenon which took place in those times. People had started to spread out to different directions from the source which is here, in the Carpathians area. There is even the concept of population swarming which is related to the example I gave you. Bees also swarm, either around the hive or farther away from it."

"But, why did they leave?" I asked. "As far as I understand, they had no reason to leave."

"It's true, but when such a phenomenon occurs, it is mainly motivated by two arguments: either the living space was too small for the growing population, which leads to food problems, or they wanted to do something in particular. The second case is only for very spiritually advanced peoples such as ours was. They wanted to move the spiritual center from here to the East, but this hypothesis doesn't have many supporters."

"Why would they migrate East?" I asked.

“It’s about an esoteric meaning which is also associated to the cardinal direction. One of the great esoterics said that, in ancestral times, this territory was called the Black Country because it was the country where Cronos was worshiped and the symbolic color for time is black.”

“Cronos? This is the name of the file,” I stated.

“Yes, and it is not a random name. It is connected with the inscriptions discovered there which you can see in the photo. The text analysis can only be related to what was later discovered and to very high spirituality elements which belonged to the inhabitants of this territory.”

“When did they date the discovery?”

“Nobody knows. We haven’t had any clue, and from the photos and the professor’s statement, we can conclude that the place is filled with gold. As you said, it is a mountain of gold. The text which could be translated offers some clues but vague ones. The graphic signs are not really the ones we know. The writing is a bit altered in comparison with early writing, but it is still intelligible. This places it sometime between 500 and 1000 B.C. They gave us an accuracy percentage of 90% for the translation, but its meaning is troubling. The other characters cannot be dated as they are completely unknown.”

“I see that there is an analysis of the text.”

“Yes, for this purpose we have collaborated with a French institute which studies Indo-European civilizations because the linguistic aspects are combined with esoteric meanings. For example, they were quite amazed that the text includes the root kr. At first, they said it made no sense because it is not used in spoken language. Later, as they studied further, we realized that the text was not supposed to tell a certain story but was rather meant to serve as a step of initiation. The root kr is always related to time, and it is the basis for the word Cronos who was the god of time and later called Saturn. The difficulty was that the root was related to io which is the archaic original form for ‘I’ in our language.* The authentic Romanian peasant still doesn’t say ‘eu’ but ‘io.’ But, the ‘evolution’ of the language, guided by certain academic minds, has gradually imposed the word ‘eu’ because it was closer to Latin.”

* Translator's note: The current Romanian word for "I" is "eu."

"So, we have Cronos and I," I said, impatient to find out the conclusion.

"Yes, and the connection could only be the natural one: 'I, who am Cronos' or, just as well, 'Cronos is me.'"

"And, what is the meaning?"

"It can only be connected to a profound spiritual nature. The person who made the inscription states that he was Cronos who was worshiped as god of time. Can you think of a human being as you think of time? Cronos or Time was considered very old because time itself is assimilated to an ancestral existence. It is so old that it wasn't even born. So, it must be a metaphor with profound spiritual symbolism. Most probably, the person who made the inscription was a priest, a human being who had reached spiritual fulfillment. From this perspective, there could be a meaning. But, what comes next is unintelligible: sal-moș. This was the only point where the translators hesitated because sal has raised problems. Our people have indicated zăul instead of sal and I tend to think they are right. Cronos, who was the archaic patron god of the Romanian people, was called zăul-moș.* Moș also appears in the inscription and is correlated with someone very old and wise. Furthermore, the root kr sends us to another important element of our ancestors' tradition which presents a complex symbolism and chronology: Christmas, also known as Santa Claus. The profound meaning of Santa Claus and the god this represents, as well as the holiday associated with him, are no longer correctly perceived by people who are confused and have no clear picture of what Christmas represents; and, if this picture exists at all in their minds, it is very superficial. In ancient times, Christmas was an exalted celebration of time as the winter solstice occurred, marking the end of the old year and the beginning of the new year. This is the origin of the Romanian greetings "Happy New Year"  or "When we return next year, we hope to find you in good health." Later, the association with the Christian holiday was added and has complicated things even more. Ordinary men prefer to build a simple image about Santa Claus, something funny, prosperous and happy. It's just an exterior meaning. In conclusion, the inscription said that this was the holy place where Cronos – Santa Claus, the god of time — was alive, present and united the worlds. This last part shows us that the place was considered to represent the origin of time. I was telling you that this is troubling because it is related to the idea that here, in the Carpathians area, is the cradle of all civilizations and nations existing now and that this is the source of the primordial language, the Romanian language. As one of the greatest contemporary linguists said, it is the only natural language in Europe. Actually, it is exactly what scientists look for and do not find: the Indo-European language which is common to all nations which make up our modern civilization.”

* Translator’s note: The word moş means “old man” in Romanian while zăul is an archaic Romanian word for “the god.” It has been claimed that zăul-moş was the origin for the name Zamolxis, the god of the Dacians.

 Translator’s note: Both words come from the root kr in Romanian: Christmas is “Crăciun” and Santa Claus is “Moş Crăciun.”

 Translator’s note: If literally translated, this New Year’s greeting would mean “next year and many years from now on.”

I breathed in, feeling overwhelmed.

“They will never recognize this, no matter how much proof there is.”

“We’ll see. Things change all the time. But, returning to the translated inscription, think about the fact that it is almost 3,000 years old. If so, then when was the unknown one written? And by whom? We’ll probably never know. I tried finding out by using the time travel device, but it’s the most powerful barrier I’ve ever experienced. It can’t be breached in any way.

When you hear what followed in Professor Constantin’s statement, you’ll better understand why. This will explain what the first inscription actually meant.”

“I wouldn’t want to miss the explanation you started concerning the migration. I believe it is also related to the spreading and transformation of the language and this is very attractive to me. If we don’t talk now, I don’t know when we will get another chance.”

It was true. Lately, due to his new responsibilities and functions, Cezar had been difficult to approach outside of business-related issues. Such an opportunity was very special and I didn’t want to miss it. Besides, the atmosphere that evening was quiet, offering an adequate background for such discussions. I was very happy when he accepted my offer to continue the discussion.

“There was an extraordinary spiritual field in this territory, but proof in this respect has only been indirect so far,” Cezar said. “But, the phenomenal discovery in the Șureanu Massif also shows us the actual dimension of this truth. You’ll see later that it is huge. It is known that, from an esoteric perspective, massive gold deposits always reveal an area where the spirituality of the people have reached very high peaks. But, this is not about gold ore, no matter how rich the nuggets are. It’s about a real mountain of gold or at least a large part of it that is made of gold.”

“I was not aware that there was a connection between this metal and spirituality,” I said.

“All things are interconnected and especially those which predominantly attract each other. Gold is a very pure and noble metal. It is not in vain that it has raised and still raises such an interest in people who feel and recognize its high vibration, even if only unconsciously. Unfortunately, they relate to it as a means of obtaining income.”

“But, it hasn’t always been like this. In ancient times, its worth was especially high for priests. I didn’t imagine, however, that it could even represent a physical factor which corresponds to spiritual energy. I thought it was just a symbolic aspect.”

“Noble metals and precious stones are substances which channel certain occult influences and energies. Their ‘market’ value is just the profane form of admitting this. Why don’t you treat stanium or iron the same way? It is because they do not have the same level of high vibration. Out of all, gold is considered the best concentrator of subtle spiritual energy. Even its yellow color is in agreement with this and shows us that the place where there are rich or very rich gold deposits was, in a way, impregnated during a certain period of history when there was a very high spirituality. For common men or modern scientists, all this means nothing. But, I am now talking from an occult perspective which has nothing to do with materialist conceptions. In a mysterious way, the spirituality of a population is especially developed in areas where there is much gold and our case is something unique. The presence of this gold mountain cannot be explained from a geological perspective, or at least I don't think it can. There must have been phenomena of another nature which are unknown to us. After all, it might have been a combination of spiritual and geological action. I don't know. But, what I can tell you is that it is by far something extraordinary and its meaning is very profound. You can't treat this discovery simply as a huge gold deposit. It's much more than that. It is a phenomenal spiritual field which has sustained us, the Romanian people, and has enabled us to keep something of that which was from a long time ago."

I took a deep breath as I was nervous because Cezar's statement touched the profound origin of our people.

"Now things add up," he continued. "A huge concentrator of spiritual energy is like a formidable magnet of subtle and very high energies that supports a culture around it which is very advanced from a spiritual perspective, even if the physical manifestation of it was very simple and its activity was comprised of agriculture and herding. Due to this phenomenal concentration of spiritual energy, magnetized in the Șureanu Massif by the huge quantity of gold found here, other space-time distortion phenomena have occurred which you'll learn about a bit later. The spiritual energy dissipated radially, covering the territory of our country but also following the line of very rich gold deposits in this regions as well in other mountains, especially the Apuseni Mountains.* In a way, the population that formed here was continuously bathed in these high vibrations and this has quickly led to the development of the highest spirituality. It wasn't just isolated or limited to only two or three individuals with a remarkable level of spiritual development but to almost all of the inhabitants of this area who, in the beginning, demonstrated this incredibly high level of consciousness elevation. The specific vibration of this area was so intense and profound that the power has been transmitted over thousands of years, even up to this point in time. It is now, of course, much more diminished in comparison to what it used to be, but it still explains many specific characteristics of our people, folklore and language. This is why the population has remained here ever since its remote beginning. This also explains other extraordinary discoveries which include: the Projection Hall in the Bucegi Mountains; the very special tectonic formation underlying the territory of our country; a combination of different forms of topographical relief over such a small area; and the concentration of surprising soil richness. All of these features are restricted to this area of the Carpathians and a bit to the south, reaching as far as the Danube. They are all connected to the phenomenal spiritual force of the inhabitants of those times. And, they also explain our continuity which is unique across the continents because this was once the spiritual center of the world. Over time, natural laws, which included those of cyclicity, applied and the spiritual level has dropped, but the center of spiritual influence has remained with its potentiality becoming more and more pronounced in these times.”

“And, at what point in time would you place the extraordinary beginning of the spirituality of our people?” I asked in hope of getting a better idea of the age of our people.

*The Apuseni Mountains are the Western Carpathians and is where Radu Cinamar experienced a space-time translation to Tibet as is described in Transylvania Moonrise.

“We can’t say for sure, but tradition and esoteric sources seem to unanimously indicate the period following the end of the ice age, after the last great flood. This means sometime between 9,500 – 10,500 B.C., so about 12,000 years ago. Even though the numbers are relative, the variation cannot be more than 500-700 years, more or less.”

“It’s a way of referring to the great flood,” I said, “but there are works which prove that there has never been a flood covering the whole planet as the Bible says but only in certain areas.”

“Of course. Archeological evidence has been found which shows successive floods that took place at certain intervals of time. The events in the Bible are mostly reduced to the Sinai peninsula which was confronted at that time with such a flood. So, there must have been a great flood about 11,000 years before Christ which was possibly related to the disappearance of Atlantis. Afterwards, everything began all over again.”

“Where did everything begin?” I asked. “Where did the population come from?”

“Why did it have to come from somewhere? Some of what remained is simply what used to be in this area, but this was the new beginning. Did someone plant them there? No. Anyway, spiritual development seems to have been very quick and at an unimaginable level. This explains the idea of the spiritual center of the world. Afterwards, as I said, they started to decay after a few thousands of years. They continued, however, to remain on the same territory, right here in the area of the Carpathians, especially in the mountains, and in Transylvania.”

“But, they didn’t know that this was the spiritual center of the world,” I said.

“It’s true. They mainly remained because they had extraordinary resources here which included salt, gold, and everything necessary for living, but the spiritual element has actually kept them united and attached to these places. After 4,000–5,000 years, maybe they no longer knew that the places where they lived had been impregnated by that extraordinary spiritual force of their ancestors and that this had been the spiritual center of the world, but they continued this transmitted tradition without alteration in its deeply spiritual and occult form. Because — you ask yourself — why do we still have this extraordinary folklore today? How could it have remained for thousands of years and been transmitted from father to son? It has remained.”

“And, why hasn’t it been perpetuated for so long in other areas?” I asked.
“Why not in Finland or in Malta?”

“It couldn’t have remained back then because, a long time ago, there were no nations in Europe. There was tundra and ice up to the middle of today’s Germany and up to Northern Maramureş* in our country. From the point of view of living space, human civilization began from these limits downward because there were no living conditions to the North. The glaciation was barely withdrawing. The first and only ones that could be said to have formed a community lived here in the Carpathians area, especially in the area of the Apuseni Mountains in Transylvania and in this area of the Southern Carpathians. Everything began and developed here: the people, the language, the spirituality, and the customs. There might have been other clusters of people in other areas of Europe, but they were insignificant from the point of view of the number of individuals and they must have been nomadic. This is why they didn’t resist. Back in those times, due to climate conditions, the population had been significantly reduced in numbers. When a few hundred or thousands of people managed to get together in a certain territory, they were very sizable relative to the entire population of the planet.”

* Translator’s note: Maramureş is an area in Northern Romania.

“Couldn’t they have taken refuge in other parts of Europe? Did they have no other option?” I asked, puzzled.

“The glaciation maps for Europe that have been drafted by scientists show the ice covered Stockholm, Berlin and Moscow. So, nobody could have taken refuge in those areas. The limit where living conditions began and ended was the Carpathians. It began in the northern area of today’s Transylvania. Westward, there was mountain glaciation from 1,000-1,500 meters above ground level so there could be no settlements as there was ice everywhere. The glaciation was withdrawing to the north in different stages. It is certain that the Pannonian Lake started to drain around 10,000 B.C., after the withdrawal of the glaciation. What remained afterwards is known today as Lake Balaton in Hungary. Actually, its name was Bălătău as the only spoken language in those times was the Romanian language.

The name was later changed to Balaton. The Danube then broke the area known today as the Iron Gates and drained the Getian Lake which came from the Thetis Sea. This great sea covered the whole territory of Romania a few million years ago. As a result, there were lakes along the Danube which were traces of the great Getian Lake which gradually drained and dried out. Thus, a warmer climate was ensured because the remnants of the ice age lasted until 11,000 B.C.. We can therefore say that Transylvania was privileged in comparison with other areas because it had a better climate. The rest of Europe had only lichens, moss and gradations of ice up to the poles.”

The information was too much. I was trying to keep up, but I was just barely becoming familiar with this subject. I also wanted to correctly understand the meaning of those times and the way everything began. My perception was facilitated by the fact that I had already seen glimpses of times very similar to the ones Cezar spoke about in the holograms from the Projection Hall. Everything checked out, but I now believed I had a chance to add up all of the elements into a unitary whole.

“Okay. So there was a remnant population in the area of Transylvania and in the western mountains of our country, but there might also have been areas with warm climates to the south.”

“Maybe, but there was nothing left. The best conditions were here. The mountains are necessary for a profound and sustainable spirituality because they provided a different structure for the human condition, both psychologically and physically. Even though it was called the Black Country, thus taking over the symbolism of Time which they worshiped, the inhabitants of this area were not black. The blackness is symbolic because, from a physical perspective, esoteric tradition tells us that they were blond with blue eyes, were tall and had white skin. This is the typology here in the Carpathians area.”

I told Cezar that, according to Plato, the ancient Greeks were also blond with blue eyes.

“This was the situation in 2,000 B.C.,” he replied. “But, many things have happened since. The ancestors of the Greeks left this area. What we know for sure is that between 10,000 B.C. and now, the oldest civilization was in this region. We don’t have any information before 10,000 B.C.”

“Because there are no other traces in any other place and this is how science works. Let’s say that we also have other methods of investigation — which you already know about—but they cannot be made public yet. And, let’s say that the research to find the oldest civilization, from which it all began, started a few decades ago. They have corroborated the maps and archeological discoveries and have discovered that the most important area is right here; more precisely, in Transylvania and in the Carpathians area in Romania. People did not leave this place for thousands of years until the swarming I was talking about began, around 3,000-4,000 B.C.”

“Do you mean that the population remained in Transylvania from between 9,000–10,000 B.C. to 3,000 B.C.?” I asked, amazed.

“Yes. As I said, they had no reason to leave. The peasants of those times didn’t go on excursions. They have kept this incredible stability in their birth places until today. Even today, authentic peasants barely leave their villages and do not go anywhere else. This is an ancient civilization. They didn't take three boats and go to see if they could steal some gold. It's tough; but, after all, it's the truth."

I smiled at the ironic hint Cezar made to Columbus's expedition to America and the later conquests carried out by Spain.

"Here we have all the right conditions. The climate is good, there is salt at the surface, and there are salty springs," he continued to explain. "On the entire arch of the Carpathians, Romania is the only country which has salt at the surface. This means you can take a tool and take zlatnă, a word which means salty water. This is the origin of the names of cities like Slatina in Oltenia and Zlatna in Transylvania. They cooked with salty water but that was not all they did. Even today, some people sell sacks of salt lumps. There are mountains where salt is extracted from the surface. This territory was called 'Europe's salt cellar.' In comparison with other areas — for example, in the southern part of the continent which you asked about — salt is quite rare. The Romans also accepted payment in salt which, in case you didn't know, led to our word salariu.* If you spilled the salt, this would lead to a quarrel. This doesn't mean they were superstitious but rather that salt was difficult to obtain. So, there were resources here in our country and the area was privileged. We had rivers and lakes with fish and people could practice fishing. There was also salt and this gave a much better quality to their lives because, as I already told you, it is very difficult to maintain life without salt. There were also minerals and fruit trees. They could therefore practice gardening which is the predecessor of agriculture. Furthermore, they had herds because there were rich pastures. There were also the necessary conditions for transhumance: mountains and fields. Where else did people have this possibility? This is the only area that was not covered in ice. Transhumance is the best form of shepherding. It is necessary and not just a method invented by these people. Due to transhumance, people continuously ensured food for their sheep. In winter, they descended to the fields; and in summer, they climbed the mountains. There weren't conditions for such an activity anywhere else."

* Translator's note: This word means "wage" in Romanian.

"But you said that they eventually started to migrate," I said.

“Yes, I was talking about the Indo-European swarming because it was believed that the Aryans initially invaded India and then migrated west to Europe and civilized it. It’s just as they said before the Middle Ages: the Earth was in the center and the sun and all other planets revolved around the Earth.”

“How did that migration actually happen?” I asked.

“The first one to conduct such an investigation was Cambridge University in Great Britain about 100 years ago. They wanted to write a history of India because India was a British colony in those times and they looked in the Vedas for arguments to establish the departing point of the Aryans.”

“How did they conduct this research?”

“They took the Vedas and looked at the flora and fauna described and at the occupations of the people in those times. And, they concluded there were no camels, no elephants, and no tigers; but there were elm trees and ducks for a couple of examples. Then they did a search to see if they were in present day India. No, they are not. So, it was concluded that was not the place of the Vedic stories and epics. And, they tried to see where all of those elements existed, where people could have activities such as shepherding and agriculture as well as elm trees, etc. The idea is that they found all kinds of elements pointing them to an approximate area between the Carpathians and Bohemia because such trees grow only in this region. Only here, can you be both a shepherd and agrarian. This is the only place that has the animals mentioned in the Vedas and which do not really exist in India.”

“This means that the migration is actually reversed, that they didn’t come from India and populate Europe but that they left towards Asia and reached India,” I anticipated.

“Exactly. After a long time, the sun was correctly placed in the center and the Earth and all other planets revolved around it. This is an analogy to the way in which things really happened with regards to the swarming of the population. But, you should know that this alternative is not accepted today, at least not completely. The manipulation is terrible.”

“Why is the situation like this?” I asked, amazed. “Why do they continue to support an aberration? This has certain risks and needs an effort to support the lie.”

“For the same reasons I’ve already mentioned. These were the conclusions of Cambridge University which is the most serious, authoritarian and famous university in the world. It’s a kind of ‘nursery’ for Nobel Prize awards; but even so, they have kept these studies on the borderline because, otherwise, they would have had to admit to the final conclusion that the population swarming actually started here in our Carpathians area and with everything I’ve said about it primordiality. This didn’t suit them at all. We’ve already talked about this.”

“Yes, we have. And, what was the final conclusion reached by the researchers at Cambridge University?”

“They said that the origin of the Aryans was right here in Transylvania, outward from the Carpathians towards Hungary, Austria, and up to Bohemia. They said that the flora and fauna described in the Hindu texts written 3,000 –4,000 years ago can be found here, but these were the only elements that they considered. If we also take other elements into consideration which are related to archeological discoveries, we can then clearly define the area.”

“Were there no state interests that were opposed to these conclusions?” I asked.

“Yes, there were, even if not openly, because we are still talking about the authority of Cambridge University, and this cannot be so easily overcome. There are tens of hypotheses trying to place the origin or the Aryans, a few of them being really fantastic. Some said that the Aryans came from the Altay Mountains where it is known that the outside temperature is 3° Celsius for eleven months out of the year. What agriculture could people have developed under these conditions? What flora and fauna could exist there that could be similar to the ones described in the Vedas? I gave you this example so that you could see how far speculation can go in order to deny that it all began here, in Romania.”

“Now, there will always be people who are smarter and can contradict you, no matter how clear the evidence is that you present. Pride and foolishness are good partners in such cases,” I said, somewhat upset.

“Proof does exist. There is a lot of well documented evidence. I told you that the Aryans’ origin was moved everywhere by scientists at different times. They tried to prove that the Aryans came from anywhere else but here. The researchers from Cambridge University were the first to say that this was the starting point. It’s true that they named this area Hungary, but they described the geography of this area: the Carpathian Mountains and the Balkan Mountains. Of this there can be no doubt. Actually, it is absolutely natural that the flora and fauna are present in a wider region that neighbors the space of the respective civilization and without having a clear delimitation. But, this is the area which they say was the source of the swarming, around 3,500 B.C.. The Cambridge theory fully supports the primordiality of the Carpathians area. It obviously strengthens it. But, as we go back in time, the area inhabited by people is only reduced to Ardeal.*

No other alternative is possible. Even the name Ardeal gives indications in this respect. Ardeal makes a reference to ari, the hills of the ari, which means the area where the ones called ari, later known as Aryans, came from. In the ancient language, letter inversion is common, so ar became ra.

Some researchers stated that they found a population called Rmania in the Vedas. Ra and ma are primordial roots: ra-ma. Ra refers to light and flowing as in the Romanian words rază and soare which mean “ray” and “sun” respectively in English. The letter r (the sound of which occurs in both words) or its sound generally refers to flowing movement which is why it is associated with solar activity.

* Translator’s note: Ardeal signifies the region in Western Romania known as Transylvania

On the other hand, the ancient word man means om. Om is actually the inversion of man: om-mo, ma; and n means closing the mouth; hence, man.

Anyway, Manu is considered the primordial man, at least according to the ancient Hindu, so this is also indirect proof that the Romanian people were primordial in the area where we live now. So, we have ra-man, light-man, meaning the “men of the light.” This is how we defined ourselves in those times, by making a direct reference to the exceptional spiritual value of the inhabitants of these places. It's possible that the initial form was ar-man, after which it was inverted and became ra-man, and then it turned into Romanian.

* Translator's note: Ardeal signifies the region in Western Romania known as Transylvania.

 Translator's note: Om means "man" in Romanian.

 Translator's note: The Romanian word for "Romanian" is Român.

"This is perfectly logical and adds up with the other evidence," I said.

"Yes, and this is acknowledgment that this space was the primordial source from which later all other peoples, what we refer to as Indo-Europeans today, originated and spread. This was also the conclusion of thorough research done on a completely different basis."

"What do you mean?" I asked.

"In the '70s, Marija Gimbutas, a Lithuanian archeologist and professor at the University of California in Los Angeles, was appointed head of a vast research project conducted in Europe meant to document and draft the map of the discoveries related to the Neolithic Age, 5,000 years B.C.. The idea was the same: to discover the starting point for the human civilization as we know it. She went to all major archeological institutes and to all prestigious museums in Europe and asked the following question: Do you have traces dating back 5,000 years B.C.? The French said no, the Italians said no, and so did the Germans, Swedish, etc. She then drafted a map of those who answered affirmatively and named the results: Old Europe. The rest was blank. There was nothing anywhere."

"The fact that they said they had no archeological evidence doesn't mean that it didn't exist," I said.

"There are no traces of Neolithic civilization 5,000 years B.C.. I showed you, the land was simply uninhabited; it couldn't have been inhabited. There was nothing but forest and ice which withdrew gradually."

"It seems incredible that there was nobody in those areas. If they searched for clues of civilizations, where was the population around 5,000-6,000 B.C.?"

“It was restricted to our Carpathians area, its farthest border being the Peri-Carpathian region which also encompasses a small area around the mountains that includes Pannonia, Illyria to the south and Sarmatia to the north which is today’s Poland. But to refer to the population of those times as living in Greece or Crete or who knows what other areas would definitely be an exaggeration. These areas appeared much later.”

“They have no traces dating back as far as 5,000 years ago...no pottery, nothing.”

“You mean that there was nobody else on this continent? If I had walked, I wouldn’t have met anyone?”

“There might have been some people but very few. The population was much reduced. But, it was here in our country where the focus was. Marija Gimbutas later wrote in a book that Romania was the heartland, the ‘original land.’”

“In comparison with the Romanian ancestral civilization, Sumerians were babies. Many maps of the different Neolithic Age civilizations have been drafted. If they are compared with today’s states, the conclusion is that they all include Romania or parts of Romania as well as some territories outside of Romania. And, when overlaying them, the conclusion is that all these maps extend from the inside to the outside; not chaotically, but clearly starting from a certain area which is our Carpathians area.”

“Their interest is not to do this. We always go back to the same problem. Incompetence and superficiality are combined with occult political interests and manipulation. No matter how revolting it is to some people, this is the truth. We know it very well from our own sources.”

“But, what happens when you say this — when you present the evidence? To be honest, it seems absurd. How can you deny something that is obvious and already proven?”

“If you talk to diplomats, academics and scientists, you’ll silence them momentarily; but afterwards, they’ll continue on as I have already told you.

They’ll say that they have certain political orders, that they want to keep their positions and other similar arguments.”

“At least we know that we have the proof,” I said.

“Archeological and language evidence is overwhelming. In European civilization, there is nothing older than what was found here. For example, before the island of Ada-Kaleh was destroyed by creating the reservoir for the Danube hydroelectric power plant, Ceaușescu ordered archeologists to see what else they could discover because most of the evidence is now under water. They dug up the banks of the Danube on the Romanian and former Yugoslavian sides. Their discoveries are clearly from the same civilization, but they differ in terms of chronology. The artifacts in Romania are 1,000–2,000 years older than the Yugoslavian discoveries.

They are therefore separated by the Danube. We can also find some things in their territory, but the oldest are here, even if they speak about Lepenski-Vir, the name of the culture where the evidence came from. They tried to impose another name than the Romanian name, which comes from this territory, thus insinuating that this was the dominating older culture. But, it is well documented what we have found on the Romanian banks of the Danube, namely the Schela Cladovei culture, which is older than the Lepenski-Vir culture.”

“How do they know this? If there is any doubt, they’ll probably hang on to it and place it in front of all other arguments.”

“We know that they are older because they have all been carbon-dated. It’s all dated; these are no assumptions. And, this includes the beans of carbonized cereals they’ve discovered in these archeological sites, in the caves on the banks of the Danube...everything. They gave the findings to three foreign laboratories to avoid any problems or errors. These labs were in Holland, Germany and England. Their estimation was 7,800 years B.C..

So, people practiced agriculture in those times. They cultivated cereals.

Works have been written based on the archeological discoveries of this culture and a temporal scale of the discoveries has been drafted which goes up to 11,500 years before Christ. There is a difference of 4,000 years in comparison with the findings on the other side of the Danube in the former Yugoslavian Republic. This is how long it took for civilization to cross this border. The stability and continuity of civilization on our territory has been phenomenal. This, of course, is also reflected in tradition.”

“If they were agrarians in those times, it means that they had a clear system of cultural values because, as far as I know, agriculture involves rhythms, cycles, and rituals,” I noted.

“This has changed the whole conception of how and where agriculture has appeared. They thought it had been brought to Europe from somewhere in Asia, but it was actually here on Romanian territory almost 8,000–9,000 years ago. According to the Cambridge University researchers who conducted the study, people remained here and were agrarians before the population swarming that took place around 3,500 B.C.. Until then, they remained here in the center. If you look at a map, you’ll see that this area, the Carpathians and Transylvania, lies at about the same distance from Spain, the Ural Mountains and the northern extremity. We are in the center of Europe and we mock the ‘specialists’ who wrote the Encyclopedia Britannica where they said that the Carpathians are a mountain chain in central Europe, but they don’t know how come Romania is presented as a country from Southeastern Europe when, in fact, our country encompasses most of the Carpathians. Europe ends at the Ural Mountains, not here, so we cannot say that we are in Eastern Europe. Therefore, we are right in the center of Europe. It’s therefore obvious that people have left radially in the following directions: 2,900 kilometers to the Ural Mountains and 2,900 kilometers to Spain. But, they always followed the ‘road of the salt.’ The fact that we have so much salt and that we even have it at the surface is another argument proving that the swarming began here where it spread and created the various peoples. I have already begun telling you about this.”

“Why do you call it ‘the road of the salt’? I don’t understand.”

“If they travelled for so long, they changed with the season until they arrived there,” I said.

“They could have stayed and spent the winter somewhere else, but they surely got there. The idea is that they started to carry bags of salt on donkeys until they reached these areas because, more to the south, in the Balkan Mountains, there was no salt. Sheep are not fertile without salt and the flock perishes. This is why the ‘roads of salt’ were created and persisted for thousands of years.”

“But, why did they decide to go so far?” I asked. “After all, they left the center. Who would have liked that?”

“It wasn’t about liking it or not. It was a matter of necessity, and this appears to be more and more obviously in that period, around 3,500–3,000 B.C.. They were probably going there for transhumance only and they searched for lower plains to the south. But, they had already surely begun to over populate and this led to food, living and other problems. So, they began swarming in order to free the area.”

“But how did they leave? Just randomly? Did they leave their homes and go wherever their eyes took them?”

“No. They had a very simple system when they couldn’t decide. They drew straws and the extra men left. There was even a poem saying that, when they were too many and couldn’t ensure food where they lived, they drew straws to decide who should leave. This is how the great population swarming began: radially from the center, moving in the main directions and on along the ‘roads of salt.’”

“But, how did they know that they could still ensure food? They couldn’t just measure the quantity of food. And, after all, I don’t think this goes like this: one year, you have food; the next you don’t and therefore you leave. Then, you have food once again; then you don’t.”

“But, it’s not far from the truth either. In any case, they started to realize that their living conditions were worsening, the level of living was dropping and more and more problems occurred. And, they realized this was caused by the large number of people. Thus, they started to leave. Over time, this has led to great transformations in culture, population and language. Leaving their homeland in the center, they first lost cohesion with the original source. They have somehow been torn apart from the primordial unity which ruled here, where their home had been for thousands of years.

As is natural, the original language started to split into dialects, thus changing a lot. This happened in many regions of Europe and was directly related to the climate, topography and certain vibrational characteristics of the respective region. To all of these, we must of course add the different periods of swarming which are probably decisive and explain the apparition of the Greek, Celtic, Latin, Northern, and other ‘languages.’ All of these factors have had a decisive influence on the language changes. And, the fact that they could no longer contact the center (their original homeland) after their departure has amplified the process even more.”

“But, they didn’t all leave at the same time,” I said. “It was probably a staggering as you said because, as far as I understand, this was a wide process which took place over a large period of time.”

“Of course they left in successive waves and in different periods of time. This has made them even more different, separating them into distinctive communities, each one with its own characteristics. Even if they had a common background, they were nevertheless different and this has of course affected the language. The best example is the one of British English versus American English. There was a population swarming from England to America 400 years ago and you can see for yourself the differences in their language: accents, expressions, words, and even dialects. And, keep in mind the fact that we are only talking about a few hundreds of years during which communication with their origin, the starting point being England, was constant at all times, and this matters a lot.”

“Things are different in this case, however, because Americans are not the followers of the English. They are the most mixed nation on Earth,” I observed. “The official language, English, is their only connection with England, because they were initially an English colony. It’s just a convention. It’s not the language of that population.”

“It’s true. I only wanted to make a reference to the communication between those who left and their origin. In ancient times, when the swarming began, this communication practically didn’t exist. This is why I said that a sort of rupture, a separation from the center took place with inevitable consequences with regard to the language, their knowledge and habits.

When you go far away from your home, there is no more interest to keep the language. There is no rigor in maintaining it, and it thus transforms according to the environment and the needs. But even so, the Romanian language was spoken everywhere because it was the foundation of all other later languages. It was spoken in dialects; it had characteristics which corresponded to the respective areas, but people could communicate with each other. There was a common word basis, even a considerable one, which ensured fluency in communication. This was until they started to introduce the official languages, which are actually fabricated, just as I've already told you. In France, for example, in the Occitan province, there are old people who don't speak French, but they speak a kind of distorted Romanian. In England, they have imposed a language similar to the existing one, but the written form of words is closer to the Romanian words while the pronunciation has been modified to give the language a particular character. This has happened the same way everywhere except Romania because here there is nothing to impose. Here, the mother-tongue, the original language, is spoken which is sufficient in itself without dialects. For the rest, they have imposed artificially fabricated languages in schools.

In some places they have succeeded. In others, as you well know, they have not. All of these language dysfunctions came from the fact that they tried to transform the original without having their own basis. The closest to the Romanian peasants' language is Sanskrit which is also called "the language of the gods." There are many Romanian words in Sanskrit and some words are even identical. You can also see them in the toponymies.

For example, there is Deva which means 'god' or 'deity' in Sanskrit and there is Călimani, Călimănești and many other derived words which are known in Oriental tradition as Kali and Kal who are the goddess and god of time in Hinduism.* The discovery in the Șureanu Massif is also extraordinary from this point of view because it actually shows us the spiritual and traditional reality on this territory. Cronos, Kala and Crăciun all represent the same 'character' in the spiritual tradition of the area. This is where it started from and it later reached India, not the other way around. From the archeological evidence and the point of view of the period of time, it is impossible for it to have been otherwise."

"And this evidence hasn't been displayed in museums?" I asked. "I think there are very many of them."

* Deva and Călimănești are the names of towns in Romania while Călimani is the name of a national park.

 Translator's note: The word Crăciun means "Christmas" in Romanian.

"There are many old cultures which have been discovered in Romania. Some of them are the oldest and this has puzzled the international scientific community, but everyone pretends that they don't exist. Take, for example, the famous culture from Cucuteni in Eastern Romania."

"To what period has it been dated?"

"Around 3,500 B.C. according to archeologists. As for the cultures, they can't be exactly dated because they have successive phases and approximations of hundreds of years intervening. But still, a clear idea of their date remains. As for the Cucuteni culture, they have discovered tens of thousands of statues and pottery fragments, and I think this culture is dated around 7,000 B.C.. Then, there is the culture of Tărtăria which is also near the Șureanu Massif. Some consider it controversial because the engraved clay tablets cannot be precisely dated, but this writing is 2,000 years older than the writing which was allegedly invented in Sumer. This places the culture of Tărtăria around 5,700–5,500 B.C.. And, many other cultures have been discovered which contain many conclusive objects or fragments. They therefore couldn't keep track of the number of statues and Neolithic archeological traces found in Romania. Sacks of archeological discoveries have been thrown away because nobody can inventory so many.

In Germany, if they find a bone or a fragment of pottery, they immediately brush it and display it in a museum. Here, we don't have people to keep track of the discoveries, not to mention a means of storing them. And all this richness in archeological relics proves the same idea: that this was the center, the origin of the following civilizations. Of course, discoveries have been made in other places too, but the oldest are here, in the Carpathians-Danube area."

"There is also the tradition and the language," I said, "but returning to the swarming, they reached India and this is the direction towards which most people swarmed. Isn't it odd?"

"Swarming towards the East is something more special. You saw that it involved the Aryans, Sumer, the Hindu civilization. It was a movement of part of the population over a distance greater than 5,000 kilometers which took place gradually. Esoterics say that swarming towards India, the East, was not actually swarming but that it represented a spiritual mission which had to be fulfilled, meaning that they had to move the spiritual center from here to there.”

“In order to protect spiritual tradition by moving it to a place which is safer from the terrible conquests which targeted the Romanian territory.”

“Nevertheless, traces and names have remained from so many gods who are now interpreted as Oriental,” I noted.

“All of the main gods are present. We can especially recognize their names in toponymies. Even if so many thousands of years have passed, they are still here: Deva – Deva; Iași – Ișă; Călimani – Kali, Kala; Mangalia – Mangala; Şîva – Şiva. Even the name of the mountain massif where this phenomenal discovery has been made is significant: Şureanu; but it initially was Sureanu, until the ‘s’ softened and became ‘ş’. Furthermore, the suffix ‘eanu’ was added later. It is specific to the last millennium because it used to be Sorea, Mount Sorea. In its turn, this name came from Suria by converting ‘i’ to ‘e’ which is a weaker vowel that is easier to pronounce. In Oriental tradition, Surya is the Sun god who is considered the supreme light that gives life, heat, and richness but also the profound spiritual symbol of immortality. If you think that they have discovered what is in fact a mountain of gold, and if we consider the fact that gold has almost everywhere been considered the symbol of the Sun, you can immediately get an idea of the spirituality and occult knowledge of the ancient inhabitants of this territory because, one way or another, they knew what kind of mountain this is, what is inside it and this is why they named it so, in order to have a clear symbol of its content. In time, people have forgotten this hidden meaning which fewer and fewer people knew anyway and thus its understanding faded away. Not even the legend remained because it was something so important and secret that nothing has ever happened there which involved a larger number of people and thus the news was never spread to the masses. The absolute secret probably vanished with the last priests. Only the name has remained and it is still kept, but people no longer understand its true meaning.”

“Some people we are...we have everything here, yet it seems that nothing is ours,” I noted, with bitterness.

“It’s true. It is caused by circumstances and manipulation. It all started here, but they say it came from somewhere else. It is proven that agriculture began here, yet they say it came from the Far East. Metallurgy began here, yet they say it originated in Antalya.”

“You haven’t mentioned this before,” I said, drawing Cezar’s attention.

“The oldest metal furnace has been found at Câmpeni in the Carpathians and it is dated around 4,000 B.C.. They picked it up and took it to the British Museum in London, but they still claim that metallurgy was first discovered in Antalya. It’s odd to draw the conclusion that a population without rich metal deposits would teach us, who have many metal deposits, how to process them. Here, practically all kinds of statues can be found.

Others have only one statue representing a deity, here and there, but this means that this is where the tradition of worshiping that deity came from as if they had all thrown them over the fence to our yard and we just kept them intact without knowing anything about them. Relics of not one but many Vedic deities have been found in this space and in our habitats. They couldn’t have been borrowed. Nobody can come and do this, just bring you an esoteric tradition. And it’s not only that. We gave them the language and word families, but every word in the Romanian language is explained as coming from another language. This space was the origin of the swarming of the population towards the East and towards Europe which has been scientifically proven, but they claim that we came to Europe from the East, as migrating tribes. As you can see, it’s a total inversion of values which is sought to be maintained in order to create a false and unfavorable idea concerning the Carpathians area where we live. In the best case, we get to be fully ignored.”

“This is amazing, but I don’t think that our people have tried too hard to prove the truth. It is the same languor and stick-in-the-mud, as if they hit our heads and made us all idiots,” I broke out.

“Until several hundreds of years ago, the situation wasn’t like this; but immediately after the period of the dignified rulers, who had faith and strong Romanian souls, a rupture occurred between the governing class and the peasants. The latter started to be considered fools, uncultivated and good only for work although they were dressed in white, were clean and when you see their celebration clothes, you feel embarrassed with our ‘modern’ clothes. They put them to work and made them idiots. They had no power to fight back; and when they did, uprisings ended in bloodshed.

After this rupture, things have never been the same again. They lost the original spirit, losing their power through this kind of oppression. But, the primary background still exists. It is implanted in us through the primordial tradition we represent.”

“Exactly. It needs a kind of awakening, taking a stand, interest and initiative in order to become active,” Cezar approved. “This applies to any nation, but I believe here the responsibility is greater because this was the center and, by the same law of cyclicity, it will be once again.”

I remained thoughtful, looking at the photos on the display screen. Even if it were only for that place discovered inside of the mountain, it would have been enough to justify the idea of Romania being spiritual center of the world. This goes beyond any idea of worldly richness, elevation in worldly life or commerce. The unimaginable accumulation of physical richness is transposed into an exceptional spiritual richness which has undoubtedly supported the manifestation of spirituality in this territory. Seeing me quiet, looking at the photos, Cezar explained.

“What is here is almost unimaginable. Even we had difficulties in this respect, and this is why we did everything in our power to discover the entrance again. But, other reasons came first and I’ve already mentioned them. Professor Constantin was telling me that when he stepped on pure gold, seeing himself surrounded by this pure metal everywhere — on the ground, the ceiling, the side walls — as if it were a rock, he felt an extraordinary purity, a kind of delicacy and even holiness. He couldn’t find the words to better explain that strong emotion flooding his heart. At the same time, he told me that the atmosphere had become thicker, the air ‘stronger,’ and yet he didn’t breathe with difficulty. With all his maturity, experience and courage, the professor felt overwhelmed. The emotion, a kind of ‘psychical pressing’ which he perceived in that place, gave an intuitive understanding of the major importance of that place that made him tremble and wish to return. He also thought about the boy who was silent and pale with fear. The blue light, however, with a water-like reflection that had appeared in front of them, at a distance which he estimated at about 100 meters, had intrigued him more and he decided to continue. But, as they went forward, a very strange phenomenon occurred. The light became more intense and they felt that it was more difficult to walk. He kept on telling me that he had a strange feeling, as if the air was becoming thicker."

"Did he feel any physiological effects?" I asked.

"He did not say anything about this. But I suppose not, since he continued to go forward and breathed normally. The ground was relatively irregular, but everything was covered in gold. He couldn't appreciate the layer thickness; but as he felt it, it must have been very thick. At a certain point, due to the increasing intensity of the blue light, he started to better notice the structure of the wide corridor. He could observe, though not quite clearly, that it continued in its arched form, high and majestic, for another 60-70 meters; but afterwards, he started to distinguish on the walls, on both sides, some high formations, like huge slabs, which he saw somehow cut from the walls of the corridor. As he told me, that was the beginning of the end."

Listening to Cezar, I also felt an emotion which I couldn't really explain. Finding out about those elements, combined with the photos made in that place, has created a state of special sensibility which gave me thrills. It was a state of spirit, a fine emotion which brought me closer to those events.

There was also the mystery behind the disappearance of the two persons who had access to that place. Cezar didn't mention the cause. He let things come gradually, allowing me to discover the development of the events. I quickly learned what had happened with great amazement. It seems that the professor and the boy went forward, hesitating, helped more and more by the powerful blue light which got stronger and stronger. They no longer needed flashlights. The chamber had a charming illumination which looked like water and had an unimaginably beautiful glitter. I then read the part of the professor's statement as he had insisted on that description a lot and therefore concluded that he had been very impressed. I could only imagine the phenomenal impact of such a glance over his psychic sensibilities as well as that of the boy's. Professor Constantin declared that in the last part of the corridor, which he could see more clearly up to its end, the roof had an upwards arch that became huge, like that of a dome. He estimated its height at about 3 to 3.5 meters, maybe more. He also discovered the mystery of some forms which he had not been able to see clearly before. At an approximate distance of 20-25 meters from the huge wall at the end of the corridor, he saw three armchairs on both sides, like thrones, which surrounded a parallelepipedal table placed at the center. The six thrones were also made of massive gold and seemed encrusted in the ground. They were neatly done, quite well polished and had high backs of over two meters. Fundamentally speaking, they had no legs or other elements but looked very well like the letter 'L' with the observation that the seat was very thick and almost one meter high. These were very imposing and massive gold constructions but not rough. Their lines were simply but carefully contoured with perfect proportions.

All six thrones were identical: three on the left and three on the right of the corridor, symmetrically placed and perfectly in front of each other.

Between them and the side walls there remained a distance of approximately 1.5-2 meters. In the middle, there was a sort of table which was actually a parallelepipedon made of massive gold, like a kind of plateau which probably served as a table. It was very well carved and perfectly aligned with the sides of the thrones. It was in fact a block of massive gold, shaped like a parallelepipedon, and was as high as the upper side of the thrones and as long as the distance over which they were placed. This entire ensemble was perfectly symmetrical and was completed at the end of the table by a seventh throne which was bigger than the others and, in a way, presided over the "gathering." Placed in front of the smaller side of the table, at the end of the corridor, it faced the person who came through the corridor. Its small side, the seat, was just like that of the other thrones, but the back was much higher, reaching three meters, just as the professor had specified. Furthermore, it had a different shape than the others. It wasn't a parallelepipedon, but a truncated cone section with the larger base upwards, on the superior side. The entire ensemble, amazing in its massiveness and simplicity, had a perfect harmony that imposed respect and solemnity. As Cezar admitted, that structure couldn't be other than a kind of "council chamber" for six human beings, probably high priests, presided over by a seventh man who was obviously considered and respected as an accomplished spiritual authority. But what completely astonished the professor was the ensemble of huge plates engraved in the corridor wall which he, from a distance, had interpreted as slabs. These were in fact huge panels, also parallelepipedons, that were symmetrically placed behind each throne with three on each side. In fact, it was proven that they were directly sculpted within the corridor walls, emerging slightly in relief as huge slabs and higher than the thrones and exactly up to the height of the back of the seventh throne. On their perfectly finished surface, a text of thousands of unknown characters and signs was engraved. The signs were very clearly and orderly engraved and covered the plates almost entirely with the exception of a kind of curb on each side which was approximately ten centimeters large.

As far as he could tell, the professor estimated that the engraved signs, which surely represented some kind of writing, were different from the ones he had seen earlier in the corridor, near the small platform on the ground.

Cezar told me that it was also a completely unknown writing according to the results of the analysis conducted by the prestigious international institutions with which our department had collaborated for this case.

Furthermore, the special graphic analysis has shown that the writing on the huge panels was older than the unknown one previously found by the professor. The nature of these signs, their succession, and the way they were composed, was proof of a very advanced level of knowledge of written language. The rows were perfectly parallel and quite often the height of the characters was the same over the entire slab. The effort made to engrave those plates was remarkable and nobody knew how this had been achieved, especially since the plates were all made of one piece in the mountain wall. It was most probable that the texts described a history of that place and its true meaning or that they referred to the occupant of each throne, offering elements of a certain nature about that person.

The huge assembly hall was dominated by the seventh plate which was bigger than the others, encrusted on the background wall of the corridor and behind the throne of the leading priest. From the professor's description and as I later saw in the only photo of the ensemble, that slab was gigantic.

It was almost ten to twelve meters high and about four meters thick. As its base was placed at a certain height from the ground, it dominated the view majestically, its superior side being placed at approximately three quarters from the height of the dome. The slab was made after the same simple concept as the other six but was much larger and more impressive. There was, however, no text engraved on it but only the disk of a huge sun from which many rays started towards the end of the rectangle. This representation, which surely is an essential symbol for what was there, was grandiose and, through its force and grandeur, it dominated the entire assembly hall from above the main throne of the leading priest. As far as I could see from the troubling photo made by the professor, the impression was amplified by the charming blue light which was sublimely combined with the glitter of the gold around. From the photo, it was impossible to distinguish the source of that light, but it surely came from the ground behind the main throne. As it was partly hidden by the imposing massiveness and its back, it only appeared as an effect in the entire assembly hall.

"Here is when the toughest part, which has confused everything, started," Cezar said. "Even now, after so many years, we don't understand more than we did back then. It is probably the end point of the journey, some kind of conversion of space and time, accomplished in a way which completely exceeds normal understanding. How it appeared there and why, nobody knows. An idea would be the connection which has just appeared with the incident in Antarctica because that buoy has signaled this space, but what can we understand from this? It's like a cosmic knot which is combined with something from Jupiter's moon, Europa. The great planet is probably connected with all this, but who knows what this connection is?"

There is clearly an answer because we have physical evidence: the cosmic buoy, the signals, this place, the indication to Alaska, and the projection from Europa; but why all these exist and what are the true implications is a great mystery. In any case, it seems to be an extraordinary energy focus point, both for cosmic and for spiritual energy. It is possible that major decisions have been taken here and that beings with a very high level of spiritual evolution have been here. We don't even know the origin of the writing on the slabs. It is extremely old, but how old is it? Then there is the serious barrier which doesn't allow me to search this time cliché with the device in the Bucegi Mountains. We practically don't know anything."

I was astonished with everything I saw and learned. Cezar showed me the last photo made by professor Constantin, from an angle placed behind the main throne, on its right side. It showed an empty space shaped like an ellipsis at the level of the ground, marked by a small wall on the edges, like a curb. The professor stated that the ellipsis was about two meter long on its long axis and about one meter and a half on its short axis.

“What is there is relatively hard to conceive, even for an open mind,” said Cezar. “The professor told me that when he went near that place and looked down, he felt he was losing his consciousness. He even fainted for a few seconds and fell but came back to his senses quickly.”

“What did he see? What happened?” I asked impatiently.

From the photo, I could not tell what was there because it was made from a certain distance and at a sharp angle. The light wasn’t very good either. I could, however, clearly see something very dark with some glitter in it. Cezar then explained.

“When he looked at that empty space, the professor saw another universe. He told me it was as if he was looking through the porthole of a space ship at the surrounding cosmos. He could see the black cosmic space and the glitter of the stars. The difference was that the respective ‘porthole’ actually didn’t exist, but the access was free, as if through a fountain. Downwards, a bit to the side, he noticed a great planet with formations similar to the ones on Earth when seen from space. He compared the size of that planet with that of Earth as seen from the Moon. The difference was the color of that planet which combined blue with different shades of yellow and orange.”

“But you’ve just said he fainted,” I said, astonished at what I learned.

“He fainted immediately after seeing the first images, or at least that’s what he told me. He also estimated that he only fainted for a couple of seconds, but when he woke up, he saw the boy standing on the edge of that ellipsis and looking hypnotized and downwards towards the planet. The professor than saw a kind of shining funnel which was rising from a point on the planet towards the place where they were standing. He then became very scared and stepped backwards. It wasn’t clear to him what happened next.

The professor said he wasn’t sure he remembered all that happened there. He only knows that the light became very intense, becoming white and, at a certain point, the surface of the ellipsis began to shine strongly. Professor Constantin saw the boy simply stepping over its edge and disappearing downwards through it. Immediately afterwards, the brightness decreased in intensity and the professor went near the edge of the empty space. He saw the ‘funnel’ withdrawing towards that beautiful planet and the universe around it became quiet once again.”

“How long did he remain like this? What did he do?” I asked, curious to find out what happened next.

“He doesn’t know for sure. He said that, at a certain moment, he once again saw that light vortex rising from the planet towards him and he felt scared, got up and ran back towards the exit. It only took him a few minutes to get out to the archeological site. With his last powers, he ran to the village police station and asked to speak to Bucharest, to his RIS connection person who was in charge of supervising the digs and discoveries made. He was told to remain there and not to speak with anyone else about what he had seen. They arrived very quickly during the same evening. There were three agents and they were very suspicious. The professor immediately led them to that place. It is unknown how it happened, but one of them disappeared just like the boy. The professor gave me a precise description of the final moments before they covered the entrance because I had already received a phone call informing me that they were coming for him from Bucharest; and I had to transcribe very quickly and summarize the statement I had recorded on tape. So, I preferred his superficial description, which was global, instead of a detailed yet incomplete one. I was hoping things would calm down and I could have access to another statement from the professor with more details. I could not know what the SNDC would decide. That was the situation. It’s good that things haven’t remained completely unknown. They went out again; and, in order to avoid any contact with someone who might have disclosed the place, they remained at the entrance all night. The following day, they called Bucharest and a special representative immediately came and was overwhelmed with the situation, ordering the immediate stop up of the entrance. As I said, maybe it was better like this.”

“They probably thought that they would return from Bucharest better prepared and with precise orders,” I assumed. “They could simply remember the location in the meantime.”

“Yes, that’s what they thought, too. But they didn’t foresee the accident where they all died.”

“It looks like a kind of ‘self-protection’ of destiny.”

“They only allowed the driver of the concrete mixer to come and help them seal the entrance. When they took a last trip to the assembly hall, the driver probably didn’t listen to them and followed them out of curiosity. They became alarmed when they heard his screaming. He had entered with a flashlight and was shocked at seeing the gold seam. From that moment on, they couldn’t get along with him any more. They quickly went out and covered the entrance with concrete by themselves, the best way they could, working almost all day long. They asked for help from two police officers in the village and told them to guard the access to the road leading there and the surroundings, but they didn’t allow them to come closer. The professor said that they remained at a distance of 300 to 400 meters. They then left the professor at the police station and drove for Bucharest that night. On the way, they had a tragic accident.”

Cezar stopped, making a short pause.

“Now you know everything that happened there.”

I looked at the clock. It was almost 2:00 a.m.. Feeling as if the waters had calmed down, I was calm and serene inside and thanked Cezar for that memorable evening which I will always remember. I was deeply impressed and clearly felt that a certain understanding had deeply touched my heart. My soul was flooded with a mysterious need to withdraw inside myself, to think quietly about the ancestral enigma of these people and to its connection with the discovery made in the Șureanu Mountain. What unseen influences fill our souls from the unmeasurable distance of the cosmos? I went out in the yard which was empty given the hour. The cold mountain air cooled my hot face and the sound of the forest carried me on the wings of sensible imagination. A whisper of the mountain slowly floated towards the sky as if waking up the unknown and profound memory of these realms. I looked up at the sky filled with stars glittering enigmatically and felt the nostalgia of the forgotten beginnings and the divine worlds within our hearts.

Part Two — by Peter Moon

Chapter Six — THE VALLEY OF THE GOLDEN THRONES

Since the publication of the Romanian version of the book you have just read, I have maintained a sporadic correspondence with Radu Cinamar.

While his communication sheds a little more insight on the matters mentioned, it does not offer unequivocal proof of many of his claims in the four books of the Transylvania Series. In his letters to me, Radu has more than once apologized that he cannot offer further proof at this time.

After writing the introduction at the beginning of this book, I travelled to Romania for the fifth time and have discovered further corroboration of his stories. More importantly, I have been privy to an entire scenario of events that reach well beyond the imagination of ordinary people and reveal a higher order at work. This is why I referred to and stressed the importance of the progenitors of the Transylvania Series in the Introduction. Radu Cinamar is an intriguing character, but there are other characters involved in this scenario who are of even greater interest and actually put Radu into a position where he could write these highly unique tales.

On my most recent trip to Sarmizegetusa, I was surprised and pleased to unexpectedly encounter an area in Transylvania that is known as the Valley of the Golden Thrones. It was pointed out to me by a local legend keeper, and I will discuss more about my encounter with this unique man later on in this book. This valley, he said, leads to the golden caves that Professor Constantin discovered, as mentioned in Chapter Five. The area obviously had its own legends and history long before Radu Cinamar became a renowned writer, but for now, I will restrain my commentary to address only the information presented by Radu in Chapter Five. For these purposes, I will accept all of Radu's data at face value and hypothesize that it is true.

The first issue I will address is the “parallelepipedon” or “golden bed” that was found in the golden tunnels and is elevated off the ground. It was accompanied by hieroglyphics that were interpreted by reducing them to the lowest common denominator. They read as follows:

KR – IO; SAL-MOŞ, HERE IS FOREVER, THE WORLDS UNITE

The scholars employed by Department Zero interpreted KR as Kronos but were somewhat sketchy with regard to IO. To anyone who has studied Western esoteric Magick even a little, they will readily recognize that IO is an iteration that was frequently used by Jack Parsons when he recited his pagan poetry (as in Io-Pan). More specifically, IO refers to IAO which is another aspect of tetragrammaton. Tetragrammaton is most popularly known by the Hebrew letters Yod He Vau He, often transliterated into the more common YHVH or YHWH that is sometimes pronounced Yahweh or Yahwah. While these four letters correspond to Fire, Water, Air and Earth, IAO corresponds to another aspect of the divinity which is Creation, Destruction, and Resurrection, symbolized by Isis, Apophis, and Osiris. Isis was viewed as the Creator goddess; Apophis was the destroyer god, often symbolized by a serpent and recognized as darkness (the enemy of Ra); and Osiris was the god who was slain by Set but resurrected when Isis gathered up all of his body parts, most notably the lost penis. Note that both YHWH and IAO consist entirely of vowels sounds which is intended as an expression of the divinity. In both cases, IAO and YHVH make up key component parts of the Godhead or Divinity. If you wish, and it is advisable, you can study up on both IAO and YHVH on the internet for further elucidation on these ancient concepts. The scholarship, if pursued rigorously, becomes very involved.

While I find their interpretation intriguing and of considerable value, I also realize that there is considerably more that can be added to the understanding of these matters with regard to my own already published studies. For one, I am referring to the correspondence between KR and Car, Kar, Cor, or Kor, the goddess who inspired names such as Carthage, Carnac, Charlemagne, Koran, and a host of others. The word cardiac (heart) comes from the goddess Car. In ancient times, Car or Kor was a major phonetic iteration of the Goddess.

If you study both the phonetics and etymology of CR or KR, you will see that it is inherently related to “distance,” in particular with regard to the invariance of the space-time interval that was included in the appendix of Transylvanian Moonrise. The invariance of the space-time interval, as taught to me originally by Dr. David Anderson, refers to mathematical models revealing that time equates to distance. In other words, it is misdefined in common dictionaries. Time is movement through space. CR refers to movement in space when we consider that the word car evolved out of CR as an expression of movement. CR is also the root of chariot which is virtually the same as car, but in chariot, we have a direct or indirect (depending upon how you look at it) allusion (from the Tarot) to the physical body which is the instrument we use to negotiate movement through space and time.

When we consider the human body and its immersion into the physical universe, there is a very rich etymology in the word carbon as follows:

Carbon (n.) non-metallic element, 1789, coined 1787 in French by Lavoisier as charbone, from L. carbo (gen. carbonis) “glowing coal, charcoal,” from PIE root ker-* “heat, fire, to burn” (cf. L. cremare “to burn;” Skt. krsna “black, burnt,” kudayati “singes;” Lith. kuriu “to heat,” karštas “hot,” krosnis “oven;” O.C.S. kurjo “to smoke,” krada “fireplace, hearth;” Rus. ceren “brazier;” O.H.G. harsta “roasting;” Goth. hauri “coal;” O.N. hyrr “fire;” O.E. heorð “hearth”).

(Note: The symbol * indicates uncertainty in etymology.)

At its core, the word carbon refers to the fire or hearth of the goddess Car.

This concept was transmuted into the Hebrew letter shin where it symbolizes the Shekinah Glory which sparks over the Mercy Seat in the Holy of Holies. The concept of fire with the goddess Car corresponds quite precisely with the goddess Kali of Indian tradition. Kali is not only a goddess of fire and heat but one of time as well. Kali inspired words like caliente in Spanish which means heat and also words like calendar which refers to time.

As we are in a carbon-based universe, we cannot escape the correspondence to 666. Carbon has 6 protons, 6 neutrons, and 6 electrons. All the embroidered symbolism off 666 is reduced to the lowest common denominator when we simply consider that 666 refers to the core expression of physicality.

Aleister Crowley defined and preoccupied himself with the concept of 666, and we find another very important etymological tie-in to CR in the words cross and circle. This is another aspect of the goddess Car that is known as carfax or carrefour, both of which refer to the circle and cross, a key feature of Crowley’s “Key of It All” as described in The Book of the Law. Carfax refers to the unfoldment of all geometric potentials as well as the morphogenetic aspects that accompany consciousness. This ranges from the most banal aspects of chemistry and cellular life to the more esoteric aspects of enlightened or godlike intelligence. Perhaps more importantly, carfax also refers to a portal outside the circle(s) of time.

When we combine KR and IO, as was presented to us in the translation of the hieroglyphics, we have the unfoldment of life in all of its myriad variations through the principles of creation, destruction and resurrection. We are talking about the Tree of Life.

specifically mentioned that io relates to eu, both of which mean “I.” Combining this with kr, Cezar suggests that KR IO is “I Kronos” which is quite intriguing when we consider it as an iteration of the god of time. I would also point out that I is no different than EYE, the archaic form of which is EVE (the letter Y being an extension of the letter V, both letters being considered interchangeable) or IEVE.* EYE evolved from EVE, the original spelling for the word YHVE or YHVH. In other words, the original word for God was the word we know as Eve. It represented a Goddess. EYE and EVE are quite interchangeable, both referring to conscious perception and self-referencing intelligence.

* In the Phoenician Paleo-Hebrew language of Canaan, the name of God was IEVE. If you compare the original writing for this word in Phoenician, you will find it hauntingly similar to how it is spelled and written in Arabic, Hebrew, Japanese, Chinese, and Sanskrit. When you strip away all of the ignorance caused by transliteration with regard to phonetics and their representative letters, IEVE was pronounced in the same way that we say Eve. In other words, the name for the Creator was IEVE or Eve. The so-called Fall from Grace is very much evident in the name IEVE itself when it was transliterated into YHVH, YHWH, or JHVH. If you consider the conventional Hebraic derivation of Eve, you will learn that it comes from the Hebrew chavvah which means “living one” or “source of life.”

Chavvah is a particularly interesting word because it derives from two earlier words where the letters y and v are demonstrated to be convertible: chavah = breath and chayah = to live. The very essence of life is thus embodied in the name of Eve as breath and life go hand-in-hand. It is, after all, the act of breathing that makes one alive. In this sense, it suggests that this golden “bed” discovered by Professor Constantin is part and parcel of the living breath of the earth. (Note: This information and the relationship between Eve and the eye are from The Montauk Book of the Living, by Peter Moon, where it is further expounded upon in Chapters 38 and 39.)

All of this, including that which was offered by Cezar and his team, suggests that this area of the golden tunnels represents a key carfax point of the universe being conscious of itself. If you consider that the universe is akin to a live organism, it is like a major ganglia or key component of the “brain” of the planet. Further, and based upon the data just presented, if one reconsiders the iteration KR IO, it is simply saying “I am a divine vehicle of time,” or it could refer to the “Eye of Time” which associates God with time, just as Car or Kali are associated with time. This corresponds exactly with the definition of KR as Kronos.

It is already pretty clear from what Radu has offered us that this area of Transylvania is a portal into time. I have only re-emphasized it with additional reference points. If we make KR and IO one word, we have KRIOS which is the same as the Greek chreo (related to cristos or christ), a virtual phonetic duplicate of the Sanskrit kriya, a tantric term which refers to a spontaneous physical or energetic manifestation that clears out energy in relation to rising kundalini. In Greek, chreo referred to communion with a god or oracle. The phonetics of kriya and krishna should also be noted.

Kri is very similar to cre, as in create or creator, but krishna (which also appears in the aforementioned etymology of carbon) means “dark blue” in Sanskrit, and this brings us back to the mysterious blue race of which both Krishna and Machandi are identified with. The associations run very deep.

Let us now consider the next part of the hieroglyphics which were interpreted as SAL-MOŞ. Neither Radu, Cezar, nor their scholastic team mentioned the rather obvious correspondence between SAL-MOŞ and Zalmoxis, the most popular and ubiquitous god in Romanian folklore. This was noticed, however, by my translator who states in the footnote in Chapter Five that the word moş means “old man” in Romanian while zăul is an archaic Romanian word for “the god.” It has been claimed that zăul-moş was the origin for the name Zalmoxis, the god of the Dacians. This definition makes a lot of sense because there are many different iterations of Zalmoxis that come to us, mostly in legend form, but there are historical references as well. There is no question that the ancient Dacians worshiped Zalmoxis. The zal in Zalmoxis means leaping or transcending while the moxis means “god” but also equates to moses or messiah.

Even though Herodotus, the Greek historian who first told the West about Zalmoxis, refuted the story, conventional views have persisted that Zalmoxis was a disciple of Pythagoras who spent four years in a cave whereupon he was transformed from a man into a god. Herodotus suggested that, based upon what he learned, it is far more likely that it was Zalmoxis who actually taught Pythagoras. This not only aligns with theories that Zalmoxis was the basis for mystery schools which eventually sprouted into the Egyptian, Hebrew, and Christian religions, it fits with what Cezar says about the repression and obfuscation of truth with regard to the crucible of civilization emanating from the land we now know as Romania and, more specifically, Transylvania.

On my 2011 trip to Romania, I learned that Zalmoxis is really an ancient principle or archetype that has embraced many remarkable characters in history. More to the point, Zalmoxis is really a name for Gemini, a word which stems from “germinate” and refers to twins. The symbol of Zalmoxis or Gemini is really the swastika as rendered below where you can visualize it as being made up of two numeral 2’s (see figure below and to the left).

The symbol above left is the Gemini or Zalmoxis swastika (whirling in a clockwise direction) because it is evocative of two number 2’s. Conversely, it is the reversal of that swastika (on the right, going counterclockwise) that can be rendered as 6’s and is most often identified with the Nazis.

This association with the numeral 2 is not accidental as the original symbolism referred to pairs or twins, and Zalmoxis represents two very important twins who were native to ancient Dacia (the land we know today as Romania) — and they were Apollo and Artemis (or Diana). There were also several other sets of twins who have embodied this archetype.*

* The number 22 is considered a master number in numerology, representing the life path of a “master builder.” This is not only a Masonic reference, but 22 is highlighted by the fact that the Tarot features 22 major arcana which are pathways connecting the sepiroth (or spheres) of the Tree of Life. The swastika represents 22, but one can also see 5 (see the swastika on the right) in its construction along with the 6 already referred to. $5 + 6$ represent 11 (the number of Abrahadabra) or the hexagram over the pentagram (see Montauk Book of the Living for a detailed diagram) which reveals the pattern of the Qabalistic Tree of Life which, when turned or twisted, represents the mobius strip of DNA. Two of these strands equals $11 + 11$ or 22. These two strands of DNA represent Gemini which, once again, means germinate.

It was also pointed out to me on my 2011 trip to Romania that this swastika on the right represents 666. You can see this in the example. When the swastika is turned around and is whorled (whorl is another name for the meaning of the swastika) or whirled, it reveals the numeral six as it moves from one position to another. I was further told that, in recent times, an ancient tablet was found not too far south of Bucharest which states “I am 666 and I am waiting to be transformed.” This was an astonishing and major archeological discovery. The transformation of 666 (our carbon-based material universe) during these so-called end times, according to my Romanian friend, refers to the process of discovery that began with the chamber beneath the Sphinx. It has been extended to the revelation of the manuscript in this book as well as the remarkable “Hall of the Golden Thrones” with its accompanying portal.

When we consider the “Peter Moon experience,” it is easy to hypothesize or recognize that I was led to all of this through the investigation of the Montauk Project. While it is not quite that simple, we can delineate it through the various progressions of my own experience. This begins with the Babalon Working and the interweaving of its players into my personal life through the investigation of the synchronicity surrounding the Montauk Project. It extends to Dr. David Anderson who served as the catalyst in getting me to Romania. What is perhaps the most special aspect of these experiences is that so many of the spectacular and key elements of the subjects I have dealt with are not only ripe in the Romanian scenario, they are waiting to be activated and reveal yet further information. These include, but are not restricted to the Blue Race, monatomic white gold, immortality, the Goddess, the Inner Earth, and the technology of time travel. These revelations and, more importantly, the transformation process that is implied, represent an endeavor that is designed for all of humanity. It is, quite obviously, not a job that is done overnight.

Zalmoxis is a very appropriate catalyst for these matters because the undisputed essence of this archetype is transformation from the human condition to that of an immortal creature or “god.” For me to visit the capital city or sacred domain of Zalmoxis and experience so many tangible tie-ins has certainly been a lot of fun and exciting for me, but it is much more than that. It is serious business, but I would also add that it is also pleasant business. The fact that Elinor, the mysterious alchemist who can do more than feign ancient knowledge with regard to prolonging life, lurks in the background is one further testament to the Zalmoxis factor or hope of immortality. This not only lights up the archetypal essence of Romania like a Christmas tree, it offers the hope that this mysterious and too often overlooked country embodies for Mankind.

Zalmoxis has been rendered in many different ways by many different authors and legend keepers. While the majority of these (I have certainly not read them all) concern or emphasize the transition of a mortal human, there are some that include Zalmoxis as an entity that is not in human form, sometimes demanding and receiving human sacrifices. In such scenarios, it is only the best and most perfect humans who are selected for sacrifice so that they can make a successful transition out of this world. While it is entirely possible and even likely that such sacrifices existed, it is my personal opinion that this sort of sacrificial rite degenerated over time. In other words, death and killing began to be ritualized as the transition from a human to a godlike state became less and less tangible. In other words, the issue eventually had to be forced. At the end of this degeneration, the ritual becomes an absolute horror and becomes the opposite of transformation. This is a demonic influence which managed to weave its way into a process that either once aspired to or actually brought about something akin to everlasting life.

In any event, Gemini is represented by Zalmoxis, and Gemini is the sign of initiation. Gemini is distinctly and deliberately rendered as such in the Thoth Tarot Deck by Lady Freida Harris and Aleister Crowley in ATU VI The Lovers, sometimes also referred to as “The Brothers” or “The Twins.” ATU means “divine emanation” and refers to the key or trump cards of the Tarot, also known as the Major Arcana. This card goes hand-in-hand with ATU XIV Art, which is also known as “Temperance” or “Alchemy.” ATU VI, which features a Moorish king paired with a white queen, is the precursor to the alchemical secrets of ATU XIV. Gemini concerns itself with duality and opposites as the precursor to the secrets of alchemy. These secrets include immortality as well as transmuting base metals into gold. In this regard, ATU XIV contains another very interesting feature and that is the acronym V.I.T.R.I.O.L., which stands for Visita Interiora Terrae Rectificando Invenies Occultum Lapidem in Latin. The above phrase literally means “visit the interior of the earth and by rectification you shall find the hidden stone.”

This reference to V.I.T.R.I.O.L. with regard to the Inner Earth is very synchronistic if not suggestive of the precise drama unfolding in Romania.

Besides this, V.I.T.R.I.O.L. is a trace reference to the Universal Solvent which refers to the elixir by which one transmutes base metals into gold or, in the spiritual sense, the mechanism by which one transmutes base energies to more sublime ones. V.I.T.R.I.O.L. refers to both the Microcosm and the Macrocosm. In the Macrocosm, it tells us that we can engage in this transmutation process by looking into the Inner Earth both metaphorically and in actuality.

It should also be pointed out that V.I.T.R.I.O.L. has another particular significance because, according to Rosicrucian tradition, this acronym was found in the mysterious legendary tomb of Christian Rosenkreutz, the titular founder of Rosicrucianism. While the story is too complex to go into here, there are rumors and legends that Christian Rosenkreutz never died and was known in other times (potentially in a reincarnated form) as Francis Bacon and St. Germain, amongst others. The most pervasive legend, however, is that his tomb was discovered 120 years after his death. When we consider the stories of Elinor, and that includes the mysterious network of individuals who “smuggled” him out of Romania and set him up to do his work, we are faced with a secret society that is parallel to the sympathies of the Rosicrucians if not the Rosicrucians themselves.

Whichever way you view it, we are confronted with transmutation of the human condition through the vehicle and mysteries of the Inner Earth.

One of these mysteries concerns the “parallelepipedon” or “golden bed” discovered by Professor Constantin. Besides the hieroglyphics I have just elaborated upon, it was also mentioned that this bed of gold featured indentations. The scholars employed were uniform in their assessment that this was most definitely used as a bed of some sort. Based upon what I consider to be rather obvious data, it is my assessment that this was utilized for out-of-body travel by a priesthood. If gold is the superconductor that is suggested by Cezar, this would be a perfect vehicle for such circumstances.

Although Cezar mentioned that there is a serious barrier (in regard to the golden “bed”) preventing him from searching this time cliché with the device in the Bucegi Mountains, I do believe he was eventually able to access this area himself. My conclusion is based upon what is written in Radu’s books as well his personal correspondence to me. My intuition suggests that Cezar eventually accessed this “golden bed” and did some sort of psychic travelling which connected him to the Inner Earth beings that he is reported to be an ambassador to. As I have reported earlier, Radu has stated to me that Cezar left Department Zero in order to serve as an ambassador to these beings. The scenario I have suggested is a very plausible explanation of what might have taken place. Independent of Radu, I have been told that the mysterious tunnel that leads to the Inner Earth in the Bucegi Complex leads to an underground necropolis which is near the Golden Thrones and the portal to the other world. This Inner Earth tunnel does not lead in only one direction but is more like an underground highway which goes to many different locations.

Earlier in this book, it was mentioned that Radu was assigned the job of coordinating the section whose area of activity concerns the borderline between the real and the unreal. It seems that Cezar quite literally jumped beyond the borderline and into an area that is not quite within this world. In any event, Radu wrote to me about a year ago that he was delighted to have finally heard from Cezar after a very long absence of communication.

Cezar reassured him that he would return when the time is appropriate.

These circumstances might sound unusual if not bizarre. They do, however, fit it in with a point in the text of The Secret Parchment that many of you might have missed. I know that I missed it the first time I read the manuscript. This concerns Professor Constantin’s statement wherein he felt he was losing his consciousness. He also mentions a blue light that is reminiscent of the violet light that Radu described in the tunnel between the Bucegi complex and the Occult Chamber beneath Giza (in the book Mystery of Egypt.) This makes one wonder if what he was experiencing was actually taking place in this reality or in another one. The report of his taking photographs of the tunnel and golden thrones, however, suggests that it is either in this reality or another that closely resembles this one.

Cezar also comments that what was encountered there is relatively hard to conceive, even for an open mind, and that it is probably some kind of conversion of space and time, accomplished in a way which completely exceeds normal understanding. Further, Cezar states that it is connected to Alaska and the cosmic buoy in Antarctica in the manner of a cosmic knot that is tied to whatever is emanating from Jupiter's moon, Europa. While all of this presents an enigma, it also reveals the presence of a superior consciousness. The entire scenario is delightfully similar to the movie 2001: A Space Odyssey and its sequels, including a mysterious beacon in the form of a monolith from Europa. Ironically, Jupiter features another moon by the name of Io.

Although IO was defined as meaning IAO or "I," it was also pointed out to me at Atlantykron that IO can, quite specifically and intentionally, refer to the number ten. Ten is diez in Spanish and refers to the deity. More importantly, a Romanian author, Mihaela Muraru-Mandrea, has written about ten-dimensional string theory, according to which there are ten dimensions in this universe and that is how time materializes or manifests in our day-to-day world. In other words, time fixes you in ten dimensions.

She also refers to a Universal Integrating Matrix which is a mathematical model for DNA. As I do not understand Romanian and have not read her book, I cannot elaborate further. Certain people at Atlantykron, however, told me this was very important to the equation and should be mentioned in this book. I cannot take it further right now.

As you can see, the hieroglyphics are replete with deep meanings that reach into the infinite. If you want to take it further still, you can look up the roots of ion, iodine, and Ionia (where we get the word Ionic from). Ion derives from e, "to go, to walk" and ions got their name from this definition as they go or move towards the electrode of opposite charge. In this respect, io or ion represents duality. You can even see it as the two binary digits, 1 and 0, that are used in computer languages and also in the biology of the brain. The word iodine comes from the Greek ioeides which means "violet-colored," from ion "the violet; dark blue flower," + eidos "appearance"; and we are once again back at the concept of sacred blue.

Ionia was the name of a civilization that once included parts of ancient Greece and Asia Minor. The name Ionia derives from Ion, the son of Apollo and Creusa, and is believed to have derived from the Sanskrit yoni, meaning “womb” or “vulva.” The Ionians were a goddess worshiping people and, I would assume, were a part of the ancient Amazon culture.

Anyway you want to look at it, the hieroglyphics described by Radu and Cezar trace back to the roots of ancient mysteries. Perhaps the most significant is the etymology of karma, a word which is believed to have derived from the pre-Indo-European k(w)er which reduces to KR and means “to make, form.” This is the idea of creating one’s own karma.

Whatever you think of these stories is not as important as what you make or create with them. In my case, I was pursuing a quest which began some time back. There are, however, some other players creating with the karma of Romania.

Chapter Seven — RULE BRITANNIA

It is a completely understandable and human reaction to doubt the veracity of Radu Cinamar's incredible tales. What is indisputable, however, are the intriguing facts and circumstances surrounding them. Besides the unique and unprecedented alliance between the Romanians and the Americans in the wake of the Bucegi discovery, there have been additional developments that have added fuel to the fire with regard to the discoveries reported by Radu. Not only was Romania admitted to NATO as a consequence of the new Romanian alliance, but one of the former commanders of NATO, Wesley Clark, is now serving as a personal advisor to the Prime Minister of Romania and is reported to be a frequent visitor in Bucharest.

Clark came to my interest years ago during his failed bid for the Oval Office, at which time he publicized his interest in time travel and said it was scientifically feasible. It suggests he knows more than a little about Dr.

David Anderson, a man who rubs elbows with all sorts of high level political people. The association between Clark and the Prime Minister is intriguing if not disturbing, and this would be due to the latter's recent bid to oust the Romanian president, virtually the only politician who is known to be privy to Department Zero matters. Clark's resume is rather unique to say the least. He grew up as a Baptist, claims to be a Roman Catholic, but says he attends Presbyterian services. Clark also asserted to Jewish groups that he is of the lineage of the Cohen priests, the keepers of the Holy of Holies, the sacred shrine which held the Ark of the Covenant. As a politician, he seems to have all critical angles covered with regard to faith.

Whatever his ostensible reasons for being involved in Romania, his unspoken intentions are of far more intrigue. If Radu's accounts are even partially true, they would certainly explain the keen interest and participation by such a person as Wesley Clark.

Another passionate and relatively new player in Romanian politics is Prince Charles, the heir apparent to the throne of England. Subsequent to the events relayed by Radu with regard to Department Zero and the golden tunnels, Prince Charles and the Romanian media have been promoting his Transylvanian heritage, his blood relation to Vlad the Impaler (who is a national hero in Romania), and the prospect of him succeeding King

Michael as the King of Romania. I am not exaggerating, and you can even find articles on the internet indicating that when Queen Elizabeth passes on, Charles will abdicate the throne of England in favor of Prince William and then assume the throne of Romania. The rationale behind this is that he allegedly has a more legitimate claim to the Romanian throne than Michael or his successors. While most serious political commentators might dismiss this as preposterous, one has to wonder why this rhetoric is being fostered by the Romanian press and is being egged on by the Prince himself. What is the motivation?

If you listen to Prince Charles' often publicized motivations with regard to Transylvania, he talks a very good game and makes it look and sound as if he is a passionate protector of the environment. The Prince has invested in quaint Transylvanian real estate and waxes over this area as being the last of its kind, a tribute to a natural ecosystem. He has also criticized the incursion of Gabriel Resources, a Canadian company, who has a contract with the Romanian government to extract gold from a region called Rosia Montana whereby they plan to utilize a cyanide extraction process that has the potential to create horrific environmental degradation. While the Romanian Supreme Court has blocked this contract for the time being due to popular outrage, Gabriel Resources has vowed to their investors to find a way around the Supreme Court. If we choose to look deeper into these matters, however, it appears as if the Prince is fostering a public relations ploy that belies other intentions. More specifically, facts demonstrate an unhealthy alliance between the Crown of England and Gabriel Resources.

While the Crown is not subject to revealing its financial dealings, it is a documented fact that the Crown purchased the company that eventually became British Petroleum or BP. Prince Charles, BP, and Gabriel Resources are all advocates of an idea coined by the United Nations as "Sustainable Development" which essentially means that one should extract resources at a level by which the population can benefit but also at a rate that will not destroy or severely compromise the natural resources of an area. This is fine verbiage and is excellent PR, but in practice, BP (with the help of Ken Lay of Enron fame) has expanded upon this idea and set up a barter exchange whereby companies are fined for polluting, and the money goes to the exchange which then invests in green technologies that will benefit the environment. In political parlance, this is known as "Cap-and-Trade” which virtually no one really understands. Barack Obama, known for his connections with BP, is a big supporter of Cap-and-Trade. His wife was a lawyer at the Chicago firm which figured out how this would all work. More details are available on Dr. True Ott’s website. I learned about this from him.

While this sounds like a virtuous idea, we are not told that BP is the owner of the exchange (to be operated by Goldman Sachs who was bought into it) as well as many of the green technologies being developed. In other words, they would receive the money collected in fines. By reason of this astute and ingenious manipulation, BP was and is in a position to expand their income fourfold if oil were to become antiquated as a major fuel source. In either case, they have harnessed the world market whether the oil market fails or succeeds.

It is not known whether the Crown is an investor in Gabriel Resources, but as their holdings are not held up to public scrutiny by law, we will never know. This, in a sense, makes us all subjects of the Crown when it comes to global financial intrigue. Their influence is occulted.

On another public relations front, Prince Charles and the royal family have suffered considerable fallout in recent times. One of his former mentors, Jimmy Savile, has been exposed as a notorious pedophile in recent times. Savile was a television star who portrayed himself as a clown, but he had a very influential and strange association with the royal family. Princess Diana exposed the Jimmy Savile connection to Prince Charles prior to her untimely and tragic death. Savile was also a player in back-door politics and was seen calling certain shots in Israel during the Six Day War with Egypt. There is currently a scandal concerning the BBC suppressing the knowledge of Savile’s pedophilia. In addition to this, a British appeals court recently ruled that Prince Charles’s letters of influence to government officials are subject to public disclosure. This was, quite oddly, protested by the Attorney General, who is seeking to protect the Prince from such disclosure. The bottom line is that there is a hornets nest festering around the ruling influence of the royal family and Prince Charles. It is more than substantial, and it is not prudent to elaborate on it further at this point in this book as it is too involved. You can read up on it separately if you wish.

Prince Charles has also long been known to have a strong interest in occultism. While this is no secret, the circumstances and history of the occult influences surrounding him are not that well known to the general public. This goes back to the Sixteenth Century and the reign of Queen Elizabeth I. This topic and its impact upon the world has been explained in my book Synchronicity and the Seventh Seal, but I will give a brief summary here. I should add that it is literally impossible to logically understand the machinations and the underbelly of the British Empire without understanding the influence of Dr. John Dee, an occultist who is more popularly known as either the court astrologer or court magician of Queen Elizabeth I.*

* The Occult Philosophy in the Elizabethan Age by Frances Yates is a thorough and well footnoted history which seeks to resolve a major paradox about John Dee: why was he so influential yet virtually ignored by history?

The quintessential scholar of his day, Dee sought to move beyond the obvious limitations of conventional scholarship and began investigating all of the functions of the human brain that are normally inaccessible. More importantly, he was dealing with the mechanism that would activate them.

These functions, particularly the activating mechanism, are so shut off in ordinary human beings that there should be no wonder why Dee's very existence has been met with so much "dead gray matter" by historians. We are talking about the program that controls the programs by which we live and meander through life on Earth. Such a concept, of course, is not much different from what is happening in Romania today.

Dee was a conjuror who literally conjured up the British Empire according to occult principles. With Edward Talbot Kelly, he communicated with discarnate entities who taught them the Enochian language, a precise language with its own grammar and syntax, that is said to be the language of the angels. In less theological terms, it is a fundamental interface with the source code of the matrix of creation. Dee's forays into the occult did lead to the formation of the British Empire, and he even coined the term Rule Britannia. This conjuration is said to have taken place in the presence of Kit Marlowe on the Isle of Dogs at the point which eventually became known as the Prime Meridian — the spot where the time keeping of civilization is all referenced to. This is not an accident. One of the more spectacular historical references to Dee's magic can be found in Shakespeare's The Tempest, a work which contains hidden and not-so-hidden references to Dee and how his conjurations defeated the Spanish Armada. This historical event, where the British defeated the Spanish against great odds, sealed Britain's rule of the seas. If you truly study Dee, you will come to see that what I have stated is not only not an exaggeration but is the tip of an iceberg.

It should also be pointed out that Francis Bacon was a pupil of John Dee, and there is no way to measure either one of these men's influence on today's civilization. Just as Queen Elizabeth and Dee are inseparable, so are Dee and Bacon inextricably related. Bacon was an instrumental factor in the formal foundation of the Rosicrucian Society, an organization which came about only two years after Dee's death. The first Rosicrucian papers appeared in Germany just after Dee had returned from the Continent to his home. As Rosicrucianism is an invisible factor in the threads of immortality that has been propagated in the Transylvania Series, the John Dee influence should not be discounted.

For those who truly understand the occultism of John Dee, it is clearly obvious that Prince Charles is not so much a significant practitioner of occult magic but rather an instrument of it. This is the way the British Empire was constructed. It should also be noted that as much as John Dee was a conjuror, he was really an instrument of spirits himself. His intelligence and studies opened him up to strings of consciousness that swallowed him up and used him. This is not unusual in the spirit world, a place where the big fish swallows the little fish. The ruler of the spirit world, as well as the sea, is Neptune or any other name you wish to ascribe to that archetype. John Dee and Prince Charles could only be servants of this archetypal force.

The point in all of this is the connection and rivalries between the various mystery schools of planet earth with regard to the discoveries taking place in Romania. This is the environment in which Transylvania has now taken center stage in the political machinations of planet earth.

Chapter Eight — PELES CASTLE

At this writing, I have taken five sojourns to Romania, two of them taking me to Sarmizegetusa and three to the Romanian Sphinx. The site that had eluded me, until this year, was Mount Omu. It means the “Mountain of Man” wherein the latter word is meant to refer to Humankind. It was a sacred site to the ancient Dacians and contains its own network of underground tunnels.

On my first trip to Romania, our plane arrived very late and our hotel rooms were sold to others. We had to go to a resort in the mountains just to find a place to sleep. There, during my first sleep in Romania, I had an encounter with an androgynous spirit who visited me. One year later, I would meet a lady whose face corresponded with this spirit. She grew up near Mount Omu and identified herself with the spirit of the mountain. There is considerably more to the dream, but it is too complex to go into. What is important is that I was “contacted” through the dream state within twenty-four hours of my arrival in Romania. It was accompanied by a tangential manifestation one year later.

After spending two nights in a mountain hotel without any practical transportation, we found a new hotel in the city but were unceremoniously dumped at Peles Castle on a rainy day with no explanation from a taxi driver who we thought was our tour guide. Peles Castle was the traditional summer home of the Romanian royal family but is now leased by them to the state who runs it as a tourist attraction. Peles Castle is named after the nearby Peles River, but no one is quite certain of the etymology. It is believed to have something to do with the Romanian word “piele,” a word which means “skin” and can also refer to “bravery.” Of considerable interest to me at that time was that one of John Dee’s key talismans was a magic ring featuring the letters PELE. I could not help but think of this association although I could not place any connection to the royal family of England at that time.

Having no desire to enter the palace, I did not go inside. I was, however, accosted by a very unusual and friendly beggar who seemed to come and go out of nowhere. The only negotiable currency I had was given to me for my two companions and myself. As I was responsible for the entire party, I was not inclined to give him anything and sent him on his way. Upon my return home, I learned about a very old and famous legend: when you come to Romania and see a beggar, you should give him something. By showing the generosity of your heart, this act will result in Romania opening its heart to you. With hindsight, I was remiss over the fact that I had not fulfilled this legend. Our trip to Romania had been pretty rugged up to the point we met the beggar. Even though I had not given him anything, things began to slowly but steadily improve, especially when we reached our final destination of Atlantykron in southeastern Romania.

At Atlantykron, I learned that the most sacred area of the country is Sarmizegetusa, located in the heart of Transylvania. With much encouragement, it became my desire to visit the ancient capital of the Dacians on my second visit. Due to the hospitality and friendship of Nicole Vasilcovschi, I was able to visit Sarmizegetusa on my second visit in 2009.

It was quite an adventure and was written up in the book Transylvanian Moonrise. On August 12th of that year, just after my journey to Sarmizegetusa, I had an out-of-body dream. There are dreams, and there are dreams. This one was reaching the deepest part of my soul and why I was in Romania. I awoke in a lucid state and found myself floating over the landscape of Romania. A gigantic dark cloud that was unmistakably loaded with dark energy was hovering over a major complex which represented the official government and/or their buildings. Black helicopters appeared, and I am not quite sure whether they were part of the negative energy or were trying to contain it. In either case, they came with the dark energy. The best part of the dream was a very clear message to me that I was neither a part of the dark energy nor connected to it. I felt free.

Two years later, I returned to the Sphinx and met my friends from Bulgaria. We had hoped to take the long hike to the top of Mount Omu. By the time we arrived at the Sphinx, however, we were told there was not enough time to take the three-hour hike and return in time for the last cable car home.

Instead, we visited the nearby Iomolita Cave which goes deep within the earth and is quite spectacular. Nicole accompanied me on this trip as well and told me that there was another cave nearby. Known as the Priest's Cave, it contains a natural "bowl" of water that fills whenever water is taken from it. The water, however, does not spill over. It just stops. It is a smaller cave, but we did not have time to visit it.

Hoping to visit Mount Omu on our second day, it rained. Instead, I went with my Bulgarian friends to Castelul Julia Hasdeu. It is a small castle loaded with Masonic symbolism and was built by B.P. Hasdeu, a remarkable renaissance man who received worldwide acclaim for his accomplishments and adopted Romania as his home country. When his daughter Julia died at the premature age of seventeen, she contacted him from beyond and directed the building of the castle to exact specifications.

Through seances and the like, he was in repeated communication with his departed daughter whom he loved passionately. The castle tour features headphones in about four languages, one of which is English. It was a very interesting and spiritual way to spend a rainy day. On our return, my four Bulgarian friends wanted to visit Peles Castle. I was not in favor of returning but was out-voted. Just as I had experienced two years earlier, it was raining hard when we got to Peles Castle. As it turned out, no one wanted to go inside.

In 2012, only a couple of months before writing this chapter, I was the guest of Jonette Crowley who leads spiritual tours to sacred sites across the world (see jonettetcrowley.com for further information). As is described in her book, The Eagle and the Condor, Jonette Crowley suddenly and unexpectedly acquired the ability to channel many years ago. It has changed her life for the better and has enabled her to cross continents and wield a great deal of influence worldwide. I recommend her book, especially for a better understanding of how she works.

During a previous trip to the Bucegi Mountains, at a time when she had no knowledge of Radu's books, Jonette correctly perceived that there were tunnels below the mountains, and she took an "out-of-body tour" of the area. During this journey of the soul, she penetrated the subtle realms whereupon she was escorted by "the white wolf" in order to protect her from certain negative energies that were present. Although Jonette was unaware of Radu's books at that time, one of her friends who was with her, Anna, told her about the books as well as the fact that I had published them in English. As a consequence, Jonette contacted me years ago and asked if I would like to be part of a future spiritual journey with her to Romania. I accepted and that is how I ended up on this tour as an esoteric guide.

Jonette and her husband, Ed Oakley, also accompanied me to Atlantykron where we all lectured and got to meet Nicolae Nicolae, the publisher of Dacia magazine. Nicolae wanted to interview me because he had heard that I was an expert on Sarmizegetusa. This was extremely amusing to me because I had only been to Sarmizegetusa once (in 2009), and I am far from an expert. He, on the other hand, regularly produces an excellent magazine on the history of the Dacians, and this has included a complex analysis of Sarmizegetusa. In any event, we had a lengthy conversation through an interpreter. One thing he spoke about was the gold in and around Sarmizegetusa. According to the Dacian way of life, accumulating gold means trouble in life. There are considerable legends about the curse of gold. It does, however, link to the astral body. It should be known that the stories and actualities of Dacian gold exist completely aside from Radu's stories.

After departing Atlantykron, we travelled to Bucharest where we met up with some forty people, including a dozen Romanians, who would accompany us on our journey to Mount Omu, Sarmizegetusa, and a host of other interesting and sacred places. After a welcome dinner on a Friday evening, we set out early on the morning of August 11th. Our first stop was Peles Castle. Once again, it rained. This time, however, I found my beggar right away and gave him ten lei which is almost $3.00. He was ever so grateful and blessed me. Thus it was, that Romania, which had already opened its heart to me, was about to open up yet deeper chambers of its heart on this visit.

After being pounded by synchronicity and avoiding Peles Castle twice, I would finally take the hint and take the tour on my third visit. It was beautiful beyond belief but describing it will not be done here. What was important was that I became informed about and conscious of the Romanian royal family, which is of German origin and is currently headed by King Michael who is 91 years old at this writing. The Romanian royal family has only been in existence a relatively short period of time. Less than two-hundred years-old, Romania only became a country after the Crimean War, a little over a century ago. The Romanian royal family's ancestral roots trace back to Germany and this is how Prince Charles justifies his own claim to the throne of Romania. Charles and his family are from the German House of Hanover.

Thus it was that I encountered a rather profound synchronicity on the first leg of my sacred journey. After becoming deeply aware of the royal family and its connections, I was subsequently subjected to lively news reports from the Romanian media about Prince Charles waxing environmental over Transylvania with accompanying rhetoric about him succeeding King Michael after the latter's death. As I said, there is a plan for Charles to abdicate the throne of England in favor of Prince William. While the Romanian royal family might not have moved me one way or the other, the entire issue of the sovereignty of Romania was being thrust in my face by the Romanian media.

It is challenging to explain the conscious symbolism I was being confronted with by reason of my sojourn to Peles Castle and the underlying occult current of the royalty involved. I am once again referring to the PELE ring of John Dee and its occult influence upon the British Empire. This ring, given to Dee by Enochian angels, was presented to him as the very same ring that King Solomon used to control the jinn and build his temple. It represents all worldly power; and more importantly, the functional power (jinn) that made the worldly power possible. PELE has different meanings, the most commonly accepted of which is "he who will work wonders." A no less accurate but far more occult and deeper meaning (from which the name of the famous Pele volcano is derived) for PELE is "black fire" or, more specifically, "the black fire of one's will." This concept and its profound significance, especially as regards the unfolding situation in Romania, are somewhat challenging to explain. The essential esoterics of the matter are described in my book Synchronicity and the Seventh Seal. At best, this can only be tightly summarized here. I can, however, add some additional insight based upon my own acquired knowledge since that book was written.

The era of John Dee, out of which the writings of Shakespeare emerged, was a time when the English language suffered or enjoyed (depending upon how you look at it) sloppy spelling with a conspicuous interchangeability of consonants and vowels. In this regard, the signature letters of PELE on Dee's ring have been interpreted as both apple (PELE = EPEL = APPLE) and fall (PELE = FELE = FALL). This represents the biblical story of the apple and the Fall, and it is not a mere coincidence. Do keep in mind here the comment about coincidences from the parchment that is the focus of this book.

The apple, besides containing the pentagram, is shaped upon the geometric pattern of a heart. When you throw out the apple, you have not only trashed knowledge, you have thrown out anything that could be termed compassion. The universe we live in is already known for its shortcomings when it comes to the heart and compassion. This brings us to the first of the teachings in the parchment: there is a divine source of compassion in the universe. If we do not acknowledge and recognize it, it is our loss and we are taking ourselves further down the rabbit hole. The PELE ring, however, conjures up plenty of energies that show no compassion. Solomon's ring had everything to do with enslaving or commanding the jinn. His so-called public works enslaved most of the local and distant populations. Whenever you study or experience the divinity, you have to remember that it is double-sided. This supreme power, however, represents the core control matrix of our local universe. Real world politics, including the Crown, revolve around this matrix. This explains why Prince Charles is orbiting around this area of Transylvania. If he is not fully aware of the circumstances you have just read about in this book, his energetic field has no choice but to hover around this key point of power. Slavery and freedom are close brothers. You cannot have one without the other.

If Solomon truly commanded the jinn through Enochian magick, it did not die when he died and the temple was raided. It was conjured up again by John Dee who was the pre-eminent scholar of his day with a library of thousands upon thousands of books at a time when Cambridge had less than five hundred. His library was something akin to the library at Pharos (Alexandria) for its time. Knowledge attracts spirits and Dee gated in the mother lode, a lode which represents so much of the hidden control over today's civilization. I will state again that it was this complex that was running Dee, not the other way around. It also ran Solomon. In this respect, the best that a Dee or Solomon can do is to have a conversation with this terrible or awesome force that manifests as a formidable power. In other words, one can interact back and forth, if one is lucky. It is not unlike wrestling or boxing on the edge of a cliff. The shortcomings of the aspirant or player are going to come into view loud and clear and be amplified. Solomon's empire went into ruin immediately upon his death and Dee ended up in poverty, discarded from the powerful empire he engineered and magically erected with the help of magical “friends.”

When I suggest having a conversation with this formidable power that represents the control of our evolutionary matrix, to say nothing of our political matrix, this runs hand-in-hand with the stated purpose of Aleister Crowley’s magick which is, specifically, to converse with one’s own Holy Guardian Angel or HGA. This is akin to your true or higher self.

One obtains conversation with one’s HGA by activating one’s TRUE WILL. This is really no different than the fifth precept in the secret parchment which has to do with aligning oneself with the will of God. It is important to point out here that the entire modus operandi of Aleister Crowley’s magical work, as dictated by The Book of the Law, is Do What Thou Wilt shall be the whole of the law. What is heinous about this dictate is not the statement itself, but rather, that virtually all practitioners of magick see this statement and think it means something akin to eating as many Hershey bars as your stomach can put up with or having as much sex as you can get away with. The whole proposition is that one should seek out and discover one’s TRUE WILL, this being something akin to that which is connected to the essence of life (God). What is equally or even more heinous than the aforesaid practitioners of magick are people who know nothing about the subject who will look at such and say, “Look, he’s saying you can eat as many Hershey bars as you want and have sex with them too!” That being said, it should also be mentioned that even a serious practitioner of magick, who aspires to more than Hershey bars and sex, is predisposed to falling into temptation and being side-tracked. Demonic possession, sometimes very subtle, is rampant in this field. The solution is simple: work on yourself diligently and cultivate your own true will. It does not happen overnight or by joining a magical order. The TRUE WILL very much aligns with step number five of the secret parchment and has to do with reaching for “the Highest Peak of the Kingdom Without Name.”

When we consider the political machinations surrounding the discoveries in Romania, we have to consider and reconsider the jinn, again and again.

When we refer back to the inscription of KR, there is another viewpoint with regard to the goddess KOR, and that is its etymological reference to both the heart (as in cardiac) and the word core, as in the core of an apple.

As was said earlier, the apple shows the archetypal symbol for a heart and compassion. The core of an apple, however, shows the symbol of a pentagram. In other words, if you make a transverse cut of an apple, it will reveal a five-pointed star in the center. Thus, the core or shin is that which is within the heart. It might also interest you to note that the dictionary's etymology of the word compassion states that it originates from the traditional passion of the Christ. Although it is certainly not true, it is as if our concept of compassion began with Christ and/or the Christ story. Krishna, of course, was full of compassion long before the Christian era. As has been painstakingly demonstrated in Synchronicity and the Seventh Seal, shin is the secret word of Freemasonry and that is the core principle upon which Christianity was formulated.

Although the rival forces surrounding Transylvania can be considered two polarities representing the Christ and the Antichrist, it does not have to be viewed that way. What we cannot escape from, however, is the fact that the black fire or hidden will suffers a blockage on the TRUE WILL. This applies on a collective basis, but it most certainly reflects back to all of us as individuals on some level. When we arrive at and recognize shin, we are not only at the gateway of a new aeon, we are at the fulcrum of change, and this includes the long missing compassion already mentioned.

In esoteric Judaism, the hidden meaning of shin is demonstrated by means of a metaphorical comparison to a piece of coal. Let us first look at the three flames emitting from the top of the letter shin itself. See below.

THE HEBEW LETTER SHIN:

These three “flames” represent three quantum states. First is the black essence of the coal which symbolizes the changeless essence of the black void. It is sometimes known as the Black Flame as it houses the second, hidden flame, which also contains the hidden will. This is comparable to a piece of coal because when coal burns, it is fueled by a hidden inner flame which cannot be seen by the naked eye. This inner flame is the power to change within the “changeless” universe. This is shin, also known as the eternal hidden flame of life. It has no beginning and no end but always survives. It is the quantum potential to change.

The third flame represents actual change. When you apply the element of air to a piece of coal by blowing on it, you have created a flame that is now outside of the coal and visible, and this represents the continuity of life.

Breath (or prana) is a push-pull (inward and outward) exchange of the element of air that makes us alive or dead. It is the test by which something is judged to be alive or dead. It is also important to remember that shin serves as a bridge between life and death because coal is created as a result of dead vegetable matter condensing over a period of considerable years. It is a never ending cycle of alpha and omega.

Shin represents the inner chamber and quintessence of the heart. In physiology, the primary physical function of the heart is to circulate blood and energy to the entirety of the physical body. If we think of shin on a collective basis, it represents circulation through not only the morphogenetic grid but throughout the universe itself. The fact that KR not only represents shin in the inner chamber of the heart but also Kronos, or time, encourages us to look at the relationship between time and the heart as well as the circulation factor between the two. Saturn (Latin for Kronos) is often viewed as the antithesis of compassion as it represents cold hard facts independent of emotion. In astrology, if one is conflicted with issues of the heart (Venus), the antidote is Saturn. Conversely, if one is surrounded by a desert of cold hard facts, the antidote for too much Saturn is Venus. There is an archetypal push-pull between time and the heart, the phenomena of nostalgia being just one example.

For those of you who have studied my past work, you know that I was led to the revelation of the meaning of shin through my pursuit of the time phenomena of both the Montauk Project and Ong's Hat. The circuitous path of synchronicity led me directly and spectacularly to Marjorie Cameron, a human representation of Babalon, who introduced me to the cosmic relevance of the divine feminine. This not only represents the compassion principle but also the relentless and ruthless aspects of Kali. As I was taking a spiritual journey to Sarmizegetusa, my past research was not only catching up with me, it was intertwining in an expository way. The trip to Peles Castle was only the first leg of my second sacred journey to Sarmizegetusa, and I was getting far more than I had bargained for. My third trip to Peles Castle was forcing me to make a subconscious association with my past studies of John Dee.

In this respect, a relevant hallmark of John Dee's writing is one particular conversation with Michael, an angelic entity. When Dee tried to pin Michael down by telling him to come when he is ready, Michael tersely replied by saying, "We lead time, Tyme leadeth not us!" This offers us some insight into the forces in play in the scenario that Cezar has described with regards to his use of the time machine made available to him. Although the artifices that Cezar uses to penetrate time are functional, they are monitored by forces that demonstrate themselves to be a senior monitor.

All of these factors, which very much includes my past studies and books, were showing themselves to be an active part of the landscape I was adventuring into on my sacred journey. This applies not only to the Crown of England but to the monitors of Tyme itself. My destination was Sarmizegetusa, an area that is said to house some of the most powerful energies in the world. And I would never even have learned about Sarmizegetusa had it not been for time scientist, Dr. David Anderson, arranging for my first trip to Romania in 2009.

I have herein expounded upon certain key aspects of my past studies because you will soon read about how they began to interplay on the journey itself. As for the regular three-dimensional world, it was now time to continue on with the rest of my sacred journey. As we emerged from Peles Castle, it was raining hard, just as it had on my two previous trips there. We huddled into the modern bus to escape the weather and get ready for our next destination: Mount Omu.

Chapter Nine — MOUNT OMU

Gathering our backpacks and ponchos, we secured our luggage in the bus before transferring to several four-wheel-drive vehicles that would take us directly to the Romanian Sphinx. The rain was not encouraging because we were slated to hike from the Sphinx to Mount Omu, a three-hour long trip on a day with nice weather. Due to the rain, I am sure Jonette would have cancelled and delayed this part of the journey if not for the fact that the accommodations on Mount Omu had been already secured for that night.

Our vehicles let us off right in front of the building which receives cable cars from down either side of the mountain. There were sheep all around as I made my way into the building where a woman and her daughter sell all sorts of honey products from the area. I bought and consumed a honey-laced cracker which gave me a boost of energy, the likes of which I have never quite felt before. It was the high point of the day and very much needed.

Not far from the honey ladies is a public rest room with two stalls, neither of which features a conventional toilet seat. It is important that I give you an idea of the toilet experience for those of you in Western countries who might like to travel there someday. Those of us who wanted to use the toilet went inside where we were greeted by a burly Romanian woman who collects a toilet donation that is the equivalent of about twenty-five or thirty cents. She was dispensing “not quite enough” toilet paper to those who needed it. Acting as both the jinn of the toilet and the toilet paper as well, she would then direct you to one of the two stalls. There is also a sink for washing your hands. I had brought my own toilet paper in my backpack, and this is a must for any excursions you take in Romania. It can make all the difference in the world and helps with other intangible aspects as well.

Had I needed more toilet paper from the jinn of the toilet, I think I could have persuaded her to part with another strip of paper for another quarter.

For those of you who wish to travel to such destinations in Romania, be warned.

Our specific destination was Mount Omu, the name of which literally means “Mountain of Man” as in “Mountain of Humankind.” It is an area that is studded with underground caverns, and the Dacians viewed it as an ascension chamber or stairway to heaven. Both then and now, the locale features sites with altars and sacred stones used for worship. Any human journey to Mount Omu can only be a microcosm of the more grander aspects that are implied by the magical geography and history of the area. It manifests in different ways for different individuals.

Mostly uphill, the journey to Omu was an invigorating but somewhat brutal hike. The conditions were wet and miserable, including muddy terrain.

Those with tennis shoes got their feet wet. Due to the uncomfortable conditions, there was no time to gather around and either contemplate or enjoy the Sphinx. Everyone was rather scattered. Up to that time, Jonette's only formal address to the group, other than a few concise words in the hotel lobby in Bucharest, had been via the public address system on the bus.

There was just enough direction so that everyone knew to move up the mountain and follow the hiking posts. Everyone tended to gather in small groups and make their way up the mountain according to their own chosen pace. We had also been advised to bring our own water as there was no guarantee of it atop Mount Omu. Personally, I was mostly preoccupied with keeping my video camera dry. I had a good poncho, and it did the job.

My feet did not get wet at all due to a good pair of hiking shoes. The only discomfort I endured was sweat from my T-shirt and turtleneck. In my case, the water penetrating me came from the inside and not the outside. At least two people could not make it and stayed at the hotel cabin near the Sphinx.

The views on the hike were beautiful, particularly after the rain ceased for the second half of the journey. I was finally able to take some video.

There were many interesting rock formations and also cave entrances in the distance. I have put up on YouTube a short video of about seven minutes which features some of the terrain. It is called "A Trip to Mount Omu and the Sphinx."

The last part of the hike is supposed to feature electromagnetic anomalies whereby you feel refreshed after having traversed the area. While this might be exaggerated somewhat, there was plenty of energy in the group when we reached the top. Such a hike is not for the faint-hearted. We all worked hard to get to the top, and it was a trial by earth as well as a trial by water. When you finally get to the top, there is a good-sized cabin and “restaurant” with no running water and no plumbing. It features minimal accommodations where several people sleep together, all in a short row, on a large platform “bunk bed.” There is a higher level and a lower level, and it forms an L-shape around the inside of the cabin. It is not heated. If you ever plan to go to Omu, accommodations need to be scheduled ahead of time as you do not want to arrive in the evening with no place to sleep.

Even before everyone got to the cabin, Jonette arranged meals for those of us who had arrived. As rustic as everything was, it was a great comfort compared to being out in the wet wilderness. It was not until about 9:30 or 10:00 o’clock that we gathered in the main sleeping quarters for a discussion and channeling courtesy of Jonette who channeled the mountain itself. The message of the mountain was that it is time to reclaim the energies for the sacred spiral. The goddess, she said, left this area aeons ago, and it is now time for the feminine to come back. War will be neutralized by compassion. The salamander (fire dragon) is the protector of the sacred fire and is the transformative symbol of yin and yang. We are to work with the salamander. It was also explained that, during the germination process within the womb, we had all once possessed the body of a salamander.

Jonette’s channeling resulted in a lot of spontaneous contributions from the group, the most dramatic of which was from Cosmin, our Romanian tour guide and coordinator. He showed us a topographical map of the general area, and how Mount Omu, the Sphinx, and the rock known as Babele are all aligned on a vertical line which is superimposed over a large area of topography that appears to be the profile of a human face (see map). It is very important to note that the depiction of such a face could only be recognized from a vehicle or view from high in the sky. Of additional importance and irony is that the part of the face that equates to the chin was named Coltii Lui Barbes or the “Thorns of Bărbesh.” This name was ascertained hundreds of years ago and long before topographical maps were available. In Romanian, the word for chin is bărbie, and this is a clear indication of the name being derived from the chin or area of the chin which includes words like barba, meaning beard. Thorns could refer to the spikes of hair that make up a beard, probably named after the terrain of the area. Mount Omu is at the crown of the head while the Sphinx and Babele are at the eye level of the face. If you follow the vertical line that extends downwards from the crown, eye, and chin, it will lead directly to the Giza Plateau. If you draw a perpendicular line to the vertical line, the “eye” of this face is looking in the direction of Tibet. This was not the only revelation that Mount Omu imparted to us, but it is an objective reference point that is very relevant to share. This map and Cosmin’s dialogue can be viewed in the aforementioned YouTube video, “A Trip to Mount Omu and the Sphinx.”

Cosmin followed his presentation of the map with an incredible story about a vision he had about this area. It was actually the most spectacular of different visions he had experienced in the last two years. Not previously prone to such visions, it amazed him. Although the vision was rather short in terms of human time, it impinged upon his consciousness. It is such a rich vignette that I have encouraged him to develop it into a book at some point.

According to the vision, there was a huge crystal next to Babele (which is only a short distance away — maybe a hundred yards or so south of the Sphinx). This crystal was a depository for information and served a purpose that was something akin to the Library of Alexandria. There was a port next to Babele where space ships would come and land. Representatives of different civilizations would land at the port, work with the crystal, and leave. They would access the information for their own purpose, the only requirement being that they were to download whatever information they possessed into this crystal. There was no other payment or tax. All Romania (or Dacia or whatever you want to call the host civilization) had to do was to maintain this crystal for Mankind and allow anyone to work with it. There were so many different ships that wanted to utilize this huge crystal that it took many days, and often months, to make an appointment to land.

One day, after a period of turbulence, an extremely large ship gave a signal that it wanted to use the crystal. The Mount Omu faction had never seen this civilization before but had heard of them and recognized them as the civilization that created Humankind and the population of earth. Their request created two immediate problems. The ship was so huge that it was very challenging to have it land in the mountain area. There was little room. Second, there were many other ships in orbit waiting for their turn to access the crystal. It also did not help that there was not a familiar language between the two factions.

A quick decision was required, and this would be made by a council of thirteen elders of which Cosmin was the youngest. His job was primarily concerned with logistics. The council met at Mount Omu, most of them feeling a moral obligation to allow this huge ship to land because their civilization represented the forefathers of the human race. Meetings of this council were regularly held at Omu, and this is where they made their decisions. After a quick discussion, the council invited them to land.

Cosmin was the only one to vote against this as he was in charge of logistics, and this operation would be a nightmare. He was already committed to other ships who had reserved their access, but he was now assigned the responsibility of fixing the logistical nightmare in order that this ship could land and do its work.

The entire evolution took place very fast. Telling all other ships to remain in orbit for further instructions, they cleared out the port for this huge ship. It took maybe twenty minutes. A positive signal was given to the ship to land, and it did so. The area was cleared of most personnel.

Two or three remained in a tall tower, and there were two or three guards positioned every so often for protection of the visitors. Although the ship was huge, it fit like a snug glove with part of it sticking out over the edge of the mountain. A door eventually opened and five beings came out.

Standing two and a half meters high, their appearance was both unique and interesting. With hands and feet barely emerging out of their suits, they walked around like penguins to get around. They possessed dome helmets which looked like black glass, and one could not see their faces.

The crystal itself was surrounded with columns, all of which had a marble floor beneath it. There was a ring on top of each column. The five penguin beings who disembarked from the ship went to the crystal. The being in the center lifted his hands over the crystal as did two others to his side. The other two did not raise their hands at all. The crystal then lit up like a Christmas tree, and Cosmin was intrigued by how much the crystal resonated with these beings. This sort of response was unusual.

Looking at these creatures, Cosmin felt that they were acknowledging his presence without saying anything. Although he was very interested in them compared to the other civilizations he routinely dealt with, he had become upset because they had asked to have their way as they claimed to be the forefathers of that particular Dacian or Romanian civilization. As this incident unfolded, Cosmin was just looking and watching them without any thoughts. The being to the right of the central being then turned to him.

Although Cosmin could see his gaze, he could not see his eyes. He then felt as if he had been filled with all the galactic love possible. During the time he actually experienced this vision, shivers went through his body and he began crying. He felt the universe was loving him through this being.

This profound glance lasted only about two seconds before the being turned his gaze back to the crystal. They soon finished, turned away, and went back to their ship, taking off with no goodbye. Looking at them at the edge of the landing pad, he wished that they would have stayed longer.

This rather remarkably intense vision was not only detailed, it all flashed sort of instantaneously through Cosmin's mind when it occurred. More importantly, it had all happened in the very territory we were visiting. If the vision is at least partially true, it gives a very plausible explanation of how the Bucegi complex beneath the Sphinx was able to acquire, according to Radu's story in Transylvanian Sunrise, so much information about the genetics of the galaxy. For those of you who do not recall, this chamber features tables whereby one places their hand over a section of the surface as it gives a complete holographic readout of the DNA of a particular life form from a different planet, also designating the specific location of the star system it is from. By placing another hand over another section at the same time, it allows for a readout of the potential hybridization of the two life forms. It is also important to note that in Radu's previous books, Cezar has experienced issues of censorship when it comes to penetrating the makers of the various devices they have discovered.

As interesting and as controversial as Cosmin's vision might be, it was only one more step on our spiritual journey to Sarmizegetusa. It was now time to sleep. I was given a "heated" room with three others while most everyone else slept in the big room. I think it was warmer in the big room due to the body heat of thirty plus people. Our little room had two bunk beds with a gas heater. There were two very thick wool blankets, and this was just enough to keep you warm. When one blanket fell off during the night, I could sure feel the difference. Due to my irregular diet as a result of travelling, I had to get up twice in the middle of the very cold night to use the outhouse facility. It was perhaps the most uncomfortable challenge of the entire trip, but I survived it and woke up on August 12th to a brisk mountain morning and breakfast.

Before descending down the mountain, we visited the sites of ancient altars of the Dacian priests and created our own stone circle with a symbol of Venus. After another long hike down the mountain, we gathered in a circle in front of the Sphinx, and Jonette spoke of her earlier visit where the "white wolf" had acted as her protector within the tunnels. At that exact moment, a real white wolf/dog joined our circle as if to confirm that what she had said were true. It was rather dramatic and is only one example of her authentic spiritual work which is far more than just a theoretical or mystical exercise. Cosmin then got out the topographical map again and clearly explained the phenomena of the face shown on the earlier pages of this chapter. Up to that time, I could not clearly make out the face, but others could see it. It was not until I focused on it through the lens of my video camera that I could see the obvious figure of a face. It is this explanation by Cosmin that you will see on YouTube. The line drawn over the photo on page 186 is subject to inaccuracy as I had to recreate the line with my own eyesight from watching the YouTube video. I do, however, believe it to be more accurate than not.

It was now time to leave the Sphinx and head down the westward slope of the mountain which leads to Iomolita Cave and our hotel. Iomolita Cave is one of the most remarkable caves you will ever see, and it is lit with electric lights so that you can experience it visually as well. That adventure, however, would be for the next day. Our mission was to simply go down the mountain inside of the cable car in different groups and make our way to our hotel. That required a walk of a mile or so. There was, however, some unfortunate news. Due to the severe rainstorm the day before, the road to our hotel had been washed out, and our modern bus could not safely bring us our luggage. The elements had spoken. Personally, I could have cared less. I would be safe and warm in a hotel, and I still had a toothbrush, an extra pair of socks and some other clothing. Others, however, were distressed as they would be deprived of certain necessities that might include medication and the like. Jonette did her best to override this unforeseen difficulty by hiring more SUVs to pick up our luggage which eventually arrived sometime in the middle of the night.

That evening, we had a Romanian dinner (there was no other kind available) in the hotel dining room. I sat at a table that was almost exclusively filled with Romanians. This was an opportunity for all of us to find out more about each other and what we were all doing on this spiritual journey.

Before long, it was time to sleep. We were all very tired, and the comfort of a hot shower and a warm bed was quite enticing. Although I would go into a deep and comfortable slumber, my spiritual journey to Sarmizegetusa was continuing on in my sleep. The next step included some rather elaborate dreams which would prove themselves to be quite prophetic by the time the journey reached its end.

Chapter Ten — RAPID-EYE-MOVEMENT

After going to sleep on August 12th, I had three dreams that were deep, penetrating, and complex. Besides being a part of my spiritual journey, there was no question in my mind that they were inextricably connected to the August 12th biorhythm, just like the dream I had three years earlier on my journey to Sarmizegetusa with Nicole. When I awoke for breakfast, it was announced that we had a free day for everyone in the group to relax. Different excursions were offered, however, one of which was a visit to the traditional shrine of Vesta, the original Vestal Virgin upon which the religion of the state of Rome was founded. Vesta was the mother of Romulus and Remus, two twins who were born of a virgin birth. Mars, the god of war, was their father. At 5:00 p.m. that evening, we had an exclusive reservation for our group of forty plus to visit Iamolita Cave. I made the decision to sleep in a bit but dedicated the rest of my free time to recounting and writing down my dreams in detail. This is not what I ordinarily do with my dreams, but this series of dreams was so strong, I felt compelled to record them. There was no thought of putting them into this book. That did not occur to me until I returned home and had some realizations.

In the first dream, I was walking towards the Kennedy compound in Massachusetts for the funeral of Joseph P. Kennedy, the patriarch of the Kennedy family. I was very self-conscious as I did not feel I belonged there. As I approached the security detail, I was ready to use the name of an old friend who was very close to the Kennedys as I figured that was the only tangible way to get past security if they questioned me. As it turned out, this was not necessary. They considered my attire to be impeccable, and I was made to feel a friend of the family. My interpretation of this part of the dream is that it represented not only presidential authority but the family that could create a president. As Joseph Kennedy was also an ambassador to England, this fits into the John Dee theme as well. The fact that he was dead represents the end of an old guard as well as a new beginning.

I was then escorted to one of the female Kennedys who talked to me. It was a challenge for the two of us to seek out familiarity in each other. When I told her about my books, she said that she had read them. In the dream, however, it was my perception that she was mistaken as she was referring to books specifically about liberty. I explained that my books were about time travel. Once we got over the awkwardness, she shrunk to an immature little girl. This represents the diminutive goddess but also suggests immature presidential or governmental characteristics. It also reveals how politicians view the feminine energy. After becoming younger, she wanted Mexican food, and I took her out of the compound to get her some. I should point out that I have repeatedly dreamt of Mexicans, and when I do, they are shells for aliens. Due to the high incidence of "illegal" Mexicans in New York and America in general, my subconscious sees them as one and the same. In this case, I was not dreaming of aliens, but her desire for Mexican food suggests that she wanted to eat alien food. We then returned to the compound.

When I re-enter the compound, I am now with Ed Oakley, Jonette Crowley's husband. As Ed taught a leadership seminar at Atlantykron, I associated him with that subject. I was walking in the spirit of leadership, and we were both very well dressed. As we approached security, I once again remembered my old friend who knew the Kennedys and thought I might have to play that card, but it was not necessary. They made that completely clear. This has to do with new connections.

The young Kennedy girl then explained dissatisfaction with the Mexican food she had recently eaten and wanted me to take her out again. I do so and point out a Mexican restaurant in Westbury to her that is named Don Juan's. I indicated that we could go there, but she suddenly expressed a desire for new clothes. Accordingly, I took her to my home where she could pick from a very colorful and plentiful wardrobe belonging to my daughter who is named Sky. Note that when I typically dream of my daughter, it refers to my book company, Sky Books, which is named after her. In the dream, the Kennedy girl picked from a whole bedroom full of colorful clothes belonging to my daughter, and her desire was taken care of.

I then needed to use the bathroom. When I entered, however, I saw a urinal slowly but deliberately sliding across the floor. It was very odd. After it slid to the point where it was right in front of me, it suddenly and inexplicably cracked down the middle. Although I realized it would cost money to replace this urinal (I do not actually have a urinal in my house), I thought it was absurdly funny. I laughed and did not really care about the expense. Knowing I would need to use another fixture, I then looked to the wall and saw that the regular toilet and the sink next to it had been smashed with a sledge hammer or the like. This was no longer funny. It occurred to me that my home or domain was being violently and deliberately violated.

I went to the upstairs bathroom and was not happy to see that the fixtures there had been similarly smashed. The message was quite personal. I saw my daughter and explained to her that if I could not find the culprits then she would be the obvious person to blame. She concedes that there would be no other logical suspect.

Hearing voices in a downstairs bedroom, I entered and saw three men. One spoke to me and clearly knew who I was. Without them saying anything, it was clear that they were hoping to intimidate me with the violence that had been committed in my home. Further, they wanted to scare me away and squat in order to take possession of what I own. It was definitely an issue of ownership, and the man began talking in an angry and challenging voice.

He wanted to know how I got all the money to build such an energy efficient and environmentally friendly house. This is a huge exaggeration as the only energy-efficient aspect of my house is a wood burning stove in my fireplace. It is not an environmental house by most standards. With regard to money, I do not possess any great wealth at all unless you consider the virtually untapped resources of the literary rights which I own. The man was, however, astounded, as if I had gotten away with something that no one else had. Instead of arguing with him, I went into re poi re with him and engaged him with communication. As I was not fighting, he knew that he would have to negotiate with me in order to deal with me. It was my intention to call the police on them for breaking and entering, but I did not tip them off. I waited so they would not react badly.

As is often the case, major spiritual dreams come in threes. Although I had two more dreams, I will first analyze this one.

The Kennedy compound is deeply symbolic and concerns power, control, and authority. The patriarch dying, as opposed to JFK, symbolizes a change in the power behind the power. I am welcomed to the fold twice, and there is no mistake about it. My interaction, however, is through a diminutive goddess who is seeking food from me from a foreign source. Unsatisfied with the food, she wants more but seems to show no interest in Don Juan or a loving interest. Instead, she wants the colorful clothes or exotic data that my books represent. I should also mention that the Don Juan restaurant is on Old Country Road which symbolizes the “old country.” This could refer either to Romania or to the way the United States used to be under the old guard. It could also refer to both.

After serving the diminutive Kennedy goddess, I go to relieve myself and every means to do so is broken. Toilets and plumbing represent the release of toxic waste matter and emotions. Even though it is my personal house, I am not deeply bothered and laugh, particularly at the sliding urinal. The sliding urinal is representative of loss of control, particularly with regard to releasing toxicity. As I do not have personal issues and do not feel emotionally upset over any of this, it obviously has to do with the matters at hand in my work. It suggests that the events surrounding Radu’s efforts are very censored, and there is no room for emotional entanglements. There is nothing I can do about it. When it gets personal, however, I have to take a stand against the perpetrators. I deal with them diplomatically. Their upset over energy efficiency, I believe, could have to do with my association with Dr. David Anderson and his time reactor which offers virtually limitless energy that is cheap. The dream ends with me knowing I can get help to get rid of these squatters.

My next dream features a black cat being grabbed from the back by a lynx. I am concerned for the cat when another lynx appears and runs by before grabbing the other lynx which is still holding the cat. In dreams, a lynx refers to secrets and the need to examine them. There is more to be known and more to be learned about a situation, relationship, or problem. A cat, in particular a black one, represents “shin” and the feminine energy. Black is also Dark Energy as defined (or misdefined) in physics. To me, this was an obvious pun on the word lynx and the link between both dreams, including the one I was about to have. Two lynxes suggest a very important connection between the dreams and the most sacred aspects of the feminine energy. The first lynx suggests that the secrecy concerned the bridling, containment, or possession of the feminine energy. The second lynx suggests that this possession was also being cloaked by an even greater or second secrecy.

The third dream was just as complex as the first one. I was in a pub that I once owned on Montauk Highway. The new owner appears as a young female, and there is plenty of food. I was friendly with her but was not quite sure what I was doing there. Walking across Montauk Highway, I saw a pub that I had never noticed before. It does not exist in reality and the terrain in real life is a parking lot. This establishment is called the President's Pub, and it is filled with all sorts of statuesque caricatures of former presidents. The patrons of the establishment also dress up as old presidents. It is highly comical but more baroque than comical. The dream is getting a point across, and it has to do with presidential politics and authority, reaffirming the earlier dream. This time, however, it is on the other side of Montauk Highway and exactly opposite the other establishment.

I went outside the pub and walked to the corner where I saw an abandoned building with an Indian name beginning with a "W." In a dream, the letter "W" is an iteration of two "U's" and refers to "you." One needs to focus on you and only you. I then saw two Indians in a fire truck who were cutting trees down and doing so in a reckless and callous manner. One tree fell down and almost hit me. I looked up, pointing to them so they would know that it almost hit me. They were very clear that they could care less about changing their ways. Laughing loudly, they clearly acknowledged that I had passed a test of initiation. From their behavior, they considered initiation to be a senior factor to what most people would consider to be nature, such as preserving trees and the environment. I then went back across Montauk Highway and returned to the pub I used to own.

The pub was not crowded. I found that I was looking for a girl named Nancy Hearty. In real life, her father owned another pub down the street, and I once had a long conversation with her. We seemed to get along well, and I recall talking to her about my interest in word processing. This was long before it was an every day skill. Her name speaks for itself with regard to the heart. She was not only the feminine energy but the heart aspect. The fact that she was associated with a pub refers to spirits or altering consciousness. In the dream, I then learned that she was now known as Chrissie and had taken a walk down the street. Attempting to follow her, I went down the street to a very busy pub. It was the old Firehouse, a restaurant in Sacramento, California. In real life, the Firehouse was at one time the most high-end restaurant in Sacramento. The owners built it over or around an old firehouse in the most dilapidated part of town which was literally the old historical Sacramento that dated back to the post Gold Rush era. When I lived in the Sacramento area and the Firehouse was at its peak, every single building in the neighborhood was a shack at best and all were abandoned save for bums here and there. This area is now the top tourist spot in Sacramento and has been fixed up utilizing the theme of the Gold Rush. In the dream, the Firehouse was on the corner, and I was accompanied by a minor. There is a sign that says you must be 21 to enter. I went down the street to another establishment, and Chrissie emerges and goes out. I pursued her but was no longer sure what was happening or what I was doing there. That is the end of the dream, but it is only the beginning of the adventure that I was about to pursue in real life. The past, future, and present were expressing themselves through my dreams. Without prematurely revealing certain aspects of what happened in real life, I will now interpret the last part of the dream beyond what I have already offered.

A pub or bar refers to an alteration of consciousness and also has to do with socialization. That I once owned it refers to my past. The new owner is feminine, youthful, and invigorated. Crossing Montauk Highway is obvious, indicating the cumulative experiences of investigating Montauk.

The President's Pub represents the subjugation of Native American power or authority through the alteration of consciousness. They are the new or empowered social order, and my roots are on the other side of Montauk Highway.

I have already explained the "W" on the abandoned Indian building. This is self-explanatory and refers to my adventures with the Montauk Indians. In dream interpretation, a fire fighter represents one's higher self and indicates one is experiencing a period of cleansing and purification. The firefighter is the symbol of a true hero and of hope. While a pine tree can be a phallic symbol, it also refers to growth and the passage of time. A pine tree, which this was, symbolizes immortality, life, and/or fertility. The fact that the tree was falling suggests all of those good things crashing down on me. It can also mean that you are off balance, out of synch and headed in the wrong direction. The falling tree, however, missed me and was designed as a test by my higher self. Once again, the “W” is all about “you” and “you.”

These are my lessons from the Montauk experience. I cross back over the highway to the heart of the matter in the pub. Once again, we have the feminine energy.

It was not until I returned home that I realized the full implications of this lady in my dream whose name had been changed to “Chrissie.” As a matter of fact, the process of writing down these dreams and their interpretation has facilitated sudden jolts of consciousness which are so deep and interweave so intricately with my life and the different threads of my research that I can only begin to expound upon the tip of the iceberg at this time. One of these is the realization that the name “Chrissie” corresponds to a girl from my fifth grade class. She was the most beautiful thing I had ever seen up to that time in my life, and I think practically every boy in the class had a crush on Chrissie. In the sixth grade, Chrissie was put right in front of my desk. Chrissie eventually told me she had a crush on me. We always remained good friends for the rest of my days in that town. The name “Chrissie,” however, would take on further significance during the rest of my journey. I did not realize any of this at the time and will explain in just a bit.

The fact that the Firehouse in Sacramento appeared in my dream is of paramount interest with regard to our ultimate destination: Sarmizegetusa.

The city of Sacramento was named after the sacrament of the Catholic Church. Specifically, Franciscan friars referred to it as Sacramento because they were able to easily grow the two necessary crops for the ingredients in the sacrament: grapes and wheat. Besides being the political capital of California, Sacramento is where gold was originally discovered during the Gold Rush. It is also a region I lived in. As for the Firehouse, it is the house of fire, and most etymologies will tell you that the word pharaoh means “house” which was symbolized in those days by a pentagon that looked like a home plate in baseball. Fire refers to shin where it is the Shekinah glory, the outward manifestation created by the spark of the divinity within. Fire also refers to transformation, just as the sacrament does in Catholicism.

With regard to the minor in the dream, this has a double meaning. It is a pun on “miner” as in a miner of gold, a big issue in Transylvania. During the Gold Rush, a whole class of citizens became miners. It is also symbolic of the fact that a minor or immature soul will not be allowed into the house of the sacrament. There are many factions vying for the control of this area of Romania, and you have already read about them. The number 21 is also a precursor to 22, the number of Zalmoxis that I have already expounded upon. 22 represents Gemini as well as the Major Arcana of the Tarot.

This is what my dreams had to say about all of this. I knew they were important, and that is why I wrote them down in such detail at the time.

The prophetic nature of them, however, only became evident upon my return home and as I began to interpret them. As interesting as they were and are, they were only one more part of my sacred journey to Sarmisegetusa. As you will soon learn, the dream was cluing me in on what to expect.

Chapter Eleven — THE JOURNEY

On the afternoon of August 13th, everyone was invited to get together, share stories, and participate in a session with White Eagle, courtesy of Jonette. One of my new Romanian friends, who I will refer to as Madame V, shared her visit to a nearby waterfall located at the traditional hearth of Hestia. Hestia is the goddess of the hearth and was the inspiration for the Vestal Virgins, her name being Vesta in Rome. There, Madame V had a profound spiritual experience wherein she experienced the presence of a particular being. While the details of what she felt are largely subjective in nature, her vision would not only prove useful during my next adventure, it would also serve to actualize what had taken place in my dream state the night before.

That evening, we were scheduled to visit Ialomița Cave, a locale I had visited the previous year with Nicole Vasilcovschi. Nicole and I referred to it as Zalmoxis' Cave because that legendary character is reputed to have stayed there. On that trip, Nicole had told me about another nearby cave, called the Priest's Cave, which contains a natural "bowl" or receptacle of water that refills whenever a portion of it is emptied. Due to time constrictions, we did not have time to see it the previous year. Hoping to see it on this visit, I asked Cosmin, our Romanian tour guide about it.

Neither he nor anyone else, however, had ever heard of it, and it was not readily visible from the Ialomița Cave area. My hopes were dashed.

Ialomița Cave is a huge natural cave, and you could drive a tank into the beginning of it. It is at least two stories high. An orthodox monastery has been erected in front of the cave, and you have to go through their door to access it and are asked to pay a small donation. There is also a chapel in front of the cave. It features a mural where the saints, depicted with white skin, are thwarting off demons, depicted with black skin. The chapel is situated so that you enter from the cave side. At the back of the chapel is a running source of natural water from the cave that is considered to be holy water. To me, entering the cave is a penetrating experience. One is going into the bowels of the earth and feels whatever that might represent archetypally to each individual who enters. One lady, who was in front of me by only a few feet, let out the most blood curdling scream I have ever heard in my life. It was a visceral reaction. Due to its extremely dramatic nature, which was completely unintended, I regretted that my video camera was turned off at the time. Anna, the lady who screamed, needed only a few minutes to gather herself. She was quite all right. It is quite surprising what descending into the Inner Earth, even if it is only a half a mile or so, might bring out in you.

After you leave the main “two-story” area of the cave, the passageway narrows considerably, and it eventually gets to the point where you have to bend down and navigate your way a little carefully. At no point, however, did it require getting down on my knees and crawling. The cave is also lit with electrical light, and this makes the path considerably easier. Even so, I still felt that I was emerging into a great darkness. I imagine that the experience would be much more profound with only candle light. It would certainly be more precarious. There are wooden steps here and there, and one has to be very careful in certain spots. The cave opens up again at certain points, and it is a truly magnificent experience. We eventually gathered together and did a meditation in what amounted to a virtual amphitheater about three-fourths of the way into the cave. One is surrounded by flowing water, stalagmites, and the like. Before the very end, there is a fork on the path which leads to a pool of water. Someone speculated that this might be the Priest’s Cave, but I was sure this was not the case. I had already been there the previous year. At the very end of the cave’s path, it becomes too wet and unwieldy to proceed further unless you have a board to walk on and good light. The electric light does not go past that point. I am told that you can negotiate your way with a board for about eighty yards. After that, you will need spelunking equipment to go further.

The cave, however, is endless and leads to a series of interconnecting tunnels, an actual conduit to the realm of the Inner Earth.

After spending about two hours in the cave, we emerged into the light. By happenstance, I was walking alongside Madame V. Looking over at one of the monks, who was operating a souvenir shop at the front of the cave, I suddenly got the idea that he might know about the Priest’s Cave. I asked Madame V to come along with me in case he did not know English. He did speak English, but it took him a while to understand what I was talking about. Finally, his eyes opened up in recognition. I then asked him to give Madame V the directions in Romanian so that it would be perfectly clear.

He told us that the path to the Priest's Cave was on our way home but that we would have to veer off on a path to our right. The walk back to our hotel was at least a mile, and Madame V and I had to leave our group to make this journey. We were accompanied by one other, a lady who was one of the very few Americans on the journey. This new cave was a little challenging to find, and we almost missed it, but we could eventually see an opening on the side of the mountain. It required a little more adventurous climbing than I had experienced thus far on the trip. When we eventually arrived at the Priest's Cave, we discovered that it is so small that we had to take off our backpacks and leave them behind. After a very short distance into the cave, we came to a point that required going down on one's hands and knees. As I am tall, I hesitated. The American and Madame V hesitated too, but both soon went past this point and relayed back to me what they saw. Before long, they came to an area where they could stand up. Madame V then became excited, exclaiming that she could see the exact being that she saw earlier in the day at the waterfall of Hestia. Instead of a spiritual manifestation, however, what she saw was a representation of the being inscribed into the wall well above her head. The "glyph" was pointing in a particular direction. Both ladies had to climb upwards and negotiate an awkward passage in order to come to a higher but very narrow level. In the direction that the "being" was pointing, they soon found the "bowl." At this realization, Madame V became almost ecstatic. I then got down on my hands and knees and worked my way to where they were.

Someone had left a pitcher, and we all shared in taking some of the water. All in all, it made for a magic moment. It was not only a challenge to find the place, it required a certain amount of fortitude and resolution to access this inner and rather hidden chamber of the Priest's Cave. Madame V commented that it took both a Romanian and an American to find this place. This comment is symbolic of what else is currently going on in Romania.

When we finally emerged from this small cave, everyone was long gone and had returned to the hotel. Taking the long walk, the three of us all talked to each other in English. Based upon what Madame V was saying and what I had recalled from our earlier conversations, it soon dawned on me that my new friend is some kind of celebrity in Romania. She did not say that, but it became obvious. When I asked her, she sort of shrugged her shoulders but admitted she was somewhat well known. Her Romanian friends later confirmed my suspicions and said that she is very well known. When I later checked her out on the internet, I noticed that there is an important man in Romanian politics who shares her last name, and she later confirmed that this man is her husband. Although I did not realize it at the time, my presidential dreams were alluding to power and authority in politics. My dreams were starting to take shape through my interaction with Ms. V and her own deeply personal spiritual experience at the hearth of Hestia. When we returned to the hotel, it was after nine o'clock. Most of the others were gathered together, and there was a formal discussion going on. We soon interrupted the proceedings to tell them of our success, and I could not believe how happy everyone seemed to be over the fact that we had succeeded in our quest to find the obscure Priest's Cave. This experience told me that we had indeed accomplished something significant. Afterwards, we all enjoyed a very late dinner.

The next day was a day-long drive into Transylvania that would eventually end in the general area of Sarmizegetusa. Other than bathroom and food breaks, our only stop was at a sacred spot, Sinca Veche, more or less a couple of hours north of the Sphinx, where there is an absolutely beautiful grove of trees surrounding a magical stream of water. It also features a magnificent cave where you can see an ancient human figure inscribed next to a Star of David. Visitors are only able to access the very front of the cave, but it goes deep into a mountain side, atop of which is a monastery.

It was very late in the day when we reached our destination in Transylvania, but it was still daylight. Although we enjoyed the comfort of a modern bus, we were travelling on a rock-studded dirt road. The bus had to move slowly, seldom more than twenty miles per hour and often less. We were arriving at the small town of Costești, the general area of which is said to feature a population of two or three thousand. There, one is very far off the beaten path of civilization as we regularly experience. It has been my experience and direct observation that this area of Transylvania is not only surrounded by a virtual field of energy unique unto itself but one that makes it challenging or difficult to penetrate the more esoteric or sacred aspects thereof. The unpaved road is just one obvious example in this regard. Although I do not consider it particularly dangerous, it is my opinion that one should be very mindful and respectful of where one is going, what one is doing, and why one is doing it. I will now give you one small example of how one might get misdirected. There is another town of the same name, Costești, in Wallachia, in the southern part of Romania. If you should decide to go to this region, you want to go to Costești in Transylvania, not far from Sarmizegetusa Regia. There is also another Sarmizegetusa which served as a political center for the Romans at one point. Do not get confused by that either.

In any event, our bus eventually arrived at a fork in the road where it absolutely could not pass. The road was really not quite wide enough and was too riddled with ruts and rocks. When the bus came to a stop, Cosmin announced that we had reached our destination and made a call on his cell phone. We were waiting for directions and everyone was a little anxious. I do not even believe that any of our fellow Romanians had been to this specific area before. Were we lost? It had been an all-day trip on the bus, and we had already been tested more than a bit on the journey thus far. Was this another test? As a matter of fact, when I originally learned of the schedule that Cosmin had prepared for this trip, I was very sceptical about the logistics because I had been to this region before. I knew of no hotel.

Although I voiced my concerns to Jonette, she had no choice but to trust Cosmin. To tell you the truth, however, Cosmin was going blind. He had never been to this spot, and he had only made the arrangements by phone.

As he later admitted, he did not know exactly what to expect. As I said, it is far from the beaten path.

Even though I had doubts about the hotel, I had been comforted on the subject when I went to lunch with Nicole in Bucharest several days earlier.

She had just flown in from Canada and was able to spend part of the day with me. While we were on a city bus, Nicole received a phone call from Lenutz, a remarkable lady that I met in the middle of the solar calendar on my first trip to Sarmizegetusa. Lenutz has become a very special person in my life. She called Nicole to tell her to say hello to me and to let me know that she was sending a package for me that would arrive at the hotel in a few days. I was now not only convinced that there was a real hotel in the region but that I would have a welcoming gift waiting for me in a sacred spot located “in the middle of nowhere.” This gave me the additional comfort of knowing that I would be made to feel at home in a place that was rather well known for its obscurity and unfamiliarity.

As we waited for a response to Cosmin's phone call, everyone got out of the bus to stretch their legs. In a very short time, a pretty girl arrived in a car and pointed us in the right direction. It was announced to us that she would transport our luggage by car, and we would walk a quarter of a mile or so to the Pensiunea Cotiso hotel. If anyone needed a ride for any reason, she offered to take them as well. It took her three trips to deliver all the luggage. In the meantime, no one knew what to expect. When we arrived, we saw a facility that was quaint, modern, nice, and clean. We were greeted by different Romanians, none of whom spoke English, and given our accommodations. Our group, many of whom are world travellers, were very pleased and impressed with the facilities, particularly when you consider the remoteness of the location. I would eventually learn that the hotel had rushed to finish construction of the main floor of a new building, just for us. There was another floor up top that was still unfinished at that point. Although it is certainly not that well known to outsiders, there is something of a tourist business in this region. This hotel also features a conference room where people attend conferences on different topics, ranging from astrology to more mundane subjects.

We had arrived very late and beyond our scheduled arrival time, but our hosts were very courteous and served us a sumptuous dinner that surprised everyone. Their food was over-the-top, and they did not stop serving us until we were all fed to our satisfaction. All of the food is from local farms.

Transylvania is one of the last unspoiled regions in the world. It was soon time to go to bed and get a good sleep for our adventure the next day. We were going to White Faces, an old Dacian citadel that is known as one of the last places to fall during the invasion of the Roman Empire.

For some reason, I awoke in the middle of the night and realized that I would have to speak to the pretty girl as she was the only one I saw at the hotel who spoke English. It was my intention to get all the details about the hotel and the local area so that I could return for future trips. Only later would I realize that my awakening in the middle of the night was directly tied to the dreams I had experienced two nights earlier. When we awoke for an early breakfast, she was busy helping to serve it. I decided it would be best to approach her later that evening.

After breakfast, we walked down to the fork in the road and waited for our bus to arrive. It was parked at least fifteen minutes away where the driver stayed with the rest of our Romanian contingent. I took this time to do my morning chi gong workout. This features an exercise of standing perfectly still without any movement for twenty minutes. As it turned out, I was standing by myself and across from everyone else. While I stood, Marianna, a Danish doctor, began to do energy work on me, from a distance. I had asked her for some help a couple of days earlier, and she said that she would get to me when she could. As she worked on me, I just continued standing. As I stood there, completely still, a herd of water buffalo came barreling down the road. There were about seven in total, and I was rather surprised. Besides the fact that they seemed to come out of nowhere, I had no idea there were such creatures in Transylvania. I thought of them as being relegated to more tropical areas, like Africa or India. One ran off into a farm, and three of them slowed down and began to walk in my direction. After all, there was a fork in the road, and they had to decide which way to go. Instead of taking either path, they walked right up to me and were no more than two or three feet away. Curious, they just stood there and looked at me. As far as I was concerned, there was no consideration of fear as I was doing an exercise that requires extreme stillness. One is also linking to the primordial mind. If done properly, there is no room for anything but the exercise. Of course, I noticed the creatures and their curiosity. All I knew about water buffalo is that they have a reputation for being extremely nasty.

These creatures were not so, but their physical presence can be very intimidating. I also knew that if I moved, I would create more opportunity for an incident. For me, there was no choice but to remain in my stance. They continued to stare at me until a man on a bicycle came and motioned them up the road. He was apparently their herdsman and was taking them to graze.

There are different interpretations for the water buffalo totem when it appears in your life. It often has to do with carrying a very complex burden, but it also suggests leaving the burden of domesticity behind and embracing the wild aspects of nature. Additionally, Lao Tse was depicted as leaving this world, through the Hunan Gate, on a water buffalo. Whichever one applies, and I think they all have some relevance, I was definitely getting more than I had bargained for on my spiritual journey to Sarmizegetusa. This was, after all, only my first morning in Transylvania, and I had only woken up a short while earlier. Keep in mind, when one makes a pilgrimage to Sarmizegetusa, it is the journey itself that makes up at least half of the experience.

The bus soon arrived and took us to a place from which we would take a several mile hike to White Faces, the ancient citadel. Although one is going uphill and walking miles, this path is much easier to negotiate than the more commonly travelled route, a shorter path which is very steep and requires grasping and hanging onto branches at different times. The shorter path is directly accessible on the road to Sarmizegetusa Regia. We, however, were not going there on this day. We were taking a more obscure path that was off the beaten track, and I did not recognize where we were. We walked by beautiful scenery and many farms, even having to walk through some of them to reach our destination. Our party included a local guide who took care of the required permissions. Eventually, we came to a grassy knoll where we rested. A lady from a nearby farm came out and brought us a bushel full of apples to eat. It was an extremely nice gesture, and we then enjoyed a talk about the local area. It was here where I learned about an ancient order of wizards with special knowledge and abilities. They are known as Solomonars and are often linked to the ancient Dacian priests. It is said that the term Solomonars is a more recent name for them and was given to them by Christian priests. The original name for them is Zgrimties or Hultan, the latter sounding very similar to sultan.

The Solomonars or Solomanari play a complex role in Romanian mythology with regard to the interaction between the “other realm.” Known to control the weather, they live away from the world, often in caves where they access another realm. Sometimes they come down to the villages to beg. Although they do not need anything, they are testing humans and can bring down hail or other ills if they do not like the response. In human form, they often appear with red hair and white robes, sometimes accompanied by a dragon. They have the power to summon dragons and often ride them. The earlier versions of these characters are much more pure than the later renditions which are deeply influenced by Christian agendas. At first, Christians attempted to neutralize the Hultan or Zgrimties by applying a Judaic-Christian namesake like Solomon, the most powerful figure in Freemasonry, a king who had power over the jinn. The magical powers of such creatures was readily acknowledged by the first Christians and were even recognized as beneficial. As time went on, the Christian priests began to demonize them for their own benefit until the point where they were declared evil. This amalgamation of the original energy with latter day appellations has created a watered down synthetic myth in current times. It is, however, through interaction with such spirits that the Dacian priests of ancient history became initiated.

A very important part of this tradition is that children born with special signs, including those with the placenta on their head, might become a Hultan. Such children might be stolen by a Hultan and taken to a school in “Crugul Pamantului” where they are trained until the age of 20. “Crugul Pamantului” can be translated as “the middle of the Earth” and is sometimes expressed as being “raised in the middle of the wolves”. This also alludes to Romulus and Remus, two twins of the virgin Vesta, courtesy of the god Mars, who were raised by wolves. It is not only ironic that Cezar Brad was born with a special sign, in his case a very large umbilical cord, but that his later life was in Department Zero under the tutelage of Dr. Xien.

It further evolves into Cezar becoming an ambassador to the people of the Inner Earth. This gives us all cause to wonder if Dr. Xien is of the order of the Hultan. In any event, I find it fascinating that Cezar Brad’s personal life story, whether intended to or not, parallels the legends of ancient Romanian mythology.

Besides finding Cezar’s correspondence with the Solomanari legends fascinating, I also find it to be delightfully appropriate. This relates to my own personal desire, as a young man, to become a science fiction writer. I had no idea at that time that I would eventually surpass this goal by leaps and bounds through the vehicle of the Montauk Project, a synthesis of virtually every scientific and occult discipline imaginable. When I initially engaged in the writing of that book, there was no question in my mind that everything known about the Montauk Project was not quite exactly the way it had been reported. We were dealing with fragments of what could be termed a crashed hard drive on a computer. The fragments were so odd, however, that it was most definitely a computer the likes of which no one had ever quite conceived of in popular literature. In any event, I chose the following theme for my book company: Sky Books — Where Science Fiction Meets Reality. The fragments of the Montauk Project given to me represented either a partial truth or a fictionalized truth. The actual truth of the situation, however, remained elusive and was even more interesting and mysterious. The stories of Cezar Brad and Radu Cinamar are no different. There is, however, a greater coherency with regard to the events and circumstances and the hope these stories offer to humanity. Discovering that Cezar's personal story is so interwoven and aligned with Dacian myth gives it, at least to me, new life and increases its significance. It is apparent to me that there is not only more myth behind Cezar's life than I had previously suspected but that there is also much more life behind the myth.

My spiritual journey to Sarmizegetusa was not only playing off of my past, it was doing it in such a way as to reactivate and strengthen my goals as a writer. It was manifesting right in front of me by way of enabling me to learn about the mysterious Solomanari. This was rapidly followed by an introduction to a local Romanian man. Much to my surprise and utter delight, he took me to an area and pointed to a valley. This, he said, is known as the Valley of the Golden Thrones. I was rather dumbstruck. You mean it really exists? That was the question I asked myself. Even if it was only a myth, it was now clear to me that the mythology of this area runs far deeper than what Radu has stated thus far. Radu alludes to a very deep mystery in this book but has not yet elaborated beyond what you have already read. I was now learning that there are indeed more legs to this story.

The Valley of the Golden Thrones is a beautiful valley that leads into pure wilderness. I was told that, within this valley, there is an entrance leading to the caves or tunnels described by Cezar in Chapter Five. If you follow the tunnels long enough, they will eventually take you to the golden thrones mentioned in that same chamber. Those are the thrones that, according to Professor Constantin's account as relayed by Cezar, surround an elliptical vortex to another world.

For his own personal reasons as well as for my own protective considerations, I will refer to this man as Mr. C. The first thing I asked him was if this entrance to the underground was a different one than the one described by Professor Constantin in his report. Mr. C said it was a different entrance and further stated that these underground tunnels lead all the way to the Bucegi Mountains. These were the pathways of the ancient Dacian priests and extend for hundreds and hundreds of miles. It occurred to me at that point in our conversation that the mysterious third tunnel in the Projection Hall beneath the Sphinx would, more than likely, lead directly to the thrones described previously. All we have been told thus far is that the third tunnel leads to the Inner Earth. As Cezar has reportedly become an ambassador to the beings in the Inner Earth, a more visible pattern is beginning to take shape in this saga that I have become far more personally involved in than I had originally intended.

As Mr. C speaks only Romanian, we had to use a translator to speak to each other. He did, however, know about me as he had read my books in his native language. As I asked him more questions, he said that he knew Professor Constantin, the man who discovered the entrance to the Golden Thrones before mysteriously disappearing. Mr. C said that the man's real name was Professor Constantin — he even gave me the first name — and that he did indeed disappear. He said, however, that the actual story is a bit different than that described in this book, further explaining that full accounts of sensitive information are sometimes restricted to protect various individuals or circumstances.

To reiterate my surprise, I had absolutely no idea that I would meet such a man or that I would personally and directly encounter circumstances suggesting that there were considerably more legs to Radu's book than even he has stated. This was all completely beyond my expectations. It was also an opportunity, if not an outright invitation, to look further into these matters. During his discourses with me, Mr. C had already stated that one can only penetrate the sacred aspects of this valley with permission from the resident spirits. This, of course, implies the Solomanari or Hultan. He has had many sacred experiences in that valley, all amounting to an alpha state of mind. There are certain times of the year, he said, when the energies are most prolific. Such experiences, he stated, are illusionary or beyond the borders of ordinary reality. In other words, do not expect to go into a cave and sit on a golden throne. The entrance to the cave will only be found by those whom the spirits allow to enter. One would be very fortunate indeed.

Unfortunately, there was no time to explore this area on our current trip, but I told Mr. C that I would like to return and explore this area with him but only after first asking the permission of the spirits to enter. When I said the latter, he gave a big smile. I was speaking the right words and he was happy to hear them. Even before these conversations with Mr. C, I already knew that I would return. That is why I wanted to speak to the pretty girl, an opportunity that would present itself later that evening.

As we made our way to the citadel of the White Faces, Mr. C made a rather off-handed comment. Stating it casually and in a matter of fact way, he said that he had once encountered Radu Cinamar in this area. This was also a surprise. Questioning him further, he said that Radu was making a trip to White Faces — perhaps it was his own special pilgrimage of a sort — and that he saw him get out of a car. Mr. C recognized him immediately. It was a spiritual thing. Although he asked him if he was Radu, Mr. C received no confirmation. Even so, it was obvious to Mr. C, but he did concede that there is maybe a ten percent chance that he might be wrong. I then told Mr. C certain private things that I know about Radu, none of which are in print.

When I did, he gave me a big smile and shook my hand. There was now no doubt in his mind that he had mysteriously encountered the real Radu.

This whole adventure with Mr. C was something of an epiphany for me. Without any expectation of what I was to discover on my second spiritual sojourn to Sarmizegetusa, I was being confronted with the undeniable logic that I would have to return in order to complete the platter that had been so mysteriously and surprisingly placed before me. As a result, I was no longer too interested in what I would see on the rest of this trip as I knew it would pale in comparison to my future visits. I was eager to return but that trip would be subject to a long time interval. While the rest of the hike to White Face was interesting and enjoyable, it could not measure up to this remarkable encounter with Mr. C.

After taking the longer path to White Faces, we took the shorter path on our way back. This meant going straight down the mountain. After a while, I realized that I had been there before. That was on my trip in 2009 with Nicole. Lenutz and her husband had taken us there from Sarmizegetusa.

The forest was unmistakably the same. This path is sometimes so steep and precarious that you sometimes have to grab tree branches to keep your balance. Several people struggled and/or fell down. Some overweight people literally had to slide down certain areas. I did not have any problem negotiating my way, but it requires agility. Once we got down the mountain, we arrived at the road which leads to Sarmizegetusa. We turned the other way and walked a couple of kilometers or so in order to meet our bus and return home.

When we got back to the hotel, it was soon time to eat. After dinner, I had the opportunity to sit down with the pretty girl. Her name is Cristina. My attitude was all business, and I was intent on becoming familiar with all the logistical details for what would be my return trip. Before we began talking, however, I was so struck by her beauty, and I am not just referring to her physical beauty, that unpredicted words just flowed out of my mouth.

Cristina’s response was to get up and hug me, and what I had planned to be only a few minutes of conversation turned into something much more than that. She explained to me that she knew who I was and that people come to their hotel as a result of the books I have written. Her mother even came out and asked me to autograph a copy of the Romanian version of my book, Pyramids of Montauk. I was very touched by all of this. As we became familiar and indulged in an informal conversation, I was rather in awe of Cristina, and I am not referring to her beauty. She is one of the most “together” and gracious persons that I have ever met. Cristina has studied law and is currently working on her Masters. At that time, she had a job at a law firm in Orăștie and helps out with the family business when she can. She also explained that she had helped with the interior design of the new rooms. Besides that, she made a point of telling me that she was willing to personally drive me to whatever destinations I wanted to go to on my next journey there. Cristina talked to me a lot about various things. She has a definite aptitude for the esoteric aspects of life, but she has been too busy with law school to read Radu’s books or much of anything else outside her specific studies.

Besides being touched by this, a very strong emotion came over me. In some strange way, I was home. Once again, I was being made to feel very familiar in a very strange and far away land, and one that is known quite specifically for its mysterious spiritual aspects. I indeed felt that Romania was opening up its heart to me. This emotion told me quite plainly that I had now arrived at the high point of my sacred journey. I could not help but tell Cristina that sitting there and talking to her was the climax. It was not going to get any better. Glad to share my experience, she hugged me again.

It was a brief moment in time but one that I will always remember. From my experience with the time travel adventures of Montauk, I would call it a marker in time and an important one.

As emotionally riveting at this delightful meeting with this new found friend was, it was not until I got home and analyzed my dreams that I realized that Cristina represented the Chrissie in my dream of August 12th.

Some aspect of my mind-body complex was obviously tapping into the future. The only connection it could make was with the name of Chrissie from my past. The Firehouse in Sacramento was a perfect parallel to their restaurant in the sacred or sacramental land of Transylvania. Both areas are also in the gold country. The fact that the Chrissie in my dream went next door to the Firehouse further reiterates the truth of the situation. The hotel and Cristina's home is in Costești, a small town which is, in a sense, next door to Sarmizegetusa.

I have had plenty of interesting dreams in my life, some of a precognitive nature, but this one was extra special because of the circumstances as well as the intensity of it. It is clear that my dreaming faculties were working overtime and doing a far better job than usual, but they were also connecting my past to my future. You cannot ask for much more on a sacred journey. It is interesting to speculate on how or why my dreams could so decisively predict or connect to the future. While I am certainly not the first person to experience such a thing, it becomes rather obvious that the R.E.M. function of the mind-brain complex does indeed serve the function of a somewhat low-grade time machine. By low grade, I am referring to the fact that it is restricted by certain limitations. That does not mean, however, that there are inherent limitations. These would only be limited by the predisposition of the observer and/or limitations imposed by another source located inside or outside of the mind-brain complex.

Based upon what Mr. C told me about his sacred experiences in the Valley of the Golden Thrones, it is obvious to me that there is something about this area of Transylvania that literally speaks to the mind-body-spirit complex in a way that validates what Cezar and Radu have already offered us earlier in this book. Specifically, they stated that the resident gold in the area serves as a superconductor with regard to consciousness. If a majority of what Radu has written in this book is false, and I do not mean to suggest that it is, he has most certainly offered me a jewel of truth with regard to this one piece of information.

What is most important to me regarding all of this, however, is that these experiences have enabled me to somehow remain “in touch” with the spiritual current of this area ever since I have left. I think of the area a lot with a feeling that is somewhat similar to but different than nostalgia. It is rather like being aware of an energy and the forces associated with it. Was I in touch with the Solomanari or Hultan? Were the two beggars I met at Peles Castle actually disguised members of this ancient priesthood that were testing me? I cannot answer these questions affirmatively or in the negative. It is clear, however, that my adventures, as well as those of Cezar Brad and Radu, are conforming to a very ancient spiritual archetype that has been woven into the fabric of the Romanian culture at its deepest roots.

Later that evening, as several of us sat around a table, someone suggested that I begin doing workshops at this location. I looked at this person as if they were nuts. Others then joined in so as to give this idea enthusiasm. Although I am definitely drawn to the area, it just seemed preposterous. Forced to take it seriously, I then said, “OK. If you organize it, I will come.”

The person behind this idea is Vanda Osman, sometimes known as Oz. She has been a professional tour operator since 1982. Sometimes, but not always, she organizes Jonette Crowley’s spiritual tours. On this trip, she was a fellow traveller. Going to sleep on this idea, I realized that it made sense. I would therefore have to go back to Cristina the following day and get more information.

That evening, a sacred camp fire was made at the back part of the property. It was a very enjoyable experience, and we were treated to local legends and stories about Zalmoxis, Vlad Dracula, and a shape-shifting white wolf. It is important to mention something here about Vlad Dracula. Completely vilified as a monster or vampire, the local story teller told us why he is so important as a hero to Romanians. For students of common history, it is well known that Vlad was thrust into a situation where his subjects, virtually all Christians, were being enslaved by the Ottoman Empire. His response was to ruthlessly and viciously drive the invading Turks out of Romania, most often impaling entire armies. This created a lot of fear in his enemies. What is not so well known, at least in the West, is that Vlad Dracula's father, Vlad Dracul, was also a great hero to the people but for another reason.

In Chapter 5, Radu and Cezar emphasize the exaltation of the peasant in Romanian culture. Without the peasant, you literally have no subsistence and therefore no culture at all. The Romanian/Dacian people have recognized this since time immemorial. It was typical, however, for the nobles, or boylans as they were called, to individuate from the peasants and to take advantage of them and treat them with contempt. Vlad Dracul was a hero to the peasant because they would take their injustices to him, and he would respond. Usually, he would go to the boylan and ask them to correct the injustice. If they would correct the injustice, that would be the end of it.

In the event that the boylan would not correct the situation or just give lip service, more drastic action would be taken, sometimes resulting in impaling. The whole point of the ruthless action was to correct the injustice. This is how Vlad Dracul became an icon to the peasants. His son, Vlad Dracula, followed him in this tradition but became embroiled in bigger issues of national importance. While this is only one aspect of the historical family of Dracula, it is crucial to grasp if you want to have any understanding of the deeper roots of Romanian culture. Hollywood, as well as others, have created a mythos around Dracula as a vampire which grossly distorts the actual dynamics of the culture. The more media you see about vampirism and the more you contemplate the subject, the more you are pulled into that mind-set. If the real Dracula and his father were alive today, they would likely want to impale most of our politicians and the media for taking advantage of the population.

After going to sleep that night, we all woke up again early the next morning to take the journey to what was supposed to be the climax of our trip: Sarmizegetusa Regia itself. As I expected, this was to be anticlimactic compared to what I had just experienced the day before. I cannot, however, speak for everyone else, but there were others who made the same observation. As the bus could not make the final leg of the trip, we had to walk over four kilometers uphill. While it was a long but not particularly grueling hike, I was a little tired of all the hiking I had been doing for the past week. While there were some good moments on our trip to Sarmizegetusa, I will not bother to recount them as they pale in comparison to what you have already read. Vanda Osman took a lot of pictures of the area, and these revealed many orbs in the area of the ruins themselves. For me, however, the best part of that day was at the very end of our long walk back to the bus. There was a creek, and many of us chose to immerse our bare feet in the cold water. To me, it felt absolutely great.

After dinner, I made arrangements to speak to Cristina again. As there had been requests to return to this area, I wanted more information with regard to groups of people. I learned that it can be challenging to take a large group to Sarmizegetusa Regia. There are no buses in the area. As Cosmin had to reserve the bus we were using as early as January, it is obviously an operation that has to be planned well ahead of time. In the event that one wants to take a group without a bus, she said that there is a man with a tractor and a cart. In other words, everyone has to pile into the cart. He can take many people for a reasonable fee, but the tractor moves slowly and the entire journey there could take up to two hours.

I am informing you about the logistics in order to emphasize how challenging it can be to reach this area. Despite the wireless internet and other modern accoutrements of the hotel, one cannot escape the fact that there is a strong element of wilderness in this area. There is also no train to the area. If one wants to fly into the area, one could fly to the city of Cluj, but one is at least an hour and a half away by car. One can take the train from Cluj to Orăştie, but then one still has a drive of about forty-five minutes. One can take a taxi the rest of the way and this can cost between thirty and forty dollars. You have to be careful though. Romanian taxi drivers have a reputation for overcharging as well as changing the fee once you have already made an agreement. All of this can be a challenge to travellers who do not speak Romanian. It is even more challenging to take a group of people.

Cristina also told me that funds had been approved some time ago to actually pave the final road to Sarmizegetusa. That would make things considerably easier for everyone and would also enable a bus to make the trip. For some unexplainable reason, however, the job never gets done. After hearing about this, and combined with other information I have told you as well as some I have not, it is my distinct impression that these challenges have everything to do with the resident spirits that influence this area. One of my friends from Atlantykron, whom I regard highly, has told me that there is fierce spiritual protection around Sarmizegetusa. That is quite obvious if you believe even a little of what Radu has written in this book. She stated to me that the chase for Romanian gold will turn on itself and, further, that the forces behind Sarmizegetusa are more powerful than the Grand Architect of the Universe. This last thought, which came from the deepest part of her psychic nature, was very disturbing to her, but it persisted for at least six months. After all, what could be more important than the Grand Architect of the Universe? I was able to reassure her in a most positive way when I told her that, to me, the only force that could be so powerful would be the Tao itself. From the perspective of my own personal journey, the introduction of the Tao into these circumstances is not only convenient, it fits into the overall pattern of my life. The Tao is always present for all things depend upon it, but it is also subtle and defies definition. As the Tao is tied to infinity, it is fitting that the vortex to another world is reported to be nearby.

Such is it that my adventures have taken me to the gateway to the infinite.

While I could say the same about my past excursions and discoveries at Montauk, this is a bit different. The Montauk investigation has led me, two decades later, to the threshold of the secret and sacred heart of Transylvania.

All of this is a result of my pursuit of the archetypal forces behind the phenomena that I encountered as a result of studying the Montauk Project.

Most people, many of my fans included, get caught up in this debris and remain there. What you read in books and hear from the words of others can only be an outer truth, if it is even truth at all. The only deep or inner truth you will find is inside of yourself. Meeting it or seeing it reflected in the outside world or through the experience of another is nice because it can intensify and further catalyze the internal process. I am very happy that Romania has been such a convenient vehicle for my own spiritual evolution. As part of my work also includes the facilitation of spiritual and personal development for others, I am including an advertisement in the back of this book for those who might like to make their own spiritual journey to Transylvania. One is for the Cotiso Hotel in Costești, Transylvania. The other is for Vanda Osman's Joy Travel. Vanda is currently planning a return visit to Sarmizegetusa with myself as a guide.

Please note that I do not have a propriety interest in any of these enterprises. My participation in any such tours will be as hired help.

What you have read thus far is only about my spiritual journey. There were some forty plus others who had profound experiences. I am sure they would have many of their own incredible experiences to share. There is some information which has been shared on Jonette Crowley's website, and you can obtain some other views there if you wish at www.jonettécrowley.com.

After obtaining all of the necessary logistical information that I could get from Cristina, we enjoyed more stories around the camp fire that evening.

Early the next morning, I got to say goodbye to Cristina and her family. It felt more like a hello. As a parting gift, Cristina gave me a full bottle of natural Transylvanian honey. As for Mr. C, he told me that he would learn English by next year so he could talk to me in my native language. We then made our way to the bus for what would be an eight or nine hour trip back to Bucharest.

After arriving in Bucharest about five o'clock, everyone got cleaned up for a traditional Romanian "goodbye dinner" that we would enjoy later than evening. This was everyone's chance to say goodbye to the people we had journeyed with all week. It was both sad and happy as well as a time to revisit our experiences and friendships before returning to the regular world. The meal we had that night was not only one of the best I have ever had in Romania, it was one of the best meals I ever had period. When everyone was finished, it was late in the evening, and Jonette had everyone gather in an empty large room in the restaurant. At the end, she wanted to thank me because, as she said, the entire journey would not have taken place were it not for me. She is referring to the fact of my publishing and contributing to the books Transylvanian Sunrise and Transylvanian Moonrise. The latter book is one of the few in the West to acknowledge and reveal the importance of Sarmizegetusa as a sacred area, particularly in a context that is both popular, topical and relevant. I took this opportunity to address the group, and it was really the only time I addressed the entire group other than when I gave summations of Radu's books while we were on the bus. I pointed out how this entire adventure really began when I took my first sacred journey to Sarmizegetusa with Nicole Vasilcovschi and Cristina Balan three years earlier. It was just three of us, and it was quite an adventure getting there by switching trains and running down railways throughout the middle of the night. We had no agenda or expectations for that journey. Now, three years later, the spiritual energy had expanded and risen to a higher spiral by reason of my return with forty plus people. I also stated that none of this would have been possible had I not been invited and financed to take my first trip to Romania in 2008 by Dr. David Anderson, a time travel scientist. While I cannot explain all the ins and outs of such extraordinary circumstances, this is the context in which all of us had visited Sarmizegetusa on this trip. I then said that I would be returning and hoped to meet everyone on a higher spiral.

Even though that was our final goodbye, there was much more in store for me on this trip. Jonette was giving seminars over the next two days, a Saturday and a Sunday, and she wanted me to participate in the Sunday seminar. Most of the attendees were not from the tour. For Saturday, she said I could take the day off or attend the seminar. In need of relaxation, I chose to take the day off, spending time with my new friends from Australia and also my Romanian publisher, Sorin Hurmuz. I found out from Sorin that Radu has been silent. For all of the time he has been Radu's publisher, there has never been such a long period of silence and this concerns him. I last heard from Radu, as of this writing, in late December of 2011. Sorin heard from him in January 2012, but that has been it. I also took the opportunity to ask Sorin about Elinor, the mysterious alchemist in Transylvanian Moonrise who is supposed to meet me at some point. I asked Sorin about Elinor because, according to the book, he actually spoke to him on the phone. There has been no in person meeting between the two.

In fact, Sorin was surprised to hear that Elinor is supposed to meet with me. Specifically, I asked Sorin what Elinor was like on the phone. He said that he was very well spoken and polite but that there was nothing extraordinary about it. All of their conversations were very matter of fact.

I found this rather interesting because the nature of Sorin's interaction with Elinor does reveal that there was an outside source that made contact with Radu and sent him on additional adventures as described in Moonrise.

What actually happened we can either speculate about or accept from Radu's accounts, but Sorin's statement is corroborative of Radu's experiences, if only in the most abstract sense. I know Sorin well enough to know that he is not part of any knowing conspiracy to create "Radu Cinamar." He was contacted by Radu and the books were forwarded to him to publish. I also know Radu well enough and know enough about him to determine that he is an individual and not a conglomerate of people who use that name to get across their point. Other friends have confirmed that Radu does work in the intelligence sector. It is clear, however, and freely admitted by Radu, that his work is subject to censorship. This is why there have been no new revelations from his quarter for the past few years.

At the end of Mystery of Egypt, the third book in the Transylvania Series, I stated that I had received a letter from Radu informing me that Elinor would be meeting me in the next ten months. This did not happen. It is now a full year since I received his letter. I am not disappointed, however, and there is a good reason. Although I am definitely interested in meeting this person, I have intuitively felt that, in some way, it is not time yet. The universe has its own time clock, and I have my own time clock. My intuition has told me that this meeting was premature. I have also been informed that things have come up in Elinor's life that have required him to rearrange his priorities. Keep in mind that security is a very relevant issue in his life at all times.

Sometime during that Saturday morning in Bucharest, while I was waking up from a dream or thinking about it, a sudden thought occurred to me with regard to Elinor. I thought back to my conversations with Madame V. If her husband was an important person in Romanian politics, and if she has her own career and is very well known, it stands to reason that she probably lives in a rather exclusive area of Bucharest. It occurred to me that she might indeed be a neighbor of Elinor or at least live in the same development. I thought this might especially be the case by reason of the fact that she felt a very strong connection to this man when I mentioned him to her. That was all psychic however. I further realized that, due to the nature of Elinor's house and the specialized contracting it would have required, she could probably, by just asking a few questions of key people, determine exactly where Elinor's house might be. Perhaps I was getting too close for comfort. Synchronicity was working overtime on this trip already, and I was stirring up far more than anyone anticipated, even myself. In any event, I learned that Madame V would be at the seminar on Sunday, and I was eager to talk to her again.

When I arrived at the school where the seminar was taking place, Madame V was amongst the first to arrive. When I suggested it was highly probable that she lives in the same neighborhood and area, she readily agreed. I was not, however, trying to smoke out Elinor. These considerations just spontaneously occurred, and I could not help but wonder if I was getting too close. Another seminar attendee, a lady I had met the previous year at the Sphinx, said that she had an opportunity to meet David Anderson through one of her friends, but she was too busy to take advantage of that.

The fact that David was in Bucharest in the last year was certainly news to me, and it would have been unexpected news from probably all of his friends at Atlantykron, too. Why was I hearing this? It is no secret that David either has or once had a Time Travel Research Center in Romania, but it was said to be dedicated exclusively to theoretical matters. These days, conversations can take place over Skype; unless, of course, it is so highly confidential that it has to be kept off of Skype. In any case, this woman would have met David in a purely social context with friends of friends. Bucharest is a big city with about three million people. I found it odd that there would be this much cross current with regard to synchronicity. It would not stop here either, but I was beginning to feel as if my presence and extraordinary experiences with synchronicity on this trip might be making certain people uncomfortable.

After lunch, I taught Taoist Chi Gong, speaking very little, if anything, about the various books I have written. To me, this is the most beneficial feature I have to offer. It enables people to heal themselves of all sorts of conditions, even life-threatening maladies. Jonette then summated the seminars of the last two days, also alluding to the trip some of us had just taken. It was then that I had a stunning realization and announced it to the group. I said that it had just occurred to me that I probably have more friends in Romania than I do in the United States. It is not that I do not have a lot of friends in America, but most of them have faded away with time and there is virtually no meaningful interaction. This is the way life flows. Not only do I have an abundance of new friends in Romania, they are “meaningful” friends, and I say that with regard to the fact that they either will play a role in my future or will have the opportunity to do so.

There is a lot of live fertile energy for me in Romania. One of the professors who attends Atlantykron has even been hinting for years that I will be moving to Romania. The idea is tempting, but practical business considerations do not indicate that this is anything more but a remote possibility. I would need to learn to speak the language fluently as well.

After the seminar, the executive committee of our tour was invited to visit the house of a couple who had been on the journey to Sarmizegetusa with us. This was basically Jonette, her husband, Cosmin and myself. Later that evening, this couple would take us to their restaurant for what would be the final “goodbye” dinner. I mention the trip to this couple’s house because there were aspects to this visit that I consider to be very significant. First, their house was in a neighborhood that was very reminiscent of what I read about Elinor’s villa in Bucharest. Like all houses in the area, there were security gates around the entire property. Built in recent times, it was an utterly beautiful house with more nooks, crannies and passageways than you might imagine — a great house to play hide-and-seek in if you were a kid. Once again, I felt as if I was one step closer to Elinor.

The second important item of this visit occurred when most everyone was out in the yard. I was sitting by myself at a patio with a glass table. I was simply resting my legs and eating from the fruit platter that had made available for us. Cosmin came over and filled a champagne glass and placed it on the glass table. As we sat there, the glass slowly began to slide along the table, but it did so very slowly. We both noticed it and could not help but wonder whether it was sliding by reason of liquid on the table or if there was a spiritual current causing it. In my past, by the way, I was once with a highly psychic girl who claimed to be part of the Montauk Project. As we talked, a Diet Coke can began to slide across the table. In that case, there was no liquid on the table whatsoever. It was pure telekinesis, and she hated it when that happened. Later on in our conversation, when we brought up the telekinesis, the can started moving again, just not as strongly. So, this strange sliding of the champagne glass was not a new experience for me. Eventually, we had everyone looking at the glass and wondering whether or not it was moving of its own accord. None of the other glasses on the table moved like that. It became the phenomena of the afternoon. I mention this because, as I realized much later, it was hauntingly similar to the August 12th dream I had wherein the urinal was sliding before it cracked in two. Keep in mind that this particular glass was filled with alcohol, also known as “spirits.”

As the sliding of this glass is related to my dream, I will revisit some key aspects here. In my dream, my house was being invaded upon by squatters while I was in the midst of helping the power behind the president. This power had transmogrified into a diminutive goddess dressed up as “Sky Books” through the clothes of my daughter, Sky. I should add here that the fulfillment of tetragrammaton as a magical formula is in the fourth letter of that formula which is HE and represents the daughter. It literally refers to the manifestation of the godhead in physical form. Sky Books is not only an advocate for the Goddess, it is the fulfillment of my own magical journey and represents just that. The sliding urinal refers to the virtual impossibility of detoxifying those elements which contradict my mission.

When all of the other toilets and plumbing were destroyed, it only reinforces this prospect. That there were squatters in my house speaks for itself. As sliding represents loss of control and also a force acting from the outside, I relate this to the American presence at the sacred sites in Romania, particularly in regard to their resentment and befuddlement over the fact that these remarkable occurrences and revelations were happening in Romania, a country which they consider to be far inferior to America.

The main issue for the Americans seems to be that they do not have control of either the territory, phenomena, or circumstances surrounding Sarmizegetusa. As my journey is a spiritual quest and without any desire to own or possess, it is diametrically opposed to the negative forces which would seek to control or access the gold or the spiritual territory that goes with it. As you will learn in a bit, there is a reason this happened to Cosmin’s glass and not someone else’s.

Our host for the day then took us to his restaurant in Bucharest where we were fed another remarkable meal. When I came into the dining area, I saw Ms. V and she was with her husband, the politician. I will call him Mr. P.

Having been told about me by his wife, he asked to sit across from me so we could talk. This was a very pleasant surprise, and I did my best to summarize my personal history in Romania. This started off with the strange story of how I was originally brought to Romania by a time travel scientist. A very intelligent and open-minded person, he was interested and willing to help David as he once worked at the highest level of the Energy Department. In the past, David explained to me that there was considerable political resistance to getting his time reactor technology into Romania.

Perhaps this is a sign that times will change. I also explained a bit about the story of Radu Cinamar and Department Zero, but he was quick to point out that this was impossible as he signed off on the budgets during that period, and there was no money marked for activities such as those described by Radu. It was then necessary to explain that the budget was funded through a private company. This is explained in the book and had to do with a company in Uruguay. He was also puzzled that he had never heard about this story. After all, he was a writer himself and is very active in a literary club. Jonette explained to him that Radu's books are known across the world.

Thus it was that I found my spiritual journey either spiraling to or intertwining with the communication network of high echelon Romanian politics. I already know people in the Romanian government from Atlantykron, but this man is at the top level. I was happy to introduce some of these mysteries to him. While he is obviously adept at politics, my meeting and friendship with Mr. P does not necessarily portend a future relaxation of restriction with regard to David's technology and dissemination of information from Department Zero. It does, however, create an awareness at a high political level that was not there before. This gives him, as well as any other politicians he cares to share these views with, an additional lens by which to review and understand the dynamics underlying Romanian politics.

What is of particular interest to me, once again, is how this experience related to my dreams. These were all about presidential authority and power. While Mr. P is not the president of Romania, he would certainly have a large contingent of Romanians supporting him if he chose to run. I found out that he is very well respected. When my Romanian publisher picked me up to take me to the airport, his eyes bulged when I mentioned whom I had met the night before. He was very impressed and surprised. I have given Mr. P the name of some of my other friends in the Romanian government, and it is my hope that they can interact.

I have already stated that I felt that I was coming too close for comfort with regard to certain issues during my adventures in Romania. Meeting a major politician certainly reinforced that. Even so, there was no discounting the observation that my spiritual journey was taking me into some very interesting and unique spheres. As I have already said, I was stirring up a lot of energy. With regard to political power, I realized that all of this energy I have stirred up could and should be transmuted into a new venture.

Accordingly, I have proposed an idea that all of the major government officials in Romania have a gathering at Sarmizegetusa. There is a very important reason for this. It would not only expose them to the super-consciousness of the area, it will have a profound spiritual effect on the well being of Romania. It should be a popular idea because Romanians are rather proud of their ancient heritage.

Romanians are in a very unique position with regard to their own ancient heritage, at least when you compare them to the United States. Other than its memorials, the U.S. does not really have any sacred ground, at least in the sense that the Dacians and their descendants do. The U.S. is not even 250 years old. All the ancient sacred ground in North America belongs to the Native Americans. This is not something the United States government can honor in a genuine manner without making drastic changes with regard to the way they conduct their relations with Natives. Truly recognizing the sacred ground in North America would necessitate recognizing the Montauk Pharoahs and all that that would imply. (See my books Pyramids of Montauk and The Montauk Book of the Living for further information on this topic). In my view, the United States and their covert operations are completely at risk to the degree they do not honor the heritage of the ancients.

I have already written to Cosmin about this, and he is totally on board. He is also in a very unique position to facilitate such an endeavour as he majored in Public Administration. Cosmin is already very conversant in politics and is an excellent organizer. It is not an endeavor I expect to participate in personally. I am only sharing what I consider to be an excellent idea.

Since returning from Romania, the various themes presented in my dreams have continued to present themselves in my life. It has become more intense, quite complex and even uncomfortable at times. These new aspects will not be detailed here as some of them get too close for comfort with real situations and people. As I said, I have stirred up energy on a level that I had not imagined. For the most part, however, my journeys to Sarmizegetusa, past and future, have left me filled with wonder and anticipation of good things to come.

Plans are now being made for my return to Sarmizegetusa, and this will occur, by coincidence, with the “Montauk biorhythm” of August 2013. It was in August of 2003, which was on the twenty-year biorhythm of the Philadelphia Experiment (1943) and Montauk Project (1983), that the Bucegi chamber was breached. In Montauk lore, the year 2013 was considered to be a major biorhythm and a crucial time reference. Even though it was the ten-year biorhythm and not the twenty, 2013 was viewed to be of considerable importance and seemingly more important than that of 2003. These were never my ideas but were fed to me by Preston Nichols from extensive readings at Space-Time Labs in the ’90s. If the history of the biorhythm is any indication of a repetitive pattern that will manifest again in the future, we can expect the unexpected as well as great serendipity.

I should also point out that it was never my plan to return to Sarmizegetusa in August of 2013. It is happening via the principles of synchronicity and destiny. By the time most of you will read these words, however, August 2013 will have already passed. Those of you who read it with the initial release of this book, however, can anticipate and perhaps even sense what might happen. While one never knows what to expect with heuristic projections such as this, it is relevant to point out that the discovery near Sarmizegetusa is considered to be a far more sensitive issue than the utterly remarkable chamber beneath the Sphinx. The implications are so powerful, if not staggering, that there is no doubt in my mind that there will be a fifth book. What it includes and whether or not Radu participates, however, are open-ended at this point. It is also a rather awesome prospect to realize that if it were not for the sacred parchment itself and the energy that rides along with it, none of these events would have unfolded the way they have thus far or the way they will unfold in the future. Each and every one of us is in a position of choice.

Thus it is that the progenitors of the Transylvanian Series have placed a virtual surfboard in my hands. Accordingly, I have also placed one in your hands. By surfboard, I am of course referring to the parchment. One learns to ride a wave by studying the ocean and seeing how it breaks. You then make your move, judiciously and with as much skill as you have. With regard to myself, I know that it is an adventure ride that will continue for a long time. How long? Into infinity.

Epilogue — by Peter Moon

I do not think it is possible to over exaggerate the importance of this book having come into existence as a result of the secret parchment. It is therefore fitting that I not only reemphasize this point but also share my views on its relevancy as well as how to best utilize it.

My first suggestion would be to heed well the words of Shin Li, Repa Sundhi's assistant, who stated, "...if we remain closed, mean, and suspicious, then beauty, kindness and love cannot penetrate this shell we have created, and then we must conclude that these do not exist."

People can become inappropriately arrogant when they read a book of the nature you have just completed. It is, after all, outside the boundaries of pedestrian thinking. The purpose at hand should not be to critique Radu but rather to utilize what has been offered so as to inculcate beauty, love, and kindness into your own life. These things are not in the realm of science or making critical observations. They have everything to do with the human factor and the inner personality. It has also been my experience that many people are too ready and quick to point out perceived foibles in Radu's presentation. More often than not, I have also observed that there criticisms are inaccurate. Shin Li's statement is very potent and useful.

We can expect that there will be all sorts of different opinions from the many people who read the manuscript. It has been my experience that most people tend to veer either towards too much cynicism or too much gullibility. There are always shades of gray with regard to any truth you read or story that you hear. The most important point is that you find the information to be useful to your own predicament.

I will now take the opportunity to address the secret parchment itself.

The text itself specifies that the five techniques are actually five efficient ways for spiritual evolution and that they should be made known to anyone interested in deciphering them. The whole point is really spiritual evolution. Radu also states that the secret parchment is a spiritual treasure revealed in a very synthetic and hidden manner. In Chapter 3, he stated that a detailed book of commentary on the five stanzas would not be enough for an exhaustive presentation of this subject. Ultimately, he gradually reached the conclusion that the best way to understand the meaning of these stanzas is through the process of thinking about and meditating on their specific aspects. This is why he chose to present the main ideas briefly and in a way which would “act as a trampoline of inspiration for the reader’s analysis” and “guide our steps towards a wider and more mature vision of our lives.”

Accordingly, it is my suggestion that you reread Chapter 3 in its entirety.

Pay attention to pertinent points that resonate with you and take notes. After that, make a crib sheet of the five precepts or initiation techniques. I will give you my own crib sheet, but you can and should make your own, utilizing what I have offered if you wish. In my own words, the five precepts can be summarized as follows:

- 1) Compassion — There is a divine source of compassion in this universe, and we need to recognize it and link to it.
- 2) All we are is a result of what we have thought — what you think is what you get. This is also representative of the principle of quantum affinity or the Law of Affinity.
- 3) Synchronicity — There are no coincidences. When events or experiences coincide outside the ordinary bounds of probability, this is a meaningful coincidence and there is an intention behind it.
- 4) Vibration — Everything is connected by vibration.
- 5) Will — Align yourself with your own Higher Will and the Divine Source of Creation.

While the general idea of these precepts might not be new to you, there is an energy that came with the release of the parchment. These techniques ride along the crest of that wave. Utilizing them in the prescribed order reinforces this.

Once you have your own crib sheet, review it and commit it to memory. Review these precepts at least daily and see how they can and do flow into your already existing life. This is a consciousness and energy that you want to cultivate and refine on a continuing basis. As soon as you obtain resonance with these ideas, reread Chapter 3 again and continue to refine and cultivate the process. Do not stop.

It is also my suggestion that you reread the entire book again as well as the entire Transylvania Series but only if you are so inclined. Keep in mind, this is your process, not someone else’s.

When I first read these techniques, I made my own crib sheet and started contemplating them immediately. This encouraged me to make sure my translator got the entire book translated before my trip to Romania. Additionally, I went out of my way to forward the first rough drafts of the translation to Jonette Crowley in order that she could read it so as to enhance our spiritual journey to Sarmizegetusa. As you have just read, the results were phenomenal. No, it was no coincidence that her name was Crowley. I could not have been more happy with the way things worked out, and Jonette has my eternal gratitude, not only for making it happen but for going out of her way to spend time with me and meet my brothers and sisters at Atlantykron. She was very well received, and they gave her and her husband a standing invitation to return any time they wished.

How you choose to employ these techniques, and whether or not you do, is entirely up to you. If done with an honest attempt, you will have experiences in synchronicity. Ideally, this will help you to discover or reinforce your life path and destiny. Some of you might also find that it leads to you having a desire to visit Transylvania. Towards that end, I have given you a few connections with the ads listed on some of the following pages.

If you follow the path of synchronicity, and these precepts will guide you quite nicely, the path of adventure will never end. It is the path of infinity. Be conscious of it.

Established in 1992, Sky Books became immediately recognized as the premier publisher in the world on the scientific pursuit of time travel and time control when it published “The Montauk Project: Experiments in Time”, a book which shook the world due to its unprecedented insight into the mechanics of time. Always immersed in very controversial subject matter and traditionally boycotted by the mainstream media, Sky Books is a company built on grass roots popularity and its influence has been recognized worldwide with translations in Japan, China, Germany, Spain, Romania and Bulgaria. Sky Books has published over fifteen titles since releasing “The Montauk Project” and also issues a quarterly newsletter which has continuously remained in print since 1993. Continue reading for further information on these titles and also newsletters (including back issues) on the topic of the Montauk Project. Ordering instructions are at the very end.

Since “The Montauk Project” was published in 1992, there have been many interesting developments and several sequels chronicling the investigation to determine whether or not the Montauk Project did, in fact, exist. Preeminent in this quest has been the Montauk Pulse, a quarterly newsletter that has been written by Peter Moon since 1993. It has never missed an issue, and there has never been a lack of interesting things to report upon, and these include Peter Moon’s adventures with Dr. David Anderson (www.andersoninstitute.com), a scientist who has excelled in understanding the actual mechanics of time and has made remarkable breakthroughs with time control technology. Dr. Anderson’s work is all based upon hard science.

THE MONTAUK PROJECT: EXPERIMENTS IN TIME

“The Montauk Project” chronicles the most amazing and secretive research project in recorded history. Starting with the “Philadelphia Experiment” of 1943, invisibility experiments were conducted aboard the USS Eldridge that resulted in full scale teleportation of the ship and crew. Forty years of massive research ensued, culminating in bizarre experiments at Montauk Point that actually tapped the powers of creation and manipulated time itself. “The Montauk Project” bridges the modalities of Science with the most esoteric techniques ever imagined and finally catapults us to the threshold of the stars. We all know something is out there, but we’re not sure exactly what. This book, at long last begins to provide some solid clues.

THE SEQUELS

The stir and controversy produced by “The Montauk Project” was overwhelming to the society it was released into in 1992. The powers that be behind the military industrial complex had a lot to explain. As has been the pattern for decades, they called on one of their old allies, Hollywood, and a whole new genre of television shows were spawned in an attempt to absorb the fallout of questions and to do damage control on the trail of information thus exposed. The most successful of these shows was the X Files. In the meantime, Peter Moon set about trying to verify the general thesis put forward in “The Montauk Project”. The result was of equal interest to the first book and resulted in:

OF THE MONTAUK
SERIES

Montauk Revisited: Adventures in Synchronicity

When Peter Moon researched the remnant trail of this mysterious time travel project, he encountered incredible and unprecedented experiences in synchronicity which ultimately unmasked many of the occult forces that were behind the technology used in the Montauk Project. Following the trail of these “coincidences,” Peter Moon reveals an enigmatic occult tapestry which leads from the mysterious associations of the Cameron Clan to the genesis of American rocketry and the magick of Aleister Crowley, Jack Parsons, and L. Ron Hubbard. The Montauk investigation carries forward as Preston Nichols tells the bizarre history of the electronic transistor as he opens the door to Peter Moon and unleashes a host of incredible characters and new information. A startling scenario is depicted that reaches far beyond the scope of the first book. Illustrations and photos are included.

256 pages, ISBN 0-9631889-1-7 $19.95

Immediately after “Montauk Revisited” was completed, and much to his surprise, Peter Moon discovered that the mysterious trail of synchronicities was getting even more fascinating when he discovered that the site of the Montauk Project experiments was sacred Native American ground that was once accompanied by ancient pyramids which could be clearly seen in old photographs of Montauk. The result of this brand new investigation was:

BOOK III OF THE MONTAUK

Pyramids of Montauk: Explorations in Consciousness

An astonishing second sequel to “The Montauk Project” and “Montauk Revisited” awakens the consciousness of humanity to its ancient history and origins through the discovery of pyramids at Montauk. A full examination of the mysteries of the pyramids at Montauk Point reveals that the Montauk Tribe were the royal family of Long Island and that they used the name Pharaoh as a designation that connected their heritage to ancient Egypt and beyond. The discovery that these pyramids were placed on sacred native American ground opens the door to an unprecedented investigation of the mystery schools of earth and their connection to Egypt, Atlantis, Mars and the star Sirius. This book explains why Montauk was chosen as a select location for pyramids and time travel experimentation. A further examination of sacred geometry awakens the consciousness of humanity to its ancient history and origins. Preston Nichols also fascinates us with an update on covert operations that includes the discovery of a nuclear particle accelerator and the development of psychotronic weapons. The “Pyramids of Montauk” stirs the quest for the end of time as we know it. Includes photos and illustrations.

The adventures had only just begun by this point. It was now 1995. After all of this information came out, Preston Nichols then revealed that he had mysterious UFO experiences as a young child and also as a teenager. This resulted in a new book which blends the history of physics and UFOlogy with Preston’s personal experiences and gives unprecedented insight into the technology of flying saucers and their accompanying phenomena in:

ENCOUNTER IN THE PLEIADES: AN INSIDE LOOK AT UFOs

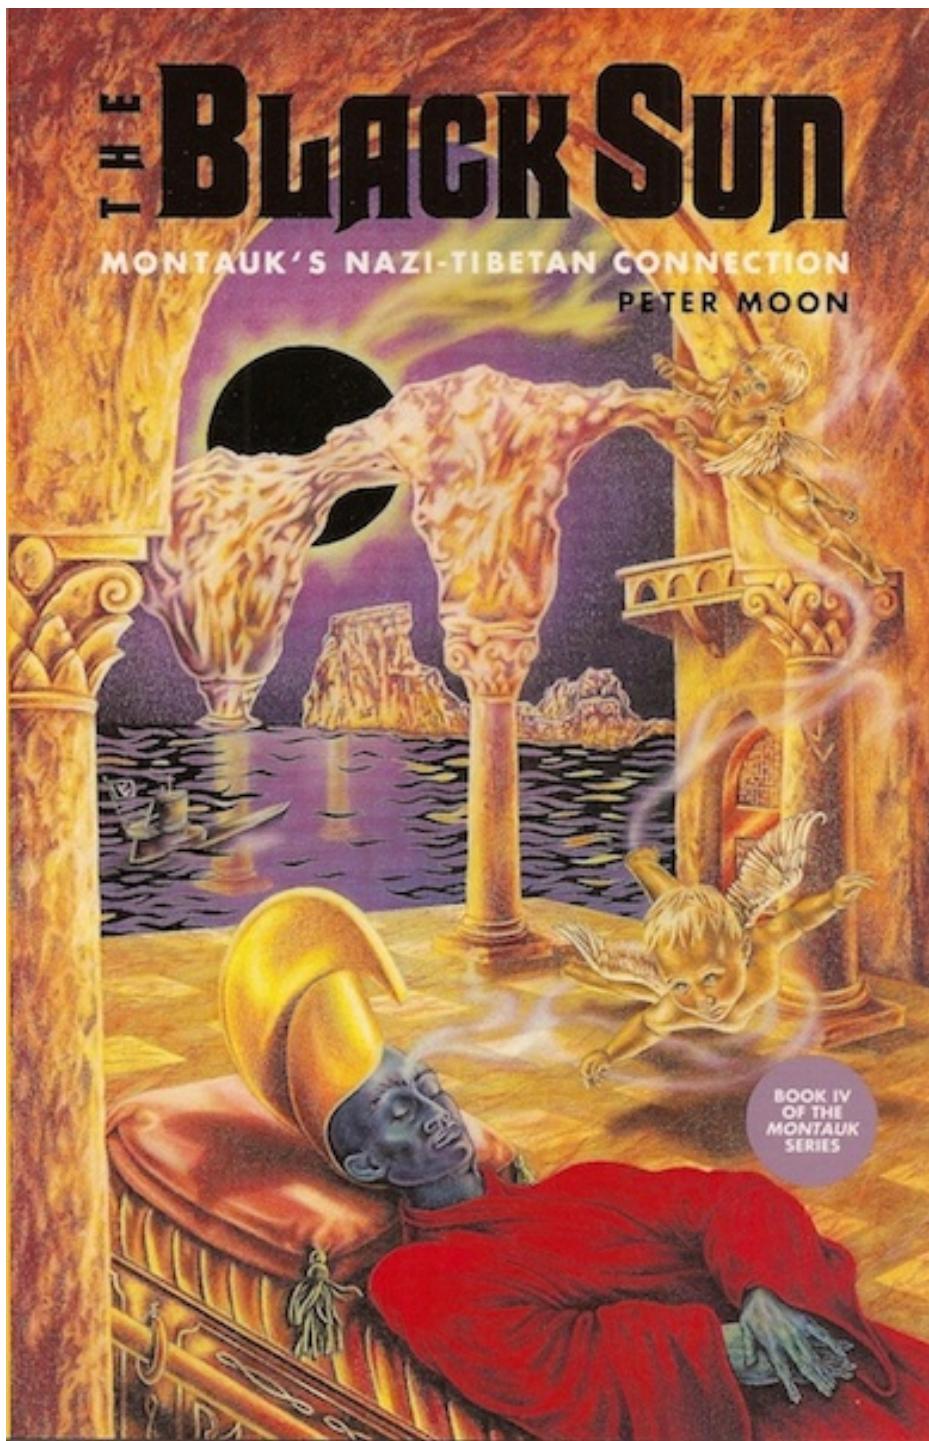

Encounter in the Pleiades: An Inside Look at UFOs

No constellation in the night sky has rivaled the Pleiades for its impact upon the mind of man. Artists, poets, scientists, mythographers and prophets alike have not only cited the Pleiades as an inspiration to their work but as a key to understanding mankind and his/her relationship with the creative principles of existence. This book is the incredible story of a man who found himself taken to the Pleiades where he was examined and instructed by intelligent life forms who appeared human. The Pleiadians proceeded to give him an education and indoctrination that would enable him to regain his health and attain an unparalleled understanding of electromagnetic science and its role in UFO technology. A new look at Einstein gives insights into the history of physics and how the speed of light can be surpassed through the principles of reality engineering. New concepts in science are offered with technical but simple descriptions even the layman can understand. These include the creation of alternate realities through the use of twisters and spinners; mind control aspects of the Star Wars defense system; implants; alien abductions and much more. Never before has the complex subject of UFOs been put together in such a simple language that can be appreciated by the scientist and understood by the layman. Peter Moon adds further intrigue to the mix by divulging his part in a bizarre project which led him to Preston Nichols and the consequent release of this information. His account of the role of the Pleiades in ancient mythology sheds new light on the current predicament of Mankind and offers a path of hope for the future.

By the time “Encounter in the Pleiades” was published, Peter Moon had also accumulated considerable information on intriguing connections between the Montauk Project and the Nazis which also extended to the latter’s mysterious connections to Tibet via occult master-mind Karl Haushofer. Peter’s collection of information on this subject culminated with a visit from world renown author, Jan van Helsing, who allowed him to publish (for the first time in America) his photos of the mysterious German flying craft built before and during World War II in connection with the Vril Society. There is much to read in:

THE BLACK SUN: MONTAUK’S NAZI-TIBETAN CONNECTION
by Peter Moon

The Black Sun: Montauk's Nazi-Tibetan Connection

After World War II and the subsequent occupation of Germany, Allied military commanders were stunned to discover the penetrating depth of the Nazi regime's state secrets. The world's best intelligence organization was not the least of these revelations. Also discovered were massive and meticulous research files on secret societies, eugenics and other scientific pursuits that boggled the imagination of the Allied command. Even more spectacular was an entire web of underground rocket and flying saucer factories with accompanying technology that still defies ordinary beliefs. A missing U-boat fleet possessing the most advanced submarine technology in the world left many wondering if the Nazis had escaped with yet more secrets or even with Hitler himself. Behind all of these mysteries was an even deeper element: a secret order known to initiates as the Order of the Black Sun, an organization so feared that it is now illegal to even print their symbols and insignia in modern Germany. “The Black Sun” probes deeper into the secrets of the Third Reich and its Tibetan contacts than any other previous attempt. Author Peter Moon ties all of these strange associations to Montauk Point, where an American military facility was used by the Nazis to further their own strange experiments and continue the agenda of the Third Reich. Peter Moon unravels more Montauk mysteries which leads to the most insightful look ever into the Third Reich and their ultimate quest: the Ark of the Covenant and the Holy Grail. This quest penetrates the secret meaning behind the Egyptian and Tibetan “Books of the Dead”. Includes photographs and illustrations.

When “The Black Sun” was completed, a very interesting man surfaced who was mentioned in “Montauk Revisited” by the pseudonym of Stan Campbell who had gone to prison for refusing to cut his ties to Preston Nichols. Preston’s revelations concerning Montauk were very hot at the time and “Stan’s” involvement in the Montauk Project was a very sensitive issue to the authorities. When he was eventually released from prison, he no longer had anything to lose and went public under his real name, Stewart Swerdlow, and wrote:

Montauk: The Alien Connection

As the new millenium unfolds, countless stories of alien abductions have begun to penetrate the mainstream consciousness of Mankind. While some new insights into the human condition have been obtained, too few of these accounts have brought such experiences to a level where they can be consumed and digested into a profitable understanding for the individual reader. “Montauk: The Alien Connection” unravels the remarkable story of Stewart Swerdlow, a gifted mentalist who has experienced extrasensory perception since birth. Stewart’s rare abilities not only made him a magnet for government surveillance, but his unique genetic structure made him a clearing house for different alien agendas which sought him out for their own purposes. Everyone’s sinister plans went haywire after Stewart began a deprogramming procedure with Preston Nichols which was designed to clear his memories and the controlling influences which had been installed. Stewart was subsequently threatened and eventually jailed after refusing to comply with orders to sever his ties with Nichols. Despite this, the truth began to work its way into his life. Estranged from his family, Stewart was sent to prison as a financially destitute and hopeless, tragic figure. Despite a severe human struggle, he was able to call on his own God-given abilities, reshuffle the deck, and reevaluate his life and the various agencies and entities which sought to utilize him. Weeding out the most negative influences, Stewart was able to recover key memories and discard those forces which sought to entrap him. The most intriguing aspect of his incredible story is that he has a valuable legacy to share.

Having known Preston Nichols for many years at this point, Peter Moon had heard many stories of Preston's intriguing involvement in the music industry where he worked as a sound engineer for many popular rock groups of the Sixties and Seventies. At the same time, Preston became involved in some very hot political water over the legal case concerning John Ford, the founder and president of the Long Island UFO Network. John was put targetted by government forces and was incarcerated ever since without ever having received a trial. Read about both of these intriguing aspects of Preston's life in:

The Music of Time

The “Music of Time” blends music with time travel as Preston Nichols reveals his hidden role in the music industry where he worked as an expert sound engineer and recorded hundreds of hit records during the Golden Era of Rock ’n Roll. Beginning with his work for Time Records, Preston chronicles his innovations in sound engineering and tells how he constructed the premier music studio in the world for Phil Spector at Bell Sound. Having created a Mecca for talented musicians, Preston found himself surrounded by and interfacing with the likes of the Beatles, Beach Boys, Rolling Stones, and many more such popular acts. For the first time, Preston reveals his employment at Brookhaven Labs and how his connections in the music industry were used for mind control and manipulation of the masses. Ultimately, Preston’s real life adventures lead to time travel and the bone chilling efforts of his adversaries to put him permanently out of commission. These include his association with John Ford, the founder of the Long Island UFO Network, who was arrested on the ridiculous charge of conspiring to put radium in the toothpaste of the local County Executive. Ford was railroaded into jail without a trial and then placed in an institute for the criminally insane without ever having received any trial, let alone a fair one. The County Executive was later imprisoned himself but Ford remains locked up to this day. In a remarkable twist of fate, mysterious forces rescue Preston and lead him to a bizarre series of financial transactions which set him up to be involved in a new time travel project. The “Music of Time” unravels more layers of mystery in mankind’s epic quest to understand the paradox of time and the imprisonment of consciousness.

With all the literature that had been produced thus far, the subject of the Montauk Project was very popular and intriguing to the public but its controversy raised many questions and attacks by those who were upset by the data and disillusioned by their own belief systems being shattered. Peter Moon sought out additional sources to verify aspects of the general story of the Montauk Project that were not connected to Montauk Project per se. The first book of this nature from Sky Books was:

The Philadelphia Experiment Murder: Parallel Universes and the Physics of Insanity

An added edition to the intriguing series by Sky Books which exposes the truth about the conspiracy to manipulate time itself. This book, edited and contributed to by Peter Moon and authored by Alexandra Bruce, begins with the tragic murder of conspiracy lecturer Phil Schneider. An investigation of this murder exposes a massive cover-up by authorities and reveals astonishing information, the trail of which leads back to the Philadelphia Experiment of 1943. Before his assassination, Schneider lectured across the country and released documents connecting his father to the U.S.S. Eldridge. Additionally, his father claimed to be a Nazi U-boat captain who, after being captured by the Allies, was recruited as a medical officer and served as a Senior Medical Officer to the crew of the Eldridge. More haunting was the discovery of gold bars in his father's possessions with Nazi insignia. "The Philadelphia Experiment Murder" investigates these circumstances and uncovers a host of new characters including Preston Nichols' actual boss from the Montauk Project. Startling truths are revealed which lead to an examination of parallel universes and the nature of insanity itself.

While "The Philadelphia Experiment Murder" was being written, a man surfaced who had grown up in and around the mysterious Brookhaven Laboratory on Long Island, the very location where the Montauk Project was hatched. His amazing story is:

THE BROOKHAVEN CONNECTION

The Brookhaven Connection

Since the advent of the atomic era, Long Island's Brookhaven National Laboratory has served as the premier and most top secret research lab in the world. Shrouded in mystery since its inception, no one has been able to crack the code of secrecy surrounding it. Wade Gordon, who grew up in and around the lab and amidst its top players, now tells his personal story of how he was groomed from a very young age to share the legacy of what happened there. Beginning with Brookhaven's formative years when the Philadelphia Experiment was researched, links are revealed which tie Brookhaven directly to the Roswell Crash, the National Security Act, the MJ-12 documents (which are included in this book) and the Montauk Project. This includes a description of a time chamber which was utilized to monitor the JFK assassination in order to secure funding for the continued existence of the researchers.

One of the most interesting research threads Peter Moon had ever encountered occurred right after completing "Montauk Revisited", but it took years for him to meet the man who was responsible for circulating this mysterious legend of quantum research on the internet. his name is Joseph Matheny. Together, they collaborated to put this into a hard copy book:

ONG'S HAT: THE BEGINNING
by Joseph Matheny with Peter Moon

Ong's Hat

The Beginning

Joseph Matheny
with Peter Moon

Ong's Hat: The Beginning

Ong's Hat is a real but enigmatic location in south central New Jersey that has inspired a counterculture revolution in physics. Exotic pursuits in the Many-Worlds Interpretation of quantum mechanics by Princeton physicists paved the way for avant-garde experiments in quantum consciousness. Integrating meditation with biofeedback and brain machine techniques, synchronicity attractors were developed which sought out tangible states of existence beyond the bounds of Earth. Allegedly, the experimenters achieved success with the accessing of parallel universes. Up to now, the truth about the cult has been vague and indecisive, but the legends, technology and quantum theory surrounding it are more than tangible. Since Peter Moon's involvement in the Montauk investigation, he has encountered incredible synchronicities with regard to space-time projects and clans of mystery. None of these have been more riveting than his encounter with Joseph Matheny and the legends of Ong's Hat, a real but enigmatic location in south central New Jersey that was once used as a return address for dissident Princeton physicists who wrote anonymous papers that broke the scientific barriers of the day. This is the first book in hard copy format to explore Ong's Hat, the home of a mysterious ashram with both scientific and natural features that included a hodgepodge of Tantra, Sufism, Ismaili esotericism, alchemy, psychopharmacology, biofeedback and brain machine meditation techniques that was said to involve actual time travel by the participants. Compiled by Joseph Matheny, a multi-talented individual who was "chosen" as an intermediary by the time-travel cult, this work is based upon the popular ebook known as "The Incunabula Papers," but also contains new material revealed for the first time that includes interviews with actual survivors from the ashram and the revealing of an "egg" used for attracting synchronicity induced time travel.

Up to now, the truth about the cult has been vague and indecisive, but the legends, technology and quantum theory surrounding the cult have been more than tangible.

192 pages, ISBN 0-9678162-2-X, $19.95

Peter Moon's collaboration with Joseph Matheny was a big breakthrough because it gave further answers to many of the fascinating magical threads which had been uncovered in "Montauk Revisited". By this point in time, Peter was also sitting on many more aspects of that story, with particular regard to the Babalon Working and the connection between Jack Parsons and L. Ron Hubbard, which had not been fully communicated in his previous work. These were written up and released in:

SYNCHRONICITY & THE SEVENTH SEAL
by Peter Moon

SYNCHRONICITY AND the SEVENTH SEAL

Synchronicity & the Seventh Seal

This is Peter Moon's consummate work on Synchronicity. Beginning with a brief scientific description (for the layman) of the quantum universe and how the quantum observer (the spirit) can or does experience the principle of synchronicity, we are taught that synchronicity is also an expression of the divine or infinite mind. Besides exploring the concept and influences of parallel universes, this book includes numerous personal experiences of the author which not only forges a pathway of how to experience and appreciate synchronicity, but it goes very deep into the magical exploits of intriguing characters who sought to tap the ultimate powers of creation and use them for better or for worse. This not only includes the most in depth analysis and accurate depiction of the Babalon Working in print but also various antics and breakthroughs of the various players and that which influenced them. These characters include the legacies and personas of Jack Parsons, Marjorie Cameron, L. Ron Hubbard and Aleister Crowley. Peter Moon adds exponential intrigue to the mix by telling us of his personal experiences with these people and their wake which leads to even deeper encounters which penetrates the mysterious legacy of John Dee. Eventually, this pursuit of synchronicities leads Peter Moon to a most intriguing and mysterious encounter with Joseph Matheny, an adept who has not only had similar experiences to Peter, but has his own version of a space-time project known as Ong's Hat. Matheny has not only had incredible synchronicities himself, he created one of the highest forms of artificial intelligence known to man, a computer known as the Metamachine which is designed to precipitate and generate synchronicities. These many synchronicities lead to the books climax, a revelation of the true Seventh Seal. The proof is delivered. No theologian nor anyone has even tried to counter the claim.

After "Synchronicity and the Seventh Seal" was finished, Peter Moon wanted to complete a trail of investigation that he had pursued for many years and this had to do with occult phenomena surrounding a "quantum relic" he had been mysteriously handed when writing about the Montauk Pharoahs in "Pyramids of Montauk". This "quantum relic" was so interwoven into the fabric of his life that he realized that, in order to present a complete picture, he would have to write two books instead of one. The first book was autiobiographical and includes an in depth look at Peter

Moon's personal association with L. Ron Hubbard. It was deemed necessary to write this book before he could address the topic of the "quantum relic."

THE MONTAUK BOOK OF THE DEAD
by Peter Moon

THE MORTAUK BOOK OF THE DEAD

PETER MOON

The Montauk Book of the Dead

A tale of the intrigue and power which hovers over the most sacred kernel of our existence: the secrets of life and death. Beginning with his early years, Peter Moon reveals fascinating details of exactly how he became involved with Scientology and serendipitously ended up working in the personal employ of L. Ron Hubbard aboard the latter's famous "mystery ship" which was called the Apollo. Included in this riveting account is the story of how L. Ron Hubbard, at the age of twenty-seven, clinically "died" only to discover that he could "remote view." From this state of consciousness, which would later be called "exterior," he was able to access what he termed the answers to all of the questions that had ever puzzled philosophers or the minds of men. Transcribing this information into a work entitled "Excalibur," which is still under lock and key to this day, he developed one of the most controversial movements in history: Dianetics and Scientology. The truth and import of the above can only be evaluated by the all out war which was waged by governmental forces and spy agencies to obtain the legally construed rights to the above mentioned work and all of the developments and techniques that ensued from it. This is the personal story of Peter Moon which not only pierces the mystery of death and reveals fascinating details of his years aboard L. Ron Hubbard's mystery ship but gives the most candid and inside look ever at one of the most controversial figures in recent history.

When "The Montauk Book of the Dead" was completed, Peter Moon would finally correlate information and experiences he had accumulated for twelve years, all of which surrounded a mysterious "quantum relic" which was, in fact, a 1909 playbill from the New Montauk Theatre that contained cryptic occult messages which are expounded upon in full in:

PETER MOON

The Montauk Book of the Living

A stunning new book by Peter Moon that tells how his research into the Montauk Pyramids led to the discovery of a mysterious quantum relic. This relic not only led to the Matriarch of the Montauk Pharoahs but has opened the door to understanding the greatest mysteries of history. These include the occult biochemistry of an Amazonian Blue Race which founded the Egyptian culture and honored the feminine principle through the star Sirius. These truths lead to the unveiling of the biological truth behind the Virgin Birth and how this theme intertwines with the descendants of these Amazons who live today and are known as the Blue People of the Saha ra. Other occult surprises include new revelations concerning Aleister Crowley's The Book of the Law that demonstrably reveals that the ancients who built the pyramids of Cairo and Mars knew deeper secrets concerning DNA that our scientists of tod ay. The pursuit of these various threads leads to Peter Moon's encounter with Red Medicine, the Medicine Man of the Montauks who is destined to fulfill the Second Coming of the Pharoahs, a time prophesied by native elders which signals the return of ancient wisdom, universal brotherhood and healing . This is also the riveting personal story of Peter Moon which includes new streams of synchronicity that include the mystical background behind the events which led to the revelation of the Montauk Project. Old themes are revisited and more deeply explored, but there are more new twists and turns than ever. The legacy of the Montauk Pharoahs is explored as never before and leads to more truth than can be readily believe which is designed to launch a new era once prophesied by Native Elders as the Second Coming of the Pharaohs, said to signal the return of ancient wisdom, universal brotherhood and healing.

Although intriguing follow-ups had been done with the data uncovered in "Montauk Revisited" and "Pyramids of Montauk", there was also an equally fascinating trail of data with regard to the Nazi-Tibetan connection researched in "The Black Sun". This research is so controversial and so proprietary to the Government that it is virtually impossible to pursue beyond a certain point if one is going to use routine journalism. Taking solid threads that are based upon hard facts of journalism, Peter Moon opted to penetrate the unknown or occult aspects of the Nazi-Tibetan story through an intuitive stream of consciousness in:

SPANDAU MYSTERY

by Peter Moon

SPANDAU MYSTERY

PETER MOON

Spandau Mystery

A historical novel by Peter Moon which reveals how the mysterious deaths of General George Patton and Deputy Fuhrer Rudolph Hess were intertwined through the Nazi's secret flying saucer technology. Directed by Tibetan elders, the Germans sought to harness the Vril, an energy so powerful that it can change the very nature of the elements themselves. To succeed, however, a major change was required in the evolutionary development of the human species. A dramatic scenario of events unfolded, however, which not only ensured that this endeavor was sabotaged but included an undertaking designed to prevent humanity from ever discovering its ancient heritage and the secrets of the Vril. It was against this backdrop that two of the most colorful characters of World War II, Rudolph Hess and George S. Patton, became immersed in an age old battle involving the legions of light and darkness. The end of World War Two precipitated more intrigue and struggle for power than the war itself. Much of this centered around the secret projects sponsored by Rudolph Hess which included not only the Antarctic project but the construction of Vril flying saucers. Patton's job, as the war came to a close, was to recover the secret technology of the Germans and safeguard it for American use. After accomplishing his mission and compiling a German history of the war, General Patton was killed in a dubious accident, the mystery of which has never been solved and has been magnified by government refusal to declassify the file on the investigation of his death. Far more conspicuous and powerful than Patton was Rudolph Hess, the Deputy Fuhrer of Germany, who flew to England in 1941 as an envoy of peace and was imprisoned for life and suspiciously killed just before his imminent release. The current of intrigue and power which permeated these two individuals and led to their downfall was the same current which led to a repatriation of the U.S. Government and an undermining of a constitutional government that is run by and for the people. Besides technology, much of this intrigue centered around the banking files the Nazis confiscated from the Freemasons. The effort to keep this secret is still a factor in today's politics. It was thus that Patton and Hess wore different uniforms but shared common interests and held within their grasp a force so powerful that, if harnessed, it might raise the ancient civilization of Atlantis itself. It was for this power that both were killed and so begins our mystery. "Spandau Mystery" is an historical novel and murder mystery featuring 350 pages of fast and easy reading which penetrates one of the greatest intrigues surrounding the Nazis and their occult interests in Tibet: the ancient Dropa civilization, a group of “little people” who claim to descend from the stars and whose corroborating artifacts have been studied by scientists for over half a century. If you would like a new view of world history, order and read this book today.

As all of the aforementioned books were written and Peter Moon continued to report on various aspects of the Montauk phenomena, he met a very unusual and intriguing scientist, Dr. David Anderson, an engineer and physicist who had his own Time Travel Research Center on Long Island. This was a serious laboratory where time could be slowed down or speeded up in a self-contained field. Dr. Anderson also had a research center in Romania and eventually invited Peter to that country to lecture at a United Nations camp for youth. During this time, “The Montauk Project” was translated into the Romanian language and was ultimately responsible for creating a brand new publishing company in Romania, Daksha Publishing, which subsequently published what is arguably the most amazing story in the history of Mankind. It is intertwined with Peter Moon’s adventures with Dr. David Anderson in:

Transylvanian Sunrise

A mysterious scientist by the name of David Anderson made an eventful trip to Romania in 1999. Dr. Anderson, who is credited by the U.S. government as having developed advanced time-warp field technology, established diplomatic connections on this trip to Romania where he also set up an advanced research facility dedicated to studying the mathematics of time travel. Upon his return to the United States, Dr. Anderson visited Preston Nichols and Peter Moon, internationally known authors of "The Montauk Project: Experiments in Time," and introduced himself. At Dr. Anderson's suggestion, a collaboration with Peter Moon began which was brief, tenuous and eventually aborted due to security considerations as a result of a logistical attack on a similar time research center that had been set up on Long Island. Dr. Anderson's continued journeys to Romania eventually resulted in connecting Peter Moon with a Romanian publisher and Radu Cinamar, a member of the Romanian Intelligence Service's occult department. The purpose of this collaboration has to do with what is arguably the most significant archaeological discovery in the history of Mankind: a mysterious holographic hall of records that utilizes technology far beyond the concepts of modern science. "Transylvanian Sunrise" is the story of this mysterious discovery and the political intrigue surrounding it, all capably told by Radu Cinamar. After Peter Moon secured the publishing rights to this remarkable story, Dr. Anderson invited him to Romania where he has pursued these mysteries one step further. The story is inside this book and waiting to be read.

The remarkable story told in Transylvania Sunrise is exceeded in its sequel as it concerns the mysterious factors and actual characters that precipitated the most amazing discovery in the history of Mankind. Peter Moon also contributes with reports on his continued adventures with Dr. David Anderson and a journey to the ruins of an ancient culture in the heart of Transylvania in:

Transylvanian Moonrise: A Secret Initiation in the Mysterious Land of the Gods

Radu Cinamar rose to prominence for his role in exposing the most remarkable archaeological discovery in the history of Mankind: a secret chamber beneath the Romanian Sphinx containing holographic records of Earth's history, bio-resonance imaging technology, and three mysterious tunnels leading to the deepest secrets of the Inner Earth. Despite the political intrigue, turmoil and restriction around this great discovery, the leader of the expedition enabled Radu Cinamar to visit and explore these artifacts. Ever since, Radu's life has been a labyrinthine adventure of strange events, clandestine liaisons and extraordinary people and circumstances. In "Transylvanian Moonrise", Radu is sought out by the mysterious Tibetan lama who orchestrated this discovery while working under an alias as Dr. Xien, a secret agent for the Chinese government. The enigmatic lama introduces Radu to a creature known as a yidam, an energetic and physical being who is created by a sand mandala ritual and can literally warp the space-time continuum and takes Radu on a mystical journey from Transylvania to the mysterious Land of the Gods in Tibet where he receives a secret initiation from the blue goddess Machandi. This is not only a remarkable story, but it is an initiation of the highest order that will benefit anyone reading it."Transylvanian Moonrise: A Secret Initiation in the Mysterious Land of the Gods" will take you far beyond your ordinary imagination in order to describe events that have molded the past and will influence the future in the decades ahead.

MYSTERY OF EGYPT — THE FIRST TUNNEL
by Radu Cinamar with Peter Moon

THE SECRET PARCHMENT

FIVE TIBETAN INITIATION TECHNIQUES

RADU CINAMAR WITH PETER MOON

Mystery of Egypt — The First Tunnel

Radu Cinamar stunned the world when he released his first book, “Transylvanian Sunrise”, which described the greatest archeological find of all time: a hidden chamber some 50,000 years old with holographic technology that is beyond man’s wildest dreams. After being allowed to explore some of these artifacts, Radu was befriended by an enigmatic alchemist named Elinor who introduced him to an equally mysterious Tibetan Lama. These adventures were chronicled in “Transylvanian Moonrise” wherein Radu was taken by Elinor and the lama to Tibet where he was given an ancient manuscript to be translated by the lama. He is then given an initiation of the highest order.

“Mystery of Egypt — The First Tunnel” begins with Radu becoming the guardian of Elinor’s exotic villa in Bucharest which contains a remarkable alchemical laboratory in the basement. Radu is soon thereafter recruited for Department Zero, Romania’s most secret intelligence unit, by his old friend, Cezar Brad, and becomes part of an expedition to explore a mysterious tunnel which leads from the chamber beneath the Romanian Sphinx to a different type of chamber beneath the Giza Plateau which contains a bioresonant device through which one can visit past and future events.

This amazing expedition includes an American from the Pentagon with a top secret laptop computer he is intuitively connected to that not only displays intricate holograms but is also linked to Hilbert (interdimensional) Space. Ancient archeology meets future science in this true life adventure that penetrates the secrets of Egypt in a way that has not been previously conceived of in our society.

THE MONTAUK PULSE: A CHRONICLE OF TIME

Issued quarterly, every Winter, Spring, Summer and Fall

by Peter Moon

A newsletter by the name of the Montauk Pulse went into print in the winter of 1993 to chronicle the events and discoveries regarding the ongoing investigation of the Montauk Project by Preston Nichols and Peter Moon. It has remained in print and been issued quarterly ever since. With a minimum of six pages and a distinct identity of its own, The Pulse will often comment on details and history that do not necessarily find their way into books. Through 1995, the Montauk Pulse has included exciting new breakthroughs on the Montauk story as well as similarly related phenomena like the Philadelphia Experiment and other space-time projects. Consequently, the scope of the Pulse was expanded to embrace any new phenomena concerning time travel or related events. It has been the leading publication when it comes to covering the work of Dr. David Anderson and his time travel research. The cost for a subscription to the Montauk Pulse is $20.00. Do not add a shipping/handling charge, however, unless you are outside the USA. In such a case, please add $12.00. Back issues are available in three volumes of 24 issues each (spanning six years). Each individual volume is $30.00 each. See order form.

INSIDE THE EARTH

THE SECOND TUNNEL

RADU CINAMAR

In this exhilarating description of mysteries inside the Earth, Radu Cinamar presents a unique way to penetrate the Inner Earth through the process of feeling and the effects that will develop from such an experience. To enhance the reader's understanding of this very guarded subject, Inside the Earth — The Second Tunnel includes multiple illustrations that include depictions of Inner Earth geography.

Familiar characters from the Transylvania Series also reappear, including the enigmatic Tibetan lama, Repa Sundhi, also known as Dr. Xien, who states:

"If someone had a device or machine that could start up and go everywhere they want, especially towards the center of the Earth, the machine would be blocked and stop at a certain point because of the frequency of vibration to be found there. Just how far you can go with such a machine can be limited by reason of your own consciousness which can in and of itself restrict the dimensional range of such a device or the extent to which it can penetrate other realms. This applies to both human beings as well as material objects. Your ability to access such a region is determined by what your own individual frequency of consciousness can or will allow you to experience."

Inside the Earth — The Second Tunnel is not only the story of an exciting adventure, it is an opportunity for initiation as you explore the frequencies of your own inner nature.

The Secret Parchment

INTRODUCTION — BY PETER MOON

For those of you who have picked up this book without any prior knowledge of the circumstances surrounding Radu Cinamar and his previous work, I will lay out a background and summary.

During the Cold War, there was a natural alliance between the two communist nations of Romania and the People's Republic of China. Trying to keep up with the West in regards to the most advanced and esoteric methods of reconnaissance and espionage, the Romanians sought out the help of the Chinese as they did not really trust the Russians. As part of a cultural exchange program whereby Chinese students were able to participate in educational programs in Romania, the Chinese government sent the Romanians an expert in parapsychology who would set up a secret department that would deal with all abnormal occurrences. These were referred to as "K events," but in pop culture terms of today, these might now be termed as "X-File" events. Known as Department Zero, this special unit was only known to the head of state and the head of security. Besides housing and caring for paranormal subjects, Department Zero also trained them. The expert in parapsychology who set up this unique department is known to us as Dr. Xien, and he was introduced to us in the first book of this series, Transylvanian Sunrise.* Although Dr. Xien is an intriguing character, we do not learn too much about him in that book. We do know that he was called in after the birth of another very interesting character who also turns out to be one of the progenitors of the Transylvania Series. His name is Cezar Brad, and he is born with an umbilical cord that is so thick, the doctors have to use an ordinary saw to sever it. As this is an anomaly, Cezar comes under the scrutiny and eventual tutelage of Department Zero and forms a close personal relationship with Dr. Xien from a very young age. Cezar is trained in a host of spiritual and psychic disciplines that would rival the best your imagination might offer.

[* The book you are reading now, Inside the Earth — The Second Tunnel is the fifth in a series of books by Radu Cinamar which are collectively, along with Peter Moon's The White Bat, known as the Transylvania Series. The previous works include Transylvanian Sunrise, Transylvanian Moonrise, Mystery of Egypt — The First Tunnel, and The Secret Parchment — Five Tibetan Initiation Techniques.

As fate would clearly demonstrate, Dr. Xien was grooming Cezar to serve as a steward and guardian for what is arguably considered the greatest archeological discovery in the history of Mankind: a secret and previously inaccessible chamber beneath the Romanian Sphinx containing futuristic holographic technology that was put together some 50,000 years ago.

In what could be termed a virtual Noah's Ark that far exceeds the thinking and experiential capacity of those who lived in biblical times (or even in our own times for that matter), this chamber includes technology whereby one can place their hand on a table and see their own DNA rendered in three-dimensional holograms. Other devices on the table enable one to see the DNA of alien species from other planets with accompanying star renderings so that one can see where they actually originate from. By placing two hands on different parts of the table, one can also "mix" the DNA of two species so as to see how they might look if hybridized. As the tables themselves are six feet high, the creatures who built them were gigantic compared to humans of today.

This remarkable chamber also includes a "projection hall" whereby one can see a holographic rendition of the history of Earth that is particularly tailored to the individuality of whomever might be viewing it. This history, however, abruptly cuts off in about the Fifth Century A.D., perhaps because it requires some sort of software update. One of the more intriguing aspects of the Projection Hall is that it also contains three mysterious tunnels that lead into the bowels of the Earth and similar facilities in Iraq, Mongolia, Tibet and also beneath the Giza Plateau in Egypt.

Although Cezar, through the tutelage of Dr. Xien, was set up by fate to be the overseer of this remarkable archeological discovery, it was not his role to write the story of what was found and its implications. As these events were unfolding, Cezar handpicked Radu Cinamar to write these volumes. Serving as a mentor to Radu, Cezar gave him a rapid fire education in all of the political machinations going on behind this discovery while also introducing him to the world of psychic phenomena and esoteric studies.

We learn about this in the first volume, Transylvanian Sunrise, but we are not told exactly why Cezar picked Radu. What I can tell you from what I have learned thus far is that Cezar is a remarkably adept individual, and he knew precisely what he was doing. His psychic sensibilities are quite formidable and proved to be accurate in this case. Radu got the job done, and with the release of this book, he now has five volumes in English.

You might think that this discovery was a wonderful opportunity to enlighten Mankind and take advantage of all that this newly discovered technology has to offer for the benefit of humanity at large. Many, if not most, of the Romanians in the government who were privy to the discovery viewed it that way. Circumstances, however, dictated otherwise.

Cezar informed Radu that the actual discovery of this secret and previously unknown chamber took place when the Pentagon discovered it via the use of ground penetrating radar that operated through satellites. It is understandable that the Americans would use all technology at their disposal for reconnaissance purposes as well as to scrutinize all geographical anomalies and resources on the planet. Right or wrong, this is the purpose of the Department of Defense. What was most challenging about this intelligence, however, was that Masonic interests in the Pentagon funneled this information to a leader in Italian Freemasonry, a Signore Massini, who represents a hidden global elite that wanted access to and control of this chamber for themselves. Accordingly, Massini approached Cezar who was then the head of Department Zero and sought his cooperation. Cezar, who did not trust Massini, was forced to cooperate to a certain extent due to political circumstances. Thus, the evil interests of an Italian Freemason forged an unprecedented alliance between Romania and America with the former suddenly being admitted to NATO. The specifics of these political intrigues are detailed in the book Transylvanian Sunrise which is primarily the story of Cezar's life and his involvement with the uncovering of these amazing artifacts.

While the enigmatic and mysterious Dr. Xien set the stage for Cezar to uncover this secret chamber through rigorous training and education, he is a distant memory when the discovery is made and seemingly completely uninvolved in any tangible way with the political machinations and evil intrigues which allowed it to even take place. Dr. Xien, however, is an interested party and a definite progenitor of the information revealed in these books, and this comes into clear view in the second book of the series, Transylvanian Moonrise — A Secret Initiation in the Mysterious Land of the Gods.

Transylvanian Moonrise begins with an editor's note from the Romanian editor, Sorin Hurmuz, who includes numerous excerpts from the Romanian press that not only corroborate Cezar's story as told by Radu but give insights into why it is credible. Above and beyond these facts, it might interest you to know that a key area near the Romanian Sphinx is blacked out on Google Earth. Besides that, Americans were seen en masse during the time of the excavations that were taking place near the Romanian Sphinx in 2003. I have also spoken to several well-placed people in Romania who believe the general story to have merit. Exactly what has taken place and all of the details are still largely a mystery, but Radu's books offer us the only clues. In addition to that, they are remarkable stories and teaching devices which integrate the mundane aspects of politics with some of the most esoteric concepts of occultism as well as the cutting edge of technology.

Radu's narrative in Transylvanian Moonrise begins with a mysterious man named Elinor trying to contact the enigmatic author through his publisher, Sorin Hurmuz, who has generally been instructed to stonewall any people wishing to meet with Radu. In fact, Sorin has never met with Radu and only communicates with him by special courier or with a prearranged phone card. When it is eventually discovered that Elinor is speaking on behalf of a Tibetan lama, both Sorin and Radu change their tune and a meeting is eventually arranged. This meeting is filled with a panoply of metaphysical revelations which present an entirely new paradigm by which to view the events described in Transylvanian Sunrise. After an amazing indoctrination into the ancient art of alchemy and the prospects of immortality, Radu meets the lama who reveals himself to be none other than Dr. Xien and explains that he once served in the royal court at Lhasa under the name of Repa Sundhi at the time of the Chinese invasion of Tibet. Escaping that purge, he somehow ended up in the employ of the Chinese government and adopted a different identity as Dr. Xien.

Repa Sundhi has a very specific agenda for this meeting with Radu and it has to do with what is the focal point of the fourth book in the Transylvania Series: The Secret Parchment — Five Tibetan Initiation Techniques (more on that later). In Transylvanian Moonrise, Radu learns that the lama wants to take him to the Apuseni Mountains of Transylvania. Once there, a mysterious but well-described space-translation takes place that literally transports them (as well as Elinor, who remains in their company) to certain rarefied high peaks of Tibet which are inaccessible to humans by normal transportation means. Radu is escorted into a cave where he meets another progenitor of the Transylvania Series. Her name is Machandi and she is a blue goddess and tantric dakini who not only educates and initiates Radu but gives him an ancient manuscript which is to be translated from ancient Tibetan and published, first in the Romanian language. Having finally been translated into English, it is the centerpiece of The Secret Parchment.

While Transylvanian Moonrise refers to the characters in Transylvanian Sunrise and the lama is included in the dramatic events that take place, the two books are astonishingly different and offer complementary views of the overall scenario from completely different perspectives. The third book in the series, Mystery of Egypt — The First Tunnel, is no exception. Radu is recruited to join Department Zero on a journey with Cezar into the mysterious “First Tunnel” in the Projection Hall of the Bucegi complex. This leads to a hidden chamber beneath the Giza Plateau in Egypt. What they find there is no less astonishing than what has already been offered in the first two books. The purpose of the mission is to recover neatly organized slate-like tablets that are in fact a type of ancient “DVD” that project holographic “memories” of the history of the world. The tablets do not require a projector and are so numerous that they can only hope to return a portion of them to their home base, after which they will be sent to America for detailed study. Even though they cannot recover everything in one mission, what they do retrieve would take a team of viewers a considerable amount of time to view.

There is also an occult chamber containing a device consisting primarily of huge crystals that facilitates the projection of one’s consciousness back into time. It is not a physical time travel device. It should be noted that it requires a certain amount of psychic and esoteric development to be able to withstand the rigors of projecting oneself into time, even if the physical body is not being utilized. We also learn that this device is bioresonant in that it is tuned to the physiological, mental and emotional conditions of the subject as well as their own past experiences. In other words, you would have different experiences than would I and so on.

Another intriguing aspect of the time device is that there is a certain amount of censorship present. When Cezar attempts to project his consciousness into time in order to see who created the device, he encounters blockages. While it is informative and useful in certain respects, it contains mysteries which it does not want penetrated, at least at this particular time. All of this gives rise to interesting speculation.

These censorship issues further fuel the controversy Cezar ignites by relaying his initial experience in the time device whereupon he returns to the time of Jesus in the First Century. Radu also recounts what he saw in his original experiences in the Projection Hall (beneath the Romanian Sphinx) when he witnessed events surrounding the crucifixion of Christ. This account contains UFOs wreaking havoc amidst a virtually insurmountable thunder storm while a fearing populace scrambles to save their own lives. It leaves us with a hornets nest of information, the result of which has been more than a few questioning the veracity of the authors. I should add, however, that most of the reading audience thus far has not blinked at the accounts given. They have enjoyed the book and are not judgmental about the authors. What is perhaps the most relevant aspect of this experience, however, is the fact that the device which facilitates it is bioresonant.

Whether the events presented are indeed real in a conventional sense, they are certainly events that the collective consciousness has wrestled with for thousands of years.

What happens in Mystery of Egypt, however, is superseded by what occurs in the fourth volume, The Secret Parchment. Radu finds himself in the middle of the political and conspiratorial intrigue that is swirling around the effort to control the holographic chamber beneath the Romanian Sphinx. Accordingly, Radu is sent to the United States to attend a remote viewing program in the Pentagon, all in an effort to defuse the rising political tensions. As the conspiratorial intrigues escalate into a full scale political and esoteric war, there is an intervention by superior spiritual forces, one of which includes Radu being recalled to Romania in order to meet with Repa Sundhi to facilitate the translation of the ancient Tibetan manuscript or “secret parchment” which had been given to him by Machandi as described in Transylvanian Moonrise. While the parchment presents five invaluable techniques for spiritual advancement (these are not the same as the already known yoga exercises known as the “Five Tibetans”), its very presence in the world has ignited a series of quantum events, extending from a bizarre structure emerging from the snow in Antarctica, serving an antenna function, which is at the crossroads between signals to Jupiter’s moon

Europa as well as Mount McKinley, and Transylvania. As incredible as the discovery of this extraterrestrial connection is, it only escalates the attempt to undermine the structure of Romania's Department Zero when the Americans learn that the signal to Transylvania reveals a passage way of solid gold tunnels, extending miles into the underground, leading to ancient hieroglyphics, embedded in gold, indicating the locale as the nexus of the Inner Earth where "all the worlds unite." Not too far from the nexus, accessible through more passageways of pure gold, is an incredible room of golden thrones with panels of yet more hieroglyphics and a mysterious portal that appears to be a direct conduit to outer space; and, presumably, an outer space of another universe. These discoveries were made by a certain Professor Constantine who, upon reporting them and taking a team from the government to investigate, was whisked away and never heard from again. Although the investigators were killed, Professor Constantine was able to make a summary report to Cezar Brad; and the file for such was deemed to be the highest state secret of the country of Romania. Even so, Department Zero was unable to find any access to these passageways and, despite considerable effort, no further discoveries were made. Although Machandi's secret parchment is translated and we are treated to its specific wisdom, The Secret Parchment — Five Tibetan Initiation Techniques leaves us with a very great mystery that is left dangling.

I also contribute to the book by revealing my own adventures in the area and learning of the ancient legends and how these fit into the scheme of Radu's adventures. It turns out that Professor Constantine was indeed a real character who disappeared, and I am even shown where he once lived.

There is also a Valley of the Golden Thrones, and it is in this region that I make one of the most remarkable discoveries that I have ever stumbled upon.

Although it has not been mentioned in any of the previous books, I was led to a cave by a Romanian archeologist in 2014. Known as Cioclovina Cave, it is the site of one of the greatest archeological finds in Romania which indicate a civilization did indeed occupy caverns within the inner earth and in the vicinity mentioned by Radu. Cioclovina Cave represents a sort of grand central cave station with some seven other caves interlinking with it, representing at least seven kilometers of tunnels.

While the aforementioned findings concerning Cioclovina Cave are of great relevance with regard to Radu's claims, there is an even more startling confirmation from Dr. David Anderson, my scientist friend who originally brought me to Romania in 2008. In an interview conducted by myself in 2015, he revealed for the first time that Cioclovina Cave was the site of the largest discharge of space-time motive force ever recorded. Space-time motive force is a term Dr. Anderson coined to signify an energy that is released as a result of time dilation that occurs in the process of frame-dragging. If you are further interested in this aspect and would like a full explanation, you can watch the video series Time Travel Theory Explained at my website www.timetraveleducationcenter.com. This function is also explained in the appendix of the book Transylvanian Moonrise.

What all of this means in layman's terms is that Dr. Anderson's findings indicate that this area was the site of heavy duty time travel experiments. He was completely surprised that I happened to come across this very area by happenstance during my adventures in Romania. Note that this area was never a targeted area of interest for me. I had an off day and was brought there by an archeologist I knew at his instigation. He had no idea of the time experiments or the like. The archeologist, by the way, told me that the stories I relayed to him about Radu's books, which he had not read at that point, correlated with many stories he had heard about the area.

While there are many so-called "side tunnels" or supplementary threads of great interest that involve Dr. Anderson and my other associates in Romania, I am getting off subject. Radu is very well aware of Dr. Anderson and mention's him in the prelude to this new book. It is quite possible that all of these different threads might coalesce into a single homogeneous thread some day; but for now, we will get to the subject at hand: Inside the Earth — The Second Tunnel. And just so you understand, the Second Tunnel refers to one of a series of three tunnels in the projection room located within the chamber beneath the Romanian Sphinx. The First Tunnel, named in the title of the third book in the series, Mystery of Egypt — The First Tunnel, leads to a chamber beneath the Giza Plateau. The Second Tunnel, the subject of this book, leads to underground cities and installations. The Third Tunnel leads to Tibet with an offshoot branch to the Carpathians (near Buzau, Romania) and then towards Iraq; and from there to Mongolia and the Gobi Plateau.

As you have now been either oriented or reoriented to the subject at hand, you are now prepared to read Radu's most recent work: Inside the Earth — The Second Tunnel. Radu was silent for eight years after completing The Secret Parchment and, as I said earlier, a very great mystery was left dangling. This hiatus is now at end, and you can begin unfolding this great mystery as you turn the page.

EDITOR'S NOTE

We have a saying in Romania (Nu aduce anul, ce aduce ceasul!) that does not translate so smoothly into English. Perhaps the best English translation reads as follows: "What the year has not brought us can surprisingly manifest in a sudden single moment."

Such was it that in the month of February 2017 when, after so many years of stillness and not hearing anything from Radu, that all of a sudden, in just one moment, everything changed. Finally, he reappeared, ready to give answers to all of the many readers that have continually asked me about Radu's return, his work, and anything else you might imagine.

In life, there are moments that will cause you to think in a rather profound manner. For example, Einstein said, "There are two ways of living your life: as if no miracles would exist or that everything would be a miracle."

Maybe it is too much to say that Radu's return would be like a miracle for us, but it is indeed a very big surprise for all of the readers of the Transylvania Series; and this is especially so because this volume contains a lot of information that represents gold for us. Radu will answer a lot of questions. He will also have a lot of propositions and opinions, but besides that, he will be able to better explain some mysteries that until now we would find unresolvable.

In a few lines, Radu informed me that this is the exact right moment for him to continue the revelations concerning the projection room in the Bucegi Mountains, also mentioning that this series of volumes will not stop here and that what he will publish in the future will bring amazing elements about the past and future of Mankind to the attention of both his readers as well as the scientific community.

Everything that Radu has ever sent to us over the years has been read with great intensity and emotion and we have discovered a lot of magic inside of the previous four volumes. We did, however, find it necessary to suggest a few minor changes to the text in this book. The reason for this is that certain information, if released indiscriminately, could have negative consequences on our publishing company as well as the Ministry of Internal Affairs. Radu immediately accepted these minor modifications and is gladly thanked for his understanding and prompt response.

This new volume, Inside the Earth - The Second Tunnel, represents a foundation for a new paradigm with regard to us understanding our own planet. At the same time, it offers an esoteric as well as a physical way to access the worlds of mystery inside the earth. No matter how we decide to view this book; and no matter how we interpret it, our concept about Terra, the Earth, has to be reevaluated.

PRELUDE — BY RADU CINAMAR

After publishing the fourth volume of the Transylvania Series, The Secret Parchment - Five Tibetan Initiation Techniques, I considered that whatever I had discovered and told in the original series of four books was enough. There was no intention of a deeper presentation on my behalf, and this was especially so by reason of the fact that my new position inside of Department Zero included much greater responsibility and would take up most of my time.

When I explained my point of view to Cezar, he agreed with me in a certain way, but he also said that the entire world needs to know this information and this includes the fact of the reality that exists beyond routine appearances. For this reason, he said that I should keep the idea before me of continuing the series and telling the world what I have discovered. At that time, however, I was way too enthusiastic about the course of events that had taken place inside of my own life and consequently did not pay attention to Cezar's advice. It was only after a few years that I came to realize the necessity of coming back to my writing in order to let the world know about my knowledge and experience. In fact, I consider it a must. I should also add that a major factor with regard to my decision to resume writing has a lot to do with my readers. My editor, Sorin Hurmuz, let me know that after seven years of stillness and quietness on my part, there were many questions with regard to whether there would ever be another appearance of mine. Accordingly, this volume will give you many answers, and I hope that it will delight all of my readers in a special way. I must, however, mention a few things first.

For a few years now, different websites and blogs have appeared that were either using my name or the subjects that I have written about. Although such activities are the result of people having been inspired by my books to bring certain facts, mysteries and suppositions to the public's attention, I am not a party to such websites; and I should add that they really have nothing or little to do with what I have written about in the previous volumes. I do, however, appreciate this fact as being a positive one as the enthusiasm of those posting these articles and information can definitely open new horizons to those that are interested in these topics. My only caveat is that you should be very careful in discerning the information that is presented. It is an entirely different matter, however, with regard to the Facebook pages that use my name and definitely give the impression that I am the one behind it. While it is every human being's freedom to name their blog, website or social media sites however they want, I want to adopt a very radical position by stating very clearly and directly to all of my readers that I do not have nor did I ever have any connection to such sites or the people behind them nor the information that is presented. In fact, I cannot put it more clearly that I do not have anything to do with anything that is being said in the virtual space of mass media with regards to my own individual self or the subjects I have written about in the earlier volumes. This includes everything that has been said in this direction by way of postings, analysis, forums, personal opinions or articles that have sought to bring the topics of my books into discussion. The only way that I have chosen to make myself well known is through the four volumes that were sent to and published by DAKSHA Publishing Company (of Bucharest) that owns my rights for the volumes that have already appeared as well as for the ones that will appear in the future.

It is a very different point of discussion, however, when it comes to Mr. Peter Moon, the director of the publishing company Sky Books of New York, who has made a very elegant, adept, persistent and fundamental contribution to the primary subject of my written volumes. A very correct human being with a lot of integrity, he is very well prepared in the domain of esotericism, and I thank him for the effort of coming to Romania several times in order to inform himself in the best way that he could through all of the connections that he has taken the opportunity to create.

One of the significant portals of awareness opened by Peter Moon is the association he has managed to forge with Dr. David Anderson, a physicist who very well understands the necessity of shielding certain information almost totally. This is by reason of his position as a scientific consultant and sub-contractor for the Pentagon as well as every government agency of the USA that he has worked for. The subject of the volume that is presented here can be an excellent study for David.

I should also add that opinions about my own personal identity that are expressed in online websites or any other means of mass media are sometimes very funny when they are attempting to assimilate me in any possible way with another Romanian writer that has achieved considerable notoriety by publishing fiction books. For me, this presents a very big question mark. How can someone make this type of affirmation that has nothing to do with logic nor the education of a certain person?

For example, a comparative analysis can be easily done with regard to style, content, and the way he treats a subject as opposed to myself. So, because I want things to be as clear as possible, I strongly confirm here that, under any circumstances, I am not that person nor am I a group or organization that would have written the previous four volumes.

While there have been some factors having to do with politics or the secret services that have kind of pressured me to make known everything that I know, there have also been opposite forces and occult energies that have threatened me against communicating what I know or have seen. A lot of intrigues and interests swirl around the subject of this book, and the most difficult situation is that one is not allowed to say anything or almost nothing about what occurs. You will understand better if I explain a little about Department Zero.

Even though Department Zero is independent and very well integrated when it comes to state matters, it is still required to use a tremendous amount of diplomacy. General Obadea and Cezar had to engage in a considerable amount of intervention just so the first four volumes could be released to the public. Unfortunately, General Obadea is no longer here. In May 2011, he died because of a brain stroke. While I do not wish to speculate about that, I do want to remind everyone that the General was one of the deepest patrons of my country (Romania) and even though his influence was very hidden, it was very decisive in key moments for the state. General Obadea's death also represented a very important moment for the Department. In the beginning of 2012, the Department was in great danger of being dissolved and assimilated within another structure from inside the services. The position of Cezar Brad, however, and his strong influence and extraordinary ability in solving very delicate situations has made it possible to maintain the continuity of the Department. This not only enhanced his relationships with diplomatic factions and the secret services, it has earned him a lot of respect that has led to him being admired at a very high level. This includes foreign diplomatic channels as well as their own secret services.

As a result of new circumstances and necessities, the structure and operations of Department Zero have been rethought. As a natural course of events, the position of General Obadea has been taken over by Cezar; and in Cezar's place came Lieutenant Nicoara.

Prior to the restructuring of Department Zero, I had been in charge of the section for "unconventional" training or what some might translate as being "paranormal" training. Moreover, in 2014, I was handed the task of funding and conducting, inside of the Department, a special directive concerning collaboration with foreign secret services regarding "sensitive" information known as "limit operations." This refers to all of the "K type" phenomena that occurs both on the ground and in space but especially for such that has a connection with the Projection Room in Bucegi as well as the three tunnels within. Cezar's decision to entrust me to set up this section had to do with the experience I had gained in my relationships with certain American intelligence agencies. This was a result of all of the training I had undergone ten years ago in addition to numerous trips that I took afterward to the United States or other locations, all of them having to do with "limit operations." Utilizing the knowledge of diplomacy that I had already gained allowed me to develop some relationships and useful bonds with the members of different services in the West.

The most significant benefit of these promotions was my own increase in authority which now gives me free and direct access to the Projection Room. We are not talking about a level of governmental security here but rather one of internal security, a special clearance that is exclusively authorized by Department Zero in liaison with a section from the Pentagon. This type of very special agreement was established in 2005 with the purpose of reducing, almost completely, any political interference. For example, the U.S. Defense Department and a specific Committee from the Romanian Parliament put pressure on to significantly extend the list of those who could be admitted to the Projection Room. They even attempted to actualize a certain control over the secret complex inside of the Bucegi Mountains.

At that particular time, both Colonel Obadea and Cezar realized it would be very difficult for them to handle the flow of forces and interests that were already targeting access to the secret complex in Bucegi. This is why, with all of the relationships and interventions, they first requested and then arranged for a reunion of both Romanian and American sides where the political participation was minimal: a representative from the defense departments of both countries. I do not want it to be misunderstood that this case was or is about a “military industrial complex,” but rather a militarily secured complex. This had the purpose of keeping a certain balance of interests, all of which is very sensitive when it comes to the Bucegi location.

Previous discussions and arrangements implied and fostered a lot of tension. Delays were requested and even certain undercover threats were taking place from both sides. Eventually, however, both the military and political factions agreed upon the negotiations with the subject of “plausible denial” being addressed. For us, this was a diplomatic way of avoiding any “contribution” from the political sphere, the influences and interests of which are complicated. If these interests would have succeeded in gaining power or control of the Bucegi complex in one way or the other, things could easily have escalated out of control, especially in the context of today’s geopolitical climate. Accordingly, an exclusive military type of control has been decided upon. Things are actually even more complicated concerning these matters, but I will stop here.

Free access to the Projection Room signified “a big breath of oxygen” for me. The death of General Obadea left an empty space in myself, and it also represented a big loss to the Department. Due to high external pressures that were aiming to take control of both Department Zero and the Bucegi complex, it was difficult to maintain smooth running of the Base for any length of time. But due to Cezar’s personality, calmness and maturity, as well as the loyalty of other remarkable people inside or the Department, it was possible for Department Zero to continue its activity. Issues were brought up or created on both side of the Romanian and American Secret Services as well as the defense departments of both countries. To a certain extent, the situation was reminiscent of the previously mentioned circumstances from 2005; but now it was easier to solve due to the immeasurable experience that had been gained as well as the discoveries that have taken place.

From the American side, General Roddey had important and influential words to say; and this had to do, to a great extent, with his very close connection and friendship to General Obadea. At the bilateral meeting that took place in 2012, Admiral Ken Hudson, a special delegate of the Pentagon, made a surprisingly beneficial intervention that came along with what appeared to be a special mandate. Later on, Cezar confessed to me that the harmful influence of an important occult lodge had been removed from the organizational structure and this neutralized a lot of tensions and bilateral disagreements even though there were still some left to be solved. Everything calmed down. Department Zero continued its activity with its structure improved and its funding increased. Our partnership with the Americans was prosperous even if it were only to be viewed from the perspective of the very advanced technology that they have furnished to guarantee security in the area of Bucegi. If I were to make a comparison of what I saw in 2003, when I was first introduced to the place, the exterior is currently unrecognizable. The landscape in the immediate area surrounding the entrance in the mountain was slightly modified in order to allow continuous surveillance and efficient control while two other areas have been put under holographic projection. Everything is now controlled from the inside of the mountain that was specially designed next to the entrance in the Great Gallery. To a certain extent, the inclination of the Americans was to reproduce their own base structure from Cheyenne Mountain. The technology they have brought in and applied at the external location in Bucegi, however, is much more advanced than what I noticed at Cheyenne Mountain.

Even though I was accompanied by Cezar inside of the Projection Room many times until 2014, I was then given free and individual access. The nature of this new function I have allows me to establish the list of people who are going to be next to visit the Room, who will accompany them and also the period of time assigned to the visit. The protocol is very strict and pretty complicated because, besides the required military staff, there are teams of scientists who periodically visit the location. Even though these teams are never larger than three people, document analysis shows that the place has been visited over the years by dozens of scientist from all over the world.

In the thirteen years that have passed by since the discovery in the Bucegi Mountains, only nine scientists have actually penetrated the inside of the Projection Room and studied what is found there. The rest of the teams referred to only studied material or data provided to the laboratory that was subsequently built inside of the mountain and next to the entrance inside the location or to another detached lab in the capital.

Many readers might imagine that the Great Gallery and the Projection Room represent some sort of a “museum” in which the flow of people is continuous and pretty intense. In this case, assessing the truth of the matter requires correctly understanding the nature of the discovery that has been made. This discovery represents a series of characteristics and phenomena that are often bewildering to the psychic and the mental state of the ordinary human being. I think the most appropriate rendering of what happens to someone after penetrating the Great Gallery can be made by using the phrase: “an unexpected transformation of behavior and thought.” Once you get into the Projection Room, the mind strives to be isolated from memories or secondary thoughts. In a way that can hardly be described, the mind is kind of “suspended” and “quiet.” The thoughts are rare and they blend with a kind of very deep emotion, almost having a sacred character. In the beginning, when I visited the place for the first time, I thought this sensation was being generated by the extraordinary greatness of the construction and the space there, by reason of the very advanced technology and the unique situation. In the years that followed, however, I figured out that the phenomena continually and identically repeats itself. In other words, it is not due to some subjective tendencies but is a consequence of the very special vibration that exists in that place.

The general impression is one of “another world.” This is not only because of the specifics of the technology and the objects from inside but, above all, through an “intuitive knowledge” that appears and modifies the nature of one’s thoughts and actions. The meditative and relaxation impulse is emphasized along with a feeling for noble and elevated things as well as for everything that is good, beautiful and imbued by a soul-uplifting aspiration. We quickly realized that access to this special place can only be offered to a certain category of people who first require proper mental and physical training. Even the personnel assigned to routine periodic tasks either had to be chosen from a collection of superior officers or they had to take special training courses. Without proper psycho-mental training, any penetration inside of the Room will come with the risk of some bizarre manifestations that might occur subsequently. Cezar told me that these aspects were understood only after noticing the strange behavior of some soldiers who had been present immediately after the discovery of the complex inside of the mountain. Those people seemed disconnected from reality and did not recover completely until a few weeks later. Their motor functions were also affected. Hardly moving, the body became rigid with the eyes gazing at a single point even though audible and visual stimuli were present. This is the reason why the question of establishing a training program and proper testing for the people who penetrate that area was specifically raised. With the foundation of the counterintelligence section inside of the department that I lead, I was able to review the protocol and make it suitable for current needs.

This topic has always been one of the most sensitive subjects in our discussions with our partners from other states. They seem not to understand the fact that the Projection Room represents more than a simple physical hole inside of the mountain, even being very technology laden itself. Indeed, we can talk about another concept and vision, about a huge difference of technology, but that particular space is also a “crossing” and this aspect seems to be inconceivable to modern science. We quickly came to the conclusion that, in order to correctly understand what the underground complex from the Bucegi Mountains means, it is necessary to abandon most of the principles and the materialistic way that most modern scientists think with. A proof in this sense is that, by 2010, the scientists involved in studying the Bucegi location could not provide any clues to the various aspects and question marks presented by this secret location.

It was discovered that the most important aspect is that, once penetrating into the Great Gallery, and especially inside of the Projection Room, the frequency of vibration of the biological being changes. This is the key to understanding all of the apparently weird processes that happen with the psychic and mental aspects of people, as well as the often strange perceptions that interfere when penetrating the three tunnels that extend from the Projection Room. I do not want to get ahead of myself at this point because this is one of the main subjects I will be addressing in this volume. The experience I had during the first expedition that I was part of profoundly affected me. This was my adventure described in the book Mystery of Egypt—The First Tunnel. This was not only the result of the unique discovery concerning the Occult Room beneath the Giza Plateau in Egypt but also because of the specific states of consciousness I experienced during the journey through that First Tunnel. I thought that the expeditions through the other two tunnels would be similar with the one from the First Tunnel, but reality turned out to be completely different. By the end of 2014, I found this out from Cezar's stories. Only after having been assigned to lead the special section within the Department did I have the possibility and extraordinary experience of going on expeditions through the other two tunnels.

Up to that time, Cezar has made several trips, especially through the Second Tunnel towards the Inner Earth; and he was sometimes gone for periods lasting several months. I tried to fill Cezar's absence in my life with proper training in the field of esotericism and paranormal; and after my integration into the Department's structure, I dedicated myself to the organization, training and achievement of necessary experience in this very difficult and slippery domain of the secret services.

From the conversations I had with Cezar, I fully understood the importance of personal training representing an essential ingredient for success when it comes to future expeditions. He told me that in regards to the tunnel towards the Inner Earth (the Second Tunnel) and the one towards Iraq (the Third Tunnel), things were different and a certain interior preparation was required that was more intense than that which was needed in preparation for accessing the Bucegi complex. Cezar's words made me even more curious, but I patiently waited and tried to stay elevated by following his directions, continuing the training within the Base and also the stages of special preparation from the remote-viewing program in the United States. After General Obadea's death, however, the situation became difficult and the time periods of Cezar's absence were very burdensome. In a certain sense, his role tended to become that of an "ambassador" to the inside of the planet, and during one of the discussions I had with him, in between two trips, he told me that the issue of him remaining within the Inner Earth had been raised. The General's death changed the course of things and Cezar returned, fully conscious that, in his absence, the General's work of a life time and also all the secrets of the Department would have been learned, controlled and exploited in very dangerous and selfish ways.

During that very tension filled period of time, my reunion with Elinor was like a ray of light. At the end of 2012, he surprisingly returned to the country for a few days; and, for me, this was like a water fountain in the middle of the desert. His look was changeless, and he seemed even a little bit younger than when I last saw him. Elinor appeared in his unmistakable way, entering naturally and debonair in the room of his mansion where the library is situated. I visited there in one of the few free moments that I allowed myself after going to work in the Department. Most of my time was spent within the Alpha Base or on other trips within the country or abroad, all on Department business. Either it was a remarkable synchronicity or Elinor simply knew that I was in his mansion at that time. No matter what the answer might be, his presence was a wonderful surprise and the next couple of days were a delight as we engaged in discussions and shared complex information with each other. He confessed to me that, generally speaking, his visits happen once every six to seven years. People like him or Dr. Xien have a special statute and their missions usually take place over very long periods of time. But, while Doctor Xien is acting through governmental connections, Elinor is part of an “invisible” category of human beings that are strongly “hunted” by certain occult societies; and, first and foremost, by the “Organization.” This is why his presence has to be incognito and his residences across the world remain unknown.

Since 2013, Cezar remained within the Base for most of the time. It was like a return to the good times when I was spending hours a day talking to him, carefully taking notes on what he was saying to me, asking and clarifying different aspects. My time as a novitiate had now long since ended and I was now experienced. We mainly discussed his amazing trips to the Inner Earth, about those mysterious worlds and the phenomena that characterizes them, about the implications of this type of knowledge, and many other options and plans that would possibly have a beneficial result for the country.

I think that the fall of 2014 was the most beautiful time I have lived so far. If someone thinks that fairy tale moments cannot exist in a dream landscape inside of a top secret militarized base, then he is certainly wrong. It was the unspoken happiness of the freedom of knowledge that came once I had been assigned to my new position. There were also Cezar’s amazing descriptions through which he revealed to me an incredible world in an incredible place. There was also the extraordinary mysteries of the history of Mankind and the temporal library that can be reached through the Third Tunnel.

During one of those remarkable evenings, in the light of a sublime and calm sunset, Cezar told me that we would soon leave on a new expedition. My dream for years was now becoming a reality. I was going to penetrate the Inner Earth for the first time, to discover mysteries that would remain unknown and not understood for the majority of people. I already knew that the situation concerning the Second Tunnel was more complicated than the one regarding the tunnel towards Egypt and even more confusing with regards to the capacity of the common man to understand. I was already informed about some of these aspects, but the one who was going to clarify these matters for me was Doctor Xien who announced his arrival at the Base during that period. I had received the notification of his coming from the Chinese services. Doctor Xien was going to be accompanied by his assistant, the enigmatic and thrilling Shin Li.

The discussions, explanations and the main events that followed represents the content of this volume and refer to the journeys that Cezar and myself took together to the Inner Earth in November and December of 2014.

CHAPTER ONE — A POWERFUL SHOCK

WHAT THE JOURNEY TO THE CENTER OF THE PLANET REALLY MEANS

The new expedition which I was about to undertake into the Inner Earth came with one more surprise when Cezar told me that we were the only two people who would be taking the journey. Even so, this idea was not really something too new because I already knew that the majority of trips through the Second Tunnel, especially in between 2008-2012, were taken by him only. Cezar had avoided giving me information on this subject because he considered it to be very sensitive. The only person he would talk to in this regards was General Obadea. From some allusions that he made to me, however, I figured out that something major was being prepared and that he had succeeded in establishing some very important connections during his previous expeditions.

With the limited knowledge I had at the time, I could only imagine that, one way or another, Cezar had penetrated the mythical realm of Shambhala. What I have found out in the years that followed, however, which is based upon my own personal experience as well as the explanations I was given, offers a very complex perspective of the subject that cannot be judged simplistically. Accordingly, I will not be referring to the main studies that have already appeared on this theme, starting with the writings of Ossendovski, Roerich, Bernard nor to the various articles which portrays diverse aspects and strange facts about the empty interior of the Earth. All of these works transmit something, but none of these descriptions show the overall picture nor the correct understanding of what truly exists in the inland of our planet.

THE FULL EARTH AND THE EMPTY INNER EARTH

Scientists themselves state, and they state it properly, that it is not possible for them to collect, let alone study, material samples from depths of thousands of kilometers beneath the earth; and, consequently, they can only make theories based on indirect measurements that are not absolutely precise. On the other hand, the stories and the books that have been published on this subject describe the subject of the empty inland of the Earth in very general terms without any details or conclusions, also being imprecise.

We can, however, make a clear distinction between two ideas or major concepts. First, contemporary science says that the planet is “full” with a certain solid stratified composition. On the other hand, there is a segment of the population who believes that, in reality, the interior of the planet is empty. Consequent to these contrary views, the latter ones are categorized by the scientific community and the mass-media as being supporters of conspiracy theories. It is not clear at all, however, what these so-called conspiracies are actually directed towards and who the so-called conspiracy theorists are against, but the common and rough front of materialistic science and state interests have succeeded in making the subject appear to be ridiculous.

The credibility of a subject decreases once it is made to look like a joke as opposed to a starting point for a debatable discussion. In the same vein, we can just as well consider modern science’s theory about the internal structure of our planet as being a conspiracy because it is not supported with either dates and concrete measurements but only with approximations, interpolation and hypotheses. That is why rejecting the idea that the Earth is empty on the inside does not represent a fair attitude, especially when there are elements that can sustain it. Some of these elements are even famous, such as the mysterious operation High Jump in 1947 when Admiral Byrd of the American Navy led a vast military expedition into the area of Antarctica. Byrd also made odd and mysterious declarations about the interior of the Earth. No matter how much Admiral Byrd or the expedition is discredited or ignored, the facts are still facts and they remained registered.

The idea of the planet being empty on the inside represents a taboo subject to all of the armies and the secret services of the world. It is considered a top state secret that can only be compared with the secrets concerning extraterrestrial civilizations due to the ideological, economic and military impact such revelations might stir up. In this regard, the policy of denying, slighting or ignoring such uncomfortable ideas, even though they point to the truth, are considered to be the most appropriate. When it comes to the great powers of the world, and the United States of America in particular, the idea of the Earth being empty on the inside is most definitely viewed as an occult subject. And if things might be clear to insiders on the subject of UFOs and extraterrestrial civilizations, even if such has not been revealed to the public, there is almost nothing known about the interior of the Earth. This ignorance, as well as the incapacity to control the phenomena that comes with penetrating the center of the planet or knowing what is there has given shivers to the military and political leaders over the past decades. In such cases, it is the uncertainty factor that bothers them the most. Apparently, none of the military and political leaders of the world know what exactly exists inside of the planet. They do not know what to expect, but on a particularly very high level of security, some of the information agencies know very well certain inside “access areas,” the ones from the South and North Poles being the most important. Although the United States, Canada and Russia have special monitoring and study programs, they have no possibility of controlling the phenomena they encounter nor do they understand it. Penetrating the inside of the Earth has always represented a technological and conceptual struggle for Mankind.

ENIGMATIC PHENOMENA

When the secret complex from the Bucegi Mountains was discovered, it represented an unexpected leap forward which seemed to offer an extraordinary opportunity to clarify the situation with regard to the interior of our planet. We convinced ourselves pretty quickly, however, that things were far from being that simple. There were tensions and misunderstandings from the very start, primarily because the location was in Romania and Americans could not control it directly.

On the other hand, there are just a few who understand that penetrating the Inner Earth has nothing to do with either armament, military strategy or with funding. One of the important aspects is the fact that not just anyone can move through the Second Tunnel towards the empty interior of the planet, thus dramatically reducing the number who either could or did undertake expeditions through this tunnel. Moreover, while not everyone resists such expeditions, something undetermined seems to block the access to human beings. They suddenly feel a general state of sickness, nausea and manifest panic attacks.

It should also be pointed out that even intense individual training does not assure unconditional success in these matters because, in a strange way, such people have neither the potential nor possibility of penetrating the tunnel or inner region of the planet beyond a certain area.

These unusual situations triggered certain frustrations, but we realized quite quickly that we had to deal with phenomena that we could not control through will, weapons or technology. What was clearly highlighted for both the Americans and ourselves was the fact that access to the Inner Earth is not an open ground and that the phenomena accompanying a ride through the Second Tunnel exceeds the capacity of contemporary science's ability to understand.

As far as I am concerned, I had the opportunity to be given valuable explanations from both Dr. Xien and from Cezar, both of whom clarified my understanding of the inside structure of our planet. In a simple and direct way, Dr. Xien pointed out the main scientific and esoteric elements in order for me to have a clear vision on this subject. Before that remarkable discussion, I had, to a certain extent, done my own research by consulting the main references on the currently extant data about the internal structure of the Earth.

THE MODERN SCIENTIFIC CONCEPT ABOUT THE INSIDE OF OUR PLANET

Basically, scientists think that the Earth is solid and rigid on the inside and have extended this conclusion to apply to all telluric bodies of the cosmos. They reason that if our planet is empty inside, then all of the other solid planets should be the same. This means that all telluric planets are either full and solid on the inside or empty on the inside. Following this concept, it is not reasonable to either think or assume that some of the planets are full and others are empty because, as has been noticed when planetary masses are compared, their densities appear to be similar. This is why scientists have concluded that telluric planets form and structure themselves in a similar way, meaning that they are either full or empty on the inside. Unfortunately, they have chosen the version of the Earth being solid and rigid on the inside, raising many issues that have remained unsolved. Although the internal structure of the planet has been elaborated upon by science, all of it is based upon assumptions and extrapolations of results derived from various measurements. These often provide strange or even contradictory factors that cannot be understood.

The currently accepted scientific concept is that there is a solid sphere in the center of the Earth that is mainly composed of iron and nickel, both being metals with powerful magnetic properties. This solid metal sphere would represent, in a scientist's view, the core or the internal nucleus of the Earth. It is surrounded by a thick magma layer which represents the so-called outer nucleus of the Earth. The scientists affirm that, because of the rotational movement of the planet and through the intense dynamism between the internal and external core, all of which is solid, thermal energy is emanated towards the surface which generates the magnetic field of the Earth.

Going further, science tells us that this ensemble in the center of the planet, composed from the internal and external nucleus, is surrounded by a thick mantle in a semi-solid state (viscous matter, meaning magma of different types), surrounded by what we call the Earth's crust on the exterior, the latter considered to be solid.

In reality, nothing is clear for physicists and geologists regarding the internal structure of the planet. There is considerable contradictory data and results that cannot stand up to an unseen scientific model.

For example, what is the real source of the magnetic field of our planet? How is it truly created? In this regard, like the theories about the internal structure of the Earth, it is only assumptions that are made, all based upon sustaining certain concepts and approximations, all of them relying upon a hypothetical model which researchers created in spite of the fact that they have no idea about what is really going on inside of our planet.

THE BASIC STRUCTURE OF THE INSIDE OF OUR PLANET IN THE SCIENTIFIC VISION:

Their entire vision is purely materialistic. Even so, nobody has scientifically surveyed an actual "vertical cross section" of the planet in order to establish the truth of the theory of its internal structure. Although scientists have not been able to penetrate more than twelve kilometers into the Earth with current technology, they publish convinced opinions on what exists in the nucleus of Terra, over 6,300 kilometers depth.

THE DELUSORY VISION OF THE “EXTERIOR” AND “INTERIOR”

From this point on, you will read the explanations of Dr. Xien. I met with him and Shin Li in the protocol room inside Alpha Base, sitting comfortably around the oval table in the middle of the room. The purpose of the meeting was to serve as a training seminar for the journey through the Second Tunnel that I was about to make with Cezar.

As it seemed natural to me, I started the conversation by commenting on the fact that modern science does not conceive of the idea of an empty interior of the planet. Just as soon, however, Dr. Xien started a discussion which confused me.

“Everything scientists believe about the interior of the Earth being full and rigid represents an illusion based upon their own conceptual limitations. This also applies to everything that other researchers say who are attempting to explain the existence of a cavity in the middle. Both see the Earth based upon measurement units which are being used in current science. They analyze the data they have based upon the level of understanding they have reached. What they consider the “answer” to be with regard to the inside of the Earth does not represent the real state of things. It is more of a state of mind adapted to the scientist’s ability to understand and conceive with regard to the current moment, based upon the existing devices of measurement. This is how their level of consciousness is, representing the limited extent to which they have been able to penetrate the mystery of the planet.”

Thinking for a moment that Dr. Xien was mocking me, I was looking for the reason why he would do such thing. I soon got over it though. After all, this was only a reaction of self-importance from my side.

“Okay. Then what is the truth?” I asked him. “It is my understanding that neither one nor the other are right. So, is there an empty interior of the Earth?”

“There is certainly a very special reality in the heart of the planet,” replied Dr. Xien, “but it is not ‘inside’ — it only exists. When scientists say a planet has a higher or a lower volume, this is nothing more than a quantitative appearance, without any quality aspect of that celestial body. Therefore, basically speaking, there is no ‘interior’ or ‘exterior’ because these terms belong to a limited language only. This language is due to the incorrect understanding scientists have about space.”

I have to admit the fact that I was stunned. Until that moment, I thought I was mastering certain knowledge about physics, but what I heard from Dr. Xien stunned my mind, making me wonder if whatever I knew had any grain of truth in it. I could not question the wisdom of the Doctor, thus there was nothing left for me but to try and better understand what he was telling me.

“If we draw a circle on a piece of paper, our concepts make us think there is an ‘interior’ and an ‘exterior’ with reference to that circle”, he continued explaining to me. “However, this observation is only in relation to that piece of paper, which is bi-dimensional. If we were to actually be bi-dimensional beings and live on the piece of paper, the circle we drew would then indeed be a limitation for us, meaning it would ‘split’ that reality into what we call ‘interior’ and ‘exterior.’ But, if we look at this matter from the point of view of someone who lives in the tridimensional world, humanity for example, the circle does not actually delimit anything. For us, the ‘interior’ and ‘exterior’ on the paper is irrelevant. Now, move the example on the paper from the bi-dimensional plane to a superior plane such as, for example, to a tridimensional plane. You do not have a circle anymore but a sphere which delimits a so-called ‘interior’ and ‘exterior.’ However, for a being that lives in four dimensions, the sphere from the tridimensional plane does not limit a ‘closed’ volume at all.

For that being, it would be like the circle drawn on the piece of paper was for us. Everything is an apparencty and our limitations makes us consider that there is a so-called ‘empty space’ inside the Earth.”

Dr. Xien’s logic was perfect and I started to realize that our discussion clearly had a greater depth than I could yet understand. I realized that my own concepts and ideas about the world did not fit in.

What I was hearing did not mean that my own ideas were necessarily incorrect, but it was more likely there was an underlying difficulty with regards to my being able to understand and process the information. Dr. Xien continued explaining.

“To go on a trip from somewhere on the surface of the Earth to the world ‘inside,’ it is not enough to calculate the distance from here to there. You must change the measurement (units) in order to understand how you should travel that distance. The way you travel assures you that you can reach what you generally call ‘the interior of Earth’ from here. That is because there is clearly no real and material ‘empty hole’ inside the Earth, but rather a mysterious world in a superior level of existence that exists in the area of the so-called ‘interior’ of the planet.”

I was starting to see the logical chain of the subject.

“Do you mean that the distance between a spot from the surface and another from the center of the Earth is appearance?” I asked, looking to better understand his point of view.

“Yes, that is what I mean. After all, what does ‘distance’ mean to you?” I thought for a while, trying to properly choose my words.

“A measure or a quantity of space that I can pass to, from one spot to another,” I responded.

“Indeed, it is a measure, but it is a measure that does not reflect reality in itself; rather, it is just your way of seeing space between two spots. But, if you change perspective, then your concept about space becomes irrelevant. Because of your perspective, a small or a big distance only represents a way of saying that you can or cannot reach from one place to another. In fact, you then add another measure in order to define distance, and this new measure is time. How would you express the distance from Earth to the Sun? You could say it is distance in kilometers, but you are not measuring with an instrument such as a meter. Instead, you say that it takes eight minutes at the speed of light to travel that distance because you are conscious that you cannot walk that distance. The time needed to go by foot from Earth to the Sun, supposing you could do it, would represent a time that cannot be measured by you. So, in this way, you have solved the problem.”

“What solution?” I asked, not understanding what he meant. “This only changes the reference system of measurement. Time is being referenced instead of space.”

“That’s right. You are using the measurement reference that corresponds to your understanding as well as the degree to which your consciousness has opened. When you measure something, whether it is big or small, you do so in correspondence with the capacity of your own consciousness or awareness.”

I could not understand too well what it was that he was trying to say.

“The system of measurement does not matter!” I insisted. “Everybody knows that the distance to the Sun is huge!”

“Does the eagle know? It is a being. Just as you do, it does estimate distances, especially when it hunts; but he does it in his own way, based upon the instinct and the experience it has acquired. What would humans have said about this distance in the year 1200? What would an autistic say? What about an imbecile?”

I had to admit that the subject was more delicate than I had imagined. It was not so difficult to understand, and I realized that I had to be more careful. I agreed that things were clearer now.

Dr. Xien returned me to our discussion.

“When you see or analyze the situation inside the Earth, you just feel like something is there because you cannot otherwise explain the situation, nor can you give yourself answers. You think that if you dig far enough you will first get to sand, then break stones, reach water, then lava and other such geological layers. Man cannot imagine much about it other than what he already knows, all of which is based upon what science tells and teaches him. This is valid as much for a beggar as for an intellectual...”

“Who seeks out an acceptable theory for what might be found inside the Earth?” I added, anticipating what he was about to say and glad that I could finally see the connection to the subject discussed from the start.

“Exactly. People imagine that there must be ‘something’ in the center of the planet that is tangible and material because that is the way they have been mentally prepared to know and understand. As their experience takes place on the surface of a spherical planet and is associated with its exterior, they automatically think that there must be a corresponding ‘interior’ of the planet. So, it is a conceptual problem.”

Concentrating upon the things I was now learning, I was surprised but also fascinated by the simple and eloquent way Dr. Xien could explain a truth that is available to everyone but remains systematically ignored.

“Some scientists are asking themselves if that solid, iron and nickel ball really exists inside of Earth,” he continued. “Others wonder if there are people living there inside. None of them are observing that their view is partial and limited because they are imagining that there is a world functioning based upon the same material laws as those existing on the surface. Yet, if they were to start digging to the center of the Earth, going deeper and deeper, they would undoubtedly have to change their perspective as well as their system of measurement”.

I stood thinking for a few seconds. Dr. Xien had a direct, fast and intelligent way of presenting things that did not allow for interruptions nor meaningless mental “escapes.” You had to maintain your focus of attention, especially when the subject was important. Processing and assimilating his information had to happen in real time, otherwise you risked losing the coherence of the explanations.

“You mean a mental and perceptive accustomization appears?” I asked. “A mental automatism, a thinking reflex? People have a tendency to judge things, even when they do not know them, using a model of what they already know. This means that, relating to the inside of the Earth, they only calculate the distance from the surface to the center, always ignoring the qualitative perspective of this ‘distance’ .”

Dr. Xien showed his approval by nodding his head.

“Yes, this is the process. Everyone habitually relates to their environment based upon the way they were taught and how they have viewed things over their entire life. That is why scientists imagine that the core of the Earth is an incandescent metal sphere — because this way they have a ‘solution’ that is based upon apparent effects: gravity and the electromagnetic field of the planet. Spreading this knowledge further, many people take for granted what they are told and repeat the same thing. Even so, what they are imagining does not exist. Nevertheless, they have the sensation and feeling of the existence of a solid nucleus of the planet, all based upon their mental programming that is a result of the knowledge and experience they have acquired up to that point. Due to the limitations of their 3-D perception, they believe the planet to be just a sphere filled with physical matter. Then, they observe particular characteristics of the planet and create models approximating scientific observations. In this way, they conceive of a 3-D mathematical model of the Earth that prevents a correct understanding of what our planet really is. In other words, scientists strongly believe in what actually does not exist.”

Although I felt that I had a clue of his ideas and explanation, I thought how difficult it could be for others to think this way. Even though I had seen and gone through a lot of amazing experiences up to this point in my life, it was still challenging for me to adapt to this new system of thought presented by Dr. Xien. All of a sudden, I was discovering a new perspective surrounding reality, one that I had never considered and one which had no ‘virus’ of illusion. I wondered how many people could actually understand such things, let alone want to look deeper into these aspects. Making efforts to adapt myself to these new ideas in ‘real time’ was not very difficult, but they still hit powerfully the deeply rooted concepts inside my mind.

THE MAGNETIC FIELD OF THE PLANET: ENIGMAS AND INTERPRETATIONS

Feeling that I still did not quite have a perfectly clear understanding, I asked Dr. Xien another question.

“Tell me then, how would you pose the question concerning the case of the Inner Earth? What is really there?”

“Currently, it is said that there is a solid metal core, cooling slowly by sending heat continuously to the surface; but as I have already said, this idea only represents an interpretation of scientists that is blindly embraced by the rest of the population.”

“Okay, but there are measurements, there are some effects, some results that were pointed out,” I said, pretty confused. “These scientists are talking according to some evidence!”

The concepts and opposition were creating a tough conflict inside my mind. They were, I felt, a manifestation of my strong mental prejudices. Feeling as if I had my “feet in the air,” I was struggling, but I tried to encourage myself.

“It cannot be — something is not right! It is impossible for the geologists and physicists to be this wrong. They must have used certain technology to in some way determine the existence of the inner metallic sphere or, at least, they must have extrapolated their results in order to arrive at this admissible conclusion. There must be an explication somewhere that unites both their observations and what you are explaining to me now.”

Dr. Xien answered me with a lot of calm.

“You cannot unite something false with something true. It is like the illusion created in a show of magic. The magician shows you an a trick and you believe it comes out of what you have observed and recognized up to that point, but the explanation behind it is totally different. What you have seen and recognized in your mind is but an illusion. What he does is real. Such researchers are like spectators to such a show. They see some effects and construe a result according to what they see and with what they measure, but the reality is different.”

“All right, what is it then?” I asked impatiently.

“In the case of the nucleus from the center of the Earth, you need to start from the idea that researchers obviously do not know that there is a solid iron and nickel sphere. They just suspect it. They think something along the lines of “if the Earth has a magnetic field, then what could generate it? It obviously cannot be produced by the crust. Nor does the lava have enough force to generate a field so intense. What is it then? For such a magnetic field to be able to exist inside the center of the Earth, it must be an iron and nickel sphere, surrounded by lava, and this tandem manifests a strong movement creating magnetic field!””

“Yes, it is a logical conclusion although I admit it is just a theoretical one.”

“As you say, it is just a theory of their own interpretation. They cannot otherwise explain the existence of such a strong magnetic field of the planet. Scientists cannot understand what it is and how this magnetic field has been generated in any other way other than through what they have already learned from the current laws and theories in physics.”

“Do you mean that they are wrong and that they make incorrect studies?” I asked, surprised.

“Not necessarily. I actually said that they construe in a limited way what they observe based upon what they have so far known as being reality. No matter the ‘simulations’ they see on the computer or their other ways of extrapolating, they end up suiting themselves with the result that they wish for and that they assume exists. They then become satisfied that their ideas have been verified. The truth is that what they think of the nucleus of the Earth represents the only logical theory that could have been arrived at, based upon the extant knowledge of science, and that this gives the answer to the presence of the Earth’s magnetic field. This, however, is not sufficient.”

I had been looking towards the doctor’s assistant, Shin Li, for a while. She was sitting still on the chair with her arms elegantly propped on the table, like a statuesque and alluring beauty. I was thinking that, to me, she was an intangible mystery and, somehow, I was regretting that Dr. Xien was not revealing this fascinating unknown as well.

At that very moment, the following words suddenly appeared in my mind:

“Do not disperse your attention. Go deeper into the mystery.”

As I fathomed these words, I witnessed that Shin Li was looking right at me as if her eyes were born from ancestral water, sending me this strong telepathic message. Shying away, I was unsure of myself as I noticed what appeared to be an amused nuance, a fine irony that mitigated her intense gaze. I preferred, however, to get back to the discussion with Dr. Xien and focus on that. Although only a few seconds had passed, Shin Li was manifesting the extraordinary capacity that she sometimes demonstrated, of creating the sensation that space and time are expanding. This was not the first time that I had dealt with such a thing while in her vicinity.

“Still,” I said, continuing my conversation with Dr. Xien, “there must be something generating this magnetic field of the planet, isn’t there?”

I had already asked the obvious question that I was prepared to ask. Scientists have made their observations and determinations, interpreting seismic waves. All of these are based upon something. You cannot simply say that their words are just in vain.

Dr. Xien smiled again, but it could barely be seen. Intuitively, I then understood that I was not the only one who knew about the telepathic transmission of Shin Li’s. But, due to his level of knowledge, he answered me as if nothing in particular had made a significant or surprising impact upon him.

“There is a sort of triangular dance that occurs between the electric field, the magnetic field and their concentration in what we label to be ‘matter.’ It is a triangle of recurrent transformations where these three different types of manifestations must be in balance with one another.

I was following Dr. Xien’s hand drawing as he explained the general outline of this process. After a while, I took the paper and folded it carefully, knowing that I would refer to it later on when I would be writing about these things. The two sketches from below represent his paper drawing.

CONVERSION OF ELECTRIC FIELD - MAGNETIC FIELD - MATTER

“Matter ‘gives birth’ to a ripple, a manifesting wave that comes apart in three components: mass, space and time,” Dr. Xien continued explaining. “This means a condensation of electric and magnetic energy because mass corresponds to condensed matter; space corresponds to the electric field; and time corresponds to the magnetic field. In fact, the magnetic field of the Earth is nothing other than the ‘wave’ of our planet’s physical presence in the Universe. It is the ‘echo’ of our planet’s material presence in the space and time of the Universe.”

CONVERSION OF ELECTRIC FIELD - MATTER - MAGNETIC FIELD

MAGNETIC FIELD OF EARTH AND ITS MAGNETIC POLES

THE “CORE” OF THE PLANET

Things began to clarify more and more. Still, some things seemed not to correlate, so I continued with another question.

“If matter appears as you say, it means there also exists a core in the planet. What could make me think there is not? I think scientists relay this in their theory.”

“A planet does not represent just a sphere of amorphous matter in cosmic space, even if it is solid or gaseous. Nothing born or appearing in the universe is random nor senseless. There is a superior source for everything, and this includes the making of an object or a shape that appears, even when it seems to have no soul or life in the material world. It does not just come from ‘nothingness’ or some so-called chaotic or ‘hazardous’ forces as science suggests.”

Dr. Xien stopped for a few seconds. Then, undoubtedly under the impulse of a sudden inspiration, he continued talking, filled with feeling and sensitivity.

“Take the example of a human being. There is a cause, a starting source. After conception occurs, the embryo appears and then develops more. Follow the steps: birth, gradual growth, teaching, and parental care. Those who conceived and gave birth to the child are still a source of inspiration and development as a moral and emotional center. The intention and life knowledge that is planted by the parents inside of the child remains and develops gradually. The initial information is kept within the child like an unseen but always present source. It is the heritage of the parent transferred to the child.”

Seeing that I did not succeed in fully understanding what he wanted to say, Dr. Xien offered me another example.

“Consider that a sculpted statue is a real work of art by reason of the refinement and beauty it was created with. It is in a state of perfection you can almost see, even if the constituent matter it was created with is amorphic.”

Having a vague impression that Dr. Xien was making an allusion to my daydreaming in the direction of the mysterious Shin Li, I became more attentive.

“Do not let yourself be guided by the concepts that others have wanted you to believe in in terms of beauty and harmony because they taught you in a certain way that was based upon their own perception which, in turn, is subject to their level of ignorance. You have to perceive the shape and exterior features of an object like a marble structure just as much as you pay attention to that which is generating it. Although the physical characteristics might be unidentifiable, it is filled with the spirit of its creator. He is the source, impregnating the work with the breath of life and his magnetic energy; and you can almost see this magnetism even after thousands of years. A prime example is the statue of Aphrodite and its creator, Fidous.”

Finally, I was no longer having doubts about Dr. Xien’s ironic strategy. My eyes stared above the table without saying anything.

So subtly would he combine esoteric aspects and precious teaching with his fine humor and the clear perception of what is happening around him. In the presence of such beings, you feel somehow naked, as if you cannot hide anything from them. What is interesting, however, is that you do not even want to hide things from them. The tendencies are contrary . On the one hand is the egotistical process of hiding yourself. On the other hand is the superior intuition of evolution and the correct understanding of what you actually are. Long ago, I adopted the second way which, by the way, Cezar has been an eminent proponent of. Now, Dr. Xien and Shin Li were looking to prepare me for another meaningful jump in my evolution.

The subject presented was very interesting, but I intervened, wishing to clarify a specific aspect. In the cases of both a sculpture and a human being, we have a consciousness and even a visible source of that which created them. But, I did not see what the source would be in the case of a planet. Where is it? As you can see, that could be a problem. The answer was shocking, even if Dr. Xien expressed it without blinking.

“The source is in the center of the planet. That is the beginning of that which forms and maintains the core. In a way, scientists feel something about this, but their mistake is that they want to solve the problem only from the viewpoint of the material aspect. These are the fundamental limitations of scientific thinking and knowledge on the Earth right now. It is a blockage because, for now, science does not conceive of a superior level than material reality. It is all attributable to some rusty materialistic concepts. Not even quantum physics has been able to break through such conceptual numbness.

“How would you explain to scientists that most of their thinking fabric is faulty with regard to the way they conceive matter as well as the entire universe? An unacademic mind with no diplomas or honorific titles could understand aspects of the world’s structure and its manifest nature. The scientific intelligence blocked in dogmas and prejudices is meaningless when compared to spiritual and esoteric knowledge in the real sense of intellectual flexibility. Then, quite naturally, comes the wisdom derived from the direct experience of different levels of reality.

“Not all,” I replied quickly. “Cezar has already spoken to me about their subtle structure, about the way they should be looked at and understood as living beings because, in the end, that is what they really are: big souls manifesting. But, in our discussions, he has not detailed their inner structure or core.

“Yes, there is a stage based upon levels of manifestation. A human being is on a certain level. A planet or a star is on another evolutionary level. The thing they have in common, the human as much as the planet, is their tendency towards evolution no matter what shape or place they have in this dimensional scale. So what is the function of the core of a planet? What is it actually? It is the heart of the planet. Its purpose for living, just as in the case of a human, cannot function without a heart. It is the center of your being but the subtle fundamental is the soul. Let us say that a doctor's hand could touch a patient's heart, but he cannot touch their soul because it is a subtle reality superior to that of the heart. It is, however, his being, just on a higher level of understanding closer to the universal source. It is the very same in the case of the nucleus of a planet which is the center of its subtle being. Just as it is with your heart having the capacity to be in touch with the supreme reality throughout which you can touch infinity. That is the nature of the nucleus of a planet which contains a reality offering the same type of fulfillment and amazing evolution for the being that the planet is. The difference here is that things are not what contemporary science imagines them to be."

"But, what is it? If I were to go from the surface to the interior of the planet, further and further, what would I see?"

"It would be like a spiritual journey on an evolutionary road. On any planet, no matter its evolutionary level on the surface, if you were to be able to go inside, you would discover that the reality on the inside is much more evolved. You cannot go to the center of a planet just by traveling at the material level. Even if you look at things symbolically, they have meaning. It is like coming back home, a returning to the source which is the spiritual core. It is always the center, the source, the discontinuous spot generating all the rest. Apparently, it is nothing; but still, it represents everything for the planet. You are then closer to the essence of that planet.

SIMULATION: TRAVELING TO THE CORE OF THE PLANET

I felt my entire being filled with interest and impatience because what I was finding out had an enigmatic response in my soul, impelling me to find out more information in a more detailed way. It was the sweetness of an effervescent intuition telling me that all the information was not given to me by accident and that I was ready to live such an experience soon. Indeed, it happened faster than I would have expected it to. Still, I will return to Dr. Xien's essential explanations. I proposed a unique situation.

"Let us assume that the technological conditions are accomplished in order to dig a tunnel large enough to send a capsule with a human crew. Let us say that the angles of descending are adjusted so that the travel occurs under normal conditions. The tunnel follows this direction throughout the center of the Earth. What would the scientists and crew encounter? ”

“For a while, they would see solid matter, earth, rocks, then lava. Let’s say they would have the means to pass through the lava. Here, things become more complicated. It is like when you go to the sun by space ship. In order to resist, it is necessary to have a ship equipped with a very strong magnetic field so that you can get closer to the star without getting crushed by the very strong forces and radiation emitted. Also, let’s say that on her way to the center of the Earth, the crew of the ship has everything necessary to break through the massive bed of lava and to resist the energetic field it emits. The members of the crew would then begin to cross that lava deposit, but the further they go, the more they will have to protect themselves in order to resist the pressure, the temperature and the massive radiation. Technologically speaking, they would have to create such an intense magnetic field that they would actually transform themselves, including their biological matter, all of this resulting in a very changed perception.”

“What do you mean?” I asked, a little puzzled.

“It is as if you have taken a man from 1600 and put him to work on a computer. In order for you to do so, you have to start teaching him how, but in that moment that he will know how to work the computer, he will then have reached an advanced knowledge level than the one that his original world has. His understanding has changed, and this inevitably facilitates major changes in his biological body.

“We will now speak very precisely, but in the example with the ship traveling inside the Earth, a point where the necessity of having a very advanced technology will reach such a magnitude that the effect of the technology upon a person undergoing such travel completely transforms the way that he or she thinks.”

“All right. But what actually happens when this personal evolution of each member of the crew takes place?” I asked.

My curiosity was legitimate , but I felt I already had the answer. By then, I figured that traveling to the center of the planet no longer had a quantitative aspect but rather a qualitative one; but I wanted to know how the material elements would combine with the subtle ones. How would the surrounding reality appear? What kind of perceptions would be generated?

Dr. Xien patiently explained the phenomena that would be taking place. The members of the crew are adapting to another energetic resonance frequency, and if this happens, they will then pass beyond this one. By that, I am referring to a plane or dimension vibrating with a superior frequency to the material plane. Their entrance to such a world does not happen because they crossed the lava deposit but because they have managed to break the condensation limits specific to the physical matter encountered up to that time, that is, the sediments, rocks, and lava. This way, they break through the vibrational frequency of that type of condensed energy that the matter we know represents. Pragmatically, they entered a new reality superior to material reality. They then enter into the etheric plane.”

I was astonished and totally confused, but the conclusion was clear.

“It means that every time someone goes to the material center of the Earth, he will actually never get there because he will first reach the etheric plane, entering a realm superior to the material dimension.”

“Yes, you understand. Advancing to the center of the planet in a material reference frame is conditioned by the necessity of personal evolution with regard to vibrational frequency because the intensity of the magnetic field grows very much. All along the way, the nearer and nearer a human being comes to the center of the earth, the individual mandatorily evolves. Otherwise, he just cannot go further on. He cannot break the restrictions corresponding to the vibrational frequency of the material plane from which the journey began.

THE INNER EARTH AND THE EVOLUTION OF CONSCIOUSNESS

After a short break, Dr. Xien looked me straight in the eyes, and in an even and detached voice said, “As opposed to the way scientists now conceive it, the universal laws of manifestation do not necessitate a literal geometric point of reference.”

This was one of the strangest statements that I had ever heard, but I had already begun to guess the meaning of it. In order to clarify in my own mind as much as possible this new idea of the planet's internal structure, I decided to take advantage of the fact that Shin Li had left the room and ask a series of short questions. I did not want Shin Li to believe that I could not understand the explanations already given to me. So, I quickly addressed Dr. Xien.

“Maybe it was a bit too fast, shifting paradigms from materialism to the subtle planes. I think I pretty well feel the background of it, but I would like to clarify once again the precise position. Let's take it all over again. I want to know what happens if you go to the center of the Earth in a capsule without any advanced technology. For example, I am here on the physical plane of Earth and start a journey to the planet's nucleus with a machine that resists very high temperature. I plan to reach the exact center of the planet no matter what I find there. What happens on the way?”

“At a certain point, you would start losing your mind. You will no longer understand anything.”

I opened my eyes wider due to the amazement of what he said.

“For what reason? Just because its environment and its frequency of vibration changes?”

“I told you before, and now I am repeating. You start here at the surface. The first part of the journey is going to be easy, crossing successive deposits of ground, rock, lava and other substances. In this instance, you are in the material level. There is heavy matter with a vibration similar to what your body has and your mind is thinking in terms of the laws of classical physics. Let's say that, after some kilometers, you would see the difference between solid and liquid matter and you want to go further on, but at one point you will stop because you will no longer be able to go if your vibrational consciousness level remains the same. You have reached the limits of the fundamental material world and what we know as day to day experience. You can perceive only so far. You can resist only so far. Beyond this zone or barrier of vibrational frequency, you will feel you cannot take it anymore, and if you insist, you will become unconscious. That reality you have reached no longer corresponds to your conscious vibrational level but has a higher one. You then no longer have the capacity to understand what is going on there. You cannot make connections. You would be like an Eskimo seeing a snake or seeing a tree growing on the moon. In both cases, your usual mental understanding is overwhelmed, confused and very probably shocked.”

“These examples are meant just for you to have a comparable analogy to bridge your understanding. In reality, if you would travel in this particular condition, you couldn’t take it after a certain moment, but this applies not only to you. The capsule itself and all the equipment in it will become stuck. Your capacity of seeing and understanding also becomes stuck. Everything is then blocked between the material reality from which you originated and this new reality that you have reached. There is a difference in vibrational frequency and your capsule’s technology no longer resonates with this new frequency.

In order to further clarify this matter, I asked, “Is it an issue of personal adaptability and suitability or is it a state of consciousness?”

“One serves the other as much as the capsule’s technology and your consciousness are at a certain vibrational level that is inferior to the frequency occurring by reason of getting closer to the center of the planet. At that point, you either have the real capacity of higher understanding and resonate to these high energy frequencies or you simply lose your consciousness because your mind cannot process the sensations and information it receives.

“In the end, the center is reached, but this represents another world entirely that has gradually manifested long before through the etheric plane as well as the more and more elevated subtle planes of existence. The vibrational frequency from the body to the mind has evolved. It is an automatic process, but still, it respects certain conditions. It is required that a person has a certain psychological or mental training and internal knowledge. Otherwise, the transformations are too strong to resist the accelerated evolution that occurs while going to the planet’s interior.”

watched Dr. Xien very keenly for several seconds. This idea had been pursuing me for a while, and I was very curious to find out the answer. I continued with my questions, offering an example of how this might play out in an actual situation.

“Let’s say that there is a mission command center on the earth’s surface with a crew monitoring what is going on in a capsule penetrating the Earth’s center. This crew has no reason to be subjected to fainting as it has remained on the surface. What would they see in front of the monitors? At a certain point, they will no longer see anything on their screens.”

Dr. Xien was silent for a moment, looking at the ground. He then continued with his uniform voice.

“I can see that you haven’t fully understood. Have you already forgotten that the entirety of the technology in the capsule and all that is connected to it stops due to the incompatibility of the vibrational frequencies? Nothing is sent or received because the machines can no longer work together as you start to get closer to the center of the planet. The frequencies you meet there are much higher than those in which the actual technology was conceived. There are no longer coherent connections between the electronic components.”

“If the frequency rises so much, then what happens with the solid matter inside the Earth?” I asked, continuing with my persistent questioning. Dr. Xien smiled gently, just as he would always do every time he had the chance to appreciate a fine observation. I could somehow breathe more easily, telling myself that after having taken a cold shower, I was now taking a warm one and could get back to the discussion.

Even though what had been explained to me was not that difficult to understand, I was combating a lot of my own mental resistance concerning materialistic thinking and the deeply imbedded thought programming that surrounds the dense matter of the physical plane. Although most of what Dr. Xien presented was clear to me, I still wanted to have a more detailed understanding. At that time, however, I had no idea that what he was saying was such an important turning point in our discussion, and his ensuing explanations would amaze me. Up to now, I had reacted as if his information was akin to more of a mere novelty, as if the analysis offered was similar enough to the schematic of the material plane as we know it but in the context of also offering some possibilities. But now Dr. Xien wanted to go to a deeper level of explanations. From his first words, I recognized that I had to change my own mental register in order to carry on with the discussion.

“You go beyond the crust,” he answered, “and after reaching the mantle or where it begins, we just approximate what is there as well as what is further towards the center.”

“What kind of approximation?” I asked, interested.

Dr. Xien answered me, looking me in the eye.

“Mainly from that zone beyond where there is no more physical matter. From that level on, because of the increasing frequency of vibration, you already are in the subtle planes. You enter the etheric plane, then the astral plane and then you get to the causal plane surrounding the center of the planet. It is a structure of manifestation that can be found in any celestial body but also in the human body. Inside yourself, everything is perfectly structured with a sequence of higher and higher vibrational frequencies, starting from the material body to the subtle causal body and eventually to the center of your being, the heart, and that is the essence. In her own way, the planet is also a being. It is the same type of matter and conscious organization, just that you are a human being and she is a planet.

“This is the principle of correspondence which traditional spirituality talks about. As above, so below. With this principle, you can view everything as miraculous. What exists down here is like what it is up there. What is down or below refers to that which is small, the microcosm. What is above or up refers to that which is big such as a galaxy or the macrocosm.

“At any scale of manifestation , the structural principle is the same. If you understand this, you also understand what happens when someone travels to the Earth’s center. After the material field of the planet, you get closer to and start getting into its subtle fields. I am referring to the etheric plane, astral plane and so on. But, you will only go as far as your own vibrational level of consciousness will be able to fulfill the resonant conditions. If there is something higher than your own individual conscious vibrational frequency, you cannot see it. You cannot understand it and go into it.”

THE SINGULARITY IN THE CENTER OF THE PLANET

“Things are clearer now, but this being said, what is it that is right in the center of the planet?. I understand there is no solid matter nor any iron ball nor other material structures with the characteristics of friction. What is there? There must be something, isn’t there? What is that source?”

Dr. Xien remained silent for a while, measuring his words. I felt that he was interested that I take in all the information correctly. If not, it could possibly cause certain concerns or delays in his plans. I could not help but notice this, but I was not concerned because I felt I could pretty well absorb all of the explanations he offered. In a certain way, I felt this was really about an important revelation; but still, I would not have expected it to be what he said it was.

“In the middle of the Earth, there is a black hole.”

We were both silent again, longer now, but for different reasons. I was looking to organize my thinking and scientific ideas in order to correctly absorb these explanations so as not to sound ridiculous or appear vulnerable to mocking. On the other hand, Dr. Xien was relaxed and waiting, looking like he wanted me to take the time needed to digest the information and to prepare my questions. I decided not to hurry. That is why I asked for a certain tolerance regarding my recurring questions. Besides, I wanted some more time to adapt to this new level of discussion.

“I feel like we should take it as slowly and as precisely as possible. I want to clarify things in order to be sure that I have tied up all the loose ends before going further.”

“Go ahead and ask me,” said Dr. Xien.

I hurried up in order to avoid any surprises or changes in his direction. Digging deeper into the subject, I responded.

“I understand about the vibrational frequency rising, but exactly how does consciousness cross into the subtle etheric plane?”

Dr. Xien bent over the table and broke off a piece of paper. While drawing, he gave me explanations, keeping the same equal but almost hypnotic voice.

“Here comes another surprise. Scientists have already obtained information demonstrating that there is a huge ocean of water beyond the Earth’s crust that separates the material consistency of the physical world from the subtle one, following from there to the center. They have, of course, asked themselves, ‘Where does this huge amount of water come from?’ and ‘Was it from the impact of our planet with comets or asteroids from outer space?’ I know this is the accepted theory even though there is nothing certain about it. To a small degree, the water of our planet has also come from comets hitting it; but in reality, the extant water — and this applies to the oceans on the surface just as much as the huge internal ocean — mostly comes from the black hole that exists in the center.”

Perplexed, I just stood there.

“This is the cherry on top of the cake!” I finally said. “I don’t know who will be able to swirl it.”

“Those who feel that this is the truth and also those who have already experienced the planet’s interior. Some of them have seen the central sun which is the black hole itself. Here is insipid intelligence where diplomas or academic honors mean nothing compared to real knowledge and direct experience. These things can be verified by those reaching a certain spiritual level of knowledge or even through very advanced technological means.”

THE INTERNAL STRUCTURE OF THE EARTH AS IT REALLY IS “Still,” I replied, “the notion of a black hole in the center of the Earth is already very hard to accept, not to mention that the water in the in-between

Dr. Xien continued, patiently explaining.

“Your indignation is due to not knowing, but listen carefully to me now and cast away the prejudices. These sorts of things overcome the actual materialism of science. They are esoteric. You cannot judge them through formulas nor other observations as scientists would like. Moreover, they are connected to other types of sciences that are discredited nowadays just as alchemy has been. While such do not talk of the huge ocean of water inside the Earth, there are clues given regarding radical humidity and how elements, metals and minerals are thereby formed. Almost all sources indicate the fact that, at the beginning, everything started from water, humidity. This is a great mystery with both metaphysical and scientific connotations. More and more, scientists are admitting that life actually began in the planet’s oceans. Do you think, however, that anyone would be inclined to admit that we are expanding from a black hole; and more, that this makes water and water forms a very big ocean inside the planet?”

I quickly made a correlation.

“In the Bible, it is said that we were created out of clay, but after all, the clay is a mixture of water and earth. If we look from the perspective of primordial elements, this is exactly what you can find in the planet’s interior; an ocean of water and the solid matter of the crust. The expression is obviously metaphorical, but I believe there is a core of real consistency.”

“You would be surprised to find out how literal this expression is. It is not metaphorical at all. Water, created by the dynamic of black holes, does exist in cosmic space. Better said, the process to create water begins with a condensation of subtle water from the etheric plane through the dynamic rotation of a black hole. In the material plane, this condensation appears like an expulsion from the black hole’s vortex and, right next to it, water is manifested in the shape of ice. So, water exists in cosmic space and in huge amounts. Even astrophysicists have noticed it, having a big surprise when they do. You cannot, however, expect for it be like ‘potable water’ because it has some special properties. It is, however, water. You will find the same process inside the Earth. The water is condensed beyond the dynamic of the black hole that emanates from the center of the planet. It’s amazing. I know this is contrary to typical scientific notions and dogma; and while everything seems to be so phantasmagorical, it is obvious and simple enough if you make an effort to overcome the initial shock. Then, you should no longer be surprised over the prospect of a black hole residing in the center of the Earth. Any structure, no matter how big or small, is based upon the same fundamental principle. There is a black hole vortex in the center, and this is a principle of creation just as is the principle of absorption applies at the end of its existence. Any galaxy has at its center a black hole. Any atom has in its nucleus a tiny black hole that ensures its existence and manifestation of evolution. Don't guide yourself under the contemporary scientific paradigm. The way it sees the world is still at a relatively modest level which is focused on either the quantifiable universe or the microcosmic aspect because it is limited to a purely materialistic understanding of things."

"I think that man's general reaction to such aspects is to deny them by reason of his own prejudices, and there is then further resistance because of scientific dogmas," I said.

"Yes. This seems to be the reaction in most cases, but as I've already told you, this is not important to us. If a person doesn't make any effort to overcome themselves in order to intuitively understand these realities, how would you expect them to react positively? From what resources?"

"I don't know, but I still find the information confusing. Who would be willing to believe that, in the interstellar vacuum of space, there is water coming from the cosmic black holes? But first, how could a black hole produce water? As far as I know, a black hole only absorbs matter — it does not create it."

Dr. Xien stood up from his chair.

"You lose yourself in so-called scientific considerations. Until recently, it was considered that nothing could escape from the gravity of a black hole. Recently, a hypothesis was acknowledged that something could be released from a black hole. You have seen how many times science makes a determination. Then, after a while, everything is modified with an admission that they were wrong. It is irrelevant to bring up formulas, equations and scientific concepts as long as the general view of contemporary science is fundamentally flawed. Although we are in the 21st Century, there are still plenty of people still believing that elementary particles are colliding like material balls, and this is just a minor example. This, however, is not the time and place to speak about such things. I will later explain to you some of the very important elements in this field. You will first need to study other elements by yourself in conjunction with your own experiences with advanced technology.”

I raised my eyebrows. I could not understand what he meant.

“When, where, how?” I asked.

“Be patient. You have already seen a lot of things, and you have already had a lot of special experiences, but still, you keep a dose of mental backstroke.”

There was obviously a misunderstanding in our communication, but we no longer said a word. I was very interested to find out about the Earth’s interior. I was imagining that it would be a relatively easy journey like the one to the occult room in Egypt, but as Cezar said, things were looking to be much more complicated.

WATER AND THE REAL WAY PLANETS ARE FORMED

I continued with the subject, accentuating the most sensitive point.

“No matter how tolerant I might be with regard to a scientific point of view, it is very hard for me to conceive that water exists in huge amounts in the cosmic vacuum and that, as you mentioned before, it springs from the black hole’s dynamic.”

“The process is not so complicated,” said Dr. Xien. “The space-time reality is very distorted near a black hole which means that there is a passing to another dimension or manifestation corridor. Liquid water as you know it is just the material expression of a specific subtle energy which is indeed the subtle element named water. There are special energetic conditions surrounding a black hole where, under certain circumstances, the subtle water from the etheric plane is condensed into liquid water in the material plane. There already are clear observations regarding this.”

“But how is this explanation connected to the water inside the planet?” Dr. Xien made a gesture telling me to be patient.

“From the initial phases of what is to become a future planet, there is only the vortex of a black hole serving as a forming nucleus. The water is condensed and expelled into the cosmos in the shape of ice and it arrives mixed with other types of matter and cosmic dust. This belt of matter forms stars to gravitate towards the black hole; and by getting closer, it forms a sort of plug around the vortex. But some of these ice and matter objects escape and they start traveling through cosmic space. This is the case of comets for example. The rest of the matter and ice belt comes back to the vortex of the black hole and conglomerates in a crust from which the planet is forming. The crust somehow blocks the center of the black hole’s activity just as a plug blocks the spiral flow of water in a kitchen sink. Or, if you wish, it is like when you build an arch and the last stone or keystone in the top of the arch holds all the rest in balance and keeps the entire structure from falling to the ground.”

Amazed, I listened to this explanation but could not understand what to believe. Was I finding out about an actual process or was I smelling fantasy-like science fiction?

Sincerely, I shared my thoughts with Dr. Xien.

“Maybe even Galileo would have thought like you if someone had explained the theory of relativity to him at that time. Many times, science has assumed the supremacy of knowledge thus far obtained, and each time it has had to admit to the fact that new elements always appear revealing that there are evolutionary stages of development.”

“But is that crust enough to ensure the conditions of life on a planet?” I asked, willing to go further to find out new information.

“Things do not happen as accidentally as scientists believe. The so-called spontaneity of creation is more like the fruit of necessity. Elements combine, starting from the destiny of that manifesting soul that the planet is to the distinctiveness of the cosmic region where it exists. In the meanwhile, an interior habitat is being formed following its evolution and having in its center the black hole. They all reach a balance because of the conscious activity of the central black hole: matter, water, lava and all the rest.

“Is this singularity also conscious?” I asked, astounded.

“Of course. It is an evolved spirit taking care of what it created, but we are not discussing this now.”

“So, the central black hole regulates proportions. Does it also adjust the elements on the surface?” I continued, accentuating the most sensitive point. “In time, the exterior of the planet is also created, and there is a habitat. The temperature can increase and create a favorable atmosphere to maintain material life, but this is not mandatory. It is always a balance of forces and influences between the exterior and the interior, marked by the specific destiny of that celestial body. That is why we meet an extraordinary variety of possibilities and manifestations. We are talking here of planets, natural satellites, asteroids, comets or other celestial bodies. In the case of the stars, the process is similar, but the central black hole is much bigger so the temperature and pressure conditions determine other manifestations of the elements from the subtle plane. In this case, the dominant subtle element of manifestation is fire, and this is why the stars light up and become the main support center sustaining the planetary system in the material plane.

“Stars have another mission compared with that of planets. Does the water not interfere in these cases? Only in the first phase of creation does there exist a transformation to the fire element when the star then lights up; but what I want to underline is the fact that in the case of our planet, almost all of the existing water comes from the central black hole inside the planet. Keep in mind that most of the water comes from the so-called interior of the planet. The interior planetary ocean, which has also been identified by scientists, contains water created in the way already described. Moreover, there are many other water sources at different depths and in different zones inside the Earth. These include lakes or even seas.”

“What you have said is contrary to everything that is known about cosmic genesis; and also about everything that is known about the way in which a black hole works,” I said with a certain concern.

“Don’t worry about it. For now, just observe that your answers are from the modern sciences and that its thinking and conceiving of the surrounding environment and universe are still materialistic. It is really tiresome to see so much limitation and sometimes even stupidity in some people pretending to be intelligent for having reached certain academic levels. Science does not even understand the nature of a vacuum. It does not conclude what consciousness really is. How could it therefore understand the mystery of the nature of a black hole’s action or behavior? When it comes to the universe or any other aspect of creation, it is as if you are talking to a three-year-old child about differential equations and quantum mechanics. No matter how you tell him about these things or even about a beauty contest, he will only show you what he knows and that’s grabbing the shovel he uses to play with in the sand.”

I definitely understood that the up-to-date notions of science cannot penetrate the meaning of such revelations.

“But still, how does water appear from black holes?” I asked. “I don’t need to see equations but rather hear the natural explanations.”

“I told you that it is a phenomena of conversion that can be understood as a condensation from the subtle plane to the physical material plane. The converter is the central black hole of the planet. The water is pushed out in different historical stages of the planet and in different amounts. At the beginning, it is pushed out as ice in the cosmos where it combines with cosmic dust and other material elements. After the crust is made around the central black hole, the water created in the black hole supplies the interior ocean. Then, through breaks in the crust, it supplies the oceans and seas on the surface.”

A PARALLEL WITH MODERN SCIENCE

Obviously, Dr. Xien’s observations have little to do with the accretion theory of astrophysics where planets are formed over a long period of time through the collision and gathering together of many boulders made out of rocks and ores. Still, there are also other theories besides the accretion theory which answer people's wishes to discover certain questions and realities from the surrounding universe. Unhappily, they look for answers according to the extant knowledge of a limited conceptual level. If something contrary to these ideas is said, the theory is considered to be either an impossibility or just nonsense. Just as Dr. Xien emphasizes in a following discussion, one of the main causes of such failed thinking is that they do not pay enough attention to the concept of a fifth element in the universe, something which they consider to be more of a philosophical theory with nuances of fantasy rather than something truly real. On the other hand, scientists do not consider anything else other than the phenomena taking place in the material plane of cosmic space, forgetting or not realizing at all that such does not represent anything else other than the ultimate manifestation of superior energies and influences. It is at this point that black holes come into the discussion in regards to what exactly they represent and what they really manifest. To a certain extent, calculations and equations can describe a material manifestation of the phenomena surrounding a black hole. For example, the crust and mantle of the Earth are formed through accretion because the accretion manifesting around the black hole in the center of the planet is, in a certain way, similar to an accretion disc surrounding a cosmic black hole sucking the plasmatic matter of a star, cosmic dust, particles, stones, or boulders of different sizes, as long as they remain at an appropriate distance.

The next information I then received from Dr. Xien was like a thunderbolt to the ideas I already had regarding these matters. It was a pretty fast meltdown of the prejudices I have had. Still, there was something missing for me. I tried to justify myself in a certain way. It is hard to overcome the materialistic ideology of today. I confess that it is also difficult for me to accept the idea of black holes emitting water in order to form stars and liquid planets, just as which happens with some protostars and protoplanets. And, even though I have had the opportunity to see extraordinary things and convince myself of many of the amazing aspects I have already stated, I still found it difficult. Even after having had the process patiently explained to me, it is still hard for me to understand how water could spring out of a black hole and stay at the base of a forming planet. It was as if I could not get rid of this question.

“It is not as difficult to understand as it seems to you,” Dr. Xien answered with amiability. “You’ll have a reference point if you consider that the composition of comets contains a lot of ice, meaning water. All astrophysicists have a certain origination point in mind for comets but always beginning from a certain stage and a certain area in the cosmos. But, for example, where did the comet take that ice from? Or how did the ice appear as subtle water in the cosmic vacuum? The accretion theory does not stand, and they know this very well because it does not explain the formation of the gaseous planets. You cannot say that telluric planets are formed in a different way than the gaseous ones, but if you consider what I have already explained about ice being pushed out in the initial phases of a protoplanet from the central black hole and what follows afterward, you can then understand the origin of comets more easily.”

“Then,” I asked spontaneously, “what is missing from the actual science in order to understand these things? Is it only the fact that it does not apply to the theory of the elements?”

“That is just a particular case. Generally speaking, contemporary scientists have a materialistic set of antique or beat up principles and conceptions systemically opposed to a wide understanding of the universe. Only a few have begun to have a holographic vision of how creation functions. Most of them still do not have the power of understanding right now because scientists’ minds are limited to a frame of reference of space-time events belonging to the material plane.

This was the first discussion I had with Dr. Xien about the interior of the Earth. I almost did not sleep at all the following night, analyzing again and again what I had just learned. I did not believe that the subject of the interior of our planet could be so complex, and I was starting to have a more consistent amazement of the condition of things, realizing how insignificant as beings we apparently are. In comparison to the big mysteries of the universe, we, at the same time, have access to these mysteries if we know how to develop our inner capacities and if we understand correctly the things.

I could not wait for the dawn of a new day to come so I could meet with Cezar and we could debate these new elements revealed by Dr. Xien. Moreover, we had already established our travel to the Bucegi complex to prepare for an expedition. Wanting to make the best use of the available time, I took advantage of the situation by continuing to talk about this subject.

HOW TO GET INSIDE THE INTERIOR OF THE EARTH

After planning some technical and executive details inside the base, I left with Cezar to Bucegi. We preferred to travel by car in order to have a free discussion. As Cezar loves to drive, he does so any time he has the opportunity.

With a lot of enthusiasm, I shared a synthesis of what I had learned from Dr. Xien and expressed my hope that my knowledge level would allow me to successfully realize these matters during our upcoming journey. Cezar dismissed my possible doubts.

“Things are already set,” he said. “The journey is all set up. I can even tell you that we are awaited, and for this first journey, there will be no problems.” I was silent for a few seconds before asking doubtfully, “What do you mean by ‘this first journey?’ Will there be more expeditions?”

Cezar approved, nodding his head.

“There are many access levels inside the Earth, and your accommodation is necessary. The internal structure of the planet is very complex, and if what you found out from Dr. Xien amazed you, prepare yourself for what is coming. The interior walls are diverse and surprising.”

Filled with mystery and projected out of the daily reality of the regular man, I enjoyed the state or condition of anticipation. Even though it was pretty common to have such an expedition within Department Zero, there were still special moments like this one, of preparing for a new expedition where your inner sensations and perceptions would amplify.

I rapidly opened up a discussion with Cezar, intending to clarify an older question I had about getting into the empty interior of the Earth.

“I understood that not everyone can get inside of the planet, especially at greater depths, but what about the location used to get inside. Is it important? Has it got any specificity? For example, does the Second Tunnel respect any rule in this regard?”

While asking, I looked at a clearly focused Cezar who was emitting an enormous self-confidence and energy of honesty. In my opinion, he is one of the few human beings capable of understanding such complex situations at their true value, even if such complications and confluences are completely random and whether or not they are connected to the material world or the spiritual world. He answered me in the direct and simple way that I have known very well for almost twenty years.

“The easiest way to get inside of a celestial body is by following the lines of its magnetic field. It is the very same in the case of the Earth. If you follow the magnetic field lines on the upper side, you will gradually get through the subtle planes — the etheric, astral, mental and causal — to the center. If you want to go directly by chance, then you go through the crust; but then, at a certain moment, you stop because you no longer have the capacity of understanding what is happening there and you lose your consciousness. Everything stops. As Dr. Xien also told you, ‘Machines, technology, and mental processes: you either have the real capacity of getting in and then going further — meaning your being is ready for that vibrational jump — or you stop there where you can even become crazy’. So, up there at the poles, it is easier to get inside.”

Continuing to think about these matters, I then wanted to implement the same technique I used on Dr. Xien with Cezar.

“Let’s say that someone could pass into the planet with no problems on this magnetic line. What would he see then? Landscapes changing?”

“The thickness of the crust and some parts of the mantle are materially crossed; but then, there is no more physical matter because you are entering the subtle dimensions — the subtle, astral and so on.”

“But, scientists give a pretty clear structure of the planet. Are they so wrong in the theory they present?”

I was not attempting to cross-check Cezar by asking him pretty much the same things I had asked Dr. Xien, but I was eager to assimilate more of these matters by looking at it from many different points of view.

“It is just their approximation based upon extrapolation and direct observations, but there are also other realities. You will be convinced by yourself,” Cezar assured me.

I was excited in anticipation for these moments and wished to find out more about our imminent travel, so I asked him, “Does the passing to the subtle planes take place all of a sudden?”

Before he would give me an answer, Cezar took a short break. I was watching him trying to carefully choose his words in order to make me better understand.

“No, it is not done suddenly. If you adhere to a certain continuity in movement, physical matter starts to become somehow lighter, then a plasma- like condition manifests which is an even more rarefied condition. You then emerge totally into the subtle planes where matter is actually energy materializing on different vibrational frequencies conditionally based upon the dimension or plane of manifestation you have reached. You cannot, however, move further beyond the zone from which you are energetically prepared. The subtle field there acts in a sort of elastic way. If a rough energy comes to it, this rebounds elastically, meaning that it cannot get in there because it is not recognized by the vibrational frequency.”

I remained quiet for a while, trying to assimilate this information.

“So, you cannot make use of force?”

“No, you will lose your consciousness if you do, or you are simply rejected.

If someone were to have an adequate mechanism and start digging like crazy directly to the center of the Earth, at a certain point, the device would simply stop. It could not work because its vibrational frequency originated out of the technology and constituent material and would no longer correspond to the internal layer that it has reached. You go as far as the frequency of your individual consciousness allows you to . This principle is valid as much for beings as for any objects made out of anthropomorphic matter .”

THE WAY OF ENTERING THE INNER EARTH BY FOLLOWING ITS MAGNETIC LINES

“I understand this, but still, I cannot imagine how such a device could be blocked from advancing.”

Cezar thought for a little while; then offered me an expressive example.

“It is exactly like a space craft entering the atmosphere. If it comes in at too sharp an approach angle with a lot of energy, it will be consumed because of the intense friction. If the angle is too wide, then the gravity will reject it and the ship will bounce off the planet’s atmosphere, but under a certain angle and direction, it can penetrate the atmosphere safely and reach the surface of the planet. This rule is primarily the same for entering the inside of the Earth where you can go through subtle dimensions, entering via the lines of the magnetic field, first on the etheric plane, then entering more and more subtle planes to the center. This, of course, depends upon the individual’s level of consciousness being adapted to such a journey.”

I interrupted Cezar, wanting a clarification.

“I know that man’s subtle bodies cover the physical body, the last and most refined one being the causal body on the exterior, but from what I’ve discovered from Dr. Xien and yourself, it is not the same in the case of the planet.”

“The human subtle bodies are presented as covering the physical body, and they extend more and more to the exterior, from the etheric to the causal body. Still, this extension is not only in one direction because the material body is also impregnated with the other subtle bodies inside. In the case of the Earth or another planet, things are just the same. Even if it is apparently reversed — in other words, that you start from the physical body and move to the center where the causal body resides — just the same, I can say that our planet also has an etheric body covering the physical body and that there is an astral body covering the etheric and so on. But, this is just a dimensional representation of the problem that the mind sets up in its need to understand the mechanism. The spiritual evolution of the human being, for example, is not designed to progress outward towards the exterior but rather in the direction of the interior of the being towards its spiritual core. From the perspective of the planet being an actual being, the fact that you can find the highest spiritual frequency in the spiritual center of the planet is perfectly justified. So, the problem is reversed but only in the mind's perspective which interprets it dimensionally, adding the ideas of inside and outside. That is why things seem to be opposed, but in reality, they are united."

I was now understanding the situation very well, and I thanked Cezar for his explanations.

CONCEPTUAL BARRIERS

For a while, we were quiet. Cezar was enjoying the driving and I was contemplating the notions I had learned during the last few hours. After several more minutes, we resumed our discussion on one of the sensitive points.

"I find it very interesting that this planetary forming process that Dr. Xien told me about doesn't have much to do with the current scientific conception of accretion theory."

Cezar nodded his head, approving.

"Interesting, isn't it? How far off the truth can they be with this, and how much can they struggle to restrict Mankind's consciousness by maintaining an antique and limited materialistic idea? In reality, all stars and planets either create themselves or are created starting with the black hole principle, but science understands phenomena only from the point of view by its obvious possibilities. Even their explanation of cosmic boulders colliding to form planets through accretion is obviously not enough. Still, it works out conceptually but only in the context of a very limited theoretical explanation. No matter how many errors, discrepancies or contradictory observations of this theory exist, they are stubborn in maintaining it, even if they figure out it could not work out."

"I wonder what makes them remain at this limited level of conceiving," I said, somewhat rhetorically.

I knew the answer, but still, I wanted to hear his opinion, too. I did not have to wait long.

“Hubris, arrogance and routine. The fact that some scientists obsessively beat up on thinking systems is absolutely materialistic. This stops them from having a wider vision of the universe. You can’t keep forever asking for or relying upon proof through measurements as long as the measurement devices and technology are modest and relatively limited. In these cases, you only get what you wish for — I mean, at least as much as the devices can offer. This process requires noting down the specific frequencies of the phenomena you seek to observe. Only then can you become aware of the existence of such through measurement devices, but you also have to increase your personal vibration and frequency in order to make effective changes in the technology. In this regard, scientific scrutiny also requires a change in thinking and behavior; and only then will one be able to perceive this phenomena or superior reality. The main barrier to the scientific process is conceiving of the world with a completely materialistic view.”

“Astrophysicists also conceived an outline for such a model when they created a theory of stars forming from stellar dust clouds as a result of gradually rotating matter, but they tried to solve everything from a materialistic point of view and ended up going backwards. Actually, this fundamental vortex first appears like a singularity manifesting a field of rotating forces that become more and more intense until the first outlines of physical matter appear, namely stardust; and then, after a while, water also appears.”

“There are a few voices in science now who assume that the main elements of matter; namely electrons, protons and neutrons; are formed inside the intense magnetic areas near some very fast rotating black holes. Other scientists consider that these elements appear from nothingness and then melt back to nothingness. I am referring to the cosmic vacuum. Actually, this vacuum is real and it exists even if its energy appears to be magic. Any small vortex existing in the cosmos represents a small black hole, and the energy of the vacuum is condensed and manifests through it like a thing filled, a sort of liquid vacuum similar to a liquid surface always swirling.”

“I somehow understand, but I doubt that modern scientists can even listen to such things. I also said as much to Dr. Xien.”

“I studied the problem because it was of interest to me. To your surprise, scientists have already discovered this truth, but they don’t understand what to do with it.* The fact that they are so stubborn in saying such things is not something natural in this universe. It’s their problem and not ours. In the same way, they imagine that all events are a circumstance of ‘coincidence,’ a smaller or a bigger instance of chaos from which life just ‘happens’ to manifest, creating a star, planets or whatever.”

* [From the Romanian editor] The author is probably referring to the Bose-Einstein capacitor which demonstrates a condition of matter different from the one’s we know in nature where atoms begin to correlate and act in unison when the temperature is very close to absolute zero.

I was amused because Cezar was using almost the same expressions as Dr. Xien, meaning that these teachings had deep roots inside of him, too.

“According to the conceptions of contemporary scientists, the only governing principles are the rules of the material universe as applied to a limited domain of reality. Variables always appear. There are always question marks. There are always unsolved mysteries, even if their laws say that a certain object, phenomena, or manifestation should not exist where it appears or in the shape it appears. You can’t build a building by using only the chisel and hammer because you risk its breakdown. You have no connecting elements. You do not know the essence of the project. In such cases, scientists should study documents, engage in research and be open to other wider possibilities in order to realize a meaningful conceptual jump. Up to now, it has not happened, but maybe there are chances that such will occur in the near future.”

ACCESS TO THE INSIDE VIA THE POLES: SUBTLETIES, LANDMARKS, CERTAINTIES

“I can’t see how they could do this unless they can conceive of the existence of a subtle dimension of manifestation superior to the vibrational frequency of matter,” I said. “They will have no access inside of the planet. They wouldn’t know how to get inside.”

“Indeed. People do not understand how the passing to the subtle dimension is done. They all imagine that the empty Earth should be like the inside of an empty coconut. Once again, this is due to the purely materialistic conceptions that they have about things. Look at those who have described getting to the inside of the world by boat. What do you think actually happened?”

“I know these sorts of stories too well and can also interpret them based upon what we have just discussed,” I said. “Floating near the Arctic center was an opportunity for them align with one of the magnetic and gravitational field lines leading inside.”

SCHEMATIC REPRESENTATION OF GETTING INSIDE THE PLANET FROM THE NORTH POLE

“Exactly. At the poles, it is easier to get in if there is a shared resonance between the frequency of the etheric plane and the individual’s frequency. It also depends upon the speed of the boat as it intersects with the magnetic and gravitational lines. If it fluctuates, you will miss entering the precise point where the magnetic lines of the poles are aligned with the gravitational field. The important thing is that the speed of the boat must be constant. You will not get inside at the equator because the magnetic field lines are perpendicular to the gravitational field and their influence does not produce this effect. Instead, biological diversity is encouraged at such a locale; but at the edge of the magnetic cone in the Arctic, right at the limit of the transition to the etheric plane towards the inside of the Earth, the magnetic field is strong and becomes aligned with the lines of the gravitational field. Their association and mutual influence is transmitted to the essence of the physical body which is strongly energized. Then, as you enter the magnetic cone, the intensity of the field gets lower but the vibrational frequency of the body’s atoms rises, allowing it to pass to the etheric plane along the magnetic field’s lines.”

“THE MAGNETIC CONE AND THE AREA OF ALIGNING THE GRAVITY TO THE MAGNETIC FIELD LINES”

“I got it. Let’s say that I am at the edge of the magnetic cone and I respect the given conditions. Do I then enter inside the earth?”

“You have three possibilities. If your direction is not toward the pole, then you continue along on the ocean floating above the entry zone. In this case, you remain on the material plane. You don’t understand what that area represents. You do not feel anything and you do not get inside the planet. If your direction is closer but not on the exact line going to the pole, you then enter a certain trance-like state in which you figure that something unusual has happened. You might even receive certain information, but that’s about it. It is just an internal experience. Physically, you crossed the access area with your boat but without getting inside the Earth. But, if your direction is toward the pole, there are a lot of chances to enter the etheric plane, and through it, the inside of the Earth. But for this, you need your individual frequency to be equal or near to the crossing frequency. In other words, if your consciousness and level of understanding is compatible with crossing — I mean pure and high enough — you can align yourself with the magnetic and gravitational fields and move into the next plane which is the etheric plane. In this way, you access what is called the Inner Earth.”

While Cezar explained all of this to me, I was preparing to mentally speak for myself with regard to such ideas. To make things clear, I drew a few sketches after coming back to the base. The illustration on the next page is the final version representing the three possibilities. But let us not forget that this is just a material drawing attempting to represent a subtle reality from one point of view. For example, the drawing suggests that when we get inside, we apparently turn around with the boat on the interior following the bending in the drawing. In reality, if someone were to have such an experience, they would feel neither bending nor such an upside down turnover. This is not because of the wide radius of curvature as some have tried to suggest but rather because, in reality, one has crossed through the entrance to the subtle etheric plane. Once there, one will not perceive the upside down turning but will just follow the magnetic and gravitational direction to the center to the Earth.

Water will also surround us. We will generally see the same sky, but before long, other elements will begin to appear, and we will know no reason for their presence in Arctic waters. Those who describe such experiences say they have entered inside the Earth, but they think this way because they continue believing that they are in the material plane. Actually, they have already entered another dimension, the etheric one corresponding to our planet in that area. Not knowing about such subtle reality, they try to associate this with what they already know on the material plane, and this is why they are feeling that they, in a certain way, have arrived in the empty interior of the planet.

THREE POTENTIAL OUTCOMES WHEN CROSSING THE POLAR ACCESS ZONE TO THE INNER EARTH

Cezar then explained something to me that might appear very strange and is also a primary factor causing people to misunderstand this phenomena. Shortly after reaching the etheric dimension of the Earth, if you look at the middle of the sky, you can see the central sun of the planet which is different than our sun in the sky in the material plane. In very rare cases, however, and for a short period of time under certain circumstances, you can see two suns. One is in the physical plane, the celestial body from cosmic space, and the other one is the sun from the etheric plane inside the planet. Soon, however, only the sun in the etheric plane remains because one is now traveling in a different realm, and this one has a less intense light and a smaller size.

“It is still not quite clear to me how the sun inside the Earth could represent the black hole at the center of the planet,” I said. “I am just about certain that there be an error in the presentation. It is either a singularity, an absorbing black hole, or a sun.”

I was apparently right. Inside, however, I was feeling that my thinking was somehow frail because of a “germ” of not-knowing.

“Neither Dr. Xien nor myself told you that there is a star in the middle of the planet,” Cezar answered. “What is seen there, like a sun, is actually the illuminating expression of the central black hole in the etheric plane.

Normally, you cannot see anything there because the vibrational frequency of the singularity is very high, overcoming the frequency of the physical spectrum.”

“Why then is there a sun making light?” I asked, surprised.

“Actually, it is the radiation of light emitted by the black hole, and the light appears out of the matter absorption process. What you see exactly with this phenomena is a transmutation of bright etheric radiation because you are already in the etheric plane at that point. It is called the interior sun because we are used to naming something that generates light in the sky as a sun. The central black hole that is referred to as the interior sun has its own magnetic and gravitational field. It has an angular speed of its own and these elements determine the rate of absorption of matter which occurs gradually but it does indeed happen. The interior sunlight is a bit weaker than the sun you see in the sky in the physical plane. That is why the interior sun is also named the smoky sun.”

I was quiet for a while, feeling almost dizzy from these explanations. I was looking to clarify this new precious knowledge out of the remains of either false or misunderstood information I had acquired up to that moment, courtesy of what contemporary science has provided and still does.

“Going from the physical plane to the etheric plane requires you to fulfill one more condition,” Cezar told me. “If you are ready internally, and if there is a resonance between the vibrational frequency of your consciousness and the vibrational frequency of the etheric plane, there is a communal range of frequencies between those two planes which you will have to cross past without losing your consciousness. You must remain perfectly aware during that short passing. Getting into the etheric plane does not happen all of a sudden but is a rather smooth and gradual transition. It continues for a reasonable amount of time. The more ready the being is, the less uncomfortable is the passing. The transition can still be felt, however, especially when something strange happens. Things seem to remain the same in the beginning, but they start to change as new elements enter the picture and become flagrant such as vegetation in the Arctic, warm wind, warmer water, a new sun, and new animals as never seen before.”

“And this is the world inside the Earth?” I asked out of curiosity.

“There are many such worlds inside our planet. It depends upon which you are referring to. There are civilizations, and I say that with a restricted sense of that word, which exist in huge cavities right inside of the terrestrial crust.”

“The crust of the planet is physical; but a transition zone to the etheric plane already appears near the terrestrial mantle. This material portion of the planet is not too thick in section and appears to be like a honeycomb with many cavities of different sizes. Some of them are empty, others have living beings there, or there are cities with smaller or larger communities. There are also different types of beings. Other such bubbles inside the Earth are filled with lava or oil, and some of them also contain huge lakes within them. We can call them underground worlds if we choose, and there is a lot of diversity amongst them. Some of these communities that are closer to the surface are integrated into the material plane. Others situated deeper act as if they are already situated in the etheric plane or are interconnected to it.”

ON WATERS, IN CAVES, OR THROUGH THE WOODS

“If this is the interior structure of the Earth’s crust, then I believe that all of the beings living there do not just get in and out at the poles. They probably have other access points, just as we can enter through the Second Tunnel.”

“Of course. Actually, these are three main ways to the center of the planet. The first is at the poles, and it is the easiest. We already described it. The second possibility is through some special places, usually caves or caverns inside the mountains, but such could also be on the surface of the ground, in the woods or even in the fields. Scientists call them space-time distortions or portals; and, in a way, this is exactly what they are. To be more specific, they primarily represent the intersection of energy vortexes in the material with those of the etheric plane. Sometimes, the energy vortexes of the astral plane are involved. There, where they intersect each other, a sort of energetic boundary is established on the physical surface of the Earth, a special zone. Some of these energetic boundaries continue to last longer than others with some lasting a shorter period. The strongest could last as long as hundreds or even thousands of years. Others might be a few minutes long.”

“It is one of the reasons. This is why they say that there are forests where people are afraid to go. It is not because these forests have a problem but rather because a crossing to the etheric plane inside these forests either exists or once existed; and further, it contains a different reality. The vegetation or beings are different than those from the material plane; and most of the time, this frightens human beings. No longer in their accustomed space and time, people get confused. They do not understand what has happened to them, not realizing that they are actually in another plane of manifestation, one superior to the material plane. For example, some of these special forests could be relatively small-sized; and after getting inside, people could go on for days without getting to an end because they were already in another dimension, usually in the etheric plane where the forest located there had some different characteristics. But, the inverse could also happen. Everything depends upon the specifics of the cross-point.”

“If you get by or go in there, and if you are ready for such a thing, your crossing into the etheric plane is completed. You then get right inside the interior of the Earth; but for this to happen, I repeat, you must be ready. You must have the correct inner state to understand these aspects and in order to be in the right place at the right time. If necessary, all these elements arrange themselves, just as they should. For example, you walk through the forest and a path appears that is different from all the others. You follow it and reach a cliff where you see an ordinary entrance to a cave. That cave or entrance in the mountain did not exist until then. Following that entrance, you then go deeper and deeper; but as you go further into the cave, you get the feeling that its walls are getting narrower and narrower and that they are flowing like a river, flowing faster and faster, even if you go as usual.”

“Are there many such special places?” I asked, fascinated by the discussion.

STRUCTURAL ELEMENTS IN THE CRUST AND MANTLE OF THE PLANET

“Their fluctuations are great, but some of them are well known, lasting for a long time and remaining very strong. Even if they have become well known to some people, however, the effect they create is first fear and even panic. The instinct of self-preservation then acts very powerfully in the man. The fear of the unknown, amplified by stories and other strange elements happening around one, creates a sometimes terrifying legend of such a place. The tendency of both the locals and the authorities is to block the access. The tension appearing at the shift of the vibrational frequency at these places generates a state of confusion, powerful emotions, mental chaos, and even more often, the strong feeling of fear.”

I interrupted by asking something that seemed important to me.

“But, assuming you move through such an objective boundary, does the space-time proportion remain the same as in the material plane? I would say no.”

“You are right. A relatively small distance crossed inside such an energetic boundary could mean tens or even hundreds of kilometers in the material plane. Travel inside the Earth is usually fast if you have the right means or if you come to pass the right energetic portal.”

After giving these explanations, Cezar told me about the third possibility of accessing the Inner Earth.

“This was used in antiquity, and it was part of their actual beliefs because it was natural to them. In this case, going inside of the Earth is done on water. For example, you are on a boat on an actual lake. Pretty soon, a strange fog appears, and once you are inside of it, you are in another place. This shows that you have already entered into the etheric plane, and most probably you are inside the planet.”

“That could explain the specific situation with regard to the Bermuda Triangle,” I said immediately.

“That is right. The only problem in such instances of planes going into the fog is that the machines on board no longer work because the resonant frequency changes. You have no idea where you are or where to go and even the engines tend to stop working, but as long as you are on a ship, you will simply float adrift through that fog until, at a certain moment, you get out of it. At that point, however, you are already inside the Earth on the etheric plane.”

“These things seems to be sort of random to me. There is a large amount of unknown involved and even risk.”

“Only apparently. Some of these zones are like energetic operating bases which are known very well by the inside inhabitants and that’s why, in most of the cases, you are awaited and welcomed when emerging from the white fog. This happens not only on the waters but also in the distortion areas on land, inside mountain caves, or other such passings inside the Earth. You will convince yourself of it soon. A good example is that of King Arthur and his knights who knew how to go to the land or island of the wise men. That did not belong to the material plane but could be reached by crossing a fog on a lake. This was historically represented in an etching where their boat was depicted on a lake beneath the water and you can see a snake biting its tail, making a circle, or better said, an oval. This is the ouroboros snake from many energetic traditions, but its meaning is the same. It means the connection to the vacuum energy and crossing from the material plane to the superior plane of manifestation which is the etheric. It is done through such a void which is, in fact, a singularity.”

I was amazed that people in that age had a special knowledge about planes and subtle dimensions and that they even knew how and where and were able to access them as they wished. Cezar then added some more specifics.

“Indeed. It shows some initiatic information that Arthur and the ones close to him had in those times. You know that, so far, his fortress Avalon has not been identified. That’s why history and culture prefer to add Arthur, Merlin and their stronghold to the category of myth and legend. It is easier and more convenient, and their excuse is that no evidence was found; but the absence of such proofs — due to the fact that these citadels, cities or characters either did not exist or did not remain in the material plane but belonged to the etheric plane — can be found in many other cases. For example, there is the Incan city of El Dorado, the citadel of Troy and still many others that nothing is known of or where the information is contradictory.”

The last twenty-four hours had been a very convincing and powerful ideological tour whereby my conception of the internal structure of the planet was totally reset in a certain measure. I felt ready to go for the first trip, but the departure was scheduled in a few days. Once we arrived at the location inside Bucegi, I asked Cezar for two hours rest and that is what I did. Then, full of unexpected resources and exaltation inside my soul, I returned to the magic atmosphere of the Projection Room.

CHAPTER TWO — THE GREAT CONTROVERSY: SOLID OR EMPTY ON THE INSIDE?

After waking up, I verified and signed some official documents for a short while. The new executive and organizational structure in the secret base at Bucegi has now become an optimally functioning system. The tasks were therefore easy to assign as the command structure had been greatly simplified. Most of this was due to exceptional American technology that has been in use at the secret base. While some of these technological elements broach upon what is found in science fiction books, the reality is that we are now enjoying them. Everyone in the Department knows that this technology does not come from government projects but rather from some other quarter, but there is a tacit agreement between ourselves and the Pentagon's American officers not to exacerbate the sensitivity of this very delicate subject. Accordingly, I have an increased responsibility; and as there are certain aspects that have more to do with the American side, I will not mention the various technologies that have been specifically designed for this location.

UPDATE

The surveillance and security systems of the base are so sophisticated that the need for staff is greatly reduced. If one decides to go on a mountain hike and gets a chance to penetrate the area, they will not see the road leading to the location as it has been disguised in a very clever way. But, even if, in the event of some security breach, you were able to find and follow the short piece of road with its woodsy appearance, you will pass right on by the mountain without understanding that you have just missed what is perhaps the most important secret base on the planet now. To get to this security level, the thickness of the mountain was simply extended to a distance of almost thirty meters in order to fill in the entrance area; and on the left, the topography was turned into a curve of more than eighty meters that was then covered with soil and vegetation. These changes included a configuration of what seems to be a sharp cliff extending up to the mountains with firs atop it. I was there with Cezar when this change was actualized and was amazed to see how efficient this technology is. If they could manifest such things in such a simple and fast way, it means that, if they wish to, they would have no problem building bases on any suitable planet or satellite.

Neither conventional sources of energy nor materials are utilized for such construction. The entire operation was huge in size and would have been extremely difficult to put together with regular technological capabilities, but this state-of-the-art technology accomplished it in only two days. The first day was focused only on the setting, programming and layout by way of three mechanisms being successively utilized, none of which resembled anything from contemporary technology. The process was sort of like magic, the likes of which I have never seen. It overcomes the conceptual image that I had about both construction and matter. Two separate perspectives were taken into account with regard to this topographical change. The first concerned increased security for the entire base area. The second one was to create a new space inside for a command and control center. This space included energy resources and a functional redistribution of departments because the scientific analysis laboratory had been returned to the secret complex. Many years ago, it had been relocated to a specially arranged building in Bucharest, but it was observed that the procedures proved to be inferior without justifying any substantial improvement in the quality of the discoveries. It was General Obadea who brought up the idea of returning the laboratory to the secret complex, just the way it existed in its first years. His idea was brought to a happy conclusion by Cezar just more than a year after the General's death.

The research laboratory was returned to the three long rooms inside the hangar that had been dug into the mountain. These included resting spaces used for expedition preparations and a small dining hall that was created in the new space created by extending the mountain. These three rooms were transformed into larger spaces equipped with very sophisticated devices, and a big room was configured to house the original laboratory. The team of scientists was generically made up of three people who did not know what the secret location was really all about. They only received directions to study various artifacts and devices that were brought to the laboratory. The contracts that the researchers signed were six months long and included very severe conditions which were overseen by the American contingent. They were renewable only once for the same person.

The massive sliding doors at both the hangar's entrance and the tunnel in the mountain were also eliminated. In their place, a very advanced technology was used featuring energetic protection fields masked with holographic projection. A very interesting aspect of the security system is that these energetic fields are adapted to a resonant frequency specific for each of the individuals that have clearance to enter the Great Gallery and the Projection Room. Arriving at the secret location, those who have access inside wear a sort of bracelet like a flat watch which emits the frequency granting clearance. When in front of the energetic field at the entrance, it automatically allows access to that person. The technology is also a part of America's secret sect of high technology, allowing us to eliminate all other checking and protection barriers. For example, there were originally human guards provided for the entrances to the tunnel, the Great Gallery and the Projection Room, but they were all completely replaced by this amazing and very restricted technology. I am not, however, allowed to describe the devices that create the energetic field nor the unconventional sustaining source of energy. This radical simplification of security has accomplished more than just virtually complete protection. It also satisfied an older wish of both General Obadea and Cezar who were not agreeable to a big influx of people into the Projection Room. There was something very special about this secret architectural development inside the mountain. To a certain measure, in the earlier books I have written, I have tried to recreate the unforgettable impression that both entering or staying in this space gives you. It is radically different than the regular experiences one has in the outside world.

A sensitive person might say that "it leaves a feeling of nostalgia in your soul" while somebody else could describe it as "a mysterious hall to the unknown" and others could define everything as true magic. Personally, I think each of these descriptions contains a partial truth because, as I already mentioned, when you get into the Great Gallery and especially the Projection Room, it is like going into another world. The feeling is complex and amazing at the same time. You feel like you have been transported to a sacred place. Even the fact that there is no trace of dust or dirt inside the location is meaningful. But beyond all this, there is the uncontested sacred character. You feel some- how lighter and worry free, like you would not want to go back to the world of people. Dark thoughts disappear. Low down and petty or mean activities and plans also disappear. All you wish for is a continuous longing for good and harmony.

Getting back to the general structural elements of the location, one of the most sophisticated areas of the military complex in Bucegi is the control room that was built inside the artificial enlargement of the mountain. From this place, everything surrounding the location is monitored, including the access paths, the energetic functioning of such paths, and also all the energy that is emitted from this installation. It is hard to conceive that such technology could exist on Earth, but it is now a reality in our secret location. For example, it assures a psychological protection barrier, but the technology is radically different than what is known as HAARP which is, by contrast, more like a children's game as opposed to the subtle energetic protection that is provided for preventing others from getting too close to this zone. If a person does get too close, they begin to feel perplexed, misdirected and unsure; or a small light dizziness takes over the person, all of which is enough to make them draw back. The remarkable thing is that this technology acts in an intelligent way without human assistance either measuring or knowing if the intruders are heading to the secret complex. Only if this happens, and only from a certain distance, does the protective effect then appear, but this represents just one example of technology introduced there and one which is considered to be relatively simple. There are, however, others which are much more sophisticated and these have to do with defense, other types of entry or even military aggression into the zone. The entire location represents a completely self-contained and secure system.

Before entering the Projection Room, I had a meeting with Cezar and we ate together. There is no kitchen in the base. The meals are provided as that which an astronaut would have, placed into special packages. It was decided that relinquishing a series of facilities and functions that are otherwise common in a regular military base was absolutely necessary in order to minimize complications, especially with regard to maintaining minimum staff. The conditions at the base are so good and the technological facilities so vast that someone can live without problems in both physical and mental comfort.

THE PROJECTION ROOM, ANOTHER WORLD

After the meal, I entered the tunnel with Cezar through the energetic screen. Approaching it, the particular frequency emanating from the bracelet creates a slight luminosity of blue iridescence in a part of the energetic field that is rather pleasant, accompanied by a vague hum. One passes through the field individually. The only feeling accompanying this a very large sensation of tingling or numbness, but it only lasts for fractions of a second. Once inside the tunnel, the outside appears completely opaque. If you look behind, you see only a world of blue phosphorescent color.

The electric transport vehicles that I like so much were awaiting us, aligned on the right side of the tunnel. The light to the Great Gallery entrance, now less intense than the first years of the establishment, is discrete and pleasant. The red lights on the walls had been replaced by a nice LED system.

I slowly passed the short distance to the giant stone gate guarding the entrance to the Great Gallery. It was open, but the entrance was blocked by the energetic field that acts like a curtain undulating in slow motion but with a greenish semi-transparent color. This replaced the old and complicated laser system and, of course, the two military guards that had been part of the access protocol. At our coming, the energetic curtain acted just like when we entered the tunnel, becoming a bit effervescent and making that refreshing low hum. I went under the arch of the imposing stone gate and could not resist commenting, a bit amused, that not even now is the technology that we are using completely understood. I abandoned myself in the hypnotic magic of the path through the Great Gallery with those undulating “waters” of colors that relax the mind, body and soul until I arrived at the entrance splendidly framed by the bluish magnetic field guarding the access to the Projection Room. Just as excited as I had been each time I was there, I stepped into the immense underground space. Although I had been there many times in the previous three years, the feeling of the sacred never disappears. You do not get used to being there. You do not get either bored or tired. It is a real technological wonder and a spiritual marvel at the same time, something for which Humankind should probably pass through evolutionary stages in order to reach a proper understanding thereof. Cezar respected my immersion into this rarified environment and remained silent, walking slowly next to me. I was feeling myself emerge out of that silent tingling, from that light coming out of nowhere, and out of that energetic subtle field that invaded my being, my soul, and my heart. I had acquired the habit of, after getting inside the huge cavity under the mountain, not looking right ahead to the giant openings of the three tunnels within the Projection Room. I have also noticed that the consciousness goes on a sort of a strange hiatus with the senses, perceptions, and certain other capacities becoming slightly staggered from the regular and continuous way that they should be manifesting. Studies and observations showed us that this was common to almost everyone going inside the Projection Room; and that is why it was recommended that, at first, the gaze should be directed to the ground or to the side, laterally; but after the middle area of the hall near the podium with the cylinder is reached, the strange feeling or sensation of duality disappears. During two of the visits I have paid to this location, I was alone in the Projection Room. This was a privilege that only Cezar and I have enjoyed since General Obadea's death and after my investiture with the commission. It is, however, only by living through the direct experience of such an environment that you can be privy to the inner emotional state that overwhelms your entire being. As Cezar knew too well the extraordinary inner force that accumulates as a result of remaining in the Projection Room, he allowed my access; but still, he advised me to be watchful about my inner state of evolution. I stayed for many hours during each visit, experiencing very intense emotions and conditions that were also very profound. It was like a trance until exiting from the tunnel whereupon everything would fade away very quickly as I returned to the base with only an unclear memory remaining that resembled a night dream. I discussed this aspect with Cezar, and he told me that the difference between the individual frequency of my being and the specific frequency of the subtle space in the Projection Room is still pretty large, and it takes time for these factors to adjust; and further, that they do so by reason of exercise and repetition. Even so, he considered me to be ready for the expedition to the Second Tunnel which actually is the central tunnel, the one leading inside the Earth. From inside the Projection Room, the openings of the tunnels appear to be immense, imposing and somehow hypnotic, the feeling being accentuated by the light green iridescence appearing at the tunnel openings which, in reality, comes from inside of them. From a certain distance inside the room, however, the tunnels cannot be seen. But, when you move around and see the openings under different angles, you notice that the luminosity is also different. It almost disappears completely sometimes, the opening then appearing to be dark. Other times, their light goes to turquoise.

I arrived at the consul and Cezar initiated the controls. In front of us appeared a holographic projection of the interior of the tunnel representing its first part, and only then could I see certain pictures. The first impression was that this, structurally speaking, was not any different from the First Tunnel leading to the occult chamber near the Great Pyramid in Egypt. Once inside, however, I observed major differences. The Second Tunnel or central one starts descending in a smooth decline a few meters after entering it. On the other hand, the space distortion device, similar to the “trumpet cone” at the entrance to the tunnel to Egypt, was not at the beginning section of the tunnel but rather a little further downward and was related to another specificity. Immediately after the distortion, the hologram showed the entrance to a space wider than the tunnel’s diameter, a sort of cube with a length of about eight to nine meters. Observing that certain dates were constantly changing on the console, I guessed that there was an energetic dynamic element that was not represented.

There were diamond-shaped alcoves in which the quartz-colored crystals were similarly arranged on both sides of the access door, but we did not notice the grooves in the walls that exist in the First Tunnel, possibly serving as navigation markers. Also, the tunnel did not feature a sideways turn like the one to Egypt but went on in a particular direction after starting to descend into the interior.

My attention was captured by a sudden change of the hologram in front of the console where the image of a human being appeared in the interior of the tunnel. The creature had white skin and stood still, looking in our direction. As I estimated it, he was approximately 1.8 meters high and was wearing a long robe like a Franciscan monk. The garment was white-beige in color, featured a hood, and was long to the ground with a narrow center around the hips. The look of this figure was very intense as it rested still for a while at the beginning of our encounter. Then, he slowly lifted his right hand with the palm facing us from his chest as a gesture of alliance. Right after this, he made a gesture like a fan, and his image disappeared.

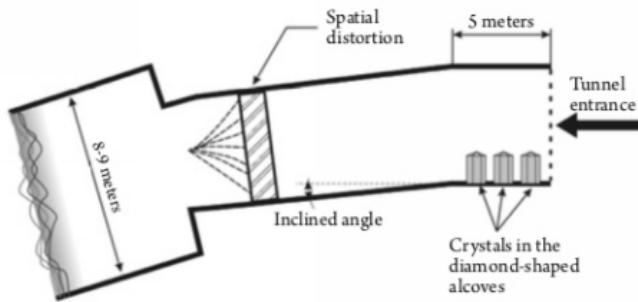

I remained staring at the empty image from the hologram. No question was needed because Cezar talked to me very naturally while closing the hologram and the controls on the console.

"His name is Dryn, but it is spoken like 'Drian'," Cezar said. "He is one of the wise men we are headed to. We have met many times before and have collaborated. The travel we will make now has already been programmed. He only confirmed that they are awaiting us."

Cezar then took a big briefcase that he had brought with him and placed it on the ground inside the tunnel, leaving it there. As we walked to the exit, I was silent. I knew that it was not necessary to insistently question with regard to certain matters. If it was really necessary, Cezar would have explained to me what I needed to know. Some of the information in the Department was restricted to me because I did not yet have the security clearance to know it.

THE TUNNEL STRUCTURE INSIDE THE EARTH

MYSTERIOUS MEETINGS

Based upon what Cezar has shared with me about his travels over the last few years, I have learned that the connections, relationships and alliances to those existing inside of our planet are complex; and maintaining them is a very difficult task because of the high level secrets involved and the fact that the governments of the great powers are especially interested to know them. The biggest problem in this regard is generated by the interest of some occult groups and organizations who exercise very strong control and even have an agenda of conquest. There are also issues involving national security, the concerns of which are much more profound.

As the years have gone by, the situation is even more complex than we originally thought. Although not asking for more than what was needed, I was still informed about the discussions on this subject between Cezar and General Obadea while the latter was still alive. I also knew about the strictly secret meetings of the Romanian-American selective group that had only a few members. These meetings took place especially after Cezar's return from his expeditions inside the Earth, two of them after returning with his crew from the tunnel to Tibet. Although I was in charge of the logistical organizing of these meetings, I did not participate in them nor am I allowed to offer any details regarding the place, the numbers of persons or the participants involved.

I can say, however, that these meetings had a different rhythm and criteria than those we are accustomed to at this diplomatic level. Sometimes, things just cannot be solved through common methods because they belong to a different level of knowledge. This was the main reason why these meetings were not recorded and why no stenography was allowed, except for the last one of them where an agreement at the highest level was secured. The technique used to make it secure was amazing because, obviously, a lot of other countries want details about what happens here. At two of these meetings, Cezar came accompanied by a man who was not wearing a suit or a military uniform, and he seemed to move and talk differently than the other members. Initially, I was surprised because the person was not included in the very strict diagram or grading structure of the meeting and Cezar had not announced anything to me. Inside the secret services, you quickly understand when you are not supposed to ask uncomfortable questions. I was, however, very interested to observe this person because I noticed his special way of being. I did not get a chance to understand this first man very well because I was in a neighboring room as he passed through the corridor with Cezar. I could follow him for only a few seconds as he walked with a unique footstep that was somehow imperial, imposing, towering and thoughtful. But I was luckier with the second character because I was right near the heliport taking care of security.

As Cezar and the mysterious character descended from the helicopter, they were welcomed by General Obadea. Before entering the building, the General and Cezar stopped for a few seconds to discuss an issue, and from what I figured, it involved a certain choice. During that short time, the stranger remained at a certain distance from the two. Keeping his hands and arms at his back and his head slightly tilted in a forward direction, I was looking from the back and admiring his elevated and confident attitude, seemingly very detached of this world's uncertainties. To my big surprise, he turned to me at this moment, looking exactly at me with a kind but bland manner and exhibiting an imperceptible smile on his face. The man then turned his back; and immediately afterward, all three continued their way to the building. I then wondered how fast my heart was beating without understanding too well why.

A MORE PROFOUND UNDERSTANDING

Returning to Alpha Base, we were welcomed by Dr. Xien who went with Cezar into one of the offices. I then noticed that the Doctor was holding something in his hand which seemed to be a map, but I couldn't figure out what it represented. On the following day, when Cezar went to Bucharest for certain official meetings, I found this the right time to clarify some aspects about the interior of the planet. The expedition was about to take place in two days, so I had enough time to settle down and take my last opportunity to secure what knowledge I could about the internal structure of the Earth. Taking advantage of the beautiful weather in the evening, I accosted Dr. Xien while he was in a more private area of the base, appearing motionless while looking at the distant setting sun.

"I have been imagining a certain situation by which the Earth could be viewed in a way that the factors we talked about a few days ago do not apply."

Unperturbed, Dr. Xien made a gesture to continue our discussion.

"Let's say that we are in outer space, about 2,000 kilometers in altitude; and hypothetically, the planet is cut in half by a laser beam. It is an action in the material plane. My question to you is, 'What could be seen from outer space if the Earth could be sliced into two pieces like an apple?'"

This idea had come to me on my way back to the Base, but I was not ready to start a discussion then, willing to think about it by myself first, in a very special way. Passing from the physical plane to the subtle plane of manifestation, how could such a thing be seen? How should we understand this transition area? After arriving at the base, I spent most of the night contemplating this problem from different perspectives, but I was not convinced that I had found the right answer. The following day, I decided that I would open the discussion and ask for an explanation. Finding out that Cezar had gone to the capital, I went to Dr. Xien to hear what he had to say. After all, it was even better this way, considering the fact that the entire discussion about the interior of the Earth had started with him.

Dr. Xien answered, looking at the red disc that was the sun.

“First, you need to understand that, theoretically speaking, you cannot carve the Earth into two pieces with a laser because the laser cannot cut into a black hole. The singularity that is in the middle of the Earth represents the real source of its forming. If the laser beam were to enter inside of the black hole, its photons would not come out. So, the action of cutting would be compromised from the start.”

I was silent for a moment, impressed by this very simple point of logic that I had not thought of. Instead, I was concerned about how the successive planes of manifestation would be affected as the laser might approach the center of the planet. That is exactly why I insisted on addressing this matter.

“We could assume that scientists do not know and do not think that, in the center of the planet, is a black hole. Theoretically, they would start cutting into the Earth, being curious to see what is inside of it. Anyway, the transition from the material plane to the subtle planes is done long before reaching the nucleus of the planet.”

“What would they see from outer space then?”

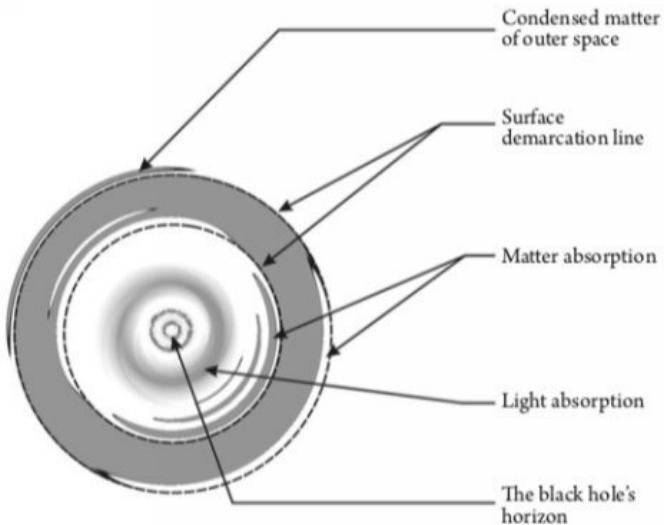

Dr. Xien discretely smiled. He then offered me a description very similar to the one Cezar gave me a few hours earlier.

“You have presented yourself with a challenging theoretical exercise, but this is a good thing. It helps you understand what you will soon be living by yourself in a real way.

“If such a cross section of the planet could be rendered, at first the physical matter of the crust would be seen. Afterward, the structure of the crust begins to look like Swiss cheese with empty spaces of different sizes inside. In some of the cavities, water that was generated from the initial dynamic of the central black hole could be found. In other cavities, you would find lava, gas pockets or even different types of rocks and metals. Others would be inhabited by different types of beings; but I think that this no longer represents a surprise for you. Inside our planet, you can find a pretty diverse and rich life.”

DIFFERENT DEGREES OF ABSORPTION IN THE SUBTLE REALMS BY REASON OF THE SINGULARITY IN THE CENTER OF THE EARTH AND THE CONSEQUENT DISTRIBUTION OF MATTER IN THE INTERIOR AND EXTERIOR OF THE PLANET

Indeed, the idea of life inside the Earth was not new to me, and I was accepting it without any problem, but it still was not clear to me the way in which it exists, the zones in which it manifests as well as other aspects related to the kind of beings and their nature. The rather sparse information I have received in conversations up to this point has offered only a general context of the issue and one that is often evasive.

Having the opportunity to clarify many details, I could now do different correlations through the good will of both Dr. Xien and Cezar. I understood too well that an ideological and proper theoretical education would help me very much to correctly assimilate the sensations and real experiences that were awaiting me on our upcoming expedition.

Dr. Xien continued to speak, thoughtfully, and looking far away.

“If you go deeper, you will see that these empty Swiss cheese holes become larger as you get closer to the transition points to the subtle plane. In this crust zone, at a small distance from the surface, the central black hole’s influence is not felt enough, and the matter is therefore heavy, hard, and physically pure, but as you get closer to the lava bed in the interior, the physical matter becomes more rare and the sizes of the interior caverns become a lot bigger.”

“I understand, but when does this influence of the central black hole become noticeable? At what depth from the surface can we talk about the transition to the etheric plane?”

“You can’t talk about a line of separation but rather more about an area. The influence of the singularity inside the Earth becomes clearly perceptible at about 1,800-2,000 kilometers deep, when the transition to the etheric plane begins. Up to that point, as you get closer to this area, you notice certain transitions to the subtle plane; and at that level of the terrestrial mantle, it could be said that an effective entering to the etheric plane occurs. From there on, if we talk from a strictly material plane point of view, you no longer see anything.”

“Still, I need to perceive something,” I said, expressing my curiosity.

“It does not make sense to say that, if you head to the center of the planet, as I assume scientists imagine, that you would continue digging through solid matter until reaching it. This is not just a huge conceptual mistake but also a point of considerable stupidity. It is like saying that you can get closer to the fire by using ice and that it continues to remain ice. You can’t. It automatically becomes water and then vapor or steam. It is just the same when traveling to the center of the Earth. As you move inward, there are transformations to higher states of vibrational frequency that are imperceptible to ordinary instrumentation or perception.”

“Then how do I see this transformation?”

“Assuming that you could see something, everything you see related to the material plane is an immense blank, a sort of vacuum in which, at the very most, you see or sense how light is absorbed by the central black sun. It could be said that you are then at the event horizon. You see some lights that, acting like a whirlwind, head to the center, which is the effect of matter being attracted to the center of the black hole.”

I was well aware that what I was discussing with Dr. Xien was at the limit of what could be considered crazy by scientists, and not just by them. I was, however, attracted to the subject, seeking to better understand the subtleties involved. I continued, coming back again and again to my initial thoughts about the hypothetical cross-section of the planet.

“But, if we keep in mind the model with the cross-section of the planet and are looking at it from outer space, how would this reality appear to us, theoretically speaking?”

“First, you would see the section through the solid crust. Then, you would see the interior cavities or ‘Swiss cheese’ getting bigger and bigger, and at a certain moment, you will reach the area where the liquid lava bed resides in the mantle. Still, its thickness is not so great. The existence of this lava bed, by the way, shows not just the lava transformation from solid to liquid within this aggregation of matter, but it is also indicative of moving into another plane. Then, from a certain moment onward, you will no longer see anything other than an empty space and the way in which the mantle is absorbed by the black hole in the center of the planet. This absorption will look like wires of light, and at the limit, you can see a bed of rocks, but these are really the peaks of the interior mountains situated within the lower part of the mantle.”

The problem of the central black hole’s influence was an aspect that confused me right from the start. After Dr. Xien told me about the real internal structure of the Earth, I began to realize that this information encapsulates the actual mental block to correctly understand the reality of this structure. The concepts and prejudices we have on the effects of black holes make them appear to be utterly devastating when related to our planet. For example, most of us would imagine that, if a black hole really did indeed exist in the center of the Earth, we would all be crushed very fast.

In reality, as Dr. Xien explained to me, the absorption of matter in the center of the black hole occurs slowly because all the processes are correlated. It would make no sense that what the planet gives birth to by virtue of its energetic central vortex and singularity would then turn around and destroy it brutally as if to evoke the “wrath of God.” Astrophysicists think that a black hole is produced through the implosion of a colossal aggregation of matter; but what they seem not to understand is the fact the black hole itself, when it manifests in the material plane, is what starts to absorb gases and cosmic dust from the exterior world in order to start the process contributing to the forming of a planet or star. Everything that manifests in the material plane: the sky, the planet, any other celestial body, or even an atom or elementary particle, is born because of an energetic vortex that appears in the material plane that we associate as a black hole.”

With precise movements, Dr. Xien drew a simple sketch of the planet’s cross-section; then continued with his explanations.

“The role of the central black hole is to serve as a converter of matter. By absorbing matter at a certain speed, and through its rotational and gravitational features, it also gets to create matter. This phenomena is not known to astrophysicists even though they have taken the first steps in their observations regarding the emission of waves and chains of particles from black holes.* It is through these special characteristics of the central singularity that a certain size, weight, and balance of our planet is maintained. If things were not this way, you would expect the size of our planet to exemplify what amounts to billions of years of accumulation of matter and cosmic dust. It is not enough to say that it has constantly eroded, having therefore remained about the same size.”

[* (From the Romanian editor) The is the so-called Beckenstein-Hawking radiation.]

Once more, I was amazed by the ignorance of this elementary observation of which I had not even thought about up to that point. Generally speaking, science always finds excuses that leave you more or less mixed up with regard to anything that has no credible explanation from the perspective of classical laws and principles. It does not want to analyze the ideas that are outside the bounds of what they consider to be “normal” thinking.

After several minutes of contemplating the drawing, I asked, “If we were looking from outer space, what precisely would we see in the center section of the planet?”

“A black vacuum, but some could still see a weak sparkling light, like a mysterious point of glitter, but this could happen only if they were to get closer to the center. You don’t see the glitter from far away.”

“Why is it that only certain people could see such a thing?”

“Because of their very strong indoctrination into the conception of materialism. For many of them, everything represents matter and with this comes a heavy nature. Even if they were to figure out that matter is actually energy, they still treat the phenomena and situations as if they could only belong to their material world. The break between scientific conception that is limited only to the material plane and spirituality is dramatic, and it stops any meaningful progress with regard to deeply understanding the universe.”

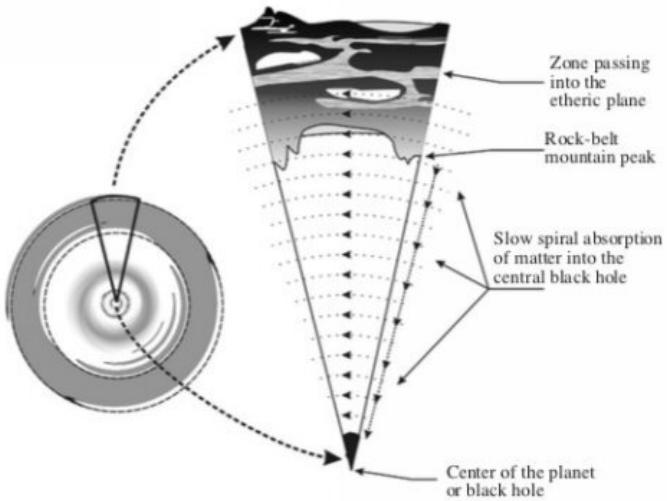

I figured that the answer coming next was important because Dr. Xien turned around and looked at me in the eyes.

“Because when you overcome the material plane to the subtle plane in order to see what happens beyond, you would inevitably have to adjust your individual vibrational frequency or you don’t see anything. If you observe a phenomena related to a particular space and the time, you must correlate yourself with the relativity of this phenomena. This means that the structure of the time and space changes. Then, the vibrational frequency changes. Let’s say that you align to the new vibrational frequency. Then, you start to resonate with it. All of a sudden, you observe that there is no more dark, but actually another kind of reality on another frequency.”

I remained quiet for a while, thinking about what Dr. Xien had said.

CROSS SECTION OF THE EMPTY INTERIOR OF THE EARTH — THE ORDER OF THE PLANES OF

MANIFESTATION AND THE WAY IN WHICH MATTER IS ABSORBED BY THE CENTRAL BLACK HOLE

HOW WE CONSIDER AND MEASURE SPACE

What I had found out about the interior of the Earth was extraordinary, but I could not totally ignore what science presents as the internal structure of our planet.

“Scientists do not even think that there could be something inside the Earth other than physical matter, let alone that in its center would be a black hole!” I cried out. “Even if though they have no direct access to observing the phenomena there, they still rely on pretty precise measurements of seismic waves. How could we ignore such a thing or how could we say that they are not correct?”

Dr. Xien gently smiled at my honest query and responded.

“I see that you maintain the doubts you had two days ago, but all you have to do is to give up dogmatic thinking. We don’t deny the results the scientists obtain, but there is a very important difference with regard to the nuances of how to interpret them. What they have discovered as clues to some sort of material reality that is inside the Earth could also result from another reality which is not material but rather purely energetic, just as is the black hole from the center of the planet as well as the intense field that it generates. The researchers start from the premise that they have to measure something, but in order to do so, they must be able relate to that something. It is not possible to start an experiment without knowing what you want to measure or to find out. For this, they need a mathematical space within which they do all these approximations, measurements, formulas, and laws, etc. So, right from the start, science designates a mathematical space specific for what it wants to find out.

“They cannot be blamed for this,” I said. “After all, that space is abstract. It is a space that we all use in order to account for the way in which we understand the world around us and its dynamic movement.”

“It is truth, but still, it is a space designated by the limitations of knowledge of this particular moment. In the exact moment in which you want to measure a certain phenomena, the abstract space that you measure is then created. It is as if I were to tell you that you only exist because I am talking to you right now. In other words, by the very fact that I talk to you means that you exist.”

“That is inconclusive. Could you say we do not exist if we shut up?”

“Who indeed does exist and related to what? Perception is relative, but it represents an experience. Intent activates the reality that you want to find out about; so, when scientists look to find out what is inside of the Earth, they already have made up their minds that there can be nothing other than that which is solid or, in any case, something that is made up of physical matter. With total conviction, they project this set of fixed ideas into the abstract space specific to this reality. They cannot perceive, however, that this mathematical abstract space was created exactly because they wanted to measure something. The idea that such a mathematical configuration was precisely created by them in order to justify their own concepts and principles seems crazy to them. The prospect that this might be a possibility does not even enter into their minds.”

“I understand. This is what people call one hand washing the other but without realizing it. Still, why is it so hard for them to modify their ideas?” I asked, surprised.

Speaking with an attitude of detachment, Dr. Xien clearly pointed out the underlying factors to the situation.

“I know that scientists generally either despise or disregard spirituality and metaphysics; or, at the most, find it ironic because, in their world view, such cannot be measured. But, if they were to study even the most basic notions of spirituality with an open mind, they would see that all of these things are not only possible but are actually true. Unfortunately, they not only will not do it, but they even fight fiercely in order to prove that spirituality is false, that it is a dreamy game, or an invention of those who are unrealistic.”

I heartily approved of Dr. Xien’s assessment, knowing well myself of many such examples. He firmly continued.

“The evolution of the human being, and that includes the scientific paradigm, cannot take place without spirituality being involved. The concepts of materialistic science are much too limited and primitive. In such instances, it is as if you would want to measure the diameter of the sun using a yard stick. You can’t. You are materially and technologically limited. Using such primitive means, it is possible that some might dig their feet in and stomp on a chair in protest. This is the case with today’s science with its set of ideas, conceptions and materialistic prejudices. No matter hard and often they would hit their head on the upper jamb of a door without being able to explain a lot of things, they will remain stubborn and continue to hit their head rather than to give up their limited concepts that maintain the status quo.”

In perfect agreement with what Dr. Xien had said, I was thinking that, to contemporary physicists, there does not seem to be any difference between how they would measure the circumference of the Sun, such as with a tailor’s measuring tape, and the space between two orbiting particles within an atom. The way they understand the reality surrounding them makes them think that space, such as is found on the surface of a planet or in the atmosphere, is identical to the quantum space within an atom or inside its nucleus. For them, the only difference would be that the latter is “smaller.” According to their mentality, the metric of the two spaces is the same, the only difference being the delicacy of measurement. Dr. Xien explained to me that this is a major conceptual error based upon the fact that all of the laws, constants and principles issued by physical science are based only upon approximations giving the apparenency that phenomena occurs or behaves in a certain way a certain percentage of the time.

“Okay, but what about the rest of the percentages? What explanation do scientists have for that?” I asked, thinking that this was a point of view that could not be ignored.

“They have no explanation, simply saying that they will analyze those percentages at some point in the future when science has progressed to the point where they will see where they fit in. They do not even think of dismissing their materialistic thinking. You cannot pretend to solve everything through materialistic explanations when you are surrounded by an ocean of different energy frequencies and vibrations. Those percentages that cannot be explained by science are actually an essential point of reference.”

I then thought then that the situation with these percentages might be like comparing them to a twig making the great chariot of materialistic science shake and eventually overturn. A good example is that all but 3% of human DNA is considered to be “junk” because no one understands its purpose as an essential macromolecule of life. This “junk,” however, actually contains fundamental information about the human being. Similarly, we can think of Einstein’s formula predicting that, near the speed of light, mass tends to grow infinitely. Although mass increases as one approaches the speed of light, it is not particularly significant until the very last few “percentage points” whereupon it grows suddenly, tending to infinity. Therefore, the essence of phenomena in general is contained in the small or remaining percentage phenomena that is ordinarily not recorded. Is this not really the true mystery of Einstein’s formula as opposed to the typical percentage of phenomena in which physical “reality” is not compromised?

Dr. Xien continued, extending this line of logic to the elements about the Earth’s core.

“You can also apply this point of view to the black hole in the center of the Earth. To a considerable extent, you can approach a black hole without the surrounding reality changing too much from what you are normally accustomed to. Eventually, strange phenomena will appear, but to get to that point, you have to first be prepared to understand such. This, however, does not apply to contemporary scientists. When they want to see and measure something about which they have already made a preconceived opinion, they will achieve results in line with what is expected. This exactly as it goes with quantum physics experiments: you observe what you want to see or what you suppose you should see.”

CURRENT SCIENCE — WHAT AND HOW IT “SEES”

I now understood the situation quite well, but I still could not understand why science does not persistently and boldly pursue the avenues of investigation that it does not master. Dr. Xien explained to me that this is the result of two converging tendencies.

“The first is ideological indoctrination. Some scientists are not necessarily predisposed nor willing to break conceptual barriers in order to penetrate an unknown field. Rather, they prefer to stick to what is already accepted, to occupy themselves with what is already known, and to analyze what they already understand. Oriented to make so-called practical inventions for the purpose of mass consumption, they thereby justify their role in society. They dislike the unknown, the challenge, and the mystery, save only to the extent that they want such explained to them through concepts they already know. There is a kind of scientific aggrandizement with everyone beating their own drums, excited about what is inside their own garden and the parameters of that knowledge. This attitude, however, leads only to stagnation and eclipsing a deeper understanding. It’s like spinning around your own tail. Spontaneity disappears, and the sparkles of genius are stifled.”

“Yes. I somehow know this problem, and I wonder if researchers still exist who have the courage and energy to have their voices heard so as to make a big impact in the scientific world,” I said with a bit of bitterness.

“The chances are slim. Very few scientists allow themselves to bring novelty into their thinking. Generally, this only happens when they are old, either when they are considered to be credible or when they do not care what society says. Until then, they are obliged to align themselves with the classical and palpable requirements so as not to disturb the very foundation of the status quo of materialistic science. This is the second tendency of contemporary science and it refers to an unspoken habit of contemporary science and society: you are not allowed to either think, study, analyze, nor present what is not within the materialist framework of thought. To this end, all kinds of means are used ranging from ignoring, marginalization, irony in the scientific environment, blackmail and even harsher methods. Real scientific advancement is blocked right at the start, not because of a lack of genius or illuminated minds who are capable of understanding such but rather because they are not allowed to progress in such a direction.”

Continuing, Dr. Xien offered me an excellent example using the case of imaginary numbers in mathematics. For scholars, these numbers belong to the abstract domain and are used only for mathematical computations. In the vast majority of cases, contemporary science works only with real numbers that offer possible solutions in various equations.

Dr. Xien then pointed out something rather remarkable.

“Any phenomenon appearing in the physical plane is somehow ‘parallel’ to all of the other phenomena in that such are not completely self-referential. On the other hand, all phenomena in the physical plane ‘are placed’ there and develop accordingly on that plane of existence. They are just effects. The fundamental misconception of scientists is that they believe that cause and effect lie in the same plane; that is, the physical plane. In other words, if there is an effect on the physical plane, scientists say that the cause of it is in this plane. This vision is a profoundly wrong vision.”

“Indeed. They seem to mix the cause and the effect in the same soup,” I said, amazed that such obvious aspects had never occurred to me.

“Yes, but that soup is not edible. In order to have access to the causes of the phenomena, you have to rise vertically. You must access a plane that is superior to the material plane. Only by looking from above can you understand what coordinates a certain effect that happens below. What we perceive in the physical world is actually a step-by-step condensation of causes emerging from subtle superior planes until these materialize in the form of phenomena which we call effects. This is the right vision.”

“Yes, they admit that there are spaces with many more dimensions, but they only consider it from a mathematical point of view and with an attitude that these spaces are not real. For contemporary science, real means only the physical space and time in which we live in and that people are aware of. Scientists do admit there are other planes parallel to the physical plane, but in their conception, they are nothing more than variations of our physical space and time. To them, a parallel plane has the same space-time structure or ‘fabric’ as our plane. Time flows the same way and space is measured the same; therefore, it is not a plane above our plane, but it simply another physical plane parallel to ours. In this way, science does not take into account the frequency of vibration which is, in fact, the main element in the structure of Creation.

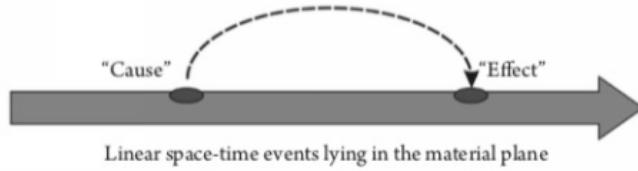

Recalling some of the notions I had read in esoteric texts that I thought were related to what Dr. Xien was telling me, I interrupted him.

“Maybe that explains the exact meaning of certain ambiguous expressions in various writings, all of which obscure, hide or deflect the reality of the situation. They talk about the lower realm, the middle realm and the higher realm. In my opinion, this is a deflected or compromised representation of the planes of manifestation, each with their own specific vibrational frequency.”

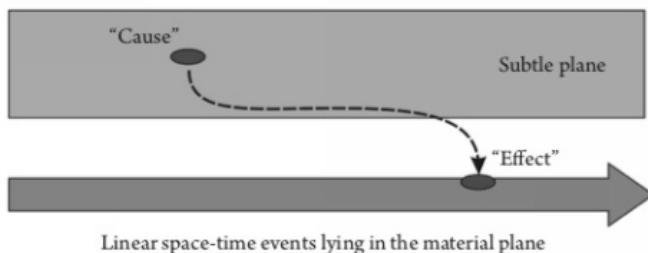

Dr. Xien nodded his head.

“Right. These are different planes of manifestation, each with their own different frequency of vibration. The lower realm does not mean that it is further south but refers to the telluric realms, that is, to the physical plane. The middle realm is the etheric plane, and the upper realm refers to the higher etheric plane as it passes over to the astral plane. Elves, for example, correspond to this realm.”

THE WRONG VISION OF CONTEMPORARY SCIENCE: THE CAUSE AND ITS EFFECT ARE IN THE SAME PLANE, THE PHYSICAL PLANE.

THE RIGHT VISION: THE CAUSE ORIGINATES FROM A PLANE SUPERIOR TO THE PHYSICAL PLANE.

We stopped talking and headed toward a building at the base. Outside, it had already turned dark, and air was pretty cold. Feeling my thoughts, which were gravitating around scientists, their measurements and their hypothesis concerning the internal structure of our planet having a solid core of iron and nickel, Dr. Xien spoke to me with great patience.

“You are still thinking about the scientific theory concerning the interior of the planet, but do not forget that what they say is nothing but an approximation of what might be in the center of the planet and its surrounding layers. From the point of view of physics, chemistry and geology, these approximations are valid, but in reality, what they imagine does not exist. Our planet is not a dense mass of physical matter.”

I replied to Dr. Xien, saying what I had said to him many times before.

“Scientists have built their theory of the inner structure of the Earth based upon the seismic waves that they measure. After all, they can say that they have what amounts to almost sure evidence in their hands.”

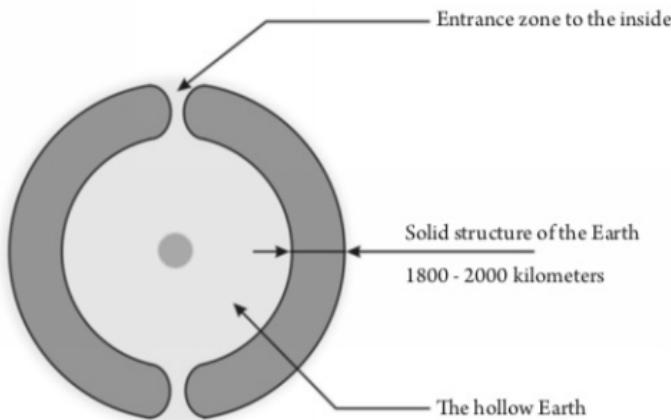

Dr. Xien did not let go and refreshed my memory.

“They can say this, however, the evidence they invoke is just an apparencty. I have already explained to you that what scientists measure as response waves can either be the result of the reflection of another reality or a known material one. Besides, if we think intelligently, seismic waves are the only means scientists have to make assumptions about what's inside the planet. This is far too little to make claims that you have categorical answers." I then thought what a crazy thing it would be for a team of scientists to travel through the tunnel to the center of the Earth. At the very least, the fabric of their modern scientific thinking would then be overthrown in an implacable and definitive manner. The shock would be huge, and the results unpredictable. Unfortunately, Mankind is neither yet ideologically nor spiritually prepared to understand and correctly assimilate the subtle realities of our planet. Its exclusively materialistic vision on the planet's interior is not only primitive, it is also meaningless; although, to a certain extent, it seems perfectly justified by the measurements and results that the researchers obtain by analyzing seismic waves. On the other hand, the idea of the Earth being empty on the inside must not be treated simplistically either. From the explanations has Dr. Xien given me, the idea that the interior of the Earth contains a huge hollow cavity surrounded by a crust of a relatively small thickness of about 1500-1800 kilometers is indeed unrealistic. In such a case, the shell of the planet would be too fragile, and the phenomena would not correspond to the reality we know.

From this point of view, the scientists' observations are correct because, once the seismic waves that are transmitted only through physical matter would overcome the crust of the Earth, they could not propagate further inside; but the measurements show with clarity that the seismic waves still propagate and they are perceived on the opposite side of the planet from the place in which the earthquake started. Actually, it can be said that seismic waves propagate to almost any area of the planet and that has convinced scientists to incorrectly believe that the Earth is indeed solid inside. They see our planet like a billiard ball, rigid inside and filled with solid matter, especially stratified rocks.

THE HOLLOW EARTH — AN INCORRECT VISION

At this point, some observations can be made revealing that things are not as clear as science wants to assure us.

We can start with the assertion by scientists that as one descends towards the center of the Earth, the pressure increases immensely and to the point where matter itself becomes more and more dense. While the logic is apparently reasonable, the reality of the situation contradicts it. It is interesting to observe how scientists come to these conclusions and what they are based on.

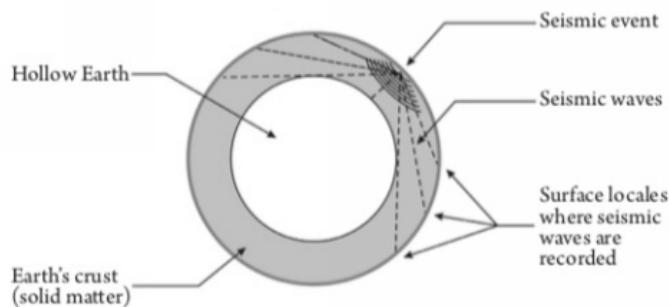

Sometimes it takes only one experiment or theory to instill rigid dogmas into scientific thinking, especially when it is of materialistic origin. In the case of the scientific theory of the inner structure of the Earth, it is based entirely on a single experiment from two-hundred years ago as well as the three-hundred year old theory of gravity of Isaac Newton.

Wanting to measure the density of our planet, English physicist Henry Cavendish designed an experiment that resulted in establishing a certain average value for the density of the Earth.* Having the density, it was then possible to calculate the mass of the planet. Cavendish conducted the experiment in 1799; and since then, it has remained the only method science has at its disposal for calculating the Earth's mass. Moreover, there is no other way to verify the results obtained in that laboratory experiment.

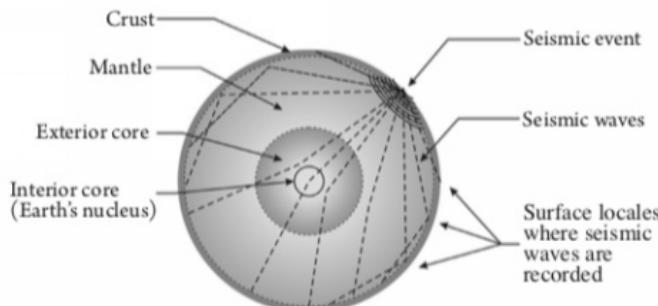

[* The Cavendish experiment used a torsion balance to measure the weak gravitational force between lead balls and was the first laboratory experiment to measure the force of gravity between masses and to produce definitive values for the gravitational constant and the mass density ♦♦ of the Earth. ♦♦ A torsion balance consists of a bar suspended at its middle by a thin wire or fiber. Twisting the wire requires a torque that is a function of the wire width and material.]

The problem with Cavendish's experiment is that he relies on a whole series of assumptions. First, it is obvious that the two lead balls involved in the experiment are electrically neutral. On the other hand, it is equally obvious that planets carry intense electrical and magnetic activity, both in the atmosphere and within them, even if scientists consider them to be electrically neutral. If this is the case, then how can we talk about the similarities between the two lead balls in Cavendish's experiment and our own planet? Even if we were to consider only this single aspect, which refers to complete difference in electricity between the lead balls and the electricity for Earth, the results of the experiment would not make any sense.

CAVENDISH EXPERIMENT

THE ABOVE EXAMPLE DEMONSTRATES THE (INCORRECT) THEORY THAT SEISMIC WAVES CANNOT PROPAGATE THROUGH THE HOLLOW INTERIOR OF THE PLANET

SCIENCE VIEWS THE EARTH AS A FULL, SOLID AND RIGID SPHERE IN THE INTERIOR, A CONCEPT BASED UPON THE SURFACE MEASUREMENTS OF SEISMIC WAVES THAT ARE REFLECTED INSIDE THE PLANET

For example, Earth displays giant electric currents within it that have intensities that can even reach up to one billion amps. By comparison, the lead balls in Cavendish's experiment show no electricity. In this case, what kind of "similarity" can there be? This reductionist view of science offers us only a rough approximation. Accordingly, they consider the Earth to be electrically neutral; and such a view gives credibility to Cavendish's experiment because a certain "electrical similarity" or relationship could then be considered to exist between the lead balls and the planet itself. As long as the Earth is continuously passing through giant electric currents, as has been demonstrated by various measurements, this proposition is, at the very least, inadequate. Therefore, if it can be demonstrated that the intense electricity affects the force of gravity, Cavendish's experiment becomes irrelevant and its results are invalid. This view has been strongly supported by certain scholars who really wanted to demonstrate this through laborious observations and experiments.

A first observation in this respect can be made in nature. It is known, for example, that static electricity has a gigantic force compared to that of gravity and that it is capable of influencing the latter. But, in order not to complicate things, scientists believe that the planets are electrically neutral and that static electricity is not in question. In other words, they consider the force of gravity rather than that of electromagnetic force. It is well known, however, that electromagnetic force is trillion times the force of gravity within an atomic nucleus; nevertheless, scholars prefer to ignore this aspect at the macrocosmic level. Instead, they rely only on assumptions that are meant to support the results of Cavendish's experiment.

On the other hand, we cannot ignore the influence of the magnetic field of the Earth on the force of gravity. High intensity electric currents are a measurable reality within our planet, and that is why magnetism and electricity influence gravity in a certain way. It is virtually impossible for these fundamental forces of Nature to be independent because everything in the Universe is correlated and acts harmoniously.

Such “news,” however, is not to the liking of scientists because, if it is recognized that the planet’s own electromagnetism influences gravity, the consequence is that the Earth does indeed weigh far less or much more than that which was estimated by the Cavendish experiment, and the findings of such will have to be declared invalid. Since there is no other way to measure the density of Earth and its mass, science would be embarrassed. With all of the current scientific progress and advanced technology we have at our disposal, scientists would no longer be able to tell us how much our planet weighs or what its average density is.

THE PROBLEM WITH GRAVITY

Although this fundamental force of nature is especially courted by scholars, too little is known about it at present. For example, the real nature of this force is neither fully elucidated nor is the way in which it works. Only the effects it produces are known. Ever since Newton formulated the famous Law of Gravity, science has not taken significant steps in developing this theory. For example, the source of this force is not known nor can its behavior be described in the quantum realm. Additionally, neither the magnitude nor its speed of manifestation are deeply understood.

One of the delicate points in these studies is connected to what is known as the “gravitational constant” which defines the magnitude of the force of gravity. This results from a formula, but all such formulas have severe limitations because they support approximations and adjusted figures, such as is the case in rounding numbers. Falling into slave-thinking by rigidly adhering to formulas is a big mistake that scientists routinely make. In and of themselves, formulas are not meant to serve as an argument to be invoked in a scientific discussion, especially when the field or scope at hand is much more complex than what particular scientists might be able “bear” from their traditional conceptual point of view. Scientists who are really well trained and who have developed a certain inner sense come to know when and where to grasp the limits of applicability of a formula. They also know where to insist with calculations using various equations and formulas. It is, however, very difficult to change old opinions deeply rooted in people’s minds and replace them with new ideas, and this is all the more true with scientific dogmas.

There are, therefore, many variables that can affect gravity. How can anyone claim, through an automatic and stupid application of Newton's formula of gravitational attraction, that gravity acts within the Earth just as it does at its surface? What good scientific sense is it that two lead balls that are a few centimeters in diameter, as in Cavendish's experiment, are similar to our planet which is over 12,500 kilometers in diameter? In this case, there are so many variables, forces and effects that are not taken into account that you have to wonder what the experiment is actually measuring. For example, how is it possible to consider gravity at 3,500 kilometers deep inside the Earth as being identical with that which exists at 1-2 centimeters deep as in Cavendish's lead balls? And, as a rhetorical question, how can this simple and unique experiment ascertain the theory of Earth being solid and rigid in the interior?!

Curiously, either for lack of inspiration or for fear of ridicule, such questions have not been asked by too many scientists. Some avant-garde researchers, however, such as Jan Lamprecht and others, have shown a lot of courage and determination and have succeeded in shattering such scientific "automatisms" that give science a great disservice.

It can be argued that when the experiment was conceived, it was natural to make certain assumptions in advance and to consider certain approximations, but the fundamental mistake of scientists is that they do not just stop at these assumptions but then consider them to be strict laws.

In reality, the reasoning upon which they base their "vast knowledge" of the inner structure of the Earth is extremely fragile. Apparently, the calculations, methods, diagrams and measurements are numerous and complex. Additionally, the technology and methods of measurement used might seem superior and defining; but in reality, they say nothing real, only offering some clues which are then interpreted in the wrong way. For example, who can possibly know that g (the symbol for "gravitational constant") is indeed a constant in both Paris and 4,000 kilometers deep? There are already experiments proving that g is not constant, the best known of these having been carried out in the deep mines of South Africa, at the bottom of the oceans or at the base of the ice caps. All showed an increase in the value of the "constant" of the gravitational attraction of g . There is therefore no obvious reason to speak of a "constant." Even more interesting is the fact that different values of g appeared at much lower depths. What about other factors of influence that are not known in detail?

Accordingly, there has been what amounts to a “unanimous consensus” that g is a constant anywhere on the planet and also within it. If scientists were to recognize the fact that a planet’s electromagnetism influences gravity, as Einstein was fully convinced, it would overwhelm all of the calculations and the carefully constructed theories up to now. That is why contemporary scholars deny the possibility that electromagnetism will influence gravity despite experiments conducted some fifty years ago by the Austrian physicist Erwin Saxl. These produced very strange results involving electrically charged pendulums. Although the results are controversial, these experiments were comprehensively designed and repeated, being conducted over a seven-year period. Besides this, clear variations and deviant behavior of pendulums have been observed during solar eclipses, a time when massive electrical charges are occurring on a planetary level. While all of these results and measurements are clearly a fact of life, they are not taken into account because scientists do not want to break out of their dogma.

PLANETARY HEAT — WHERE DOES IT COME FROM?

Volcanic eruptions throw melted magma which obviously comes from the deep. It has an average temperature of 1000-1100° Celsius depending upon its type and composition. This information, however, presents a formidable question. Where is the very high heat that can melt the silicates that make up most of the volcanic magma inside the Earth?

The existence of layers of molten magma does not prevent the movement of seismic waves, rather only a certain category of them. This has led scientists to conclude that the Earth’s crust is mostly solid in nature; and more to the point, it is rare to find instances where seismic waves do not penetrate the magma.

Accordingly, another question was asked. What is the origin of the heat that melts the silicates and rocks inside of the planet, thus transforming it into magma? There are two scientific theories for it, and as both have elements to support them, they could be true. The idea that magma would come from the center of the planet, however, cannot be true because, as scientists have pointed out, it would lose heat over the enormous distance that it would have to travel and would solidify long before it reached the surface. It is therefore obvious that the lava that is expelled out by volcanoes comes from deposits within the Earth's crust which is only a few tens of kilometers thick or, at most, from the top layers of the mantle.

On the other hand, our planet's age is estimated at about 4.54 billion years, but even after this enormous period of time, it seems that the Earth has a sufficiently strong source of heat powerful enough to melt matter and produce fused or melted magma. The planet obviously generates heat from within; and, moreover, its temperature proves to be relatively constant. This shows us that our planet is not just a hot sphere of melted matter which gradually cools and solidifies over time such as might be imagined or mistakenly believed by many people. As current measurements and observations prove, reality is proving to be quite different.

In fact, the source of the Earth's internal heat remains a mystery to modern science, and all the more due to the fact that it can only be researched or measured indirectly. Science currently admits that it cannot penetrate the inner depths of the Earth beyond some 18-20 kilometers deep because, due to increasing pressure and temperature, the rocks melt and the cavities in the solid bark would fill up so that a drill would hit a semi-solid mass of molten material and melt it, too. In practical terms and according to scientific theory, it is impossible to drill deeply towards the interior of the Earth because, beyond a certain depth, the drill could not remain in the hole it bores because this would be filled with magma that comes from a certain depth. So far, the observations and conclusions of scientists are correct, but they do not explain, as did Dr. Xien, what else is going. Furthermore, the scientific theory is valid only for a rather narrow branch of the crust. It is not a generality that can be applied to the whole planet. This is actually a great problem for scientists as they extrapolate upon the Newtonian theory of gravity and apply it to the rest of the planet's interior, claiming that the pressure and temperature increase coincident with linear depth and that, according to Cavendish's experiment, which sets a certain average value for Earth's density, there is matter within which possesses a much higher density than the rocks at or near the surface.

For example, many scientists imagine that the Earth is full of volcanic magma starting from a certain depth. They think this way because they have noticed that when you descend into a mine or dig downward, the temperature rises constantly. This led them to extrapolate that this would apply at depths of hundreds or even thousands of kilometers inside the Earth, thinking that everything would be the same and that a gradual increase in temperature would continue all the way to the core of the planet. It was also assumed, historically, that the Atlantic Ocean continued to the end of the world. And the ancient Greeks also assumed that the warm weather in the Sahara desert would continue to warm up as it progressed southward to what we know today as the Antarctic.

The big problem with today's scientists is that they assume they have a logical and rational basis upon which they base such extrapolations. First, even the deepest mine does not reach much more than eight to ten kilometers inside the Earth, and this is almost nothing in comparison to the Earth's radius of 6,300+ kilometers. It is far too small of a sample with which to consider this shorter depth as an appropriate starting point for doing extrapolations. Just because it has been observed that the Earth's temperature increases at the rate of about 1° Celsius per 100 meters, this does not mean that this rule applies at any greater depth inside it. Even though no one can verify it, no one seems to doubt the proposition that the temperature increases as we move deeper towards the center of the Earth. Let us entertain a simple exercise of logic. As I have said, the volcanic magma originates from the crust of the Earth which is about forty kilometers thick. As lava has an average temperature of $1,100^{\circ}$ Celsius when it is expelled by volcanoes, it invites us to ask a question. If the crust has this temperature, then what temperature should be inside of the planet at depths of 2,000 kilometers or more (keeping in mind that modern science is using the principle of extrapolation in this case)? Obviously, all of these values and theorizing on this phenomena are assumptions that are based upon Newton's theory of gravity.

DRILLING COMPLICATIONS

Several decades ago, some countries invested funds to drill into the Earth in order to verify the scientific theory of our planet's internal structure. Drilling into the crust, however, has revealed a notable difference between actual experience and the assumptions of scientists.

As I said above, the universally accepted theory has been that the temperature inside of the Earth increases by one degree Celsius for every hundred meters. Drills conducted by Russians, however, showed that beyond three kilometers, the temperature increases 2.50° Celsius for every one hundred meters, two and a half times faster. At a depth of ten kilometers, the temperature was already 180° Celsius and not 100° as would have been expected so as to be in line with modern theory. This proves to be almost twice as great as what scientific theory implied. Considering such facts, what value can be placed on such a theory?!

Despite the above experiments, nobody has done anything to inform the public about such information nor has the subject been debated or explained in any way. Instead, the same degree of misinformation and scientific ignorance has been maintained.

The Germans have also drilled into the crust of the Earth and with remarkable results. At a depth of four kilometers, they discovered that the temperature already measured 100° C, but at a lesser depth, for example 3.5 kilometers, the temperature was yet higher, having a value of 118° C.

During this drilling in Germany, it was found that the temperature rises rapidly from the depth of 500 meters; and after that, it decreases. Such results appear to be unbelievable, at least in relation to what science had predicted. Not only do these findings fail to converge with scientific theory, they prove to be opposed to it.

The density of matter has also proven to be inconsistent with scientists' predictions. They assumed that the density of rocks should increase as the pressure increases, but the Russians have discovered that up to five kilometers deep, the density of the rocks was constantly increasing. After that, it decreases, probably due to their higher porosity. Neither of these outcomes, however, have been able to break the stubbornness and rigidity associated with certain concepts of scientists. In principle, they do not want to give up on the basic ideas upon which their theory is based; and instead, they firmly hold that both the temperature and density of rocks increase as one penetrates deeper towards the center of the Earth. Even though these are just simple assumptions, they are universally accepted as undisputed truths. And this is besides the fact that no scientist has verified whether such a theory is true. Additionally, even simple verification with superficial drilling tests have totally invalidated this scientific model.

Therefore, nothing in the theory that science has assumed, as it seeks to understand what is within our planet, is valid nor is it based upon observation. As has been noted, inconsistencies with this scientific theory occurred even in the first ten kilometers of drilling. Accordingly, what should we say for what might occur in the next 5,000 kilometers? How is it possible that such a scientific farce is maintained in such an aberrant and disrespectful manner and by omissions or false hypotheses used in order to manipulate all those who show a certain intelligence and good intention to learn the truth?

SEISMIC WAVES

The situation is almost hilarious, and Jan Lamprecht synthesizes it very well. We have just one single experiment, 200 years old, upon which science relies upon in order to support the current theory that the Earth is solid and rigid inside. This experiment of Cavendish is itself a direct product of Newton's gravity theory which also has its limits.

The only methodology that is somewhat acceptable, whereby certain assumptions can be made about the interior of our planet, is the "seismological method" whereby seismic waves are analyzed and measured as they propagate and spread both at the surface of the Earth and within it. No one actually knows how and where these waves travel. All that can be done in this regard is for seismic stations on the surface to measure their intensity or strength and the direction of their propagation. The results can then be correlated and analyzed by computer and, in turn, be subject to complex mathematical models in order to help scientists understand how the Earth is structured inwardly.

Current seismology is based only upon Cavendish's experiment and a set of assumptions. The behavior of seismic waves is also interpreted mathematically. Therefore, absolutely everything in the current scientific theory about conditions inside the Earth can only be described as mere interpretation and assumption. Under these conditions, if Newton's theory of gravity is not observed to be applicable within the Earth as it is on its surface, then we can assume that when it comes to the internal structure of our planet, the entire edifice of modern science is fundamentally wrong. Moreover, mathematics and seismology, however laborious their methods of computing and interpretation are, cannot by themselves explain what lies within our planet. There is a limitation in this regard because it would lack common sense to provide such a complex theory about the interior of the planet that are simply the result of extrapolations that are based only upon blind suppositions.

In turn, these hypotheses were issued by scholars; otherwise, they could not have begun to develop theories and studies of the internal structure of the planet. All are but assumptions of what they thought might be there, nothing else. In the spirit of materialistic theory, this is how they thought it should be and then considered these assumptions to be true.

For example, Newton's theory of gravity gave Cavendish's "experiment" a so-called "mass" of the Earth with an average density of 5.5 grams per cubic centimeter. The only place where scientists can actually measure the density of the Earth is at its surface, and here it has the value of 2.7 grams per cubic centimeter which is half the value given by Cavendish. In order to "balance" this average, scientists have deduced that the density in the Earth's depth has to progressively increase from 2.7 grams per cubic centimeter to a certain value so that, in the end, the Earth's average density will correspond to the value found by Cavendish two-hundred years ago. By making the necessary calculations, scientists have concluded that the average density in the middle of the planet should be 8-10 grams per cubic centimeter; and, accordingly, have provided a whole theory that the inner structure of the planet contains concentric "layers" with different densities. Starting from these models, which they assume to be real, scientists have begun to interpret seismic waves. If, during their research, their model proves to be wrong, they then change its characteristics to fit what they measure, but all of their models, conceptually speaking, are the same.

When a strong earthquake occurs, the seismic waves propagate everywhere, both on the surface and inside the planet, but this propagation is not uniform. By analyzing its characteristics, scientists strive to understand what is inside the planet, and for this they appeal to other scientific notions such as the speed of seismic waves as they move through various layers of rock. In other words, they measure the time it takes for a seismic wave to travel a certain distance. It has been observed, however, that the waves suffer sudden variations in velocity at certain depths. The conclusion of scientists is that seismic waves cross layers of different density. This could be a decent explanation, but it turns out that these changes do not happen exactly in the same places, thus demonstrating that the Inner Earth has a different "relief." If the "relief" inside the planet is different, this means that there is enough empty space within to allow for changes, thus implying that the density, compactness, rigidity and solidity of the planet's internal structure do not respect the modern scientific theory.

All of the results scientists obtain are based upon two assumptions which no one knows the truth about. First, scientists deduce the speed of seismic waves moving inside of our planet based upon their own model and in accordance with Newtonian gravity as mentioned above; but no one has the means to verify that these waves even reach those depths and propagate inward with those speeds. On the other hand, no one can be sure that the changes in wave velocity are due to the change in density of matter inside the Earth. How do we really know how deep these seismic waves actually go and what is the density of matter in that location? For example, no one knows where the seismic waves travel inside the planet or what they are actually going through. The only aspect that can be measured involves the effects of these waves which, again, are perceived at the Earth's surface by seismographs and seismic stations.

Naturally, we expect these waves to be refracted, and there is even an entire theory showing precisely how this happens when density increases as materials are impregnated with seismic waves. But here, we could ask again: how do we actually know, like science assumes, that the density rises as the depth becomes greater? As even the superficial drillings that have been done up to this point demonstrate that what they have found does not conform to the theories given, how could they then rely on something that proves not to be real?

Scientists have assumed that changes in seismic wave behavior are due to the structure or "relief" within the Earth, and they view this in the context of physical nature in accordance with Newton's theory of gravity. So, it is no surprise that science bases its entire conception of the internal structure of the planet on this classical theory. In reality, however, nobody has tested anything in this regard, and there is no chance of something happening in this direction, at least with the technological means currently at our disposal.

The deep drilling conducted by the Russians that I have already referred to was a shocking blow to contemporary science. They have shown very clearly, based on the data obtained from penetrating the Earth's crust on Kola Island, that the density of rocks did not, as was expected from the scientific theory, increase in proportion with depth; nor did the speed of the seismic waves increase. Moreover, and once again contrary to the predicted theory, there were no changes in the physical properties of the rock layers that were drilled.

Such data and conclusions are the kind of information that is immediately suppressed and unpublished in the broader environment, or simply ignored. Not only is it embarrassing to modern science, it also raises serious credibility issues in scientific theories and in many other areas, especially in the quantum and nuclear fields. The data from the Russian drilling has clearly shown that the traditional idea that geophysical measurements carried out on the surface should correspond with the natural materials in the terrestrial crust materials is, in fact, completely false and must be changed. Even so, contemporary science continues to work with this idea, paying no attention to these results. People are still taught these theories in schools and universities but without any of the details; and instead, by presenting just the model which the researchers consider to be viable. For example, the science of geology presents the theory that continental plates are characterized by a great discontinuity in the velocity of seismic wave movement at a depth of five kilometers which is attributed to a change of rock layer from granite to basalt. The drilling on the island of Kola showed that such a discontinuity does indeed exist but at a much greater depth (between 8.5 and 9.5 kilometers).

The Russians, moreover, have detected other discontinuities of this type, in addition to the aforesaid erroneous depth postulated by science. The final death blow to their theory, however, comes from the fact that the basalt layer that had been predicted at a depth of five kilometers did not even appear at a depth of 9.5 kilometers; and further yet, it did not even appear at a depth of twelve kilometers, the deepest drilling depth to which they had drilled. While there is indeed a zone of discontinuity that exists between tectonic plates, it turned out that, after the drill passed beyond this area, the nature of the rocks did not change as the researchers had expected.

This example shows how far and how fast scientists can be deceived when a theory is not supported by practical evidence. If such a mismatch between scientific theory and experimental evidence occurred at a depth of ten to twelve kilometers, how can we believe what science tells us is happening or what exists in the center of the planet at a depth of 6,300 kilometers?

Results that invalidate this pet scientific theory were also obtained by the Germans who also dug to a great depth. Guided by this theory, which states that there should be a delineation of the rocks at a depth of 3 kilometers, this was not yet identified at a depth of 3.5 kilometers. The problem is that, whenever scientists fail to discover the internal structure that they predicted, they say that "perhaps this will be found at a greater depth." But if so, then why did they not achieve their expected results that was based upon their measurements and analysis of the duration of seismic wavelength propagation? If they really were so precise, there should have been no problems, and any errors would have been detected immediately.

OTHER ISSUES THAT DO NOT “FIT”

Another example of theoretical disparity concerns the pressure inside of the Earth which they say is so great that it would practically close or seal any hole made by a drilling hole as well as any naturally existing exit, fracture or porosity. In fact, nothing of this kind was discovered as result of deep drilling; and moreover, geologists were disturbed by the fact that, when such drilling was done, they encountered the totally unexpected: fluids in circulation such as highly mineralized water and also gas. The hubris of Western scholars, however, has not been diminished by these obvious results. They then blamed the Russians for using an inferior drilling technique, but the same result was also obtained by the Germans who discovered hot fluids in open fractures at 3,400 kilometers deep, a depth at which scientists did not even dream of finding such.

The subject of the Earth’s core is also controversial, having been described in various ways: in the form of an ovoid, a sphere or even as a hexagon. If the measurements of the seismic waves are as accurate as is stated, then how does one explain such “scientific” babble?

On the other hand, the issue of “topographical relief” existing inside the planet began to surface when it was discovered that rocks actually have a “flexibility” factor of five percent when they are traversed by seismic waves, even at very deep depths. While the science of seismic tomography provides the possibility of viewing the structure of the Earth’s mantle in a three-dimensional format, it is not yet clear what these images represent. Are they showing that there is a “relief” landscape in the mantle or the pressure changes in those areas? Some scientists are even talking about continental-sized objects in the center of the Earth or about mountains and valleys at various depths of the upper mantle or lower crust. Thus, we can now say that the first doubts about the true reality within our planet are beginning to arise within the minds of some researchers who are, in turn, asking serious questions. As there is no actual evidence that the pressure inside the planet has the enormous value that science expects, these doubts are all the more justified.

There are other serious questions that have not been answered so far by science. Amongst them is the problem of the planet “shaking” as it rotates around its own axis, as if something of a liquid nature within it would cause these slight variations in movement over the years. Although scientists have searched for all sorts of explanations for these small perturbations in the axis rotation, they did not bother to think that the Earth might be “empty” inside, and further; that the immense mass of water inside or “inner ocean” could lead to this slight alteration of movement.

One of the greatest mysteries that science struggles with, which invalidates the scientific theory of the solid and rigid structure of the Earth on the inside, concerns the observation of deep sea earthquakes. Normally, ordinary earthquakes occur up to a depth of 100-150 kilometers, beyond which, according to scientific theory, the pressure and temperature would be so high that the tension between the rock layers would cause the tectonic plates to slip over one another rather than fracture. Science tells us that rocks at these depths somehow become elastic or ductile in a certain sense; mainly, that they “soften” and that their sudden and catastrophic fracture is no longer possible. That is why theory teaches that, because there is no tension, earthquakes should no longer exist beyond the depth of 150 kilometers.

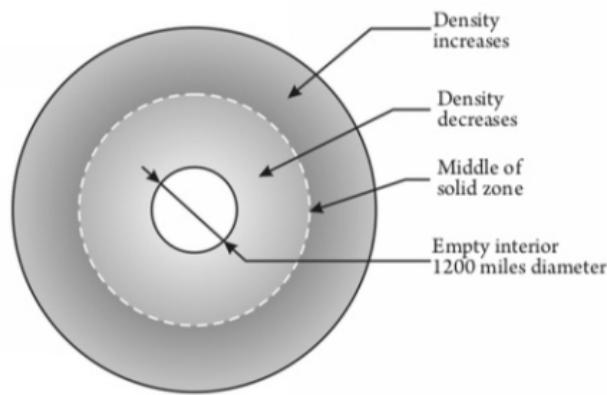

Over twenty percent of earthquakes, however, are deep-sea earthquakes. Earthquakes with the intensity of 8.2 on the Richter scale have been recorded, for example, at a depth of 650 kilometers. Another strange fact is that these deep-sea earthquakes have similar properties to shallow ones, including the fact that they have fracture characteristics. These measurements virtually abolish the scientific theories of laboratories which state that such a reality cannot exist at those depths due to the very high pressures and temperatures there. Nevertheless, such earthquakes are still perfectly possible and do indeed happen; and it is science itself that makes this all known as if they, in this way, seem to be nailing their own sole. Deep sea earthquakes show exactly the opposite of scientific prediction: namely, that the pressure inside the planet at those depths is not nearly as great as it is believed and the temperature is also quite low.

Scientists believe that if seismic waves can reach any point on the planet, it then means that the Earth is completely rigid and solid inside. For example, they say that if it contained a lot of lava, large seismic waves could not move and would not be able to reach different points on the globe. They therefore conclude that, for the most part, the Earth must be solid in the interior so that such seismic waves are crossing solid matter and reaching various points in the world, all according to the measurements made.

A computer model, however, simulating an Earth with an empty interior with a diameter of about 1,200 kilometers, revealed a different story. In such a case, the simulations showed that the seismic waves would also spread across the entire surface of the planet, giving the impression that the Earth would be solid inside. In this model, the density does not rise constantly toward the center of the planet, as scientists think, but it increases toward the outer core and then drops as it approaches the inner core of the planet. This model would also explain the very large deviations of waves that show their reflection and strong refraction from the core of the planet.

A HYPOTHETICAL, BUT MORE VIABLE, PHYSICAL MODEL OF THE EMPTY INNER EARTH

The whole idea of the structure of the Earth being based upon an “outer core” and “inner core” is, in fact, only an invention of scholars relying on certain assumptions. They have measured different types of seismic waves and have seen that the primary waves, which propagate only through solid matter, do not pass into certain areas while the secondary waves, which can propagate through a liquid medium, do pass. From here, they deduced that it must be a molten environment and thus invented the theory of an “outer core” as molten metal that surrounds an inner core that is solid. The model of the Earth with a solid inside, however, features the inconsistency of the seismic waves reducing their velocity in the inner core while, on the contrary, this should increase due to it being solid matter. Scientists have determined this mysterious slowdown to be an effect of change in the elasticity of the core, a factor contributing to the change in speed. The empty Inner Earth model, however, solves all these mismatches and predicts results that are in agreement with various types of measurements that have been carried out and without the need for the theory of an outer core and an inner core.

All of these problems arise because scientists are stubborn about accepting or finding a model of the Earth's internal structure that fits in with the enormous mass of the planet that was indicated from Cavendish's unfortunate experiment. In this case, they have to find a way of explaining how a lot of matter is condensed in a given volume so as to verify the value of Earth's mass that was provided by the experiment. Their only possibility in this regard is to find evidence that matter is changing its density within the planet and that it grows enormously towards its center. In this way, they could also explain incomprehensible changes in the speed of seismic waves at certain depths within the planet.

THE SITUATION TODAY

Some scientists realize that the reality within the planet is different from what current theory supports, but if they were to dare to present another viewpoint, they would be ostracized by the reaction of the scientific community. In this way, it seems that one hand is washing the other and, under the tangle of terrible manipulation and a very oppressive control of progress and scientific ideas, Mankind is actually held under an embargo on the knowledge of reality and scientific ideas. Dr. Xien has repeatedly specified to me that the "evidence" and measurements regarding the internal structure of the planet only seem to portray a certain reality, the one that scientists want to impose, but the truth is completely different. It has already been demonstrated that the planet, which is believed to be a compact full-faced planet, might be hollow at its center by reason of the existing data and measurements that have been recorded. Therefore, it is only a matter of interpretation by contemporary scientists who prefer the solid Earth model, even if it exhibits innumerable inconsistencies and even if it is proven by experimental evidence to be false.

An eventual recognition of the model with an empty interior of the planet would automatically attract many awkward questions to which science is still far from providing competent answers. What follow are just a few examples: How did that "void" form inside? What's there? What is the heat and energy source of the planet? What makes up her magnetic field? What are the environmental conditions in that "empty" environment?

Avoiding such challenges, scientists do not even want to recognize their own conceptual boundaries. Nor do they not want to abandon the obsolete and horizonless paradigm of materialism, a mind-set they seek to maintain desperately in any explanation or scientific hypothesis they express, both on the inner reality of the planet as well as the outer reality. In fact, this “curse” of a dusty vision has even extended into the quantum domain where phenomena is not understood in terms of the essence of its subtle energy but rather tends to be interpreted in the spirit of purely materialistic ideas and principles.

When I replied to Dr. Xien that we ourselves cannot provide concrete evidence of how things happen inside the Earth, he had a lot to say.

“This is true. You cannot show what is unseen, but there are still many people who have gone through these experiences in one form or another, more or less consciously. They usually sense these experiences when they either become conscious while dreaming or consciously recognize the etheric or astral plane at the time they are led to the inside of the planet. Sharing many delicate common points of agreement, these experiences cannot be explained by reason of access to the collective subconscious because these elements do not belong to daily activity. Many of these people, however, either do not realize where they have arrived nor do they understand the subtle mechanism that is involved here. Upon returning, their memories are usually blurred or, if they are clear, they are not fully understood. Many of the distinctive elements I have explained to you such as visions, perceptions, or situations related to the interior of the Earth are the same as some people already experience. They do not, however, know what it all means.

“So, why do such people not tell others what they have lived?” I asked Dr. Xien.

“For fear of appearing to look ridiculous. The lack of a certain initiatory knowledge or understanding the conscious power of entering makes them unable to correlate all of the aspects of their experience, and they therefore prefer to remain silent and conceal what they know.”

Desiring to clarify this issue, I asked Dr. Xien a question.

“Does the one who travels this way know where he is and understand that he has entered inside the Earth?”

“They often do not realize this. It depends upon the nature of what is experienced and the level of consciousness of that person. That is why a traveler to these realms is accompanied by one or more guides, i.e. other beings of the interior or in the celestial worlds whose mission is to lead and sometimes inform that being about what is happening, but this is not always enough for her to understand or remember. Often, at some time after the experience, everything tends to be concentrated in the category of interesting dreams; but, in reality, the being has lived a real experience from which he can learn a lot. Instead, when access is direct, starting from the physical plane through a portal or internal passage as is the case in Bucegi, the situation is highly advantageous because then you “translate” the whole structure of the being, including the physical body. This is important, provided the continuity of consciousness remains.”

I realized that, in the end, everything seems to be a matter of inner preparation for the being, an aspect that involves our level of consciousness. Our access to the spirituality within the Earth depends upon the stage we have reached. This led me to the following rhetorical observation.

“I suspect that not any such conscious experience means going inside the Earth.”

“Not at all. Such trips are dedicated, have a precise purpose, and the people involved have certain affinities or tendencies towards those regions within the Earth, whether they realize it or not. Everything has a meaning and nothing occurs by chance. Such experiences do not happen anytime or to anyone, but even so, I assure you that there are many souls who have experienced such experiences and not just once. But, you cannot discuss this with scientists because it is a non-existent domain for them.

“But, is there anyone who has penetrated the planet directly from the physical plane? I am not referring here to our tunnel.”

Dr. Xien had an almost imperceptible smile. His answer was very close to Cezar’s comment.

“There are but very few cases. Such entrances to the interior of the Earth, starting from the physical plane, are well guarded and blocked from outside access. Actually, they are more like ‘buffer zones’ between the physical plane and the etheric plane that lead to the interior of the planet. You have to be there at the right time and under the right circumstances to be given access; for example, when entering caves and usually in mountainous regions. If it is on a wide and open surface, such as on water or in the air, then most of those who experience such do not understand what is going on. Their astonishment becomes very great, and it is not clear what phenomenon has happened. Most return to the surface world, but some remain there in one of the worlds within the Earth.

“Are they the ones who choose to do that?” I asked out of curiosity.

“No, it is a matter of destiny, but in certain cases, there is the possibility of choice.”

“And, if you pass through such a gate, coming from the surface of the planet, you consciously come into subtle planes and arrive inside it,” I said. “Just as I have described to you, but only if you have the level of consciousness for that, and only if you can understand what is happening then.” I was to soon convince myself of it. I left Dr. Xien and retired to my room to rest. The last two days had been challenging both mentally and physically, so I wanted to be in shape for the expedition that was about to happen. Falling asleep immediately, I slipped into a wonderful dream, but I know for sure that I had not yet gotten inside the Earth.

CHAPTER THREE — TOMASSIS, THE ANCIENT ROOT

I spent the rest of that night meditating on the real structure of the interior of our planet as had been explained to me by Dr. Xien and Cezar.

Practically speaking, this includes almost no points of convergence with the theories of modern science. With great power, the dogmatism and the stubbornness of scientists oppose a broader and more effective vision that would propel Mankind to a higher level of knowledge and achievement. Perhaps the balance will soon incline to the brighter side of life with the ignorance and narrow judgment being cast away.

THE SURPRISE OF THE SECOND TUNNEL

Cezar arrived the next day around noon, and we both worked on organizing the expedition, leaving behind the necessary instructions and orders for those at the base. He told me that, in principle, we would only be away for a few hours. Upon hearing this, I was amazed and even a little disappointed because I thought we would not be traveling too far inside the planet.

“You will see that this journey is different from the previous one you took through the tunnel to Egypt. It is done differently, and in the first phase, we will only go through the secondary branch of the tunnel.

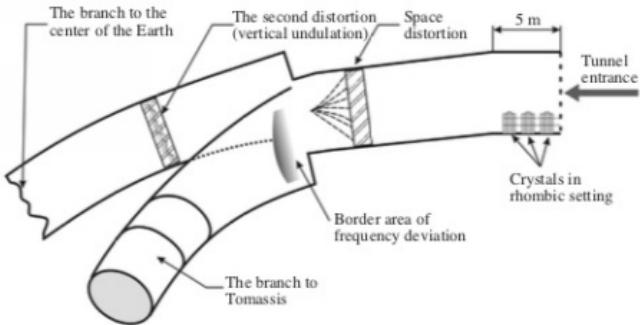

Busy with certain orders he had to give, Cezar did not give me any further details at that point. I had no idea how we were to travel or what he had meant by “secondary branch.” My expectation, however, was short because we were already in the Projection Hall by 9:00 A.M. the next day. This time, we arrived at the secret location in Bucegi by helicopter. I had slept well; but for no apparent reason, when I got to the front of the console, I was suddenly imbued with a deep emotion that melted me. I believed it to be the influence of a subconscious and egotistical defense reaction which was manifesting itself vigorously as a result of the actualization of the information I had previously received about the true internal structure of our planet. It was obvious that this expedition, even short-lived, in some way implied an alteration of ordinary consciousness, and it is very likely that my own subconscious was reacting in this way so as to defend my egocentric conceptions and prejudices that had been fostered and fixed by living in modern society; and further, it was trying to stop me.

UPDATE

Managing as best as I could, I became aware of the orders that Cezar began to set on the console. The graphic responses on the glossy screen were different in shape and color, and I did not recognize any of them. After several seconds in front of the console, a holographic projection of the Second Tunnel appeared, its trajectory shown only up to a certain point. Unlike the other holograms that I was already familiar with that depicted the entrance to the tunnel, this one presented the structure for a longer distance. The first major difference from the tunnel to Egypt was that the space distortion appeared at a certain distance after the twelve crystals, not before them. As I have said, the tunnel descended on a relatively smooth slope, and after a distance I approximated to be a few dozen meters, a cone or funnel was followed by a large cubic space larger than the diameter of the tunnel, inside of which we saw a strange phenomenon: the image appeared as if one reality was offset by the other, and the common area vibrated slightly. Then there was a bifurcation which was undoubtedly the “bifurcation” that Cezar had referred to: a branch of the tunnel with a small angle of inclination downwards as well as a second branch continuing in the initial direction of the tunnel. Here, at a short distance from the bifurcation, the hologram had a new distortion. It was vertical, but its surface was slightly undulating and was dark blue with purple tones. I suspected that the purpose of the distortion was to facilitate an earlier attempt to penetrate the subtle etheric plane, a sort of “shortcut” to the center of the Earth.

STRUCTURAL DEPICTION OF THE SECOND TUNNEL WITH THE BIG CUBE AND THE BIFURCATION

Indicating to me that we would enter the branch with the slight angle, Cezar spoke.

"It's important to first get used to this kind of world and with the frequencies inside the planet," he explained. "These are inhabited worlds and each one has its peculiarities."

He told me that we would be going to an area inside the Earth, a living city called Tomassis. Such trips are based on well established protocols as visits involve different levels and domains: information, political, administrative, commercial, and military. I was the beginning of only my second expedition through the tunnels inside the secret location in Bucegi, but Cezar had already done thirty-four. Having personally documented the general reports in the Department's archive, I knew that he had explored practically all of the possibilities offered by the three tunnels in the Projection Room. Most of his trips to the Inner Earth were either with Romanian-American mixed teams or, especially after 2010, by himself. In his new position at the level of the Department and due to the information we had access to in the last few years, I know some elements about the nature and implications of Cezar's twenty-seven singular missions within our planet. I do not allow myself to reveal them, however, nor to present any sensitive details in this direction. I can give descriptions up to a certain point, in the name of informing people correctly and presenting some of the secret elements, but these disclosures should not point to delicate strategic information or to details that might disrupt ongoing plans.

After several discussions we had over time, Cezar and I set a series of parameters in order to balance the information I am presenting. Even though the books I am writing do not necessarily represent what the Secret Service wants, there is a limitation of disclosure which allows for a tacit approval by the latter. The reader may have noticed a certain lack of detail of sensitive points, but I have tried to supplement this with several drawings to make it easier to understand the elements presented. There are, however, limitations that cannot and must not be crossed at the current juncture of our world.

While much of the information is a state secret, it does fall into the category of general knowledge, at least at the conceptual level. While it cannot be used in a literal sense, it can contribute to a change in the mentality of the population towards its higher evolution. For example, even nowadays, many of the American and Romanian military officials and other senior officials of secret government agencies involved in these projects do not correctly understand the true nature of the planet's interior nor the subtle phenomena that is going on there. Lacking solid esoteric knowledge and having a habit of treating such elements as either potential physical threats or as issues to be dealt with by control and domination, they are prevented from believing or having a deep understanding of what actually happens when they interact with the reality within the Earth.

I have noticed that there is still much opacity and doubt with regard to correctly perceiving information from the ultra secret reports that reach decision makers. On the one hand, this is due to a lack of conceptual training of military leaders and heads of agencies or departments. On the other hand, it has to do with their habit of trusting and relying too much on the advanced technologies they have at their disposal as well as the modes of action that are specific to the physical plane.

The technology and huge funds that are allocated represent neither a guarantee for a good understanding of the situation nor for correct decisions being made with regard to certain negotiations with those inside the Earth. This requires many explanations, meetings, discussions and clarifications; but as life in the military and intelligence agencies is by itself very agitated and concrete, it does not easily allow for the assimilation of sensitive information on the surrounding reality. Generally speaking, military chiefs and Earth leaders are tributaries of mental habits and the education system in which they live; so, it is difficult for them to conceive that there might be another reality than the physical one that they are accustomed to and in which they act.

There is also the matter of interference from the state. It is very difficult to combine the reality of subtle higher dimensions and worlds with physically concrete desires and ideas and tendencies that are characterized by a low vibrational frequency which includes conquering new territories, controlling the population, discretionary use of energy resources, and political and military influences. Due to this incompatibility, the Earth's leaders do not understand almost anything about the phenomena that occurs when the Inner Earth is penetrated, and that's why they do not have access there. In other words, they do not seem to understand that oil cannot be mixed with water.

The very special protocol that exists between Romania and America regarding the secret location in the Bucegi Mountains, as well as the discoveries that have been made during the expeditions through the three tunnels, has solved some of these aspects and has also created some extraordinary opportunities. Suspicion and occult interests from state-run chains, however, which have their own understanding of the situation, still represent a strong barrier to openness and direct action. When it comes to such a level of collaboration between civilizations, problems can only be solved if there is a qualitative leap in the consciousness. The old way of thinking and acting, with divisions of territories and geo-strategic influences among the world's leading leaders, is not only awkward in such a case but also completely ineffective.

Cezar and Colonel Obadea had long grasped these aspects, and this is precisely why they sought to alter the bellicose vision of decision-making emanating in both Romania and the United States. The unexpected death of the General has made it difficult, but Cezar did not give up. Gradually, through sustained efforts, he managed to maintain a certain balance of conception and intent with the higher decision-making bodies, especially the military ones. There is an almost primal fear from the military when their technologies are either greatly out-dated or when they cannot understand a certain reality of things. The fact that they cannot know or have access to something creates the false impression that something is threatening and should therefore be treated with hostility. It's like an instinctive security need that, in fact, reflects the hidden desire to conquer and have power.

There is a huge difference between this kind of world vision and the reality that exists in the worlds inside the planet. To some extent, I was aware of the complex ties, especially at the diplomatic level, which Cezar has in this respect, as well as the discrete but extremely effective help that Dr. Xien has offered at key times. I had long guessed that this mysterious character from the Orient, whom I had known as Repa Sundhi, has missions that are far more complex than they seem at first glance. The powers and ramifications of the links between the exterior and the interior of the planet are extraordinary; and even if such circumstances seem unreasonable and strange in the context of today's world, such beings do indeed exist and manifest their presence and influence at critically key times in order to sustain the good.

After the General's death, there were some opinions in the secret services that sought to induce the idea that Dr. Xien's intentions were not sincere. When that occasion arose, I was very surprised to learn that Dr. Xien's deeper identity was also independently known and even documented to a certain extent. Up to that point, I was convinced that the only ones who knew that Dr. Xien was actually Repa Sundhi were those in Department Zero. Moreover, Elinor's existence was known of, and even though I did not have access to the entire file, which is from another section of the Secret Services, I saw some references about his presence in Switzerland. I do not want to go into details, which are quite complicated, but the information about his presence in Switzerland was conjectural and inaccurate. He is indeed in Europe but not in that country.

From a certain level up, the game of information within the Secret Service becomes very delicate. It is sometimes like a kind of barter between the parties and can even be constructive with mutual benefits. This balance is usually maintained until military interests arise, at which point the weight of arguments tend to bend in one direction. The nuances and psychology of the game increase at high levels of diplomacy; and when discussions are held with representatives of other worlds, emotions also play an important role.

In recent years, there have been several distinct phases of these conversations. Although progress has been difficult, there is a positive trend at work. From what I have learned from Cezar, the present phase requires a process of "educating" human beings who are in leadership roles with decision-making power, but this is done only in accordance with their own will and power of understanding. In such cases, it is most appropriate to utilize patience and perseverance.

Taking advantage of a relative "lull" from these encounters and very complex discussions, Cezar decided to grant me a higher level of access; and so I came to know very important elements about the planet's interior. Now, I was with him right before my first trip to such a world. To be honest, I thought that everything would be more “spectacular” or “grander,” but the circumstances now seemed so natural that I was slightly disheartened. Cezar behaved very naturally, seeking to make me calm and able to reasonably approach the events at hand. As I would later learn, emotional behavior is very important in such expeditions and meetings. It is one thing to go to a safe place in which there are only objects, as in the case of the First Tunnel, but it is another situation entirely to go to a place where complex energy interactions and relationships are involved. Because the energy frequencies of the physical plane are merging with the frequencies of the subtle etheric plane towards the interior of the Earth, the energy balance of the being is very important, and it requires a stability of emotions. This is why Cezar had chosen a short period of time for our journey inside the Earth, probably so as not to overpower my subconscious and to avoid reactions or other undesirable emotional manifestations of being.

We were both on the threshold of the Second Tunnel which enveloped us with its diffused green light. Cezar took the leather diplomatic bag, the contents of which I did not know, and looked inquiringly at me. Breathing deeply and shaking my head, I told him that I was ready.

As I headed for one of the special vehicles that were parked there, Cezar said to me, “We do not need them for this trip. The road is shorter than you think.”

He was amused by my astonishment, for it is true that I did not expect to walk to the middle of the planet.

“On this branch of the tunnel, things are simpler. We do not have much to go after the first distortion.”

Walking into the tunnel somewhat hesitantly, I suddenly noticed an almost completely soundproofed ambience. My ears seemed to be covered with earphones, and I could hear my heartbeat. We both walked silently and swiftly past the gorgeously colored crystals that shined mysteriously in discrete light. As I was walking, I perceived a doorway effect; and while it was not disturbing, it made me feel somewhat insecure. Looking down, I saw that the material covering the ground was solid, smooth and almost glossy.

The sound insulation began to disappear immediately after we passed the crystalline area. The tunnel descended smoothly in front of us, but after about forty meters, what we saw seemed to make no sense. The tunnel seemed to be “offset” or “doubled” upon itself, but the area was unclear as if it were blurred. Intrigued, I hurried a little ahead of Cezar to get to that area faster. I stopped about a meter away from the passageway, staring at a reality that I could not interpret. It was like looking at a neon tube with indigo light. I could not see the contours clearly, but I found that this was valid only for the vertical surface, like a screen that delimited the area. Looking “beyond” that surface, I saw a cube-shaped space larger than the tunnel itself, a sort of antechamber at the bifurcation beyond the cube. I approximated the depth of the cube as being almost ten meters. What surprised me was the fact that, beyond the “double,” the outlines were clear again.

I realized that the transition area somehow made it possible to “alter” the physical plane as a passage to the etheric plane and admit that I was shivering a bit before going through the “double,” but I noticed only a slight dizziness when I passed through it. Beyond the transition zone, the soil was also solid and yet different. I suppose I could say it was more refined. It is hard to explain, but the impression was that matter had a less dense consistency.

“Those who built it had access to a very advanced technology, but they also had a profound knowledge of the universe,” Cezar explained. “The Projection Hall and tunnels are some sort of legacy that they left behind by establishing fixed access points. They created several spatial distortions that increase vibrational frequency in order to facilitate traveling through the tunnels. The first distortion is general and exists in all three tunnels, raising the vibrational frequency of the body to prepare it for the underground journey. The one you just passed through brought your being closer to the etheric plan and made a kind of ‘jump’ between dimensions.”

“A jump?” I answered, intrigued. “What kind of jump?”

“Take the keys out of your pocket and throw them back through the ‘double’ area,” Cezar told me.

I threw the keys back into the tunnel, but I was amazed to find that they disappeared as soon as they passed the surface of the screen.

“You’ll find them in the tunnel when we get back, but you cannot see them from here. It seems to be just a relative continuity, but it is actually quite a jump in space.”

I began to understand why we did not necessarily need electric vehicles to move through this tunnel, but as I looked towards the mysterious space distortion on my right side, I could see that this was blocked by a discontinuity of an indigo-violet color which seemed to be crossed at certain points by short fast moving waves.

“That’s where we’ll be on our next trip,” said Cezar. “It is more special and leads right to the center; but first, you have to prepare yourself through this branch.”

We both entered the slowly descending left corridor. The tunnel seemed to be getting darker and narrower; but after about twenty meters, I saw bright yellow reflections on its walls. As the yellow color got stronger, the light in the tunnel became more intense, even to the point where it was shining right in front of us. I stopped again, hesitantly. Cezar urged me forward, telling me that we had reached the “first station.”

“We only just left on the expedition,” I replied. “Too short a road!”

“So it seems if you are thinking about the laws of physics you are familiar with. The reality is that we made a ‘jump’ and now we’ll be making a second one. It is important to remember that things and phenomena in the etheric plane no longer have the same characteristics as they do in the physical plane.

“So Dr. Xien was right!” I exclaimed, forgetting the slight hesitation I had just had in front of the bright light. “Inside the planet we can even get into subtle planes!”

In what was a surprisingly rare moment, Cezar had a short laugh.

“Did you even doubt it?” he asked. “The truth in this case is that our passage into the etheric plane was not due to advancing through the thickness of the mantle and crust of the planet, but it rather has a more practical purpose in order to make the movement very efficient. This branch of the tunnel and the sequence of distortions have been precisely designed and planned. Originally, when it was made, it was not known exactly what it was that was beyond, but you can now convince yourself of what is there right now.

Saying this, he put his arm around my shoulder and we passed through the blinding intense light at the entrance, into a gateway that has no exit at the surface.

DRYN

The crossing was smooth, like a kind of slow-motion, and the light did not blind me. When I stepped out to the other side, I felt a return to something familiar. We were in a large room, like a hemisphere resembling a tall but well chiseled cave. I approximated the length of the room to be about 30-35 meters. Looking back, I could no longer see the intense light but only the oval outline of a slightly bright surface with metallic reflections.

When I returned to the room, I saw two men of medium height moving forward toward us. Their skin was light olive, and they had black hair. One of them raised a hand with his palm facing forward, making a sign for us to remain in our place. He seemed to be listening carefully to someone via a small rectangular device that was attached to his right temple, and I suspected that various transmissions and commands were being made through it. The man seemed to have received a certain order with something being explained to him. He gave a brief reply before both of them stopped before us, making a sign to wait.

Comfortably waiting, Cezar and I remained there for about a half minute. I took advantage of this opportunity to examine the area better. It looked like a natural cave that had been artificially widened. The rocky walls of the mountain were sanded and polished to some extent, but traces of the modification were still visible; the rocks being neither glossy nor perfectly smooth. We seemed to be in a passageway that also served as a storage hangar. In the back, I saw several crates and boxes of great size, one above the other. There were also parcels and other objects, but I could not tell what they were nor did I notice any vehicles.

The place was austere, even having a Spartan look. As a matter of fact, the impression that it was a military area was reinforced by the uniforms of the two men. Additionally, I noticed three other people who were wearing the same type of uniform and moving around the room, performing different actions. The slight military style was particularly noticeable in their boots which featured double straps around the ankle area. Their clothes appeared to be made of a lightweight beige-colored material with dark brown stripes, without being complicated like military uniforms in our world. The two men in front of us wore black belts and in the chest area, they wore tunics with several pockets.

I did not notice any weapons neither in the room nor amongst the equipment that was there. I asked Cezar if this was the usual procedure for this facility, but even before he answered, I noticed another character approaching from a large group of crates stacked one above the other. Taller than the two soldiers before us, he wore a garment similar to a gray-white coat with a belt at the waist. From his dignified bearing and the specificity of his clothes, I tended to think he was a monk, perhaps a spiritual mentor of the place, or a distinguished member in the spiritual hierarchy of that community. Looking at him, I recognized him as the one who had appeared for a few seconds a few days ago as a holographic image in the Projection Hall. I already knew from Cezar that his name was Dryn.

I noticed that his robe had a hood, but it was not on his head. His hair was whitish blond and was longer than the other two men who were in front of us. He seemed to be a man of up to about fifty years old and had black eyes with white skin, but it was not a pale white but rather vivid and even shiny. As he approached, I felt a sudden empathy for his gentleness and his wisdom. I was not surprised by the nature of these qualities but rather by the clear and direct way in which I was perceiving them, much easier than would have been the case in the surface world. As Dryn came before us, he gave a slight bow to Cezar as a welcoming gesture but then turned and spoke to me, as if responding to my inner inquiries.

“All your sensations and capabilities are somewhat amplified here. The vibrational frequency of the matter here is slightly higher than the frequency of the physical matter at the surface. It is still physical matter, but more refined, getting very close to the frequency of the plane that you call etheric. Functions are easier to carry out due to the lower density.

I was watching and hearing him speak a language I did not know it even though it seemed to me to be somewhat familiar as some of his words were close to ancient Greek and Latin. What amazed me the most was the fact that I perfectly understood what he was telling me even though I did not know that language. Somehow, the man gave me the meaning of his words telepathically, but for my convenience and to preserve the appearances and nature of that reality, he was still using the spoken language even though I realized that he could just as well have used telepathic transmission.

Reflexively, I was thinking that he did not introduce himself, but he promptly responded.

“You already know my name. You have found that out.”

He had a very direct way of being, and I could sense in him the presence of an extraordinary force of will which, although not dominating, still produced a gentle unrelenting firmness. Making a gesture with his hand, Dryn pointed to the left towards a sort of platform on the wall of the room where I saw a construction that looked like glass.

THE DIMENSIONAL ELEVATOR

As we headed to the platform, I was experiencing a certain degree of mental confusion with regard to how I was able to understand the meaning of the spoken language I had been listening to even though I did not know that language. I was preparing to ask for some clarification, but Dryn was showing me that he had not exhausted all of his surprises because I then heard him speak in Romanian without almost any accent.

“Okay. In this case, we will communicate directly in your language. We know it; and, in a certain way, it represents us.”

I was just about to answer him as we arrived at and ascended upon the platform at the end of the ramp. My attention was attracted to a kind of cabin with transparent walls, apparently embedded in the rock. It looked like a fairly large elevator and had a rounded entrance, like a semicircle. When we came to the door, it glided and Cezar and I entered that space, followed by Dryn and the two soldiers. The cabin was quite wide, measuring about 2.5 meters wide and two meters deep, and I immediately realized it was not made of glass but of another perfectly transparent and durable material.

The door was closed automatically even though I had not noticed any control panels, buttons, nor any other device that might activate it. The elevator then began to descend in the first few seconds at a relatively slow speed; but then the speed increased until I could no longer distinguish the details of the areas I was passing through. All I saw was a very fast roll of layers of different colors. The only noise I was feeling was a slight buzz, or rather a murmur, apparently created by the very high speed of travel. I did not, however, feel the strong acceleration as would be expected at that speed.

Several questions spontaneously appeared in my mind. First, what kind of “lift” was this which seemed to be break through and into the planet? Is there a deep shaft inside the Earth through which this elevator runs? How deep is it and how was this accomplished? What was the technology that made the lift move at such a very high speed without friction becoming critical? What was the source of energy that propelled it? What kind of “grip” or attachment did the elevator have on the corridor through which it was moving?

While these questions appeared in my mind, I was looking with great interest through the transparent walls of the cabin. I saw beds of rocks moving by at a very rapid sequence, and we passed by lava streams twice, feeling a slight increase in temperature but in a pleasant way. Sure, passing through lava without touching the walls of the lift was another issue that I wanted to decipher in later discussions, but I really enjoyed the impact of the radiation that the lava was emitting, perhaps because of the intense orange color which had gained a special glow as I passed through it at such a high speed. The heat that the lava beds emanated was different from that of radiators, a stove or the usual fire. I do not know why, but the two phases in which we crossed through layers of lava impressed me deeply, even if each such crossings did not last more than a few seconds. Our elevator trip took only about half a minute. As soon as I had barely begun to dazzle myself, I felt the deceleration but only for a very short distance and without unpleasant effects. During the last portion, I think no more than a meter and a half, the lift was moving at the same slower speed that we experience in the elevators in our world, just before they stop.

The door then slid to the left, and we went out of the cabin. For a moment, I thought my heart was going to stop with amazement and delight. We were on a mountain plateau, about halfway up that mountain, and a wide valley opened before us with a city that was stretching out to the shore of a calm sea in the distance. I was engrossed in deep emotion, not just for the sight we were seeing but especially over the fact that we knew it was inside our planet.

THE CAVITY AND ITS PECULIARITIES

As much as I wanted to associate what I was seeing and feeling with nature as it appears on the Earth's surface, there were still a whole series of elements that appeared strange. Moreover, I had the unmistakable feeling that things in general were different, including the vibrational nature of this environment. On the surface, what I was viewing was ordinary; and yet it all seemed wrapped-up in something peculiar. I also had the impression that I was seeing a highly evolved and clean ecosystem.

When we stepped out of the elevator, we were on a platform that was an extension of the rock wall, and what we saw was a human designed landscape but without artificial materials. For example, the soil was a mixture of sand and fine pebbles, and the rocky sides of the entrance to the elevator were slightly arched. The rocks had not been polished, but they seemed to be carefully carved. In the valley that opened up before us, I saw an inhabited city which spread to the left and to the right. Looking up, I saw a cloudy but bright sky of luminous lightning with a quiet reddish yellow color. The light was not bright nor did it have great intensity.

In the distance, close to the horizon and especially to the side, I could see how the sky seemed to bend in a way that is confusing and hard to describe. I could not distinguish clearly where the sea ended and where that strange atmosphere began. The entire landscape somehow creates the feeling that it “closes” somewhere in the distance. For example, I saw the rocks making a curved line as they tended to close into the horizon. I already had the impression that this was not too big of a cavity inside our planet, and I was beginning to wonder, with some disappointment, if this was the hollow interior in its center which has been the source of so many legends.

I saw Dryn turning to me, and for the first time, I noticed a fine smile on his noble face. As before, although those observations and conclusions were only in my mind, he still answered me loudly.

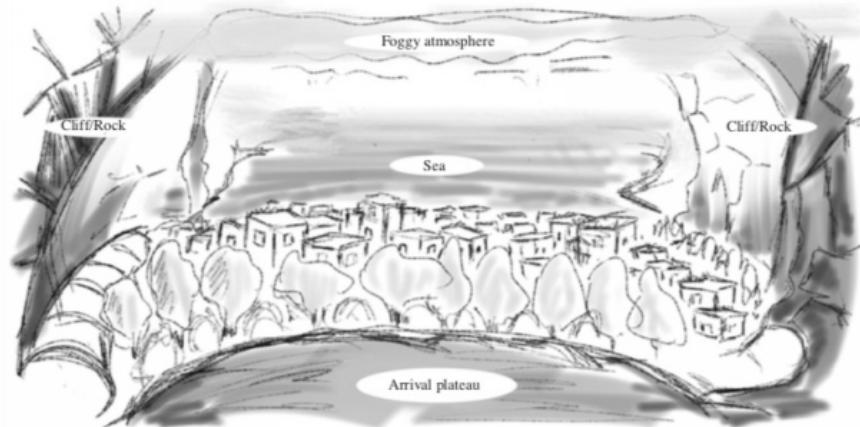

“No, this is not the empty interior in the center of the planet. You will probably end up there later on, and it will be special trip. What you see here is a big empty space inside of the solid bed of the planet. You call this layer inside the Earth the mantle, but your science does not understand either its structure or its functioning. As you can see, life has no problem developing here. You are not yet in a higher plane, and this is not a subtle plane of manifestation. You are still in a physical world, but it is more elevated than what is on the surface, and its vibrational frequency is very close to that of the plane you call etheric.

“Are there other cavities of this kind inside the mantle?” I dared to ask.

“Of course, and some of them are even bigger than this one. Many of them are inhabited and have their peculiarities. After you get used to the specifics here, you will then find out more.

Staring silently, Cezar did not interfere, and the two soldiers stood by, waiting respectfully. From the way Dryn had addressed me, I understood that my presence there had been discussed beforehand, and I realized that Cezar had called for that meeting so that I could gradually learn the mysteries of the planet’s interior; and in this process, Dryn assumed the role of a guide. Cezar probably had a plan for the future, but he did not reveal it to me.

GENERAL VIEW OF THE CITY OF TOMASSIS INSIDE THE EARTH

From my point of view, just as in the other amazing experiences I have had in Department Zero, I could not be anything other than deeply grateful for the extraordinary chance I was being offered. I do not exaggerate when I say that, to a certain extent, I was experiencing the impression of a “dream” that was as real as possible; and the truth is, in that case, the sensation was particularly amplified by the nature of the experience and the elements involved. I am referring in particular to the repeated crossings from one plane to another and to crossing spatial distortions that are likely to influence the ordinary perception of consciousness as well as its degree of vibration. In the absence of adequate training or familiarity with the respecting frequencies, passing through such spatial distortions can lead to a kind of “sweet dizziness” and even a slight euphoria during the first phases. Thoughts tend not to follow the usual course, and logical connections are sometimes strange. This condition, however, only lasts until the individual system manages to “reset” itself so as to accommodate the new demands it has been subjected to. One learns quite quickly, and if the level of consciousness is sufficiently evolved, the return to normal is fairly rapid and easy.

So, I took advantage of the short respite that Dryn had offered me to accommodate the new reality. Having many questions that were facing me, I decided to sort and organize them because I felt intuitively that I did not have much time to spare. Such expeditions are not like a holiday stay or a relaxing weekend in the mountains.

I realized there were two elements that intrigued me in particular: the “sky” above and the vegetation on the ground. For example, I did not see any sun, but the atmosphere was made up of a relatively thick blanket of “bright clouds”. The light seemed to be uniform and did not come from “something” in the sky but was evenly distributed in the compact mass of clouds, giving them a slightly orange tone that was not shiny. It was more like a radiant diffusion of light as opposed to an emanation from a dedicated and powerful source of light.

Actually, after a closer look, I realized that the term “clouds” was somewhat improper. What I saw in the sky was more like a continuous fog such as a mass of fog at a certain height that was diffused and uniformly lighted. Still, that compact mass of fog was not static but was visibly animated by certain atmospheric currents, and I could even see formations that were moving to its outer side with a weak reflection. The impression was that there was a mist of clouds; and in the background, there were “clouds” moving under the influence of high currents just as there are clouds on different layers and at different heights in our atmosphere.

One of the first things that attracted my attention was that the general light inside of the cavity was of low intensity, making me think that we were there on the threshold of either the evening or early morning. I associate that quality of brightness with the light that our sun emits about an hour after it rises on a cloudy day, thus signifying a relatively low intensity of light.

The second element that struck me was the vegetation. In the areas of the mountain to our left and right, it was missing. There were only cliffs and rocks without biological elements. The atmosphere was relatively moist, but I also noticed the presence of some winds, more like a light breeze. I estimated that the temperature in that space corresponded to a subtropical region, even if the flora and fauna were different from what you might find on the surface. Somehow, the ecosystem of that inner cavity ensures an optimal fit under the given conditions.

The vegetation began in the valley below and continued up to the city but also extended inside of it. I immediately noticed that the color of the plants was green but a brownish green. Combined with shadowy light, the colors seemed dull and without brilliance, but this does not mean that the plants or atmosphere were not lively. Vital energy emanated from every pore of that cavity, and I felt it as a clean, pure and profound energy. The colors, however, were not as vivid as in our world, and I did not see a great deal of nuances in that respect. Even the seawater had a dark color. It was not blue but a dark blue-green, and in some distant areas, towards the horizon, it was gray.

The vegetation was neither lush nor tall. Rather, I could say that it was dwarfish, like a juniper. The tallest trees were like shrubs. I noticed that the plants developed more horizontally, having large and broad fleshy leaves with strong fibers, something like the aloe leaf. Perhaps that particularity was due to the need to absorb as much light as possible in order to achieve photosynthesis, the leaves therefore requiring a larger surface.

THE TYPE OF PLANTS PREDOMINANT IN TOMASSIS

Those plants, shrubs, flowers, and the entire ecosystem there produced a sense of solidity, a sort of “power of life” that was, in its essence, simple force but with purity. As the minutes passed, I felt more and more clearly the infusion of a beneficial energy into my whole being such as I had never before felt on the surface of the Earth. This phenomenon probably contributed greatly to the balancing of my psycho-mental and energetic structure because I felt very confident with a great lust for life but, at the same time, internalized and focused. Even if I perceived the feeling of inner euphoria, which was probably due to the abundance of vital energy in that environment, I noticed that I naturally controlled my state and felt a conscious internal distribution of this great energy. The good mood that had appeared in my being was nevertheless effectively retained and channeled, and all of my faculties benefited from it. I was not sure if this process was controlled and directed by Dryn, but I tended to think it was a peculiarity of the place, something inherent in that space within the Earth.

One of the unusual features I had noticed was the lack of animals, but I did see some middle-sized birds flying at low altitudes. I cannot say for sure whether or not there is a rich fauna in that place, but I still tend to think it was sparse. The specificity of the vegetation and life of those people seems to have prevented the proliferation of animal species, at least in this particular cavity of the inner planet.

Feeling already in full form and being eager to find the answers to my questions, I wanted to find the source of the light in that place that I had not yet identified. That was one of the elements that struck me from the beginning: the uniformity of light across the sky at a low altitude.

According to my estimations, the mist that formed was at the height of typical storm clouds, not more than two or three hundred meters.

“There is not a sun in the sky to give off light, such as you have on the surface,” Dryn explained. “Here, the light comes from the strong radiation of the massive lava layer that is above our cavity. Temperature and light radiation is transmitted through the rocks, and the balance is ensured by the natural intelligence of the living energy and forces that do not belong to the physical plane. Because light does not come from an isolated source, it diffuses uniformly into the mass of clouds. There is a special process of interaction between the powerful lava radiation passing through successive layers of rock and the particles in the atmosphere here that ionize and create this twilight-like luminosity.

I smiled to myself, noting the style of Dryn’s explanations: clear, concise, direct and very precise. His mental abilities must have been truly remarkable. Still, I did not want to persist with such thoughts, knowing too well that it was not a problem for him to perceive them whether or not they were spoken. I was preparing to ask the next question when I noticed something very interesting.

IN FLIGHT OVER THE CITY

In front of us, four objects floated through the air which I would compare to small platforms. They first attracted my attention through their color and the fact that they seemed to be the only objects in the environment that shined to a certain extent. I do not know who had summoned them and did not know how they were guided, but they were emerging from the town and headed for us. I guess it was a common protocol for people arriving from the special elevator and who were supposed to get to the city. What I saw, however, was a giant leap in relation to the technology of the surface world as these inhabitants seemed to have mastered the secrets of anti-gravity very well and also had devices that functioned with this technology.

I was able to better see these flying objects when they came right before us and stopped, standing at a height only a few inches above the ground. They looked very much like the antigravity platform that I had seen in the Occult Chamber when we made our journey through the tunnel to Egypt. Rather small, they were oval in shape and about one and a half meters long at the large diameter of the ellipse while the smaller diameter measured about one meter. I did not notice any other moving parts or attachments other than the oval disk plate from which they were made.

There were, however, differences from the platform I had seen in the occult chamber in Bucegi. The most obvious of these was in respect to the construction material which, in this case, was very special. It seemed to be a metal, but it gave the impression of being transparent. I noticed that this sensation was due more to the interesting color which was a combination of golden and silver yellow, but the golden yellow also had a reddish tint. The specificity of that material and its color created a strange visual sensation as if the sight could penetrate superficially into the first layer of metal which, in reality, was not happening. It was more of an optical illusion caused by the characteristics of that material.

Climbing the platform beside me, Dryn climbed behind me onto the same platform. Cezar and the two soldiers each mounted on a separate platform. Dryn probably wanted to make sure there were no problems with me on my first flying experience with such an anti-gravity device. I confess that I had a slight grip on my heart during the first few moments when I climbed upon that platform, but I immediately noticed that it was very stable; and moreover, it provided enough space for me to feel that I was in relative safety. I thought that, at worst, I could sit on the surface to keep my balance or feel safe, but it turned out that I did not have to resort to that.

Immediately after we all got onto those anti-gravity transport platforms, they moved silently and perfectly through the air, flying at a speed that I approximated to be about 30-40 kilometers per hour. Once you experience that feeling of free flight, you cannot forget it. It was a feeling of freedom and openness, of ease and even happiness. I then wished to travel on that platform over the entire city, but I immediately felt the answer from Dryn — this time telepathically — informing me that I could not do this.

We flew to the city a few dozen feet above the ground and traveled for less than ten minutes. I did not feel any sense of loss of balance nor dizziness, and the air flow did not bother me at that speed at all. Perhaps we were helped in this way by Dryn's presence, and perhaps the material from which the anti-gravity platform was made had some special properties of a psycho-mental nature. It is certain that my whole being was filled with great joy and positive emotion, amplifying my affection and willingness to share it with others.

I watched the approaching town from a high altitude, and I noticed its streets, a big market place, people, and normal activity to which I could relate. It was not a metropolis, nor even a bigger city, and the tallest buildings had no more than two floors. Their shapes were different, but I noticed that squares prevailed. The dominating color was white or white mixed with beige or gray. Blue, with varying nuances, was also used for some buildings. Generally speaking, there were no loud or shining colors. There was a certain similarity to some of the constructions found on some Greek islands. That is, white houses in simple straight lines, generally parallelepipedic. I felt, however, from the way they were arranged, their mood and their shapes, the general atmosphere that this community was generating was a kind of precious information wave conveying stability and balance with great trust and a calm thanksgiving.

BRIEF HISTORY

While I was feeling and taking in the “pulse” of the city in this way, a thought entered my head which I had not considered before. Contemplating what was before me, I wondered precisely what that community represented and how those people came to live at this place inside the planet. My mind had already begun to create some images of lines of people advancing through hidden colors in the Earth’s crust, wielding lit torches like during an exodus or when conducting a desperate search. My thoughts were then interrupted by Dryn’s response.

“It would have been too difficult to do that. You cannot travel through the bark of the Earth like an endless subway tunnel. We’ve benefited from some shortcuts, just like you have in your travels. We have been here for thousands of years, and we have a very old and rich history. Everything is documented. Your historians and scientists would be very surprised if they were to see the documents in our archives.”

“But why precisely those living in Romania?” I asked, a little surprised. Until that moment, I had in mind the general idea that this city was somewhere inside the planet, in a random area of it, associating the displacement with the expedition we had made through the First Tunnel to Egypt.

“Where do you think that this city that you are now seeing is located in relation to the surface of the planet?” asked Dryn.

“I do not know,” I said hesitantly. “Probably near the equator.”

I had no basis for my assumption, but that was the idea I had as soon as I stepped out of the elevator.

“No, but you are actually pretty close to home if we are talking about a few hundred miles of depth beneath the surface. This cavity is under the territory of your country. More precisely, it corresponds approximately to the place where the ancient Tomis was located.”

This was a new surprise, a wonderful one. Quickly, I made a possible correlation with the name of the settlement that Cezar had mentioned.

“Is Tomassis related to the old settlement on the surface?”

Dryn nodded.

“Yes, although it is located inside the Earth, it corresponds somewhat vertically with the old city on the surface. The cavity, however, has been populated since ancient times, well before Tomis even existed. We are the direct and pure descendants of the ancient Dacians. In a way, you can say that we are your ancestors. The people you see here in town descend in a direct line from the Dacians of 2500-3500 years ago.

For a few seconds, I looked at the fog and clouds above me thinking that, just a few hundred kilometers over our heads, we could find the theater or square of the city of Constanța* as it is today. The historical disparity was enormous, and as I understood it, the roots of that settlement inside the Earth go even deeper, linking back to time immemorial.

[* The current city of Constanța developed itself on the place of the ancient port of Tomis on the Black sea. It was a settlement of Dacians contemporary to the Roman Empire.]

“The secret of penetrating this place was known by certain monks who were initiated during the wars between the Romans and the Dacians.”

Prior to them, this inner cavity was visited only by the great sacred priests of old times who were serving in an area near Tomis. There are still ruins of an extremely old fortress from those times. The beings who lived here then were very small and came from the so-called First World which followed a great cataclysm from the surface of the planet.* But even before them, this space was inhabited by other beings that did not come from the surface world and were highly evolved. Up to that point, the atmospheric conditions in this cavity were different from the ones now and were not favorable to human beings; but at that time, there were some transformations in this area of the planet's interior that led to some changes in the composition of the atmosphere, the characteristics of which could no longer ensure the livelihood of those special beings. They left this area at one point; and in fact, the planet itself. This new ecosystem rapidly formed, and it became accessible to surface beings. As I told you, a so-called 'colonization' of the area began gradually, but the number of people having access has always been small."

[ The author is probably referring to the city of Histria, a former colony on the mouth of the Danube River. The word Hister means "Danube" in Latin, and the etymology of the word history is, ironically, intrinsically related to the place name of this ancient city.]

[* This possibly refers to the final drowning of Atlantis that specialists date to around 11,500 B.C.]

"I now see a whole civilization here," I said, curious to find out how this had been accomplished.

"With the loss of the war and the entry of the Romans into Dacia, we had to do this. There are other cities under the territory of Romania which were populated in the same way. Even though access to such locales was very secret and esoteric, the priests decided under special conditions that some Dacians would have access to this place and continue their lives, cherishing the same values as before. They considered that they were too important and valuable to be forgotten. Over time, the number of inhabitants has increased."

"What population is there now?"

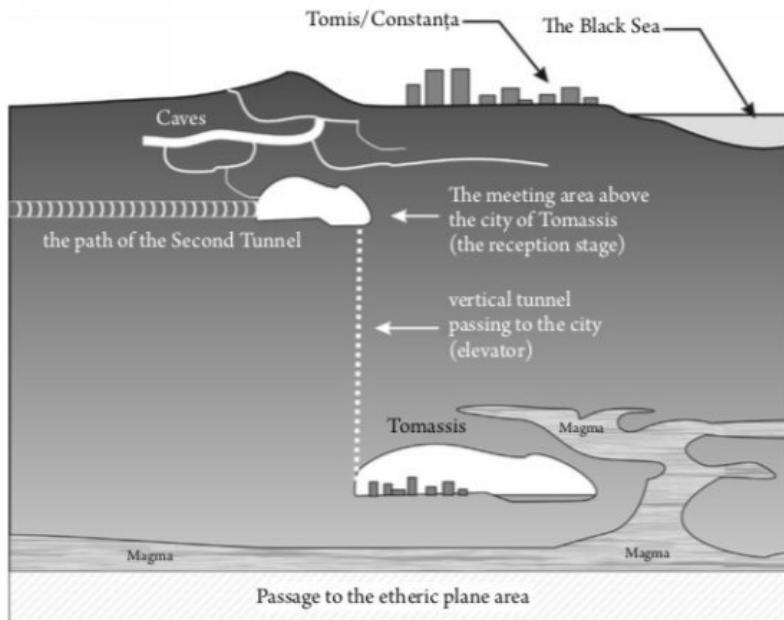

"About two hundred thousand inhabitants. Genetically speaking, there is no difference between the Dacians of two thousand years ago and the people you see now on the streets. It was an act of retreat and preservation, and with it, many gates of communication with the exterior world were closed. Evolution, however, has followed its own course in all its aspects."

PEOPLE, ACTIVITIES AND OTHER DISTINCTIVE FEATURES OF TOMASSIS

I wanted to ask about the technological level, but I noticed that the platform was beginning to descend to the ground, heading for the seashore. As we descended, I could see the structure of the city much more clearly, and it was very similar to what we see nowadays: streets, intersections, and people with various chores bustling about with focus as opposed to irritation. I think that the population could well apply the famous Latin motto: festina lente (which translates as “make haste slowly”). I did not, however, notice any vehicles, at least from the aerial vantage point I had. All of the men and women were walking on foot.

It seemed to be an unusual society from our modern point of view. For example, I saw nothing industrial, no factory, no smoke-free chimney, nor any workshop. They probably had areas devoted to study and technological research with manufacturing and production being done elsewhere; or perhaps they have simply reached a higher level of civilization which no longer involves the cumbersome and complex mechanical devices that we use, and all of it without conventional fuels. Their antigravity platforms are an excellent example.

Related correspondences of the city of Tomassis to other structural elements inside the Earth

Generally speaking, the impression that the city left on me was that I was in Ancient Greece. I mainly saw buildings and constructions with a style very similar to what I knew from illustrations, books and articles, but everything was integrated with very modern systems and devices. This somewhat paradoxical state applies to both the perspective of the city itself as well as the behavior of people. For example, while the streets were not wide nor paved with asphalt, they were all made of cobblestone. It is true that their stones were perfect, but it was stone pavement without asphalt or other synthetic material. There were no “concrete and glass” buildings, no glittering contours, no skyscrapers, no complex highway intersections or clover leafs. Everything was steady and intelligent with inherent simplicity and a certain kind of elegance, somehow blending into the ancient style. As we passed by the last of the building and headed to the seashore from the right, our platform approached very close to the ground and stopped. Neither upon our arrival nor at landing did I have any idea who had facilitated our transport or how it all worked, and I did not ask. I figured that it was probably a predetermined program and that the platforms followed a kind of schedule revolving around arrival and departure points, but I found it hard to believe that, with such advanced technology, the inhabitants of that place would have been constrained by fixed points of travel.

I stepped onto the sand of that beach. It was fine, clean, and yellow. The waves were not high, and later, I learned that there are never storms, whirlwinds or other destructive manifestations such as we are accustomed to on the surface of the planet. The sea water is always calm, just as I saw it. Near me, on the beach, there were a few small rocks with vegetation growing amongst them.

From the city, we noticed a group of three people, a man and two women, who seemed to know about our presence there. Observing their behavior and attitude, I could see them walking in a very relaxed matter with a balanced mood. I could also see the technological devices they wore. Each of the three people had a small triangular shape at their right temple which was attached to the skull in some manner. I saw no other elements that might support it. The man had a greenish shirt opened at the top and a little over his chest. It was not closed with buttons, but had a sort of vertical band that seemed to stick, like Velcro. On the lapel of that shirt, I also noticed a small device that had two bright lines, one blue and one green, flashing with different lengths. The man wore trousers of the same color as the shirt, but a darker shade, and he had brown shoes that resembled moccasins.

Everything created the impression of perfection. I did not see anything that was disharmonious.

Based upon certain technological aspects that I have mentioned, it was logical for me to assume that their clothing was futuristic in style, similar to a “fashion of the future.” Still, their clothes showed a simple and conventional design but one that paid careful attention to detail. If I were to make a concise description of what I saw in Tomassis and its inhabitants, I would say that it was the image of something that looks old but that is made with new things. All of these aspects created a slight sense of anachronism, but it was not disturbing.

The clothing of the three had good taste and also involved a knowledge of proportions, even an elegance of detail. The women were wearing a sort of traditional blouse for women which we call an ie (pronounced ēēya) in Romanian, and they had long black hair. I noticed that one of them had two beautifully braided ties that were decorated with two fine chainlets, one of gold and the other one of a red material.

The three approached us, bowing their heads slightly, and Dryn began talking to them in the unknown language that I had also heard him speak when I met him in the passage. This time, however, I no longer understood the meaning of the words, but I noticed that they often ended in es or isos, resembling what we know to be ancient Greek.

Meanwhile, Cezar told me that he would have to discuss some aspects of collaboration with Dryn and other representatives, and that meant he would have to go to another place in town. He told me not to worry and said that he would come back shortly. He considered the meeting to be important because it concerned opening up some possibilities for technological collaboration. From what I learned later, Dryn, serving as a high representative of the Tomassis civilization, was offering documentation of anti-gravity technology. It seems that the issue at hand was not necessarily of a conceptual nature but was mainly related to the material or alloy that had to be used.

Turning to Cezar, Dryn made a gesture of invitation with his hand and climbed onto one of the platforms which then ascended into the city. Behind them, the man and one of the females, the one with the beautiful hair adorned with those precious metal chainlets, climbed onto the second platform. Their platform closely followed in the same direction of flight to another area of the city which I figured to be the central era.

“THE 30-YEAR-OLD WOMAN”

I was alone, somewhat out of my element, with the second woman in the group. The two soldiers stood at a distance from us, on the edge of the water, speaking slowly between them. Not knowing what I should do then, I looked inquiringly at that woman who did not seem to be more than thirty years old. The brunette, with big eyes and delicate features, had a very slim and even athletic body from which I deduced that her function was to serve in a protective manner like a security guard. The light blouse she wore had no sleeves, and on the upper side of the right arm, she had a spiral-shaped bracelet made of a reddish-colored material. Her black eyebrows were well contoured and when seen up close gave her a very determined air with a specific dynamism. The hair, tight on her temples and head, was trapped in back in a long queue. In her ears, there was a pair of long, elegant and very refined earrings; and upon the right temple, I noticed that the same device with the triangular shape was attached, just like the two men.

I was expecting her to somehow come forward, but she did not do that. Instead, she spoke to me in Romanian with the same strange accent that I had also noticed with Dryn.

“We can take a short walk until they come back.”

I accepted and we started to walk slowly along the beach, somewhat parallel to the shore of the water. I was a little overwhelmed by the situation, not knowing how to proceed or what to say, but the girl was very natural and began to explain to me that some of them travel to the surface at different intervals with different missions. As the conversation unfolded, I realized she was not a telepath like Dryn, and then I became more relaxed. Asking her if she had ever been to the surface of the Earth, she answered that she was well acquainted with the regions of our country and with those in other countries.

“Last time I was in northern Scotland for three years. There is a well-established mission cycle, and my turn comes once every ten to fifteen years. I’m just getting ready for a new departure.”

Something did not fit. I told her I recognized her as being young, but I could not understand how she could have missions to foreign countries during her adolescence.

“Our energy capacity is different, and our lives are longer,” she answered.
“You estimate my age to be thirty, but I am actually fifty-four.”

I was deeply amazed but did not show much surprise as I myself was perceiving an infusion of special energy that made me feel deeply revitalized and full of good cheer. I changed the subject because I assumed that she did not want to give me more information about what they were doing at the Earth's surface during those missions.

TRADITIONS, ORGANIZATION OF SOCIETY, AND EVOLUTION

"I have not seen children in the city until now but just in the distance, on the shore," I said, curious to know details. "Is there a place for them?"

"The conditions here are limited to only a certain number of inhabitants so that life is balanced. We pay attention to this, but the great majority of children in our ranks were born on the surface. They are brought to our city when they are three years old. Those born here are more special."

I raised my eyebrows, frankly wondering what the reason was. The woman explained it to me with a warm and calm air.

"At birth, the child must benefit from astral influences. It is very important to achieve an energetic contact between his or her structure and the energetic influences that come from the stars. This is like a kind of a necessary footprint for its existence and everything that follows is under the sign of that influence. Your science still does not understand these aspects, but those born here have gone beyond the necessity of astrological influence because of their spiritual transformation. Such a being is Dryn."

"Okay, so how do you know who's supposed to be born on the surface and who's born here?" I asked.

The girl smiled and explained that this was determined by the wise people of that community, and this surprised me. I had the impression that I was viewing a documentary film about archaic societies, and my mind was beginning to look distrustful of what I was finding out. The woman probably felt my distrust and responded accordingly.

"In all of our history, for thousands of years, there was not even one case where the wise men were not right. Everything has come true just as they said; but you, on the surface, tend to regard almost everything as a product of technology and matter. That's why you often fail, and your conception of the universe does not allow you to understand any of its mysteries."

Having no choice but to accept her statement, I hoped for an accelerated evolution that could be helped by proper communication between Mankind and their society. I quickly realized, however, that things are very complicated in this regard, so I abandoned this topic, a subject for which I did not have any accreditation anyway.

Taking advantage of the opportunity I was offered, I asked a question.
“Have you actually progressed all alone in a closed system over the last 2000 years?”

“It’s not a closed system,” replied the woman. “There are connections both on the surface and within the Earth. We are not the only ones here. But we also have the advantage of special materials that cannot be found on the surface or extracted from your mines. It is a special knowledge that has long been transmitted.

“Dryn told me you are descendants of the Dacians.”

She nodded with a noble and determined gesture.

“We are their direct descendants, but on an evolved spiral. Everything is like a mirror image. Just like our city, you have the surface city of Tomis on your sea, and we have Tomassis down here on our sea. The spirit of our ancestors and the Empire has been preserved.”

I was not sure what empire she was referring to, but I suspected it was the Thracian one in Burebista’s time, not the Roman one because, if it were otherwise, what she said would not make sense. But, to be sure, I asked her.
“It is the ancient Empire, and we have everything documented: tablets, metal plates and other objects from that time and even previous time periods.

We also have evidence of what followed. Everything is documented and archived and includes an entire history of thousands of years. We have continued the existence of the people, but only in this place, within the planet. Our organizational structure is the same as in the old days.

“What organizational structure do you mean?”

“Chain of command. The way in which decisions are made. We have a hierarchy, but the concept is that of our ancestors. It has no failures.”

I could not contradict her since I had proof right before my eyes: a big city inside the planet which was perfectly functional, technologically advanced, and in which peace and tranquility reign, emitting reason and wisdom. Its inhabitants were beautiful, calm, relaxed, and intelligent. It was impossible not to compare what I saw with the sad reality of today, with the so-called ideologically “advanced” society in which we live with the stupid “democracy” of the existing political system, so complicated, useless and creating endless conflicts and problems. If such a political and governance system, with the hundreds of laws encompassing it, is truly valuable and effective, then how do you explain the continuous floundering of today's society with all sorts of problems and short-circuits in the decision-making chain which abounds all over the world? And if you see something that is obviously lame, would not it be normal to want to modify it? Unfortunately, the chain of inter-state dependencies and obligations, especially of an economic and financial nature, is so tough and manipulative that it becomes very difficult to make such a major change, even when it appears to be perfectly rational and make common sense.

The woman explained to me that their leadership system is based on "the principle of wisdom": the one who is the wisest leads the city. Asking about the way in which people determine the wisest, she told me that, generally speaking, they are chosen from the so-called "group of wise men" who are usually the elderly. It is that "old man's advisory group," well known from ancient times in our tradition but also in others, and they seem to have strictly maintained this tradition with remarkable results. She then explained to me that subordinate to the Wise Man there are what can best be described as ministers in our organization system. Each of them has a region, but it does not mean a space region but rather a field of activity: one for construction, one for science, another for research, and so on. The system is designed and applied so that each of these administrators take on their subordinate people in accordance with what they need to do.

"Of course, we also have a defense system that is very effective," she said. "There is a Special Guard and an Analysis Group. Those in the Guard are fighters who are well trained and have a very advanced technology available to them. Those in the Analysis Group are comparable to the analysts in your world. They monitor surface communication systems, access ways, and a blockade that we set up a long time ago in the event of possible intrusions or attack plans from your leaders. Fortunately, very few people know or believe in our existence here, and that is mainly due to the major disability your world has in terms of science. Your scientists do not understand reality as they should."

"Yes, too much hubris and arrogance," I said softly, mostly to myself, actually repeating the words of Dr. Xien.

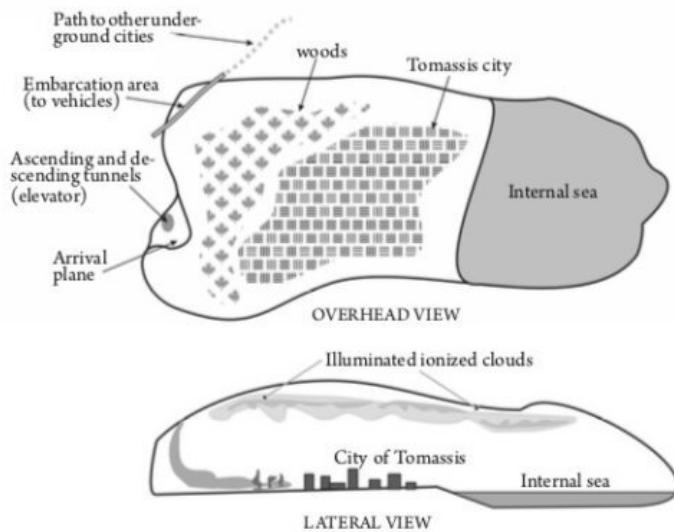

After that, I wanted to make the bitter pill a bit sweeter.

"We still have a pretty advanced technology."

“The basis of our technology is completely different from yours,” said the woman. “Its conception is parallel to what you know, at least up to now. First, you probably need to figure out where you block yourself or get stuck and then to look further. We are ready to help you and to respond to your appeals, but this has to be done with great care because, in the way you view existence, something very dangerous has slipped in over the past few hundreds of years.”

I implicitly deduced that this had everything to do with the diplomatic contacts initiated by Cezar and General Obadea with the civilization of Tomassis, and I thought there was a high probability that the meeting Cezar was attending now represented a stage in these discussions and negotiations. I did not, however, have any further information at that time, and I understand that such things are very sensitive and cannot be discussed under any circumstances. The woman remained silent for a moment and lightly touched the device at the temple with her hand. Looking behind, I noticed one of the platforms approaching us, and behind it, on another platform, came the two soldiers. They stopped for a few moments in front of the woman who spoke to them in their pleasant tongue, after which they bowed respectfully and moved on. I understood then that the woman had a certain hierarchical rank and that she was even the superior of the two. She turned to me and spoke.

UPPER AND LATERAL VIEWS OF TOMASSIS, MAIN ELEMENTS

“We are not the only ones to have built this sort of living arrangement for ourselves. There are many more urban settlements beneath your country at different depths. When the ‘exodus’ occurred, many of us withdrew from virtually all of the regions of the surface territory, and we came to such secret places inside the planet.”

“I am certain that almost no one on the surface knows about your existence. You have no connection with them.”

“Before the wars, a connection between the inside and the outside existed. The cavities and the access ways to them were known by many people. There was another level of thought and action. After the arrival of the Romans, we were forced to withdraw and close these access ways. We blocked the entrances to the cities inside the Earth, but we also deposited here a lot of evidence, writings and documents that are not known, especially since that time after the conquest. Only a small proportion of what you know as the history of that time is true, but the greatest part of it is unknown. You just simply do not know how things really happened.

When the time comes, all the evidence we hold will be made known.”

We were both flying on the platform to the city; and more precisely, to the edge of the city where I noticed an area like a train station with several tunnels entering the mountain. Near two of them, I noticed some lift vehicles. There were no rails or other guidance devices.

We slowly descended to the ground which this time was well polished stone. The two soldiers were waiting for us at one of the vehicles. I looked inquiringly at my companion, and she invited me to enter that vehicle. I understood that we were going to travel; and impatiently, I rushed to the spot.

CHAPTER FOUR — APELOS, THE CRYSTAL CITY

Approaching the vehicle, I could see that the design was very modern and unlike the generally simple and old-fashioned style that generally characterized the community. This was a real technological jewel. At first glance, it resembled the famous Shinkansen Japanese trains, but its capsular shape and more complex construction differed from them.

The woman explained to me that this was a sort of commuter or shuttle vehicle that links the cities inside the Earth, each of them corresponding to the approximate territory of our country. She did not, however, tell me whether it also was used for other settlements inside the planet that were situated at greater distances or depths than the place in which we were then. Logically, if such cities are spread out in a particular region, they should also exist in other areas of the planet.

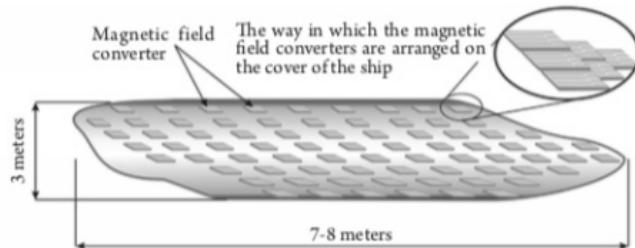

AN ADVANCED TECHNOLOGY

The departure station was very much like the one in which we had arrived by the elevator. It had the shape of a semicircle, spreading out like a fan, being guarded by the vertical wall of the mountain. The capsule was floating at about ten to fifteen centimeters above the ground due to an anti-gravity effect.

The vehicle attracted my interest in a most special way and that is exactly why I have carefully analyzed it. Over all, it resembled an ellipse, but it had certain specific lines at the ends. I estimated its length to be about seven to eight meters and its height to be about three meters. It was compact, massive, perfectly polished, and it even asserted a certain dynamism because of its aerodynamic shape. While it was built out of a white material, it featured a white-cream color in some areas.

From the start, my attention was caught by the peculiar construction involved in building that vehicle. The external shell was covered by identical “packages” of joint-like scales in a way resembling the tiles on the roof of a house. I figured that this had to do with the specific technology related to its energetic source. Initially, I thought that the technology involved in building this shuttle was like the Maglev magnetic system that has been used by the Japanese, but I was wrong. The woman told me, however, that it is another type of technology based upon different physics. Your science still has not understood it, she told me. It is a force that distorts space and time.

VEHICLE USED BY THE INHABITANTS OF TOMASSIS TO DRIVE INSIDE THE EARTH

Looking to understand what she meant, I was observing the special plates on the outer shell of the ship. They were compact and perfectly smooth. Rectangular in shape, the plates were adapted to the curvature of the cover upon which they were placed. The thickness of each of them was no more than two centimeters. The shuttle had no windows, skylights, nor other openings. It was like a sort of compact spindle that had been spread out, appearing to be made out of a single piece. The vehicle was positioned perpendicular to the mountain off of a massive dark opening that I initially identified to be a tunnel opening. Coming closer, however, I recognized that the surface of the mountain was polished in a circular pattern within which was a reddish-brown circle of about five meters in diameter that was much darker than the surrounding rocks. Actually, there was no tunnel dug into the mountain nor was there any unevenness or access path. Instead, the circle delineating the “tunnel opening” had several identical devices placed symmetrically on its circumference. I suspected that these were in a certain resonance with the plates or scales on the cover of the shuttle.

As it was not clear to me how such a vehicle would operate and to where it might travel to inside the solid interior of the Earth, I asked my companion.

“Obviously, the problem of digging mud-like tunnels through the mantle and the crust was not considered. Here is where the conceptual and technological jump that I told you about comes into play. We utilize the gravitational field; and precisely, its interaction with an electric field, just like the interaction between an electrically charged body and a magnetic field. In such an interaction, certain vortexes of electric and magnetic fields are generated. We have applied this principle, but in this case we are using gravitational fields. We realized that when an object crosses a gravitational field, a certain magnetic field is generated.

At this point, the chasm of my ignorance appeared to becoming deeper and deeper. Bewildered, I asked her a question.

“What do you mean? That — just like that — a magnetic field results from this interaction?”

“Not automatically, but through a conversion that is facilitated by these pieces,” she said as she pointed to the scales on the exterior of the shuttle. “Just as you convert a magnetic field into an electric field, we also figured out how to convert a gravitational field into a magnetic field. There is a lot more to it than the simple electromagnetic induction your culture is familiar with because it this technology which allows us to bend space and time.”

While the woman was speaking, I walked slowly by that capsule-like vehicle, carefully looking specifically at the unique characteristics of its construction. It was mostly like an elongated spindle or spike, a compact unit without any opening, perfectly sealed. When I arrived in front of it, the frontal part resembled a fighter plane’s nose cone but with more rounded lines. I went around the vehicle, going parallel to its body, observing the exceptional finishing of the exterior wall. The “scales” were perfectly joined and arranged, one on the top of the other, covering the entire surface of the shuttle’s body, but I could not figure out precisely how they were converting the gravitational energy into magnetic energy. I wanted to ask my guide about it, but the thought struck my mind that my interest could be regarded with suspicion and wrongly interpreted. Such apprehension, however, was unnecessary because the woman, obviously perceiving my anxiety, smiled and started to explain things to me in a very relaxed way. “I can explain the principle to you, even if your science hardly accepts the possibility that such interactions can involve gravity. Before it starts, the shuttle generates a fluctuating magnetic field around itself which is augmented by high frequency ultrasonic waves which enable it to “enter” the solid environment of the Earth’s crust.”

“What sort of fluctuating field is that?” I asked immediately, very attentive to the explanations she was providing.

“It is a complex field formed by the combination of two magnetic fields: a rotational vorticity field and one other featuring a special characteristic which presents itself like a monopole because, at the exterior of the ship, it is always ‘north,’ and in the interior, it is always ‘south.’ This combination of fields, which is facilitated in a certain proportion and at a certain intensity, creates a kind of “space-time cell” that delineates the shuttle.”

I suspected, to a certain extent, what the effect was and I told her.

“Does the vibrational frequency change in such a way that the capsule is able to cross through matter without interacting with it?”

“Yes, this is the phenomena. First, a local space-time distortion is facilitated by raising the vibrational frequency.”

“Is this initialization a facility of the device? What creates the two types of magnetic fields? Is it the small plates on the surface of the shuttle?”

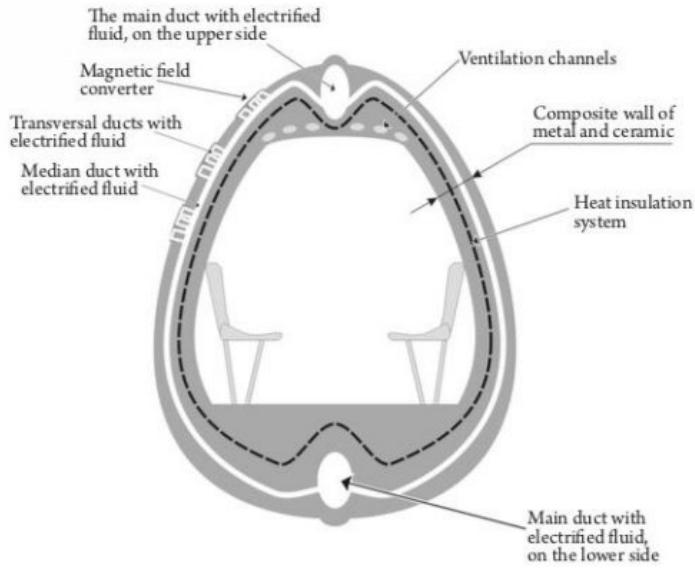

“No, not them. The walls of the shuttle are thick and they have three distinct areas. The inner one is the resistance structure. The middle area is very thick and includes magnetic field generators that initiate the distortion, but you cannot see them here because they are integrated into the construction of the wall. The outer area contains the plates on the shuttle’s body which actualizes the conversion of the gravitational field into a magnetic field while traveling.”

Based upon her description and out of the images that I later saw in certain holographic projections, a vertical cross-section from the body of the shuttle generally includes the features illustrated below.

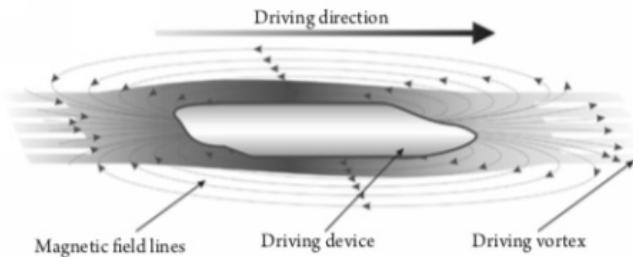

I was curious to find out what was going on during the trip.

“After creating the distortion, the shuttle starts and then charges itself by moving and crossing the lines of the gravitational field,” the woman explained. “The small plates in the outer area then convert the gravitational field into a magnetic field.”

VERTICAL CROSS SECTION THROUGH THE SHUTTLE BODY

THE PRINCIPLE BEHIND THE SHUTTLE'S DRIVE

“And what does that do?”

“It is used to maintain the process of generating the space-time bubble in which the shuttle resides in while it is in motion. The energy requirement to facilitate this phenomenon is very high. Only an initialization of the process can be done within its own means. Then, the energy requirement is met from the conversion of gravity into a magnetic field. The constant movement of the shuttle creates a kind of virtual tunnel or a kind of medium through which it advances at a high speed. Accordingly, the links between underground cities are easy to facilitate whenever they required.”

Then, with a certain sense of surprise, I began to wonder how she knew all of these scientific details. Even though they concerned just the basic principles, she demonstrated a certain knowledge about the construction and conception of the shuttle. You could not offer such explanations without somehow being involved in the field. Relying upon the familiarity we had already established in our discussion, I dared to ask her about this.

"I coordinate research in the security and defense area," she said in a natural tone.

"But this seems to me to be a civilian transport vehicle," I commented, not understanding too well about the connection with defense.

"It can be used for other purposes," she said. "It is basically a transporter. We often use such shuttles to transport goods. Only a small part of their internal space is dedicated to travelers."

After saying that, the woman gently lifted her left hand on the body of the shuttle, approximately at chest level, and the wall glided to the left, leaving an opening to enter the vehicle.

IN THE PASSENGER COMPARTMENT

If you were looking at the capsule from the outside, it was virtually impossible to realize that there was actually a door that allowed entry. It did not overlap the wall but penetrated inside of it, after first withdrawing a few inches deep. There was almost no sound involved, just a pleasant wisp.

The shuttle's interior was fully illuminated. I did not notice a special source for the light which was uniform and came from everywhere. The first thing I noticed was the appearance of the interior walls which seemed to be made up of hundreds of small and very bright crystals. The light was not intense, but it gave the feeling that it was enveloping you and relaxing you at the same time. Even though it was a cold white, I did not feel bothered by it. The reflections on the shuttle walls created an intimate and pleasant glow that immediately relaxed the psyche and the mind. Although the technology that created these pleasant effects was different from the ones that existed in either the Grand Gallery or inside of the tunnels running from the Projection Hall, the results were very similar.

In the middle of the vehicle, on either side of the walls, a pair of three ergonomic lounge chairs were symmetrically arranged. At first glance, the chairs gave me the impression of being hard and strong; but when I sat down on one of them, the material they made softened, melting as if it were buoyant gelatin. I was then pleasantly surprised to notice that if I tapped slightly on the surface of the chair, it would remain firm, but if I pressed with a higher force, it would soften, as if melting. For example, when you sat in the chair, the material became soft and immediately conformed to the shape of the body, creating a very comfortable feeling. Any movement of the body would make that intelligent material conform to the new shape, and when you got up out of the chair, it immediately returned to its original smooth state. I said to myself that, undoubtedly, this intelligent plasticity is something that every sedentary person who might work for hours in an office would like because the material correlates very well with the physical shape of the body.

The front and back of the shuttle were each blocked by a wall of semi-transparent material, behind which I noticed several boxes placed one on top of the other, perfectly sealed and probably filled with goods. I was a little amazed to see that there was no command cabin or pilot, at least as far as I could observe. The interior was very simple, containing only six ergonomic armchairs in the central part with the rest of the space inside being used for storage. Actually, the interior space was not very big, as much due to the ellipsoidal shape of the transporter as well as to the thick walls. Before the door closed automatically, I saw the delimitation of the three areas that my guide had spoken to me about, and I estimated the wall thickness to be about 30-40 centimeters. I then saw the door sliding sideways from the inside of the wall as it pushed outward, shutting the space perfectly.

Only my companion and I entered the shuttle. The two soldiers stayed on the platform. The woman communicated a few words in her native tongue, perhaps to a control center, and I immediately felt a strange feeling in my stomach as in the case of a strong acceleration, but it was easy and short-lived. I then noticed a sensation of my internal organs lifting as opposed to being pushed backwards horizontally, such as is the case when one is subject to vigorous acceleration. One explanation for this might be that the vibrational frequency had been modified to make it rise and therefore create that special sensation of ascending.

After a few seconds, everything went back to normal; and immediately after start up, the walls inside the shuttle showed bright and colorful information, including graphics systems that were all arranged in sections like large video monitors on both walls. For example, in one section which was larger, we were shown where we were and how the journey evolved. It did not, however, appear as a window on a train with landscape streaming by. The images appeared slowly, somehow synthetically contrived, and the representation of the route was punctual; but nevertheless, I realized that the velocity was disproportionate to that which was represented graphically. Everything was represented in a map-like format. This applied to both the natural elements on the surface as well as those inside the Earth through which we were passing. I recognized the Carpathian mountain chain and the northwestern part of Romania as well as the area we were crossing beneath the surface. The image contained a dynamic view of the general landscape of the terrain on the surface; but at the same time, I was also able to view the main forms of relief and structures inside the Earth through which we were passing within the Earth's mantle. It was fascinating to observe that interactivity of images, so vivid and faithful, where information was presented not only schematically or virtually but also very realistically, with actual images of the environment on the surface of the Earth and also within it. Above these, I noticed some graphical and digital information which showed directions, curves, intensely lighted areas, and blinking colored dots, all overlapping in an admirably designed configuration. I assumed that these could be directions to other settlements and underground cities, and I also noticed that most of them were in the Apuseni Mountains. I did see, however, that two lighted areas pointed to Moldova.

Their writing was not like ours. The graphical signs that were almost continuously changing were appearing in different areas of the image but were predominantly on the upper right side. Resembling runic writing, they had something archaic in their shape, a mystery that I felt attracted to. Carefully following the route and the images from the wall projection, I noticed by the graphic indications that we were heading for an underground city located much closer to the surface and in the southern area of Transylvania. The level of depth between Tomassis and this city was very large — I would say about 1500 kilometers. Actually, our destination was so close to the surface of the Earth, at least with reference to the vivid representation of the images that we were seeing, that I was wondering if it would have been easier to descend from there to the city rather than traveling via this shuttle. This was, of course, a funny way to look at the situation because, first, our journey would not last for more than two minutes; and second, moreover, my guide told me that the city, even though it is much closer to the surface than Tomassis, is still at a depth of several dozens of kilometers.

“Apellos is a very special city with regard to its history and structure,” the woman told me. “It is also very old, but still, it is different in many ways than our city. Its inhabitants are also from the Dacian people, but at a certain point in history, a hybridization with another race occurred.”

While she was talking, I noticed from the pictures that we appeared to have arrived at our destination. As the shuttle stopped, all of the complex images that had been occupying a large part of the interior walls suddenly disappeared, and the door opened, sliding very quietly. A warm and pleasant light penetrated the interior of the capsule, but it was not much brighter than the inside.

THE CITY IN THE GIANT CAVITY

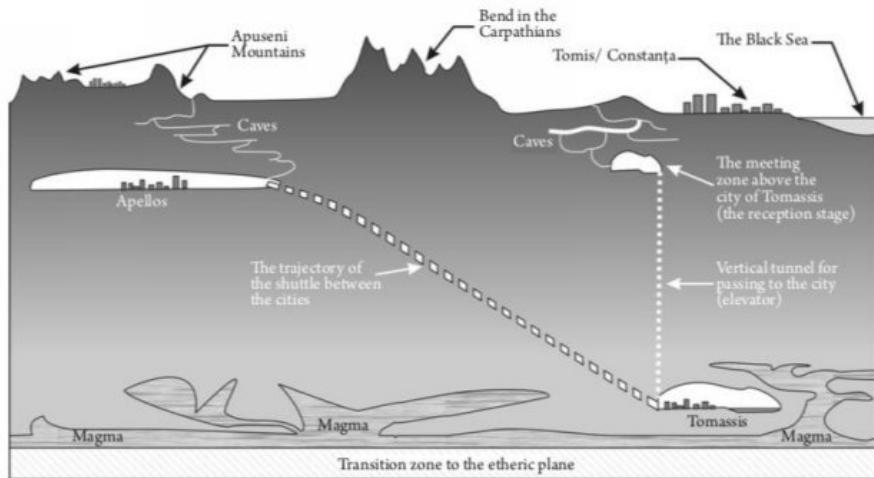

As we left the shuttle, I saw that we were on a suspended platform supported by a central pillar at a height of about fifteen meters above the ground. The platform was placed near a rocky wall, but it was not in contact with it as was the case in Tomassis. Below, on the left side, I noticed three separate platforms at a certain distance from each other, but they were slightly smaller.

“This is the diplomatic platform. Our arrival was announced,” my companion said to me.

Indeed. A couple of meters away were two men who seemed to be waiting for us. They took a few steps toward us, stopped and bowed their heads a little as a sign of welcome. They were dressed in elegant white costumes, but the way they were tailored left me with the feeling that they were connected to a security service. The hips and the coat featured flaps, probably in place of a belt; and on the forearms I saw elbow pads while the trousers had specific stripes on the side. They wore some kind of boots on their feet with some straps at the top.

The two men were about the same height, about 1.80 meters. One of them was blond while the other had dark brown hair. They exchanged dialogue with my companion, and I noticed that they was using the same language as had the inhabitants of Tomassis.

OVERVIEW OF THE TRAJECTORY FOLLOWED BY THE SHUTTLE

While they were talking, I looked carefully around. Unlike Tomassis, here I had the feeling that the space was a lot more open and vast. Beneath my eyes, over a wide panorama of a few kilometers, the city stretched out, the view of which astonished me because it seemed to be taken out of science-fiction books. All buildings and constructions were made of transparent material, as if it were from crystal. The transparency, however, was not like you would see in the case of a bottle but is best described as translucent. At certain angles, I saw how the light was reflecting into the colors of the rainbow, like in a prism, creating great perspectives.

Beyond the city, I observed some hills covered by vegetation; and right underneath our platform, trees were growing that looked a lot like oaks only less tall. Instead of grass, I observed that the ground was covered with something like moss and lichen, but from what I could tell, it had a rougher consistency. Most of the city's buildings, as I could see from afar, were spherical or curved. I did not see any tall buildings, only a few small towers that were rounded at the top. I also saw pretty wide streets and very beautifully arranged tunnels and arches as well as dome-shaped buildings. The architecture of the city was totally different than that of Tomassis, and the construction material was staggering, creating the sensation of a city of the future. The light, which was also special, contributed to this. As in Tomassis, it was not emanating from a concrete source but was uniformly spread, white in color but of medium intensity, just as it is at 10 o'clock in the morning.

When the conversation of the three had ended, the blond man turned to me, addressing me very kindly in almost perfect Romanian.

“Time is too short to visit the city, but in addition to what can be seen from here, we can offer a summary of the information about us that will help for our future collaboration.”

I was feeling good and accepted what he said with joy. At their strong advice, we all headed to a small pedestal on the platform that was revealed to be a command panel. I did not know its precise function, but the same man told me that this was a peripheral device that could connect to the central information of the city.

At the moment we approached this pedestal, which was like a meter high parallelepiped, it activated with different signs and information with schemes and images appearing on its surface. I had the impression that the device was a sort of selector; and indeed, with only one hand movement from a distance, the blond man was able to access a certain field. In front of us, a large holographic screen was immediately projected upwards from the pedestal. Wider than the pedestal, probably more than two meters, it was just a little smaller in height.

THE HISTORY OF APELLOS

As soon as the holographic “screen” started to play, images of that city and its inhabitants began to unfold quickly and with exceptional clarity. I realized that they were not necessarily in chronological order but that did not bother me. I was very attentive and curious to find out details about that place, even more so since the presentation was very similar to those in the Projection Hall in Bucegi.

At first, I saw the surroundings of the area: the hills that I had already seen, two small lakes, and what seemed to be a small-sized glacier in the distance. Then, all of a sudden, the images showed a sort of entrance on the mountain’s ascent that was very elegantly developed. The presentation emphasized the mountain’s entrance, portraying it as if it were a tourist cave, showing it from different angles and at different distances. This was the first time that I noticed the way in which the mountains were structured, like a sort of semicircle on the side, as if they were surrounding the space that we were in but at the same time curving over it. Stunned, I looked up to see the image projections; and it was then that I noticed that the holographic projections had come to a standstill or froze when I had taken my eyes off of them. As soon as I looked again at the screen, the images continued.

When I looked up, however, the stream of images stopped with one image remaining available to view as if it were a frame in a roll of motion pictures that had been halted in a movie projector. It was obvious that, in a certain way, this replay was inherently connected to the direction of my gaze and was referencing just that.

Looking at the city, I did not pay particular attention to the sky as it was diffused because of the light; but now, I looked more closely at the area where we were, right next to the rocky wall of the mountains. As I noticed the wall rising overhead, I saw that it bends slightly so as to apparently block the light from above, making it appear as if the rock was immersing into something “milky”. Even so, as it disappeared into the light above, I could see a certain outline of the cliffs over us as well some peaks that pierced the clouds overhead. Only then was I able to form a clear picture in my mind and understand that this place was, actually, a sort of gigantic cave that was somehow able to provide the habitat we were seeing. The ceiling of that giant cave, however, was not too high. Judging by the peaks of the cliffs that I observed above us and comparing them to the ceiling of the cave, I would approximate the height to be a maximum of seventy meters, but I realized that it varied and probably increased towards the city.

I came back to looking at the images on the screen; and as soon as I did, they started to stream once again. They were more clearly depicting the structure of that place, the mountains and their arching above, forming an immense underground cavity that was much larger than the one that I had seen in Tomassis. Although the mountain was not “growing” in height, it was somehow stretched out above the city, like a sort of bellows, with the roof continuing into the distance.

While I was looking at those images, my interest was drawn to the entrance of the cave in the mountain, something that I could not see from the platform that I was on. I then I figured out that the images that were appearing were somehow related to the interest that I was showing in one thing or another, all dependent upon what I wanted to see. From this, I realized that this was yet another type of inter activity with a direct connection to my mind, but it was even more profound and probably the result of a technology that I did not understand.

As the screen zoomed in on an image of the cave’s entrance, I immediately understood that this was actually the exit from the mountain to the internal cavity in which I was then: namely, the city. I noticed that it was like a big tunnel opening, pretty tall and wide, with artificially polished edges. The intervention of the humans was also seen in the area in front of it, apparently an arrival and departure point and where I also noticed many boxes and crates deposited on one side.

Then, all of a sudden, the image showed the same entrance into the mountain, but this time it was in its original natural condition. Comparing it to the image in which it had been enhanced, I saw that it was once smaller. The edges were natural rock, and the ground at the entrance was uneven and far from being level. I immediately realized that I was seeing the history of that place, right from its beginning, even to the point where it was immersed in darkness.

The images showed two men with large beards with cușme (the Romanian name for a head piece that the ancient Dacians wore) on their heads, each holding a lighted torch in their hand, cautiously stepping further into the opening of the cave and into the cavity in which the city of Apellos now resides. The light of the torches was weakly reflected to the upper side of the cave, showing the very solid stone structure of that very large cavity inside the Earth. Behind the two, but remaining at the entrance to the mountain, there were several other people waiting for them and carrying some large bales or bound up commodity.

From the way the images played out, I realized that those were the historical beginnings of how that area inside the planet became populated. Perhaps I was being offered to see the moment of discovery of that huge cavity so that I could have some idea of the succession of its development. Interestingly, the ones I saw that were the first to discover that cave were not “cavemen” and rather wore wearing rudimentary trousers made of thick white material, head skins with cușme, and wide shirts that were linked to the hip with a dark belt. I assumed that these were the inhabitants of the surface, maybe even a long way before the old Dacians, and that made me think that the populating of this huge cavern inside the area had probably taken place many thousands of years ago. It was, however, a totally different story than that of Tomassis, and it seemed amazing to me that they had advanced so incredibly quickly from a technological point of view.

GENERAL OVERVIEW OF THE CITY OF APELLOS

Out of the next series of images, I was able to understand the way in which things developed, even if I did not see too many details. At the beginning, only a few people made their way into the immense cave, but due to the fact that there was total darkness and the area nearby was extensively rocky, they left. But then, probably at a certain time afterward, I saw another group of persons entering and utilizing a small-sized globe that was spreading a very pleasant and powerful yellowish-white light. Several similar globes were then brought into the area. They were not big — I do not think they were over one meter in diameter — but the light they provided was extraordinarily strong and constant. Soon, the entire valley and cavity was lit, revealing a landscape that was mostly rocky, arid and deserted. My initial estimation of the height of the cavity proved to be pretty correct as it was not more than 70-80 meters on the average. The space stretched out several kilometers horizontally, ascending slightly on the opposite side of the entrance to the mountain. Practically speaking, it was like a huge empty bubble with an almost ellipsoidal shape on mostly flat ground, a gigantic cavity that stretched over a large area beneath the territory of Transylvania. Those people who brought the lighting globes were a part of another brotherhood or class of people; and, by the way they were dressed in long robes, they seemed to be priests. They were accompanied by a small group of very beautiful men and women with blond hair who, by reason of their shiny clothing and behavior, showed that they were not part of the indigenous community on the surface. My intuition told me that those beings helped and supported the inhabitants to populate and establish that community inside the Earth that is now known as Apellos. The technological advances and the way in which that place developed clearly demonstrates it.

THE LIGHT IN THE CAVITY

Unlike Tomassis, where the light comes from the natural ionization of the atmosphere, it is produced artificially in Apellos. The flowing images showed me the ingenious way in which the inhabitants of the city solved this problem. Their illuminating system is pretty much like the LED system in our technology, but instead of the ceramic material inside of LEDs, they use quartz crystals that they produce and integrate into a special composite so that the interior illumination of the cavity doesn't need auxiliary energy.

To me, this is a very ingenious idea and an extraordinary technological achievement. Those quartz crystals are produced so that pressure is placed upon them in such a way as to create an emission of weak photons that manifest as light. The rocky ceiling of the interior cavity in which Apellos resides is covered with billions of small crystals which react to the pressure caused by a gravitational difference that manifests on the giant cavity ceiling. The images suggested that there is a main gravitational attraction to the center of the planet but also a certain gravitational attraction exerted by reason of a mass of matter above the cavity. This difference in gravitational attraction acts upon the device that supports each crystal and causes a certain electrical voltage to occur within it which is absorbed by the crystals and converted into photonic emission or light.

Looking closely at the hologram in front of me, the image zoomed in; and I could see that even if a single small crystal emits only a specific frequency, due to the fact that there are billions of such small crystals in the entire underground cavity, the volume of frequencies being emitted is enormous.

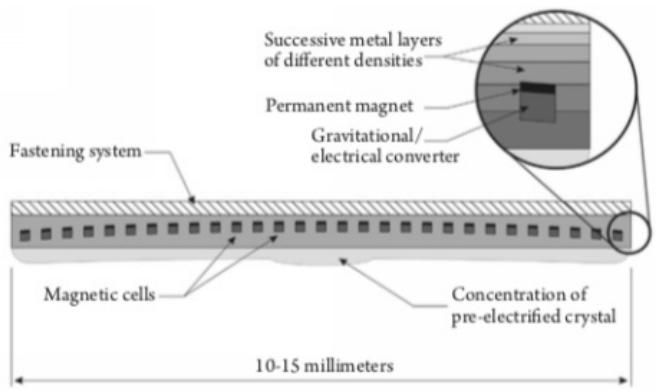

As my interest in this crystal technology was very strong, I was shown the structure of the device supporting the crystals. These devices are like rounded small plates, having a diameter of about ten to fifteen millimeters and a thickness of one millimeter. They pretty much resemble the LED technology we have, with the difference being that they are made out of several successive layers of metals, each having an increasing density.

I realized that the technology is advanced because those metals were probably utilizing nanotechnology imprinted on the small plate that create electric tension through differential gravitational attraction. With a small magnet and a special converter placed over them, the converter was transforming the differential gravitational effect into an electric field, then directing it to the crystals in what amounts to a pretty complexly layered system.

The quartz crystal had a powerful magnet on top of it, thus taking the weak electric current through a vortex which, in turn, created a new variable magnetic field. The combination of a static magnetic field and a variable magnetic field was creating a permanent excitement in the quartz crystal that was generating a photonic emission; that is, light. The most interesting part of this effect is that this process is permanent and does not need another electrical source other than the one produced by the gravitational distortion.

THE COMPLEX ARCHITECTURE BEHIND THE ADVANCED TECHNOLOGY OF FACILITATING ILLUMINATION THROUGH QUARTZ CRYSTALS

Structurally, the light emitted was calculated to cover the entire visible spectrum. Together, all of the crystals were creating an ambiance of white and balanced light that was very rich in different frequencies, flowing from the countless photonic emissions emitted by the quartz crystals. This explains the sense of well being and the sensation I had of “feeling fed” when I arrived in Apellos and came into contact with the light there. Solving this delicate aspect of living has also ensured a rich habitat for vegetation and has enabled life to thrive.

THE FIVE PLATEAUS AND THE COMPLEX SYSTEM OF CAVITIES BENEATH THE TERRITORY OF TRANSYLVANIA

It is thrilling to see the way in which a population is established and the way in which it builds a proper environment and even a destiny, especially inside the Earth. In short flashes, it was shown to me how everything had begun; how they brought bales and sorts of barrels in the first phases as well as various other objects which they stored in front of the mountain entrance to the mountain; and how they then eventually started to advance more deeply into the cave, especially after the first lighting globes arrived.

The fact that I was seeing rather large objects that the people had brought there made me think that the access opening to the cavity was pretty large itself; otherwise, they could not have managed to carry in those materials. Still, just like in Tomassis, I did not see any type of animals that might have helped them with the transport. As soon as I focused my attention to the access to the huge cave, I was shown images of the cave in sections, presenting the cavity from the right side, the bottom side and so on. From there, I saw the main corridor at the entrance which then developed into many more branches. Some of those were blocked and were rather short, but others were larger and were laid out in different levels so as if to have a “split level” effect. I did not see a continuous diagonal access path from top to bottom, but the environment had somehow been fragmented into many relatively horizontal plateaus with passage ways made in between them. As different branches of tunnels existed at each of those plateaus, one had to know the correct and primary path leading into the huge cavity below; otherwise, I observed, you would end up following the secondary branches leading into smaller caves or the path would be blocked. I cannot say, however, whether any of these smaller caves were also inhabited or not. As some of these caves were linked, I would guess that the answer is yes; but this is just a personal opinion of mine. Nothing was shown regarding it.

I counted five levels or main access plateaus to Apellos. As I looked at the sectional images that were presented to me, I was amazed to notice how complex the structure was inside the Earth, even when so close to its surface. From what I have seen, I can affirm that Apellos is in the zone of transition between the crust and the mantle area, at a relatively small distance from the surface, and that it can be accessed directly through a certain place in the Apuseni Mountains that resembles a pretty big crack in the mountain.*

[*In Romanian, the word Apuseni is derivative of apus, meaning “sunset” and the suffix eni which refers to a plurality as well as a group of people or objects with certain attributes that might include beliefs or other characteristics. In this regard, Apuseni can refer to the “people of the sunset.”]

In comparison, Tomassis is at the lower limit of the Earth’s mantle; that is to say, at a much greater depth than Apellos. Due to that, the Dacian city is very close to the border of the transition zone to the etheric plan inside the Earth. This explains why the physical nature of matter in that place and the beings there are more refined than what you will find on the surface. Additionally, it is possible to access Apellos by walking if you know the know the correct route. Access to Tomassis cannot be accomplished in the same way but rather only by passing through certain lock chambers or spatial distortions that exist in certain well-known zones. They are either natural or were created artificially, such as is the case of the Second Tunnel through which Cezar and I entered.

I was shown the path to Apellos, at least to the first level. After one enters from the surface, there is a rather steeply declining passage to the first level. The steep descent attenuates at the second plateau and a relatively constant angle of declination is maintained to the fourth plateau, the largest of all the plateaus. I have seen that a large cave exists on that level which includes a pretty wide underground lake that needs to be crossed in order to get into yet another cave. It is by journeying through this last cave that you eventually reach the immense cavity wherein is the city of Apellos.

THE FIVE PLATEAU SYSTEM OF THE ACCESS ROAD TO APELLOS, STARTING FROM THE SURFACE OF THE EARTH

I was then shown an overview of the territory of the Apuseni mountains which suggested to me, by reason of a luminous apparition in the projection, that there was an immense cavity inside the Earth. Apellos itself had an elongated shape in the form of a kind of triangle. I could place its boundaries between the Romanian cities of Oradea, Sibiu and Alba Iulia. From the edges of this cavity, I saw it extending into other smaller caves like some “fiords,” all of which made a very complex underground beneath the Apuseni Mountains.

I believe it to be important fact that both Apellos and the other “fiord-caves” extending from it are physical worlds in the same sense that our world is on the surface of the planet. Moreover, these worlds are connected culturally by reason of the access paths shown to me and just described. Based upon further explanations that I received from the blond man, I found out that they pretty often visit our world and return with many products and goods from the surface world. Access to Apellos, however, is not allowed except in cases where it is absolutely necessary.

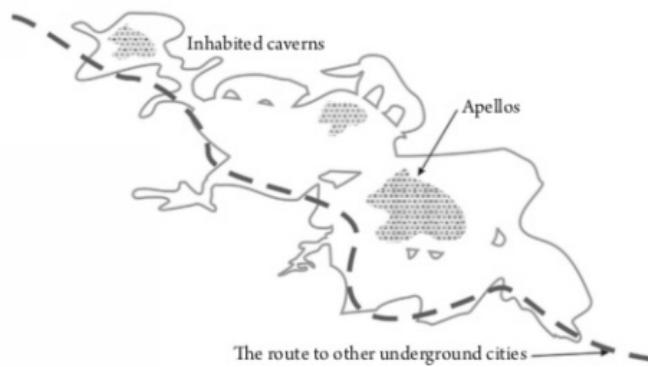

The widest part of the inner cavity inside is oriented to the south, right beneath Rosia Montană and the adjacent town of Campeni. It is obviously no coincidence at all that so many problems, debates, discussions and conflicts, particularly of a so-called economic nature, were born out of the subject of extracting the gold ore from Rosia Montană. We know too well the subtle-ties beneath this problem, but it is neither the case nor the time for it to be presented here. These represent internationally sensitive issues involving state secrets, but the attentive reader may make some pertinent correlations.

THE TRANSPORT NETWORK

The cavity narrows very much towards Oradea, forming a kind of triangle with the wider side at the bottom. The projected images I was watching then showed me a sort of circulation “network” inside of Apellos as well as in between the different “fiords” or its branches. As the images were zoomed in on, I could see that the connections and the movement were by shuttles such as the one in which I myself had traveled from Tomassis to Apellos. I noticed, however, two other types of shuttles or capsules, one of which featured a modular transporter more than fifty meters long.

From the platform I was on, the city looked very quiet, just like Tomassis, but the underground shuttle was dynamic. Even inside the hollow of the cavity, it was quite active, but I noticed that most of the trails were relatively close to the circumference of the huge cavity, nearby the mountain’s wall and with only a few vehicles penetrating radially towards the city center. Basically, it was the same structural layout as in Tomassis where the shuttle tunnel follows the circumference of the mountains on the edges of the inner cavity.

THE LARGE CAVERNS AND “FIORD-CAVERNS” BENEATH THE TERRITORY OF THE APUSENI MOUNTAINS

I have noticed many such small and large shuttles that connect the various areas of Apellos and other outer branches of the city. Of course, I have seen the movement of such vessels penetrating zones close to the surface where there are some major stations at relatively small depths beneath the ground that serve as “reception points” through which movement and transport of goods and personnel is made with the outside. The passages between those stations and the surface were short and also secret.

Still, while I was seeing those visual sequences, I observed that the transport shuttles were taking only a small part of the goods deposited into those reception stations. Personally, I was facing a dilemma: right from the beginning of these visuals, I was asking myself how communication with the outside world took place and how the inhabitants of Apellos were arriving at the surface and traveling back. Also, I was curious as to how the transportation of goods took place; and from what I had noticed, the quantity of such was rather massive. There was no way that the shuttles could arrive to locales on the surface nor could you find many transport vehicles at the reception stations, all of which were probably two to three kilometers beneath the surface. If those from Apellos would have tried to use the caves and plateaus system that I had seen in the images, then it would have been a failure right from the start because the traveling along those passages would require immense effort and would take a lot of time. Even assuming that the route were flat, it would still take several days to ascend the almost 70 kilometers between the city and the surface of the ground. And let us not forget that the interior of the planet has countless meanders, barriers, ascents, descents, waters to cross and who knows how many other unknown elements. In such conditions, transporting goods of any kind, especially in big amounts, and depositing them into immense hangars, as I later witnessed, would be virtually impossible.

I was preoccupied by this problem, and that is exactly why I dared to ask for some information. The blond man answered me with a lot of goodwill.

“Yes, this has long been a thorny problem, but it has been resolved. Here,” he said, alluding to new visual sequences, “you can see our hangars on the surface where we bring various goods from your cities before transporting them to Apellos.”

The screen showed images of a huge and very modern hangar in which people were bustling and using forklifts and small electric vehicles, just like in a retailer warehouse. Amazed that the activity of the underground dwellers was equally alive on the surface of the Earth, I made an enthusiastic and natural inquiry.

“But where exactly do you have those depositories or hangars? I did not expect such a big circulation of goods to exist,” I said admiringly.

Smiling, the man replied to me.

“You can understand well enough that we have no permission to reveal this. Information of this sort is discussed at another level and they are beholden to higher authorities who decide such matters. Even the information that you now have access to has been previously ascertained with regard to what will be revealed to you as well as to how and when. These are important matters that cannot be treated with superficiality.

CONSIDERATIONS AND POINTS OF VIEW ON LIFE IN THE CITIES INSIDE THE EARTH

I was well aware that such things are fully justified and fit into the logic of events.

“Due to the nature of the people on the surface and their level of understanding life, the problem of the security of our city has always been very important. Your coming here is also part of a plan, designed long ago and that happens in a step by step manner. The fact that this stage has been reached means that a real diplomatic decision was made.”

His words were saying, indirectly, that future contact between our civilization and Apellos, Tomassis and perhaps other cities inside our planet was being prepared. I do realize, however, that this cannot be done so easily. Without getting into philosophical and religious details, I would mention the immense technological, social, psychological and economical shocks that Humankind would suffer after facing the reality of the existence of these civilizations inside our planet as well as the reality of the interior structure of our planet, all of which has no connection to modern scientific theory.

These two Inner Earth cities that I had accessed up to that point seemed to me like they were two enclaves of another world. I do not think it is wrong to say that, if their existence were to be known about by our surface civilization and access would be free, we would probably witness an invasion similar to the conquistadors conquering the Inca empire. From a certain point of view, things have not changed too much from four hundred years ago. The goodwill of the beings from the two cities, however, is great and they really want to help us. I now better understood the titanic efforts of Cezar, his countless journeys inside the planet and their true motivation as well as the great discretion that he has shown in this respect.

Noticing other smaller cities on the outskirts of this settlement, nestled inside smaller cavities, I asked a question.

“Did they develop independently?”

“They are like satellites of ours, but they each have their own separate status and bylaws. We communicate and help each other out, but the development is on an individual basis. The population of these cities increased massively after the conquest.”

Without asking more, I understood that he was referring to the Roman conquest of Dacia, two thousand years ago. The blonde man continued his explanation to me.

“The interior of Earth is not full at all, as you say, but you can also say that it is ‘rarefied,’ having a lot of cavities, caves and caverns of which you know nothing about. Some of them have no association with the surface but only communicate amongst each other. Many, however, are connected through channels or other access ways to your realm. Of those, you only know a few. Caves that are used for tourism or exploring represent only the tip of the iceberg; but the cavities inside the Earth are bigger and more complex than those and exist in far greater number.

“Are they all inhabited?” I asked, opening an older curiosity.

“No. Some of them are empty even if they are capable of supporting and maintaining life. Powerful governments in your world have discovered some of them that are closer to the surface and have even built military bases there that are actually real cities in which thousands of people live. They are considered to be used as refuges in case of great calamities or cataclysms on the surface and that is why they are secret. Other cavities, although very large, are useless for the purpose of developing a society. Many of them are practically bags of gases while others have wide fresh water lakes and some have sediments, oil, or other substances.

Certain powers in your world wish to exploit us by different means. Sometimes, when they get dangerously close to one of the access paths, we prevent them from doing so without them realizing what is really happening. For the time being, we cannot have any another type of contact because their intentions are almost always destructive.

“In any case, their influence inside the planet is minimal, practically meaningless,” I commented. “At the same time, there are probably many other populations, cities and possibly even civilizations that I know nothing about but that you are probably already familiar with. Are there any conflicts amongst these different factions?”

Fights in the underground are pointless because they are destined to failure on both sides right from the start. There are no winners and losers.

Everyone loses because the environmental conditions dictate it. It is a closed and relatively limited space, and you cannot treat it randomly. The balance is delicate and a lot of attention is required to maintain it. Powerful weapons of destruction, explosions, and as you call them, weapons of mass destruction, are out of discussion. These are, in fact, rather primitive. Even if we were to use simple rudimentary weaponry, like the type that existed in your medieval period, too many corpses would destabilize the ecosystem. Many of the cavities are not as large as Apellos, and life there needs to be carefully organized. Those of us inside the planet have understood right from the beginning that fights and conflicts are pointless. Human evolution has changed its perception and genetic information step by tiny step so that, after thousands of years, there is a fairly large difference between the beings on the surface and those inside, and this applies in almost any field. If genetic information is healthy from the beginning, the evolution inside the planet can take place quite rapidly.

“TELEPORTATION” OF GOODS

Some things were unclear in my mind, and as I tried hard to arrange their importance, I allowed myself a comment.

“It is hard to believe that all the beings in the underground are built from the same model. I see significant differences even between yourselves and those in Tomassis; but, after all is considered, I find it to be understandable.

What I do not understand, however, is if all of the communities are on the same approximate evolutionary level. Are they all peaceful and happy?"

"For those starting from the same genetic pattern, yes. They have developed based upon the same pattern. But there are also some limited communities that are different. These are beings, not necessarily human beings, who have another way of living. Some of them are not from this planet. Their worlds are dark and filled with anguish. They are isolated and their access to the big cavities, where society is considerably evolved, is blocked. They have arrived here through fate and the game of destiny, all in the context of historical circumstances which they themselves have perpetuated."

"I understand that this is the situation at minimal depths."

"The cities and civilizations inside are not only physical. Their degree of elevation increases as you go closer to the center. While we are in a cavity that is relatively close to the surface, it is natural to maintain the connection to those living there because we live in the same dimension of reality, that is, the physical dimension.

It is the same for Tomassis. That is why we have rich activity and use many of your products."

I then remembered the subject which we started the discussion from and I looked at the screen that had immediately animated itself.

"Indeed. I see that you use many products from the surface."

"It is only natural. We have no plantations, agriculture, nor a complete set of elements that are necessary for survival," the man said.

"Okay, but how do you transport these products from the surface to the city?"

He passed his hand in a certain way over the projection panel, and a small cross-section of the hangar appeared on the screen. I saw a clear circle with a diameter of about three feet. Above this, I saw an arch about five meters in height that was made from a yellow-reddish color metal. A round-shaped device was attached that made the entire ensemble look like a huge shower installation. I even made an innocent remark about this in a joking manner.

“In reality, it is a high technology device that relocates the goods and the beings from there to the receiving station where they are taken by transporters,” the blonde man explained to me as he smiled.

“Are we talking about teleportation?” I asked, stunned.

“No, it is not teleportation in the exact meaning that you might give to this notion. The object or being does not simply disappear and reappear in another place. It is a simpler method that does not imply the difficulties involved in teleportation. We raise the vibrational frequency of the object or the being to be transported, and then the material is ‘pushed,’ as if it were on rails, to its destination. The ‘rails’ are actually field lines, like rays of energy, between the transmitter in one location and the receiver in another. Atoms are pushed along these lines; and when they reach their destination, they are ‘coagulated’ by diminishing the vibrational frequency.”

“Does the process take place instantaneously?”

“No. It takes some time, but it is short. Even though there is no question of speed in the classical sense of the notion, transmission takes only a few seconds due to a required sort of rebalancing of the electric and magnetic fields of the transported material. To compare it with reference to the current understanding of your science, it is as if the object travels to a parallel universe and then goes back to our universe. The technology is a bit more advanced than that of our shuttle system.

MAGNETIC CONVERTERS

From the explanations given, I understood the movement of the transport vehicles was more a problem of “local” physics, a phenomenon that in the open spaces was helped by some adjacent structural elements. The shuttles were not going on rails but were passing under some “arches” as they circulated in open spaces. In the images shown to me, I saw how they traveled at high speed both through empty spaces inside of caves and caverns but also through solid matter in between. I then understood that the travel technology used by the inhabitants of the two cities inside the Earth is not very different.

As soon as I looked at the situation from this angle, the images showed me a shuttle very similar to those from Apellos; and then, very quickly, several projections followed showing the type of converter used and the forces it generates. As I already knew about this, I realized that the transport technology used in Apellos was similar to what the woman in Tomassis had described to me, though not necessarily identical to it. I was shown how the shuttle was propelled by physical matter through the principle of changing the vibrational frequency; and then at the forefront of such a system, how gravitational attraction is converted into a magnetic field, almost identical to the “scales” type system on the cover of the shuttle that I had traveled in from Tomassis. As the vehicle was shown to me in the images, the cover was just a little different in shape to that of the one from Tomassis with one of the sides sloping and corners being slightly rounded.

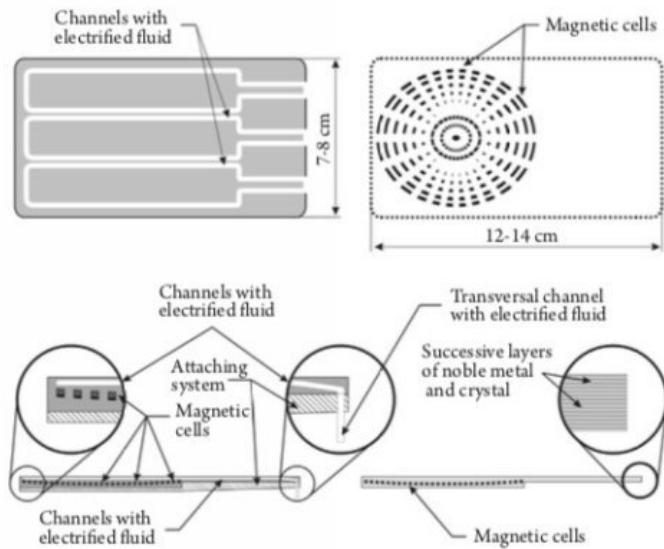

The zoom on the image increased considerably so that on the surface of the converter I could see the structure of a complex network formed by the lines of the gravitational field. It intertwined with the shape of the shuttle and was rendered graphically so that I could see an interaction between it and the major network which then began to fluctuate. Then, in a very interactive way, it was shown to me how the electricity generated out of those fluctuations was taken by the system and converted to a magnetic field.

Implicit within the physical construction of the converter were some compartments with a special shiny white liquid that looked very similar to liquid oxygen, but I tend to think it was something different. As I watched how this special liquid interacted with the gravitational network lines, I concluded that it probably contributes to the conversion of gravitational energy into magnetic energy.

RETURNING HOME

After the projection of this last detail, the screen became opaque before pulling itself back into the solid pedestal upon which it rested. The blonde man turned to me and spoke.

THE PRINCIPLE STRUCTURE OF THE MAGNETIC FIELD CONVERTER

“It is now time for you to return to Tomassis. Your colleague is already waiting for you.”

I thanked them for their goodwill and kindness as well as for the marvelous opportunity they had provided to me of learning about the history and life of their community. I was impressed; and inside myself, I admitted that I wished to stay in Apellos as I enjoyed it very much. After saying goodbye, I entered the shuttle with my companion.

The return trip was even shorter. As I traveled, I abandoned myself comfortably into one of those chairs with their very relaxing material, thinking about everything that I had seen. Meanwhile, my female companion was searching out some information on the interactive images on the walls of the transporter.

Five minutes later, I felt a very light and short deceleration which indicated we had arrived at our destination. I stood up, and when the door opened, I walked onto the platform in Tomassis. There, I had the pleasant surprise to see Cezar, waiting for me with a slightly amused smile. Dryn was a few meters away, talking with the two military personnel. I looked at my watch and saw that the time spent in Apellos, including the travel both ways, took about forty-five minutes.

My intuition was telling me that it was time to get back to the surface, and Cezar confirmed it with a knowing look. Dryn told us that the two military officers would accompany us for a while to see us out. We told him goodbye, and I thanked him especially for the care and details that he had offered. I was feeling that this wise man would play an important role in the future destiny of the cooperation that is anticipated between their civilization and the surface world.

We both ascended on a flying platform that took us up to the area of the mountain where the inter-dimensional “elevator” was. The two military people followed us on another platform. Everything was happening very fast, but I still had no impression of hurrying or hastiness. Being under the spell of all the information that I had just found out in such a very short time, I preferred not to talk, especially because Cezar seemed to be preoccupied.

I then enjoyed the short journey in the elevator and the images I saw through the transparent material that were somewhat daunting due to the very high speed. When I stepped out, I was in the reception area, but I saw more people this time. The two soldiers led us up to the section of the wall of the mountain, and when Cezar and I came directly to it, it began to vibrate, becoming translucent. Strangely, I had already felt a change of state in my whole being, as if my center of gravity had changed, and it made me very dizzy. Greeting the two from Tomassis, who bowed their heads with respect, I walked along with Cezar and beyond the reception area.

I experienced the discontinuity as naturally as possible, feeling only a shivering sensation that crossed throughout my entire body like lightning. Cezar explained to me that, in practical terms, this feeling is a result of changes in the vibrational frequency of the bioelectric field at a cellular level. While we were walking back through the tunnel, I asked if this was going to ruin the body. He explained to me that, due to the fact that the frequency differential is at a relatively close value, the body would not notice such changes in an unpleasant way, even if those were realized at a rather rapid pace. Additionally, he told me that the body “learns” such new information quickly and assimilates it through repetition. This led me to understand that it is very probable that I would feel almost no disparity during my future travels.

In the meantime, we arrived back at our original point of disembarkation in Bucegi, and I was having a bit of a hesitation as I looked at the tunnel that bifurcates, the branch that I had yet to travel on. Noticing my response, Cezar told me that branch represents a more complex travel experience than the one we took to Tomassis and Apellos.

“First assimilate what you have found out and experienced so far in the two cities. We will go through the second branch later, and you will see for yourself that here things are, in a way, more complicated.”

Seeing the diffused light in the Projection Hall, I abandoned myself in the drunken magical state that it would give me each time, even if I am only passing through it. I could not help from remarking how efficient these technological systems are which facilitate natural changes in vibrational frequency in order to allow travel to be made in a very short time.

Looking at my watch, I told myself that I was living a dream. I had originally arrived at the base at 9 A.M.; and after all of these experiences and trips, I was on my way back to the Base at 12:30. An hour and a half later, I had walked into my room and was laying down on the bed with my face upward, somewhat confused by the rapidity of everything that had happened. I was wondering if I had even departed that very morning, and now, in less than six hours, I had already arrived back but with a huge bag of information and a colossal experience.

A little tired by the multitude of emotions and energetic demands that I was not yet used to, I felt a very profound sleep coming over me. The last mental image I saw before slipping into a well-deserved rest was the splendid vision of the city of Apellos with its crystal buildings.

CHAPTER FIVE — THE GUARDIAN

The next two weeks featured considerable agitation. At certain times, the Department goes into “alert” mode, and its activity increases very much. Cezar was mostly gone, but he left me and Lieutenant Nicoără with the task of organizing a very important expedition through the tunnel to Iraq. Until then, the Middle East had proved to be the most difficult due to technological problems that could not be overcome. I will give some details when it is the right time to discuss that journey.

The expedition was going to be a joint effort, and the American crew was scheduled to arrive in two months. The organization protocols had changed significantly since the expedition to Egypt and so had the American military chiefs. As visions were not always convergent, this required moment by moment snap-judgment decision making as well and a vigilant wariness of contacts at different levels. I already had a lot of experience managing these issues, but things seemed to get more and more complicated from year to year instead of becoming more simple. Impatience, tensions, and repeated demands on the part of the U.S. put a lot of pressure on the Department, and this was felt especially after General Obadea’s death.

Once the structure and logistics of the expedition were determined, things calmed down somewhat. Other services, like the Secret Services, were occupied by organizing secret diplomatic meetings at a certain level with the State Departments because some agreements were political in nature. Anticipating possible surprises, Cezar decided to take advantage of this calm period and told me one morning that we would go traveling again but this time through the second branch. As soon as he spoke, I felt a tightening in my stomach. Ever since I had passed through the second tunnel, I have felt an unmistakable but indistinct tremor, the nature of which I did not understand. On the one hand, it was like a magnet attracting me to that branch. On the other hand, a strange agitation enveloped me. But as Cezar had already experienced traveling through that bifurcation, I did not worry but happily welcomed the journey.

Of the expeditions through the three tunnels, those inside the Earth involved the least preparation. The specificity of the travel and of the contacts make everything happen quickly and precisely. It is far more difficult when visiting with governmental representatives from our world as we are required to compensate for their lack of understanding as well as hidden intentions and issues of power, arrogance and money.

I rested well that day because Cezar had told me that it would be a difficult journey and I knew that I would have to experience many adjustments in vibrational frequencies, even more than usual. Only later was I able to understand the real meaning of his words. My only surprise was that, unlike the preceding trips, he did not announce to anyone that we were coming.

"It is not necessary. Somebody is there all the time," he answered me. "I told you that we are dealing with a special situation in this case."

Following the pattern that I was quite familiar with, we were in the Projection Hall in the morning of the second day. All that was needed was for Cezar to activate the discontinuation of the first tunnel; and when he did, he beckoned me to pass with him. One of the advantages of traveling through these tunnels and paying repeated visits to the Great Hall is that the body seems to gradually assimilate the superior experience and more effectively integrate it afterward. One never becomes bored or disinterested because your entire being is upheld and fed by a mysterious energy that seems to "activate" and offer an elevated experience or feeling during these expeditions. Through the passage of time, a specific certainty and confidence manifests which enables you to easily overcome what, during one's first experiences, was a heavy testing stone. This sense of power can be seen as a "habit" although it is more a "habit of realization" as the confidence that is acquired by correct assimilation provides efficiency and precision in one's actions. I offer these explanations because I myself was living that wonderful feeling of safety and superior understanding that such continuous practical and theoretical experience offers, especially when it is about such an esoteric subject.

Up to the time we arrived at the secret location in Bucegi and had entered the Great Gallery, we had hardly spoken. Now, we both remained silent until we arrived inside of the tunnel, right in front of the bifurcation.

Passing near the area of the big cube with the frequency deviation, we entered the straight path. Stopping before the second distortion, we witnessed glittering violet that was undulating in a delightfully mysterious way.

“I have always liked this part of the tunnel,” Cezar said with an enigmatic smile.

We both walked beyond the distortion with a motion that was suggestive of a slow down in the flow of time. For a moment, I felt a genuine resistance to our forward movement, but that was immediately followed by a feeling of release as if I had suddenly become lighter. The tingles I felt during the crossing lasted longer than those in the Tomassis branch, but they disappeared after a few yards. After passing through the distortion, the tunnel seemed to be identical with the part before the distortion, but I soon noticed that it started to widen like a funnel, becoming more and more illuminated. This was a remarkably novel experience which was reinforced even more by the perception of a sea breeze and the unmistakable smell of a beach. I was amazed and impatient to solve this intriguing mystery. After all, I had just entered into the mountain and now I was about to get to the seashore.

The tunnel made a wide curve to the left and I observed its grandiose expansiveness that was in the shape of a giant megaphone. I could even hear the first sounds of sea gulls screeching and the calm sound of the waves. Rushing ahead of Cezar, I followed the curve to the left of the tunnel. I stopped suddenly, finding my feet in a yellow sand facing the sight of a small island with rich green vegetation. Even though I am accustomed to stunning experiences, I was still amazed because I did not understand where the tunnel had disappeared to. Looking up, around and behind me, the tunnel was there; but, when I looked ahead, I could not see the edges of the “funnel” which seemed to dissipate into the air. Even the color of the sky seemed to intermingle with the color of the borders of the funnel, becoming thinner and thinner as I looked upward until simply getting lost in the air. It seemed that I was looking at an extraordinary well done painting or I was just emerging out of a television screen in a reality that I did not know how to define.

“Sometimes a short relaxation would do no harm,” joked Cezar as he came close to me. “I am thinking of bringing a lounge chair; maybe an umbrella, too.” We both laughed, but the truth is that I did not understand a thing. Staring at that almost unreal and unnatural landscape, I could not explain it in any way. The beach was deserted and dry with dry wood and algae. The sand spread far into the inside of the island, about thirty meters from the very clear and calm ocean. The air was pretty cold and very refreshing, but the vegetation that started from the beach seemed to be luxuriant. I saw palm trees and even big ferns. The island appeared to be uninhabited and, at first glance, we recognized that it had a relatively round shape with a diameter of several hundred meters. I could see, for example, the bend of the island to the opposite side, all beyond the green jungle just ahead of me.

I still did not understand anything. I looked upward to the very clear sky with only a few white solitary clouds, and I saw the bright sun at its zenith. We had entered the Projection Hall a little before nine o'clock in the morning, and to get here we only needed about five minutes. I made a gesture of giving up, renouncing any possible solutions because nothing seemed to connect. First, the temperature of the air was inconsistent with the type of vegetation; and then there was the position of the sun at the zenith on a little patch of an island in the middle of the ocean to which was added an immense funnel that became lost, coming out of the water and emerging into the air until it became indistinguishable.

After joking for a while over my stupefaction, Cezar spoke to me as he looked across the wide ocean.

"Just imagine how surprised we were when we arrived here for the first time. We were expecting a totally different view and, in any case, a presence.

Everything you see right here is the same as what we saw ten years ago. No change at all. The same beach, the same vegetation, as if time stood still. Back then, I did not know what to do. The team was made up of four people, and we had equipment with us as I had no information about what to expect. The console had shown there was a blockage beyond the distortion."

"So, this is our whole trip?!" I exclaimed, amused. "After all, where are we? At least tell me that we are still on Earth."

Cezar closed his eyes and clasped his hands at his neck, leaving the breeze strong enough to cool his face. Smiling slightly, he replied, "Yes, of course we are on Earth, but nevertheless, one cannot determine one's position here by using any kind of instrument. Nothing works and everything is in a mess. It would have been impossible to figure out what had happened if the Guardian had not arrived. You will see him soon as he always arrives a certain while after a team comes here. You will, however, find him waiting for you on the beach if you happen to come by yourself. This is indeed a mystery, but keep in mind that you cannot consider such a being to be like the others that you are already familiar with.”

I was already feeling some discomfort at the thought of having neither a reference point nor any sort of inspiration up to this point. Cezar continued to gaze in a dreamlike way toward the horizon. Without turning to face me, he answered.

“It’s an anomaly. I do not know that I can describe it any better. What I’m telling you was explained by the Guardian himself. This branch of the tunnel was descending inside the planet, right to its center; but at some point, something unpredictable happened that was never anticipated by the original builders and the space-time structure was altered in this area of the Earth. It was a terrible cataclysm, and the tunnel came into the category of so-called ‘collateral effects.’ The vibrational frequencies changed, but those inside did not want to completely break the connection in this direction. They considered it too old and important to be canceled completely, so they generated this intermediate “outpost” as a bridge between the physical plane and the etheric plane. At this moment, we are no longer in the physical plane; so, you have no position to measure. If you still miss it, you can look for the tunnel where you can find some physical traces, albeit altered from the distortion.

I remained stupefied. For the first time, I was finding out that I was in another plane of existence than the physical one. Out of reflex, I thought of modern scientific theory and mentioned this to Cezar.

“I know that this is only mere ‘magic’ to scientists, even a blasphemy from the point of view of their principles. With all of these, however, here we are, definitely not in a place on Earth where you could be found.”

He made a short pause, reflecting upon what he had to tell me. Knowing him as I did, it meant that the information to come was important.

“You have to understand that the physical plane represents only a small part of the unthinkable vastness of Creation,” he said. “In a way, you could say that it is a particular aspect of the etheric plane because these two planes are somewhat intertwined, not unlike Siamese Twins. General representations show us that the etheric body is covering the physical body, but it is, in fact, also inside it. Meridians and subtle energy paths, which are not seen but which are known by esoteric traditions, are proof of this. Actually, we might just as well say that the etheric plane is the one that encompasses the physical plane and not the other way round. That's why we meet the etheric plane in the 'interior' of the planet, but it also envelops the planet from the exterior. Basically, there is a very close connection between the etheric and the physical planes because their vibrational frequencies are relatively close."

"I do not really understand how the physical plane can appear out of the etheric plane," I said, confused. "They have different vibrational frequencies." "By a kind of condensation of the etheric vibrational frequency," answered Cezar, "which then decreases to the frequency specific to physical matter.

The etheric plane is like a 'foam' of vast water."

"That's all"? I asked, amazed by what he had said. "Is the physical plane just like an etheric foam?" "Yes. The physical plane is small compared to the etheric plane and has a narrow frequency of vibration. By comparison, the etheric plane has a wider range of waves, starting from an etheric aspect very close to the physical plane, almost ectoplasmic, and up to elevated etheric frequencies, close to those of the astral plane, such as some cities in the center of the Earth.

Thinking of the recent experiences I had, I said, "That would explain our repeated and relatively easy crossings between these two planes," I said.

"It's almost like a conversion from one frequency to another."

"That's true," said Cezar. "A simple example is that, at zero degrees (Celsius), water turns into ice, but those pieces of ice float through the liquid water that surrounds them and supports them. That's like the etheric and the physical plane. The vibrational frequency of the water has fallen and the water has 'contracted' or 'condensed' into ice. By analogy, the ice manifests as residing in the physical plane, but at the same time, the ice continues to be 'wrapped' and penetrated by the surrounding water that did not freeze. Similarly, the physical plane is surrounded by the etheric plane and also penetrated by it because, as the ice seems to be 'something' other than water, it is still water when it is heated and melts when you increase its frequency of vibration. This also explains why there is a relative correlation between what you see in the physical plane and what you encounter in the etheric plane.”

I carefully looked around once again and could say that, generally speaking, everything seemed normal in terms of “substance.” If I put aside some of the oddities I have already mentioned, I could say that we did not see too much difference between the physical plane we came from and the etheric plane in which we now were, at least according to Cezar’s description.

Cezar then continued his explanation.

“Strictly speaking, the alteration of space has brought us to somewhere in the Arctic Circle, a little further north of Iceland. This zone somehow represents a tradition for accessing the Inner Earth except that those who have lived this experience and wrote about it have not totally understood what they were dealing with nor have they described it correctly. This is the same endless problem and false controversy with regard to getting ‘inside’ the Earth through ‘the opening at the North Pole’.”

I was familiar with this problem because I have read and seen different representations, depictions and even known photographs of the so-called ‘cavity’ leading to the center of the Earth. I have also read the reports of my American colleagues about the decades of investigation in the Arctic.

Obviously, there was no opening in the ground and no curvature in the physical plane leading to the center of the Earth nor was the water of the ocean leaking out anywhere. There are, of course, an entire series of anomalies in this region that have been reported on over time, including the bizarre behavior of devices used for guidance and control, but no open path to the interior of the planet has been described and represented in the books, articles nor even classified materials of the Navy which tolerate the idea in their computer data base as they have no plausible variations of how to explain the phenomena.

“Everyone wonders what this opening to the interior of the planet is, what shape it has, how great it is and where it is. Many believe that in order to visit the inside of the Earth at the poles, there must be a huge hole in the Earth’s crust and that one must follow the curvature of the crust in order to arrive there, but in fact, things are different and I have already explained this to you. The endless controversies only arise due to ignorance, and this begins with the way in which different ‘positions’ are interpreted on Earth, but these are just conventions.”

“Still, you know that such interpretations are tempting because the experiences we have are very vivid and close to our normal life,” I said, based upon the readings we had already taken.

“Yes, but they come from misunderstanding the problem. For example, you’re standing at the base, and if we’re going to interpret in a mechanical and somewhat infantile way, when you get to Australia in the Southern Hemisphere, your head should be down. But, if you actually travel there, you see that it’s not like that; but rather, you remain the same way you were when you were sitting in the base training area.”

I was a little confused and agitated by Cezar’s approach because these “physics problems” were, in my opinion, in the category of the puerile category, being suitable for the first year of high school.

“I know the eternal story with the question of ‘Why do we not get off Earth when we walk through the circumference and why we are not head down when we get to the opposite side?’ Everyone knows that there is gravity and we have little chance of getting off the surface of the planet. Also, everyone knows that the radius of curvature of the Earth is so great in relation to our size and the speed at which we move that the surface always appears to be flat; and so, we will always be with our head ‘up’.”

“Not everyone knows this,” Cezar answered patiently. “But even if they knew it, it would only be a partial vision of the problem. The notion of ‘up’ or ‘down’ is conventional. If you were looking at the planet from the cosmic space, up and down would not make any sense.”

“What do you mean by ‘partial vision’? I asked, looking at him in wonder. He bent to the ground and began to draw with his finger in the sand. “The fact that the force of gravity acts and does not allow the body to detach from the surface of the planet, regardless of the angle it makes with it, is a general consensus explanation at a macrocosmic level. But, if you look at what happens at the microcosmic level, in the cells for example, the situation is no longer simple. The magnetic field lines will influence each atom and molecule in your body as you modify your position on the surface of the Earth, and that influence will be reflected differently in the organization and structure of your cells. At different points on the surface of the planet, the direction of the magnetic field is different, so the influence on the cells of our body is also different. However, we do not realize this because the process is slow, and the structural changes are not very big.

Accordingly, it appears nothing has happened; but in reality, there have been some magnetic changes in the body.”

“All right. So what about it?” I asked impatiently.

“The problem is similar to what happens at the poles when someone gets inside the planet, and this is what I am actually trying to explain. And here the process is slow. If you are in such a zone, you are no longer solely under the influence of the magnetic field on the surface but rather become subject to an interference pattern which is really an admixture of two different magnetic fields, one sourcing from the interior of the planet and the other connected to the surface. To give another perspective on things, it is like you are on the surface of a Möbius strip that becomes twisted, but you are actually remaining on the same surface.

Looking carefully at the drawing that Cezar had made in the sand, I said, “What I do understand is that when you pass into the interior of the planet, you are no longer in the physical plane.”

“Yes; then you gradually pass to the etheric plane. When you enter the zone passing into the Inner Earth, the magnetic field initially has a higher intensity in that area at or near the surface and its direction is almost perpendicular to the surface of the Earth. We could say that gravitational attraction and magnetic field lines almost overlap. Advancing toward the poles, the magnetic field of the Earth decreases, but for those whose consciousness is open, a gradual entrance into the etheric plane is produced, allowing one to continue their way to the interior of the Earth.

“There is a conical zone in which the magnetic field is smaller, but there are also other forces that appear, including those related to the rotation of the Earth. At the poles of the Earth, the magnetic field of the planet significantly decreases and this decrease forms the ‘cone’ that I was telling you about. You enter the inside of the planet at the base of this cone that is located inside the polar circle and it has a weaker magnetic field. There, the orientation of the magnetic field lines facilitates the process of passing to the ‘inside’ of the Earth, for if the intensity of the magnetic field decreases when you initially descend inside the cone, it then increases by the fact that you, apparently, are continuing to descend, but you are actually approaching the central source.”

For the first time, I was truly understanding the passing to the “inside” of the Earth via the poles.

“But isn’t this influence of the magnetic field exactly what determines my passage into the planet?” I asked, to get a better understanding.

“Sure. Once you cross the Earth’s magnetic field in the Arctic Circle, there is a certain alignment with the gravitational pull, and the energy released by the atoms’ response to this process causes them to rotate rapidly. It’s a phenomenon related to quantum mechanics. Amidst an accumulation of factors, the energy of your cells increases as they are excited; therefore, we can say that their vibrational frequency increases. After this ‘shower’ of energy, your cells will ‘want’ to retain their excitement, and thus ‘choose’ to go towards the growth of the magnetic field while retaining some particularities of the orientation towards the gravitational attraction. This ‘choice’ is equivalent to the slow entry into the etheric plane, and this in turn makes it possible to penetrate gradually to the center of the planet. Of course, this process occurs only to those who are trained and have a certain level of understanding. It also does not happen at any time or anywhere but is correlated with what we might call ‘universal necessity’ as well as with the will of the wise in those inner worlds.”

So absorbed in Cezar’s explanations, I almost forgot where I was. I then asked him a question.

“In this case, why is it that everybody who is succeeding at this is talking about getting inside the planet?”

“They then pass to the etheric plane, but their cells no longer align with the magnetic field at the physical surface of the planet but rather with the magnetic and gravitational field lines from the etheric plane of the Earth. Then, there is an ‘inversion’ with the surface that is produced that creates the sensation that they are ‘inside’ when, actually, they continued to go forward.”

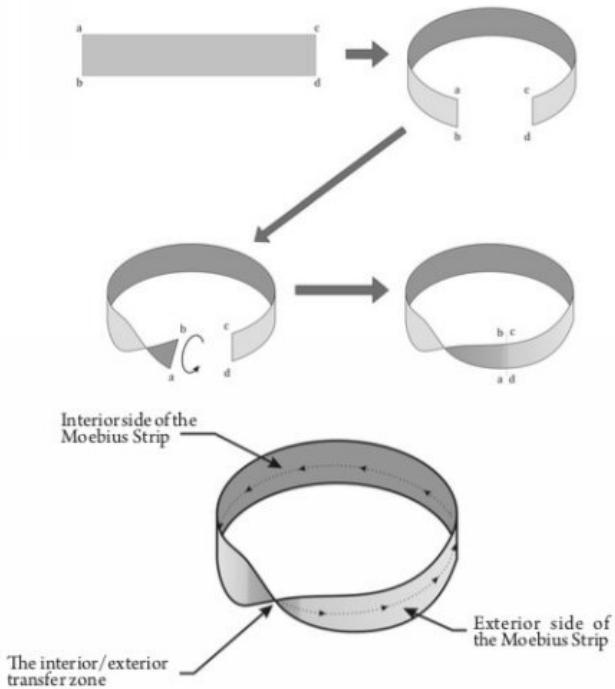

“How can this be? Do I have the same surface but with two different planes of manifestation?”

I was stunned because I could not understand how was it possible to pass from the influence of the terrestrial magnetic field influence to the gravitational field in the etheric plane.

“The vibrational frequency of the etheric plane is relatively close to the vibrational frequency of the physical plane and that is why the two planes, many times, seem to be glued together, meaning that they are close. This is the reason why it is pretty easy to pass from one to the other if you are in the right place under the right energetic conditions.

Only then did I begin to better understand that passing from the physical to the etheric plane, or the other way around, is like an inversion or reversal of the surface of a Möbius strip. Apparently, we do not feel it, but it exists. For example, when we fly by a plane from Bucharest to Canberra, we do not feel that something inverts within the cells of our body when crossing the different magnetic field with different directions, even if we are moving from one side of the Earth to the opposite one.

MOBIUS STRIP

“The same thing happens in the case of accessing the planet at the poles. Beyond the zone of the Arctic Circle, we feel almost nothing, but gradually, we see areas and views appear that should not be there,” explained Cezar. “We are at first confused, then impatient; and in the end, panic can appear. Still, curiosity and amazement often win out because the things that you then see are really extraordinary. The entire experience is stunning and you see what a wonderful opportunity it has been for you to live those moments offered to you. Inside your mind, the idea gets formed that one has traveled to the ‘inside’ of the Earth, but this derives mostly because the surface where we live is thought of as the ‘exterior.’ Fundamentally, if we say that we are entering ‘inside the Earth,’ we are not wrong, but the way in which the notion of ‘interior’ and ‘exterior’ is conceived in three-dimensional geometry is out-of-date. Also, the way in which one gets ‘inside the Earth’ is typically conceived and represented in a completely wrong fashion.”

Cezar sketched a new drawing in the sand and continued explaining.

“The passing zone is favorable at the poles because the rotation of the atoms around their own axis is increased, unlike the situation around the Equator where the apparent mass is bigger. It is like the gyroscopic effect: if you weigh a spinning top, it will be lighter when it is rotating than when it stands. The difference is infinitesimal at the atomic and cellular level, but it accumulates at the level of a physical body. Considering a specific model or example, we can say that the vibrational frequency of the spinning top increases when it rotates. At the poles, a similar phenomenon to the gyroscopic occurs. All the atoms in your body will be under this gyro-magnetic influence — they ‘rotate’ faster and have greater energy. The vibrational frequency rises and then you get into the etheric plane, even though you are maintaining the same direction of movement and apparently remaining on the same surface. But the ‘inversion’ or reversal that I told you about is produced, and the mind will interpret that it arrived ‘inside’ in the same way that it interprets that one’s head is ‘down’ when in Australia.” As he spoke, my gaze was drawn over his shoulder to a being approaching us on the beach. Although it was still far away, I was quite perplexed because it seemed gigantic to me. Feeling a certain shivering thrill, I let Cezar know.

“Yes, the Guardian. He never rushes things and arrives exactly when the discussion comes to an end. Watch carefully and you will see that he does not stop but walks continuously at the same pace. Neither stopping nor slowing down, he will be here exactly when we are ready for him.”

“We could go meet him,” I suggested.

“You can try, as we did, but you will see that it is useless,” Cezar answered. “Nothing changes; the distance remains the same. It is confusing, but if you consider that the rules of the physical plane do not apply here, the phenomenon becomes somehow explainable. You can barely understand the world that the Guardian comes from, and that is exactly why it is so hard to get there. You have no mental point of reference and there is almost no correspondence or agreement between what you know and with what you are with in this environment. It is a very elevated level of existence compared to our world.”

For a few moments, we both looked in his direction. I was practically hypnotized by his imposing stature and at the same time by the imperturbable calm with which he stepped, always focused and looking downward, but I strove to be attentive to what Cezar was saying to me. “The Earth is like a Möbius strip. Its exterior surface continues with its interior surface because they are not actually separated, but a lot of people do not think this way. They think that a line of separation exists and that if you stand above it or below it to any degree, then you are on the opposite side. Hence, one concludes that they are ‘inside’. Actually, it is a trick of the mind because they are just comparable situations. I was telling you that, based on this idea, and if we strictly judge things by it, if I am standing up at the North Pole, I should be upside down at the South Pole. But, if instead of this vision, it is understood that the cells of the human body always arrange themselves along the magnetic and gravitational field lines, then these things can be better understood.”

“That is right. We do not perceive them in real time unless they are major and produce an inversion like the one that we talked about, such as when you pass into another plane and get ‘inside’ the planet. But even then, what we see is actually what the senses perceive as new in the environment in which we now are, not necessarily an internal change in the cellular structure.”

Maybe we do not have the adequate receptors for this, or perhaps our sensitivity to these energetic changes is weak,” I said.

“Yes, these could be possible explanations,” Cezar admitted, “but some animals feel these changes quite strongly. Migratory birds are one example, but it applies to other terrestrial animals as well. Although you do not figure out when and how the cells of the body energetically rearrange when you fly by plane to Australia, these animals are capable of detecting even the very fine changes in the magnetic and gravitational field lines. We only perceive the geometric change. The quantum factor that produces a vibrational change is more subtle, appearing only as an effect.”

ANALOGY BETWEEN THE MOBIUS STRIP AND ACCESSING THE INNER EARTH

The conversation captured me again, and I forgot the Guardian's approach for the time being.

"This thing with the cellular rearranging or disruption sounds rather abstract," I said, "especially because the person does not feel anything."

"It depends upon from which angle you look at the problem. If you consider it only from a human perspective, then the cells remain the same; there is no difference because the being feels nothing or almost nothing and concludes that nothing happened. But, if you look at it from the perspective of energy, then every electron, proton, atom, molecule or cell — absolutely everything — leaps to a higher level of energy because there are gyrations that excite the atoms which then move on to another level of existence. At one point, this transformation becomes major, and the transition to another plane is like when you penetrate the Earth. This, however, is precipitated by certain conditions in the magnetic field and their orientation by reason of the gravitational pull."

“Okay; but the rest? A journey to another point on the planet should also cause cellular changes because, as you say, the magnetic field lines have different directions.”

“That’s right, but these changes are comparatively much smaller because the energy is also much less. If the experience is repeated, however, changes in the magnetic field, even small ones, disrupt biological organisms by influencing their metabolism. The specific set of psycho-mental attributes and other human characteristics are different from one region to another, and this is primarily due to the subtle influence of the magnetic field which impresses itself upon life. Science is just in the beginning stages with these researches and studies and is not too willing to give it much importance. The magnetic field, of course, is not the only factor of influence, but it is a determinant.”

“If we leave aside cultural differences and customs, we see that there is a specific set of general ideas and behavioral characteristics in society.”

“Yes, because the intensity of the terrestrial magnetic field is unchanged globally, at least over fairly long intervals. But where more serious magnetic field fluctuations exist, the changes are also obvious. There are also magnetic fluctuations that are often sudden and unpredictable, but the interesting thing is the fact that we can’t say the same about the fluctuations of the electric field. That remains constant at the surface level of the Earth. A correlation between the two manifestations should exist, but it does not appear. You would say that the laws of electromagnetism are not respected even if, globally, things seem to be all right. Still, the details should make one think.”

I then found the right moment to relate that aspect to the phenomena in the center of the planet.

“If science is not clear about how the terrestrial magnetic field is born, then how would you expect it to explain its fluctuations? The idea of a ‘dynamo’ in the middle of the Earth that would produce, they say, this magnetic field, is only a theory and it explains almost anything, not to mention the phenomenon of getting into the ‘interior’ of the planet and into the subtle planes. Only after I learned about the singularity in the center of the planet did I better understand what’s going on. Otherwise, you cannot reliably explain a whole series of phenomena through the simplistic explanation of the ‘dynamo’.”

“That’s right. If there is a dynamo, then it should provide a constant magnetic field around the planet, but it fluctuates unpredictably and nobody knows why. But, the electric field of the Earth doesn’t fluctuate in unison with the magnetic field. Even if it is said that the electric field maintains a continual uniformity on the surface, certain fluctuations should still be measured electrically when a magnetic fluctuation occurs, but they do not appear. These issues are not taken into account.”

“Probably because of deeply rooted fixed ideas,” I said. “I consider myself pretty open-minded from this point of view, but I still have had trouble getting used to this new perspective on the interior of the planet. I think people are so indoctrinated and accustomed to the idea that the Earth is a solid sphere that you have to dig into in order to get inside of it that they can’t think in any other way.”

“Yes. To them, and especially to some scientists, aspects like changes in frequency, subtle planes, or the idea of a central black hole represent only the utopian product of the imagination. Just because they have not seen all of this and have not experienced it does not mean that it does not exist. At present, we have an aggregate of erroneous or obsolete scientific ideas and principles that have only an immediate and somewhat local applicability but which are considered to be universally valid.”

“It is hard to get out of this circle of dogma and principles”, I accentuated, relying on my own personal experience.

“It is hard for people to understand the ‘interior’ of the planet because they only want to judge the problem exclusively at the level of the physical plane and from a three-dimensional orientation. This point of view takes into account an axis system with three dimensions in which something is considered to be exterior and something else is interior. In reality, the ‘interior’ of the Earth, and especially the zone in its center, is ‘something else’ because it is in the subtle plane. You do not realize that you get in there, as I told you, not by walking on the same surface nor do you see downward ‘curvature’. But, once you arrive inside, you can see from a distance a certain concavity which is not like the one in an inner (gigantic) cavity.”

“Yes, it is true. Most people struggle to understand how there can be an empty interior of the Earth. The interior exists in the etheric plane, but the connection between exterior and interior; namely, between the surface and its interior side, is not as it is typically explained. I mean, you don’t arrive with your head upside down, walking on the bending of the crust of the Earth. This is not happening because you are actually passing into another plane. Think about it. When you pass from the physical to the etheric, what would you relate to so as to figure out that you are standing up or not? You no longer have a reference point because you changed the perception of the environment. You passed from the physical plan to the etheric. The exterior surface and the internal are bound through this ‘inversion’, like a Möbius strip, and you do not even figure out that you got to the inside of the Earth this way until you start to see distinct signs of another world. By then, you are already in the subtle plane.”

The imposing figure of the Guardian was getting closer and closer, and I realized that it was probably time for him to arrive next to us. I don’t know if I really had anything more to talk about to Cezar, but I felt that the being came to us precisely at the right time that it should have. Due to its exceptional presence, I was a little timid at first. He was, I think, over three meters high, and I had my head bent a bit so that I could better see him. I still had not yet escaped the sense of the unreal caused by the subtle nature of the etheric plane in which we were. Having already extended myself beyond the limits of the physical plane, I saw myself as if in a movie with giants.

Still, that imposing presence proved to move with incredible delicacy and his smile was full of kindness and wisdom. The apparent height and size gave an overwhelming impression, but when you looked into his gentle eyes of very deep blue, you wouldn’t want to do anything but embrace him with an open heart and to abandon yourself under his protection. The clothes were very simple: pretty wide blue pants and a white shirt with a big opening at the neck that was tied at the belly with a narrow belt. I would say that the material of which they were made of was like a linen cloth but it was more fine than it. The footwear resembled dark brown sandals. His presence brought an extraordinary calm; and without wanting to, I then thought that this would be an excellent therapy for those who are stressed and agitated.

“We can go now,” he said, looking at us with a wonderful smile. His voice was warm and compassionate. Even though I was hearing it very well, I did not see him moving his lips. I figured out that the communication here was mainly telepathic. Although this was awkward at the beginning, I soon found it agreeable, being very simple and convenient.

We followed him back to where he had come from, about a hundred meters to a small bay, in the mouth of which was a very simple boat made out of wood. It was not tied to anything, floating on the water right near the shore without being influenced by the movement of the waves. The Guardian made a gesture, and we climbed in the boat. The Guardian then joined us. To my surprise, I noticed that when he climbed into the boat, it did not get any heavier nor did it move more than when we climbed into it. I was waiting for a powerful list or tilt after he got on board, but the weight of the Guardian did not seem to be any heavier than ours, even if he was about twice our size.

With calm gestures that were always focused, he sat at the end of the boat. I was expecting to see some oars, but instead of these, the Guardian bent over and lifted a long spear-like piece of wood that he sank into the water, pushing the boat out into the open water. I was wondering how successful he would be in doing this because the lance was not longer than three meters, but I saw that, even though we were out of the bay, the water remained at about the same depth. It was probably an area of shallow waters, as in the tropics, even though we were, theoretically, in the area of the Arctic Circle.

While I was thinking about all of this, I saw a strange fog quickly rise up around us which did not exist when I was looking out to the shore. In a few seconds, the fog became so dense that I could not even see the Guardian. Suddenly, I felt a shock as if the boat had hit something hard. I thought we had hit some rocks and that water would soon enter the boat; but in fact, in a way that I could not explain, we had just hit up against the shore. Nothing seemed to make sense, but I remained lucid and remembered that, in the subtle realms and under such very special conditions, such as being in the presence of the Guardian, reality suffers major distortions that cannot be logically understood by our three-dimensionally referenced minds.

I stepped silently out of the boat and onto the sand, following the Guardian who had begun to climb a narrow walking path, bordered by rich vegetation. The fog began to diffuse more and more, and when we arrived to the top of that path, after walking about fifty meters, it was totally gone and the view left me breathless.

In the valley below, I saw a small-sized but very well ordered city. The way in which the shapes of the buildings, streets, and the central square were placed gave me the impression that the city was extremely well organized and meticulously planned. Beyond this town, far away and somehow on an upper level, I saw the glare of a second city. It was stunning, resembling Apellos to a certain degree but obviously in another category of vibrational frequency. The buildings were taller and more daring in their architectural style, but the material from which they were built was also like crystal but more transparent and more glittering than what I had seen in Apellos.

While looking to assimilate what I was seeing, I noticed how the Guardian and Cezar were looking at each other, and even though I could not hear anything, I realized that they were having a telepathic conversation. Unlike as occurs in the physical plane, conversations in the etheric and subtle planes are almost always telepathic with a voice heard inside the mind where images are also projected.

At the moment I observed the telepathic dialog between Cezar and the Guardian, I simultaneously heard the voice of the latter.

“What you see far away is the entrance to Shambhala. It is difficult to get there. It was even hard for Cezar.”

I was awaiting other explanations, but the Guardian, just like Dryn, seemed not to waste too many words. I quickly understood that he was speaking only if it was absolutely needed and when he was asked.

“Where are we actually?” I asked anxiously.

“Near the center of the Earth. Even though we are not going to Shambhala today, our visit still has a meaning. You will not be able to go later, however, because it is necessary for some time to pass before your consciousness can understand what is there.”

I admit that I felt a bit discouraged, but I still had the prospect that it was something to look forward to.

“Are we just looking?” I asked.

The Guardian nodded.

“Many more events will be connected between now and then, but the way in which it will happen will become clearer later on. You need to be patient and careful.”

It was funny. I felt that I had a thousand questions that I wished to ask; but still, I was able to get focused enough to ask even one. I just asked what first came to my mind, a hidden thought that I had since we were on the beach, after exiting from the tunnel.

“Are you the Guardian of Shambhala?” I asked?

He looked at me with an immense kindness and understanding for the somewhat infantile way in which I posed the question. After a few moments, I heard his warm and gentle voice inside my mind.

“I am one of them. People still believe that all of this is legend.”

This is indeed true, but I was most interested in what I was seeing on the horizon: Shambhala. Being at a certain height, I could even see a little beyond the great wall surrounding that magnificent city. The buildings were tall, semi-circular, and shining like a diamond. Even though the distance was far and I could not observe the beings in the city, it gave me an impression of intense activity. Above the buildings, I was seeing diverse flying objects and the reflection of the lights indicated pulsating life.

Without knowing how, I understood the fact that the city was immense and that it represents a sort of center that is exactly the way it appears in countless written narrations on its existence, accounts that are taken in jest by the ignorant and arrogant scientific community.

Actually, the reality is unsettling. The magnificent and benefic radiation that this realm emanates to the inhabitants is fascinating, and the mere fact that I was watching it from a distance flooded my soul with joy. At the same time, I understood why stories about Shambhala seem implausible when they are told to others, for it is very difficult to express what you see so that your words are as close as possible to the truth. There is a big difference between the specific vibrational frequency of the realm of Shambhala and that of our world. Accordingly, and to the best of their ability, humanity interprets the narrations on Shambhala to be like fairy tales or perhaps even something akin to ghost stories. This, however, is nothing other than a product of ignorance that makes us all lose because it blocks or slows down the possibility of getting there. Unfortunately, the scientific paradigm of today is not at all to our advantage because Shambhala is not a physical realm nor does it significantly radiate into our world for the time being.

The voice of the Guardian woke me out of my reverie.

“It is time to go back now.”

As I looked at him with a deep state of detachment, I had the sensation that he was making certain efforts to express himself in the context of my logical system of understanding things. I nodded my head, and we turned to start walking down to the bottom of the hill where the boat was expecting us. Once again, we emerged into that mysterious fog for a short while, and when we got out of it, I discovered that we had returned to the small bay on the island.

The Guardian said good-bye with a slight bow of his head, and he disappeared into the fog. I remained for a few moments afterward, looking into the place where the boat had disappeared.

“He told me that you will have the opportunity to go deeper with the experience you had today,” said Cezar.

I did not believe that a simple visit could impress me so strongly. I was looking for other reasons for how I was reacting. In my mind, I thought perhaps it might be from either the rather extreme passage between the different planes, the fog, the presence of the giant, or maybe even by reason of the fast speed by which things had happened; but down deep inside, I knew that all was due to the indelible impact that the vision of Shambhala had left upon me. I confessed these feelings to Cezar as we headed to the cone-like opening of the “sectioned” tunnel.

Although I wished to express my exuberance, I did not comment. Still under the spell of that semi-trance state, we quickly passed back through the tunnel to the Projection Hall. Less than two hours had passed from the moment of our departure. In the final analysis, such expeditions prove to be very efficient. As the access was pretty fast and easy, I could now better explain the big number of excursions that Cezar had taken in recent years. The mystery remained, however, as to why Cezar did not return for several months during some of those excursions. He did not say much about it, and I have no permission to reveal other details at this time.

We returned to the base where Lieutenant Nicoară let us know that two American officers had arrived in order to prepare the expedition through the tunnel to Iraq.

CHAPTER SIX — THE MAGIC PORTAL IN YOSEMITE

Organizing the expedition through the tunnel to Iraq was starting to have unpleasant surprises. We knew about and expected the arrival of Major Cross, but it was not until we returned to the base that we discovered the fact that he was accompanied by another person, apparently a high dignitary of the American government. Samuel Cross was a good friend of Cezar's and the fact that he had not announced anything about this character could only have one explanation: he was taken by surprise himself, not expecting the arrival of the unknown American official.

Our suspicion was confirmed because, on the same day we returned to the base, Cezar was phoned by the Major. After having a short talk for a few minutes, Cezar announced to me that it was necessary to have a meeting with them in Bucharest. The Major told him that he faced a fait accompli that he had to comply with.

“He is a Venerable Master,” Cezar told me (referring to a highly placed Freemason), “but what else would you expect? He has special authority, but it is not clear yet what he wants. Samuel doesn't know anything.”

Finding my heart beating strongly, I have never liked surprises of this kind as they usually mean constraints of some sort. We both left that afternoon for Bucharest and arrived at the Marriott Lounge at about six in the evening. Even though I was perfectly aware of the nature of these activities and meetings, as well as the specificity of the Department's work and the secrecy it involves, I sometimes still experience a vague sensation as if all of this is a dream, as if I might surprise myself some day by thinking that what I am living through is actually real.

This very rapid succession of planes, dimensions, frequencies, realities, worlds, and different lands, beings and situations, sometimes contradictory, can lead to certain slip-ups if you are not anchored as you should be with regard to what you know and what you want to do. For example, a simple combination of events such as those I experienced during the previous day was enough to induce at least the seeds of doubts about the surrounding reality. Early that morning, I had entered the Bucegi mountains; and from there we passed through a spatial distortion and arrived in the etheric plane. We then met a giant that was over three meters tall who led us to the center of the planet where I was able to view the fabled land of Shambhala from far away.

Then, after returning to the base, we were now in Bucharest at the Marriott hotel at a reserved table waiting for the American Major and a governmental dignitary who was accompanying him, apparently a Venerable Master.

For some reason, I thought that it was my “duty” to be somehow “worried” because my mind was dictating to me that all of these experiences I had were not plausible. Looking at my watch, I noticed that these events happened in an elapsed time of about nine hours; and that’s what gave me the vague impression that I might be dreaming. As I watched Cezar calmly drinking his lemonade, I returned to my regular state of mind, at least to the point where I was not as overwhelmed. Telling him briefly of my fears and the way that I saw the situation, he looked confused for a few seconds but then started to laugh, exhibiting a very good mood. In the nearly twenty years since I have met Cezar, I think that I could count on my fingers how many times I have seen him laughing. This was one of those occasions, and it was auspicious for me because it “woke me up” from the relative panic into which I had entered. I then understood how important it is to always remain focused and mindful with regard to who I am and what I do at every moment. Analysis, evaluation and assimilation of one’s experiences can be attended to after the fact, during moments of break and relaxation. As Cezar began to explain how this worked, we were interrupted because the two Americans had arrived.

I had known Major Cross for several years because we had to collaborate in order to organize some important Romanian-American gatherings at the base. There were multiple exchanges of information with him which included telephone discussions and two spur of the moment encounters, and the impression I had of him was positive. A firmly established officer, I think he was a little over forty years old, and I knew that his duty was much greater and more important than his military rank. I never brought the subject up; but due to various references he alluded to, I have realized that he has access to certain classified information and domains that are not even under government control but just the military. Cross was well known at the Pentagon, and General Roddey had supported him for pro- motion, probably due to his young, open and powerful spirit. Back then, Chris Roddey was still the head of the American faction that collaborated with our department, and a very tight friendship existed between him and General Obadea, often reflecting itself positively with regard to the very delicate aspects surrounding the location in Bucegi. After the death of the General, Roddey probably wanted to reinforce his position that had been somewhat damaged by this unfortunate event; so he promoted Cross as his protege. It was our luck that the Major had some important qualities: he was an honest and intelligent individual that you could rely on. Maintaining a certain balance with political, administrative, and intelligence factors regarding “the problem of Department Zero” has always been a delicate spot and has depended upon, among other things, the nature of those empowered to collaborate with us. The relative instability that followed in the wake of General Obadea’s death was quickly brought into balance by the combined efforts of Cezar and General Roddey which halted certain tendencies to undermine the collaboration protocols that had long since been put in place. Those of us who were here from the beginning knew very well that this collaboration was equitable for both sides, despite the various kinds of interventions and pressures that existed.

Nevertheless, some decisions and influences simply cannot be avoided. They are far above the province of any political decisions. Apparently, no one knows where such power and influence comes from, but we have already had certain experiences in this area. It is very hard to avoid such interventions which burst onto the scene like a bolt of lightning. In such cases, neither one’s rank nor assigned duties matter; only the relationships and influences that you have. Typically, decisions of this nature are handed down indirectly through intermediaries without anyone knowing who issued them. The cases in which such individuals come personally to discuss such matters are extremely rare, and this always signifies that the problem is very serious and important. Personally, I knew of three such cases: the original visit of Signor Massini, the one in 2010 when we received a visit from of a high representative of the Council on Foreign Relations, and now we were preparing for the third, an important discussion with another Venerable Master that I knew nothing else about except that he has opened all the gates of power. This did not sound good at all, but as it turned out, the problem was actually much simpler.

After Major Cross introduced everyone, we all sat at the table but only after our personnel had security checked it. There were five people guarding us: two posted at the balcony railing on the next floor, one at the entrance and two in the hall. We could have chosen one of our regular places: one of the houses that the Department has at its disposal; but Cezar preferred to insist on this place, regularly used for business meetings, in order to give another shape to the discussion in the event that there was an attempt to impose pressures or make demands. This would not have been as easy had we met in the silence and the solemnity of a conspiratorial safe house.

The Venerable One was aged. I think he was more than seventy years old, but he possessed a special commanding appearance. Despite his age, neither his dress nor behavior revealed him to be old-fashioned or conservative. He was impeccably dressed and I could see famous fashion brands on his clothes and accessories from the highest level; and the way he expressed himself showed that he was, doubtlessly, a very intelligent man and a dandy. There is, however, in spite of these characteristics and features, always something about these beings, a sort of “seal” on their face and soul, that can best be described as “hardness, suffering, and hidden torture.”

I will not present the discussion that took place right here because it involved many more technical aspects that I am not allowed to present; but I will say, however, that the Venerable One “asked” less than we expected, at least in the beginning. He wanted us to give up our rights to study and research a matter of international concern: any artifact we might recover from our forthcoming expedition through the Third Tunnel. Right from the start, this was considered to be a tunnel with problems. Although the request was not too serious, something still did not fit the general scenario because it was hard to believe that a Venerable Master of this level would travel all this distance just to assure our acceptance of an apparently simple matter that could have been negotiated through intermediaries. The interests therefore must have been much deeper and longer term, but they could not yet be easily recognized because we did not yet have any information. The unpleasant side of such meetings is that you are not quite allowed to say no. It is an unwritten rule, but one of the most powerful of the protocols established in the collaboration between the Americans and ourselves regarding the location in Bucegi. A refusal from Department Zero would be like a Phryric victory because it can trigger, through the unbelievably complex and formidable connections of the Organization, much worse consequences than if the initial terms would have been negotiated. Rash action in this way risks a break down of everything built this far. That is why the balance has to be maintained through well-chosen diplomacy and inspired negotiations.

One cannot certainly not ask for anything, as there are some well established limits in this regard, but such demands and meetings generally act like a “red phone-call” to a president: you cannot ignore it. What can be done, however, is to try certain renegotiations along the way to obtain certain compensations, but you cannot end the meeting by a refusal. There is an entire chain of dependencies that was created from the very beginning involving enormous funds, ultra-advanced technology and political and command interests, all of which are manipulated by the invisible forces of the Organization, that could change the ratio of influences if the game is not played intelligently. It is like a difficult hand of poker. You do not know for sure if it is bluff, but you don’t have the courage to risk a bet because you do not have powerful cards either.

The meeting went well and without tension. After all, there was no reason to refuse the Venerable One because he had only asked for something akin to an exclusive license to exploit something we had not even discovered. This did not bother us too much because our interests were not directly touched, but the personal presence of the Venerable Master remained, and what he truly wanted remained hidden. An entire year of research and counter-intelligence was needed to finally discover what was underneath his apparent business.

I will not go into details, but I will say that it had a personal aspect about it that had to do with the family of the Venerable One.

After we left the hotel, I went to the villa of Elinor, and Cezar went with the Major. The next day, as we drove back to the base, Cezar gave me a short briefing on his private discussion with Samuel Cross.

“For some time now, they have been operating a department they founded which was based upon our own model. Cross was put in charge of the command and he asked my opinion about certain aspects. He then said something that interests us directly. Actually, he made an invitation.”

I looked at Cezar curiously at this point because I had no idea what he was referring to. For a moment, I thought it was about other specialist courses, such as I had participated in with remote viewing, and I asked him if it was about that.

“No, it is a special invitation for you and me,” Cezar answered smiling. “A special place and a delicate situation. He said that, for now, they don’t have people prepared to correctly understand and document what it is that is there and he wants to appeal to our experience.”

It was indeed something special. Cezar then briefly told me what the Major had told him.

“They discovered a special place in Yosemite Park in California. Actually, the Counter-Intelligence Service of the Navy has known about it for a long time. The problem is that it is placed on the territory of an Indian reservation and it is a somewhat restricted area. Their information seems to say that the shamans there have a place of passage to the interior of the Earth, but it cannot be used in any regular sort of way because it requires a certain type of ritual. Even if they were to have the Army intervene, they still couldn’t use that special entrance. Apparently, they cannot control the phenomena, and this disturbs them. Nobody understands what it is there and they have thought to ask us to share our experience.”

We were going to go with Major Cross after we finished all the other aspects of collaboration related to the expedition through the Third Tunnel. Indeed — in two days we were on a plane to Madrid, and from there we were taken to the Rota Naval Base, near the ocean. As the major had some issues to deal with there, we had some down time while waiting for our travel to America. I spent a day on the ocean shore, relaxing myself and putting my thoughts and information in order.

From there, the three of us flew by a military plane to Norfolk, Virginia where we remained for a day. Then, we flew by Command plane to Las Vegas. From there, we were taken by car a relatively short distance (four hours) to Yosemite Park. In front of us was another car with four military personnel. The Major’s justification for this was that it was indeed a special operation, and the place where we were moving through was out-of-the-way. This was indeed true, as after we had walked on the main road for a while, we turned to a secondary road that ascended up into the hills.

We reached an area like a small plateau, fenced to the left by a fairly tall wooden fence that seemed to be electrified. Beyond the fence was a wide valley where a very beautiful and intensely colored forest of late autumn was growing. To the right, off in the distance, I could see mountains with snowy peaks on the background of a perfectly clear sky. I walked under a large and old wooden archway, on top of which was written the name of the reservation and the name of the Indian village. Basically, this was a village that preserved American culture, but I remarked from the very beginning that there was something different about the general atmosphere there. The place gave me the feeling that it is an exclusive and even secret area. I asked the Major if the area is open to visitors.

"This place is not secret, but it is out-of-the-way," he answered me. "It is an area for those of their people who are especially interested in mysticism or shamanism. They have here an extraordinary secret, but we cannot have access to it. As they have told us, it is like a kind of gateway to the interior of the Earth. It's a tradition kept in great secrecy."

"Initially, it was intended to move the settlement to somewhere else in order to have military control over the area and of that specific point, but we realized that it would have been nothing more than a gratuitous maneuver because it would have proven to be useless. Something would be missing, and we would not be able to use their knowledge. Besides that, they have many governmental agreements, papers and contracts since the time of the Civil War that would complicate things."

"Has this generated any unpleasant effects? Do they hide what they know?" I asked.

"No. They are calm. It is a problem of maintaining a tradition. From what we have figured out, we cannot use their knowledge as long we are not managing the process. They do not want to reveal it, and I also believe that they are not ready to know it either," Cross sincerely admitted.

When a group of men appeared on the road, we stopped on the right side, a small distance from the archway at the entrance. The Major told us that our visit had been arranged, but he asked us to remain inside the car for the moment. He got out of the car and greeted these people. One could see that they knew each other and shared a good relationship. They were medium-sized men, and I could easily figure out from their features and clothing that they had many characteristics of the American Indian race. The four military men also got out of the other car, but they kept a certain distance from the group and maintained a relaxed attitude.

Taking advantage of the lull in the action, Cezar shared some additional information with me that the Major had told him.

“The problem with this place is not that it would represent a threat, but rather, it is a powerful space-time distortion. For the community here, it is sacred and only they know how to access it, so no matter who it is, whether it is the Pentagon, us or somebody else, it is the same thing: we don’t have the key to get in. While this has disturbed officials on our side, they have decided not to push things but rather to maintain amiable relationships for purposes of collaboration.”

“It seems weird to me that they have not yet let anyone go through that gate,” I said. “Why would they let us in precisely at this time?”

“There have been a few persons that went beyond; and it is from them that things became clearer as to what it is about. The Indians told them that it is a realm inside the planet, but they didn’t wanted to tell them any more. They respect the directives of those inside who are much more advanced, but even if they are somehow forced to tell the secret, it would not have any practical use for others. It is the same situation in the case of the Great Gallery or access to the subtle planes: selection through resonance.”

“All right; but how can they get in there?”

“I don’t know. We’ll see if we are allowed to enter. It appears that the gate was discovered before the Civil War; and from that time, it was protected from generation to generation as a big secret.”

Cezar stopped because the Major had come to the car and told us that the locals had agreed to our visit.

“They already knew you were coming,” said the Major, a bit unsure. “I don’t understand how this is possible because we only just announced this to them right now and in our presence. We were going to explain who you were, but they already knew.”

We all went down the gravel road, passing some pretty big wooden cabins that were nearby. Some had the American flag placed before them and others had their doors open. In front of them were small groups of people having discussions. I was surprised to see that not all were of Indian origin, but some of them were definitely Native Americans. While the community did not seem to be too evolved, the people appeared both intelligent and dignified.

Beyond the cabins, I saw houses made out of mountain stones that had two columns in front like those in Greek temples, only smaller. That made me think a little because I could not recognize any connection to ancient Greek civilization nor understand what its purpose or influence would be in this part of the world.

We then came to a more imposing building, probably a sort of town hall, that also had the American flag flying, but next to it was another flag with unfamiliar markings. Above, on the upper part of the roof, I could see a big placard between the branches indicating this was Yosemite Park. On the same placard, I also saw an Indian specific blazon: a big raven feather with the peaks of three mountains underneath. I will not, however, offer many more details regarding this as the location is still out-of-the-way and very important. Those who live there are very much concerned about their silent status of non-involvement. Additionally, there is a commitment to U.S. military forces which I must respect.

As we walked along the road and it turned slightly to the left, one of the group who seemed to be a leader of theirs approached Cezar and myself. Without any introduction, he told us that we would be going through a portal to the center of the Earth, and that it had been announced that they will receive our visit. We looked at Major Cross who gave us a gesture that he knew none of this. The man, whose name was Watuk, spoke to us.

“Very few people have come to see this place. It is our heritage and we keep it in great secrecy. There are, however, certain conditions to fulfill, and Mezina* will tell us what has been decided by those living in the inside.”

[* Translator’s note: Mezina is a word that can be translated as “the youngest daughter and sister in a family.”]

Watuk was a dignified descendant of his predecessors: not too tall, but surprisingly agile at about fifty years old, he had long hair and a smiling but serious face that showed great firmness or resolution. I do not think that he was a shaman, but he had an important role in the Elder Council of that community. He talked with determination, pointing to a small path leading to a more isolated place where we saw three wooden cabins. We headed to the one on the right which had already caught my attention. The space surrounding it was clean and beautifully arranged with walkways and a lot of greenery, all of which was very well maintained. The cabin was old, but I remarked that it was somehow built over another building that was even older than it. I figured out that this was done in order to protect the original edifice, but I did not understand why it would have been necessary to resort to such an unusual method in order to preserve it.

When we arrived at the entrance, the Major addressed Cezar.

“From this point on, only you are to go. We will be waiting; and I have already spoken to Watuk. They have strict rules in this regard. It is a sacred place and there are certain conditions to fulfill.”

The Indian opened the door and made room for us to enter. From the moment in which we stepped into that cabin, I had the distinct impression that I had jumped two hundred years back in time. The initial wooden construction was so old that it squeaked from all joints when the door opened. The wood had not rotted, but it was as if it was “tired” by the passing of time. I paused after a few steps from the entrance in order to familiarize myself with the semi-darkness and to better observe the details. I could then hear Watuk’s voice once again.

“This building has remained exactly as it was since it was built in 1776. The land on which you now are is old Indian territory. Our ancestors inhabited this land, and some of us come directly from their genetic line.”

The cabin was over twenty meters long, and the width was about seven meters. The ground inside was dry and rocky, obviously in contrast with the fertile soil that surrounded the outside of the structure. On one side, I saw some very old rusty tools and also two logs. Everything was left intact and without any intervention, exactly how it was in the year of its construction. On my right, I saw a very dry shrub and some thistles on the ground that had been left exactly as is without having been subjected to any interference from the outside environment. Everything there seemed to have “stopped dead” at that past time, a time when something very special had happened. After allowing us time to adapt to the atmosphere, Watuk spoke.

“There are two conditions. First — you have to go to a certain place in this room and be there at certain moment. The second condition is that you cannot pass beyond unless there is a feminine component. Mezina fulfills this role for the men who go inside.”

We looked at him inquisitively because we were both men.

“You will go one by one,” Watuk said. “Who knows the precise moment in which we have to be in that special place?” Cezar asked.

“Mezina. She is the intermediary and she knows what to do.”

As he spoke, a girl of about twenty years old appeared at the door and approached, taking only a few steps toward us. She wore traditional Indian clothing with a long skirt to the ground, a leather blouse with fringes, and she had moccasins on her feet. She was not tall, and her beauty was not in the Western style but rather came from a force emanating from her inner being. The cheekbones protruded slightly and were characteristic of features specific to Native Americans. Her perfect long black hair was tied in two braided ties at the back, leaving a long bang.

Coming before us, the girl bowed respectfully and then looked at Wutak. “She is the one who will accompany you on your journey,” he said. “She has traveled on this road many times and knows of the realm inside the planet. You now need to decide who is the first (of you) to go.”

I suddenly became agitated because I did not understand at all what was going on. There was nothing in the entire cabin that would suggest where or how we might depart on our journey. After I made an impassioned look at Cezar, he said that he would go first.

Coming close to his person, the girl looked at him intensely for a few moments. She then smiled slightly and said something in an unknown language which was probably their local language.

“Mezina says that she is compatible with you,” said Wutak, translating her words for Cezar. “She says that it is a joy to meet a traveler who knows the wise men of the world. This is good; otherwise, the portal wouldn’t open.” I gasped, hoping no one noticed. The girl then came next to me and looked at me directly. She had very beautiful almond-shaped black eyes, but I had the impression that even though she was looking at me, her look seemed to extend beyond the physical realm. Unlike the case with Cezar, she looked at me much longer, about a half minute. I was starting to feel hopeless when she suddenly spoke again.

“There is compatibility in your case, too,” Wutak said.

I breathed a sigh of relief, as if a boulder was taken off my back. I then noticed an increased respect from Wutak towards Cezar and myself, and I suspected that it was related to the “verdict” given by the one that was called Mezina. Later, I found out from Major Cross that, up to that point, only one other person had been found who was compatible to travel inside the Earth together with Mezina. This was a psychic who was collaborating with the Pentagon. Their problem was that they could only come up with a limited number of “candidates” to be checked and only at certain time intervals at certain times of the year. Our opportunity was during one of those periods, and the Major was impressed by the fact that we were accepted. Cezar explained that it is very possible that this was due to the fact that he had traveled to the inside of the planet many times before, and this had somehow embedded a specific energetic impression into his being. As for myself, I had the chance to be embedded with the energy of the magical zone inside the Earth when I was in the presence of the guardian of Shambhala. Even though I knew that this was not the complete explanation, it still had meaning. In reality, what counts is the level of consciousness and purity of being at an emotional and mental level.

As is the case with our Secret Services back home, there were also backstage fights at the Pentagon regarding their collaboration with Department Zero. The problem that seems to very much irritate certain important officials is that they cannot have control over such phenomena or locations in the way they are accustomed to all over the world. Even if they convinced themselves to be resolute over such matters, their anxiety remained, and like a derailed train, this could cause certain effects that could be felt in certain details of the collaboration. Major Cross told us that it is not an easy job to resolve such tensions or outbursts, and we understood this very well because we have also faced many similar situations.

Happy to have fulfilled the compatibility requirement necessary to pass through the portal, I became anxious for the actual journey. As Wutak and the girl went to the area behind the cabin, we followed them closely. I noticed that there was an area of moist soil as if someone had been digging recently.

As we stepped to the area where the hard-packed soil conjoined the moist soil, we stopped. As the girl took Cezar by the hand, they both walked into the middle of the loose ground. Wutak gestured to me to remain near him. Withdrawing her hand from Cezar, Mezina turned to us and made a sign with her right hand. Wutak then pulled a long wooden dagger from underneath his coat as he bent over and left it on the ground. Viewing it up close, it appeared to be very old with all sorts of symbols and inscriptions having been carved into it. The handle was cracked to the point where it was almost split into two pieces. I admit that I was a little disappointed and not too impressed, telling myself that I was a witness to a shamanic ceremony and thinking about how easy and simple it had been for me to pass through the tunnel to the inside the planet in Bucegi. But I then realized that this was simply another form of access to the civilizations inside the planet, all of it being based upon a certain shamanic ritual required to activate the energy needed to open the portal.

I did not have too much time to think about what was going on because the girl recited a short incantation with equal tonality that was more like an extended sound and less like a word or line of words. I soon realized, however, that she had mastered the exact tonality needed to activate the subtle latent power of the magical dagger. Then, immediately behind her and Cezar, I saw the air “undulating” and becoming semi-transparent in part, like a square screen with sides of about two meters. As Mezina turned towards the distortion, I could not see clearly what was behind this square area, but she took Cezar by the hand and they both walked through the screen, instantaneously disappearing.

Even though I was used to such phenomena, having experienced it many times, I admit that I still felt a certain wrench. I felt somehow unsure, not regarding such phenomena itself, but with regard to the methodology of accessing that phenomena. Seeing no scientific or stable support, I was bothered by the idea that there was no corridor, tunnel, nor any devices but only a very old wooden dagger that had also disappeared at the same time the two had passed through the portal. I was somewhat uncomfortable with the thought that I was facing elements considered to be magical and that I could not fully comprehend. Even though I understood almost nothing about the technical details by which I was able to travel through the tunnels in the Projection Hall, my experiences there were based on incredibly advanced technologies, and to me, that somehow made me more confident. Feeling pretty embarrassed and at the same time a little worried, I stood next to Wutak, not saying a word. Like a block of rock, the Indian remained immobile, standing with a fixed glare at the screen as it slowly undulated, having a somewhat pearly color. I did not dare to ask a thing as I suspected that he was somehow mentally, and perhaps emotionally, plugged into the whole process. In fact, everything that was happening there had no connection to our ordinary reality in the outside world, including science and the laws of physics. I reflected on the fact that these absolutely simple beings, without pretensions or great aspirations and being full of modesty and dignity, have had access to an extraordinary world inside our planet and have enjoyed its benefits for hundreds of years; and now they were going to allow us, who consider ourselves to be more “evolved”, to enter that realm. Once more, I was realizing that, in order to have knowledge, you do not necessarily have to have either money or technology. And to the contrary, if these are not used correctly, this can keep you away from any true knowledge.

I think, however, that the phenomenal simplicity of the entire process was what inhibited me the most. By simply observing, you almost cannot believe what you see and you wonder if it is not a hoax or you're not going mad. There is such a big difference between what we are accustomed to seeing and what is actually happening that the tendency of the mind is to refuse and reject everything, even though it is obvious and occurring right before our eyes. We are tempted by prejudice to consider those people who can actually give us real initiation and knowledge as primitive or even retarded. We do this out of arrogance and hubris because we cannot admit that other people sometimes have more efficient and easier methods of perceiving reality than ourselves. We are used to believing that we have already discovered all that can be discovered; that we possess the "great secrets" of nature, and what we don't know or don't understand cannot be true but is to be despised and satirized. In fact, however, modern or "official science" is corrupt in most of its aspects.

While I was musing over these thoughts, Mezina suddenly emerged through the undulating pearly screen in front of me as the dagger materialized exactly in the position in which it had been placed on the ground by Wutak. By my approximation, the girl had not been absent for more than a minute. She came to the demarcation line, took my hand, and we walked together onto that moist soil. Everything was happening without a word; precisely, in well-established stages. As I came near the screen, I hesitated and restrained myself slightly. Mezina perceived this immediately because she stopped and looked inquisitively at me.

"Do you agree to pass beyond?" she asked, looking deeply into my eyes. I nodded affirmatively, looking at the screen. Closing my eyes and holding her hand, we walked through that "screen." I immediately felt that I was being immersed into a high speed of particle flow and began to relive the sensation of "lift travel" that I had experienced in the elevator when I was in Tomassis, but now the speed was even higher. I saw successive layers of the interior running by me at a dizzying pace in front of me: rocks, lava, holes, water, and crystals. I was a bit dizzy, yet in a pleasant way, with neither the sensation of nausea nor other discomfort.

Suddenly, I opened my eyes and saw that Mezina was already a few meters in front of me, looking ahead. Looking down, I saw that I was standing in an area bounded by a circle having a radius of about three meters, precisely contoured into the rock of the mountain. In a dizzying speed in front of me, I saw rocks, lava, holes, water, and crystals. I was a little dizzy, yet in a pleasant way without feeling nausea or other discomfort.

To my utter astonishment, I saw the dagger to my left with its tip inside the circle as opposed to the outside where it had been prior to our passing though the portal. I realized then that the dagger, being a magic element of the process, undoubtedly represented the “key” to the entire energetic activation phenomenon of the portal.

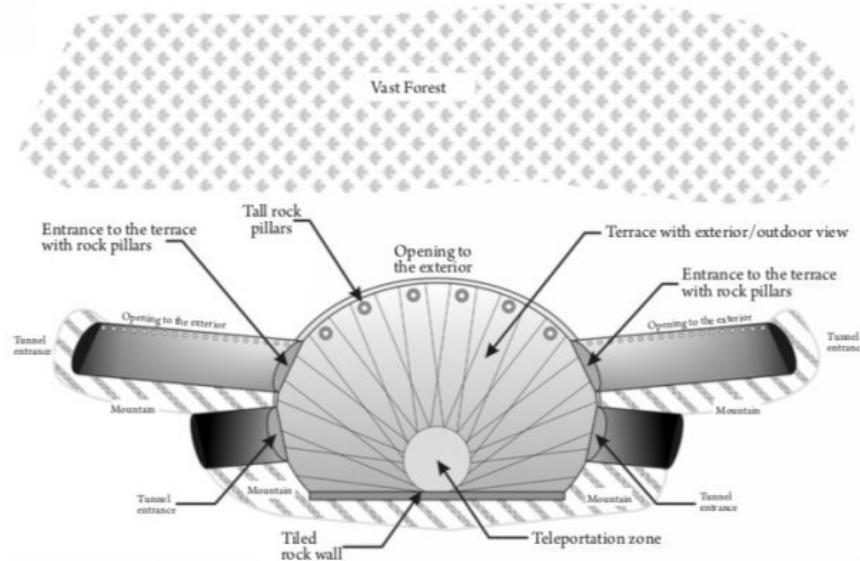

I then directed my attention to the place where I actually was and began to feel that I had arrived into a virtual paradise that was giving me an intense sensation of wellness and joy throughout my entire body. I had felt something similar in Tomassis as well, but the sensation here was more refined and it appeared immediately upon becoming aware of the place. I saw that I was actually in a huge hallway that opened into a semi-circular terrace with an extraordinary view. To either side, I saw four big tunnel openings dug into the rock of the mountain, each having a circular opening of about four meters in diameter. They were dug directly into the rock of the mountain and two of them featured a sort of columned terrace that served as an opening into the mountain. The hall in which I found myself was like a terrace that had been dug into the mountain that opened widely. Its arch was held up by some pillars, also carved from the mountain, which rose from the base and then curved into a cupola above. Absolutely everything there was made out of the rock of that mountain. I did not see any displaceable, separate, or moving part nor anything else that was made of other material. Everything that could be seen was carved into the mountain as if the entire space had been “hollowed out” of the mountain.

Looking in front of where I was, I realized that we were somewhere at a high altitude because I could see vast green vegetation beneath the terrace and a rich forest spreading to other mountains that were seen in the distance on the horizon.

On the floor of the room were large stone tiles forming a fan-shaped pattern that extended vertically onto the back wall of the mountain. Although it was noticeable that the tiles were polished and showed a different finish than the rest of the rock surface, some of them were somewhat deteriorated or damaged on the edges, a sign that they must have been there for a very long time. The burden of time could also be seen in the columns, which probably looked quite splendid when they were created, but now they were worn down by the thousands or tens of thousands of years that had passed and diminished their original brilliance and finish. Some had cracks while the symbols on the others seemed to be shimmering, especially where we saw traces of moisture. Despite the imperfections, the columns retained an imposing presence and nobility which created a sense of sacredness.

SEMI-CIRCULAR TERRACE IN THE MOUNTAIN

The tiles had been dug out and placed so as to serve as a boundary between them and the mountain rocks. Where they merged into the rock wall, each tile presented a pattern formed only by lines and dots. On the tiles that continued vertically on the wall of the mountain, I saw symbols on the ends of each tile made up of combinations of lines and dots, and simply viewing them gave me a creepy feeling in my body. This was followed by a vivid emotion enveloping me, even though I did not understand anything that those signs represented. Their impact on my subconscious, however, was very strong.

THE PATTERN AND SYMBOLS ON THE VERTICAL STONE TILES

In front of me, beside the imposing pillars on the edge of the hall, Cezar was viewing the landscape. I noticed that Mezina was looking at me and she discreetly gestured for me to go to the pillars, near Cezar. I proceeded, carefully walking on those very old rock tiles. Near the circumference of the hall, to the exterior, I saw two big corridors with terraces, one on the left side and one on the right side, both continuing as tunnels into the mountain. Their walls were not finished on the inside, but you could see carvings that were far from crude and definitely not barbaric. The ground floors of the corridors were like a rock mosaic, but right down the center, each had a perfectly straight line made out of rock tiles. The two tunnels extended beyond the pillars at the entrance for about twenty meters before completely emerging into the darkness of the mountain.

THE LUSH LANDSCAPE STRETCHING BENEATH THE TERRACE

Standing next to Cezar, I watched him daydreaming, gazing at the canvas of nature beneath us. After slowly approaching to share his view, I was both surprised and amazed at the vast view of archaic beauty and lushness as it filled my soul with calm joy. About 50-60 meters below us, a valley full of luxuriant vegetation extended to the horizon, with two massive mountains on either side. Reminding me of an oasis from the Sahara, the landscape was captivating because it not only offered a superb view but also a calming of the spirit with an uplifting sensation of gratitude and enchantment.

Not too thick, the vegetation was luxuriant and diverse; and it was somehow creating within me the sensation of some long-gone era. The trees were sort of like hybridized palms amidst moderate undergrowth with very beautiful flowers at the ends. This layout gave the entire landscape a distinct air, making it vivid and enchanting.

In the middle of that vast forest, I saw a road, not too wide, extending into the mountains before getting lost in the rich vegetation. While that seemed to be the main access road through the palm forest, there were narrower pathways on either side.

THE TYPE OF TREES THAT PREDOMINATE IN THE FOREST

LIZARD SPECIES, LIKE THE MONITOR

It was in this location that I saw, for the first time, animals inside the Earth. This species was a sort of lizard, reminiscent of the monitor lizard but more active in its movements. On its back, there was a crest like an iguana. I also saw insects, (flying) mites and birds. Life seemed to be very rich there and everything seemed to express a deep sensation of peace and security. This made me feel very quiet, and the thought came into my mind that if I had the opportunity, I would like to stay in such a place for a long time.

Somewhere in front of us and just a little to the right, we saw some kind of pavilion on one of the cliffs. It was like a small house made of wood with stone stairs descending to the ground that led to a cobbled and narrow path that became lost in the forest. The edifice was completely white with wonderful green vegetation twisting about it, giving an air of relaxation and meditation to the whole scenario. I think that was the exact purpose of the beautiful structures which appeared on other cliffs in the distance: to serve as a place of meditation to facilitate the rest of the body, mind and soul in an atmosphere full of peace and balance.

HOUSE-LIKE STRUCTURE ON THE CLIFF

I then looked at the clear sky, and for the first time, I saw “the sun” inside the Earth. It had a slightly smaller size than what we see as our sun in the sky and had a white-bluish color. The sky was clear, but its blue was not as intense and a little more faded than what we see on the surface world. I also saw some white clouds, but they were not as precise in shape as those in our sky and were more diffused, suggestive of small areas of fog. The sun was giving off a gentle and very pleasant light that was emanating maybe sixty to seventy percent of the light intensity that we are used to on the surface.

While we were watching that sun and sky, we suddenly felt another presence behind us. We turned around and, indeed, in front of the left tunnel inside the mountain, I saw Mezina, respectfully bowing in front of a tall man. I heard her talking with him, but I did not understand what they were talking about.

The man then approached us. He was about two meters tall, had long black hair, black eyes, and slightly olive skin. He was dressed very much like Dryn, with a sort of white frock, elegantly tied at the middle with a golden belt. I must admit that his appearance was impressive, as much through the extraordinary charisma that he emanated as through the nobility of his walking. His behavior was majestic, and his gestures exhibited a perfect control and balance of being.

Coming next to us, he saluted with a slight bow of the head. He then spoke to us, and just as in the case of the Guardian, I was hearing his voice in my mind, and it was in the Romanian language. It was clear and very pleasant. From time to time, images appeared in mind that were being telepathically transmitted by that man in order reinforce and clarify what he was saying.

“This portal is very old, a lot older than the last great cataclysm on the Earth’s surface. Some of the wise men came here and built this communication network.”

Simultaneously, he transmitted certain images of human beings entering that valley and the sequences through which they created the terrace with the four tunnels. It was then that I realized that these were beings from Ancient Atlantis but from an era long before the total disappearance of that legendary continent.

“We have arranged for you to come here because it is, in a certain way, a part of a necessary succession of events.”

It was like hearing the identical words of the Guardian being repeated. In my mind, I clearly saw a specific place in southern Argentina and a person I knew to be a shaman. The tall man then gave us another transmission.

“He is waiting for you in that exact place, two weeks from now. It is an important meeting and a new journey to the inside of the Earth.”

I was a little confused because I did not really understand the purpose of these trips and experiences. The man then looked at me directly and telepathed to me that the explanations for these different experiences and ways of penetrating the Earth that we have access to will manifest later. There is a collective purpose rather than individual or separate purposes at work. He showed me that, in the future, this knowledge we are acquiring will be like a seed for changing the mentality of other people about the interior of the planet.

The man then told us that we had to go back because there is a window of time that has to be respected. I was slightly disappointed because I was hoping that we would get a chance to at least explore some of these tunnels and also visit the populated cities beyond the forest. For example, on the horizon and a very great distance away, I could see a certain glow between the mountains that appeared to be white buildings, but they were so far away and the image was blending with the color of the sky and the whitish fog that I am not sure it was actually a city.

Respecting what was asked of us, we headed for the transfer or teleportation circle. When we got there, Mezina beckoned me to enter that circle. She then lifted the dagger from the ground, oriented it in a certain way and then intonated the same sound as she had when we originally came. Almost immediately afterward, I felt like a whirlwind had powerfully sucked me up and had delivered me back in the way that I had come. Suddenly, I became aware of the fact that I was on the moist soil I had departed from and that Wutak was watching me. He beckoned me to come near to him while Mezina went back through the portal and returned shortly thereafter with Cezar.

The girl gave the magical wooden object to Wutak who covered it with the leather piece that he had and put it inside the interior pocket of his coat. We all headed for the exit where the others were waiting for us. Saying good-bye to the Indians on amicable terms, we left the reservation, sharing our adventures with the Major on the way back. This included the story about the man indicating we would meet the shaman from Argentina, but we did not mention the location, and as Major Cross was diplomatic, he did not ask any more about it. At a certain level of rank and with proper preparation and understanding, superior officers perceive such things correctly and with elegance. Afterward, in a private talk that Cezar had with the Major, I think that they also exchanged information of another sort. That, at least, was what I could deduce from what I was told.

Three days after those events, I was again in my room at Alpha Base, contentedly thinking about the wonderful experiences that I had lived. I was feeling that something in my being had matured and that I had acquired a deep intuitive understanding which gave even more profound meaning to these events.

Impatiently, I was awaiting for our departure to Argentina and the meeting with the mysterious shaman.

CHAPTER SEVEN — THE CENTER OF THE PLANET AND THE SUBLIME WORLD OF SHAMBHALA

The experience in Yosemite impressed me, particularly by its apparent simplicity; but at the same time, through the unconventional methods used which are usually interpreted through the term magic. These represented a mystery to me, and it is my opinion that the native Indians were equally in the dark with regard to the true meaning of the phenomena that happened there. Obviously, it was an initiatory process; accessible only to the shamans from their community, but it was also a practical and very efficient method that represents a real challenge to explain in terms of science. I will try, however, to offer a correlative explanation, combining certain elements that are obviously magical with some aspects that have a scientific meaning. For example, the girl offers a unique and precisely identified frequency with regard to the emission of that sound. The magic dagger probably serves as an intermediary factor with sound being a trigger to create a specific energetic resonance.

What is really challenging to a rational being who experiences such a phenomenon is that, even though one does not understand the process involved or the various factors associated with it, events are still happening and they are bewildering to the degree that they are not referenced to one's regular knowledge and perception. Even Cezar was bemused by the adventure in Yosemite, telling me that he was particularly interested by the presence of that wise man who came and transmitted that information, which served as a very strong suggestion, about going to Argentina. As a matter of fact, we immediately identified the place shown in Argentina after returning to our country; then waited impatiently for the day of departure after all other arrangements for the journey were made.

The trip to Buenos Aires was routine but long and tiring. After spending the night in the capital, we took the plane to El Calafate in the province of Santa Cruz. As we would be going to a deserted mountainous locale, we decided to rent a jeep from the airport because we thought that a powerful vehicle would be more useful. At the first company that we consulted, they had no available jeeps. On the second day, they had two but neither had a GPS. This was not a problem, however, because we could use a mobile phone GPS.

Twenty minutes after taking our baggage from the airport, we were already on our way to the point indicated by the wise man inside the Earth, in a region that we located in the Cerro Pinaculo Mountains. I can give the precise location here because I do not consider that we are revealing any great secrets in doing so, especially because this point does not represent the exact “gate” to get inside. It is found at a small distance from that point; and according to the wise man, locating the precise entrance requires meeting the shaman. Cezar said that providing the location would not shed any more light for enthusiastic seekers as, even though the spot is close to the area of the portal, it could prove to be a source of frustration for them. Moreover, potential dare-devils would only see in that desolated zone an almost arid plateau, a dusty road with an abandoned station, and beyond, some green fields of vegetation in a circular shape. Despite my protests, Cezar remained inflexible with regard to revealing the location. I am now inclined to say that he was right about it being practically impossible to identify the portal without guidance, especially because it is situated in a hollow in the mountain that is like a narrow cavern. That is why the wise man gave us the contact details for the shaman from Argentina.

At a certain point, we had to get off of the main road whereupon the landscape became even more arid. It was like we were traveling through Martian valleys and hills with rocks, reddish soil, mountains and a desert. Here in the heart of Patagonia, I could not help but notice the special vibration of the area as well as a mysterious characteristic that was like a force that was not at all interested in the agitation and the tribulations of the world but rather in purity and evolution.

We were the only ones in this remote area as the GPS eventually indicated that we had to get off the rarely traveled secondary road we had been following in order to ascend a relatively smooth slope that was full of rocks and stones. Besides the lichen and some small shrubs I saw amidst the boulders, there was no sign of life. I didn't even wanted to think what an engine breakdown or the loss of the GPS signal would have involved. To our advantage, however, was the fact that our jobs required us to use cell phones with global coverage via satellite and this enabled us to find the exact point where we could meet the shaman.

I did not see him until the last possible moment, only after we turned around the edge of one of the more rocky hills, just before the tall mountains. He was just simply standing still, erect, waiting in the direction we were approaching, the only one possible in that mountainous terrain. I do not know how he could possibly have arrived in that deserted wilderness. He did appear, however, exactly as I had seen him in the mental image that was projected to me by the wise man inside the Earth, right down to the most specific details. He was wearing a backpack that was not too full over a carelessly unbuttoned jacket with a checked shirt underneath. His pants were green and shabby, and his footwear consisted of scuffed boots. As we approached in the car, I intuitively grasped the lack of interest of the shaman with regard to his dress. He was tall, thin, about 60 years old, and the long hair that reached down the middle of his back streamed into white and dark strands. There were several small objects in his hair: several rings, a feather, and even a tiny little eagle carved in wood. I saw red and white lines on his fingers, and on the forehead, he had a long and wide indigo line.

He seemed to be waiting for us, but his look and attention were somehow diverted. Stopping a few meters away, we got out of the car and got closer to him. The man did nothing, did not move, and made no gesture. Very intently, he watched us with penetrating black eyes that made his deeply creased sun-burned face look even more severe. Cezar addressed him with a few welcoming words in English and then asked him precisely what we needed to do next. The shaman was not saying a thing but just looked at us. He was not hostile but neither was he brimming with amiability. There were some embarrassing moments until I addressed him in Spanish, once again explaining what was obvious to each of us: that we are the ones that he was waiting for. After listening carefully, he made a short gesture of approval; and without a word, he beckoned us to follow him.

Without hurrying, we began our ascent on a steep slope, passing by the boulders and rocks with even steps. It was not necessary to worry about the vehicle because the desolation of the area was complete. As I walked in silence, I again asked myself how the shaman had arrived at the meeting point. We had traveled about fifty kilometers from the airport to reach it, and a long part of the journey was through the arid desert and on an abandoned secondary road. As I did not see any other car, I assume that the shaman did not drive there. I wondered if was driven by someone who had then left.

The entire experience seemed pretty strange to me; but at the same time, challenging. Starting from the way in which this connection was brought to our attention until the actual meeting with this strange character, who appeared as if he was from another world, everything seemed to be taken from a Tim Burton film, except for the fact that it was very real.

We continued walking through rocks and stones, descending and ascending through the hills until the ascent became rather steep and consisted only of rocks. To a certain extent, walking through this arid and rocky emptiness reminded me of my experience with Repa Sundhi in Tibet as we traveled to the entrance of the cave where I met the goddess Machandi. The only difference here was that the landscape was more red and the mountains less tall.

After making our way around a bigger rock, a man and woman suddenly appeared in front of us, standing and seemingly waiting for us. They were about ten meters in front of us, at an opening in the mountain rock. If you looked at the entrance from the angle from which I could see as I was climbing, you would have said that there was nothing there, but as my position changed, I saw that the opening in the mountain appeared wider, but it did not particularly attract special attention. From the images that the wise man had sent us, I neither recognized the area, the opening in the mountain, nor the two people in front of us; but I was suspecting that we were only given the information that was necessary to facilitate the beginning of our travel in order to meet our guides.

The man and the woman were less tall than the shaman, but they seemed to have an older ancestral connection than him. The clothes that they wore were of good quality, and their long shawls evoked in me a similar identification with the clothing of the people in Peru or Bolivia save for the fact they were not wearing comparable hats. By my estimation, the woman was about forty years old and the man forty-five. Their faces were serene with traces of smiles. Stopping a few meters away from them, we saluted them in Spanish. They bowed; and unlike the shaman, the man simply told us that they were waiting for us. He also spoke Spanish but with a certain accent. They then beckoned us to follow them, but the shaman stayed put. Even though we had our mobile phone GPS and knew the coordinates of where we had left our vehicle, I was hoping that he would once again wait for us. Walking behind the two, we entered a small cave on a mountain slope. It was obvious that this was not a traveled path, but even if it was, its location in the mountain and the way in which it was somehow hidden from sight made it difficult to be identified.

When we entered, I had the certain impression that I was descending on an inclined plane, and this gave me a sensation of slight dizziness even though the ground ahead was level. The corridor we had entered was not too long, about five to six meters; and afterwards, it opened into a normal cave. As soon as we walked into the small space of that cave, my sensation of dizziness and descending disappeared. The cave was pretty narrow, not too tall, and extended a small distance into the inside the mountain.

I then had one of the most interesting experiences I had ever had up to that moment when, after we had moved a few steps into the mountain, it seemed that Cezar and I were passing together through different sections of space and time. At first, I thought that it was only my distorted impression, however, I became convinced of the reality very quickly. Even after the first few steps, I saw moisture appearing on the walls and also tiny water springs that were pouring down along them. I was apparently still in the same mountain cavity, but something had somehow changed; and this all happened without myself being able to figure out how. I was only seeing the effects.

As I moved further into the cavern, huge crystals appeared on all sides, some being up to one meter high. They spurted out in all directions and some formed bundles, like a bouquet of flowers. I had the feeling that there were similar halls of crystals in this cavity we had entered and that the landscape would somehow change unexpectedly as we would enter each one. I figured out that, due to the spatial distortion we were passing through, we were walking very huge distances and that we were also experiencing an alteration of our consciousness. It was clear that this little cave was a crossing point, an access portal to the subtle dimensions of the Earth's interior, and that the way of travel through the physical plane to the subtle one was really astounding. With every step that I made, I had the feeling that we were going through enormous distances and that the surrounding reality changed according to the “area” I was passing through. As I advanced further towards what I thought was the bottom of the cave, going behind the two guides, I suddenly felt a strong wave of heat, indicating to me that we were probably passing through a zone with melted magma. I felt like I was in a sort of trance; but at the same time, I was perfectly lucid and aware of what was happening.

After that heat sensation, I saw another zone with crystals and then moisture again, even more highlighted than the first time. Suddenly, I had the impression that I had passed through a door, even though I saw nothing of the sort. All of a sudden, the passage in which we were was perfectly dry and we had come to its end. There, I saw, dug into the rock, a rectangle with a small arch above it through which the man and woman passed, disappearing from our sight. Without a worry, I passed first, immediately followed by Cezar.

Suddenly, I found myself inside a house. It was as if I had just emerged from a storeroom inside the house. I saw the man closing the door behind me, and I noticed, somehow strangely, his hand pressing the door handle at a much slower pace than would be expected. At the moment when the door completely closed, however, I was startled, as if I had emerged out of that trance-like state and was returning to a normal condition. My impression was that I was now completely integrated into the reality of the subtle plane in which I had just entered without having anymore connection to the physical plane. It was like a clear delineation had been made so that I now had a precise knowledge of the reality around me. Later, after talking to Cezar about our experience and analyzing its various stages, I understood that my assessments and judgments about what I was seeing were based exclusively upon associations that I was familiar with from the physical plane. The long train of conceptions and ideas that were imprinted in my mind with regard to the laws and specifics of physical matter created a kind of slowing down of perception as we penetrated into the etheric plane, and it accentuated as we advanced to higher frequencies such as the astral.

Closing the door behind us meant a clear breaking of the connection with the physical plane.

I then oriented my attention to the place in which I now was. It was a large room with many windows and very beautifully carved wooden chairs. I then realized that the way in which I was perceiving what was surrounding me there was completely different than my previous experiences in which things appeared only in one reference frame. Here, they were somehow nuanced. For example, those chairs might have looked old at first glance, even if they were elegant, but when you looked at them more closely, the perspective on them changed in a fine way, making them appear as modern objects, taste- fully and highly refined. It seemed to be more of a matter of detail: the closer you looked at an object, the more exceptional it became or the more perfected it appeared to be.

The room was harmonious and very pleasant. In the middle, there was a table that seemed to be made out of glass because it was transparent, and I saw a container with some fruits and a vase with flowers in it. The strange way in which I was perceiving things ex- tended because, while I knew there was a bookcase on one wall of the room, I could not actually see it there. In physical terms, I would have said that it was invisible, but Cezar explained to me afterward that I was not able to see certain elements because my consciousness and senses were not yet properly adjusted to the frequencies specific to the plane which we were in, thus causing certain uncoordinated perceptions between what I was seeing and what I knew to be. Still, even figuring out all of those relative oddities, I was not bothered by them at all as I considered them to be normal somehow.

I began to realize that in that advanced reality within the Earth, knowledge was manifested in a superior way. For example, on the right side of the room there were two large and elegant wall-mount- ed windows that did not have glass, but I could tell, nevertheless, there was a barrier there. While I could see what was outside, I knew that someone on the outside could not see inside.

In front of me was an exit door from this “house,” and to the left, I saw another door to what we could call a kitchen. I did, however, not see any of the appliances or utensils that we are used to, such as a stove, oven or other items, but within the field of my consciousness, I understood that this was the place where the creatures of that house prepared their food.

Through the opening of the door, I could see many fruits and a sort of device which I knew everything about in spite of the fact that I cannot explain how or why. Somehow, I knew that the device was used to directly extract the pure subtle energy of each fruit, just the way we extract juice with special appliances. I then heard the voice of the man who was accompanying us, but I was only hearing it in my mind. He was clearly speaking a language that I did not know, but I understood very well what he wanted to say.

“We have indeed reached a higher stage evolution where we extract the energetic essence of the fruit which we then consume.”

He then entered that room that I associated with a kitchen and came back with that device which resembled one of our juicers. It had a sort of tall vertical body and a sort of sphere into which the essence was probably extracted. Picking up a fruit off of the table which seemed to be an apple, although bigger and thicker, he placed it in the appliance. He then made a movement with his hand, putting it over the sphere, whereupon I heard a faint tingling sound, and I perceived a penetrating odor similar to a strong tea consisting of apple and cinnamon. The man then detached a small pot-like container from the device and showed me its contents: a small amount of a substance that appeared to be semi-liquid.

“This is what we consume from fruits,” the man told us. “It is a very pure and energizing element.”

He showed us how he kept the food: in a sort of apparatus that I saw in a niche at the back of the room; but even though I knew there was some sort of device there, I could not see it with any clarity, its appearance reminding me of a blurred or faded bubble. Although I did not understand anything, it seemed to me that the man knew what I could and could not see as his explanations were insightful.

“For the time being, you can’t distinguish it (the device) because your mind has nothing to associate it with, but it serves the function of maintaining the food in an optimal condition. We eat only vegetables that are neither dehydrated, dried, nor preserved at a low-temperature.”

Saying this, he took another fruit, similar to an avocado, then took off an item from a shelf that I initially thought to be a string and passed it over the fruit. It turned out that the “string” was actually the mouth or opening of an “energetic bag” designed to preserve the product in its present condition without its energy being in any way lost, compromised or altered from a qualitative point of view. It was only after the fruit came into that “bag” that I could see an outline around the food manifesting as a very fine field of energy. The man then put the food in that appliance which now, after the explanations I was given, appeared to me in a slightly clearer form.

Within the left side of that big room, there were stairs leading to a floor which I felt was an area with rooms for those living there to rest and sleep.

The lower chamber had a door to a corridor that led to several small rooms that were like storage stalls where various objects were placed. Generally, the functionality of the house was roughly the same as what we know in our world save for small differences that are specific to the subtle plane in which it exists. The technology, of course, is more advanced. For example, they also had a sort of window blind that could be dropped, dimming the light; but when that was done, the blinds “stick” to the surface of the window, even though the window apparently contains no glass to adhere to. The man explained (telepathically) that they have light all the time, and this is why they must resort to this method for periods of rest or sleep as it enables the house to become dark.

We then went outside through what we could call a door. In reality, however, there was nothing there. The space was defined for a door although it was not rectangular and the upper side was curved like a small arch. From inside the house, I was seeing everything that was on the street outside, but after getting out and looking behind myself, I saw that the space designated for the door was opaque and had a dark indigo color. I stopped and put my head through that door and immediately saw the inside of the living room. Then, I took my head out and had the opaque surface in front of me, and I could not see inside. I played around like this a couple of times, coming in and out of the house again with my entire body. It was most likely a protective energy screen, programmed to have that specific effect. The screen was not only visual, it was also temperature-sensitive. As we entered the house, we noticed that it was warmer, and when we went out into the street, the temperature was lower. In other words, the energy-saving and protective screen technology that they use for windows and doors secures the family’s personal environment.

After clarifying these matters to my satisfaction, I came back to the others who were impatiently expecting me and somehow amused. We started to walk down a street that had a slight slope, seeing only a few people. It was explained to us that it was early “morning” to them and most of the inhabitants in the city were in the resting cycle and sleeping.

The streets were paved with polished stone, similar to what I had seen in Tomassis. We walked to the end of the street and then on to two smaller streets until we came to a large square with a very beautiful fountain in its center. The water was bursting forth vertically into different shapes, but the interesting fact was that it was appearing only from what could best be termed the “top half,” the bottom half of the spouting water being invisible. It was as if the water only materialized at the half-way point before forming into the beautiful shapes that it would then make.

The people that I was seeing on the street were neither tall nor exuberant, but I could see a refinement and kindness of their soul from the way they looked and from their happy faces. Their features were Amerindian but in a very refined form.

“The fact that we live under the light of this sun has, over time, facilitated certain structural changes in us, at all levels,” the man explained. “In comparison to the sun on the surface, it is a completely different influence.” Cezar then asked him about their origin.

“We have been here for thousands of years, even before what you know as the Mayan civilization. Our ancestors are those who founded the Olmec and Toltec civilizations on the surface. A part of them remained there while others came here.”

The man explained to us that this was not the only city with descendants of this lineage. Those we know in more recent times as Mayans and Incas also had ancestors who lived inside the planet, although in different areas.

“But, our city is very old and, in time, it evolved towards the center of the planet, where we are now. Here is the heart that supports everything, and here are the very tall people that some on the surface have heard of. You know very well what this is about,” the man said, turning to Cezar. “We have taken on the task of showing you this way of access. In the future, it will have been shown to have a certain importance for Mankind.”

Understanding that the man was referring to the world of Shambhala, I felt a profound emotion because I suddenly remembered what I had experienced in the presence of the Guardian and what I saw when he showed us the extraordinary brilliance of Shambhala and the feeling of spiritual elevation that had accompanied it. I strongly wished to see that wonderful world again, and now I was receiving the confirmation that I was now at the right place at the right time.

In perfect synchronicity, we went from the square to a main street that opened up to a view of the horizon where I could then see and recognize the magnificent beauty of the world of Shambhala. Far away, beyond a gulf that I associated with a lake, I saw the glittering of the white walls and imposing buildings of that fairy-like land. The mere fact of seeing these things gave me a feeling of dignity and extraordinary force that was subtly infused into my being, creating a state of sacredness and nostalgia that reaches out into infinity.

What I felt was a very profound force of knowledge, an unwavering weight of spiritual authority that reaches beyond any context of slippage or imbalance. I slowly bowed my head in a sincere act of humility and gratitude for the deep wisdom that is spread by the beings in this wonderful land.

Looking beyond to the horizon, I could see the slight curving of the Earth, but it was very far away and appeared more as a blurred vision that was lost in the dense blue of the sky. My intuition about the remote city was then confirmed to me by our guide as he made a wide gesture with his hand, pointing to those walls and spoke.

“There is one of the entrances to Shambhala. We’ll come back a little later to admire the view.”

I was vexed to see that the man was using the same name that we also use for the superior world inside the Earth, but he explained to me that the spiritual tradition of Mankind is responsible for preserving this name as a memory from ancestral times when things were different on the surface of the Earth. The name has been transmitted over eons up to the present day. We spent a while admiring the splendid vision that stood before our eyes, after which the man invited us to go further onto the other streets of the city. I felt a very pleasant warm wind that was touching my skin and creating an extraordinary sensation of wellness throughout my being.

At first, the city created the impression of being ancient, but this only amounted to a first impression because, as my attention became focused, things seemed to change as I could now see a modern and even technologically advanced aspect. None of the buildings exceeded one story in height, and the houses were adjacent to each other without any yards. Behind the houses and the main square sprawled lush forests. Nature seemed to blend very well with the activity and presence of the people.

GENERAL VIEW OVER SHAMBHALA FROM THE CITY OF UTKLAHA

After a detour, we arrived again in the central square where I saw some people this time. Their clothing was simple but refined. I saw that most of the men wore a sort of robe, long to the heels, split down the sides, and with pants underneath. The women wore a long dress that was tied at the waist with an elegant belt. The dress was tailored with feminine aspects and beautiful folds on the sides. Their footwear were sort of small boots that resembled galoshes except that they were a lot more elegant and had a strap on the side. Even though the footwear seemed soft, I noticed than when it hit the tiles, the bottom (of the shoe) would harden, but when biological matter, like soil or grass, was stepped on, it would mould according to that shape.

I admired the refinement of their clothing, and even though it was simple, it was very elegant and designed with good taste. For a while, I studied our two guides; and especially so because they represented a very nice couple. The woman was captivating through the harmony of her form and a commanding appearance, and this was doubled by reason of a great kindness emanating from her that manifested through her large eyes which were a mixture of gray and hazel. Her dark brown hair was long and curly, and she wore a round-shaped medallion without a wire at her neck. Seeing that I was interested in the symbol engraved on it, she explained that it represented a sort of coat of arms of her family's ancestry. She explained to me that the medallion adhered to her skin without being held by anything due to the resonance created between its specific vibration and the feelings in her heart. Considering that I was in the lofty atmosphere of the etheric plane, such phenomena seemed perfectly explicable to me as it was more energetic in nature and less material.

Their garments were not representative of what others wore. When we arrived at the fountain in the square, I saw people wearing tight clothing. I figured out that those people were preoccupied by a certain activity that we would equate to sports in our world. A short distance in front of us, one of the men was moving pretty fast toward the sea, probably to swim or to engage in a similar activity.

Watching with greater attention, I noticed that we were actually on the edge of the city which stretched far to our right. From where we were located, the village seemed to lie on a peninsula that extended deep into the sea, and on the horizon, we saw the realm of Shambhala with its walls and other buildings beyond it. Looking to the right, toward the city, I noticed several high-rise buildings that had a special architectural line, though not necessarily futuristic. I realized then that the closer they were to the city center, the higher were the buildings.

I then turned my gaze to the sky and watched it more carefully. Their sun was exactly overhead at its zenith and was not changing its position. Even if it was not easy, I could look at it without being blinded because the intensity of its light is about two-thirds of our sun. Its size was also smaller, about half of the diameter of the solar disc that we see in our sky. The light was gentle and the air warm, like it would be during May or June. Since we arrived here, however, I noticed that the air had less oxygen than we have on our surface world, but its lack was totally compensated for by the subtle energy it contained. Our guide explained to us that this was due to the special radiation of the sun inside our Earth that is actually the etheric manifestation of the black hole in the center.

The sky was not blue as we see it on the surface but more like a combination of blue, white and grey, making it appear somewhat diffused. The light itself seemed to be "milky" as if it were comforting each shape on the skyline by putting into a protective covering. I also saw clouds in the sky that were appearing in clearer shapes than those of the sky in Tomassis. The man told us that we were on a peninsula that extended into the ocean. I was surprised to hear this term, but he confirmed that it is an immense ocean and that other areas of the planet's interior still have large expanses of water, lakes and even seas. I already had experienced this in Tomassis where I saw that great sea or what was at least a large lake. In addition, I knew about the suspicions of scientists and their measurements attesting to the existence of an inner ocean, so I could easily understand this, however, the term "ocean" seemed amazing to me at that time, especially because the waves that I saw were very small. The man explained that this is due to the special configuration of the land in this region of the peninsula which forms a gulf, thus protecting the shore from bigger waves.

I am inclined to believe that the water of this ocean is sweet, even though I cannot say this with certainty. Generally speaking, I figured out that you are allowed to ask what they want you to know, and if you want to also ask other questions afterward, something seems to stop you. The situation was somewhat similar in which a group visits a museum and listens to the explanations of the guide. You can ask two or three questions, but after that, you are beholden to the direction of the guide and the agenda that he is there to serve. Therefore, I did not ask anything about the water in the ocean, but I felt a certain internal knowledge, specific to that plane in which we were and where things happen differently than at the surface; and somehow, I knew that the water was still different than the ocean water on the surface, thinking it to be sweet and salty at the same time. I also knew that the specific energetic quality of the water was caused by the action of the sun in their sky, just the way the air has a special energetic charge in it. In the meantime, we walked down that street and arrived at the ocean beach that was covered with clean white sand. Several small and sparse cliffs were pleasantly contrasting with the gentle glare of the sand. At the end of the stone-paved road, beyond which was the sand of the beach, there were several shrubs surrounding the area.

I gazed wildly beyond the bay at the splendor of those buildings and the white walls that meant the entrance area into the realm of Shambhala. Being a little closer to that land and having a completely free and clear perspective without the obstruction of other buildings, I was able to better see some of the features of that sublime realm. The buildings were tall, bright and transparent, seeming to be made of diamond. They were imposing, with bold shapes and spiral features being dominant. This time, however, I could see with greater clarity that behind those majestic buildings were other constructions, but it was as if they were hidden in some kind of halo through which I could not distinguish too well. I asked the guide what that the halo is and what it was hiding.

“The halo is unique to your perception,” the man answered me. “It represents the limit to which your consciousness can understand what it sees. Beyond this limit, it can no longer perceive the vibrational frequency of what is there and that is why it appears occulted or hidden to you. I, however, clearly see that reality and so does your friend.”

I knew that Cezar had been to Shambhala many times in the past, but he never opened up on this subject, and I felt it was a barrier that must be respected and so I did not insist on asking him about it. I felt a great joy for him, and I was hoping that now, as my experience became richer, I would find out more from him, aspiring to go to that realm myself.

“Still, even among the inhabitants of our city, there are few who have the capacity of seeing “beyond the halo.” The majority see it just the way you are perceiving it now. People only see the entrance areas of these buildings that you are looking at now, and they cross the gulf often to go there to receive teachings and spiritual training. It is like an apprenticeship zone because it only signifies the entrance zone to the realm of Shambhala. In order to effectively get to Shambhala, you need to be in the region that you see far away, covered by a ‘halo’.”

Even though I understood the principle of what he had said, I still remained attached to certain conceptions and tendencies that are inoculated into the existence of the physical plane. For example, I wanted to know what precisely would happen if someone were to go to the peripheral zone of Shambhala; and from there, continue on their way to the halo in order arrive inside that fabled destination.

Looking slightly amused, he appreciated the innocence of me asking that question and he answered me.

“Even if someone were to do that, one would find oneself on the mountain or in the forest. You cannot know something that you are not yet ready to know. This is the reason why many of our peers go to that apprentice zone of Shambhala, like a spiritual school, through which they evolve and refine their consciousness. Later, they become capable of accessing the consciousness plane of Shambhala and enter the territory.”

Still, it was not too clear if other beings from other zones and cities inside the Earth were also coming to this region. It seemed to me that the commuting required would be too complicated.

“Perhaps it is easy for people here to have access,” I asked, “but for others inside or even at the surface, it seems that they would have a difficult time accessing these learning sessions. I imagine there are no collective excursions.”

“You judge such things in the spirit of physical laws, but here things are totally different, especially regarding this realm that many of you on the surface consider to be legendary or mythical. You see it with your own eyes. It is as real as possible, even if you do not have access to anything other than a small part of it. What many people cannot understand, however, is the fact that Shambhala is not located somewhere precisely. It is indeed an independent stand-alone world, but it has branches in different places so that those who are prepared can enter into this realm whether they are from the other side of the internal cavity of the Earth or from other cities or worlds, including the surface of the planet.”

“And how do they do it?” I asked, very interested.

“Through certain dimensional gates, like the one through which you also came here, to Utklaha.”

I remained thoughtful, telling myself that anyone could have stumbled upon such an inter-dimensional gate. The man immediately picked up my mental inference and he corrected me.

“Apparently, you could say so; but in reality, things are totally different. The access is very strictly controlled, and it is not a mechanical or automatic process as you might think. For example, in order to have access, it is not enough to know that there is an opening to the world of Shambhala in some particular place. Even if you get to the place where you know a gate exists, you still cannot pass unless you know certain rules of its cyclicity or of its specific position. Besides that, there are also guardians of such special places.”

All of a sudden, the memories of my recent travel and the meeting with the Guardian encompassed me.

“Are you such a guardian?” I asked our guide sincerely.

“I received this task from the wise men. I keep an eye on the passing from the surface to the world of Shambhala through the gate by which you came. They announce to me who should come here and who should not. It is a task that I have assumed with my family.”

“Was it imposed? Is it like a job or something else, like a service?” I asked, curious to know how things are there.

“It is neither a job nor a sport nor an occasional habit. It is a natural attitude, something that develops naturally according to one’s degree of understanding. No one is imposing anything to someone else here.”

I then thought of our condition on the surface world and the manipulation, lies and oppression existing almost everywhere in all sorts of shapes and sizes and compared it to the silence, calm, and wisdom ruling here inside the Earth, near Shambhala. Who would want go back to “prison”? But still, things have a purpose of their own and there is a certain order of things that has to be respected.

Before I could go further with my philosophy, the man beckoned me with his hand, making an invitation to continue our way back to the city. With the streets still relatively empty, we walked like this for a few minutes with our guide a bit ahead and his wife always on my left, but a bit behind. I perceived her wonderful, sweet and dignified presence; and at the same time, a delicacy that emphasized her strong personality. She brought gentleness, affection, femininity, and harmony into our group and I could feel it clearly.

We approached the mountainous part of the city, and on the left side of the beach and the bay, the man pointed to the horizon. Looking carefully, I was able to notice, even if rather blurred, the ample internal curvature of the Earth, but only on a relatively small scale. Even so, the feeling was overwhelming. I saw everything as a gigantic blue-tinted structure, even though it seemed to be aerated due to the great distance to it.

“Only from this angle can you see the inner curvature of the Earth and only if it is clear and without clouds. It cannot be seen from other areas due to the light and radius, but if you look right here, the light falls in a certain way and you can understand that you are inside the planet.”

I could only vaguely see the curvature on the horizon when I looked to the realm of Shambhala near the beach, but from here, you could see it so much better and from a greater height, even though it was a great distance away. Theoretically, the curvature should be observable from any point or city inside the gigantic cavity in the center of the planet, but in practice, there is no difference to the way in which we see it at the surface: the line of the horizon is closed before the eye clearly perceives the curvature. On the surface, it is downwards and we cannot see it. Inside, it is upwards, but the nature of the light and the distance makes it fade away almost completely. When you are inside the Earth in the immense subtle or ethereal cavity in its center, a very special feeling arises, a certain experience that cannot be mistaken or compromised. The most appropriate depiction of that emotion is that you feel protected. Apparently, someone on the surface world might harbor the consideration that, once one gets inside the planet, they would feel either constrained, limited, or sealed to the degree they cannot see the stars or the sky and cannot have the sensation of open air. With regard to this, there is no such problem for the inhabitants of the center of the Earth because, as our guide explained to me, their spiritual level allows them to understand and to feel to a certain measure that the Universe is in themselves. From this point of view, they do not have to see the stars in the sky to know or to feel that they exist in the immensity of cosmic space. In a way, it is like the issue of happiness: you cannot find true happiness in the exterior world no matter how much you search for it, but only when you go inside your being do you get to its springs. A hermit, surrounded by the rock of the mountain where he cannot see the stars in the sky, never suffers because of remaining motionless for years in his cave. Neither does he suffer from claustrophobia or from not having enough space. His very rich inner spiritual experience brings him much more knowledge and sensation than all the stars in the sky.

Being there, in the cavity of the center of the Earth, I felt a sensation of protection, wellness and safety. I was not scared and now better understood the psychology of the inhabitants inside the planet who feel very free and content. They live in a total symbiosis with nature, without intervening with it such as occurs on the surface; and from what I could figure out, violence does not exist.

The man turned to us, making a gesture to move on. We turned to the square and then saw more people on the streets as well as vehicles, the first I had seen. They were anti-gravitational and resembled small uncovered or open capsules, moving through the air at about one meter in height without any noise other than the swish of their passing through the air. Apparently, I could say that the person sitting down inside was driving the vehicle, but in fact, I did not see any steering wheel or joysticks. Instead, what I noticed was like a sort of computerized board, but I cannot be sure on this detail because I did not get closer to the vehicle.

The guide then showed us other vehicles in the sky that were a lot bigger and were flying at a great height. They had a tubular and cylindrical shape and were probably used to transport goods and people. Along with the intensification of the aerial activity, the atmosphere in the city took on more of a technical air, and, at the time, it induced a state of spiritual exaltation. The big cylindrical vehicles in the sky had different routes at different heights and some of them were heading right to Shambhala. I also saw other smaller flying vehicles amongst them of different shapes. All of those shuttles were flying rectilinear, but at different elevations. This intensification of aerial activity, combined with seeing the bright majestic buildings of Shambhala, created in me a very strong feeling what would be thought of as futuristic. Still, almost the only sounds that I heard were natural ones and some-times, on the rare occasions when we spoke, our voices, because most of the conversations were telepathic. The flora and fauna assured the general sonorous background sound. I was hearing and seeing insects flying, the water of the ocean swishing, the murmur of the trees, and the squeal of some birds that resemble pterodactyls from ages passed, but these were of smaller sizes.

While I was looking at that pretty intense aerial activity, I saw an immense vertical vortex starting to appear. It resembled the vortex of a tornado in certain aspects, but the foot of the “funnel” was erect. Around the funnel, along its length, there were several rings. The vortex was huge and darker in color than the rest of the clouds, creating a mysterious but terrible power. I saw the foot of the funnel come near the ground, but it did not touch it. Then, almost immediately, I saw three shuttles, one very big and two smaller ones, accompany it, coming from above through the opening of the funnel and then moving out into the atmosphere of the city. They had the shape of a lens and the big one was like a double lens. The shuttles headed to the right and towards the center of the city which was quite a big distance from where we were.

Astounded, I watched this phenomena as I heard our guide talking as he pointed to the vortex.

“There is what you on the surface say is the geographic South Pole. The vortex represents the passing zone; and it opens up at precise moments when certain magnetic fields are aligning themselves. We know precisely when these important moments occur.”

At the beginning, I was surprised to hear his voice which was gentle and warm but strong. I perfectly understood what he said to me, but I was hearing the sounds of a language that I did not know. I recognized it is Mayan, but it was probably a derivative or evolved version of it.

Recovering from the initial surprise, I focused myself once again on the problem of the vortex. I thought that the count-less mysteries and weird stuff that has occurred in Antarctica, among which is the memorable experience of Admiral Byrd, are not at all coincidental and can now be confirmed.

“In other words, are we just about under the South Pole now?” I asked, almost not believing.

“Yes,” he answered, “on an approximate vertical line.”

“This means that anyone passing through there arrives through the vortex to here?”

Cezar intervened.

“Only if they allow it. You know, we discussed this before.” “That is correct,” said our guide. “The vortex opens only at certain moments and just in certain conditions. It is not a constant phenomenon.”

“Indeed,” I responded. “I have already discussed the problem with Cezar and it could be applicable in this case. On the surface, vertically, when someone in the physical plane passes through that point, they do not feel anything special if the subtle connection is not made. But, if you are in a more elevated state of consciousness, and if the wise men of Shambhala allow your access, then slowly, small step by small step, you get in, even though you did not even notice it at the beginning. But, after a while, you see how the landscape starts to change. The snow gradually disappears and vegetation appears in its place. You can see even animals. Then, at that point, you are already inside the Earth.”

The man then spoke to me.

“There are two possibilities: either we are the ones allowing the access or asking for it, as it was in your case; or he or she is already a pretty evolved spiritually being that can ‘catch’ the necessary state to get into our world. At the same time, it is their right and their merit.”

“Is this also valid for entering the realm of Shambhala?” I asked.

“Of course. It is just that there are some successive stages. The world of Shambhala is ‘stratified’ with a hierarchy of different levels, like rings. If you envision a ring-like structure, you get only to the ring that corresponds to your consciousness at a particular moment.”

I was astounded, and at the same time, a bit discouraged. I was not even allowed access beyond the first wall, it representing the entrance to Shambhala, or the first ring, never mind further access to the center which, as I understood from our guide, represents the Supreme Wisdom.

“You need to understand that these rings are like energetic barriers that you cannot overcome unless you have the necessary preparation,” the man specified, probably noticing that my understanding was not exactly correct but inclined to the same type of physical interpretation as in the surface world that made me think of the rings as concentric walls.

"You get deeper according to your level of consciousness," the man also specified. "There have been some civilizations in your world that have applied the same ring structure as a physical construction, but its profound significance is subtle in nature and refers to the barriers corresponding to the level of consciousness."

From here, the discussion extended to the level of knowledge and technology possessed by the diverse community inside the Earth as well as the planes of consciousness that they have access to. This, however, presented a problem to me that had been bothering me for a while, and I thought it was proper to bring it up as this point.

I knew from my discussions with Dr. Xien and Cezar that, as you go to the center of the planet, the vibrational frequency rises and the planes of manifestation culminate with the causal plane in the center of the planet. Logically, the realm of Shambhala is an exponent of the highest frequencies and that is exactly why I saw it right in the center of the Earth. Still, I was not succeeding to explain to myself how this is possible since Utklaha exists only in the etheric plane, even if it does possess a high frequency. In my opinion, there was not sufficient space with which to measure a certain proportionality of manifestation in order to explain the jump from the etheric to the causal. We were in the etheric plane, and I was seeing Shambhala over the gulf, the symbol of life and spiritual illumination. To me, it seemed "too close" and that's why, while we were ambling to the house of the man and woman, I asked Cezar a question, in a bit of a whisper.

"We are in the center of the planet and we are still talking about the etheric plane? Where do the astral, mental and causal planes of the planet compress?"

Cezar seemed to make an effort to understand what I actually meant. After a few seconds, he spoke up and answered me but with a bit of admonishment in his voice.

"You are thinking too mechanically about things. Penetrating the subtle planes as you move further into the center of the Earth cannot be treated strictly with reference to dimensional measures, such as in kilometers. You see the entrance to Shambhala from here, where the frequency is a lot higher, and apparently, you are only a stone's throw away from this realm, in the etheric plan. Logic tells you that Shambhala should also be in the etheric plane, or at least at an entrance to the astral plane, because it is very close and there is not enough space, proportionally speaking, to account for passage to the superior planes: the astral, mental, and causal. In reality, however, this is a problem of manifesting quality: namely the vibrational frequency, and not a matter of quantity (dimension). You are thinking quantitatively when, actually, the problem is referring to a qualitative point of view. You do not measure the distance between the ethereal and causal in terms of meters.”

His explanation clarified once more how important it is that, when we think about the subtle and spiritual aspects, we do not let our minds be fixated only upon the laws of the physical plane and the attitudes and prejudices that accompany such.

In the meanwhile, we were heading to the house of the family, and we arrived there in a short period of time. As we walked, the man had the time to tell us that the cities inside the Earth exist at different depths and each one, including those in the central cavity, have their own personality, knowledge, tradition, and level of consciousness. Even if these are connected and they communicate, each structures its existence on its origin and individuality.

As we all entered the house and entered into the big room, I was drawn to the bookcase, near one of the walls. I continued to know that the bookcase was there, but I was not seeing anything on the wall there. Seeing that my attention was fixed on this, the woman came closer to the wall and made a gentle gesture with her hand, like a fan, whereupon an apparition gave itself away and allowed me to see that bookcase. The space that the shelves occupied was not big, and the books had a special format. Curious, I got closer and took out one of these books, none of which resembled what we are used to. The pages or leafs were much thicker and the books here generally had the appearance of a carrying case with CDs (compact digital discs).

Each “leaf” represented a domain or a history covering a long period of time. For example, when I examined such a book “sheet,” it covered the history of Mankind for nearly a thousand years. The sheets were actually “states of knowledge” that were accessed or “dipped into” by simply touching the hand of the leaf. I told myself that what I was seeing here was even more technologically advanced than the archives from the occult chamber in Egypt, to which I have had access to during my travel through the First Tunnel. It was no longer about holographic projections nor about watching images. Everything was perceived by a direct interaction between that book and one's consciousness. You knew and you understood the informational content on the page. I rapidly figured out that this also involves an extraordinary efficient process of inter activity. I could enter in the informational content and select what I wished to know. This could be applied in a general way or in a detailed manner, all depending upon what interested me.

I discovered all this in just few seconds of manipulating one of the books in the bookcase. It was a much advanced and somewhat "empathic" knowledge that allowed for easier assimilation of information. I felt there were books about medicine, history, culture, science, construction, and many other areas.

The first book that I took off the shelf was on medicine, and by merely keeping it in my hand, I knew what that treatise was on: mainly, bones and the skeleton. I felt this was general information. If I wanted to know something in detail or to look for precise data, the information would become much more detailed; and this way, the study could begin. I put the book back and I took another that was on the human culture and civilization of the entire planet. When I opened it, I immediately understood the way in which the information was structured, and it was almost like a verbal process. If I was choosing a year, there was synthesized knowledge of what happened in different parts of the world at that time period, such as in China, Europe, America and in other areas. It was like a global history, an overview of the historical course of Mankind. I noticed that this history did not present just the important events that took place only on the surface of the planet but also the ones occurring in the cities and communities existing inside of it, as they also have their own history and evolution. Insisting upon this aspect, I was curious to find out more about Utklaha. That "leaf" covered a period of hundreds of years of history, starting with the year 1100 A.D., and it gave me information about events in the Orient, Spain, and Britain; but I rapidly focused on the history of the city in the center of the planet and understood that the inhabitants of this city were at that point already experimenting with antigravity technology in their shuttles. This eventually evolved into the technology that I saw in Utklaha. While the soldiers and knights of the Early Middle Ages had been occupied with wars and the Crusades specific to our history, those inside the Earth had already applied levitation and had already realized the first longer travels with their shuttles, contacting other superior beings in the process.

I was curious to find out what had happened before this, and I re-turned the book and picked another which documented a history from an older period. When I touched that leaf, I was acquiring the knowledge of that book, but at the same time, I also saw correlating images. The leafs had “writing” on them that were actually some signs with a bit of relief. When they were touched by the fingers, the information seemed to “flow” into the consciousness where it was also “seen” by it. I was effectively living the information that I was receiving, seeing the correlating images with it; and at the same time, I was perfectly aware of the ambience of the chamber that I was in and also of what I was doing at the time. In a very pleasant and interesting way, my consciousness was accessing multidimensional levels and it made possible a special knowledge to which I could have access in a very special way.

Interested to find out how Utklaha appeared, I then knew and saw at the same time that, about 2300 years ago, there was only a simple village or hamlet in the area in which I was, placed in the middle of the forest. Almost everything around was only forest. I also understood that the first ones who lived there were from the Olmecs and Toltecs. These were the witch doctors and wise men of them who had access to esoteric knowledge and to the portals that allowed them to get inside and to establish the first houses, being practically the first settlement in that region. Then, little by little, others arrived here and became citizens of their civilization. At a certain point, I saw a massive increase in population, but the city was already evolved by then.

When I was “reading” this way, it was not as if I was reading line by line from a regular publication. The history that I was finding out was pretty dynamic and I think that I was actually covering it from one century to another so that I then had a global perception over an extended period of time. I figured out the subtle dexterity of how to “read” this way, but it being the first time that I did it and with no further time available, I could not investigate anything in detail. I could have accomplished this, however, because I noticed that there was “writing” on these leafs; and if I looked more carefully — it was a little pointed and in relief format — I saw that it became finer and finer with the information becoming more and more thorough.

I then perceived a telepathic transmission from the man saying that the time of our departure was coming. I closed the book, put it back on the shelf, and the woman also made a gesture by hand as that apparition or “film projection” that covered the book case disappeared from sight. I saw a girl coming from the upper floor, descending down the stairs. The woman introduced her as their daughter. She was seventeen years old and she was indeed beautiful, combining more features from her mother than from her father: the same long and curly hair, the same color of the eyes, and the same dignified and delicate air that the woman had. Her body was very harmonious and well proportioned, emanating the energy specific to her age. As far as I could tell, she had inherited from her father the structure of her nose and mouth, for here the physical features were similar.

We were introduced as coming out of the “outer curve” which I thought sounded interesting because it was the first time that I heard the way that they relate to our world. Greeting us, the girl looked at us with some curiosity, then went on and left the house, heading for the square.

I then knew that we had returned to the surface. The man came near to the door in the wall through which we had arrived, and he opened it because it was the only door in the house that was normal and like the doors in our world. It was completely dark beyond it, and this at first caused my heart to beat strongly. The man then made a sign as he entered into the darkness, followed by Cezar and then me. The woman came after me, and I heard her closing the door.

In the moment during which we walked in that darkness, the surrounding environment lightened up. I saw the corridor that was a few meters long, like a niche, and then the cave as we went backwards through all of the various stages that we had passed through when we came. These different stages or zones were characterized either by moisture, heat, or crystals.

When we arrived in the high temperature zone, just like upon our arrival, I entered a trance-like state in which I maintained lucidity, but everything around me seemed to be moving in slow-motion.

At a certain point, after having the false sensation of ascending, even though I was on level ground, I arrived at the front of the cave exit. Cezar and our guide were outside, and a bit further, in about the same place where we had left him, the shaman was waiting. The woman arrived behind me.

The visit to the center of the Earth had not lasted long, but it was full of information and wonderful moments.

The two guides slightly bowed their heads to us, a sign of good-bye, and then reentered the cave, disappearing from our sight. The shaman led us to our vehicle, but he refused to let us give him a lift to the city, so we returned to El Calafate and the hotel where we had booked a room. Still feeling like I was in a trance, I wished only to sleep and I did so until the next morning. I noticed that after every return from a journey inside the Earth, I felt somewhat like an outsider to the surface world for some time. I was talking less and sleeping more, but after two or three days, everything was back to normal. Cezar told me that those sensations would disappear after several trips because my body would gradually adapt to the vibrational characteristics of the interior of our planet. Although the long flight home prolonged my condition, everything went back to normal after I arrived at the Base.

It took me a month to sort out my notes and sketches about the trips I had made inside the Earth and also to establish with Cezar what I am permitted to say. While I was dealing with all of this, I also took care of the last details of organizing a very important expedition to Iraq.

The travels that I made to the inside of the planet brought about a major transformation of my knowledge and understanding of the world. They have paved the road to amazing experiences and revelations that have given me long searched for answers. All we have to do is give up on dogmatic thinking and follow the intuition from our heart.

EPILOGUE — BY PETER MOON

While the book you have just read required a relatively short amount of time to read, quite literally thousands of man hours have gone into the translation, editing and production process, not all of it by myself. I bring this up because, as the editor and publisher of the English edition of Radu Cinamar's various works, I feel it is incumbent upon me to give some context with regard to the information presented in this book.

I have now been a publisher and author for over a quarter of a century. Never in that time have I ever met with so much difficulty in bringing a work to fruition. It is not that my other publications have been easy, as some required years of research and adroit mental gymnastics to complete. Inside the Earth — The Second Tunnel, however, wins the prize with regard to being the most challenging. These difficulties extended across a very wide panorama of factors ranging from the translation process to the finer contractual details. There were also other business priorities and personal factors that contributed to the slow launch of this unique and rather remarkable work, but these aspects were minimal compared to the raw inertia that had to be overcome to get the actual translation done. For example, after the original Romanian book was published, it took me eight months to get an actual copy of it in my hand and at least another six months to receive the digital files and work out the details of the contract. The translation, however, proceeded from the time I received the original book. This process was extremely cumbersome for a variety of reasons; and perhaps it would have gone like clock work if my familiar Romanian translator was not having a baby. It is not important, however, to bore you with details but only to inform you that I was opposed by various factors which, in the final analysis, can best be identified as psychic resistance. In other words, it was as if various forces did not want this book to come into print.

If I were to share details of what happened, you would readily counter with logical solutions that should have been employed. In such instances, your ideas would be correct. In practice, however, logical procedures and strategies produced inadequate responses or solutions. The good news, however, is that all of these difficulties have been overcome. I do not expect such ridiculous problems in the future and that applies to the translation process as well. It is as if a barrier has been crossed, and a not insignificant barrier.

I do think, however, it is advisable to add more context, not only in regard to the difficulties encountered in publishing this book, but also with respect to the phenomena and circumstances that it presents.

Although many Romanians are well-educated, speak English and share many Western customs, there is a huge chasm between their culture and that of America. When we bring in the esoteric factors, there is an even greater chasm. While I am referring to the issues which both Cezar and Radu bring up in this entire series of books, there are also other esoteric factors that they do not mention. Ever since Dr. David Anderson brought me to Romania in 2008, I have sought to bridge this chasm as best I could in order to share the live spiritual legacy of an ancient and mysterious land which has been overlooked, obfuscated and even vilified.

The main point here is that if a book is this hard to produce, it is an indication that there is something worthwhile inside; and perhaps more to the point, such trials and tribulation are indicative of what is known as initiation in the esoteric world. Whether you liked or resonated with this book or not, you have been introduced to an entirely new world as well as a new way to think about it. This is the gift of Radu Cinamar.

With regard to my personnel correspondence with Radu, he went silent in 2011. This was after a message when he told me to expect a visit from his mysterious friend, Elinor. That meeting never happened; but the reason for it was that I was personally not ready. That will change in the near future. I did finally hear from Radu this year, in June of 2018. He answered personal questions I had about Elinor in a letter written a year before. Radu also wanted to know why the book had not come out yet and if I had a problem with the content (I did not, save the ordeal involved in getting it translated). Additionally, he apologized for his long hiatus in communicating as well as the fact that he would be mostly inaccessible for the near future. What he did offer me, however, proved insightful (regarding a personal matter).

As for the future, Radu plans to write at least another six books or so; and while such a proposition is always subject to change, his Romanian publisher told me that he expects Radu's next book to be published in the Romanian language in early 2019. It will be released about the same time this English edition of Inside the Earth hits the shelves in America.

Whether you believe the information herein or not, Radu has presented an incredible paradigm that can be either ignored, rejected, or appreciated and used as a template by which to seek out your own evolution. It is my opinion that if we are to be either so clever or lucky to engineer our lives in such a manner that we might have similar experiences to Radu, we had best do a lot of personal work on ourselves. In the meantime, I will respond as rapidly as possible to any new work that is presented by Radu Cinamar.

FORGOTTEN GENESIS

RADU CINAMAR

FORGOTTEN GENESIS delves into ancient history in a way that no book has done before, explaining and illustrating changes in DNA that have taken place over millennia and how Mankind has evolved into what it is today. Some of the “hot spots” of human history, which have either remained unknown or have only been considered from mythological positions, are explained, including: Atlantis, Troy, Shambhala, and Hyperborea. The diversity and the accuracy of the explanations presented are clear and conclusive, combining pure esoteric knowledge with certain scientific elements. Particular emphasis is placed upon the existence and manifestation of inter-dimensional chasms or portals at the “intersections” between the physical plane and the etheric plane.

FROM THE AUTHOR:

“Even though the notions presented in this book are delicate, I considered it necessary to take a step forward and expose some deeper aspects. I also believe that the elements presented in the other volumes of this series have prepared the ground for the interested reader to gain a fair understanding of the esoteric and other factors involved with this fascinating and complex scenario. I will continue with this more elaborate approach which has become a necessity in the current context of the times. I hope that the readers of this series of volumes will correctly understand my approach and the sincere desire to expose to the world some unknown aspects of the reality we live in.”

INTRODUCTION — BY PETER MOON

For those of you who have picked up this book without any prior knowledge of the circumstances surrounding Radu Cinamar and his previous work, I will lay out a background and summary.

During the Cold War, there was a natural alliance between the two communist nations of Romania and the People's Republic of China. Trying to keep up with the West in regards to the most advanced and esoteric methods of reconnaissance and espionage, the Romanians sought out the help of the Chinese as they did not really trust the Russians. As part of a cultural exchange program whereby Chinese students were able to participate in educational programs in Romania, the Chinese government sent the Romanians an expert in parapsychology who would set up a secret department that would deal with all abnormal occurrences. These were referred to as "K events", but in pop culture terms of today, these might now be termed as "X-File" events. Known as Department Zero, this special unit was only known to the head of state and the head of security. Besides housing and caring for paranormal subjects, Department Zero also trained them. The expert in parapsychology who set up this unique department is known to us as Dr. Xien, and he was introduced to us in the first book of this series, Transylvanian Sunrise.^{*} Although Dr. Xien is an intriguing character, we do not learn too much about him in that book. We do know that he was called in after the birth of another very interesting character who also turns out to be one of the progenitors of the Transylvania Series. His name is Cezar Brad, and he is born with an umbilical cord that is so thick, the doctors have to use an ordinary saw to sever it. As this is an anomaly, Cezar comes under the scrutiny and eventual tutelage of Department Zero and forms a close personal relationship with Dr. Xien from a very young age. Cezar is trained in a host of spiritual and psychic disciplines that would rival the best your imagination might offer.

[FOOTNOTE: * The book you are reading now, Forgotten Genesis, is the sixth in a series of books by Radu Cinamar which are collectively, along with Peter Moon's The White Bat, known as the Transylvania Series. The previous works include Transylvanian Sunrise Transylvanian Moonrise, Mystery of Egypt — The First Tunnel, and The Secret Parchment — Five Tibetan Initiation Techniques, and Inside the Earth — The Second Tunnel.]

As fate would clearly demonstrate, Dr. Xien was grooming Cezar to serve as a steward and guardian for what is arguably considered the greatest archeological discovery in the history of Mankind: a secret and previously inaccessible chamber beneath the Romanian Sphinx containing futuristic holographic technology that was put together some 50,000 years ago.

In what could be termed a virtual Noah's Ark that far exceeds the thinking and experiential capacity of those who lived in biblical times (or even in our own times for that matter), this chamber includes technology whereby one can place their hand on a table and see their own DNA rendered in three-dimensional holograms. Other devices on the table enable one to see the DNA of alien species from other planets with accompanying star renderings so that one can see where they actually originate from. By placing two hands on different parts of the table, one can also "mix" the DNA of two species so as to see how they might look if hybridized. As the tables themselves are six feet high, the creatures who built them were gigantic compared to humans of today.

This remarkable chamber also includes a "projection hall" whereby one can see a holographic rendition of the history of Earth that is particularly tailored to the individuality of whomever might be viewing it. This history, however, abruptly cuts off in about the Fifth Century A.D., perhaps because it requires some sort of software update. One of the more intriguing aspects of the Projection Hall is that it also contains three mysterious tunnels that lead into the bowels of the Earth and similar facilities in Iraq, Mongolia, Tibet and also beneath the Giza Plateau in Egypt.

Although Cezar, through the tutelage of Dr. Xien, was set up by fate to be the overseer of this remarkable archeological discovery, it was not his role to write the story of what was found and its implications. As these events were unfolding, Cezar handpicked Radu Cinamar to write these volumes. Serving as a mentor to Radu, Cezar gave him a rapid fire education in all of the political machinations going on behind this discovery while also introducing him to the world of psychic phenomena and esoteric studies. We learn about this in the first volume, Transylvanian Sunrise, but we are not told exactly why Cezar picked Radu. What I can tell you from what I have learned thus far is that Cezar is a remarkably adept individual, and he knew precisely what he was doing. His psychic sensibilities are quite formidable and proved to be accurate in this case. Radu got the job done, and with the release of this book, he now has five volumes in English.

You might think that this discovery was a wonderful opportunity to enlighten Mankind and take advantage of all that this newly discovered technology has to offer for the benefit of humanity at large. Many, if not most, of the Romanians in the government who were privy to the discovery viewed it that way. Circumstances, however, dictated otherwise.

Cezar informed Radu that the actual discovery of this secret and previously unknown chamber took place when the Pentagon discovered it via the use of ground penetrating radar that operated through satellites. It is understandable that the Americans would use all technology at their disposal for reconnaissance purposes as well as to scrutinize all geographical anomalies and resources on the planet. Right or wrong, this is the purpose of the Department of Defense. What was most challenging about this intelligence, however, was that Masonic interests in the Pentagon funneled this information to a leader in Italian Freemasonry, a Signore Massini, who represents a hidden global elite that wanted access to and control of this chamber for themselves. Accordingly, Massini approached Cezar who was then the head of Department Zero and sought his cooperation. Cezar, who did not trust Massini, was forced to cooperate to a certain extent due to political circumstances. Thus, the evil interests of an Italian Freemason forged an unprecedented alliance between Romania and America with the former suddenly being admitted to NATO. The specifics of these political intrigues are detailed in the book Transylvanian Sunrise which is primarily the story of Cezar's life and his involvement with the uncovering of these amazing artifacts.

While the enigmatic and mysterious Dr. Xien set the stage for Cezar to uncover this secret chamber through rigorous training and education, he is a distant memory when the discovery is made and seemingly completely uninvolved in any tangible way with the political machinations and evil intrigues which allowed it to even take place. Dr. Xien, however, is an interested party and a definite progenitor of the information revealed in these books, and this comes into clear view in the second book of the series, Transylvanian Moonrise — A Secret Initiation in the Mysterious Land of the Gods.

Transylvanian Moonrise begins with an editor's note from the Romanian editor, Sorin Hurmuz, who includes numerous excerpts from the Romanian press that not only corroborate Cezar's story as told by Radu but give insights into why it is credible. Above and beyond these facts, it might interest you to know that a key area near the Romanian Sphinx is blacked out on Google Earth. Besides that, Americans were seen en masse during the time of the excavations that were taking place near the Romanian Sphinx in 2003. I have also spoken to several well-placed people in Romania who believe the general story to have merit. Exactly what has taken place and all of the details are still largely a mystery, but Radu's books offer us the only clues. In addition to that, they are remarkable stories and teaching devices which integrate the mundane aspects of politics with some of the most esoteric concepts of occultism as well as the cutting edge of technology.

Radu's narrative in Transylvanian Moonrise begins with a mysterious man named Elinor trying to contact the enigmatic author through his publisher, Sorin Hurmuz, who has generally been instructed to stonewall any people wishing to meet with Radu. In fact, Sorin has never met with Radu and only communicates with him by special courier or with a prearranged phone card. When it is eventually discovered that Elinor is speaking on behalf of a Tibetan lama, both Sorin and Radu change their tune and a meeting is eventually arranged. This meeting is filled with a panoply of metaphysical revelations which present an entirely new paradigm by which to view the events described in Transylvanian Sunrise. After an amazing indoctrination into the ancient art of alchemy and the prospects of immortality, Radu meets the lama who reveals himself to be none other than Dr. Xien and explains that he once served in the royal court at Lhasa under the name of Repa Sundhi at the time of the Chinese invasion of Tibet. Escaping that purge, he somehow ended up in the employ of the Chinese government and adopted a different identity as Dr. Xien.

Repa Sundhi has a very specific agenda for this meeting with Radu and it has to do with what is the focal point of the fourth book in the Transylvania Series: The Secret Parchment — Five Tibetan Initiation Techniques (more on that later). In Transylvanian Moonrise, Radu learns that the lama wants to take him to the Apuseni Mountains of Transylvania. Once there, a mysterious but well-described space-translation takes place that literally transports them (as well as Elinor, who remains in their company) to certain rarefied high peaks of Tibet which are inaccessible to humans by normal transportation means. Radu is escorted into a cave where he meets another progenitor of the Transylvania Series. Her name is Machandi and she is a blue goddess and tantric dakini who not only educates and initiates Radu but gives him an ancient manuscript which is to be translated from ancient Tibetan and published, first in the Romanian language. Having finally been translated into English, it is the centerpiece of The Secret Parchment.

While Transylvanian Moonrise refers to the characters in Transylvanian Sunrise and the lama is included in the dramatic events that take place, the two books are astonishingly different and offer complementary views of the overall scenario from completely different perspectives. The third book in the series, Mystery of Egypt — The First Tunnel, is no exception. Radu is recruited to join Department Zero on a journey with Cezar into the mysterious “First Tunnel” in the Projection Hall of the Bucegi complex. This leads to a hidden chamber beneath the Giza Plateau in Egypt. What they find there is no less astonishing than what has already been offered in the first two books. The purpose of the mission is to recover neatly organized slate-like tablets that are in fact a type of ancient “DVD” that project holographic “memories” of the history of the world. The tablets do not require a projector and are so numerous that they can only hope to return a portion of them to their home base, after which they will be sent to America for detailed study. Even though they cannot recover everything in one mission, what they do retrieve would take a team of viewers a considerable amount of time to view.

There is also an occult chamber containing a device consisting primarily of huge crystals that facilitates the projection of one’s consciousness back into time. It is not a physical time travel device. It should be noted that it requires a certain amount of psychic and esoteric development to be able to withstand the rigors of projecting oneself into time, even if the physical body is not being utilized. We also learn that this device is bioresonant in that it is tuned to the physiological, mental and emotional conditions of the subject as well as their own past experiences. In other words, you would have different experiences than would I and so on.

Another intriguing aspect of the time device is that there is a certain amount of censorship present. When Cezar attempts to project his consciousness into time in order to see who created the device, he encounters blockages. While it is informative and useful in certain respects, it contains mysteries which it does not want penetrated, at least at this particular time. All of this gives rise to interesting speculation.

These censorship issues further fuel the controversy Cezar ignites by relaying his initial experience in the time device whereupon he returns to the time of Jesus in the First Century. Radu also recounts what he saw in his original experiences in the Projection Hall (beneath the Romanian Sphinx) when he witnessed events surrounding the crucifixion of Christ. This account contains UFOs wreaking havoc amidst a virtually insurmountable thunder storm while a fearing populace scrambles to save their own lives. It leaves us with a hornets nest of information, the result of which has been more than a few questioning the veracity of the authors. I should add, however, that most of the reading audience thus far has not blinked at the accounts given. They have enjoyed the book and are not judgmental about the authors. What is perhaps the most relevant aspect of this experience, however, is the fact that the device which facilitates it is bioresonant. Whether the events presented are indeed real in a conventional sense, they are certainly events that the collective consciousness has wrestled with for thousands of years.

What happens in Mystery of Egypt, however, is superseded by what occurs in the fourth volume, The Secret Parchment. Radu finds himself in the middle of the political and conspiratorial intrigue that is swirling around the effort to control the holographic chamber beneath the Romanian Sphinx. Accordingly, Radu is sent to the United States to attend a remote viewing program in the Pentagon, all in an effort to defuse the rising political tensions. As the conspiratorial intrigues escalate into a full scale political and esoteric war, there is an intervention by superior spiritual forces, one of which includes Radu being recalled to Romania in order to meet with Repa Sundhi to facilitate the translation of the ancient Tibetan manuscript or “secret parchment” which had been given to him by Machandi as described in Transylvanian Moonrise. While the parchment presents five invaluable techniques for spiritual advancement (these are not the same as the already known yoga exercises known as the “Five Tibetans”), its very presence in the world has ignited a series of quantum events, extending from a bizarre structure emerging from the snow in Antarctica, serving an antenna function, which is at the crossroads between signals to Jupiter’s moon Europa as well as Mount McKinley, and Transylvania. As incredible as the discovery of this extraterrestrial connection is, it only escalates the attempt to undermine the structure of Romania’s Department Zero when the Americans learn that the signal to Transylvania reveals a passage way of solid gold tunnels, extending miles into the underground, leading to ancient hieroglyphics, embedded in gold, indicating the locale as the nexus of the Inner Earth where “all the worlds unite.” Not too far from the nexus, accessible through more passageways of pure gold, is an incredible room of golden thrones with panels of yet more hieroglyphics and a mysterious portal that appears to be a direct conduit to outer space; and, presumably, an outer space of another universe. These discoveries were made by a certain Professor Constantine who, upon reporting them and taking a team from the government to investigate, was whisked away and never heard from again. Although the investigators were killed, Professor Constantine was able to make a summary report to Cezar Brad; and the file for such was deemed to be the highest state secret of the country of Romania. Even so, Department Zero was unable to find any access to these passageways and, despite considerable effort, no further discoveries were made. Although Machandi’s secret parchment is translated and we are treated to its specific wisdom, The Secret Parchment — Five Tibetan Initiation Techniques leaves us with a very great mystery that is left dangling.

I also contribute to the book by revealing my own adventures in the area and learning of the ancient legends and how these fit into the scheme of Radu’s adventures. It turns out that Professor Constantine was indeed a real character who disappeared, and I am even shown where he once lived. There is also a Valley of the Golden Thrones, and it is in this region that I make one of the most remarkable discoveries that I have ever stumbled upon.

Although it has not been mentioned in any of the previous books, I was led to a cave by a Romanian archeologist in 2014. Known as Cioclovina Cave, it is the site of one of the greatest archeological finds in Romania which indicate a civilization did indeed occupy caverns within the inner earth and in the vicinity mentioned by Radu. Cioclovina Cave represents a sort of grand central cave station with some seven other caves interlinking with it, representing at least seven kilometers of tunnels.

While the aforementioned findings concerning Cioclovina Cave are of great relevance with regard to Radu's claims, there is an even more startling confirmation from Dr. David Anderson, my scientist friend who originally brought me to Romania in 2008. In an interview conducted by myself in 2015, he revealed for the first time that Cioclovina Cave was the site of the largest discharge of space-time motive force ever recorded. Space-time motive force is a term Dr. Anderson coined to signify an energy that is released as a result of time dilation that occurs in the process of frame-dragging. If you are further interested in this aspect and would like a full explanation, you can watch the video series Time Travel Theory Explained at my website www.timetraveleducationcenter.com. This function is also explained in the appendix of the book Transylvanian Moonrise.

What all of this means in layman's terms is that Dr. Anderson's findings indicate that this area was the site of heavy duty time travel experiments. He was completely surprised that I happened to come across this very area by happenstance during my adventures in Romania. Note that this area was never a targeted area of interest for me. I had an off day and was brought there by an archeologist I knew at his instigation. He had no idea of the time experiments or the like. The archeologist, by the way, told me that the stories I relayed to him about Radu's books, which he had not read at that point, correlated with many stories he had heard about the area.

While there are many so-called "side tunnels" or supplementary threads of great interest that involve Dr. Anderson and my other associates in Romania, I am getting off subject. Radu is very well aware of Dr. Anderson and is even interested to meet with him. It is quite possible that all of these different threads might coalesce into a single homogeneous thread some day.

Radu's fifth book, entitled Inside the Earth — The Second Tunnel refers to what is referred to as the “Second Tunnel” in a series of three tunnels in the projection room located within the chamber beneath the Romanian Sphinx. The First Tunnel, named in the title of the third book in the series, Mystery of Egypt — The First Tunnel, leads to a chamber beneath the Giza Plateau. The Second Tunnel, leads to underground cities and installations. The Third Tunnel leads to Tibet with an offshoot branch to the Carpathians (near Buzau, Romania) and then towards Iraq; and from there to Mongolia and the Gobi Plateau.

Inside the Earth — The Second Tunnel begins with a rather sober evaluation of geophysics and how it relates to the core of the Earth and the myriad misunderstandings that have proliferated on the enigmatic region which is often referred to as the “Inner Earth” and often incorrectly as the “Hollow Earth.” Radu’s old friend and mentor, Dr. Xien, gives him rather thorough explanations on these various aspects and gives remarkable new insights into the science and origin of black holes that will eventually reach into the halls of academe and revolutionize the way that science thinks about such topics. There is also an exhaustive explanation of the fatal error of the Cavendish Experiment, done in 1799, the “gold standard” for justifying that the Earth’s core is a mass iron-nickel alloy surrounded by molten lava. You will learn that later experiments to justify this conclusion is based upon what amount to outrageous assumptions based upon an experiment which has not been subject to rigorous inspection and is, in fact errant. You will also learn that what resides at the core of the Earth is indeed a black hole.

Beyond the science are Radu’s remarkable adventures with Cezar where the two visit mysterious regions within the Earth and the multiple civilizations that occupy that region. There are lots of amazing meetings as well as descriptions of technology that facilitate transportation between the mysterious regions “Inside the Earth.” Radu also provides us with a glimpse of the fabled city of Shambhala, a paradise at the core of the Inner Earth itself where balance and harmony are the basis of civilization. Whatever your final opinion of Radu’s adventures might be, you will be exposed to a paradigm that is novel and will change your view of the world.

One of the most admirable aspects of Radu's book is that, while familiar aspects and characters are common to all of them, each one is unique and focuses a different look. Forgotten Genesis is no exception and herein you will read about the forgotten origins of the history of Mankind.

AUTHOR'S NOTE

I wrote this book with a keen interest in giving the readers the real basis and essential points of the history of Mankind. This was an older project, a quest that had begun in 2004, after having been stunned by various images from humanity's "forbidden" past that had been witnessed in the Projection Hall.

There were two main reasons why I did not fulfill this project more quickly. On the one hand, I did not have enough information to present an appreciable view on the destiny of Mankind from its origin to the present time; and, on the other hand, I did not have permission at that time to reveal even a very small part of what I already knew.

Even today, I have been advised not to disclose certain "delicate" events in the history of humanity which could shake the religious foundations of various segments of the population. There are also other sensitive political and geo-strategic events that should be withheld due to the governmental problems or "embarrassment" that may arise.

After I finished writing the text of this book and reviewed it for correction, I realized that what I have to offer could be quite complicated and make for a sticky situation. For a few days, I was in doubt, not knowing what to do. Eventually, I realized that a simplification of the entire matter could later give birth to other questions, so I decided to "risk it" and publish the full version.

I do dare, however, to make an important suggestion to the reader. At the very least, the fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh chapters of this book must be carefully scrutinized in order to understand the roots of the "Human Project". Rereading segments of their content will prove itself useful in contributing to a better knowledge of what happened in those very distant times.

Even though the concepts presented in this book seem difficult, I thought it was necessary to take a step forward and expose some deeper issues. I also believe that the elements covered in the previous volumes I have written have prepared the ground for presenting a fair understanding to the reader with regard to the esoteric and other meanings herein so that the reading of the present volume and those that follow will have context and coherence.

I will continue with this more elaborate approach as it has become a necessity in the current context of the times. I hope that readers of this series of books will correctly understand my approach and sincere desire to expose to the world some unknown aspects of the reality we live in.

CHAPTER ONE — THE EARTH IN CROSS SECTION

After my return from Utklaha,* the city of the ancient Mayans in the center of the Earth and located very close to Shambhala's sublime citadel, I had to come back to terms with the rather tough reality of our planet. The difference in perception and the level of vibration was huge. During the first few days, I felt virtually suffocated with everything seeming primitive to me, and this included the habits of people, their ideas, their ambitions, their way of conceiving life as well as the standard of living that we are all familiar with.

[FOOTNOTE: * One of different cities that Radu visits in Inside the Earth — The Second Tunnel, Utklaha is the closest to the fabled region of Shambhala. Although Radu is only able to get a glimpse of the storied city, he is told that it lives up to the fabulous legends that have told about it.]

Unlike me, Cezar seemed to be in his element whether he was inside, the “interior” of the Earth or on its surface. When we returned to the Base, he asked me almost immediately to give a briefing to Lieutenant Nicoara, our colleague who had replaced him in leadership of Department Zero. In the following hours, Cezar was already distributing tasks, making plans, having telephone conversations within the country as well as abroad and making important decisions. I admire the extraordinary power of focus, self-control and the force and energy that radiates out of his being; and his determination and good intentions and motives are always expressed with wonderful simplicity.

As for myself, I had to go to Bucharest for two days in order to resolve some personal issues. The excitement of the capital and the affairs I was involved in there were not exactly what I needed then, especially since the impressions of my recent trip inside the Earth were very much alive in mind. I returned quite quickly to the Base, however, and the normal flow of activities resumed before I was then pressed to make an immediate departure on an expedition through the Third Tunnel, the tunnel to Iraq, which was scheduled at the beginning February 2015.

PROBLEMS WITH TEAM CHANGE

Shortly before we left, some of the basics of this expedition had already been set forth in discussions with Major Cross.^{} The team was to be made up of five members for a short-term trip with a precise purpose. For me, it would be my first trip through the Third Tunnel,^{} but as I had already accumulated considerable experience in the expeditions through the other two tunnels, I felt ready for such an attempt.

[FOOTNOTE: ^{} Introduced in Inside the Earth — The Second Tunnel, Major Cross is the American liaison to Department Zero and has a positive relationship with Radu and Cezar Brad.]

[FOOTNOTE: ^{} The Third Tunnel leads to Tibet with an offshoot branch to the Carpathians (near Buzau, Romania) and then towards Iraq; and from there to Mongolia and the Gobi Plateau.]

The task of organizing this expedition was up to me and Lieutenant Nicoara. I was charged with the administrative part of the protocol which included the composition of the team and their general plan of movement, including all activities and links with the American side. Lieutenant Nicoara was assigned to take care of all matters regarding logistics and security as well as the scientific aspects.

As this expedition was going to be virtually lightning quick, the training was relatively simple. In the first stage of organizing the trip, the team was formed of Cezar, Lieutenant Nicoara, myself and, in accordance with what the Americans asked, two officers from the U.S. Navy's Secret Service. As we did not understand the reason for the Navy's involvement, I had asked for an explanation, but we received a confused response which made us reconsider the composition of the team. Accordingly, we asked for members from the internal secret structure of the Pentagon as this had been the case with the other expeditions. The situation, however, was a bit tense, especially due to the arrival of the Venerable One* with whom we had a discussion that was attended by Major Samuel Cross. Nevertheless, that discussion did not influence the collaboration with the American party for the travel that Cezar and I had taken to Yosemite. It turned out that the Venerable One had other intentions and did not put any pressure on us regarding the composition of the team that was to travel through the Third Tunnel. He only asked for the rights to study a particular artifact. To be specific, he wanted the rights to study the crystal pads which he knew already knew had been discovered in the Third Tunnel by reason of previous reports from those who had traveled through it.

[FOOTNOTE * The term “Venerable One” is a term used to designate an esteemed officer in Freemasonry. In this case it refers to Signor Massini, an Italian who is in the highest echelons of Italian Free- masonry and also is a member of the Bilderbergers. Discussed extensively in Transylvanian Sunrise, it is Massini’s high level connections in the Pentagon and his acumen and connections with the Romanian government that precipitated the discovery of the Projection Hall beneath the Romanian Sphinx in the Bucegi Mountains.]

[FOOTNOTE  In the book Inside the Earth — The Second Tunnel, Cezar and Radu visit Yosemite at the request of Major Cross because the Americans are having difficulty accessing and dealing with a portal to the Inner Earth. The expertise of Cezar and Radu are in concert with the Yosemite Indians who provide access to another region of the Inner Earth by non-technological means.]

Following our request to change the team, the Americans reconsidered their decision and included two young officers on the list from the Pentagon. Besides this change, there was also a surprise that Cezar and I had learned of upon our return from Argentina. It was initially just a brief verbal briefing from Lieutenant Nicoara, but it was subsequently presented in a full report that had been requested by Cezar.

“THE SPECIAL CHAIR”

From the briefing presented by Nicoara, we learned that a team of scientists had been able to develop a technology that allowed for downloading the information from the platinum tablets that had been retrieved from the chamber beneath the Giza Plateau that had been reached via the First Tunnel.* The research to accomplish this had taken years.

[FOOTNOTE: * The First Tunnel refers to a tunnel that leads from the Projection Hall to beneath the Giza Plateau in Egypt where there is a similar installation to that beneath the Romanian Sphinx. It is the subject of the book Mystery of Egypt — The First Tunnel.]

The unknown material and the coding system used in the recordings remained a mystery for scholars, but somehow, they eventually managed to access the stored information. Immediately after the discovery of the plates in the Egyptian chamber had taken place, the biggest problem faced was that the data contained therein could not be accessed in any way so that it could be delineated and therefore evaluated. In the first years after their discovery, intense studies were carried out, and although it was very difficult, they were able to download the information from one tablet, but it took about a year to accomplish this. There were, however, thousands of such tablets in the Occult Chamber in Egypt, but Lieutenant Nicoara informed us that an important step had been taken in this direction and to the point where downloading could be done in less than a month. More importantly, technology was provided so that multiple tablets could be downloaded simultaneously. The fact that such extremely important data could be downloaded in digital format has made it possible to inventory and classify it and, of course, under very tight security. In his report, Lieutenant Nicoara specified that the Americans had inquired about this protocol, wanting to know if the decoding and downloading of the information would be done by them or us. Cezar, however, was very clear in this regard.

“If the operation is done in the United States,” he said, “that means transporting the tablets there. We cannot afford that. If it were an ordinary treasure, this factor could be overlooked, but certainly not such an invaluable treasure as this which is beholden to the vigilance of all Mankind.  Decoding and classification operations will be done here.”

 [from the Romanian Editor] Cezar is most likely alluding to the royal Romanian treasure being transported to Russia during the First World War under the pretense of keeping it safe. This treasure, however, seems to have “vaporized” as most of it has never been returned.

This step forward made me very happy because it allowed me to have easy access to study all of those records. The protocol, however, proved to be a bit more complicated. In the subsequent bilateral talks, the Americans tried for a long shot, advancing the idea of “blackmail” but they gave up quickly because our arguments were obvious. They attempted to make us addicted to this new downloading technology that they had discovered, but they recognized the huge problems that could arise if the tablets were taken from here. It was much easier to assemble a laboratory in Romania that was dedicated exclusively to this task, and to ensure optimum security, it was decided that the plates would be taken back to the Occult Chamber in Egypt after the decoding and inventory of the information. It should also be mentioned that a very strict protocol has been developed for the security of the information with regards to its storage, accessibility and protection.

The accuracy of the data extracted from the tablets was almost 80%, and this was significant. A synthesis of scientific reports on the matter indicate that the loss of information is the result of a strange interaction that emerges at some point between the technology used and the unknown material that supports the holographic information. It has some very special magnetic properties that is congruent with a particular algorithm that has not been fully deciphered up to the present. Although there was some loss of information, the percentage of accuracy was acceptable, especially since we could hope for a complete solution to the problem in time.

In the report, Lieutenant Nicoara repeatedly mentioned the existence of an element that we had to take into account. With digital information provided that had been extracted with American technology, I watched most of those extraordinary recordings, and I noticed that in many of them, as the images began to flow, there was a “seat” which, by all appearances, made it possible to move individual consciousness across great distances, both for the purpose of facilitating “meetings” with other beings or entities as well as for “seeing” places, planets, stars or other cosmic elements that would otherwise be ignored by the common human mind. The association between the chair and the images indicated that the latter were accessed by the former.

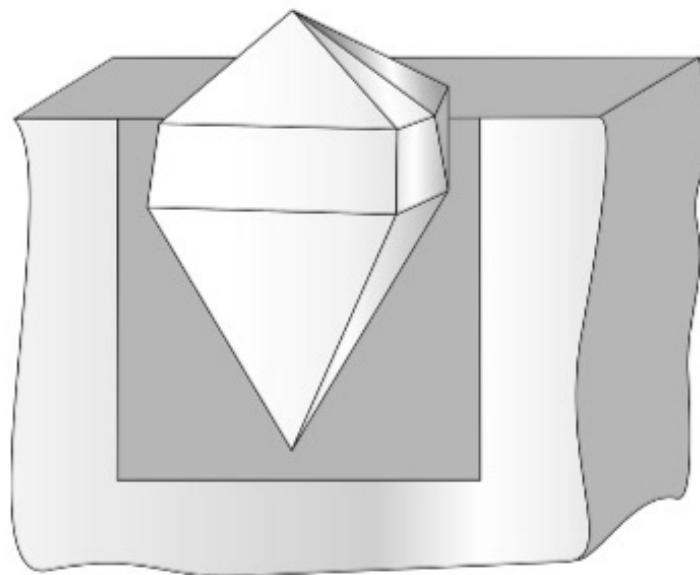

We already knew from Cezar that the underground complex in Iraq, accessible through the Third Tunnel, contains a “room” similar but smaller to that of the Occult Chamber in Egypt. After I watched the visuals from platinum tablets, Cezar informed me that there was such a “seat” in the Occult Chamber in Iraq, similar to what I had seen in those images. The fact that the images on some of the platinum tablets in Egypt featured a special “chair” similar to that existing in the complex in Iraq is the element that Lieutenant Nicoara had mentioned in his report, and he did so because it is a common element between the two chambers.

THE WEAK LINK

Even though Cezar had been in the Occult Chamber in Iraq several times, he could not clearly understand the functionality of the “seat” with regard to human beings because it just did not work. All attempts to make it work were doomed to failure, including the attempt to connect it to an external source of energy. The “chair” was not “booting up” and had not been brought into operating condition ever since the time it was discovered.

SIMPLE REPRESENTATION OF RECESSED ETHERIC CRYSTAL

This enigma persisted until, after Cezar watched recordings on some of the platinum tablets in the great Egyptian library, it became clear that the functionality of the “seat” depended upon a fairly large crystal being placed to the right of the chair. The crystal emanated light, and its radiation varied in intensity, depending upon the elements of the information that was presented. As far as we could tell, the crystal had the shape of a tetrahedron and was recessed with the tip pointing downwards.

The problem was that there was no such crystal in the Occult Chamber of Iraq. There was, however, a designated place where it was supposed to be to the right of the “seat”, but it was empty. This was quite odd because it made no sense to just have a “seat” without the presence of the crystal upon which it functioned, as had been revealed in the recordings on the tablets.

That is why, after the informational report was sent to the Pentagon, some voices from its senior staff requested the presence of an IT expert to be a part of the team that would be traveling through the Third Tunnel. Their argument was that a computer scientist might eventually solve the problem of operating the special “seat”. Personally, I would have liked this expert to have been Aiden*, but I knew he had left the service of the U.S. Army six years earlier. In our advisory meetings at Alpha Base, however, we decided not to supplement the number of team members. Thus, after several deliberations with Pentagon, this option was abandoned as, in my opinion, it would not yield any result. As such IT experts were civilians, potential leakage of information was possible. An exception, however, could be made for Aiden as he was a special case.

[FOOTNOTE: * A character in the book Mystery of Egypt — The First Tunnel, Aiden is an American who is a tech expert who accompanied Radu and Cezar on the trip to Giza and brings along a holographic laptop computer which is indispensable to the success of their mission. A fascinating and complex character, Aiden feels like he is mentally “wired” to the holographic computer.]

AN IMPORTANT HELP

Although there was no answer to the mystery of the missing crystal in Iraq’s Occult Chamber, Cezar made a decision during one of the planning sessions for the expedition through the Third Tunnel. He decided to contact Dryn, the wise man of Tomassis, to ask for his opinion and help.* By the end of January, Cezar had accomplished this by the familiar method of contact in the Projection Hall. After returning to the Base, Cezar told me that Dryn had agreed to help us and that he would also ask the Apellos Council for support.^{} Dryn justified this by the fact that those in Apellos would know more about this because they are hybridized from a race of cosmic beings, and the technology of the secret complex in the Bucegi Mountains was obviously of extraterrestrial origin. It was therefore logical that the people of Apellos would better understand this technology and be able to help us.

[FOOTNOTE: * In Inside the Earth—The Second Tunnel, Radu meets Dryn on his first journey to the Inner Earth. Dryn lives in Tomassis, a city beneath the surface of the Earth that is an actual subterranean region, heated and lighted by natural elements. It is an in-between area with regard to the more inter-dimensional aspects of Inner Earth culture and Dryn is a liaison for Radu and Cezar.]

[FOOTNOTE:  Apellos is another city Radu and Cezar visit. More advanced than Tomassis, they travel from there to Apellos which is not in the physical plane. It has very advanced technology which is discussed and even illustrated in Inside the Earth — The Second Tunnel.]

Cezar's idea was not received with much enthusiasm at certain levels of the Pentagon. Some of the generals there did not want to create a precedent of "indulging" other civilizations inside the planet. In other words, there was no desire to share the technology in the Projection Hall or the chambers in Egypt and Iraq, even if the population of Apellos was more advanced than ours. This information came to us unofficially from Cezar's good friend, Major Samuel Cross. The fact that we learned this was due to the gracious and direct authorization of Major Cross, an honest man with integrity. Such tensions between the Romanians and the Americans sometimes arise at the decision-making level, but they are usually quickly overcome, with or without diplomacy. As I have said before, the most difficult moments are those in which we have to cope with the intervention of the Venerable One, as when such occurs, the issues are more complicated.

Dryn's response was not delayed, and as a result of his consultation in Apellos, where he is very respected, doors opened in an extraordinary way to share an objective and trustworthy knowledge of the past of Mankind, the main points of which I will present in this book. Dryn told us that those in Apellos have agreed to help us, and moreover, in turn, they have proposed that there will heretofore forever be a link between them and the surface world. My own wonder over these matters reached a climax when Cezar informed me that, at the request of the Apellos Council, that liaison would be me. They did not give much detail about this decision, but they said I had made a good impression during my meeting with them in Apellos. With a happy smile, Cezar also told me that it would require a person with relatively good esoteric training in order to properly understand the revelations they wanted to share.

As they have presented the situation, their decision is part of a very large plan to facilitate a transcendence of human society that will emerge on the surface of the Earth by spreading information that will serve as an important link that will enable at least a part of Mankind to experience a transformation in their level of consciousness. Dryn said that, at our planet's level, this plan is coordinated by the Wise Men of Shambhala.*

[FOOTNOTE: * In Inside the Earth—The Second Tunnel, the Wise Men of Shambhala refers to a council of elevated beings who monitor the region of Shambhala and allow access to those who demonstrate an elevated state of consciousness.]

Although I was very keen to get to Shambhala, I was aware that this suggested that I would have to have a certain level of consciousness and understanding that would allow my presence there. The visit I had taken to Utklaha, in the center of the Earth, had clearly shown this to me, but it has also laid in my heart the nostalgia of that dream realm to which I have no access save for to look at that fabled city from afar. Now, with this wonderful opportunity offered by the Apellos Council, I was thinking that maybe the moment of my penetration into Shambhala was not that far off.

APELOS REACTIVATED

Things evolved quickly. Dryn brokered the connection with Apellos and gave us a set of precise coordinates that indicated a meeting place. Quick research showed us that the place was on a deserted hillside near a small town in Transylvania, at the foot of the Apuseni Mountains. An exact date and hour were set to get there, and I went unaccompanied. It looked like what I saw in the visuals, but it was perfectly recognizable. In fact, the place indicated was virtually impossible to miss: the small hillside was bare, covered with only a thin layer of snow, and over its wide expanse, the same landscape was uniform, almost devoid of trees, shrubs or forest. The city was in the distance, about five kilometers away. As there is no access road at ground level between the other hills and the surrounding mounds, you cannot get there by walking.

It was obvious that this place had been ideally chosen to block any attempts to be pursued. I do not, however, think that those in Apellos did so because they suspected we would have been followed; but rather, it was probably a minimal and even necessary protection measure, given that, from time to time, certain national or foreign forces and factions have shown that their occult interests and ambitions have been onerous and lacking in transparency. The tendency to control, seize, conquer and even to suppress has caused much suffering over time, and the situation is no better today, even if things seem to be paved with good intentions.

When I arrived at the meeting place, there was a man waiting for me. I thought then that the situation seemed to be a replay of the meeting in Argentina where Cezar and I also waited in a deserted place and were met by a strange shaman. Now, the man at least seemed more “normal”. Middle-aged, he looked like an ordinary man, clothed in sporty winter gear and very relaxed. Besides, I felt relieved that, unlike the shaman in Argentina, he talked, but in German, speaking with a slight Bavarian accent. He showed me the direction in which we should go and I was amazed to see that we were actually heading for the city where I had just come from. I expressed my perplexity about this, and the man explained to me, as I suspected, that the meeting place was only a minimal protection measure.

“I was instructed to drive you to where you will get your supplies,” he said. I raised my eyebrows.

“Detecting us could be very easy, even if there are only two of us,” I said, in order to prevent any misunderstanding that might later come up.

The man smiled finely and spoke.

“From the moment we met, any device that you have on you no longer works. You have ‘disappeared’ to the outside world for some time.”

As I looked at him questioningly, he paused briefly, then cryptically added, “The Apellos technology.”

I realized that this was the case, but the man did not show me any device. Instead, he remained quite steady and focused. Curious, I pulled my phone out of my pocket and the special GPS from the Base. Indeed — both devices were “dead”. I did not say anything, but the level of that technology was admirable.

We travelled the rest of the road in a few minutes, engaging only in pleasant and general conversation, but I noticed that the man had not introduced himself. We were already close to the outskirts of the small town, an area suited especially for warehouses. I was quite amazed because I was expecting to be going to a much more isolated and mysterious place, perhaps again to Apellos; but in fact, the man led me to the front of a well-maintained and well-kept hangar in a courtyard guarded by a modern fence. We both walked to the entrance and, to my surprise, I simply entered the door into that hangar and saw that it was just like a regular warehouse of a retailer.

I have to say that I was expecting something unusual and mysterious about that meeting, but it turned out to be quite ordinary and even trivial. If it were not for the protective stealth technology demonstrated by that man of German origin, I would have said that everything was the product of a bad joke or perhaps that he had brought me there to shop. In reality, as I was going to understand very quickly, things were completely different.

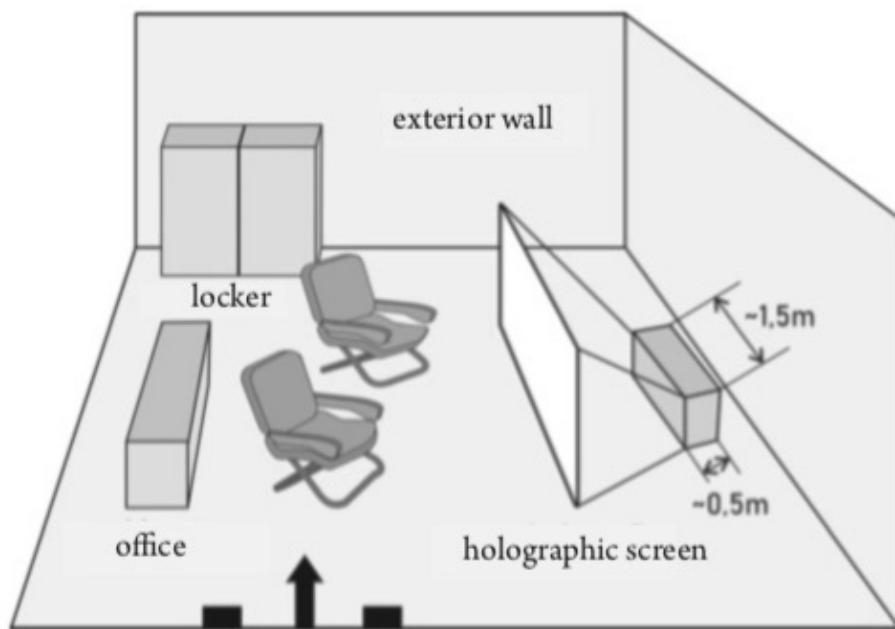

The hangar was just one of the bases of civilization of Apellos that they had told me about when I had visited their city. Indeed, looking around, I noticed that the place was full of commodities and especially food. Everywhere I looked, I saw balloons, sacks, big boxes, containers, and forklifts. In a word, the usual activity and items one would expect in a warehouse of goods.

AMAZING TECHNOLOGY — AN INTER-DIMENSIONAL HELMUT

The man who had led me into the hanger closed the door behind me, remaining outside. Inside the lighted hangar, I saw five people coming to me and immediately recognized that they had characteristics of the people found in Apellos. Although they looked like us, their faces featured a distinct paleness with higher foreheads, and their gait was harmonious in a manner that could even be considered noble. Their brown hair is slick as if anointed with oil. Coming to my right, they greeted me, speaking this time in Romanian. Dressed in simple but elegant brownish-red overalls, the skin of their faces was white, making a strong contrast with their dark hair, and their eyes were more elongated than ours, slightly almond-shaped. One of the five seemed to be their leader, and I exchanged a few pleasantries with him. He spoke Romanian well although his pronunciations were strange to my ears. His freely relaxed and spontaneous nature generated a feeling of great comfort that was also supported by kindness in his communication.

THE ROOM IN THE HANGAR WITH THE HOLOGRAPHIC PROJECTION SCREEN

Three of the men went to another area of the hangar while I was left with their leader and another person who followed us, respectfully staying behind. These two showed me a more secluded area in the hangar where I saw a circle on the ground with a diameter of nearly three meters that was bounded by lights whose source I could not see but which I likened to LEDs. The light emitted was a very fine white color that was continuous but barely perceptible. The surface of the circle was covered with small squares and lines, also discreetly luminous, but in a whitish-blue color. Based upon the earlier explanation given to me during my previous visit to Apellos, I recognized that this was a “lift” with specific teleportation technology.

A few meters further, we saw a space separated from the rest by three tall walls, the fourth being the wall of the warehouse. It was a rather large room with a surface that I estimated to be about thirty square feet that featured a thick carpet of a rubber-like material on the floor. Beneath the carpet, the floor was somewhat porous and dark blue. Surprised by the cleanliness and perfect order of the interior, I saw only a desk, two armchairs, and a folder. In front of one of the sidewalls, we noticed a metallic silver surface on the ground in the shape of a rectangle with a large side of about a meter and a half. It was explained to me that this is a device that facilitates the projection of Akashic records that Apellos uses to investigate certain present time situations in relation to their own security. While we were listening to these explanations, the metal rectangle began to take shape, but I did not see anybody giving any special command for that. When it reached about a meter in height, it stopped. A rectangular metal box, it was perfectly smooth and appeared to be a brilliant silver. After a few seconds, some of the light blue lines close to the surface appeared to the side of us, some of them changing to red. Suddenly, a holographic projection appeared in front of the metal box and about a meter away from it. Also rectangular, but rounded at the corners with a depth of about half a meter, this was a genuine holographic screen with large dimensions. Although I could see through it, there were holographic waves of blue-light undulating slowly, somehow appearing inside the “edifice” of the screen, the surface of which retained its smooth quality. Gradually, images of the nearest city appeared with sequential snapshots of streets, buildings, people, and interiors, all clearly put before me in a manner I could readily understand. I immediately realized that I was being shown how this holographic screen worked.

INTER-DIMENSIONAL HELMET

The leader of the group from Apellos that had first greeted me then showed me a small device that was like a very thin and small helmet into which he inserted something similar to a card. He told me that in order to better understand some of the elements that were to be presented to me, I needed to be somehow “coupled” to the rectangular device on the ground, and for that, I had to put on this miniature helmet.

As its main element, the helmet had a ring resembling a narrow luminous band at the level of the forehead that surrounded the entire head. At the front, the ring had a very fine transparent crystal screen. If it were not for two small branches of the helmet extending down to my ears, I would have said this was a modern pair of glasses. It was a very technologically advanced “smart” device. The man told me that the device would couple to my personal vibrational frequency in a subtle way so as to serve as a kind of additional accessory to my consciousness that is aligned with the specifics of my mental processes. In other words, I understood this to be a customized personal accessory.

The Apellos man told me that the device would automatically record anything I would see as soon as it was put on my head. For playback, he told me it was only necessary to touch the left side of the headset with the hand and then focus on the moment, the image, the being, or the object I wanted to evoke. Yet, from what I was told, the pièce de résistance of the helmet was its ability to visualize in the etheric plane. Switching views between the physical and etheric planes was done automatically or “on demand” by gently touching the right side of the headset with your fingers. The Apellos man then urged me to experience this special function of the helmet.

At first, I did not see anything unusual in the external world. After a few seconds, however, I began to perceive otherwise as more colorful and clearer three-dimensional details came into view. At the top of the “lens”, figures and other specific signs appeared, but in a holographic format at a certain distance ahead. The visual information was unfolding pretty fast, just as I had witnessed with the rectangular metal box in the room.

I then turned my gaze to the holographic screen and saw pictures of a rather crowded market. It was as if I were watching a documentary, but the interesting part was that I could not only see the simple projected images on the screen, but it was as if I were actually there amidst those events and images, perceiving everything through my senses. Somehow, with the help of the helmet, I was able to perceive the images from the large holographic screen but with the emotional aspects added in as well. I was not really a stranger to this sort of thing due to Cezar’s explanations as well as the time displacement I had experienced with the device in the Occult Chamber in Egypt. Slightly touching the right side of the helmet, I saw the images become somewhat “milky” with a slight glow around objects and people, thus indicating that I had gone into “etheric mode”.

With regard to the helmet I was using, I did not understand how all of this could happen, but I suspected it was an integral part of the advanced technology of Apellos. I was seeing everything on the holographic screen, but I also had a deeper sense and understanding of the images. There was obviously a link between that helmet and the holographic screen, but I did not understand it.

In a certain way, I was a part of that “documentary” and was taking part in the environmental images I was watching as if I were actually there. At the same time, however, I knew too well and could feel that I was in the hangar together with the beings of Apellos. I did not have the feeling that I had “gone somewhere” or that I was losing contact with the physical reality I was in; but still, I felt as if I were both in that room in the warehouse as well the “inside” of the images I was viewing on the holographic screen.

THE EARTH IN CROSS SECTION: PASSIVE ZONES AND SUBTLE CONNECTIONS

Just as I was seriously wondering about seeing those images of a crowded city, I felt like I was being “lifted” to a certain height, as if I was levitating over it. The ascension was so fast and so high that I could quickly see the planet as a whole, and when the Earth turned around on its axis long enough, I could see a cross-section of it on the left.

I was stunned because it seemed that those in Apellos wanted me to come to terms with viewing the Earth in a cross section, just as it had been brought up for discussion during my meetings with Dr. Xien. I explained this to myself as if this was the result of the helmet technology having access, at least in part, to my neural activity. I was glad, however, that I could see “live” what I had just imagined mentally. It would have been very exciting to know what technology they used to facilitate that, but this was not the time to ask such a question.

Initially, I thought what I was going to be viewing would be a graphic rendering, but I realized immediately that everything I saw was very real. In a way that I cannot explain too well, I was clearly seeing our planet in a half-section, and I was even able to modify that vision in terms of distance. It occurred to me that those in Apellos wanted to show me a map indicating where to get to Apellos from the surface.

We saw many caves, grottoes, and tunnels, including the large tunnels through which the population of Apellos travel inside the planet via shuttles. Wherever I looked in that section, the visuals were perfect. That is, wherever I looked within that section of the Earth, I saw everything clearly, including details.

We also saw the tunnels through which the Apellos send material such as “goods and merchandise” by their specific teleportation technology. I have counted four such transport tunnels in the area corresponding to Romania, but I think there are actually more. No one spoke or explained to me those things, but I did understand what I was seeing and what the images meant. I was already firmly convinced that the technology implied a highly evolved software; but besides that, I think it included something else that had a direct interaction with the etheric plane.

The section that I was viewing then amplified and “approached” me, so to speak, and clearly separated Transylvania and the northwestern parts of Romania. On the side of the section from Oradea, I saw an opaque silver sphere at one point, serving to hide what was there. When I asked what this was, the man who had accompanied me with the leader and had remained respectfully behind us told me that such opaque spheres were areas where I was not allowed to see for the time being. He specified that there are five such major areas beneath the Earth’s crust which are located under the territory of Romania.

These areas contain entrances to the “inside” of the Earth which must remain hidden. One is in Dobrogea, another is in the area of Buzau, two are in Transylvania, and the fifth is in the northeastern part of the country. These are areas on the surface where one can access the tunnel networks within the Earth that connect with subterranean cities and their populations. They are inter-dimensional chasms, i.e. entry points through which you can move from the physical plane to the etheric plane and penetrate into certain precise locations underground. There may be more such input zones, but they have shown me only five of them, even though they were obscured.

Rising higher and higher, as I noticed the outer shell of the planet in sectional format, I became more and more astonished at the sight of the network of subtle etheric links within the Earth as well as their extensions into the material plane which included inhabited regions such as grottoes, cities, tunnels and big cavities.

In that extraordinary cross-section of the Earth, I saw brighter dots, some of them shining in a such a way that they were emanating power. Asking what those lights were, it was explained to me that there are powerful magnetic distortions that serve as portals, making it possible to move from the physical plane to the etheric plane, even from the “inside” of the Earth. They are basically links between the surface and the interior of the planet.

“As such etheric connections are not limited to the Earth, they are inter-dimensional,” the Apellos man explained to me. “These portals not only connect the exterior to the interior of the Earth but also serve as a conduit between the Earth and other planets. Those who have sufficiently developed technology use these links with much wisdom.

I confess that, at that moment, I did not really understand how this took place because I was shown only what was connected to Earth. The colossal etheric links appeared to me to be like silver arches whose exact localizations remained obscure. Watching them, I realized that they were etheric in nature by reason of the direct understanding that was transmitted to my brain as well as the fact that they were brighter, being encompassed in a distinct shining halo. For example, I could make out the difference between the natural caves or voids in the Earth’s crust that were in the physical plane and those on the etheric level that were radiating out in that particular way.

Just as subtle energy meridians support the circulation of energy in the human body and “nourish” the being on different levels, so does the Earth have its own “meridians” and “subtle channels” that are very active and at the same time “nutritious”. I understood at that point that the populations living in the Earth are “nourished” to a great extent by these subtle tellurian energies, and that is why it is easy for them to come into contact with the etheric plane. They do not use our planet but rather can be said to live within it in a kind of harmonious and efficient symbiosis. This is fundamentally different to the paradigm of understanding and thinking of people on the surface of the planet which endures systematic destruction by reason of pollution, waste or irrational exploitation.

“COVERED” SINGULARITIES

Some of the points where subtle meridians “intersect” the surface were very bright, drawing attention to their importance. Beginning to understand how the helmet worked, which I realized was a very technologically advanced converter of human psychological experiences, I wondered if those points were populated or deserted. This amazing technological device somehow made the connection between the human mind and certain information stored in subtle dimensions of Creation; otherwise, I could not explain the “dialogue” that was possible within certain limits. After I asked the question, the image immediately and intensely zoomed in to some of those bright dots on the surface of the planet. I was somewhat surprised to see that some of them revealed houses, castles or old buildings while others were placed in forests, on the coast of the mountains, or even on the flat surfaces of plateaus.

I was particularly interested in those buildings that had been built exactly upon the points of intersection along the etheric meridians. I turned my head back to the Apellos man who was assisting me and asked him what those constructions represented in the areas indicated. I already knew that the Apellos man was interested in correctly understanding what was being revealed to me and had the telepathic ability to follow my journey with regard to the visuals I was seeing via the helmet.

“You might call them ‘houses of cabal’ but these buildings actually cover essential points of passage between the physical plane and the etheric plane. They are like portals,” he explained.

“Okay, but then who lives in them?” I asked with puzzlement.

“Some of us are the Apellos, but there are also other advanced civilizations inside the planet with whom we work in the sense of using portals to move from one plane to another. We cannot afford to let go of these essential passages in the etheric plane and within the Earth, at least for the time being, because they would disturb the population, and your rulers would want to use them for military purposes.”

“Some of them are very old I see,” I commented.

“Yes. The castles are hundreds of years old, but there were other settlements before them in the same place, even thousands of years older. It is, however, sensitive areas of convergence in the cities that are the most important because they are exposed and must be well guarded. There are property titles for all of this, of course; but this is sometimes not enough. Over time, there have been various incidents and some even in these times. With the development of your technology, your monitoring capabilities have become finer. The secret services of developed countries have become suspicious and have begun to gather information on these points, but they still do not understand what is really going on there. There are some critical situations when breaches occur, and we have to intervene and cancel the etheric charge of the place, alter its structure and move the ‘convergence point’ of the etheric meridians into another more secure area.”

“So why do you not do the same with all of these sensitive areas and locate them in very safe places?” I asked candidly.

“Nature must be left to play its own game. There is a reason for everything and a meaning that is often hidden. If we were to take some tendons from their natural position in a human leg, do you think the person could walk just as well? It is the same here, too. In cases of force majeure, we appeal to such extreme methods, but even so, the move takes place at a certain time and in a succession of well-calculated steps to help induce a circumstance that aligns with nature.

“Have you had such a situation?”

“Yes. One of them was a few years ago,” replied the man from Apellos. He focused his eyes for a few moments and then touched a small device attached to his temple that I had not noticed up to that point as it was almost covered by the black hair on his head.

Within my helmet, different images immediately began to appear from what I had seen before. I was shown a pretty old house in a German city. Then, the picture suddenly changed, depicting another home, this time in the U.S., which I was able to identify by the specific way the streets were named and arranged. The image suddenly changed again, and I could see the Earth from extreme heights that highlighted the clear outline of Europe and North America. Between two points on the two continents — which highlighted the two locations I had been shown — a rainbow-like conduit appeared, blurred and accompanied by many symbols.

We therefore had a space distortion, a discontinuity in the fabric of the space-time continuum which was known of for a long time and guarded by this unique method of building old properties exactly over such portals. It was basically the same method used by the Yosemite Indians with the cabin that had been built in 1776 over the portal leading to the “inside” of the Earth. The Apellos man told me that some of these cases were already being hunted down by the intelligence services of different countries. As I know from experience that information about such things is offered in exchange at a certain echelon, I resolved myself to check this out upon my return to the Base. I was curious to know what had actually happened in this regard and how such situations were resolved. Having access to good intelligence information from two countries, I was hoping to find records about this.

SUBTLE FIELDS AND REALITIES

The man from Apellos then brought back the series of images with the Earth onto the holographic screen. The best comparison I can make about what I was experiencing is that I was watching and even sensually and emotionally “participating” in a very well-documented documentary. I was amazed by the very large number of areas populated under the terrestrial surface and the many variations of “relief” regions inside our planet. These areas looked exactly like the nerve networks in our body, full of life and branching out to the body’s extensions. I never imagined that the activity inside the Earth could be so complex. Being now at a great height and having a wider perspective of the planet’s section through her crust to the mantle, I could see many of the aforementioned spheres of silver in other parts of the globe, all of which were designed to obscure the knowledge of what was there. Some of those silver spheres were smaller, others larger, but some were really huge. Showing my curiosity, I asked what was there.

In the case of the large silver spheres, I was told that they represent more than just important passages from the surface of the Earth to the “interior” of it. Some of them also overshadow extraterrestrial bases that have been placed in those regions. For example, I have seen such spheres inside the crust which correspond to areas on the bottom of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans at their different depths. From those bases, I have also seen subtle etheric networks connected to various other structures or settlements within the Earth. I then asked myself if the bases were built into existing cavities or if it had been necessary to cut rock to form the cavities. The information I received is that there was no need to cut rock to get the space needed for the construction because the Earth's crust is full of voids and many already extant underground cavities, each with its own specific characteristics.

I began to see the cross-section of the planet I was viewing more and more clearly, observing that the structure of the Earth is not chaotic, but in a precise way, aligned upon magnetic field lines generated by the black hole in its center which, in their turn, are extremely complex, somehow resembling the striated muscles of the hands and feet. I saw a complex overlap of these lines extending deep into the planet. In holographic imagery, these were rendered as brilliant arcs with varying colors of different intensities in the etheric plane.

My mind then grasped that the planet's crust is formed by magnetic field lines and that vortices appear in different places where it is empty. I then understood matter could not be formed in these areas because of an accumulation of intense magnetic, electric and gravitational fields and that those spaces are the cavities, caves and great voids found inside the Earth. I also saw that the field lines have different characteristics and, depending upon how they combine in different areas of the planet, they push the matter upward, forming the mountains; and in others, they pull down, forming the great valleys.

The hypothesis of scientists concerning the way the mountains were formed — by the collision or interaction of the tectonic plates that are stuck to one another — is not wrong, but it is incomplete. For example, I have clearly seen how the crust does not float on the magma such as contemporary science tells us. It is true that there are large areas of magma inside the planet, but there are also areas where the Earth's crust is self-contained and arches (based upon magnetic field lines manifesting as arcs), just as I have described as seen in the section of the planet that was presented to me.

Magma is therefore a kind of “by-product” and the mountains do not necessarily form by reason of different tectonic plates floating on its surface colliding and pushing against each other. On the other hand, they are born due to cumulative factors related to magnetism, electricity, pressure, temperature, and also certain moon movements which cause fluctuating stresses on the Earth's crust and influence the characteristics of the field lines that manifest in those areas. I could see that there were a bunch of complex fields, the nature of which were not identified. Any fluctuation of the field lines causes a rearrangement in the crust. The rocks there are no longer solid but are rather soft, like clay.

I also witnessed that the field lines generated by the central hole of the planet are not static but dynamic. They move continuously, and where their structure changes, solid matter is tensioned. At some points, there are gaps and tensions, and these rearrangements and shifts cause earthquakes.

Volcanic activity has a similar explanation as, depending upon how the field lines are directed, the magma bag can retract or push; in which case, a volcano erupts.

I then understood how difficult it is for contemporary scientists to understand these realities which start from something ethereal and invisible and end up manifesting on the physical plane on a large scale, resulting in volcanic eruptions, tremors or mountainous formations. It is extremely difficult to present something that belongs to the subtle domain of such a manifestation within the parameters of modern physics because the laws and phenomena of the subtle worlds are much more complex than the physical one. Neither Newton's classical physics nor even the general relativity of Einstein can be applied to an etheric or astral reality. Even though the understanding of such phenomena is valid and is recognized by the academic world, it is still limited by the conceptions and prejudices that most scientists still retain.

CONSCIOUSNESS OF THE PLANET EARTH

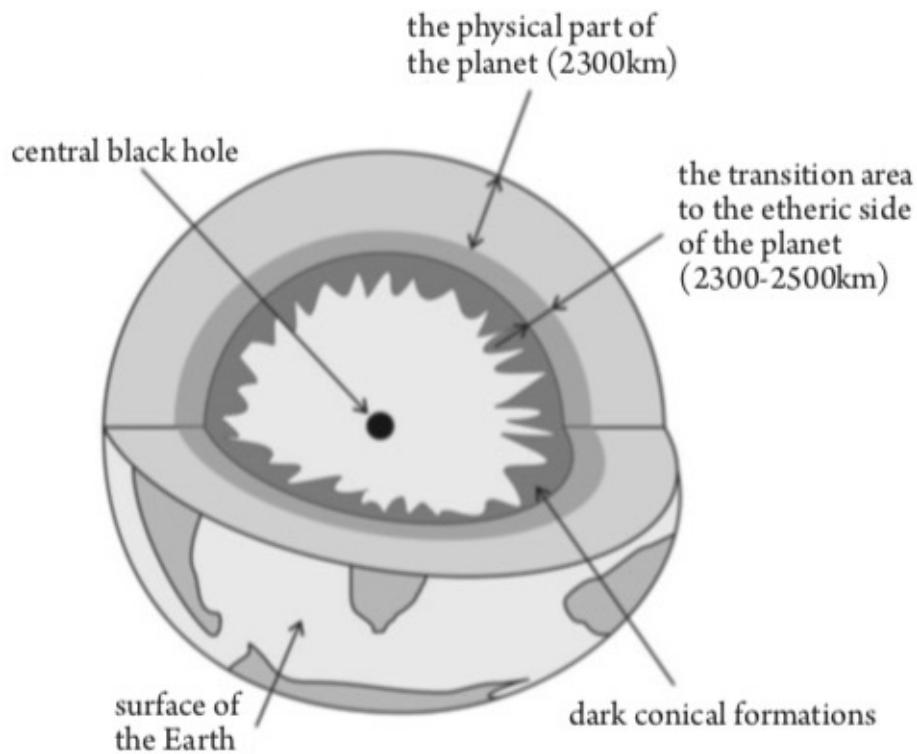

Then, as I continued to watch the cross-section of the planet before me, I saw where the magma ended, but the visual below me was already darker and more obscured. After a few seconds, I began to see this part of the interior structure of the planet more clearly. It was based upon the gravitational distortions caused by the central hole, but the “texture” or “fabric” was different.

It was then shown to me that the passage between the physical plane and the etheric plane is about 2,300 to 2,500 kilometers, and beyond this “depth”, starting from about 2,800 kilometers, is the etheric dimension. I found this astonishing because I had already learned from Dr. Xien that the transition to the etheric plane was made from between 1,800-2,000 kilometers. When I raised this issue, the Apellos man explained to me that what Dr. Xien said is not wrong but that differences arise due to the dynamic forces manifested by central singularity which may vary from time to time depending upon what the consciousness of the planetary spirit wants to accomplish. On the other hand, we have already explained in the preceding volume of this series that the “division” of the dimensions of existence — the physical plane, the etheric plane, the astral plane and the causal plane — does not imply a “slicing” of the dimensional planes; that is, a stratification that would appear as a “sandwich”, as some readers might incorrectly understand.* Rather, the planes of creation are differentiated by their specific vibrational frequency, each falling within a certain margin, but they coexist along with the physical plane. This reality is just like that of radio waves that coexist in the same space. They do not “mix” but can be accessed as soon as the radio switches to their specific frequency. Of course, there may also be “interferences” in some cases that are generated by energy anomalies.

[FOOTNOTE: * These aspects are very well explained in volume 5, Inside the Earth — Second Tunnel, 2017, pages 58-60.]

EARTH IN CROSS SECTION — DISTANCES AND CHARACTERISTICS

In the case of our planet, the vibrational frequency of matter increases from a certain “depth” and begins to resonate with the vibrational frequency of the etheric plane, an aspect which is dictated by the proximity to the central singularity or black hole. So does the change in vibrational frequency occur as one moves from one subtle dimension to another, all of the way up to that of the causal plane that surrounds the central singularity right in the very “center”. It should be understood, however, that the subtle planes do not exist by themselves but rather are there by reason of the presence of the black hole and its enigmatic nature in the Earth’s center.

Inside the cross-section of the Earth that I was seeing, there were some roughly tapered cone-like formations that were pointing towards the black hole in the center. This surprised me because, when I actually entered the planet, I saw sea, earth, and vegetation, but as I looked through the special helmet, there seemed to be a dark void marked by those conical formations.

As soon as these questions occurred to me, the image changed a bit and rotated at a small angle, and I then found myself looking right over the center of the planet, just above the black hole. I immediately realized that what you see varies from area to area, all depending upon the vibrational frequencies of the area where you are looking from. I had been “placed” just above the center of the black hole whereupon I noticed a kind of glimmer, a wondrous splendor that I had never before seen.

I understood that it was very important for me to observe the beautiful reality of that poetic grandeur which is almost impossible to describe. At the very moment when it is viewed, it imparts a trance-like state in one, a nostalgic thrill and even a mystical hue. That vision is almost hypnotic, impossible to replicate accurately and undoubtedly not to be seen on our surface world. As it has been presented to me, this manifestation represents THE celestial entity, inclusive of the celestial spirit that gave birth our planet. Its mystical glow triggers a state of absolute fascination, but even as I admired that reality, I remained fully aware of what was happening to me and the place where I was on the surface world.

The first impression I felt after that state of fascination and amazement was the wonderful sense of gentleness that came from this ancestral spirit. And, contrary to general belief and what is written in the mythology of humanity, the spirit of the planet or the subtle entity that represents it is male, not feminine. I understood this instantly when that overwhelming glimpse also transmitted to me the state of strength and dignity that are of the masculine nature.

When men and the esoteric tradition refer to Gaia as “the spirit of the planet”, they are actually alluding to its bioenergetic component, the life that exists and manifests itself on its surface as well as the interior of the Earth. This is why Gaia is soon conceived as the soul of the planet, a term which implies its life and dynamism. On the other hand, the spirit of the planet is the very consciousness that created all this and which represents the planet itself, being of a male nature. This observation is important in the context of understanding the laws of manifestation where everything is based upon polarity. So, the male spirit of a planet that creates the lines of force upon which it is formed corresponds to a feminine nature which is the soul of the planet that sustains and develops life.

Virtually overwhelmed by the depth of the impression I was experiencing, I was allowed to quietly and without disruption digest a transcendental vision. I appreciated the respect and understanding of the two men from Apellos. At the same time, my observation of those images, which turned quickly into contemplation, was neither passive nor only in a singular sense. Almost immediately, I felt that the very profound “contact” I was making was actually being reciprocated because I then perceived a mood similar to the one in which you are allowed to enter a home where you are well received.

CORRESPONDENCE OF SUBTLE PLANES INSIDE THE EARTH

I gradually emerged from the trance state and returned to the careful observation of the cross-section of the planet.

I understood that, even if from our point of view — metrically speaking and corresponding to the physical plane — the etheric plane within the Earth begins about 2,500 kilometers below the solid surface of the planet, the cavity inside is larger because the metrics of space there are in another dimension that is different from that of the physical plane.

The information I received telepathically was that the inner diameter of our planet, with regard to its subtle dimension, is roughly equivalent to the diameter of Venus which is very close to the diameter of the physical Earth.

The Apellos man explained to me that there is a lot of confusion among scientists because they say that entering the “cavity in the center of the Earth” is not supported by a complementary series of factors, laws, and measurements which would corroborate this idea. The laws, factors and measurements that are used in this instance, however, belong to the physical plane whereas, within the planet beyond a certain depth, we pass into the subtle etheric dimension and then into even more subtle dimensions where the type of measurements to the surface of the Earth can no longer be applied.

One of the concerns is that those who have been inside the Earth and talk represent the area as being very large which leads to an interpretation that the crust of the Earth would have to be very thin. While I was seeing this, I was shown that scientists’ criticism in this direction would indeed be valid if the metric at the surface of the planet, i.e. the metric of the physical plane, were used. Other energies and other realities, however, manifest themselves inside the Earth which are specific to the etheric plane and have another metric, another space and another manifestation of time. We cannot therefore simply take a reality that we have become accustomed to — for example, the one on the surface where we live — and just apply it anywhere, regardless of the conditions.

Entry into the etheric plane therefore requires our ability to adapt to the reality there and to the metric that applies. In connection with this, the calendar of the Mayans was shown to me. While their year was 260 days, a number pretty close to one year on the planet Venus, their calendar is not related to it; rather, it is actually based upon the duration of a year within the Earth whose inner cavity has an “etheric diameter” close to the physical diameter of Venus.* Since I had already been in Utklaha and met the family that descended from the ancient and very special civilization of the Mayans, I was not surprised that they were calculating their own calendar and correlating it with the one inside the Earth, just as today’s big companies, banks and hotels account for time zones in different regions of the planet.

The cavity inside the Earth has two important seasons. It was shown to me that even though there is not a real physical hole at the surface of our planet’s poles, the way that the Earth moves and the fact that the sun’s rays reach the north or south of the planet have an important influence because light and heat bring in energy and cause some changes in the eco-system inside the planet. Even though the brightness of the central Sun within our planet — which in fact represents the effect of the black hole in its center — is almost constant, the influence of the Sun in outer space causes some changes within our planet, bringing more rain or extending droughts, especially in the Northern and Southern regions. The central areas inside the Earth, however, have a certain temperature stability.

One of the extraordinary aspects that greatly impressed me was when it was shown to me that, at certain times, the physical and etheric planes are “aligned” in a manner that the beings within can see the nighttime stars, provided they are in certain areas. It is through this precise correlation of planes that it is possible.

The details of the section in the center of the planet now became clearer to me. I have especially noted a lot of lush rich vegetation and very high mountains which correspond vertically to the Pacific Ocean in particular. The central sun has a luminous light, and I could observe this by directly looking at it courtesy of the special headphone technology. The intensity of its light is about 55-60% compared with the light reaching the surface of the planet that comes from the Sun in cosmic space. It has also been transmitted to me that the inner sun's diameter is several hundred kilometers. Telepathically, I understand it to be about 700-800 kilometers.

From place to place, I was shown by a zoom effect various details, especially in terms of fauna, both on the soil and in the waters. I smiled, observing pterodactyls in flight and other dinosaurs, thinking that perhaps those who wrote or made films about the interior of the Earth did not do so unknowingly or perhaps just took some information that was long ago forgotten. In fact, such information is very real. Dinosaurs, for example, are exactly as we know them from museums or paleontology books, but I have nevertheless appreciated that they are somewhat smaller than the dinosaurs that roamed the surface of the planet in times long ago.

I have not seen, however, destruction or interventions in the harmony of Nature's play such as that which has been generated by the hand of man on the surface world. For example, there are no hydropower plants or other such industrial exploitation or pollution. Instead, there is a perfect communion between the human beings and the exceptional nature that exists there. It was also shown to me that there is absolutely no feature of our planet, either externally and internally, that is unintentional. Rather, the very aspects of manifestation are a direct and very clear decision of the male consciousness that gave birth to it. Both the specific position of the Earth in space and the amount of light or heat it receives from the Sun, as well as the other characteristics that it has such as density, mass, volume, etc., all are the manifestation of the will of His spirit which is determined from the center of the black hole.

For example, while watching those images, I telepathically received the knowledge that, from the very beginning of the formation of the planet, the subtle entity representing it decided that its surface would have a certain kind of life so that certain souls can come here to have the necessary physical experience. From time to time, the entity or consciousness of what is basically the Earth modifies the planet's integration parameters to enable the DNA to change according to the change that is desired. All of this, as it was transmitted to me through a profound telepathic understanding, is in perfect correlation with the whole universe where we are with the cosmic cycles and energies that surround us.

Next, the transition from the etheric plane to the astral plane was shown to me with reference to the visual cross-section of the Earth. The transition is about the diameter of Mars.*

[FOOTNOTE: * Earth's diameter is about 12,700 km, and the diameter of Mars is about 6,800 km, almost half of our planet.]

Of course, these analogies are given in order to present a clearer mental picture of the inner dimensions, but we must not forget that a different metric applies in each of these cases. For example, in the case of the diameter of the planet Venus, this analogy was correlated with the magnitude of the inner earth's dimensional capacity in the etheric plane. On the other hand, the analogy with the diameter of Mars is made to give an idea of the magnitude of the size of the astral area in the "inner" Earth. In other words, if we use the metric of the physical plane that we live in, the etheric dimension inside the Earth would have the approximate magnitude of Venus, and the astral dimension would be about the size of Mars.

I found it very interesting that, by reason of observing the cross-section of the Earth, the causal plane within the interior of our planet corresponds approximately to the size of the Moon, if we relate it to our metric from the physical plane. It has also been suggested that the size of the Moon is not at all accidental. Although I now know the real elements about the Moon, its origin, what it represents, and the reasons for its presence in the sky beside our planet, I did not have this knowledge at that particular time. The details of these issues will be presented in the next volume. What was explained to me, however, was that the spirit of our planet wanted to have a "mirror reflection" of itself and from the moment it appeared in the sky, that Moon was that "mirror" and especially so due to its strong feminine nature.

Thus, the information that comes to Earth is somehow controlled through the surface of the Moon. It is an extraordinary experience at a Macrocosmic and Celestial level that all these elements — both from the outside of the planet and from within it — are combined in the Earth. This experience has made me intuitively understand that the implications for our planet are in fact much deeper and more complex than just the mere formation of a celestial body or the appearance of life on its surface.

After this last presentation, the images were interrupted, and the two Apellos men, both of whom had carefully attended my “trip”, told me that it was their mandate to transmit what information that was relevant. I was, however, slightly puzzled, given the reason I had come there; that is, to receive some information about the missing crystal from the Occult Chamber in Iraq. Just when I was preparing to talk about it and bring up how my experience in observing the cross-section of the Earth could possibly solve this issue, the leader from Apellos told me that this could be accomplished by reason of the special helmet that I had been viewing with.

“This is our gift to you,” he said. “It will help you solve the mystery surrounding the ‘chair’ in Iraq and its crystal. Just grasp the nature of that crystal.” Upon hearing this, I felt a deeply emotional and extreme gratitude as I could not imagine that such a piece of advanced technology would be left with us for our use. That was a great gesture which made me cherish even more the friendship between us.”

Before saying goodbye and leaving the man from Apellos, he told me that there would be two more visits that I would make there, and this was according to the information he had received from the higher echelon, the wise men from Apellos. He revealed that these visits were meant to provide me with important information about the unknown past of Mankind so that it could be brought to public knowledge in a coherent and clear way. He also showed me exactly the days and times when those meetings would take place and commented that I would have a pleasant surprise at the first one.

CHAPTER TWO — THE FLAT EARTH DELUSION

I spent the next two days sorting out documents and files but mostly solving the communication and organizational aspects of the forthcoming expedition. Additionally, I investigated the database and other informational notes from the past to find references in connection with the portals of the “houses of cabal” mentioned by the Apellos man. The few holographic images that I had seen of these had impressed me. I wanted to know how things happened, both from the experiential perspective at the level of the Secret Service as well as to see the type of reaction of those involved in such special cases. I focused in particular on the German and American information because I suspected that it was not a mere accident that I had been given that example with the viewing device. There would surely be some information on this, and all I had to do was either look carefully or ask our overseas colleagues where it might be. Although I worked almost continuously, taking only short breaks for rest, I realized that it would not be possible to meet again with anyone from Apellos until I left through the third tunnel. I felt somewhat dissatisfied in this regard because I was very impatient to investigate the past of Mankind, even if some events and situations had been shown to me years ago in the holographic images of the Projection Hall.

According to my calculations, however, and if I managed my time efficiently by delegating some tasks to Lieutenant Nicoara, I had the opportunity to obtain extraordinary information corresponding to the invitation from Apellos. I did not quite understand the reason why the two meetings scheduled were not to take place until the expedition; and while this obviously put pressure on things, I suspected it was based upon a certain necessity, probably dictated by a “window of time” related to that activity.

A STRONG THEORY

Drawing on references to the “houses of cabal” that hide inter-dimensional gates, I came across an informative note I had not seen before that was floating amongst a few dozen others on my desk. Generally speaking, I prefer to work in electronic form or to wait for notes or files in digital format, but given the particular interest I had on the subject of dimensional portals, I decided to check everything I had on my desk, including an update of current events.

I do not know why and how, but the information I had found had been overlooked. After checking notes and information summaries, I found one titled “Flat Earth-References.” I had heard of such a “movement” that made some waves amongst people for many years, but I never imagined it would ever be worthy of becoming a subject for our department. The delusion of such an idea is obvious, especially for those who have good sense and personal experiences regarding our planet from the perspective of outer space.

A little confused as to whether or not I should read the few page summary on the Flat Earth Theory, I sought out Lieutenant Nicoara and asked him about it. He told me that the information came from the operational department of another SRI section* and had the status of a secondary circular. The Lieutenant specified that the only reason why this information came to our department was due to the abnormal “phenomenon” it had triggered in the world, but less so in our country where the number of “followers” was at a relatively low and reasonable rate.

[FOOTNOTE: * The initials SRI are an abbreviation for the Romanian Intelligence Service.]

The Flat Earth Theory seems to be the “gold rush” of our day, an aberration which, in my opinion, the only merit of which is that it can leave you speechless and even in a state of “shock” if we take into account the progress of contemporary science and the technology that Mankind currently has. I could understand that a lack of knowledge, amplified by bigotry and other obscure interests hundreds of years ago, could take hold of the minds of a relative few but for it to grow to the level of an international movement in the 21st Century was beyond rational belief. From a celestial perspective, I wondered if human stupidity could go beyond this level, but I was not very convinced of that prospect.

As it is, however, one of the tasks of the Secret Service to take into account even the most quirky phenomena, at least to the extent that such concerns the masses and their opinions. I did read the summary which very clearly exposed the main points of the problem, but it did not offer any conclusions.

“THE FLAT EARTH” — A SERIOUS DEGENERATION

That same evening, taking advantage of the fact that Cezar was free, I shared the Flat Earth issue with him, presenting it more as a social case rather than as a direction of study. Cezar laughed loudly, talking a little bit about the subject before the conversation then took a surprising turn towards some very interesting issues. He told me that, three to four years ago, this subject was introduced to him and discussed with other colleagues in the intelligence services as there were signs that this idea was trending towards becoming a common opinion. Out of respect to the reader, I would not normally include such a discussion in my book series. It requires only a little intelligence and minimal scientific training to understand that the arguments for such a theory amount to ignorance and fanaticism. Beyond that, however, there are some psychological implications that have been revealed by Cezar that seem to have some importance with regard to general knowledge and social experience.

The first point in the discussion with Cezar about the Flat Earth Theory concerned the great number of its followers.

“The mechanism by which the number of followers of this bizarre theory increases is related to the segregation of human beings,” Cezar said. “It is as if the population is divided into two distinct categories, but this separation is actually based upon the level of consciousness of each human being, and that is directly related to their vibrational frequency.”

“But,” I replied, “I cannot figure out what caused this outbreak by which more and more adhere to these ‘arguments’ without meaning. It’s more like a silly virus.”

“Such a major change in the thinking paradigm does not come, as might typically be understood, as being on the same wavelength with what is known in the world today. That is to say, such new ideas are not related to the knowledge of our times. This is an effective method to use because the idea of a flat Earth is strongly supported by occult factors, by those who are interested in seeing that things remain stagnant and do not progress. That is the best way to control: break people out of reality, make them dream of nonsense, support their fantasies, and encourage them to project. So it is that popular masses are controlled by imposing upon them that which someone else wants. The followers of the idea of the flat Earth, believing in it firmly, will seek to meet, gather and even separate themselves from others for they will regard others as fools who are deceived by lies. In other words, they will be convinced that they are the ones who “discovered” the truth.

Although this was sad to hear, the situation was, unfortunately, quite real. I spoke.

“Although I have the report under my eyes, I find it hard to believe it has arrived here. I have the feeling that this is an ugly dream, as if a part of the population of the world has willingly regressed several hundred years. That’s the feeling I have. It is incredible that the minds of today’s people can still be influenced to such an extent by delusions that not only defy decent intellect but also scientific reasoning, carrying everything right to fanaticism. Look at the results!”

I showed Cezar estimated figures and graphs.

“I know. We’ve talked to other colleagues about that,” he said.

“Your astonishment is justified precisely by the great difference in conceptualization and frequency of vibration that is already beginning to be felt amongst people. It is a reality that is accentuated by each passing day and cannot be ignored. It is part of the segregation I was telling you about. In principle, people are interacting with those who are evolving as well as those who prefer to remain in the purely materialistic, coarse, or involuntary mind-set. Those in the first category refine themselves, realize the changes that occur on Earth, and experience certain emotional states and specific sensations. That is why it is incredible that some think in a medieval mind-set, such as the followers of the Flat Earth Theory.”

Cezar saw the wonder on my face and rushed to confirm what he said once more.

“Yes. I do not exaggerate. It is a return to the Middle Ages because these people cannot evolve; and instead, return to an older state of consciousness that is closer to their true level of consciousness.”

“Why cannot they evolve?” I asked, amazed.

I knew the answer, of course, but it was always a pleasure to capture Cezar’s explanations. In addition, there could always be a new element that would enrich my knowledge.

“Because they have no affinity with the current state of things and with the higher vibrational frequency of the Earth, a feature that is increasing more and more.”

“For the followers of the Flat Earth Theory, their comfort lies in the fanaticism with which these primitive ideas are sustained as free spirit and thinking are blocked. So was it also during the Inquisition: a set of stupid and false conceptions were raised to the rank of law, and any violation of them was enforced.”

As I thought about all this, I was hoping I was wrong.

“Are we back in the Middle Ages? History raises waves of conceptions that sweep across extremes. Those in antiquity already knew that the Earth is round, but the situation deteriorated in the Middle Ages.* Then there was the modern scientific revival, but is this just so we can now backslide into medieval retrogression?” (see footnote on next page)

[FOOTNOTE: * The author is undoubtedly referring to the knowledge shared by Pythagoras and Aristotle, both of whom asserted that the Earth is round, as well as the demonstration made by Eratosthenes in ancient Alexandria.]

Cezar answered calmly:

“We do not; but for that segment of the population that has regressed: yes. There are several elements that contribute to this. There is the indignation with which the followers of the Flat Earth Theory cling to their idea, their refusal to think logically or rationally based upon real arguments and evidence, and there is also the denial of evidence — justifying their position fraudulently — and, in general, a kind of proselytism that masks fanaticism.

PSYCHOLOGY OF THE “FLAT EARTH”

We have noticed then that whenever fanaticism has prevailed, society faced a lack of discernment and a limitation of individual freedom. Cezar offered me an example to better explain how it is possible to reach this predicament in the context of a civilization that is relatively developed.

“The phenomenon is the same as in quantum physics. If there is enough energy, an electron can make a leap into a ‘higher’ orbit. If there is not enough energy, then it can remain on a slightly higher level and be relatively stable; but at some point, the surplus energy is emitted as a photon and the electron returns to where it started, in the orbit it was originally found. In quantum physics, this is the fundamental orbit of the electron. In other words, the electrons with these characteristics turn back to the level at which they have a safe trajectory.”

I was on topic and chimed in.

“I know that, throughout the history of humanity, the idea with the Flat Earth has long existed in a few religions. Modern astronomy has since developed extensively. The planets Uranus, Neptune, and Pluto have only been known for about two hundred years. In this sense, the Flat Earth Theory is not really very old and its memory is still fresh. Maybe that's why some of humanity returns to what it knew before."

"This is also another factor," Cezar admitted. "In any case, human society is changing from 'having' to 'feeling.' That is, the sense of possession, egotism, competition, and violence tends to be gradually replaced by pure and positive emotions and feelings of which love, altruism and compassion are fundamental."

I was somewhat skeptical.

"This is hard to believe as almost all of us see the proliferation of these negative manifestations."

"At first sight, it probably seems so. Remember, however, that most of the population on Earth is uneducated and 'resorted' to this illusion of competition, money, business, and lack of spirituality. The great number of human beings who indulge in this dream tips the balance against those who are looking for a pure life with a definite meaning who are guided only by spiritual values. Here is the segregation we are talking about."

Cezar, in fact, wanted to say that every man is invited to take part in the great spiritual transformation of Mankind and our planet, to ask with aspiration and dignity that his life be a germ of light, spirituality, and hope for a bright future to which we can have access. This is a superb ideal but followed by too few to date.

SPACE AND TIME IN THE PHYSICAL AND SUBTLE PLANES

Consider, for example, the concept of the "FlatEarth". I was thinking that, by reason of scientific and technological progress thus far, such an idea — both from a conceptual point of view and from an existential reality — should have been considered, at most, a joke. It seems, however that, due to its multiple nuances, the problem was not that simple. Cezar gave me a much deeper perspective on this issue.

"The adherents of this theory confuse a certain kind of subtle perception with physical reality," he explained. "There are indeed accounts of Oriental mythology concerning the 'Flat Earth' being supported on the back of four elephants, turtles, or even diamonds. But, you have this vision with time and space having the same ‘value’. The physical world, that is, our world, is characterized by three spatial dimensions and, apparently, a separate one of time. We can talk about this as: 3-D (space) + 1 (time). It is a ‘three-dimensional’ world if we are only talking about spatial dimensions. This situation is so because we are moving through space using time, but you already know that, in reality, and according to the laws of relativity, space and time ‘work’ together. If you perceive them as inseparable, then the spatial curvature does not matter to you, such as the curvature of the Earth as a sphere. This is what Oriental sages perceived when, traditionally, the Earth was represented as ‘flat’. Stretched like a plate or as round as a sphere, it was the same for them except that the ‘flat’ option was probably easier to represent.”

I thought this was hard to understand for those who did not have the necessary subtle experience. Such a reality cannot be properly integrated into the physical plane because it is superior to it. The way the problem was posed was also new to me. Anticipating a little, Cezar’s subsequent explanations would be confirmed by what I was going to see on the holographic screen during the next two encounters with the man from Apellos. Cezar continued explaining to me.

“Suppose, for example, that you have a lucid dream or consciously decided to go from the Earth to the Moon without traversing the space that is normally between them in the physical plane, just as if you were walking from one garden to another. And so on would you go, from the Earth to the Sun, the Sun to Saturn and so on, between different heavenly bodies, but still within a certain limit, usually within our galaxy. Practically speaking, you do not have any ‘empty space’ between these heavenly bodies. If you then return from the astral plane to the etheric plane, you notice the difference because you cannot do the same and even less so in the physical plane.”

“What do you mean by ‘there is no empty space between these heavenly bodies’?” I asked. “How then are they?”

“Laws take other forms in the higher planes. You cannot claim to understand the phenomena that exist there by simply applying the physical laws that govern the material plane. The differences are too great. In the astral, the vibrational frequency of a thing, a being, or a phenomenon is very important. It's not like here where something miserable can stand next to something clean or when a liar can deceive a lot of honest people. In that realm, you can only be in the 'space' and company that match with your own personal vibrational frequency. You cannot deceive as is so common in the physical plane; and this is to say that you cannot be where you do not deserve."

"And if I still want to go higher than my vibrational frequency, what happens?"

"You have access to the lower frequencies below you but not to those that are beyond your reach. Even assuming that you try this, the space you see is a blur, even becoming opaque. This gives the feeling that things are linked or 'tied together' in some way with no space to separate them."

"Well then, what is the connection with space and time? Are they are unified or not?"

"The connection is that if you look from the higher to the lower levels, there is no space between the bodies because space and time are united, but when you return to the physical plane and take things from the perspective of the current system of thinking, that is 3-D and time, then even the calculations of mathematics show that the most effective form for matter to be structured is spherical because there is no other method that is suitable. This is to say that no other model would provide an explanation with regard to the nature of the physical universe. Therefore, a rectangular disk or rectangular plate does not suitably fit the image of the Earth in this plane as they are neither recognizable or adaptable with regard to macrocosmic laws. Those who try to credit the idea of the "Flat Earth" lack the capacity of subtle observation and then struggle to inject there idea into the physical plane at all costs, resorting to all sorts of 'explanations' and 'observations' that can bend the weak and ignorant who then become confused and full of doubts."

I then brought up the point that when matter is in a vacuum, even water tends to take a spherical form when there is not any external intervention. "Yes," said Cezar. "This is precisely the case with the large-scale telluric bodies in the cosmic void. There is, however, a minimum limit before they can become spherical. For example, planetoids need to be about 500 kilometers in diameter before gravity and other types of forces are strong enough to structure the spherical material.”

Cezar also told me that the followers of this bizarre Flat Earth movement adopted this variant because they cannot “jump” from the physical plane (3-D) to the etheric plan (4-D), all of which implies a unitary vision of space and time.* When you cannot do this, you “condense” into three dimensions and even lower than that.

[FOOTNOTE: * Einstein’s Special Theory of Relativity applies right here in the physical plane: it replaces the separation between space and time within the space-time continuum in 4-D (Minkowski space).]

He explained this to me in the following way. The physical plane is characterized by three spatial dimensions which are rendered graphically, generally speaking, through the three-dimensional axle system: x , y , z . But, when we add time as a variable to this axle system, the three axes are no longer found in the classical three-dimensional system x , y , z .

O-X,Y,Z SYSTEM OF REFERENCE

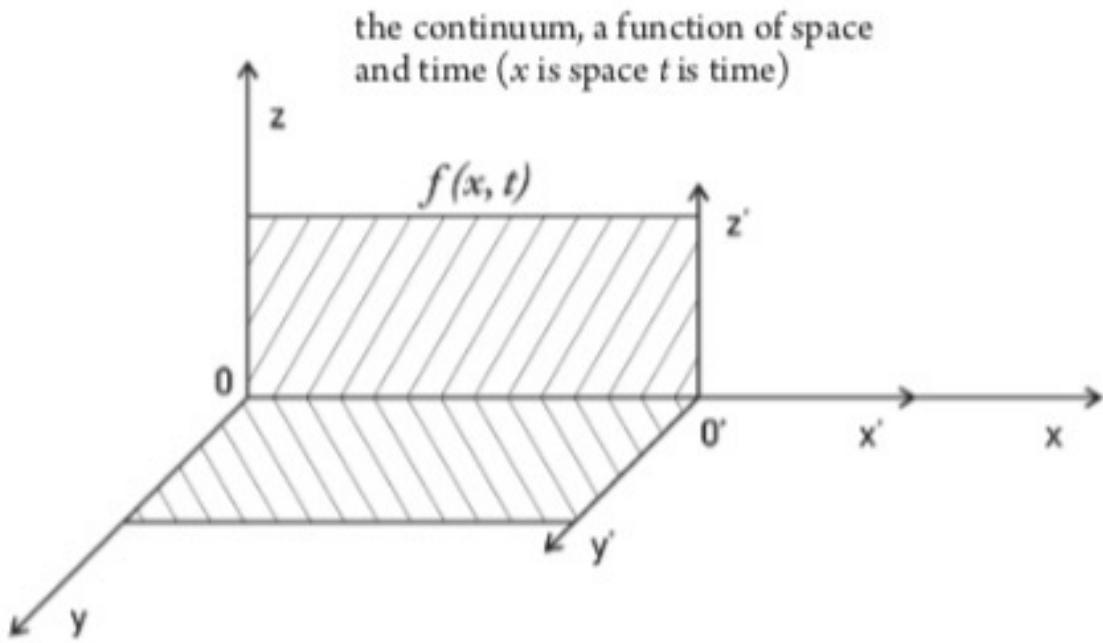

To make this explanation easier, I’ll show the motion only on the $0x$ axis, because it’s easier to track.

“When we talk about the space-time continuum, you really have the feeling that things are somewhat flat, being a ‘continuum’,” Cezar went on to explain. “This is not about volume. It is like a wide strip of paper, and the astrophysical representations also show this continuum as being, in fact, bi-dimensional, as a ‘net’.”

REPRESENTATION OF THE SPACE-TIME CONTINUUM (IN THE PARTICULAR CASE OF THE OX AXIS)

“This, however, is only for our ease of understanding because things do not actually exist in this way; rather, it is just a notation or a convention of physics. The point is that if you cannot embrace this concept and cannot ‘digest’ it intuitively in your mind, then you go back to what you know you have; that is, something that is easier to understand and belongs to the past.”

BY A LARGE BODY (SUCH AS A PLANET, ETC.)

“Very well,” I said, “then they will return to 3-D, that is, to the physical plane.”

“Not at all,” replied Cezar. “For us, 3-D clearly represents three spatial dimensions. We move from 3-D to 4-D considering that ‘time’ exists in a unitary way with ‘space,’ i.e. 3-D + 1-D. On the other hand, the followers of the Flat Earth Theory say that they do the same, but if we analyze their idea with the Flat Earth as a ‘sheet’, 3-D is not actually three spatial dimensions, but only two, to which they add time, i.e. 2-D + 1-D. Their impression is that there are three dimensions, but in fact, they only refer to two spatial dimensions because the third, that is height, is negligible in relation to the other two dimensions. It is a significant regression.”

“That’s why you said we cannot apply situations from the superior planes to this world. However, even if the idea of a ‘Flat Earth’ is more of a 2-D reality or something located between 2-D and 3-D, those who express it and believe it with so much conviction live in 3-D physical reality. That cannot be denied.”

“No doubt, but here you tend to state things in black and white. In reality, there are, as everywhere, transitional areas. In the case of those who move to the 4-D space-time continuum, that is, those who can be said to ascend in some way, the process is not yet definitive and we can associate it mentally with a kind of 3.5-D. This, of course, is a simplistic explanation at this time, but at least it has the merit of being intuitive, and yet it provides an incipient basis for understanding what the difference between 3-D and 4-D really means.

The ‘intermediary’ numbers I have given you that are not natural — that is, between 2-D and 3-D or between 3-D and 4-D — only suggest a condition, a level of consciousness that some people can reach at some point. On the other hand, in the case of those who subscribe to the Flat Earth Theory, we can talk about a kind of 2.5-D; but for them, the transition is inferior and, this fact itself is somewhat dramatic because the decline for some is quite great, especially from a moral and psychological point of view as can easily be seen from a brief analysis of the global situation. So, they come back to where they feel safe, at a level that allows their individual consciousness to manifest, and this level is very rough.”

POPULATION SEGREGATION

Listening to Cezar, I almost slipped into philosophical reflection because I could not accept the reality of the times we live in. For example, how can such divergent attitudes, such as atrocious evil and sublime good, coexist side by side on the same plane? I raised this issue in my discussion with Cezar.

“It’s possible in the physical plane. In recent years, however, we are in a period of transition to the etheric superior plane, 4-D, and even though such actions and attitudes may still exist here in the physical world, it is appropriate for the situation at hand because such actions and attitudes are appearing faster and firmer. Currently, many people are capable of reprehensible, coarse and illogical actions as a result of the decrease in personal vibrational frequency. It is like a sort of compression of individual consciousness because it resists the rise of energy, the amplification of the general vibrational frequency of our planet. That is why the followers of this bizarre theory in the physical plane, who say that the Earth is actually flat, want subconsciously to separate themselves from high frequencies, precisely in order to preserve the frequency of vibration that suits them and with which they are accustomed. This results in a segregation of the population.* It is a ‘contraction’ of consciousness, a separation; and that is why it is a decadence: because they have so far evolved into orbits of existence which are unstable and cannot be maintained at that level.

[FOOTNOTE: * In Volume 3, The Mystery of Egypt - The First Tunnel, 2007, p. 248, there is a passage in which Cezar makes a similar comment about the law of affinity and the segregation of values in society. “(...) part of the immediate future destiny of Mankind is determined by the lack of unity of people and their incredible opacity in the perception of what is good, positive, authentic and valuable. Many times, this attitude degenerates into a foolish stupidity,” he explained to me at that time. “Those who are misleading, dogmatic and aberrant in their opinions, rejecting many issues of common sense or lacking a profoundly spiritual side that could turn many things into goodness, are not even open to dialogue. In a sense, they imagine they are the only ones that can do anything. In fact, they cannot do anything from a practical point of view, but they still claim to be the only holders of truth.”

To the contrary, I asked Cezar, “Okay; but then why do not all the forces unite to change the balance of evil for the better?”

“Do not forget that under no circumstances can evil unite with good. That has always been the case. The one who is evil will flee from what is good, and for this reason the union you suggest cannot be achieved. You can only realize the union of good and good because people who are mutually oriented ‘speak the same language’. Unity can only be achieved between those people who have affinities that are close on a mental, emotional and spiritual level. You cannot, for example, have a very bad friend if you are good because that friendship cannot stand. Where there are no affinities, it is impossible to unite with unity, brotherhood or sympathy.”]

I reflected a little before sharing my own observations.

“Indeed. People are grouped by affinities. We also see good, altruistic and active organizations in a superior way but also many that are bad and even destructive. People are ‘distributed’ according to the tendencies that each of them manifests. What amazes me very much is how they all manage to be together in the same space. It is clear that the physical plane manifests from this perspective, but at the same time, it represents a great ‘risk’ for evolution.”

“But, it can also be a great chance for it if you do the right thing and you understand your experiences correctly,” Cezar said. “It is true, however, with the groupings that observe and resonate at the same type of vibration: people gather together according to affinities because this is a universal law. For example, consider those who have reached 4-D or close to it because there are such people who have a fairly broad and fair understanding of the world. They attract those who have the same aspirations around them, and they are gradually elevating themselves, listening to and even practicing certain spiritual techniques that are shown to them until they themselves reach the 4-D level. The others who have ‘come down’ have reached the level of fanaticism which is very well known as the ‘medieval area’ with its specific representations: religious conceptions of the world and its existence. They consider us to ‘lost’ because ‘we do not see the truth’. But, this ‘truth’ is their truth, a medieval relic embedded in the inability to understand things correctly. It is also a common sense problem.”

“It’s the kind of reaction that happens with those who cannot even listen to explanations because the difference in vibrational frequency is considerable,” I said. “Whatever you say, anything you show or prove is rejected de facto and a priori. Yes; it’s amazing where human stupidity can go.”

“Not just stupidity,” Cezar said, “but ignorance, too, for they often complement each other. For example, in the case of those who adhere to such ideas and mentalities that correspond to the Middle Ages, you can notice that they do not know the basic principles of quantum physics, all of which leads to an understanding of how energy is transmitted at such a level. Instead, they sometimes invoke those principles and bring them into question from a safe and authoritative position, but the vibrational frequency of their consciousness does not allow them to understand the quantum realities. Further, they imagine electrons as particles of matter, continuing to manifest their skepticism about quantum fields and their objective reality. In other words, they want to ‘solve’ the quantum world through the knowledge and notions of the physical plane, but that’s like trying to put a huge French key through the eye of a needle. Their lack of knowledge of what energy means forces them to mechanically revert to the principles of classical Newtonian mechanics, about four hundred years old.”

I spoke thoughtfully.

“That could be dangerous in the future. If more and more people are looking for this ‘safe’ thinking, that could lead to some sort of social schism; not necessarily conflict between countries, but rather social segregation, just as you said.”

“Yes, it could. Let us hope, however, that it will not be so,” Cezar replied with a sad smile on his face.

FANATICISM AND IGNORANCE

We were both silent for a while, and then I spoke.

“From the report, I noticed their lack of reason and knowledge but especially their fanaticism. It seems that any discussion is doomed to failure precisely because of the fanaticism that manifests and is routinely encountered in those with poor intellectual training and suffering from a lack of general culture. They are able to find explanations for any evidence or answer that contradicts their theory, but they are often hilarious or simply fanciful. In fact, nothing can be said to them because they consider from the beginning that all the ideas and arguments relating to Earth, other than those supported by them, are erroneous. For them, the fact that the Earth is flat seems to be an axiom that cannot be countered or discussed.”

Cezar was caught up in the subject, and he responded clearly to me.

“Some time ago, we were talking to someone in our echelon about this subject, but we were more interested in the psychological factor of the problem. The Major told me that the followers of the Flat Earth Theory go so far as to assert that they know nothing of sciences such as astronomy, physics or biology, yet they tell the whole world with the utmost certainty that the idea of a spherical Earth is completely false and that all Mankind must believe their word. This is like saying, ‘I do not know Chinese, but I certainly tell you it does not exist.’ Meanwhile, however, a billion and a half people speak Chinese. They use all sorts of ‘experiments’ and ‘demonstrations’ which can divert their audience, for those less well prepared or even angry, from the values of common sense. And, when faced with indisputable evidence, they say they it is actually fake. You cannot reach an understanding with such people because they are an expression of fanaticism. In a way, it is dramatic to see such thinking behavior. They do not know, do not document, do not read, nor seek to understand. The only thing they do is postulate from the very beginning that everything is one great scam.”

“Whose scam?” I asked.

“They say it is all of the decision-makers and important institutions of the world who ‘conspire’ to make people think that the Earth is round,” Cezar said ironically. “According to the Flat Earth Theory, scientists, NASA, ESA, and other research institutions all seem to have talked to each other in order to present to the world false evidence that the Earth is round. It is not clear why NASA would do this, but the followers of the Flat Earth Theory know better and say for sure that this is the case.”

“Now, considering the problem more seriously, much of this fanaticism comes from the interdisciplinary manner in which science develops. Many of the results of modern science have emerged from the continuous ‘movement’ or active way in which it has evolved, even though it has many bugs, especially from a conceptual point of view. To give you a better idea, consider the idea of a wheel with spokes rotating very quickly and to the point where you do not see its spokes. At some point, there is an alteration of the image that gives you the impression that the spokes are just three or four. Moreover, there is also an aspect when you feel that the wheel is spinning in reverse, as if it were going backward. It is a dynamic aspect, and while it is obvious that it is not real, it appears as if it is real. Therefore, it is an illusion; but for the followers of the Flat Earth Theory and their mentality, this becomes a big problem. They do not take into account of the fact that such illusion is a result of the eye not being able to properly discern the movement due to the high speed of rotation, but they say that this movement cannot be seen because it actually does not exist.”

Somehow, I was overwhelmed by what I heard, but I nevertheless spoke.

“If this unfortunate idea of a flat Earth continues to be followed, I would expect that their way of thinking, which is essentially aberrant and fanatical, would be extended to many other phenomena, both in the physical and abnormal realms. As far as I understand, they go on the general theory of global conspiracy wherein everything is a conspiracy that is meant to make us think in a certain way, but they are the only ones who know the truth and tell it.”

“Such phenomena is regrettable and even worrisome, but it is likely to grow in the coming years,” Cezar said. “Indeed. It is true that deviants can believe in and advocate those who adhere to this false conception.

“If you were to take some of them to the International Space Station or a cosmic shuttle in orbit around the planet, they will say exactly what they say about the tens of thousands of photographs that were made in cosmic space: that this was an ‘arrangement’ made to make them appear stupid, that everything is actually a fake and that nothing of what they see in connection with our planet being spherical is true; or that it is just an optical illusion caused by camera lenses or photographers.”

“Still, how is it possible for the rest of the population to ‘swallow’ such nonsense?” I asked, annoyed, indirectly citing the cellular perception and sensitivity as well as the individual discernment that every human being in the present society should have.

“This is possible due to lack of education and individual training. People simply do not know, do not study, and lack general culture. Also lacking guidance and common sense in the interpretation of such things, they are at the hands of anyone who tells them that something is so or different. Here too, the education system contributes a lot, tending to become somewhat unidirectional with only certain things being taught with regard to their own personal skill-set. Nearly all other sciences or life-enhancing aspects that could give a much wider and pertinent view of life are neglected. Because of this, the majority of the human population on the planet is helpless and, in a way, it makes them ‘prey’ to strange influences. What should be the discernment factor of those who have no knowledge of or have never heard of the physical laws of matter, energy, the cosmos, or the multitude of phenomena that are happening in the world? They live only within the very narrow range of small needs and daily satisfactions.”

“This represents a great decline for our society,” I said sadly.

“It is true, but we must see this decline also from the perspective of the transformations that come. Part of humanity is evolving. That is indisputable. There are beings who have refinement in thought, who are intelligent and have good sense, and who aspire to superior consciousness so as to pass through the specific vibrational frequency from 3-D to 4-D. Those who are unable to achieve this will automatically descend to a lower level, i.e. to 2-D, because maintaining 3-D is difficult due to powerful disturbing forces.”

DRAMATIC INVOLUTION FROM 3-D TO 2-D

At this point in the discussion, I wanted to clarify one more aspect because I was not sure that I understood the problem that I had raised a little earlier. Cezar clearly explained that this ‘dimensional’ representation, i.e., 2-D, 3-D, 4-D and so on, is one of the methods used to designate the perception or degree of consciousness of the surrounding reality.

“In other words,” I said, “to understand within the perspective of the 3-D system, time is considered as a separate variable.”

“Exactly. On the other hand, in the 4-D system, time is an integral part of the coordinate system that represents this reality. Understanding time as being ‘fused’ with space — as is the case in 4-D — requires a higher degree of consciousness.”

“So what is time in 4-D?” I asked, a little confused.

“In 4-D, space and time will form a stand-alone reality. Then, we no longer have $x + t$, $y + t$, and $z + t$, representing a three-axis system, plus the movement in time; but we have a permanent collaboration between x and t , y and t , and z and t . They seem to constantly correlate, as if to say: xt , yt , zt , as if to be united permanently. Do you understand?”

“And, one should not confuse $x + t$, $y + t$ and $z + t$ with addition nor xt , yt and zt with multiplication because we are using different units of measure,” I said thoughtfully.

“Obviously. They are just a way of rendering features in the absence of better notations. But, if you want, we can better consider $0xyz + t$ in the case of 3-D and $0zyzt$ in the case of 4-D.”

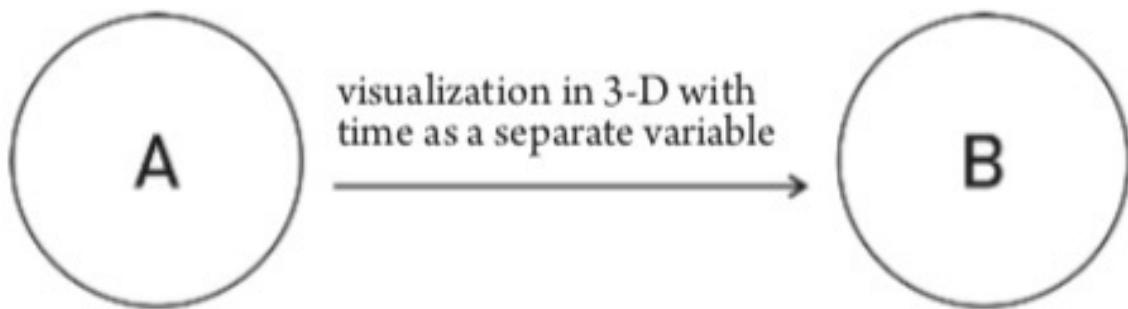

Cezar then looked through the room for a few moments, searching for something with which to give me a good example. He saw a small metal ball on his desk and said, “Here is a ball. Do you admit to it being part of three-dimensional space?”

“It can be represented by a three-axis system,” I nodded.

“Now, look at how we add time as the fourth dimension when we move the ball from one point to another. I move the ball from here to here and you see this as a linear motion, like a thread.”

MOVING A SPHERE IN TIME (T) FROM POINT A TO POINT B

“All right. I get it. And how would this move in 4-D?”

“Then, instead of seeing a moving sphere, you actually see a ‘bar’. This is actually the four-dimensional plane; that is, a unification between space and time. For those who have diverged away from and out of 3-D, like the followers of the Flat Earth Theory, time is not even taken into account because it is interpreted as a mere ‘quantity’ that measures an event. For them, time is just a measurable quantity which is not perceived as a very subtle energy in relation to the superior aspects of Creation.”

“If so, then those who adhere to this Flat Earth Theory are returning to the mechanical theories of classical physics, that is to say, Newtonian physics,” I commented, drawing the natural conclusion.

THE MOTION OF THE SPHERE OVER TIME IN THE FOURTH DIMENSION (4-D) CREATES A KIND OF TUBE, LIKE A “CANE” visualization in 4-D in which time creates new forms that are visible as a whole

“Newton revolutionized physics, explaining gravitational attraction and many other phenomena, but the followers of the Flat Earth Theory do not even accept the existence of gravity so they actually descend more and more, over time, to the ‘flat’ concepts of the Middle Ages.”

What I heard was almost unbelievable but unfortunately true, and the report I had read was testimony to that.

“It is interesting, however, that this drama of humanity — because it is still is a drama that will continue this way for decades — has its need, and you will see this after you’ve progressed quite a bit,” Cezar continued.

“Otherwise, the segregation of human beings would not occur. The Earth would be virtually sick because nothing would be done to get it out of the numbness of a perpetual mire in which different categories of people are combined at relatively close frequencies. Those who want to know and learn would have no conditions or sufficient momentum to evolve due to all kinds of pressures that come from others. It would be like collective suffocation.”

What he was saying was overlapping with the concept of raising the vibrational frequency of the planet. The Earth is preparing to activate its superior dimensions, first of which is the rise to the subtle field characteristics of the etheric dimension of 4-D. In the meantime, “Old Earth” in the third dimension still remains with its limitations and vicissitudes.

This segregation of vibrational frequencies also inexorably attracts human beings because some of them will aspire to spiritual evolution while others, most of them, will prefer to stay with what they already know; that is, to live on Earth in the 3-D physical plane.

This process is already in progress and will be amplified more and more towards 2020-2025 when some galactic energy ‘pulses’ will take place that will have profound effects on human consciousness.

This, however, being primarily a matter of choice, which in turn is based upon individual inward tendencies, will not be easy for many human beings to deal with in order to choose another life that is bright and pure. Instead, they will prefer to remain in their own sphere of reference and low resonance sensations because this comfort zone is better suited to their inner structure.

Cezar then strongly punctuated his point.

“With this severe segregation, there will be a massive gap between frequencies so that those who want to harden will harden even more; and the others who are moving forward will find the opportunity to easily distance themselves because the difference in consciousness between the two factions will increase significantly.”

“Yes. It makes sense,” I said.

“Those who will ascend in 4-D will be well prepared at some point and will be quite stable to descend later and try to help those in 3-D or below. This will all depend upon the choices and decisions of those there.”

“From what you say, I see two clear tendencies: the hardening and even the deepening of this hardening of a large part of the population, of which the followers of the Flat Earth Theory are a good example; and the freedom of other people to evolve and break away more easily from the rest of involuted humanity.”

Cezar nodded his head, approving. Then, after a few moments, he spoke again.

“Let’s hope there will be enough of those in the second category.”

I did not insist on this last reply because it was already very late. Generally speaking, I now had a clear idea of what this “Flat Earth phenomenon” represents with regard to correctly understanding the situations we are likely to face in the years to come.

I went to my room to rest because two American team members would be arriving the very next day, and this would involve some preparations that had to be made before the expedition. Several briefings were needed as well as preparing accommodations for two American officers to visit the Projection Hall.

It turned out, however, that they had already done their homework; so the talks were very productive, expeditious and efficient. As an exchange of information, they brought several evidentiary documents and the discussions derived from these were very interesting; so, with the approval of Cezar, I have decided to present in this book, in summary format, some pieces of interest from the content of those discussions.

CHAPTER THREE — IMPORTANT CORRECTIONS

The two officers sent by the Pentagon were young, professionally trained and agreeable. Not all of those with whom we have been dealing with in the past with regard to expeditions have possessed such qualities. In fact, in such situations there have sometimes even been animosities and hidden intentions or thoughts on their behalf, but this depends upon the people involved. The Pentagon's secret orders are never absent; for in a way, it's like going fishing. "If one gets caught, then it's good; if not, we are still trying." It is important, however, to what degree they are influenced and dominated by those who sent them as the nature of human beings is different.

These American officers proved to be a pleasant presence, and the conversations with them went very well. There were two rounds of talks, the first focusing on technical elements, and the second being related to information and documentation that the Pentagon officials wanted from us.

It was a procedure that worked on the basis of sincerity and fairness, a sort of "barter" that was mutually beneficial for each of the parties involved, both the Romanian and the Americans. While we have had access to the very advanced technology of the secret complex in Bucegi, they have offered us other types of immediate advantages in return for being allowed study the artifacts and the other elements that are there. Politics were also involved but only as an outward form of things. This exchange, however, does have its limitations, being structured by General Obadea on ethical and moral principles which are still in force today.

The basic rule was that the nature of the information they were to request would be neutral, not to be used for onerous purposes or to exploit or harm other nations. Things have worked well since 2010; that is, since the protocol was implemented. This has resulted in a mutual trust which has led to a very good and close cooperation in this direction. This does not mean that everything was “milk and honey” but we believe that the present state of things is an example of how to work in a balanced and honest manner, even though the “object” of common interest — the secret complex in the Bucegi Mountains — is extremely important and delicate for all Mankind.

ANTEDILUVIAN HISTORY

During the briefings and discussions that took place before expeditions or other types of cooperation, it was usually Lieutenant Nicoara and myself who participated on the Romanian side, but Cezar attended this time because it involved the exchange of information at the highest level of security. The general explanations given here are to show the context in which the discussions turned to the direction of Mankind’s history, all as a result of details requested by the American side. It is not necessary to insist upon mentioning them, but they have led to an excellent presentation of historical realities which Cezar has summarized.

At that time, I did not know about these aspects as I had not had time to ask about them. That is why I was much more interested in listening to and understanding the true nature of some important events in the past of Mankind, the ordinary historical description of which has either been truncated or modified by the prism of understanding of the people from that time. In reality, as I was going to find out, the historical events to which I will refer have to be addressed in another form and with other connotations than those that have been handed down to us from history, transmitted from the darkness of those times.

A significant part of that discussion, more than half of it, I do not yet have permission to report on. From what remains, I have summarized some elements that I consider important, especially since they correlate with what I myself would soon find out, learning much of the unknown history of Man-kind in summary form.

The discussion I am referring to took place in the second round of talks with the two American officers. It was a free, open and formal discussion. In short, the question arose concerning artifacts discovered by the U.S. military in Afghanistan and also in another area in the Far East. The two officers presented a written report and several photographs depicting a rather strange object. We were told of its amazing characteristics which were described to us in some detail. The Americans wanted some past information about the place where the artifact was found and an in-depth view of the topography of the soil, a request which could only be fulfilled by accessing either the dome in the Projection Hall* or the “Time Machine” in the Occult Chamber in Egypt.

[FOOTNOTE: * The book Transylvanian Sunrise, Chapter 5, discusses a device in the Projection Hall beneath the Romanian Sphinx by which one can view historical events.]

[FOOTNOTE:  See Volume 3, The Mystery of Egypt - The First Tunnel, Chapter 4, which discusses a “time machine” that will enable the viewer to travel in time with their mind but not the body.]

They also wanted information about the past populations who had lived in those places. As I am not allowed to give details of all this, I will confine myself to saying that the discussion veered off quite a bit with regard to the distant past of Mankind which Cezar presented and explained in a novel way. In two of the issues raised, Cezar could not answer on the spot as a special inquiry was required, but he answered the other questions that had been asked, at least for the most part. At one point, in direct connection with some investigations they themselves had made, the two American officers raised the issue of the Flood in the Middle East region. They wanted to clarify rescue efforts that had taken place for the people who lived there at that time. As Cezar had studied that time period, he responded immediately.

“If we consider the Bible and how the Flood is presented in the text, it follows that all the Earth was covered with water. We need to consider, however, how the inhabitants of that time understood what the Earth to be like. To them, there were no other continents. The area in which they lived and what was around them was the entire world.”

One of the Americans, the younger one, then spoke to make a point.

“The biblical flood does not seem to be the only one in the history of humanity. There are other traditions and populations that speak of a devastating flood but in different parts of the world, including our continent.”

“That’s how it is. Various populations have experienced such a phenomenon in different periods of history and in different areas around the globe. But to say that the entire surface of the planet was covered by water at the time of the biblical flood is a mistake. Things did not happen like this. Over time, there were vast territories and even entire continents that fell under water, burying civilizations. There is, for example: Mu, much of Lemuria, and especially Atlantis.”

In the holographic images of the Projection Hall, I had seen many things about the Flood. This, however, had occurred many years prior, and they were very few in number, presented in the format of a very brief summary amongst many other events in the history of the Earth. For example, I had seen large areas covered by water, starting from old Cappadocia (central Turkey on today’s maps) and extending down to Syria and Israel with a flood of water destroying everything in its path, like a tsunami. I could no longer distinguish the shore of the Mediterranean from the land. The layer of water that flooded the soil, however, was not very deep. The landscape seemed desolate: an endless stretch of water with a few rare trees above the water or an isolated temple that had resisted the diluvian forces. This was largely due to the fact that there were no tall buildings as most of the buildings then were small and precarious, made of clay and stones.

I did not, however, see the source of the Flood nor other implications related to it, but I did not doubt such existed.

SPECIFICS ABOUT THE BIBLICAL FLOOD

Seeing that the discussion had quieted on this subject, the time seemed right to clarify a few unknowns in this regard, so I came up with a question.

“How is the Flood described in the Bible?” I asked.

“The Flood in the Bible is the same as the Sumerian description of the evolution of the society over the past thousand years,” Cezar replied.

“When the cataclysm took place, it was desired to preserve the fauna and flora in the area which was covered in water. Noah’s Ark was not so great and not all animal species were taken in it. The boat was indeed built, and Noah and his family even took on board a few pairs of animals but relatively few in relation to what was written. His ark played the role of a necessary “double” or backup on the ground. The real preservation and subsequent resurgence of fauna came from space.”

Seeing the stunned faces of the two American officers, Cezar continued.

“At that level, the problem was put in another way. There was a fairly large ‘library’ full of containers containing DNA samples of living creatures from Asia and Africa. Those who wrote the Bible could not explain this scientifically so they stated that Noah took pairs of all animal species on his ship. In fact, the taking of DNA samples was done by beings from another stellar system who were considered to be ‘gods’ on Earth.”

“They had a virtual biological data bank,” I said, “but what was the point with the Noah episode?”

“It was the evolution of humanity, of its own destiny,” Cezar replied. “Help was given, but people had to build their own future. Their contribution was necessary as it was part of their destiny. Even if everything was well established and preserved in the DNA samples of living creatures, the process of ‘rebirth’ of the fauna was to be initiated by humans as a ‘backup’ on Earth. The recovery of animal species lasted several decades after the Flood. Humanity, of course, was helped by an extraterrestrial civilization, but that took a long time.”

The two American officers did not seem too convinced. One of them then asked a question.

“But why did they do that? The fauna and flora were rebuilding themselves after the Flood. It would have taken longer, but it would have recovered.”

“In a cataclysm of such proportions, you have no way to recover,” Cezar replied. “Everything is destroyed. The flora would still have a chance but not the fauna.”

“It all seems quite nebulous,” the younger major insisted.

“Indeed. That period was very tense,” Cezar admitted. “It’s about 5,000 years since then. There were many divergent interests even between the ‘gods’. What has happened, however, was due to the necessity of evolution on Earth. Greater diversity of wildlife was needed as evolution was impetuous. The more diversity there is, the quicker it is that souls can incarnate and evolve.”

“And what guarantee is there for that?” the other major asked.

“None,” said Cezar, “but the chances for evolution are great with this rhythm. Unless there is diversity, a great effort from one species would be needed to evolve sufficiently in order for it to ascend to become the higher species. But diversity, through the many experiences that it promotes, allows for ‘learning’ in an accelerated way; that is, an accelerated evolution. The easiest path by which beings can rapidly evolve is by small evolutionary steps that are ‘accelerated’. This avoids sudden changes that strain the structure and can make certain events unpredictable.”

“Okay, but does that mean that there was a need for a flood to be triggered?” I asked with wonder.

“Things are always correlated in the Universe. What you think serves a purpose at a certain time is also a solution for other needs. Something may seem to be bad or terrible at a certain time and space, but when you look at it from a broader perspective, it proves to be necessary, even leading to a higher level of evolution. The cataclysm that involved the Flood — especially when it encompasses a wider area such as the biblical flood, i.e. much of the Middle East and Southeast Europe — has undoubtedly meant a massive purge of the area of inappropriate practices and tendencies with regard to the correct development of the human being, but it also represents the possibility of a rebirth with regard to the sense of a significant leap on the scale of evolution.

TWO MAIN CHALLENGES IN THE EVOLUTION OF HUMANITY

The room was silent. We each thought of how it is possible that a flood, which undoubtedly means much suffering and massive loss of human life, is still a trampoline for human evolution. Cezar was also silent, letting us soak in the idea. Finally, I put my heart in my mouth and said that maybe some extra explanation was still necessary.

“The point is, when we talk about an evolutionary leap, we have to consider a change in the structure of DNA,” I stated.

Cezar answered with goodwill.

“This cannot only happen through genetic engineering but also as a result of environmental changes. What do you think that the great migrations of peoples meant when they took place? Even the most stable seeds eventually migrate. It is an impulse of life that determines evolution. An environmental change for a population always means more than just the immediate needs that are reflected in everyday life. It also means a profound change in DNA.”

“The location, the topography, the geographical area … all this affects DNA?” the other American officer asked in amazement. “That would partly answer some of our questions.”

“Undoubtedly. Food, climate and the area influence DNA over time, it being modulated according to the basic information structure within it. Everything then changes, even the spoken language, at least to the extent of an accent if not a complete transformation of its structure. Migrations by communities, groups, or even entire populations, in time, have resulted in combining races and diversifying human DNA. It’s like ‘grafting’ a plant to affect a slow transformation of DNA.”

“But, there were more evolved populations on Earth among the people,” the officer commented. “Besides the ‘gods’ with their technology, there have been human communities or even civilizations that have developed amazingly. We have artifacts and evidence in this regard that we have discovered.”

Cezar approved of what he said with a nod of his head.

“In the history of humanity, we can talk, more or less, about two great categories of human beings who have developed differently: one of them has reached a high degree of evolution; the other has been somewhat left in nature so that its progress was much more strenuous. This is how we can explain why some areas of the Earth developed and evolved to a great extent while others were inhabited by people living in caves and organized in tribes. We see this even today at the level of monarchical or certain genetic lines or even in the cultural tradition of some peoples. For example, the caste system of the Hindus represents a rough classification of what once dominated life on this planet. Then there is an issue of purity and not mixing the DNA between ‘pure’ and ‘impure’ races. It is, to put it this way, a sort of struggle to preserve the superiority of those who come ‘from above’; that is, those who have a special structure of DNA in their genetic tree. The problem is complex, but in summary, we can say that the current human civilization is a reflection of the second category of human beings, the ones that have evolved strenuously.

MIGRATION THROUGH INTER-DIMENSIONAL PORTALS

I did not know anything about these issues, but I was hoping to find out more about the two upcoming meetings with Apellos. I decided to ask a question.

“Why has this happened?”

“It was not just a single cause; but more recently, in the last few thousand years, it took the form of a ‘blockade’ from certain alien civilizations who wanted to exploit this category of human beings for their own use. In other words, they were not interested in the evolution of humanity. This gave rise to many divergences between ‘gods’ as I have already alluded to, for some wanted to facilitate the extraordinary capacity of the human being to evolve.”

“And others wanted to exploit them?” I asked, amazed. “Why did an advanced alien civilization want to use backward beings?”

“Nevertheless, they did. This planet is alien to them, has resources, and some of these had to be exploited. Additionally, some of the ‘gods’ were to be serviced and especially so that they could control everything. They wanted to keep humanity very close to an animal level; that is, not allow it to evolve in order to use it. Later, they advanced their plans in order to take over total control of the planet, using as an intermediary an ‘elite’ class human beings that had somehow been hybridized with the DNA of those extraterrestrial beings.”

Cezar’s indirect references were obvious to all of us.

“It seems though that their plans did not go as they wanted,” I said. “I understand that the migration of people has just resulted in a slow but safe change in DNA. Otherwise, control would have been total.”

“Yes; because such negative ‘gods’ have a limited mandate. They cannot do exactly what they want. There is a sort of a ‘galactic control’ imposed by some very advanced civilizations to which they are subjected. Even so, because they are very patient, the negatively oriented ‘gods’ have done much harm, especially through the people they have appointed.”

The younger officer intervened, wishing to bring the discussion back to the information the two were particularly interested in.

“About the artifact we discovered — the data we have is leading us to the Huns, but something does not fit because they seem to have come from elsewhere.”

“That’s right,” Cezar replied. “The Huns were a migratory people, but they not only came from the Mongolian steppes, as it is supposed, but from three distinct directions. They have emerged from the Arctic, along the Nordic countries, in the Siberian region; and from the steppes in the east, in Mongolia. The Huns, however, did not actually come from these physical regions but ‘entered’ into their respective areas through the secret passages which still allowed for a connection between the physical and the etheric planes. From there, they began spreading to Europe, giving the impression that they were coming from the Mongolian steppes.”

I saw the two American officers look at themselves, a sign that the information corroborated with what they had discovered and knew. Cezar continued unhindered.

“They came from some areas of the etheric plane close to Shambhala. This explains why the Huns suddenly occupied a vast region; not because they conquered it but because they arrived from other areas, seeming to have conquered new land. True, there were also struggles; but their empire, as it was, was rather due to the speed with which they had occupied the area.

They also, of course, contributed a lot of their warrior qualities. There were not many, but the other peoples felt the specific energy of righteousness that the Huns manifested, and some of them united with them against the Roman Empire.”

“Yes; they fought with the Roman troops, so there were more than a few,” said one of the officers.

Cezar nodded his head, then explained.

“Here we have to clarify who the Huns actually are. The name ‘hun’ comes from ‘inn’ which means ‘leader’. They were a tribe of ‘rulers’ or special beings with obvious qualities, both physical and intellectual. Indeed; these were few, but the rest — that is, the great mass of the tribe — were made up of ordinary and rather primitive people, most of the time being part of the already conquered tribes which bloated the army ranks of the Huns on their way to Europe. Only the rulers were Huns because they were part of a special race of human beings. This also explains that they originally came from the etheric plane through inter-dimensional chasms.”

The two majors shifted a little bit in their chairs, and the youngest finally dared to ask a question.

“Could we know precisely where the etheric plane crossed the physical plane?”

“The eternal problem,” I thought to myself. On the other hand, I understood them, for their demand was somewhat legitimate. They were in possession of a very valuable artifact found in those areas, and they wanted to know more, to find out and explore.

Cezar smiled discretely, making an elegant denial.

“Even if I precisely knew those locations, I would still not disclose their position. You know how things are in such cases. They are the territories of other states, and we have no jurisdiction there and do not want any suspicion.”

“We could act punctually and efficiently without destabilizing anything,” the other major insisted.

I knew Cezar well, and I knew that from this point on there was no way to convince him otherwise. After a while, we all got up to go to rest, the time being quite late. There were five days left until the expedition, but the program was still full. The two American officers had to go through some predetermined training steps in connection with the secret complex in the Bucegi Mountains. I was the one who had to deal with their training, practically and theoretically, and Cezar had to go to Bucharest for some important discussions. To get the opportunity for the two meetings with those from Apellos, I had to delegate my duties to Lieutenant Nicoara, and he accepted with extreme goodwill.

INTERPOLATION OF PHYSICAL AND ETERNAL REALITY: AN AMAZING CASE OF GERMAN AND AMERICAN SECRET SERVICES

I woke up early in the morning and decided to reserve that day for rest and relaxation in order to prepare for the next day's expedition to meet with those from Apellos. Although I focused on preparing myself mentally for the expedition, there was no peace of mind because I could not forget what the man from Apellos had told me about those so-called "houses of cabal". I went to the office and started researching, hoping to find some information in our database about a possible secret operation between the U.S. and Germany that had taken place in recent years. I was not successful, so I had to resort to using some of the relationships I had in the BND.* We already knew that the German Secret Service was never too generous with the exchange of information, but we rely on the collaboration that sometimes exists between agents to obtain data of mutual interest.

[FOOTNOTE: * BND is an abbreviation for Bundesnachrichtendienst, the German Secret Service which was created and run by Reinhard Gehlen, the Nazi who also set up the CIA.]

Relationships spoke, and the same day we received a secure copy of the preliminary report for that secret operation. I immediately realized that it was just a two-page summary of a full report on the event, and details were lacking. The operation had taken place in 2005 and was immediately classified into the highest category of security. I wanted to read the whole report, but my source in the BND told me that they had no access to that level. I thanked them and decided to try my chance with the Americans because, according to the summary report and what I had seen on the holographic screen, both countries had been involved in that activity.

Finding Cezar in the training room, I briefly addressed the situation. He had tangentially heard of a U.S. Army secret division which only dealt with the study of space-time distortions in the U.S. and Antarctic. He knew about this from some talks with Major Samuel Cross who, in turn, had come across such information several years ago.

“The division was led by a Colonel Finnegan,” said Cezar. “Cross met with him several times, but he did not give me any further details. I do not know if that colonel is the head of the division anymore, but I’ll check on it.”

Towards the evening, Cezar sought me out and gave me some good news. He told me that he spoke to Major Cross and that he had confirmed that Finnegan was still the head of that secret section. Over time, it had become very important. Cross knew about the 2005 incident with the Germans, so it was easy for him to ask about it, especially by reason of the fact that he had the necessary security clearance. Since there was already a collaboration agreement between the Romanian and the American side, based upon mutual exchanges of sensitive information related to unusual phenomena, the Colonel finally agreed to disclose the details of the operation, even if his division had not been mentioned in the 2007 agreement. He had a great friendship with Major Cross, however, and he knew about the Bucegi complex. Surprisingly, however, Finnegan did not ask for anything in exchange. Surprised, I noticed that even the Secret Services can have a human face.

I received a dossier with several dozen pages the same evening which I immediately read with great interest. There was a corroborated analysis of the BND report with that of the FBI. Indeed; I can say that it was a most unusual operation, having disturbed both sides enough to the point where it warranted the establishment of a special division under Finnegan’s leadership.

The situation was such that both the Germans and the Americans were somehow on the same wavelength without knowing it. Somehow, there were parallel events in both Bavaria and the city of Detroit. In Germany, special troops were alerted but only after what began as mere routine curiosity turned into genuine perplexity and suspicion.

In a German city, there was a very old house, built almost 300 years ago. Having been rebuilt and renovated several times, it somehow kept its late medieval appearance. The problem was that it was in a demolition area where a large park was planned. The surrounding buildings, all very old, had already begun to be demolished, but that house was well defended by property law. Besides, it also had a historical protection status. Discussions, proposals and even legal proceedings had gone on for many years, but no one had ever seen the owner. Lawyers said that he was always abroad, being an important businessman who did not want to sell or give up that old building. In the legal papers, it appeared that he had inherited the property, with all of the other papers referring to the "descendant". It seemed to be a problem with no solution. At one point, the city officials asked the police to do some discreet research because, despite the efforts of state officials, they were unable to contact the owner of the house to conduct direct talks and negotiations. Any such dealings, at the order of the owner, were to be done only through the law firm.

After a time, however, things became very strange. Taking advantage of the cameras already fitted for the future park, discreet observation of that house began. The reports indicated that it was not inhabited during the first four months of 2005. Then, at the end of April, the first person, possibly the owner, went inside and came out only four days later. In the summary note I had received from my BND colleague, the police report stated that the man who entered had no luggage but only wore a raincoat over his clothes. There were obviously no goods in the house because it had remained uninhabited for several months. Even so, the man did not go out until four days afterward.

The police became suspicious and informed the BND, believing that the situation contained a certain risk of terrorism or other dangerous actions. The observation of the house continued, this time with a superior technique and Secret Service personnel dedicated specifically to that operation. The house was again deserted. In just two months, another person, a tall brown-haired man with a small backpack, was seen entering it.

The team carefully monitored the house for the next seven days without seeing lights, movement or other people entering or going out. Intrigued by the unusual situation, the head of the team made the decision to penetrate the inside. Additional outside help was called upon for observation, the German team being ten in number.

On the other side of the ocean, the situation was slightly different. While the Germans merely observed a building, the FBI actually chased a suspect. He was a tall brown-haired man with unnaturally white skin who did not appear in any civil or visa records of the United States, but he had been involved in a particular accident. He had been sporadically observed from 2003 to 2005 in various cities on the East Coast of America, but each time, he was lost. The case was solved in 2005 when an alert was given that the person had suddenly appeared in Detroit whereupon he was arrested.

The FBI team, however, wanted to closely follow the subject to see if he had any associates. Additional trigger forces had been mobilized so that the character could no longer “disappear” as had happened before. The man was traced to a house in a neighborhood near the outskirts of the city where he entered alone. A special FBI intervention team of seven members then arrived and were strategically placed around the building.

What developed from that point precipitated even more confusion. Reading the American report, I had the global vision of what had happened there, but none of the parties involved, neither the Germans nor the Americans, knew each other. When six members of the German team entered the old Bavarian town house, they found no one there. The rooms were large enough, measuring about three meters tall, and were modestly furnished.

Four of the German agents walked into the middle of the house through a hallway that led them into a room that was larger than the others that was placed perpendicularly to the direction from which they had entered. On the opposite wall, they saw an ordinary door located exactly at its center. The only strange aspect was that on the side of that door facing them, there were ingrained stones on the wall that were just like those from a river at the base of the house. The German agents were tense as they heard more voices on the other side of the door, addressing them in English in a commanding tone.

“The German team violently broke the wooden door between the two rooms, being prepared for automatic weapons. Our team, more specifically three of the four agents who entered the house (sergeants # 1, # 2, # 3), also had their weapons on the door because we had heard voices giving orders in the German language. They had four agents and we three. At first, we screamed at each other to drop the guns, but in all of that tension and agitation, we could not understand anything. Then, we suddenly stopped because we were all stunned.”

The German and American operatives were staring at each other after finding each other in a large but completely empty room. What follows is a fragment from the summary of the German report according to what the team commander said.

“I looked in the room from behind one of the windows. It was evening and was raining hard enough. Our clothes and equipment were wet. I turned my head towards to view through the window inside the empty room where the American agents were, and I saw it was noon time there with the sun shining in the blue sky. None of us could articulate a word. I knew that the images were being transmitted in real time, but everyone was silent during those moments. The surprise was colossal.”

In the report, it was mentioned that when agents were at the broken door; that is, when interacting with inter-dimensional space, the image was distorted, but it was still possible to distinguish what was going on there. After the portal area was entered, images returned to normal.

Obviously, that house contained an actual distortion; that is, a spatial portal, and the door between the two chambers was actually a discontinuity between two worlds. When they broke the door, the German agents broke into the “other side”, meeting with the American team who had already entered the room but through the opposite door. For the Americans, that door was in Detroit; for the Germans, the portal door, which they broke, was in a city in central Bavaria.

Even though the German report was only two pages, it was still surprising. I particularly liked the attitude of the German team leader as he seemed to have shown a great deal of self-control, and he quickly focused in on the new situation. He responded very well to what he had encountered when he walked through the broken door into the empty room: “I felt a tingling when I walked through the portal.”

He also showed himself to be a keen observer with a presence of mind, making some observations about the weapons after having passed through the portal: “The guns electrified and sparked when they were touched by hand.”

Of the four German agents who entered the room, only one — the commander of the team — showed any curiosity about that phenomenon of discontinuity in reality and not losing one’s bearings. Two of the American agents showed a presence of spirit and interest in the situation, and one of them — mentioned in the report — even sent a report to command through the microphone attached to his combat gear, stating: “You should see this.”

In the days that followed, the other agents took part in a few psychological therapy sessions to alleviate the emotional and mental shock that they had due to a lack of understanding of what was happening there. In some people, the structure of the mind is so rigid that it cannot withstand sudden changes of reality without giving rise to unpleasant side effects.

In the U.S. incident file, almost half of the volume concerned the analysis of the operation as well as conclusions and proposals. Research began immediately, and in the archives, it was revealed that, in fact, that house in Detroit was built more than 200 years ago over a place where there was known to be a portal or spatial distortion described as: “which takes you away to who knows where because no one will come back from there to tell you.”

There was no reference as to who had built the house over the space distortion. Indeed; people were “jettisoned” somewhere to a hill in Bavaria, suffering complete disorientation and even losing their minds. For those who managed to get over that shock, it was probably very difficult to ever return to America, and so the legend was created.

A good initiative from the Americans was that, after the incident in 2005, they set up a secret division to research into such phenomena, the head of which to date is Colonel Finnegan. Apparently, he drove this department with an iron hand and managed to impress his superiors in the Pentagon by virtue of results — some remarkable, as Major Cross revealed to us — that he obtained. He was the one who presented, for example, a classification of spatial distortions based upon all the years of work and activity of the division that had taken place since its establishment.

By summarizing Finnegan's material, it can be said that spatial distortions can be divided into three main categories:

- 1. Fixed Portals — These are very rare and not very well known (this category includes, for example, the distortion in Germany).
- 2. Multidirectional Portals — Passing through such spatial distortions can be reached in different places, depending on the individual characteristics, the time chosen for the passage, and the weather or other elements.
- 3. Dynamic Portals — Also called “Earth wormholes”, these are continually moving space-time distortions in the sense that they appear and disappear very quickly, changing their position, size and even subtle energetic characteristics.

Major Cross told us that Finnegan's division gained an even greater reputation a year ago when he managed to implement a special program — after a long collaboration with several IT geniuses — that allows him to, in a certain way, “foresee” the place and moment when the third category of portals will open.

Finnegan's study is based upon a whole series of mysterious events that have taken place over the years, from the late Middle Ages to the present.

One of the instances, indicated by the uncertain reference of an obscure antiquity in Paris, shows the case of the great physicist Isaac Newton and how he apparently experienced passing through a spatial distortion on the edge of a forest. Newton was projected about 30 kilometers further from that location. Although he returned there, the portal had disappeared, and so it was designated as a “wormhole”.

The division led by Finnegan provides a map of the portals discovered and classified according to the above division. Many of them are found in Iceland, Northern Ireland, Canada, in the passage to Alaska, and also on a significant part of the Alaskan surface. This also included locations on the ice as well as the Kamchatka Peninsula.

I finished reading the file later that night, but I was pleased to have documented it and to understand how “houses of cabal” work. Such notions were not new to me because I had already experienced many such “passages” up to that point. Besides, they were commonplace within the secret complex of Bucegi and its tunnels. But, the impact of such a situation on human beings who are not accustomed to this kind of situation is often intimidating.

Reading the two reports, we have found that there are two main categories of people: those who are open to such experiences and have a level of consciousness that allows them to adapt quickly to them; and those that do not support the “vibrational jump” or change in thinking paradigm. For them, the “threshold” is too high. I then remembered the phenomenon of population segregation which Cezar had put in the spotlight shortly before, a factor which will dramatically increase in the years to come. This was an additional reason to better understand that the radical transformation of Mankind can only come from elevating the level of individual consciousness.

CHAPTER FOUR — HUMANITY'S ORIGIN ON EARTH:

FROM THE COSMIC TO THE QUANTUM LEVEL

I was glad I that I had managed to arrange everything in order that I could attend the two meetings with those from Apellos. Lieutenant Nicoara dealt with the training of the two American officers, and this gave me the time to prepare for the next day and also to solve other pressing tasks within the Base. Everything went really well. The officers from the Pentagon proved to be cooperative, and they assimilated perfectly.

Arriving punctually for the meeting, things went quickly as far as I was concerned. Although I was told we were early, everything worked out as it should. We were in the hanger that the Apellos used for surface activities.

MENTOR

The Apellos man received me very kindly and with friendliness, leading me to the holographic viewing room. Already in front of us were two comfortable armchairs that had been arranged for our visit. I was given the special helmet in order to access as much information as possible.

“Someone in our world wants to give you some important things,” he said with a smile.

I looked at him with wonder and an inquiring gaze as the Apellos man directed my attention to the holographic screen that was projected in front of me. It was big and blue. Appearing immediately with it was the image of a very beautiful woman who looked at me carefully, almost serenely. She was about 5'7" tall and brunette with her hair cut straight in the back, descending a little bit down to her shoulders . She wore a one-piece suit of glossy skin-like white material upon which discreetly beautiful designs were emblazoned. Her eyes were almond-shaped and long, and her eyes seemed to veil a hidden flame. The white skin, characteristic of the Apellos, contrasted strongly with her black hair and dark eyes. Her body, harmonious and supple, gave the impression that she was very well trained, and she exuded a special magnetism. It was virtually the first time I had seen a woman from the Apellos civilization, and the effect it produced upon me was one of sincere admiration, with a fascination for the special charisma that she manifested in a natural way and for the energy that radiated out of her.

Addressing me in the Romanian language, which she had mastered very well, she had the same easy but “sweet” accent that I had also noticed in the man who had guided me in the surface hangar. I heard the sound of her voice coming from the direction of the rectangular device that came out of the floor, but I could not figure out how it worked. I did not see speakers or anything else in the room.

The woman said her name is Mémentia and that she is one of the scientists of the Apellos civilization. Her field of activity corresponded to the term “medicine” in our world, although her explanations of this notion is much more enriched and nuanced than you would typically hear in our society. Better said, Mémentia deals with the health of the people of Apellos, being a kind of “minister” in this respect. They regard health as being inseparable from spirituality. You cannot have one without the other because they are inseparable.

“Being healthy is a necessity for man,” she said. “You cannot be healthy in the body without having a healthy soul. Body sickness means a sickness of the soul and vice versa. Your medicine has developed only in a horizontal direction which is of little use. It does not provide or offer effective and genuinely powerful treatments for healing.”

Even though I knew very well that what she was saying to me was true, I did not really understand the purpose of our meeting. As if reading my thoughts, she replied immediately.

“What I want to tell you about is the physical condition of people and their spiritual condition, both of which are degrading more and more. From our point of view, it is worrisome because our analysis and observations even show a degradation of ‘base’ DNA in many people on the surface of the planet, and this is very dangerous. This is primarily due to neglect of health. In turn, health is linked to a much deeper understanding of human nature and body composition. The physical part must be correlated with the subtle part of the being. This means that what is material, that is, the body, must be correlated with what is spiritual, that is, with subtle energy and consciousness. Your people not only separate the body from energy and consciousness, but many of them completely ignore the spiritual side. This is a sure recipe for decay, suffering and involution. My hope is that you will be able to share this with as many people as possible.”

Méntia spoke with a lot of passion, force and feeling, drawing my attention to the fact that the human health situation in the world has become alarming. The solution, she said, is not in national and international health associations and bodies, all of which are merely administrative machinations of political, personal or group interests. These organizations do not improve the situation. At best, they perpetuate it on the same level. I noticed anger in her which I interpreted as a sincere concern and expression of compassion for human beings.

“There’s not much to do in this direction,” I said. “It’s a terrible octopus at this level: of drugs, hospitals, and medicine in general. The change must come from a profound level.”

“Of course. One has to first of all change the vision and mentality,” she replied quickly. “This will lead to new discoveries of great value which integrate the human body into the universal holographic structure.”

“The problem with this,” I said bitterly, “Is that I do not want that.”

Having talked with Cezar on this subject a couple of years ago, I knew the subject quite well. We even had access to some sensitive files in this area. Unfortunately, we always butt up against a colossus in this area which seems to crush everything and not let any flowers grow. My metaphors were immediately understood by Méntia who was not at all foreign to the subject.

“We know of this serious situation on the surface world. To you, a number of harmful factors cause disastrous combinations. Governments are avid for money, power and political influence. In order to obtain them, they allow the use of very harmful products in food and treatments. Many of the laws are insidious, and the knot of financial interests is immense. We, however, firmly say that change comes from the population; not from riots, but from a change of mentality. People must understand that they must produce a transformation in their conceptions and then be firm in maintaining those superior ideas that in some way imply the ascension of being.”

She paused for a few moments before speaking with great determination.
“Transmit this further because any seed has its fruit later.”

I smiled to myself, noticing that Méntia was taking over the style of expressing herself through occasional metaphors. Ultimately, however, she was perfectly right because a superior world is primarily a world of perfectly healthy people, full of radiant energy and vitality. It would be difficult to imagine a sick and afflicted society which is also advanced from the point of view of technology and spirituality. Human health and evolution are two aspects that correlate and go hand in hand, such as chains that are inseparable. A sick or distressed man, trapped by all sorts of physical or psychological problems, cannot concentrate, nor is he efficient; but most important of all, he is not happy. What evolution can come from such a state?

I knew this all too well and even expressed this to her, but Méntia told me that those in Apellos had found solutions and are willing to help us if there is openness and desire in this respect. She told me that, at a given moment, the relations between Apellos and the population of Romania would have to become public; but until then, they are willing to help indirectly.

“People must understand that health depends on certain factors that can neither be ignored nor excluded. First of all, this is about their evolution at all levels; and that means refining and then transforming their DNA, but in a beneficial sense and on many vibrational frequencies.”

“And how will they figure this out?” I asked curiously.

“There are three main factors. First, senses will become more sensitive and more developed; and people will use their brains more and more efficiently. Some of them will gain paranormal powers because their DNA structure will be refined enough on certain frequencies. It will have affinities with some material or subtle realities in the universe, and this will lead to the ability to influence matter or certain subtle energy fields at will. This is combined with the second essential factor that must be taken into account, and this is the psychological and mental balance of the being. The third factor is the physical body. A person will actually ‘feel’ the problems that exist at the two higher levels and how one’s will translates them into the physical plane through various diseases. As you can see, we cannot separate one of these areas from the other two.”

“Is that what you do in Apellos?”

“Spirituality, psychology and medicine make up a collective body inside of us. They are not treated separately, such as is the case in your world. But, we believe that it is time for an invigoration of these ideas, none of which were at all strange to the ancient inhabitants of your country. The Dacians applied this style of ‘holistic medicine’ and the Greeks adopted certain notions from them, enough to propel them to a higher stage of evolution.”

I wondered that if this was the case with the Greeks of antiquity, then what was the level of the ancient Dacians in this regard? I realized in a flash the truth of what Mémentia said as I already knew that the inhabitants of Tomassis,* direct descendants of the ancient Dacians, applied this style of “holistic medicine”. I now had a better explanation as to why I have noticed harmony, well-being, balance and, generally speaking, the perfect health that these people always radiated.

[FOOTNOTE: * Tomassis is an underground city that Radu visited and is below the surface city of Tomis in southeastern Romania. See Volume 5 of the Transylvania Series, entitled Inside the Earth — The Second Tunnel.]

In practical terms, Mémentia told me that the spiritual transformation of the human being, which refers to raising the vibrational frequency of consciousness, is directly related to the health of the body and that one cannot achieve one without the other. The Apellos woman surprised me again with her telepathic perception and answered my thoughts immediately.

“Indeed. A perfectly healthy body has every chance of evolving, for one is then able to go through the stages necessary for their spiritual evolution. Your ancestors knew and accepted this, applying the principles I am telling you. This information is ‘imprinted’ in your DNA, and all you have to do is re-activate it. There are many other populations on the planet that have the same characteristics, especially in those territories that have maintained their ancient roots.”

I raised an issue that seemed a logical question to ask concerning a trend that is quite extensive nowadays.

“If the health and spirituality of the being go hand in hand, what is the situation with atheists or agnostics? They are also healthy and can live long enough without suffering despite the fact that they are not evolving spiritually. They have their own system of interpreting the world and life, none of which seems to affect their body.”

Méntia immediately responded with a charming smile on her beautiful face.

“An atheist only ‘lives’ within the context of playing their role in what amounts to a simple mechanical participation in a much more complex process, driven by many forces and energies. He participates in life in a somewhat gentle way, but he still thinks he is complete.

“This does not mean true health or harmony, however, because ‘life’ is lacking. An atheist is like a dry tree which, although it continues to exist for many years in the forest after it has died, nevertheless has a dry trunk without the slightest trace of the essence that gives it life. He ‘lives’ in a way, however, because he is still standing on two legs.”

“Then what is the difference between a person and a spiritual being?”

“A spiritual and physical being ‘lives’ as opposed to just existing,” replied Méntia. “Do you perceive the difference? She is more or less aware of what she really embodies while an atheist remains stuck in an individual, self-contained and seemingly self-sufficient system of thought. In fact, they consume themselves without even realizing it. This is because they are not connected to the true source of their existence, thought and feeling. Such an attitude ultimately exhausts individual energy, drains the cells of vitality and inhibits the true joy of living.”

As it occurred to me that a superior attitude does not emerge out of nowhere, I had a question.

“Are there perhaps some internal changes necessary for the being to have access to a superior condition of thought and existence?”

“These are happening at the DNA level,” Mémentia said. “What your civilization is living in now is a very special time period of limitation. Such stages and evolutionary leaps in the history of Mankind have taken place and are essential pillars in the understanding and development of human civilization. In the past, Mankind was supported to achieve those significant leaps in vibrational frequencies at the DNA level; but this time, human beings have to demonstrate that they really want it. This requires an increased awareness of what you truly are and are embodying on Earth.”

I was very interested in the opportunity to know more about those essential moments in the evolution of Mankind, and I asked Mémentia to talk about it. She replied that this was the main reason why I had been invited there and that I would immediately begin to view the main elements of the origin and nature human beings on the holographic screen.

Then, after assuring me that we will meet again in the near future, Mémentia acknowledged me and the Apellos man with a short bow of her head. She then disappeared from the holographic screen, leaving me in a very pleasant and comfortable state. I was impressed by her pleasant presence, the tone of her voice, and the fire that radiated from both her gaze and her very being. I did not expect the “intermezzo” that she provided, but it proved very welcome, preparing me for the very special viewings that were to follow.

After closing the image on the holographic screen, the Apellos man told me that there would be many hours of viewing and talking, and that is why he suggested to me to concentrate as best as I could. A little excited, I prepared my inter-dimensional helmet and sat down in the comfortable armchair, anxious to find out the mysteries of our civilization’s history that had not been revealed to me so far.

A SPECIAL STAR CONFIGURATION

I was happy with the fact that I already had some experience with the holographic system of presentation and interpretation of the images I was seeing as well as the way to interact with the screen through my helmet. It had been explained to me that the processing of Akashic* images could be done very easily, but in order to receive them, I had to mentally connect myself as efficiently and quickly as possible to the flow of images that appeared on the screen. In this way, I could have full personal control over the emission of the visual flow, all of which would be modulated by my psychological and mental characteristics.

[FOOTNOTE: * The author refers here to “universal records” which contain any fact, thought or phenomenon that has ever occurred in the universe. The background of these records is akasha, which in Sanskrit means “space”, “heaven” or “ether”. Elements about this notion were presented in Volume 2 of the Transylvania Series entitled Transylvanian Moonrise.]

I sat comfortably in my chair and put on my helmet. The Apellos man sat down on my right and looked inquiringly at me to see if I was ready to start. I nodded, and then, without any visible command, the first holograms began to appear in front of me, naturally and with extraordinary clarity. I then started to watch the most astounding, complete and correlated epic of Mankind and its evolution from its first moments to the present day.

I will attempt to faithfully reflect what I saw during the two days of visuals, but the volume of information is too great, and the explanatory ramifications are too many. I will therefore first give a general overview of the subject and then a summary thereof. In this, I will include other associated information in order to allow for the best assimilation of the elements present. While watching, I learned this method over time and realized it was the best suited to imprint the information in my memory, at least to a certain extent. Additionally, because the wealth of information was so immense, I often stopped to write down some points or sketch out what seemed important to me.

The first session lasted nine hours and the second eight hours. Both have marked a profound transformation in my being through the incredible accuracy of the presentation and the integration of the stunning images I was able to see. It was a virtual course in “The True History of Mankind”, conveying a knowledge that destroys any myth and prejudice through the realism and clear truth presented.

Even knowing some of those aspects which I am now able to present, I was enthralled by the perfection of the way in which I was shown everything. Correctly, I considered this to be a “Royal History of Truth” that was, at best, only known partially, usually distorted and manipulated.

As a necessary part of my training, the man from Apellos revealed to me that the evolution and development of human beings was, among other things, due to a number of influences from several stars, planetary configurations and solar systems. Every star, planet, satellite, or other heavenly body, such as comets, more or less acts to develop biological systems, a phenomenon that is constantly happening.

Even though I was still not fully aware of the circumstances, the evolution of primates on Earth has been deeply influenced by both natural influences and so-called artificial influences. On the holographic screen, I first saw a starry sky, but on an azure background with the stars looking like circles with a bright glow.

It was not the black of cosmic space, but I saw a fairly bright sky of blue that was very pleasant. Some of those stars were somewhat highlighted, having a shape like a rectangularly-shaped file with rounded upper and lower edges, just like the icon you would see for a file when working on a personal computer. There were always three circles with certain marks at the top left of each file. I noticed that the first symbol, the one on the left, was on each of the stars, being similar to the letter E.

THE STELLAR SYMBOL “E”

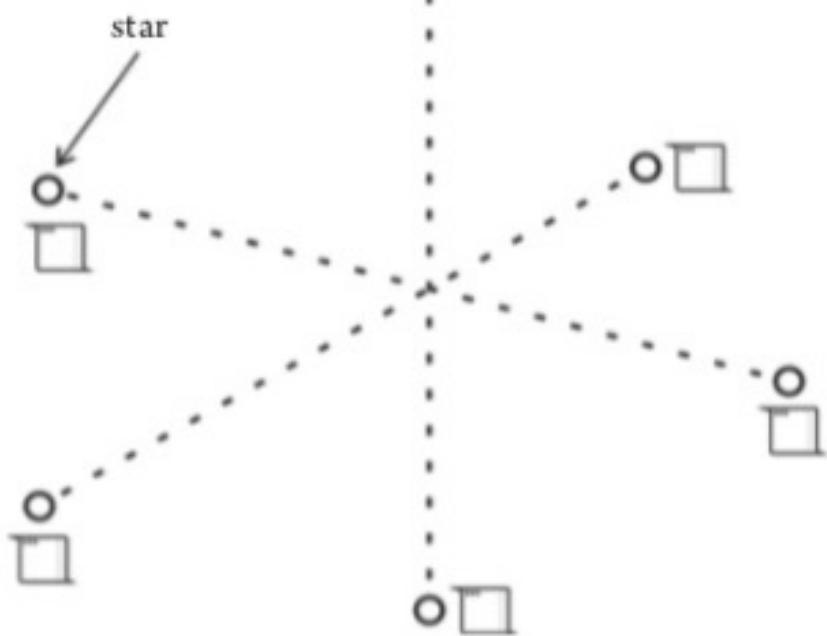

To the right of those files, there were two “dynamic” vertical lines, full of symbols, changing and having different intensities of luminosity.

Our solar system then emerged with its planets at the intersection of several “relationships” or links between stars which can be likened to “stellar rays” of force.

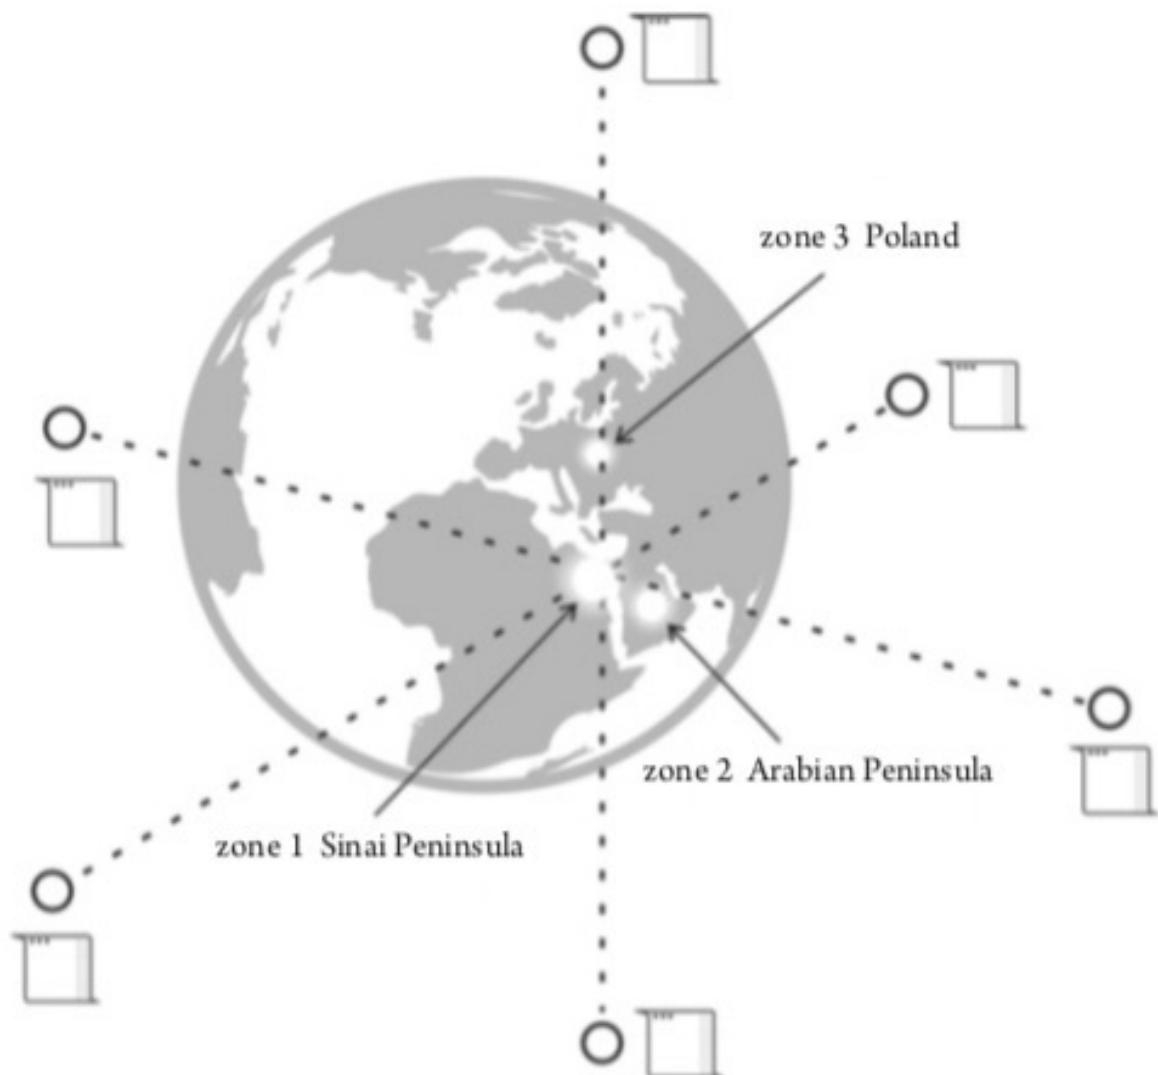

STAR ARRANGEMENT CONCENTRATING IN THE MIDDLE WHERE THE EARTH IS LOCATED WITH A WEAK BUT CONSTANT GRAVITATIONAL INFLUENCE

The image grew even larger and the planets of the Solar System were highlighted. I noticed that it was somehow “rotated” with respect to how the Solar System is conventionally understood, and it did not have the same tilt of the axis as the present one. For example, I saw that the area that today corresponds to Egypt was close to the Equator.

The image then approached the planet and the fundamental symbol E was designated in three places which “signaled” three different areas: one in today’s Egypt, more precisely in the Sinai Peninsula; another in Arabia; and the third somewhere on the surface currently known as Poland. The symbols shined with different intensities: the one in Sinai was the strongest, then the one in Arabia, and the one in Poland was the most blurred and less visible.

EARTH WITH TILTED AXIS
THE THREE MAIN AREAS OF SYMBOL “E”

I concluded that this probably indicated a certain time line of events, but it could also be an indication of the importance of those areas in a particular context.

THE FIRST IMPORTANT MODIFICATION OF DNA

The picture became more detailed, focusing around hills in a valley in the designated area at the bottom of the Sinai Peninsula. Unlike the desert that exists today, the region was covered with rich vegetation.

The images of the valley then showed a large primate, an evolved bipedal monkey. I noticed that the facial and skull features were different from those of a regular monkey. That primitive bipedal creature was part of a not too large group of individuals who set themselves apart. As far as I could tell, he seemed to be the leader of the group because he was directing the other creatures to certain places where they were looking for food.

Everything that appeared to me in the images was accompanied by a specific sign that appeared to the right of a being, an object, or an area. Though I did not know the significance of those signs, it was often suggestive in the sense that it indicated the direction in which I needed to pay particular attention. For example, a sign near the hologram image of the leader of that group would be indicated with a red pulsation. Later, I would understand that when a signal had such characteristics, the creature or work indicated was very important in the context of the situation being presented. In other cases, the mark could be static and otherwise colored.

Wanting to see a close up, the zoom increased to the specific biology of that primate, first “entering” into its tissue, then into the cells, and ultimately into its DNA structure. During this process of penetration, I felt that I was being comfortably guided by the man from Apellos. The images on the screen were accompanied by the “stellar rays” intersecting so as to indicate the influences of the stars in the first images that were part of that specific star alignment.

They were like threads of white yarn that suggested a certain kind of cosmic action. In fact, those “rays” had been part of the images until then, but I did not understand their meaning previously, and that’s why I did not give them too much weight. I noticed, however, that as the image penetrated more deeply at the microscopic level of the anatomical structure of that primate, the “rays” became more and more powerful until, at some point, when they came to a certain layer of the spiraling DNA structure, the stellar rays concentrated in one place in the DNA of the primate.

That point corresponded to a certain moment of time and to a certain place in space in which a certain cosmic influence was implemented into that primate, and I saw this as a specific symbol that appeared at the beginning of each file. I understood then that this represented a very fine but fundamental influence for subsequent changes that were to follow.

Even though it is difficult for some to accept that stars can have such an influence on the development of human beings, I have realized, as a result of following the evolution of humanity on the holographic screen, that the stars and configurations they form permanently act in this manner.

In some situations, it is possible for it to take hundreds of thousands of years for a specific stellar arrangement to decisively influence the DNA of some species in order to create a special structure. Those structures or stellar configurations may remain active for thousands or even tens of thousands of years, during which time modifications to the DNA of those species become complete.

It was shown to me on the holographic screen that such a period of time was essential to the facilitation of an important transformation of DNA of a “great grandfather” on Earth that was from long ago. I saw how the influence of the stars acted at a precise point in the DNA structure of that primate, highlighting what seemed to be an atom with its bonds. I easily recognized the carbon atom and saw that the stellar “rays” had “changed” one of its bonds as well as the rest of the DNA structure.

INFLUENCE OF STELLAR ALIGNMENT UPON THE BOND BETWEEN TWO CARBON ATOMS

EDITOR'S NOTE: Adenine is a compound which is one of the four constituent bases of nucleic acids. A purine derivative, it is paired with thymine in double-stranded DNA.

Within the DNA macromolecule, carbon “uses” its four valence electrons to form covalent bonds. The DNA macromolecule supports the bonds between the oxygen atom and the nitrogen atom, but the geometry of the electronic orbital arrangement in the carbon atom can modify the future type of bonds that form between the oxygen and nitrogen atoms and the four basic components of Human DNA.* Until then, the links created by the carbon atom have certain patterns of manifestation, but through the new cosmic “implementation”, there is a “branching” of these patterns; that is, an increase in the probability that the carbon atom will create more types of bonds.

[FOOTNOTE: * The four different types of organic molecules or bases in the DNA structure are Adenine (A), Cytosine (C) Guanine (G) and Thymine (T).]

Therefore, multiplying the quantum possibilities that create covalent bonds has caused changes in polarity in DNA. Thus, the likelihood of other new links being created has greatly increased.

DIVERSIFICATION OF POSSIBLE BONDS TO THE CARBON ATOM IN THE DNA MACROMOLECULE

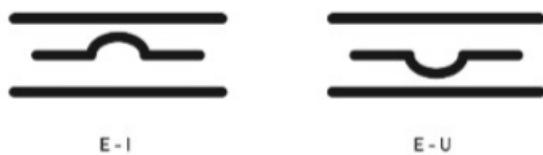

We have clearly seen how the stellar rays have come and “multiplied” the possibility for the electrons to move in several trajectories, virtually increasing the electron cloud of the carbon. Electrons have become more free in that area, creating new connections and opening the way for a new development of that primate’s DNA.

THE SYMBOLS E-I AND E-U

I was glad that I had deciphered the meaning of the major star symbol, but as soon as I had that thought, a new symbol appeared. Bright and very close to the star (E), this was also a fundamental symbol with the line in the middle having a “protuberance”. The emergence of this new symbol was accompanied by a sonorous representation which was clearly similar to the vocal speech of “E-I”. Then, another star symbol appeared on the screen, and in that case, I heard the representation of the sound of “E-U”. The E-I symbol appeared as a slightly sharper sound while the E-U symbol sounded like a gentler, quieter, and more permissive sound.

The nuances of the E symbols E-I and E-U, representing distinct families of frequencies

In fact, these symbols, which I present here as E-I and E-U, are graphically close to the E-shape as we know it, but in reality, they form and represent symbols designating certain cosmic frequencies in the form of stellar arrangements and positions which reveal a certain influence from a group of stars in the galaxy. Later, however, I found out that this feature also exists with regard to planetary positions or other important celestial bodies.

I have in particular noted the fundamental symbol with the three horizontal lines which I have associated with the letter E. In fact, it is more like the Greek letter Xi (Ξ), the middle line slightly shorter than the other two. It is no coincidence that we also find this in some very old spiritual traditions such as Shivism in India where three lines are drawn on the forehead (white or red) by the followers of this system. This is, however, not just a local custom but is also universalized at the galactic level.

I found it very interesting how I was shown the great importance of those essential cosmic symbols. On the screen, I saw the moment of inception that involved a corresponding area in a large sector in our galaxy. There was a kind of galactic “alignment” of many stars with our planet in the middle.

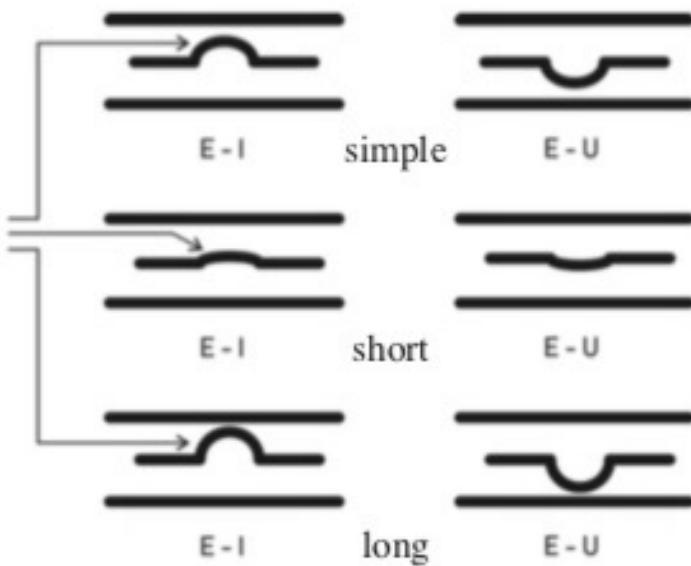

Somehow, I realized that in those times a local galactic phenomenon occurred which for some time created the visual sensation that the Earth was in the midst of those stellar movements. In other words, the reference point of celestial mechanics for that time and in that area of the galaxy was Earth.

Of course, these graphical representations are “paper-based” correlations, but just as in astronomy and astrology, there are very important and significant cosmic synchronicities which cannot be ignored due to the subtle energy impact that is created for a certain amount of time.

OCCULT SIGNIFICANCE IN THE STELLAR SYMBOL E-I

Then, as if practically speaking to me, the scheme of a very special stellar alignment was shown on the screen. It was made up of six stars, linked two by two (see illustration below), which I had up to then thought were only certain gravitational influences on the Earth. In the meantime, I realized that that stellar configuration also represented the correlation between certain stellar characteristics. It was a significant system, consisting of 6 + 1 cosmic objects; that is, six stars and our planet in the middle of that special celestial configuration. The significance of that “moment” of better times, which lasted about 10,000 years, consisted of the fact that the Earth was then a genuine force. It was a cosmic conjuncture that takes place at great intervals of time which — as I understood telepathically — was wisely observed, understood and exploited by very advanced extraterrestrial civilizations.

variations of E-I and E-U symbols representing variations of stellar influences

At that cosmic moment, which was a specific star configuration, it was shown that the conditions for a thriving civilization were born on Earth, starting from the DNA of the great primates that existed at that time on the surface of the planet.

Such a very favorable context also offered advanced alien civilizations the possibility of calculating the need for natural or artificial events that could speed up the development of those primates. Many such highly advanced alien civilizations have fully assumed their “parental” role in the “formation” and development of life on Earth. In a certain way, we can say that they have become the spiritual fathers of Earth and Mankind.

Returning to the holographic images presented to me on the screen, I was shown that the two symbolic representations (E-U and E-I) could have different nuances, transmuted in several ways, such as a longer or shorter E-U or a higher or lower tonality, and so on.

I was, however, intrigued by the semicircle of the E-I or E-U star symbol because I did not understand its meaning. Knowing that the technology available to me was providing me with an amazing way to access information, I focused my attention and interest on this because my experience there was also a learning process and a personal adjustment to the parameters of a technology that is much more advanced than what is on our planet's surface.

As soon as I focused on the significance of the semicircle in the structure of the E-I and E-U symbols, I saw on the holographic screen how the semi-circle “unfolded” from the graphics of the two symbols and became isolated. To the right of each semicircle, several types of alignments appeared: stars, vortexes (whose meaning I later understood as a yin or yang structure) and even atoms, which we saw as having a great nucleus, a glitter surrounded by a kind of “cloud” or “fog” of electrons, also in the form of a whirl. Then, I was shown that some electrons are characterized by a certain atom-binding energy which seems to be separate from the physical plane. In other words, these electrons are actually coupled into the subtle etheric plane, which is superior to the physical plane, even if they belong to different chemical elements. For example, an electron of a carbon atom could be coupled with an electron in an oxygen atom. This coupling of the subtle etheric dimension was symbolized precisely by the semicircle in graphical representation of E-I or sometimes that of E-U.

Their coupling means that they come from the same family of etheric subtle vibrational frequencies. In my cortex, the information was telepathically synthesized as a profound understanding which was received as an inexpressible expression: “the same tachyon family”.

I knew what tachyons are, as defined by scientists, but they also recognize that they are “hypothetical” particles because they do not depend upon time nor do they manifest in or belong to the physical world. Now, however, I understood that things are not like that at all. I was shown how two such electrons, in their journey through a cloud of other electrons, at one point “found” and “coupled” with each other by virtue of their associated resonance.

I then realized that two such electrons, even if they are not in the same atom, are still “subtly” bound etherically. The reality of this really impressed me and immediately led me to think of one of the strangest phenomena in quantum physics, called entanglement,* but I will speak of that in another volume because it is the basis of understanding the most fascinating aspects of the cosmos.

* The phenomenon of entanglement is a phenomenon specific to quantum mechanics in which microcosmic particles that are separated from each other at great distances can perform instantaneous and mysterious exchanges of information. This leads to the mutual modification of their quantum states. In recent years, however, some studies have shown that the phenomenon of entanglement (translated as “quantum inseparability”) appears to manifest itself not only in non-human objects but also in living organisms such as bacteria. MODIFICATION OF ANOTHER DNA “WAVE”

Next, as if the intelligence behind the screen or my special helmet knew that I understood the aspects presented, images appeared on the screen showing the bonding of the carbon atom with other atoms, creating virtually another DNA chain in the primates on the Earth due to the stellar influences I have previously mentioned.

Although the shape of the new DNA was also double helical, having the same atomic and molecular composition, I still viewed it as more complex than the DNA of primates. This is because the oxygen or nitrogen atoms that bind to create the DNA were of a subtle quality.

Almost immediately, the screen displayed both the physical DNA macromolecule as well as the subtle bonds that exist between the atoms in the DNA. I saw a bright cloud over the image of atoms that represented the etheric charge of the physical part of the DNA.

Subtly, the macromolecule looked like a twisted sponge, and in some places, I could see some luminous clusters. It was not just a twisted ladder but looked rather like a “tube”; and in some of areas, there were bright dots, representing the nuclei of certain DNA atoms, namely, those in which changes had been made. Being curious, I turned my attention to one of the points that seemed to me to be very beautiful, and the image immediately became very pronounced. Then, more files began to appear, containing a lot of information in the form of signs and symbols that I did not understand. I realized, however, what a depth of information there was in those files that were presenting the reality of these matters at very deep levels.

“In this way, you can find out everything you want about the history of each atom or electron herein or about any other particle or component; and this includes how it appeared, how it developed, what transformations it passed through, and so on. You can go deeper and deeper for further information,” explained the man from Apellos.

I referred back to the modified DNA form which was well-known to me. Looking closely, I could see within it the shape of the twin propeller, twisted, apparently the same as before the star-like outburst. As a whole, however, the new macromolecule of DNA appeared to be more dynamic and somehow more vivid.

I noticed that its dynamics came mainly from certain “clusters” of subtle etheric energy, like small bright clouds surrounding the outer DNA and conveying that sensation of dynamism. They moved, interacting from time to time with the electrons in the upper layers and producing various physical lighting effects in the DNA.

Those etheric “clusters” represented complex symbols, but at the beginning of each symbol, E-I was found, the influence of which created the possibility that the DNA bonds would be more dynamic, smoother and more sensitive. In this way, I understood that the increase in “quantum sensitivity” at the level of DNA macromolecules has allowed the environment of the planet to further model the genes of the primates and to significantly accelerate their evolution.

INTERNET STYLE “MENTAL TECHNOLOGY” — RESUMPTION OF VISUALIZATION

As I said to myself that all of those links between the physical plane and the etheric plane, which started to become rather complicated, could be correlated with an observable or measurable phenomenon, I immediately noticed that the image on the holographic screen began to blur.

The Apellos man then told me that this was due to my mental intervention with the device with which I was interacting. The principle that had to be respected was for me to understand correctly what was coming to me and to present coherent questions. To have a good representation of facts and events, the man advised me to look at everything without involvement because personal inferences affected the correct rendering of the akashic* recordings. (see footnote on next page)

[FOOTNOTE: * The author refers here to “universal records” which contain any fact, thought or phenomenon that has ever occurred in the universe. The background of these records is akasha, which in Sanskrit means “space”, “heaven” or “ether”. Elements about this notion were presented in Volume 2 of the Transylvania Series entitled Transylvanian Moonrise.]

“Okay, but why does that happen?” I asked, puzzled.

“At this stage of technology, the interaction between man and device is done at the quantum level,” he explained. “Everything you think ‘interacts’ with the device’s systems. If there is no consistency between your attention and the subject chosen for viewing, then the images are interrupted. Your thoughts and emotions only help to launch the ‘theme’ in the beginning, and you can adjust some images on the go, focusing on what you are looking at according to your particular interest. It would be like going in a particular direction of the subject, but if your mind ‘slides’ into all sorts of digressions, then you interrupt the connection created between your synapses and the cumulative electromagnetic waves emitted by the device; and in such a case, it will no longer ‘respond’ to you.”

Stunned by the description of the technology, I refrained myself from making any comment, knowing that this was the reality of quantum phenomena in the experiments of contemporary physics. After I ceased the process of deduction and felt ready to stop my own thoughts, I resumed watching the lively experience of what I was seeing in the pictures.

I noticed that my understanding of what I was seeing was of great importance because my cognitive processes then led to the development of explanations rendered in images on the holographic screen.

If my understanding was unclear or even totally absent, then the imaging and information process stopped. My experience with this high-tech device showed me that, generally speaking, it did not emphasize anything if I did not “ask” or were not aware of that particular aspect.

In resuming my interaction with the device, I reconstructed my ideas and initial interest as to the origins of humanity and realized that the interruption actually brought me a further knowledge of what was happening with regard to galactic history at that particular time. Through the mysterious telepathic interaction between me and the helmet, I realized that there had been a cosmic mission which consisted of creating a new species of humanoid beings on our planet; and further, those advanced alien civilizations had to “change” the ancient genetic links that existed in the DNA molecule of primates on the surface of the Earth in order to accelerate evolution, as well as to give it a certain and much improved orientation of the process.

Such interventions, however, are done in full agreement with universal and natural cosmic laws because everything is integrated on multiple levels and in synchronization with the dimensions of the universe, not just at the physical level. For example, I asked how that “change” was made to initiate the process of creating a new and superior human being that is closer to nature. I had already seen how “priming the DNA” was prepared by “dynamizing” and awakening it from “numbness” or dormancy by reason of the energetic influence of the specific stellar configuration represented by the symbol E-I.

Now, I wanted to know what was actually meant with regard to the process of forming the humanoid being as a new distinct race; that is to say, Man itself, and what were the details of that process. I will explain this below, but I came to understand that such a fundamental change in the intimate structure of a being, with regard to its very “code” of life, cannot be done in a gross manner with “scalpel and scissors” as some people might imagine.

GALACTIC LEVELS AND BENEFICIAL INTERVENTION

What provoked this necessary “splitting” to begin the process of modulating the characteristics of a “basic being” in order to obtain a much more highly evolved being? This is not done only by reason of interventions with genetic manipulation. Even though this has been done to a large proportion of beings, the random aspect of their development remains because individuals are different by their very nature.

You cannot determine or dictate only through a “surgical” intervention, even if it is sophisticated and technologically advanced. There is no substitute for the way in which Nature will take that change and develop it in those beings. In other words, you cannot simply “fabricate” humanoid beings through endless genetic interventions in the hope that they will become “autonomous” and have a good and stable structure of the DNA macromolecule in order to ensure the success of a new species of intelligent beings.

In addition to such interventions, which are undoubtedly necessary at certain times, the natural course of life must be allowed to proceed according to its cyclical rules as the evolutionary process is not just about certain operations at the physical level but also involves more subtle dimensions such as subtle bodies and the souls of beings. We are not talking about a simple cloning or robotic determination for the new being but rather the integrity at all levels of existence, all of which has to be taken into consideration.

For this, the best method for evolution of the Earth’s primates was considered to be the subtle help offered by certain advanced alien beings to facilitate the bodies of those primates that were already at a certain level of development. As I have seen, there has been a very interesting entanglement for some time between some advanced alien beings and developed primates.

This would have been impossible, however, if there had been no initial intervention of primate DNA on Earth involving the “modification” of certain elements within the DNA macromolecule so as to generate a new molecular chain of superior DNA.

As we have shown, this was accomplished by focusing the specific E-I energy at a certain point in the DNA of a primate at a specific time and space in order to make the necessary changes in the way that the bonds in the carbon atom are created. Hence, the possibility of carbon atoms bonding with other atoms and the “building” of a new superior DNA strand was possible under the permanent influence of energy specific to the respective stellar configuration. Further, the deeper “modification” involved the combination of the DNA of primates on Earth with the genes of alien beings, all taking place in various stages, who assumed the role of parents of Mankind. In this way, the process of forming a new humanoid species was initiated.*

* The extraterrestrial origin of human DNA is already certified by many researchers, but it is not yet officially recognized by contemporary science. Some experts in the study of the human genome in Kazakhstan have asserted, after 13 years of intense research, that human DNA was conceived and engineered in its evolution by an advanced alien civilization that “planted” a very complex program with two versions: one containing an extensively structured code and one containing a simple basic code. At the end of the study, scientists concluded: “Sooner or later (...) we will have to accept that all life on Earth bears the signature of the genetic code of our extraterrestrial cousins and that, in fact, evolution (on our planet) is not what we believe it is.” [from the Romanian editor]

TEMPORAL DATA TECHNIQUE

When I returned to the history of DNA modification and the development of E in E-I and E-U, I wanted to know the time when that extraordinary phenomenon took place. I noticed then that the spaces between the vertical symbols in the files were not regular, but there were different distances between the signs. At that moment, I had the telepathic understanding of the fact that those distances were representative of temporal values. They were in different colors and widths; some thinner, some thicker.

Then, between the two columns of signs, some sort of “bridge” links appeared which I understood to be “notations” that were correlated with frequencies. I focused on them, and then one of the “notations” grew, and I could even hear a sonorous representation. Through the intuitive induction of the inter-dimensional helmet, I then understood that that frequency was correlated with the time I wanted to find out. After this understanding manifested instantly in my mind, it appeared to me that the period of frequency was correlated to the number 4.

I then turned my attention to the other “notations” (i.e. frequencies) and I had the understanding of the time when the first DNA change occurred in a primate on Earth. In other words, when the first implementation of the new information came about, the moment when it all started for the human race was by the action of the “rays” that created the first significant change in a link of a carbon atom in that primate’s DNA macromolecule. With the general understanding I had acquired and by continuing the process of understanding how to interpret frequencies, the moment I was looking for was revealed to me in the image as about 432,000 years ago.

I then saw other overlapping symbols that indicated that period of time even more thoroughly, but I could no longer decrypt them. It was difficult to focus my attention, probably because the refinement of the information was too great. I did realize, however, that those symbols showed me exactly the time, the hour, and an even more precisely detailed time than that. The device always determines what a viewer can see, depending upon their level of consciousness.

For example, I can say that the first digit after the number 2 was 7, even if it oscillated somewhat, but something was unclear there. It was as if I could not “perceive” that frequency very well. In other words, the number of years trended toward 433,000 because it was really 432,7(_ _). After the 7, however, everything tended to fade because the information was too fine for my perception, and I was beginning to hear a complex set of sounds that I could not decipher very well.

THE GRAND COSMIC SHOW

I was shocked by the accuracy of the items that the device presented. Almost immediately, the images and symbols on the screen began to rewind. I was then shown another moment in time which I identified to be around the year 421,3() B.C., about ten thousand years later, the length of the stellar alignment that influenced the carbon bonds in the DNA of the primates. This was a new phase of development of human DNA because I afterwards saw another primate with more evolved features.

The images did not last too long at this juncture, but they moved to a third phase which I understood to be around 372,5() years, although I had some doubts as to the figure 5 being accurate as my consciousness sometimes confuses this with the figure 6. This error, however, was relatively small.

An image of a huge alien ship appeared on the screen. It was spherical and amazingly large, like a planetoid. I could make this comparison because it was close to Earth. There were then some quick “flashes” from different areas of that colossal structure before the image stabilized and focused on the central control area of the ship.

We saw a large room where humanoid beings were present, taller than our present average. The image stopped and focused on the man who seemed to be the master of the ship who was in front of a large holographic screen. At that moment, I was shown how the ship’s master decided to emit an electromagnetic signal which was blended with the gravitational influence of a star. I noticed that if I imagined a line from that ship passing through the center of the Earth, the star was in the diametrically opposed area.

On the holographic screen in the giant ship’s control room, we saw a linear assortment of lines and symbols that resembled stars that we can now see on astrological maps but with an astonishing accuracy of details. I then felt the helping presence of the Apellos man because my mind tended to get stuck due to the complexity of the knowledge I was dealing with.

I received telepathic information that the ship’s commander actually looked at the screen towards the possibility of creating a change in the DNA of primates on Earth, supporting in turn the modification of the carbon atoms in the DNA helix chain as was previously mentioned. I noticed, however, that when the subject of the origin of man on Earth was re-launched, the information was then much more detailed than when it was originally presented to me for the first time.

I have interpreted this through the prism of the mental and emotional modes that should be used when working with the holographic screen and the inter-dimensional helmet but also through a certain understanding of what I already knew. At the same time, I thought that such technology is inconceivable to modern science, but I immediately realized that the image was starting to blur due to the fluctuation of my concentration. The Apellos man then intervened again, correcting the image so that I would not have to “rewind” it all back to the beginning. Speaking to me telepathically, he said the following.

“Indeed. There is a huge difference between conceiving something and the technological level of realization. Working in this way with the stellar influences that your scientists do not even suspect might exist, it is impressive even for us. In any case, this moment of time you are seeing on the screen is fundamental. It represents the beginning of your race as superior human beings.”

“But you are not part of the same race?” I asked, slightly taken aback.

“Yes, but there has been a further hybridization with us, and we have developed in Apellos in isolation, evolving without any undesirable interventions, but it was more complicated for you.”

The man then made a sign, inviting me to follow the historical thread of these exceptional revelations.

The stage of life on Earth at the time that giant ship appeared in our planet’s neighborhood seems to have been very important. The images at that time showed me the traces of a space conflict in our solar system. I could not, however, see the nature of that conflict in the cosmos, who determined it or what was the reason for it, probably because it did not come within the scope of the theme upon which I was focusing.

The images showed me only a few sequences during the war with terrible battles in outer space, but I was very interested in how the superior human being came into being on Earth, and this was the reason why those images of conflict appeared in a rather fast and flashing sequence, pointing out only the most important aspects of a secondary story, as was that spatial conflict, but which still had a certain connection with the subject that interested me.

CHAPTER FIVE — TENEKAU AND MANKIND'S ORIGINS

I was shown some pictures of the period that followed the terrible war in space. I did not understand the reason at first, but it was revealed to me later. The huge ship suffered great damage during the repeated and harsh attacks of the enemy fleet, requiring repairs. I saw that it had been decided to extract ore from Earth because I noticed how many other small ships descended from the giant spherical ship to Earth before returning and bringing various materials to the orbiting vessel. I received the telepathic understanding of the fact that they were carrying some deposits of which the gold ones were the most important because this metal was part of the mother ship. It was practically a confirmation of what is written on the Sumerian tablets discovered and translated in the last century.*

* Indirect reference is to Zecharia Sitchin's books on the contents of the Sumerian tablets describing the process of the evolution of the human race on Earth. [Romanian editor]

The convergence zone where the ships descended to and then climbed back into space from was the Arabian Peninsula, as I realized from the geography of the area.

 This is different from the descriptions on the tablets which indicate that the exploitation of gold and other metals began in South Africa. The materials extracted in the Arabian Peninsula, however, could be other than the gold which was extracted in Africa, probably by other vessels. [Romanian editor]

FIRST CONTACT

The image focused on one of the mid-size alien ships that landed in a place with little vegetation that was relatively rocky. The picture then changed when the creatures in the ship loaded more parallelepipedal containers. I saw how manipulation of those parallelepipeds was done by levitation and with just hand gesture, without anything being touched. Such an object, which was quite massive, was pulled out of the carrier, and then, through levitation, it was oriented vertically, staying in the air about a meter high from the ground. “Light tubes”, which were buried in the ground, then emerged from it. I could see through them how a kind of “liquid” was extracted from the ground and then stored in the container. Involuntarily, I thought that was the easiest and most advanced and efficient form of “mining” I had ever seen, but the picture began giving signs of instability, so I focused again on what was presented, wanting to see the point of it all.

Among the rocks and vegetation in that area, I was able to see in the picture a group of native beings, a kind of primate that were more evolved, similar to homo erectus. They looked curiously but fearfully at the ship and the alien beings around it, still keeping a comfortable distance.

At one point, one of the extraterrestrial beings, who seemed to be the commander of the transport ship, saw those primates and the way they showed their curiosity. He then came closer, stopping for a few moments and observing them carefully in a slightly mild state. At first, I did not understand why those images were shown to me so I formulated the question in my mind. At that moment, I began to feel the empathy of that extraterrestrial being as he carefully watched the primitive beings in front of him, creatures that still retained certain features of the great primates. I felt the germ of an idea becoming more and more outlined in that man’s mind as he assessed certain possibilities related to those primates.

At the same time, I had the understanding that the alien creatures that lived as crew could not stay for a long time in our atmosphere on the Earth’s surface due to some physical characteristics of the Earth’s atmosphere which were incompatible with their constitution. As soon as I understood this, the image on the screen changed, and I saw the inside of the ship on the ground, a round and quite large room in which there were five masculine beings, including the ship's commander, who actually talked about this aspect.

By amplifying the telepathic transmission, I understood that the members of the crew had made the decision to start using some of the primates who were more curious and more evolved to carry out the mining work. They wanted to do this by using a mental transmission technology on the primates and then using their bodies for the surface affairs on the planet.

FIRST STEPS IN THE TRANSFORMATION OF DNA

My understanding quickly arrived at new values. For example, it was clear to me that the crew's decision on that transport ship had a double meaning: on the one hand, primates were helped to evolve very quickly due to the mental influence of alien beings and their technology; and on the other hand, the crew also benefited from the aid of physical labor from those great primates as the bodies of those aliens could not withstand the soil very well.

I then asked which alien civilizations those beings belonged to, and I immediately received the response in my cortex that it was one of the civilizations derived from the Sirians which originated from a system in the constellation of Orion's Belt. The images then suddenly changed and I saw a multi-planet system around a relatively small star located in the vicinity of the main stars of the Belt.

The process of modifying primate DNA in that area of the Earth — which would then trigger the entire chain of transformation to reach the evolved human being — was staggeringly complex and virtually unthinkable for today's scientific conception. We have seen that the level of action and forces involved in that grandiose plan have reached an extreme breadth, from the quantum level to our galaxy.

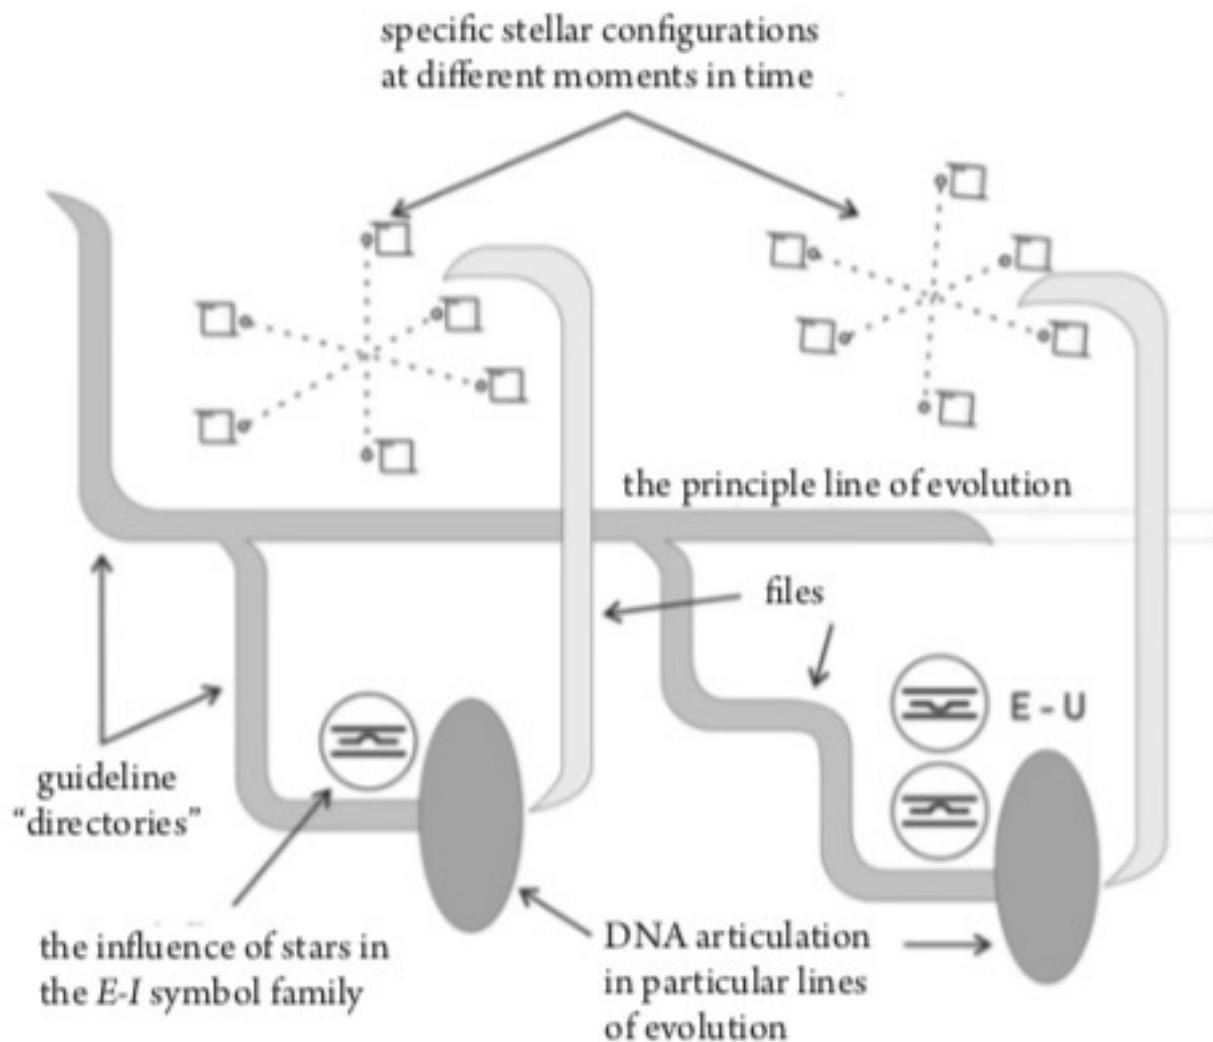

THE CONSTELLATION OF ORION, OR THAT OF THE HUNTER, WITH THE THREE MAIN STARS FORMING THE “BELT”

First, there was a need for a structural change in the DNA of the first primates on Earth in order to prime the process of evolution. When I wanted to understand a more nuanced way in which that extraordinary leap from the primate to a more evolved form and level of consciousness occurred, a sequence of files instantly appeared on the screen, like the ones I have previously described, accompanied by various symbols. These files had certain guidelines. I understood then that they were related to and in fact represented a “folder” or, to make a connection with a modern understanding, a directory.

SCHEMATIC REPRESENTATION OF SOME EVOLUTIONARY PHASES IN HUMAN DNA

I had already seen in the previous images the symbols E-I and E-U, both of which were stars or a number of stars connected to each other at a specific frequency. As I said, they indicated an “alteration” of the linkage of a carbon atom in the primate DNA to create multiple possibilities that would form new structures within that DNA.

We also saw the huge alien ship, both in the configuration of the star-like alignment as well as it being near the Earth. We noticed, however, that when we came back to an aspect or phenomenon, asking to review a presentation again, other details or correlations were revealed to me in pictures that had not been included up to that point. This was important because it allowed me to then subdivide the subject on the basis of new details and through asking additional questions in order to get deeper into this knowledge.

TWO IMPORTANT SYMBOLS

In fact, I was pursuing two main directions: on the one hand, to clarify some details that I did not understand very well; and on the other hand, to try to get more information on the subject studied. I could only do this by repeating some images, sometimes even two or three times, in order to better understand that summary or to decode, as much as I could, the meaning of the images. The Apellos man was a discreet and agreeable presence that I felt was not in any way disturbed by the “maneuvers” I was engaged in. In addition, the increasingly secure and fast communication with the device I had access to was a pleasure, and I began to better understand the way of “conversing” with the highly advanced technology that was integrated into the construction of the holographic screen and the inter-dimensional helmet.

As a novelty to what I had learned before, I noticed that two of the symbols were present everywhere: the star symbol E-I, which always appeared when it was in a star configuration in the galaxy; and a symbol that resembled, graphically speaking, the number 11, which represented a certain action at the quantum level in the atoms that make up the macro-molecule of DNA. As I pictured this, I understood that that symbol represented the ability to unite. In other words, when two aspects were different, they joined together and became one, and this process was represented by that symbol.

THE COSMIC VESSEL NEIBERÁU symbol E-I

symbol E-N

The file complex on the screen was accentuated by the primate's image at different stages of development and with some symbols. At the top of the paper I again saw the representation of the group of stars in the galaxy, united in a specific way through certain lines and symbols, but this time I noticed a smaller circle at the end of such a line, a smaller circle than the circles that symbolized the other stars.

I also saw a second symbol beside the fixed symbol, over which I felt a strong emotion. Then, immediately, the symbol grew on the screen and turned into a clear and large image, representing the huge spherical cosmic space ship that I mentioned previously. Immediately, through a combination of frequencies and states in my mind, I understood that the name of the ship was NEIBERÁU. There is, however, a small variation involved because I also understand there to be a similar name known as NEIBERÉA.

STELLAR ALIGNMENT TO WHICH THE SYRIAN SHIP NEIBERÁU BELONGS

I immediately realized that a correlation can easily be made with a theme that is now widely publicized but misunderstood. The consonants in the names were stronger; and therefore, as a necessary connection, I think the names “slipped” into “N I B I R U” as an updated version currently used.*

* It is very likely that this explains a great confusion that has long been circulated on the internet or in other works concerning the “planet” Nibiru which, according to Sumerian tablets from 3600 years ago, visited with unusually devastating effects on the Earth. If we consider the author’s words, then Nibiru is indeed the great Sirian ship Neiberáu. [Romanian editor’s note]

Besides, the fact that the images did not blur nor disappear from the holographic screen when I thought of these aspects was further proof to me that this correlation is correct and is directly related to the huge alien ship.

What amazed me was the fact that that this ship occupied different positions in the galaxy, filling the corresponding “empty” place of another star in the essential configurations I was shown. I understood then that it was placed in an area of the galaxy so as to create the structures necessary to implement, in successive phases, the appropriate frequency to cause some change in the DNA of primates on Earth.

I then wondered why such a complex engagement was needed and how it was possible for those influences to propagate so precisely, from a gigantic level to a tiny level. Moreover, why did the cosmic energies generated by this specific stellar alignment not then affect everybody, such as all primates or other beings that existed then on Earth and not just a certain primate from those times?

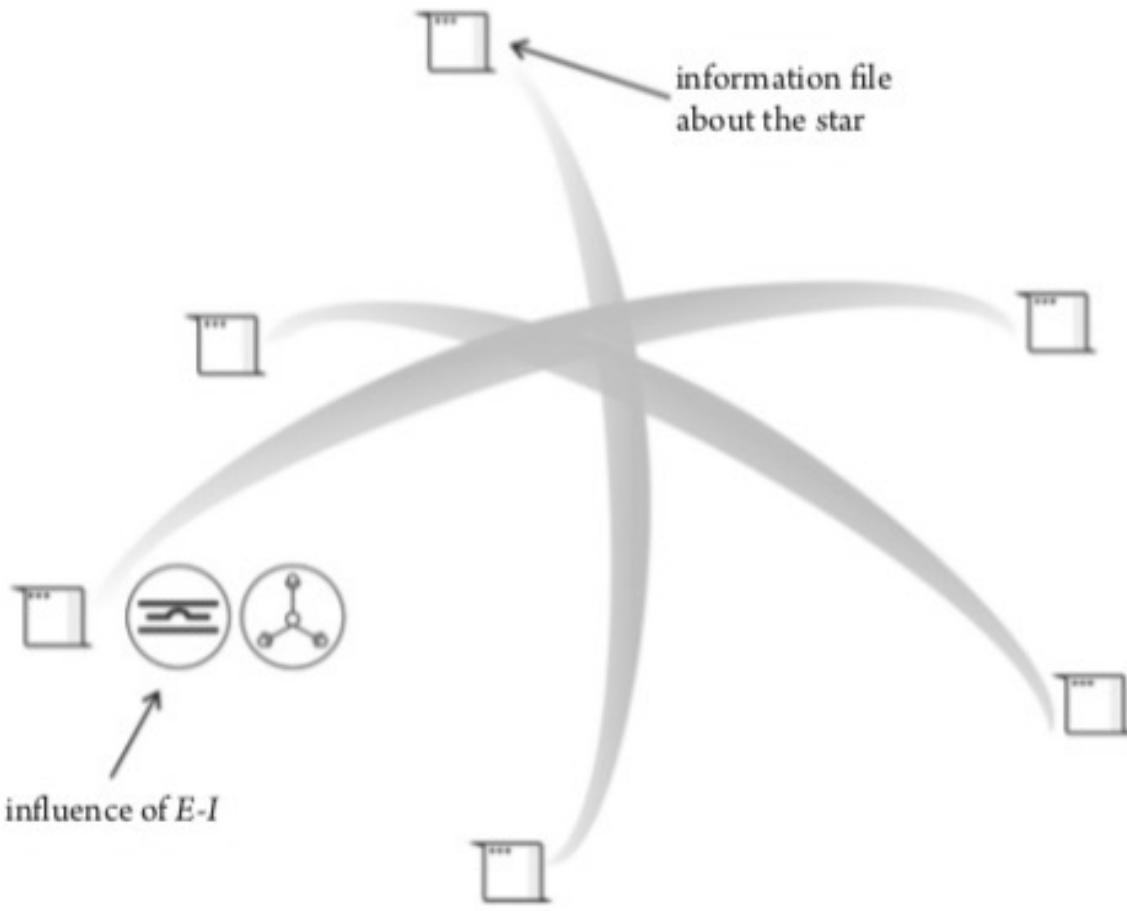

The screen immediately “reacted” and pointed out that these were the only primates in which a special change was implemented while other primates remained “inert” to the same subtle influence. I immediately understood the idea, and I even thought that the old saying could very well apply here: “It is not for whom it is, but for whom it fits.”

This selectivity seems to have been essential, and from the height of the extraordinary technological and spiritual advancement of the extraterrestrial beings that initiated the process of DNA modification in that primate, it determined a whole chain of gradual yet really quite fast transformations at the DNA level of other primates. The latter also served as receptacles for some subtle information that led to the appearance of man. I realized then that everything was an action of extraordinary programming and genetic engineering at the highest level, something which today cannot even be conceived of in similar terms, both because of the conceptual limitations of modern science as well as the lack of necessary technology. In the cosmic scheme of the stars that were involved in this immense plan to form a superior being who would become man, there was always the clear impression of interventions by superior aliens.

On the screen, I saw that next to each star was a symbol which the Apellos man told me indicated the overall scheme of timing and influence by very evolved entities from the subtle planes that would enable the star to interact in a certain way and at a certain point of time with another star, indicated by the line that unites them. When I understood this, the image on the screen changed and I could see everything from above. This seemed to represent that I had achieved a superior step of understanding, a superior look at that reality. I could not see the stars anymore but there were some kind of ties or “wisps” between the positions they occupied. It was a very complex subtle network between those focal areas, i.e. between the correlated stars. As I had first seen the subtle bonds between two electrons, so did I notice the subtle etheric link at the star level. Only then did I understand the profound truth that had been revealed to me about the quantum bonds between the electrons. I have noticed that the understanding of the entanglement phenomenon is only a small step in order to be able to understand the complexity of the links that exist between the stars in the universe, and these are far more spectacular than those links generated by gravitational forces.

SUBTLE NETWORK OF “ENTANGLEMENT” BETWEEN STAR

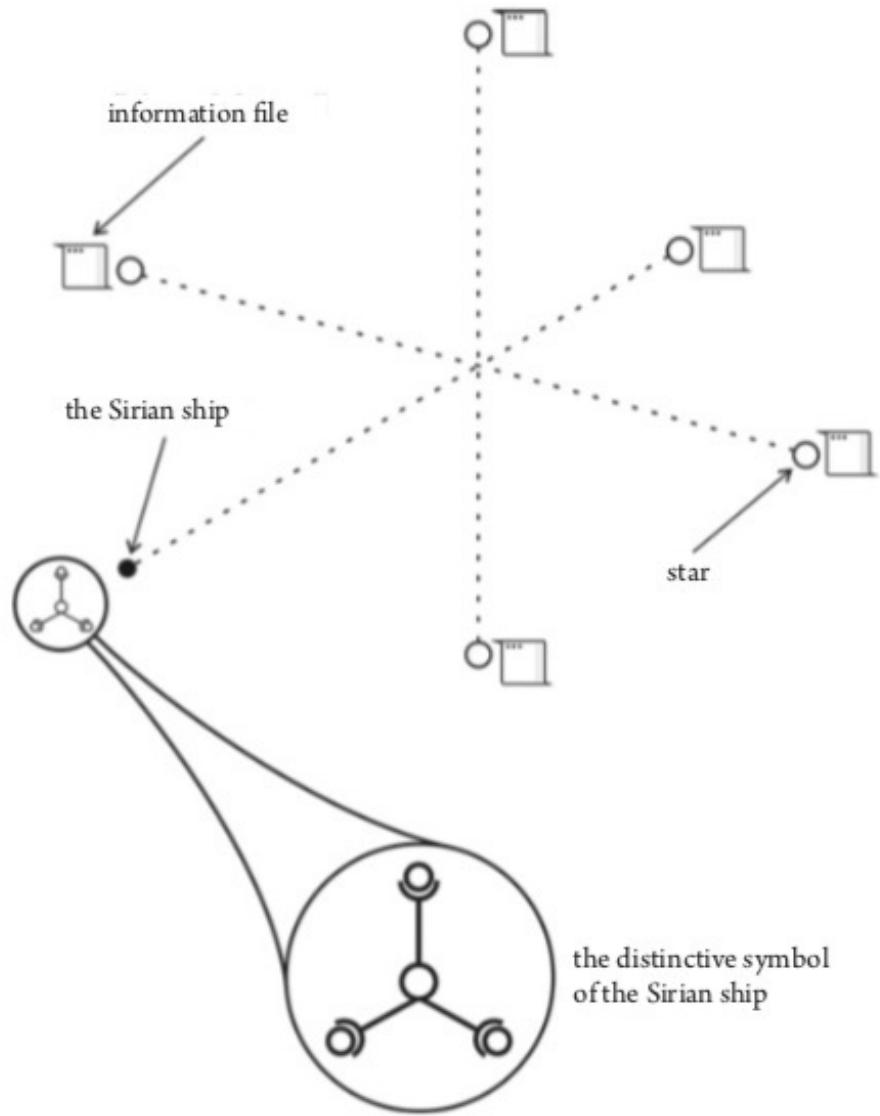

On the screen, I could still see two different phases of primate evolution, presented in parallel, with two different star configurations of their position in our galaxy. In the “network” between what the Neiberáu ship and the stars were forming, the celestial object was always in the middle and being influenced by subtle energy. In the first stage, I saw that our place was occupied by our own planet, and at a later stage, I saw that that central spot was occupied by the Sun in our Solar System.

The Neiberáu was beyond the Moon, perfectly round and slightly smaller, shining brightly in the sky, but it was different in this respect from the Moon by its light blue color, as seen from Earth. I was presented with different images from different angles of Neiberáu’s position and admired this special heavenly spectacle of the Earth apparently having two very “bright” satellites.

The beginning of this crucial moment in time was presented to me in sequential order. First, I saw the main command room inside the huge Neiberáu ship with its commander calculating the best possible configuration or network of stars that could specifically influence the DNA of certain primates from the Earth. I realized that he was particularly interested in determining the moment when that influence could be done with the greatest efficiency. I smiled because what I saw was very similar to actual astrology, but on a much more advanced level, and to me, this implied an astounding knowledge.

The control board of the ship was complicated and extended over a large circle arc. Behind it were several beings, but telepathically, I understood that there were also other command centers at different levels of the ship, each one specialized in one particular direction of action: military, space jumps through cosmic chasms, and so on. The control room I was viewing, however, was the main one in which the most important decisions were made.

THE STELLAR CONFIGURATION THAT THE SIRIAN SHIP WAS A PART OF

I saw how the main device onboard, which could be likened to a modern computer, could quickly manifest a myriad of stellar alignments in rapid succession. This was, in fact, a very large “crystal display” on which holographic information was projected.

The commander of the ship then chose a particular configuration and decided to move the ship to a certain place in the cosmic space near the Earth, maintaining a certain stationary orbit around the planet, just like the Moon.

Later, I saw and intuitively understood how the beings in the main command room promulgated the electromagnetic emissions of the ship to that of the star with which it wanted to create a link, thus giving rise to a so-called phenomenon of “galactic entanglement”.

I was then shown the triggering of the entire network of subtle energy between the stars in the cosmic configuration that I had seen at the beginning; and then, the immense action influencing the area in the galaxy where the Earth is. After that, the simple structure of the DNA of that primate from Earth appeared on the screen. Finally, I saw the carbon atom and the resulting quantum modification, a factor which was essential to reorienting the evolution of a large group of primates from Earth towards a higher state of being.

THE CHRONOLOGY OF THE FIRST STEPS OF TRANSFORMATION OF DNA

As I said, the first moment when the cosmic influence for triggering the plan to create the human being was implemented was around 432,000 B.C. More specifically, I was able to understand that it was 432,7(____) B.C., but the fineness of the frequencies and periods for the last two digits of that “distance” in time was too great for me to understand. This influence lasted approximately 10,000 years, corresponding to the time period for that stellar configuration. Transformation of primate DNA had begun to become increasingly apparent, and its effects increased over the next 50,000 years.

Later, that terrible war followed from space, and the Sirian shuttles began to descend on Earth to extract various materials, especially gold, needed to repair damaged parts of the Neiberáu mother ship. This was about 372,5(____) or 372,6(____) B.C. according to the audio frequency conversion.

Because they needed a workhorse tailored to the specifics of the planet, alien creatures on the ship decided to support the development of the primates and “work together” with them to extract the metals they needed.

This event was rendered as “Enki’s descent on Earth” as the resultant frequency of the cumulation of symbols related to that decision were resonant with the symbol E-N.*

* The author refers to the contents of the Sumerian tablets describing the Anunnaki “gods” who came to Earth (Enki and Enlil) as well as the origin of the human being and the way in which it appeared. For more information in this direction, see the books of Zecharia Sitchin. [Romanian editor’s note]

Then, not knowing what internal impulse was driving me, I wanted to find out more about that extraterrestrial being that was the first to trigger the radical transformations that would lead to the creation of Mankind. Soon, however, I was going to find out that the idea that sprouted in that alien mind — to use primates to help in terrestrial work and at the same time to help them evolve faster— was actually planned long before, highlighting much higher and more extensive dimensions of manifestation.

I was completely fascinated by the fact that I was seeing the very beginning of Mankind. Pragmatically speaking, thanks to the idea of Sirians using sophisticated technology on the primates existing at that time on Earth to achieve certain work, the foundations of the creation of a superior human being on our planet were laid. I have seen this in detail as well as the main faults which took place in the whole process. I also saw the motivations that led to the creation of the first human being and the nature that it had. I will come back to these issues later.

TENEKAU

As soon as I expressed my desire to know more about that Sirian being, I was presented with his image on the screen. He was wearing a blue coat with two stripes of a lighter color on the edges. At the same time, the information file, which I unfortunately could not comprehend, appeared in a “writing” that did not belong to our planet, based mostly on signs and symbols. The Apellos man, who was patiently attending to my investigation, spoke.

“He was called Tenekau. Indeed — it can be said that, from a certain point of view, he was “the Father of Mankind”, although this phrase is not exactly accurate. The plan for Earth was conceived of over eons at the causal level of the governing entities of this galaxy and of the universe we live in. It was hoped that there would be a certain manifestation of life in this area at a future time, but with a precision set by certain galactic conjunctions.

Tenekau was chosen a long time ago for that fundamental role because his DNA structure resonated with what he wanted to get from primate DNA. He was born aboard the Neiberáu and was directed at that unique moment in the history of Mankind, the moment when he looked at the primates and had the idea of transforming them and collaborating with them to ease the work on the ground. He has been constantly encouraged at the very subtle causal dimension to develop the plan of primate DNA transformation.

That moment coincides with what we might call the “Time of Tenekau”, the moment when that remarkable extraterrestrial creature descended on the ground from the carrier ship that had come from the conflict in space and saw a large group of primates hiding with fear in the bushes. The holographic images showed me that picturesque moment in detail. I then saw how one of the beings in the group had the courage to get out of the bushes and even get a little closer to the ship, being curious. Tenekau stopped abruptly, watching him carefully. I think that was his “sparkle of genius” because he then had a special idea that led to the transformation and evolution of large primates into a superior humanoid being. As a result of a much wider plan, however, the process of forming a new humanoid being on the Earth began about 60,000 years earlier at the cosmic level through the stellar alignment I spoke of earlier.

While I was looking at those extraordinary images that had a great emotional impact on me, I understood that that ancestral moment can be considered the very beginning of the path to the formation of Mankind, the first scrutiny of the idea of the genetic transformation of primitive beings into a superior humanoid being. I was also able to feel the first emotion of Tenekau, his first thought and his first intention, all of which led to the impressive work of genetic transformation that was to follow. The transmutation of the new humanoid was astounding, and this would eventually lead to what we are today: superior, intelligent and self-conscious human beings.

I also felt a vivid emotion because I was a virtual witness even to the “first move” of the colossal chain of genetic transformations that were to follow, and that is why I wanted to insist on viewing those images as they presented to me a highly exceptional and significant moment.

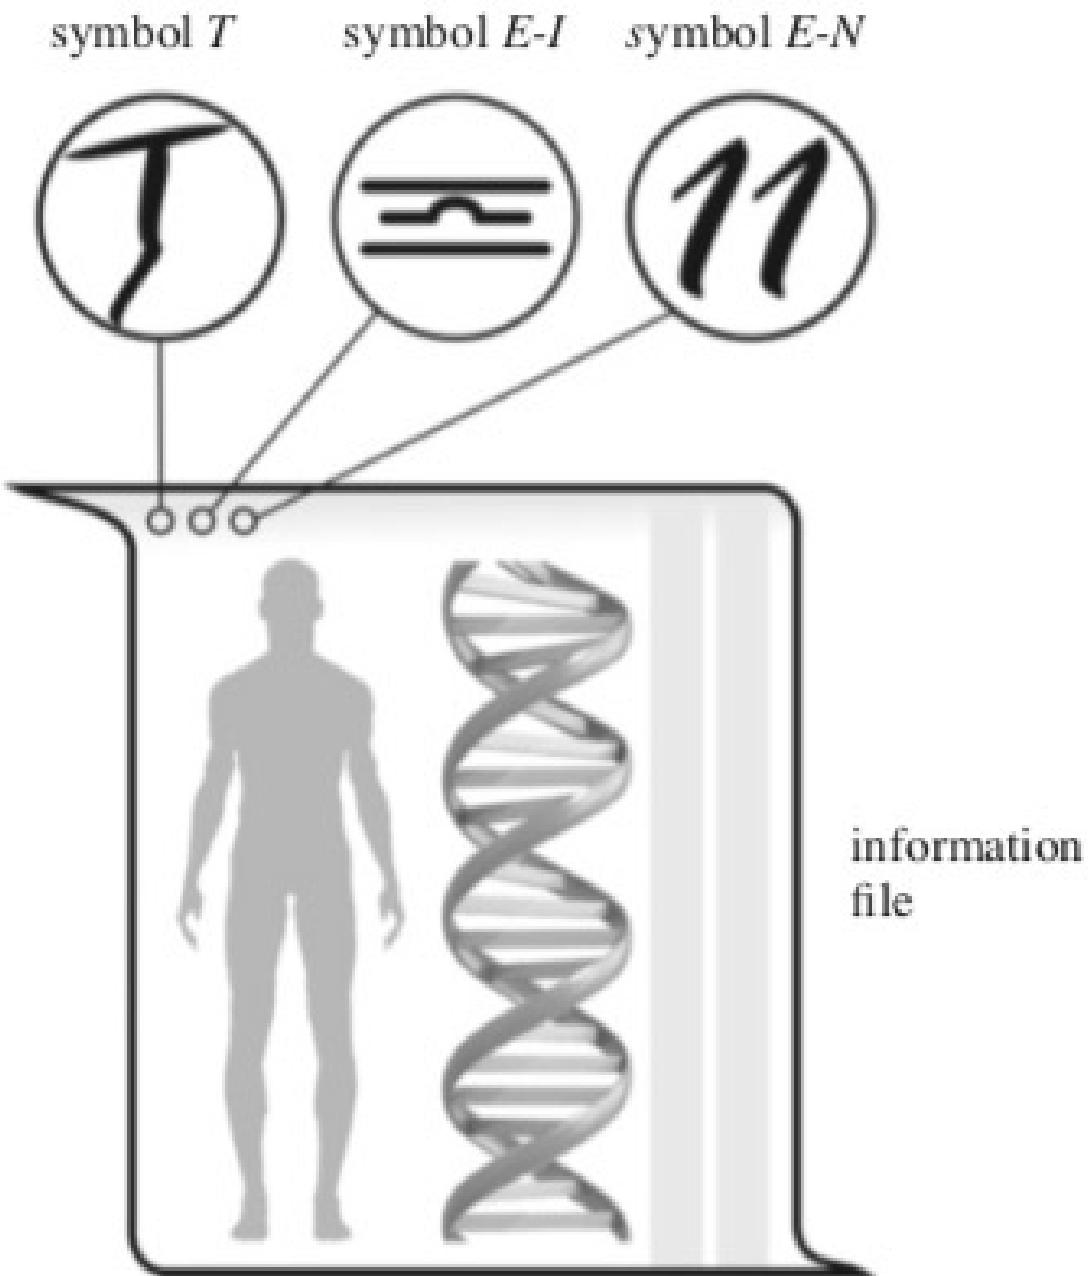

Due to the kind of “biofeedback loop” I had with the holographic screen, it “followed” my desire, and Tenekau’s image came to the fore. I saw him stop and look at that curious curiosity that was a few yards away. He bowed his head slightly to the left in a relatively meditative attitude, and that was the first trace of the idea that spurred into his mind his first intention of making a mental contact with those primitive beings. That idea then triggered a complex set of events that led to the transformation of primitive beings into higher beings.

Meanwhile, other crew members had begun to descend from the ship, bringing some equipment to the ground. After receiving his inspiration, the commander made a sign with his hand to the primates, and then joined the work of the others. But the images on the holographic screen showed me how his idea had already been arranged, being the last link needed to trigger the vast plan to form a new humanoid being in this galaxy sector.

In the beginning, Tenekau coordinated the entire plan only at the mental level. Only the primates who were curious and had a more bold spirit were chosen. After a certain period of time, I was even shown the way that initial plan was carried out. I saw Tenekau inside the ship, sitting in a kind of chair, leaning back, surrounded by certain sophisticated devices and mentally coordinating two items outside the ship, moving objects and doing various other tasks. One of them was lighter and even showed signs of a certain intelligence; the other primate was slower and more confused.

In the images I saw, Tenekau was a being that emanated a lot of bliss and deep respect for cosmic laws. I could tell from his outfit and the features of his face that his vast experience had revealed many spiritual mysteries and “carved” his formidable destiny, linked to that of the future of humanity. In a separate directory, he was depicted alongside the three distinct signs that characterized his name.

THE THREE SYMBOLS THAT DEFINE TENEKAU: T, E-I, E-N

THE SYMBOLS T, E, N, AND CHANGES IN DNA

In the spirit of my demand to know more about this first being who sparked the “spark” of humanity, the Apellos man continued to explain.

“Observe the similarity of the first symbol on the left with the letter T and also with the form of Orion’s Belt.”

Indeed. I had seen this before. In other words, displays on the screen in some areas are brighter and brighter and others less so and even darker, indicating the importance of that particular detail. In the case of Tenekau, the T-shaped symbol of Orion’s Belt was emphasized in this way.

CORRESPONDENCE OF THE T SYMBOL WITH THE STARS IN ORION'S BELT

THE T SYMBOL FOR ORION'S BELT WHICH

The middle part appeared brighter to indicate that Tenekau came from one of the planetary systems in the middle area of Orion’s center.

As my mind was coupled with the information that had been received so far about the amazing way in which the DNA of the primates had been formulated in that area of Earth; and by the fact that I saw the technological elements of the Sirian beings interacting with these primates in the background, I wanted to see, in an almost reflexive way, how their DNA evolved from the first star influence on the carbon atom. Almost instantly, the image changed, focusing on one of the primates on the surface of the Earth, after which the structure of its DNA was revealed.

SCHEMATIC OF PRIMATE DNA WITH ENERGETIC INFLUENCES OF E-I, E-N, AND T

I noticed that, in the molecular structure of the DNA, there were several areas to which the symbols E-I and E-N were independently associated, but there were also links where the two symbols appeared together. The T symbol appears to overlap the place where the first two symbols, E-I and E-N, are associated.

I have seen that T indicates a significant influence in the combinations that existed in the DNA of the evolved primate. The images showed me, in a way somewhat similar to what I had seen at the T-shaped tables in the Projection Room, a very powerful zoom inside of the DNA molecule: the isolation of an atom with the nucleus in its midst, after which I noticed the T symbol overlapping the atom. Such influence has created an excitation of the atomic nucleus which gave birth, through various core electrons, to a special hybridized electron orbit.*

* According to Wikipedia: In quantum physics, the hybridization process is a concept that involves the merging of atomic orbitals into so-called “hybrid orbits” (which have different energies, forms, etc. than those of the atomic orbits they come from) so that the pairing of electrons is suitable for the formation of chemical bonds. Chemical bonds are interactions that are established between atoms, groups of atoms, or ions. They are the power of attraction that manifests itself between atoms, binding them into molecules, ions or radicals. [note from the Romanian editor]

HYBRIDIZATION OF THE MAIN ELECTRON ORBITS OF THE CARBON ATOM UNDER THE INFLUENCE OF THE T SYMBOL

After hybridization, electronic orbits faithfully copied the geometric structure of the T symbol. With time, I realized that there was a connection between the geometric orientation of the hybridized orbits and the shape of a symbol appearing in the hologram. Since these symbols represent subtle cosmic realities, it follows that the “writing” we see is galactic. This is not, however, just conventional writing or symbols. It is not like the Latin alphabet nor any other modern alphabet that was invented and then used by certain populations. This extraterrestrial “writing” involves symbols that represent cosmic, atomic, and molecular structures, a writing that links the various levels of Creation and expresses profound and complex actions.

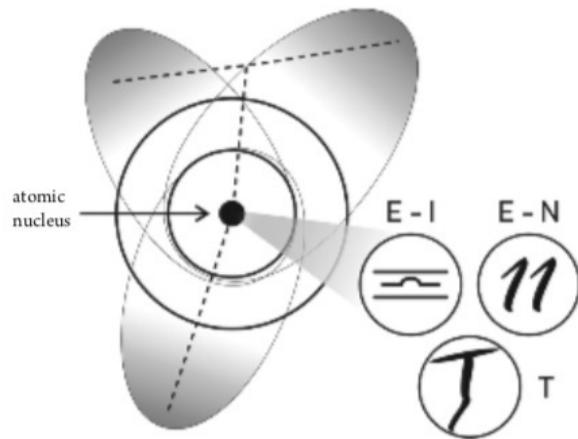

ORBITAL ARRANGEMENT ACCORDING TO THE INFLUENCE OF THE T SYMBOL

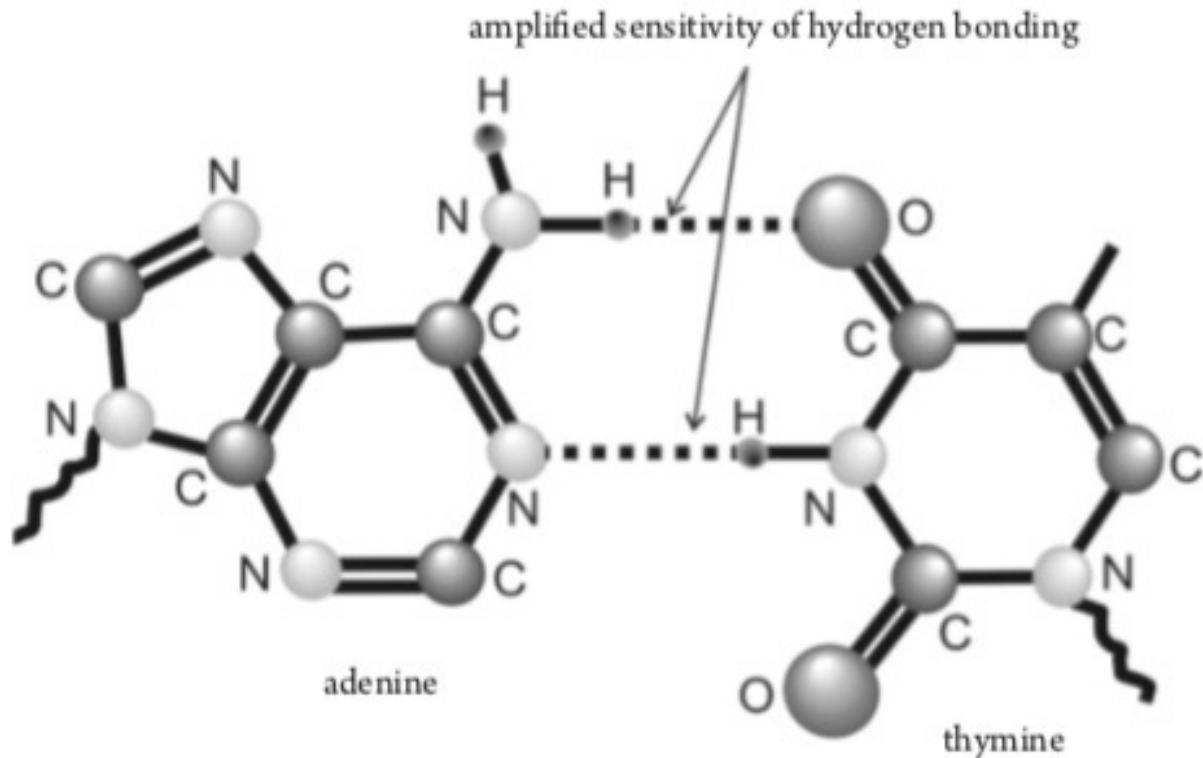

Starting from here, I later noticed that the nucleus of the atom resonates with the frequencies designated by the symbols E-I, E-N and T. Finally, I was shown the oxygen atom in the DNA with the hybridized orbits. Its hybridization resembled much of that found in the water molecule (H_2O), but instead of the two hydrogen atoms, there was a carbon atom. In the water molecule, a hydrogen atom is covalently bonded; and in the second semi-covalent, it is almost ionized. I saw something similar with the carbon atom in primate DNA. As a result of the various influences, both the oxygen atom and the carbon atom have a greater disposition to making covalent bonds as opposed to binding with other atoms. This could be seen, for example, at the hydrogen bonds between adenine and thymidine or between guanine and cytosine in the DNA macromolecule.

INFLUENCES ON CARBON AND OXYGEN HAVE CREATED AN ACCUMULATION OF FACTORS THAT HAVE INCREASED THE PREDISPOSITION FOR HYDROGEN BONDING IN THE DNA MACROMOLECULE

In the “translation”, the bonds between the oxygen atom and the hydrogen atom resonated with the frequencies designated by the symbol T , and the two carbon atoms with their bonds resonated with the frequencies designated by the symbol $E-I$. Beyond the carbon atom is another atom, which we later identified while studying the structure of adenine nitrogen atoms. It links to the carbon atom or to the hydrogen atom, and we have noticed that it acts with the frequencies designated by the unit symbol $E-N$.

On the whole, I saw how primates from that area on Earth received, over time, those influences in their DNA which were from Tenekau. Over time, the effects of this action could even be noticed in their behavior. After Tenekau had withdrawn his field of influence and mental support from technological devices, some primates were no longer amazed or scared, but on the contrary, they even manifested a certain dominance of self and maturity, a clear sign of the guided evolution.

Pragmatically speaking, I saw a purely advanced genetic engineering project that was highly and thoroughly engineered, and this was backed up by the very special Sirian technology. In the images I have seen, there were devices in the background, some even large, that were brought with shuttles by the Sirian beings to Earth. Later, they were stored on the ground and assembled by the Sirian crew.

The largest object of this type was a sphere with a diameter of approximately ten meters with two huge branches, like two antennas at the top. In the middle of the sphere, I saw a kind of command room with an “ergonomic” chair in which Tenekau sat down, coupling himself to the very complex apparatus in the sphere. Intuitively, I understood that he was using that device to emit a field perfectly suited to the frequencies that were needed to influence primate DNA in order to help them progress in an accelerated fashion. There were other smaller devices around the sphere that looked like cylinders resembling containers. They were on a support at a certain height above the ground.

THE FIELD EMITTER USED BY TENEKAU WHICH WAS REQUIRED TO INFLUENCE PRIMATE DNA

In the lower part, there appeared rays of white-yellow light that beamed to the ground as if they were lasers, forming turbines that facilitated extraction of the materials to be mined. As I saw those images, the extraterrestrial logistics operation extended over a large surface that probably covered several square kilometers. In the middle of it all was the “sphere of mental command” from which Tenekau coordinated the activities of primates so that they knew what to do.

THE SPHERICAL MENTAL CONTROL DEVICE SURROUNDED BY LASER CYLINDRICAL CONTAINERS

Tenekau's mental influence involved both the primates' work with those containers as well as their gradual transformation at DNA level through extraterrestrial technology. Gradually, primates began to remain in the areas where containers were extracted and where the mental control spheres were. Frightened at first, some left those areas, but I saw that, as their DNA changed its structure under the action of the modeling field, they did not run away and were no longer afraid.

THE HEXAGONAL SYMBOL

The implementation of frequencies designated by the E-I and E-N symbols had been achieved in the region we know today as the Persian Gulf. The frequency designated by the symbol E-I was used in the south, the one designated by the symbol E-N took place a little to the north, in an area situated to the right. As I have seen, images with the actual extraction of metals by the already transformed primates took place somewhere in a larger area to the north but also in the Persian Gulf area.

THE PERSIAN GULF AREAS WHERE THE

In the south, corresponding to the first transformations of DNA in primates, there was lush vegetation, but a little further north, in the wide fields where mineral extractions were done, I saw many cliffs, the landscape being quite arid. I kept my mind on the idea that preoccupied me from the beginning: the origin and evolution of the human being on Earth; and what appeared to me on the screen was an unfolding of this idea which I was not always able to understand or keep step with. Sometimes the presentation on the holographic screen was so complex that the descriptions and graphic renderings of the elements included here in this book were very difficult and would make reading very complicated. That is why I prefer to present the main elements as succinctly as possible and without going into too much detail. For example, how the action of the Neiberau alien ship, positioned in a certain network of stars, influenced the transformation of primate DNA at that time on a mental and emotional level is quite remarkable but also very complex. When this aspect was presented to me, I saw a succession of directories with their specific undulating forms. As one of the files was brighter, I removed the other directories and chose the one which opened with the image of the star network and the Sirian ship, Neiberau, near the Earth. The main action of this cosmic network was then “targeting” our Sun. It has not been shown what phenomena happened at that time around this star, probably because I did not ask for it, but it is certain that there followed a time when the Sun shined brighter, radically influencing the transformation of life on Earth. The Persian Gulf zone, corresponding to E-I and E-N, dried out, and primate tribes living in that area began migrating north to an area that had become lush with vegetation, just above the area where metal extraction took place. The lush area, not very extensive, was between two large rivers.* When the image reached this point, the familiar symbols T, E-I and E-N appeared on the geographical detail.

* It is quite possible that the author refers to the Tigris and Euphrates, rivers which are mentioned in the books of Zecharia Sitchin. The area that Radu Cinamar talks about is probably the area that was later known as “Eden”, the cradle of the emergence of the first evolved human beings. [Romanian editor’s note]

REPRESENTATION OF PRIMATE MIGRATION FROM THE PERSIAN GULF TO THE LUSH VEGETATION AREA

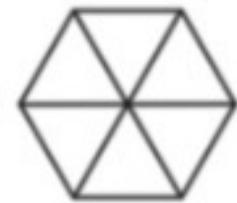

Besides the three symbols, however, I noticed the presence of a fourth. It was not a letter but had a more complex graphic representation, similar to a hexagon with diagonal lines.

The general symbol designating the specific influence in that area was therefore composed of T, E-I and E-N in which E-I and E-N were bright and T was weaker. The appearance of three letter symbols was followed by a pause, and then came the fourth symbol, the hexagonal one, which I felt was a state of happiness and exaltation, the source of which was the Neiberau ship.

I understood telepathically that this euphoric state was associated with only one particular place, a certain area corresponding to that area with lush vegetation between the two great rivers. The primates who had retreated to that area, attracted by it like a magnet, enjoyed an extraordinary joyous overflow which was directly acting on their emotions, refining them. I saw how the state of joy and happiness created a certain cohesion in primate groups that continued to find creative expression beyond the period of influence that came from the ship. This allowed them to feel more refined emotional states than other primates.

At that moment, I asked myself how emotions helped the evolution of the people other than giving them an exalted state of consciousness, something which obviously could not be permanent. Almost immediately, the image of a portion of primate DNA appeared on the holographic screen as several pulsating luminous dots that represented that they were living in happiness. I understood telepathically that those bright dots were portions of DNA that resonated with a cumulative frequency that was designated by the complex symbol: T E-I E-N (T E N).

This “game” of frequencies began to form some new complex modifications within the primate DNA molecule, and at some point, they developed themselves emotionally. This fact is remarkable because the refinement of such psycho-mental aspects signifies an important leap on the scale of the evolution of being by opening it to the higher frequencies in the Macrocosmos.

CHAPTER SIX — SPLITTING EVOLUTION

THE E-N-L AND E-N-K BRANCHES

Using the headset, I continued watching with much interest, aiming to focus as much as possible. As my intention was very clear, complex images emerged on the screen that represented the environment of these “new” primates. Changes in DNA that were directly related to the T, E, and N symbols created the possibility of an increase in vitality. On the other hand, the feelings, emotions and thoughts of those primates were influenced by the new structures in their DNA which were directly linked to the hexagonal symbol. As I said, the hexagonal symbol was the complex influence that the Neiberáu had on primate DNA.

Sustained work on the planet, however, required better coordination between crew members and primates, even with evolved ones. The damage that the great ship had suffered was great, and in order to repair it, they needed some of the metals that had begun to be extracted from Earth. The difficulty was that alien beings could not work too much time on the surface of the Earth due to differences in the environment between their ship and our planet.

To summarize the presentation, I understood that Tenekau had received a suggestion from the group of physicians on the Neiberáu to create a hybrid clone that would be enriched with genes from the more evolved primates that had already made an evolutionary leap by reason of the subtle influence of energy represented by the T-E-N-hexagon. Tenekau agreed, and so began a complex process of “modeling” the DNA macromolecule, all of which would lead to structures with extraordinary potentials for cloning beings in the future.

From that moment on, I only saw the figure and body of that being into which Tenekau's consciousness had been transferred. I was able to identify, through the "play" of the frequencies and resonances that I had somehow been taught, that the transfer of Tenekau's consciousness to that being occurred about 371 B.C.

These elements may appear to be in the field of science fiction, but I can assure the well-intentioned readers that the technology underlying this kind of transfer, which is both physical and inter-dimensional in its nature, has already begun to be "deciphered" on Earth at present. It is true that the Sirians in the Orion Belt Constellation have been mastering this technology for half a million years or maybe even more, but this shows that evolution has no borders; and the fact that something is unknown to contemporary scientists does not mean that it does not exist or has not been used so far.

The being that Tenekau had designed into which to project his consciousness did not look perfect, but it clearly already had all of the "improvements" at the DNA level because it was always on the screen with the full symbol: T-E-N - Hexagon. I understood that that cloned being was, in fact, a composition of all parts of primate DNA that were originally influenced by T-E-N - Hexagon. That was the very special being that was compatible with Tenekau.

The T-E-N - Hexagon symbol was continuously associated with that being and was as tall as Tenekau, about 2.50 meters. Unlike Tenekau, however, who had no hair at all and whose head was slightly elongated at the back, this creature had a head similar to that of a modern long-haired human. The color of the hair was amazing. It was platinum white, shining very beautifully in the light. Intuitively, I understood that this being was basically a cross between primate DNA and extraterrestrial DNA, but it was a genetic engineering product and not a result of genetically crossing-breeding physical bodies. This was clear because there were no sexual organs. Then, later, I saw that being as he had left the lab and walked out among the other primates with a gentle meditative air.

I did not understand, however, why there were more such bodies in the other cylinders in the laboratory. The most plausible hypothesis seemed to indicate more "variants" of the original prototype which also were to be tested. Although I did not insist on this point, I was curious to find out more about the creation and evolution of that hybrid being.

A DECISIVE MOMENT

I was so stunned by what I saw that I lost my focus. The screen images then became blurred. Excited, I realized that I was watching “live action” events that took place hundreds of thousands of years ago, and that I was really privileged to get this information.

Regaining my composure quite quickly, I focused on the subject again, recreating the mental-emotional connection with the holographic image playback device. I continued to focus on Tenekau and the clone I had seen. After the images became clear, I noticed that they presented a reality in time that was a few years afterwards because I could see that there were now cloned beings among the primates. These cloned beings worked hard in several areas in the southern Arabian peninsula, being helped by primates who, in turn, were mentally coordinated by various crew members on the ship.

The holographic images changed, depicting the Neiberáu’s huge command room, populated with a part of the crew. Then, another room was shown to me in the pictures which I immediately recognized as a medical room. I saw Tenekau talking to three of his fellow humans, and I also received telepathically the information that they were doctors on the great ship Neiberáu. There were other Sirian beings in that room with the characteristic insignia on their outfits which I could not decipher. I somehow realized, however, that they occupied high positions in the command hierarchy on the ship. They formed small groups in the room, discussing a particular subject with a lot of interest. I knew that this was an important topic about primates on Earth. At one moment, one of the beings raised his hand in front of himself, and a hologram appeared in the middle of that room, revealing some stellar configurations.

At first, I did not understand why those images were shown to me or what they represented. At one point, however, a star appeared in the image with the specific files, and their intersection focused on the Neiberáu. The image then grew, and I saw the Solar System, then the Earth, the ship, the middle area of the ship, and then a bunch of other creatures on the ship, including Tenekau. I did not understand the meaning of those images, and that is why I turned to the Apellos man. He smiled, looking at me as he spoke.

“What you have seen here is very complex. As is the case with astrology on Earth, it is working with planets, the Moon, the Sun, and other heavenly bodies but less often with other fixed stars. In the astrology known by those extraterrestrial beings, thousands of stars were taken into account, not just a few. When a birth occurs on a cosmic ship, the star influence is much stronger because it is in a place in space that is not related to the parents’ home planet. One such case was Tenekau’s. We were shown in the hologram image that, at the time of his birth, there were some star arrangements that had the same type of E and N structures which were found in primates on Earth. Tenekau grew up on the ship, taught on the ship, joined the military on the ship, and climbed the ranks. Throughout this time, he had the E and N type stellar influences in his DNA, also felt by primates on Earth over the last tens of thousands of years. When Tenekau descended to our planet with a ship to extract ores, he felt something “interesting” in the primates who were looking curiously at the ship. He resonated with the subtle stellar influences E and N which had already produced transformations in the DNA of those primates. I then saw images showing the connection between those DNA sections transformed by the stellar influences that existed in both the primates as well as that of Tenekau.”

“That was the reason that Tenekau was able to transfer his Consciousness to the clone. It could be easily accomplished because its genes were compatible with the primates. He realized the importance of those issues and sent a long report to his superiors on the Neiberáu. ”

I wanted to see that moment in detail and turned my gaze to the screen as the image cleared in seconds. A very large room was featured that was technologically oriented. Everything seemed to be done ergonomically, ranging from the layout of the objects to the forms of the technical apparatus which consisted mostly of different types of screens that were placed either vertically or horizontally.

The image presented Tenekau standing in front of a large screen that projected holographically many symbols, signs and images at a short distance in front of him. Seeing everything behind Tenekau's right shoulder, I realized that those were the moments during which he sent the vast report to his superiors. The images followed quickly, and I saw the moment when the answers came. Intuitively, I felt the very special subtle-energetic impregnation of that moment. Those moments were those that most definitely defined the destiny of humanity, the moment when the decision to create a new being was made.

The Apellos man helped me understand the new images I saw. He told me that Tenekau's report had the effect of a lightning strike on the upper echelon of the great ship Neiberáu. The commander, along with the ship's command staff, sent that report to the Wise Council on the mother planet. The answer was illuminating for all. Tenekau was informed that he was not randomly placed at that conjuncture in that place on Earth at that precise moment. He explained that all of this was planned long before on the level of the subtle superior planes; and that by his actions, he created the prototype of an evolved being that will exist in the future on this planet.

Tenekau then understood that, in reality, everything had been arranged and rendered so that he could synchronize and determine those decisions and actions he had committed. Even if his intention at the beginning was only to create a being with superior possibilities from the existing primates in order to help extract the ore they needed, everything was now making sense on a much deeper level. The order he received was for him to stay with his ship around the Earth and to support the necessary activities for the development and evolution of the primates that then existed in that area.

The problems arising from the spatial conflict continued to exist, but Tenekau was "detached" and received a direct order from that point on to support the natural evolution of the great primates on Earth who would, in time, become a thriving civilization. That order was given to him as well as to all leadership echelons on the Neiberáu. Upon receipt of that order, all of the crew and all the logistical resources of that giant ship were directed on the new mission. Only a small section of the ship would have to deal with the ship's military and security aspects in that area of the cosmos.

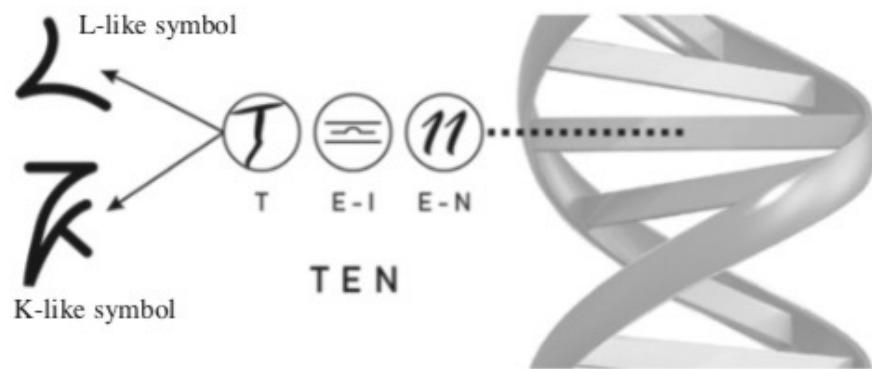

THE SIGNIFICANCE OF T

The images then showed a huge room where several alien creatures on the ship were studying the links between the stars and their possible configurations in order to implement certain energetic influences into the primate DNA to accelerate their natural evolution. The images on the holographic screen I was looking at proceeded quickly and stopped at a time when only two of the star structures were being studied. In front of those pictures were two symbols.

From the combinations of T, E, and N to the primate DNA, I saw that T, which was less intense than E and N, began to spin into two other symbols, representing two distinct families of frequency.

Then, on the screen, I was shown how the two frequencies combined, and their two symbols were united, resulting in a configuration whose intrusions were the very points in which the stars of the structure formed the necessary influence for the evolution of the primate.

THE INFLUENCE OF THE FREQUENCIES DESIGNATED BY THE SYMBOL T-E-N IN THE PRIMATE DNA AND THE SPLITTING OF T, REPRESENTING TWO DISTINCT FAMILIES OF FREQUENCIES

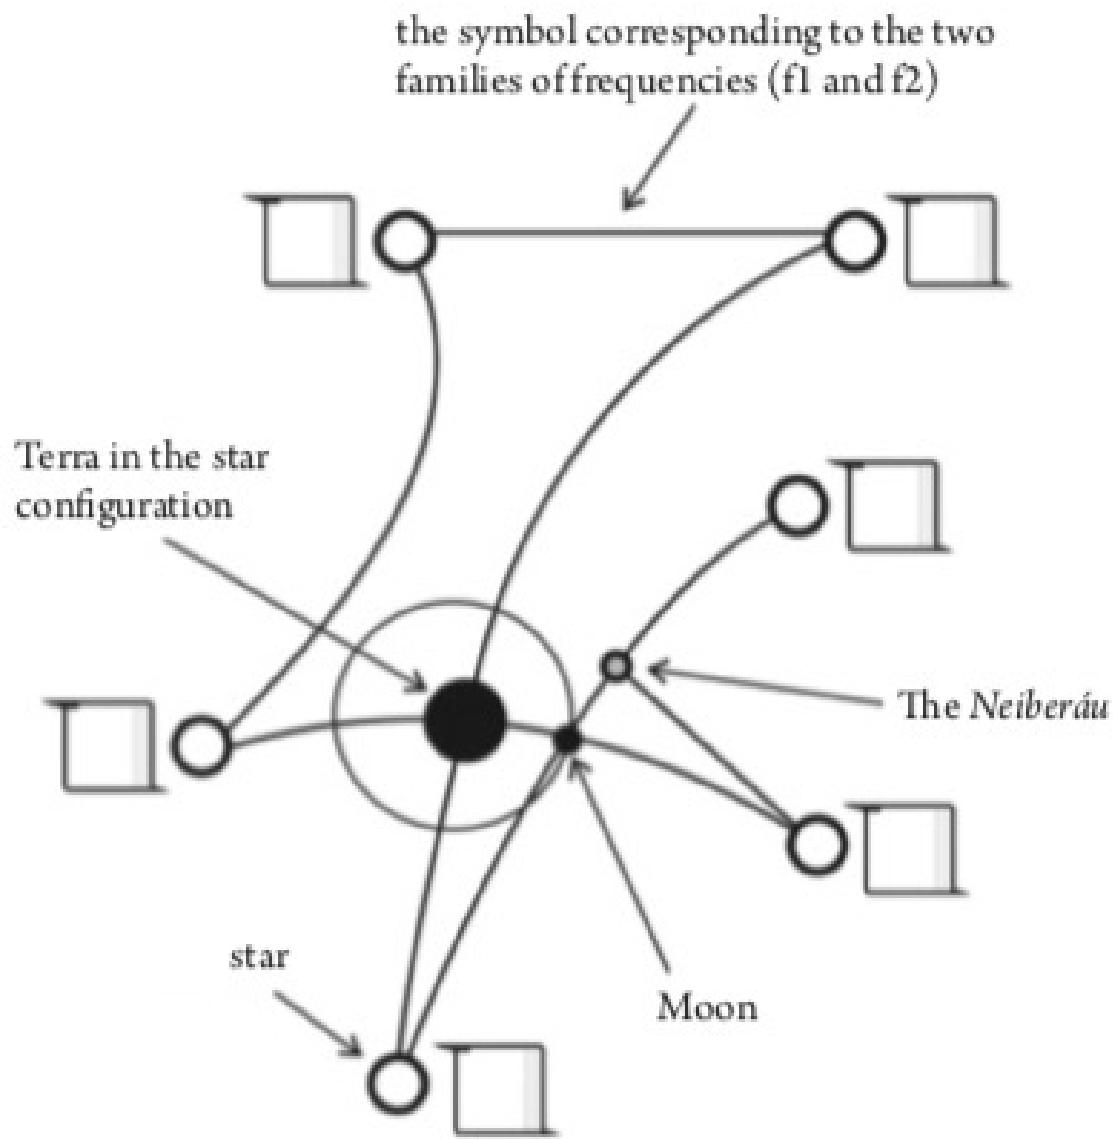

THE UNION OF THE TWO FREQUENCIES AND THEIR POINTS OF "STAR INTERSECTION"

At the primate DNA level, this splitting of T into two distinct families of frequencies represented the implementation of the ability to choose. The emotional states that these beings possessed allowed them to choose before engaging in a particular mode of action. It was no longer about instinct but rational feeling and choices being continually updated

Therefore, as we have understood from the succession of images, the frequencies designated by the $E-N$ symbol influenced the frequencies designated by the T symbol in the DNA structure. As a result, consequently complex interfaces were born that gave birth to new families of frequencies. These frequency families have been designated by two symbols: a K -like symbol and a second symbol similar to the letter L .

POSITIONING OF THE NEIBERÁU NEAR THE MOON IN THE STELLAR CONFIGURATION CORRESPONDING TO THE INTERFERENCE-GENERATING FREQUENCIES

As per what I have seen in a sequence of flashes on the holographic screen, the Neiberáu had settled among the planets of our Solar System to support this very important split in the future evolution of the human being. In some situations, the Neiberáu, to amplify these interfacing frequencies, is situated next to the Moon in a configuration that keeps it in touch with the overlapping frequency symbol.

THE SYMBOL K

The meaning of the K symbol is very important and, over time, it has come to define the genetics of the primordial primate of the Earth. In connection with its occult meanings, we then received some valuable information from the Apellos man. Especially for the Sirians, this symbol, which is similar to the letter K, is very important because it represents the connection between heaven and Earth. In other words, it signifies divine support, but at the same time, it indicates the support of other entities with a high degree of spirituality. I will subsequently elaborate in more detail different aspects of the symbolism of K as it was shown and explained to me.

The K symbol represents a wide range of frequencies that are directly related to divine influence and support as well as the spiritual help offered by entities that are right in the physical plane. In other words, we have the help of the subtle dimensions, especially from the etheric plane (which is close to the physical plane) on the one hand, and we also have the help that comes from the physical plane itself. The symbol as such signifies divine influence and support from the top down (refer to the vertical line in the letter or symbol “K”) which makes the connection “between heaven and Earth.” That is to say, it comes from the subtle planes as a downward manifestation to the physical plane. This influence is also supported, as we have said, by celestial entities of the subtle dimensions (refer to the top oblique line in the symbol “K”). The lateral line (the downward oblique line) represents the possibility of other influences supported by beings in the physical plane, such as the influence and help of the semi-gods who also had certain preferences or tendencies such as, for example, supporting a king, a people, or a group of human beings developing in a certain direction. All of this support starts from the middle point, but what does the etheric plane mean in this regard? I will offer a more detailed description of this very important symbol in the next volume.

DEFINITIONS BETWEEN E-N-L AND E-N-K

I then saw how the two distinct families of frequencies, in conjunction with the K and L symbols, were combined with E-N, resulting in the specific E-

N-L and E-N-K families of the DNA of those beings. Of these, we saw how the beings designated by the E-N-L symbol had a larger and finer bio-field, whereas the beings designated by the E-N-K symbol had a somewhat more “restricted” bio-field.

Both frequency families existed due to the interference created by the frequencies symbolized by the hexagon, but the frequencies designated by the L symbol were more sustainable due to specific resonances.

After this splitting, I realized that the development of the beings represented by the E-N-K symbol was reserved for the physical plane while the development of the beings designated by the symbol E-N-L would encompass both the physical plane and the subtle etheric plane. This enabled some of the primates, those in which the L-designated frequency family was more present and more combined in the E-N-L format, to get more quickly familiarized to the frequencies designated by the hexagon symbol. Because of this, they evolved much faster. E-N-L had a faster development, as well as the fact that they lived for a long time near extraterrestrial bases, interacting in different ways with extraterrestrial beings, helping them or learning from them. The most advanced specimens even had access to those bases. In their evolution, hybridization in successive stages of extraterrestrial DNA was of great importance.

After a while, when the E-N-L beings began to produce, the embryo received the influence of the subtle fields emanating from the extraterrestrial bases from the very beginning, as well as the strong influence from the genetic mutations supported by the doctors of the Neiberáu.

PROCREATION SUPPORT ON THE E-N-L BRANCHES

After observing all of these elements of our origins on Earth, I then wanted to know how procreation was sustained on the E-N-L branch, which was clearly strongly hybridized with extraterrestrial DNA.

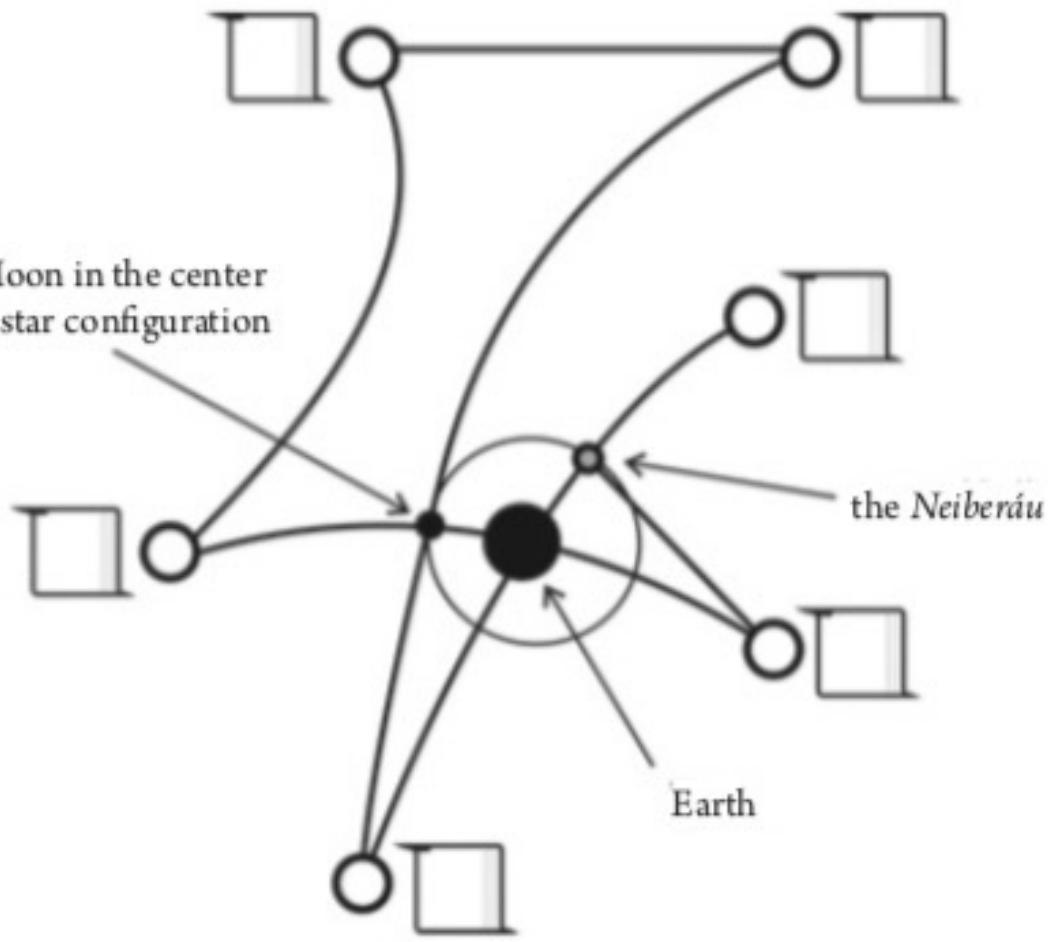

The image on the screen disappeared for a fraction of a second in order to instantly place the image of the Sirian Neiberáu ship within the network of its known star lines.

As I said, in the midst of the vast cosmic network they formed, there was always a heavenly body upon which the subtle influence was focused. For example, to initiate transformations at the level of primate DNA, the Earth was first in the middle. Later, in another stellar configuration, our Sun was in the middle in order to determine a new important stage in the evolution of the DNA structure of those beings. (see illustration on next page)

I was now shown another configuration with the Moon in the middle. It also showed me that the Moon was the fundamental element that determined the development of the sexes in the primates that would become human beings during their evolution on Earth.

On the holographic screen, I was then shown a projection that was a subtle “etheric duplicate” of the Neiberáu to note the existence of a great multitude of beings or, more preferably, souls as subtle ethereal manifestations. I also immediately realized by telepathic induction that they used the subtle body of the ship to influence the development of the genetic combinations of the fetus belonging to the E-N-L branch. By doing this, the beings born on the E-N-L branch were supported, both mentally and ethereally, by compatible beings on the Neiberáu. This support from the huge ship was focused on the Earth at the level of groups of beings, tribes, or in some cases, just in a region. Besides individual capabilities, support depends only upon the compatibility between the primates and the extraterrestrial beings on the ship.

THE RELATIVE POSITION OF THE “NEIBERÁU” IN OUR SOLAR SYSTEM WHEN THE MOON WAS AT THE CENTER OF THE STELLAR ARRANGEMENT

Over time, the E-N-L beings have evolved and even started to “break down” into secondary branches of the main E-N-L branch, forming new developmental pathways symbolized as follows: E-N-L-A, E-N-L-I, E-N-L-O and E-N-L-A. There are other combinations of this kind. I saw, as in the spectacular growth of a tree, the “splitting” of the main frequencies of E-N-L, or “the trunk,” into several branches and secondary sub-branches or secondary frequencies, each with its own features, potentials and power.

The symbols in the secondary branches were not what I already knew or could recognize at that time (A/E/I/O/U etc.), but I gave these explanations only to make it as simple as possible to understand what was happening as the symbols I saw in the holographic images were far more complex and dynamic. In order to get an idea of their structure and the way they looked, however, I often stopped from viewing to write on paper and sketch these elements, associating them as best as I could with the letters that we know. Being curious about how those special primates from the E-N-L branch developed, I was able to see the complex ties and the extraterrestrial beings that began to come from the Neiberáu to the surface of our planet, having as their mission to support the accelerated evolution of those primates.

From the rapid succession of images, I realized that the Neiberáu had become a powerful focus of spirituality for over several thousand years. Her military mission has changed, focusing primarily on research to create and support the development of a new being and a new civilization. I also saw that the number of those on the ship almost doubled. As I said, there was also a military section to guard the space around the ship, but most of the creatures that inhabited the giant ship were oriented toward scientific research.

The images that appeared to me were sublime, but I could not enjoy them too much because I quickly noticed how that the supportive actions of the extraterrestrials was incomplete. Primates that evolved from the E-N-L branch, and which were supported by the method described above, failed to procure very much nor did they procure it fast enough. Even though Neiberáu researchers gave great support to awakening the consciousness in the population of the evolved primates, their number was still too small.

The deficiency was solved in a way that would mark the subsequent evolution of the human being. In the images I was watching on the holographic screen, I noticed an epochal event that happened about the Moon as a result of the positioning of the Neiberáu in a network with certain stars. This event, which most probably had a subtle etheric nature, was suggested in the images I saw as a star configuration with the very luminous Moon in the center. By influencing the Moon's movement and trajectory, the evolved primates were predisposed to be more sexually active.

On the other hand, the E-N-K branch continued to evolve at its own natural pace without any help or external interventions since the difference in vibrational frequency was still too high to allow for efficient hybridization with evolved DNA.

ADAM

The images followed quickly, showing some events that took place several thousand years after the initiation of the E-N-L branch. On a sort of “dynamic” map that was portrayed in holographic images, I saw that they coexisted on Earth at that time with many other types of primates that had reached different stages of evolution. Of all these species of humanoid beings, the E-N-L branch was clearly supported by extraterrestrial civilizations that oversaw the developmental processes of the new race on the planet, both by orienting individuals to develop in certain areas as well as by “seeding” them to boost the development of their DNA.

Women of the E-N-K branch procreated quite a bit, and as the men of E-N-L branch were still attracted to them, this could lead to a severe degradation of the E-N branch; and, thus the evolutionary rhythm of the human being could be diminished.

In terms of numbers of individuals, the E-N-K branch was dominant, and the E-N-L branch, which was rather small in number, had retreated to some of the most remote places on the planet, particularly to coastal areas and islands. I did not quite understand why the E-N-L beings had this preference for the coastal areas, but from what I saw, it was very clear that they settled only in such regions. Basically speaking, I have not seen E-N-L beings inside the continents.

The fact remained, however, that in the DNA of the beings of the E-N-L branch, the hexagonal symbol predominated, representing a certain family of frequencies that led to a clear elevation of them, thus enabling the more evolved E-N-L beings to become true emitters and powerful sources for other beings derived from other E-N-L branches and even for some beings in the E-N-K branch, contributing to the evolution of all. They represented a kind of highly evolved bio-field outbreak, and that is why the beings with whom they lived, even the lesser evolved ones, took over a greater or lesser part of that extraordinary influence and thus considerably improved the characteristics in their own DNA.

At each such change, I could see in the projections that were presented to me on the screen that there was another alien spacecraft besides the Neiberáu, and it was much larger than the ship with which I was now so familiar. This other ship was positioned in different areas of our Solar System: either near the Moon, Saturn or another planet, supporting complex genetic mutations created by stellar or planetary structures and amplified by the position of the ship.

After several thousand years, beings influenced by the higher E-N-L branch already had a structure closer to human nature. They had begun to lose their hairiness, became “brighter” with a more erect stature and began to manifest certain intellectual capacities. I have seen such evolved primates expressing inner happiness, having a certain elevated feeling, and being quieter than the others, even “meditative”.

Genetic complexity began to manifest itself more and more. Some beings were born with blond hair, others with no hair, some of them had blue eyes, others had green eyes, and so on, the changes being made in the embryo right from the start, just after the procreation phase.

This happened until, one time, I saw that the planets in our Solar System were positioned in a specific way, along with a gigantic spacecraft. I was then shown how, from a more complex extension of the E-N-L branch, a highly evolved embryo was targeted to fulfill a highly sophisticate genetic transformation that would take place over a few thousand years. The images focused on those moments, giving details from the embryo’s conception.

Then there was a very important event which eventually became a myth. Through repeated cross breeding, an embryo was naturally developed by a female of the E-N-L branch that was compatible with the subtle etheric body common to the Sirius civilization. Up until then, the beings of the different branches of the E-N-L line could only be “mentally” and subtly influenced by an extraterrestrial being. It was now possible for that being to become the prototype of future man and for an alien soul to actually incarnate in that body.

Usually, this is done through a conscious assumption by the evolved soul of the alien being — before he leaves his physical form — to reincarnate into a coarser body. Essentially, the extraterrestrial soul assumes one of the physical bodies of an E-N-L on Earth in order to gradually determine the necessary changes in the DNA by the very high vibrational level of his consciousness.

Once this process has begun, the souls of alien beings who have become entangled in bodies of the E-N-L line remain in the astral plane in the vicinity of the Earth and then continue to reincarnate here, respecting the natural laws of life and evolution.

On the one hand, the balance between what is allowed to intervene in such a “modulation”, and on the other hand, the cosmic laws that govern cosmic order and evolution, is something that resembles walking on a tightrope at a great height. You must have a profound knowledge of Universal Laws and also be fully humble and devoted to the Divine Will, understanding and perceiving the direction of one’s actions so as not to oppose them, especially when it comes to a galactic project involving conscious life. Otherwise, failure is guaranteed and will happen in short order.

There must therefore be a certain science of merging technology with the divine laws of Creation, and this is known to beings who have reached a high degree of spiritual evolution. In my opinion, as I have been able to see and understand from the pictures presented, those from very advanced civilizations had performed a sacrificial act, because a return to a lower plane and a purely inferior physical form through successive incarnations, as some of those souls have assumed, cannot be neither easy nor enjoyable. At that stage, however, it was a quick spiritual way of achieving the correct and natural transformation of humanoid beings from their origins into a more evolved being

This was the first time that all conditions were met for the birth of the first human being. If, in the past, as in the case of Tenekau, there was a transfer of consciousness into a clone, this was a natural evolutionary process of a new species. I then saw the beginning of the process of incarnation of a highly evolved extraterrestrial being, highlighted on the holographic screen through a more intense luminous ray which had penetrated into the embryo of a woman of the E-N-L line. Through repeated transformations of the embryo at the DNA level, a body was created that was compatible with the souls of advanced alien beings. I understood that this was the first human being to be very evolved on Earth, and it belonged to the E-N-L branch.

Of course, , as one can imagine, this “birth” was not an ordinary one. I was shown in detail how the future of this being developed, step by step, through a very advanced technology that included connections with subtle superior dimensions. I was curious to see the inside of one of the round-shaped alien laboratories that were built on Earth and where the genetic development of the new humanoids of the E-N-L branch was accomplished. I saw there a kind of ovular sac , filled with a semi-transparent and slightly gelatinous liquid, where the embryo extracted from the E-N-L female was placed.

Embryo development was fascinating. In the beginning, white spikes were emerging that looked like nerve endings. They then merged, forming more and more complex and compact structures, probably based on a code and already established structures of subtle-etheric fields. The ovular sac was in suspense, but around it, I saw other complicated devices that emitted rhythmic bright flashing lights that were like lasers shining on the sac. I deduced that it was most likely a specific process necessary for the creation of the physical body into which the “spark of life”, the soul of that highly evolved Sirian, was then lowered.

I saw in detail the rapid process of his body’s development. Where there were luminous flashing lights, a small vortex emerged from a viscous liquid, from which a thin white thread-like element extended. Later, it grew more and branched out to unite with other such threads. Everything was very dynamic and contained many nuances, the description of which would take require too time and space to tell.

I was very curious to see what was at least the approximate year in which this extraordinary event for Mankind took place, a sort of “foundation stone” for this human being in particular and for the whole of humanity in general. As soon as I showed such genuine interest, I heard the “play” of frequencies in the special helmet I was wearing, doubled by some specific symbols that followed in the top right of the holographic screen.

As far as I could understand and decode, the time period was approximately 368,000-367,000 B.C. This was the period in which the first human being appeared to be perfect, after several thousand years of successive transformations that took place in the DNA of the primates. There were other physical bodies of E-N-L beings around, but of them, only this body was somehow “infused” with perfection.

Esoteric and Christian mythology present this as Adam. That being yet existed in the logical sequence of the evolutionary transformations that have taken place; surely, not within the metaphorical Eden Garden (though later, that was indeed the area on the north side of the Persian Gulf in Iraq where Adam was) and not accompanied by Eve, the snake or the famous Apple. These were probably subsequent metaphors, directly related to the possibility of procreation, for at first, Adam was androgynous.

So, through a divine act and as a result of a very complex and ancient epoch of time — as I have shown in an exceptionally clear and highly summarized way — Adam (as the soul of a highly evolved extraterrestrial entity) was incarnated by emitting that intense ray of light from the ship that was there, as was mentioned previously.

I was shown on the screen the moment when this very first human being was born. This was the first superior conscious being in the framework of the successive transformations towards a new race of intelligent beings, all of whom were born on Earth at that time of the project's development in connection with the creation of the human being. The name given has remained almost unaltered in time: Adam.

I can confess with an open soul that I have never seen a perfect being such as the Adam who appeared to me on the screen. Due to the special interaction between me and the holographic screen — through the inter-dimensional helmet that reflects the advanced technology of Apellos — I was able to feel with great clarity the extraordinary features of the first human being whose legacy has remained for a long time afterwards, serving as the foundation of the so-called “modern” man. Although the process was much more complex than that and did not adhere to a linear evolution, we can still say that, to some extent, the root of our DNA started from that first extraordinary being who was Adam. In this regard, biblical text is accurate

The telepathic and intuitive transmission I was receiving, which also included my senses, became so clear and intense at one point that I was almost overwhelmed with excitement, unable to master a faint trembling of my body. I was shown and understood clearly that the soul who incarnated into the body of Adam was a perfectly spiritual Syrian. On the physical level, however, Adam's DNA contained a certain percentage of primate DNA on Earth as the embryo came from a woman in the upper E-N-L branch. Adam's level of consciousness was so evolved that, when he first opened his eyes, I was able to see that he was already in a deep trance state in which he remained for a long time.

In the brief summary of his life, I noticed a few “gaps” that have not been elucidated upon; meaning, that for sometime, Adam was not in the Persian Gulf area; but for the rest of his long time on Earth, he remained in approximately the same area. His existence represented an almost continuous meditation and introspection as well as the attention to preserve that extraordinary purity of the body and soul necessary for the efficient transmission of DNA for the genetic changes that they wanted.

Even if some might be horrified and others find it blasphemous, this is the truth about Adam’s existence. Perhaps I have an advantage by the fact that this very advanced technology is not wrong and that, moreover, we had access to the summarized elements of those times in a fairly rapid but especially precise and interactive rendering. This is why I have decided to present these aspects of the true origin of Mankind and some important moments in its real history, convinced that at least some readers will be able to intuitively feel or even verify what I have revealed here by other means.

For example, I understand that the successive moments of Adam’s “awakening” are probably hard to accept, but I will still state them here exactly as I have seen in the pictures presented to me. The first was the moment when Adam opened his eyes for the first time, being immersed in that gelatinous liquid. Then, in the next flash, I saw how that gelatinous substance leaked slowly as his naked body remained in the alveolus. I was then shown the moment when he got up from the alveolus and stepped out of it. After that, I saw different situations where he was engaged in meditation or doing other activities, but he always seemed to be a self-contained, silent, and even mystical being.

It is interesting to know that the evolution of the primates to the present day human being has not been achieved only physically. In the case of the first cloned beings, in which there was a transfer of Tenekau’s consciousness, it was just about the body being used as a vehicle. This was necessary to support the spiritual evolution of the primates so that their souls could be embedded in increasingly specialized vehicles. If the Sirians and advanced civilizations who participated in that project had proposed to do only clones, they would have succeeded in doing so quickly. The stakes, however, regarded the evolutionary development of those primates’ consciousness so that they could evolve. That is why Adam’s “birth” is very important as it is the first natural incarnation of an evolved soul into a body of clay, that is, the “biological raw material” of the planet. By this, it is understood that his DNA also contained the basic structure of the DNA from the primates on Earth, and it is this from which the “modeling” of his body began.

Adam’s incarnate manifestation was necessary to allow divine nature to manifest: firstly, by descending from the vertical planes, and then expanding horizontally by multiplying the DNA of that particular being. Expansion was accomplished by many seedlings in the feminine beings in the E-N-L branch. The beings born through this procedure could be perfected into bodies which were able to incorporate alien souls from different civilizations that supported the development of the new species on Earth. In other words, starting from the DNA of that very pure human being, which was actually androgynous, various possibilities of embryonic development were then explored through genetic engineering.

The androgyny of Adam reflected more like it was an exceptional harmony of body and mind which could easily be noticed, and it did not include sexual differences. I saw him in all the splendor of his perfection: he was a great creature and about 2.5 meters tall, similar to the extraterrestrial beings around him. His waist was thinner than that of the normal male; his skin was white and he had long silky silver hair. His eyes were large and almond-shaped, like deep waters, and his features impressed me by their perfect refinement and harmony. The general impression created was that of a man, but he had some feminine features that made him very refined.

From the specific sounds I heard, which my cortex had somehow translated, I deduced quite easily that Adam lived for a long time, which I approximate to be more than 750 years.*

* In the Bible, it is stated that Adam lived 930 years. [Romanian editor’s note]

Due to the extraordinary purity and harmony of his physical body, this was possible by reason of the very evolved nature of his DNA. In a sense, it was his “main mission” to serve as a “DNA matrix” for the beings that would be derived from his DNA, to which various other types of DNA were added in order to gradually deliver the complex but stable formula for the new civilization that they wanted to create. From this perspective, we can understand the biblical text that says Adam “begot” sons and daughters. The meaning is that his gene has been spread into several feminine beings that have spawned bodies with the ability to be “inhabited” by souls of evolved extraterrestrial beings who have assumed that mission.

THE SYMBOL N, THE “MARK” OF REPRODUCTION

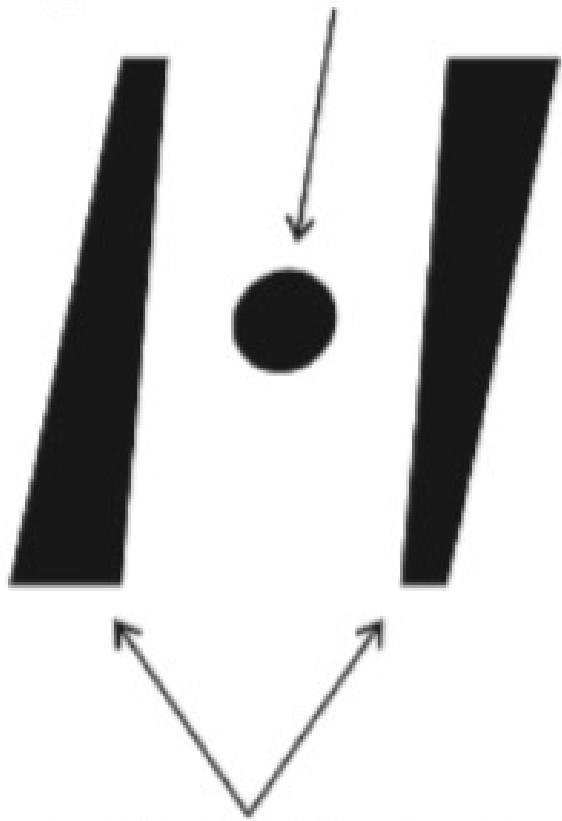

Even though Adam was created, being a perfect matrix of the new species, he could not procreate. Likewise, no other beings, even those born of Adam’s genes, could procreate in the beginning. Most beings born, being hybridized with Adam’s DNA, were androgens. Over time, through the increase in the number of beings born in this way, sexual differentiation was achieved. It is quite possible that the esoteric and Christian tradition regarding “Adam and Eve” referred to precisely that stage of human evolution in which Eve represented the moment of the splitting of the sexes, and this includes a direct connection with and incidental occurrences concerning some very special events that involved the Moon. It was then that the enigmatic, mysterious and reflective character of femininity defined itself in the new being created upon the Earth.

Starting from here, it is now easy to understand the expression that the woman was born “from the rib of the man”; meaning that “Eve appeared from the rib of Adam” because the appearance of the two sexes (male and female) was, in fact, nothing but an extension of Adam’s DNA base. For example, there was no “primordial” female being, namely Eve, the original representative of the female sex. I did not see anything of this kind in the summarized history on the holographic screen, but instead, I telepathically understood what the word “Eve” was referring to, as I just explained.

The special moment of the splitting of the sexes in the new beings was displayed by the symbol N which rather looked like a kind of H because, when it was displayed on the holographic screen, I saw two vertical lines with a larger point in the middle.

THE SYMBOL N AND ITS GENERAL MEANING the point represents the manifestation of the divine will segments defining the necessary sexual polarization in the evolution of the near-human

His significance was that of an increased sexual polarization that applied to both extraterrestrial and human beings. On the one hand, the souls of extraterrestrial beings who assumed the task of forming the superior man “separated” from their civilization in the sense that they became associated with the planet Earth for the mission they had assumed: to create a new civilization here. This was the first vertical line (see above illustration). On the other hand, many of the humanoid beings on our planet whose DNA had already undergone certain transformations separated from the inferior structure of other families of humanoid primates. This was the second vertical line. The point in the middle of the N symbol signifies the Divine Will which made that transformation possible. That point also represents a fundamental moment of celestial mechanics when certain stars, in their relative motion, aligned, creating a massive influence on the planet Earth.

As the number of humanoid beings that were born under these influences increased, more and more extraterrestrial beings had to be incarnated on Earth. The development of the new civilization obviously depended upon the evolution of consciousness in the new bodies.

As for the spiritual evolution of the beings, they were not yet so evolved as souls to be able to incorporate themselves into the pure bodies of the beings derived from Adam’s genetic structure. To bring about the evolution of the entire humanoid civilization on Earth, many extraterrestrial souls, originating from various other civilizations in our galaxy, began to “migrate” and incarnate on Earth.

The advanced alien civilizations involved in this cosmic project exercised these tremendous possibilities; but this, of course, happened at a cosmic rate of time; that is, over a period of several tens of thousands of terrestrial years. In this way, the evolution of the human being of the E-N-L branch was quickened in the positive sense by precisely utilizing that chance at the cosmic level. At the same time, those extraterrestrial civilizations had to make sure that a large enough number of individuals of the new species had come in order to secure its self-preservation on Earth.

A NECESSARY EXPLANATION

I feel compelled to make a point here because ignorance and, in particular, the bigotry of some individuals can very easily block the fair understanding of things. From what has been presented so far, especially in connection with Adam, one might understand that man would not be “a creation of God” but would only be a product of scientific operations of genetic manipulation and cloning; and further, that the human being — and implicitly Adam — is only a kind of “experiment” conducted at the discretion of extraterrestrial civilizations who have nothing better to do than play “master and slave”.

Such an interpretation would highlight the lack of spiritual maturity in correctly understanding how the human being was created. I think we can readily overcome the infantile idea that “God created a man of clay”, modeling him with His hands. I think that, even for the most bigoted, such a “reality” is too pathetic and unethical to be argued as a good argument.

First, the presence of God must be correctly understood and perceived at an intuitive level as being unknowable and transcendent; or, on the contrary, it can be understood from the perspective of the surrounding reality in the sense that God is everything we see and experience through our senses and our minds. If these two “variants” were not valid at the same time, it would mean that God would not be omniscient and omnipotent. But, because God is precisely all this and much more than that, He is present everywhere or, in other words, in all things. Therefore, God’s action must not be “manual” in order to create “something” — a thing or a being — because His presence and energy penetrate everything and can accomplish everything. When acting with a certain purpose in His Creation, God acts through His “proper” tools, all of which are His creations in a well-established spiritual hierarchy.

Just as a matter of mathematics or physics is solved by well-established theorems, laws, or rules of calculus, which are the working tools in these exact sciences, God also acts and accomplishes His divine intentions through his “tools”; which are usually beings and entities that fulfill the role of being “emissaries” and “perpetrators” of divine plans. This is a reality that transpires from every action that is observed in Creation because everything always works perfectly and without cracks, even though it often seems to us — in the face of the subjectivism we manifest — that things do not go as they should and as we wish.

In the case of the creation of the human being — as a distinct humanoid race on Earth — things happened the same way. God acted through His “instruments” that were best suited to accomplish this very complex plan, instruments which in the case at hand referred to several very advanced alien civilizations. These were mainly the Sirian civilization, controlled by its Supreme Council; the Arcturian civilization; and the Pleiadian civilization who, in turn, were guided by celestial supernatural entities to accomplish the divine mission that has been entrusted to them.

We are talking about extraterrestrial civilizations that have reached a high degree of spiritual and technological development and who very well understand the divine laws of the cosmos, both physically and subtly. All of their actions were divinely integrated and enjoyed the support and inspiration of the great beings in the superior celestial hierarchies, for as I have seen and subsequently understood, the creation of the human being in this way — and even the formation of the planet Earth and the Solar System over eons of time — were based upon certain intentions and clear and profound ideas with a “great pulse in time” that is occluded and unknown to the majority of beings. Therefore, everything that has happened with regard to the appearance and evolution of man on Earth is not a particular fad, play or experiment of any extraterrestrial civilization but was and is totally the Will of God , expressed by the very high level of consciousness of the main extraterrestrial civilizations that have assumed this mission and then took part in the creation of the human being on our planet.

CHAPTER SEVEN — GENOME REINVENTION

I was excited by what we were hearing and by the incredible accuracy of the presentation in the holographic images that underlined the crucial moments of the formation and development of the human being. Everything that is in the texts of the various spiritual traditions or in historical writings has been presented only allusively or metaphorically as regards the origin of man, but I now saw, in reality, an admirable and very clear summary. It was, however, very condensed and difficult to track due to the complexity of the information, requiring a great deal of concentration and emotional stability in order to allow for a coherent and intelligible unfolding of the images.

It is not so easy to truly “digest” seeing the first human being, the “ancestor” from which you might have been derived from, much later, through an amazingly complex chain of transformations, syntheses and nuances that defined the structure of DNA over time. It is a kind of ancestral connection, a time arc that sensitizes us and makes us aware of the deep resources we have. What I saw there brought the necessary light on our origin as human beings, clarifying many unknowns and question marks.

Although the development of the images was difficult to track, the effort required for this was largely offset by the amazing value of the information.

HYBRIDIZATION OF THE TWO MAIN BRANCHES OF HUMAN DNA

Adam was the first conscious human being, belonging to the E-N-L branch, which was created on Earth and had most of the characteristics of perfection. From the images I saw, many other beings were born after him with approximately the same DNA structure, highly evolved and following the same “reproductive” pattern. In my estimation, their number was a little over a thousand. Then there was the time of sexual differentiation for these special beings, after the very special energetic event in which the Moon played the most important role. Due to the special star alignment, there were some “cosmic implementations” at that time on the Moon, after which the satellite of our planet acquired a great transformational role on the Earth.

On the other hand, as I said, “Eve” represented that important “element” related to the fact that human beings, after the event on the Moon, could be born sexually; that is, the astral souls that were to follow and incarnate on Earth were able to choose between the two sexes, male and female. There was no longer just one type of being, the androgynous ones, but because of the genetic combinations repeated over several thousand years, it came to that significant leap in which the DNA of the primates became sufficiently improved to allow for the incarnation of evolved souls from the astral plane. As we saw in the holographic images, future genetic combinations involved genetic engineering in which DNA was enriched with other specific DNA fragments taken from other extraterrestrial populations which accepted this kind of “hybridization” of the future human being on Earth. From what I’ve seen, I estimate that there have been more than twenty types of extraterrestrial DNA that have been involved in genetic engineering operations.

As I have said, what happened in Adam’s case with the Sirian DNA was made step by step for other beings after him, using DNA from other extraterrestrial civilizations; thus, beings could be born on Earth that originated from other planets.

I was shown both of the bodies developed inside those special laboratories as well as the synthesis of DNA combinations which involved hybridization. Thus, the DNA of the new human being had a common basis in the DNA of primates on Earth, a significant part of the Sirian DNA, as well as other “fragments” of extraterrestrial DNA from other civilizations.

Contrary to what one might think, we did not see “zombie beings” which usually result from inferior or gross genetic engineering such as is happening on our planet today. Those hybridizations of new DNA that were created, however, were very refined and gave birth to bodies in which the evolved souls could and wished to incarnate.

SYNTHESIS

I stopped watching for a few minutes at this point because the volume of information and data was too large. I felt the need to relax a little and, helped by the man from Apellos, made a general recapitulation of the first stages of evolution of the human being so that things would be as clear as possible to me. I even made a sketch which proved useful later in the sedimentation of knowledge. Therefore, after the appearance of Adam, the population did not recover because the beings that appeared were androgynous. Little in number, they were very harmonious and spiritually evolved and this resulted in a combination of natural development and genetic engineering with the help of the highly advanced technology of extraterrestrial civilizations that monitored the process of human evolution. Of those beings, Adam was the first to assemble the most appropriate combination in the structure of DNA, balancing almost perfectly, an androgynous characteristic.

Only later, when a sufficient number of evolved beings who had lived for quite a long time was a certain point reached where the process of multiplication by sexual reproduction (represented by the symbol N) began. As I said, this was due to a special event in direct connection with the Moon. After the split in the two sexes and after they began to procreate, a slowly evolving species of human beings (from the original E-N-L branch) appeared whose DNA was mainly of extraterrestrial origin but also combined with some of the DNA of primates on Earth. Another species of human beings (associated with the symbol E-N-K) was somehow “left” to develop on its own, naturally, especially so as to maintain the strong resonance with the specific energy of the Earth.

Thus, from one of the fundamental combinations of frequencies, E-N-L (which contributed to the development of E-N-L branches such as E-N-L-A,

On the other hand, the beings associated with the E-N-K symbol developed in parallel, but more slowly, because they did not have as much of an “infusion” of extraterrestrial DNA as was the case of the E-N-L beings, and most did not even have any at all. However, due to the presence of the developed E-N-L beings, even the E-N-K branch developed faster as compared to the development which would have occurred only through natural selection.

Of all of these phases in the evolution of the human being on Earth, it seemed to me that the most important one was that of the splitting of the sexes; or, in other words, the one in which the beings from the DNA of Adam began to procreate.

The meaning of that fundamental stage was then deciphered and depicted to me very quickly, with great clarity, by the symbol associated with the modification produced on the Moon: the middle circle (see previous diagram: The Symbol N and Its General Meaning) representing the original androgyny, that of the first beings who embodied both the masculine and the feminine aspects.

Then, the two branches on the side represent the phenomenon of the splitting of the sexes which was determined in the physiology of the human being by the modification produced on the Moon which, in turn, led to the diversification of the E-N-L beings. These were different, measuring over 2.5 meters, but they had a relatively thin body, harmonious and refined. Their physical beauty was doubled by an extraordinary spiritual value and refinement of consciousness. They had a very sharp intellect and also showed great paranormal powers, thanks to their highly evolved DNA.

Compared to them, E-N-L beings — who came from primates whose DNA was mostly “earthly” and secondarily extraterrestrial — were shorter E-N-L beings, did not have the same spiritual and intellectual endowments, but instead were more vital, and their bodies more muscular and more endowed with physical exertion. Over time, however, even though the E-N-K beings were thicker and their mental potentials were not as developed as in the case of the E-N-L beings, they nevertheless displayed certain abilities but to a much lesser extent than in the case of the E-N-L beings.

For a certain period of time, the two main branches (E-N-L and E-N-K) coexisted and gave birth to the so-called “mythical” civilizations from the immemorial times of our planet, but in reality, they were as true as possible. It is true that, in time, some sub-branches of E-N-L, due to the interference with the E-N-K beings, “lost” certain capacities and traits, but even so, they were exceptional beings, their genes still being pregnant and powerful. Through these mixtures, their average height decreased significantly. On the other hand, the legends of the “semi-gods” are mostly born of true events, and they refer to human beings with hybrid genes (between E-N-L and E-N-K) who had special powers and traits, being the fruit of the union of beings from the E-N-K branch with evolved extraterrestrial beings or with beings developed from the E-N-L branch.

The so-called “semi-gods” had E-N-K bodies, but their genes belonged to the E-N-L branch due to their combination with extraterrestrial DNA. Through repeated sexual crossings, some very tall beings had been developed, up to 3-4 meters; and, generally speaking, that was the period of the “giants” on Earth, some of their skeletons being discovered relatively recently in several areas of the planet.

Unlike the large mass of E-N-K beings, the “semi-gods” had special abilities, being able to interact effectively with alien technology, having access to their ships and having amazing physical capabilities. Families of these extraordinary human beings (either pure E-N-L or E-N-L hybridized with evolved E-N-K, i.e. “gods”) continued to remain on Earth even in times closer to the present, but they gradually disappeared as E-N-K beings multiplied greatly and populated virtually all areas of the planet.

GENERAL SCHEME OF THE FIRST STAGES IN THE EVOLUTION OF THE HUMAN BEING

Even after this personal synthesis, however, I felt confused and a little tired; so, at the advice of the man from Apellos, I took a short pause to relax. I was served with a “made in Apellos” drink which had a light green color and a phosphorescent appearance. Up to that time, I had never drank anything more pleasant and invigorating. And when I say invigorating, I mean an effect appeared a few seconds after the liquid was swallowed. It was amazing because I almost immediately felt a very pleasant force spreading throughout my body, and my mind became very clear and lucid. In my enthusiasm, I felt that I would be able to continue watching for days in a row without getting tired. Smiling, the man from Apellos told me that it is indeed a revitalizing drink which provides great strength and force of concentration, obtained by combining special plants whose nutritional values have been amplified several times by certain processes of technology at the cellular level. As I was already feeling overwhelmed, I asked him to return to the viewing room because I was already eager to continue with the amazing history of the origin of humanity on Earth. The man from Apellos agreed, adding that he would now request a new summary from the holographic projection device to make the concepts even clearer.

“SPECIALIZATION” OF THE GENOME

After this summary presentation of the main branches in the evolution of Mankind, I returned to the beginning periods to specify certain details. As I said, it all started and developed in the northern part of the Persian Gulf, encompassing in particular the areas of Iraq and, to a lesser extent, the areas of Iran and Saudi Arabia.

It was primarily the Syrian civilization which had assumed the role of “parent” in the creation of more beings in our galaxy — among them the future human being on Earth — having collaborated in this respect with several other very advanced civilizations, among which one of the more important ones were the Arcturian. They were considered the “doctors” of the galaxy because of their exceptional knowledge in the field of spiritual development of genes, life and evolution.

I was shown in a few pictures that the Arcturians deal in our galaxy with the state of harmony, well-being and spiritual health of many civilizations, especially those in the early stages of evolution. Knowing the “theme” of the genetic project on Earth, which I will talk about later, they suggested that the strain of human DNA must withstand a very high degree of complexity of genetic combinations and also indicated the frequencies that were needed to make it happen in order to get this extraordinary versatility of the macro-molecule of life.

Fleeting, I was shown some of the “design” assemblies of the DNA molecule and of the human being made up of members of the Arcturian, Sirian, Pleiadian and other two civilizations whose names I did not understand. Arcturians pointed out the main civilizations in the galaxy that they had to connect with so that genetic engineering would produce a strain of Earth’s DNA that could be very easily linked to other extraterrestrial DNA strains.

At first, the DNA that was to characterize the new being created on Earth was designed to have twelve “branches.” I was shown the whole structure of the initial macromolecule, and its complexity was extensive. But, over time, some of these branches or “branches” of the original DNA were “undone” by the trunks and individualized while others were “hidden,” and all this happened due both to specific external actions as well as the conditions that existed on our planet in its various phases of existence.

We can talk about several stages that took place with the passage of time. At first, it was specialization so that DNA would encompass and support as many frequencies as possible. This was the E-N gene derived from primates existing on Earth. Their DNA was mostly modified by stellar influences directed to Earth.

I also saw that, at one point, one of these primates broke off on a branch of their own, their members living in the waters of the oceans, becoming amphibious beings over time and evolving in that environment. They were later guided by certain extraterrestrial civilizations that adapted to the waters of our oceans because that was also their natural environment. I noticed that the amphibian beings derived from the E-N primates were guided in particular by one of the Pleiadian civilizations who lived underwater. This is a little known aspect in the contemporary world.

With regard to the E-N gene from the ground level, through the subtle energetic interventions of the Neiberáu ship and the genetic ones realized by Tenekau and the team of researchers, it gradually developed and split into two main branches: the E-N-L and the E-N-K. They developed over time, and through diversification, each formed sub-branches. Following the “birth” of Adam, the E-N-L branch became a specialized nursery for the “incarnation” of extraterrestrial beings who had accepted the mission to help ground the new race while the E-N-K branch has grown more slowly and mostly naturally, with certain occasional “infusions” of extraterrestrial DNA or through combinations with higher beings from the E-N-L branch.

The specialization continued on certain sub-branches of E-N-L (derivatives X, Y) when, in fact, the necessity of “amplifying” sexuality also emerged to allow the reproduction of the beings born in this form. However, this strengthening or fixation of DNA in the physical plane also meant a kind of “breaking” of the easy connection with the subtle upper planes which represented the connection with the extraterrestrial beings that supported them through the network of devices on the ships that monitored the process of DNA development on Earth. By this, the DNA of the new being was “hardened” a little, and the physical nature created the need for a rapid multiplication.

Seeing those images, I was somewhat puzzled because I thought that, instead of evolving, the human race could take the path of involution due to the attention that was predominantly procreation oriented, but I was immediately corrected by the man from Apellos.

“It is improper to speak of an ‘invasion’ as you think. Rather, it is a ‘specialization’ that was needed to achieve a certain goal, that of diversity of DNA structure. If you gather from the street a thousand people, almost everyone has different concerns: one is a computer scientist, another is a carpenter, another a driver and so on. You cannot create a thousand people, all of them alike. That would be meaningless. You have to offer multiple possibilities because this is the creation game itself. If we were to make an analogy, your oil, for example, serves many purposes. At first, it is a uniform mass; then it ‘specializes,’ depending upon the required direction: one part is refined into several types of fuel of different qualities, another for certain solvents, another for certain paints and dyes, another for plastics and so on. It is therefore a necessity in the physical plane where the initial causal energy ‘specializes’ later on in several directions.”

I was puzzled, however, and that is why I asked the following.

“Okay; but in the concrete case of the evolution of the human being, why was this specialization necessary?”

“It was necessary for many souls in the astral plane to incarnate here, in the physical plane. Over the course of tens and even hundreds of thousands of years, these ‘specializations’ or ‘branches’ have become increasingly clear. Now you have the mongoloid race, the black race, the red race, the white race, the yellow race and there are even some subdivisions that are not yet well understood by your scientists. Also, the process of creating several civilizations is first of all a natural process, and then an artificial one. It was a galactic necessity, and the extraterrestrial civilizations involved did not support the decay of the being but rather its ‘specialization’.”

“Then,” I said, “why wasn’t it about ‘specialization’ right from the start?”

As the man from Apellos turned his eyes to the screen, I felt him mentally interacting with the technology at the subtle level. Immediately, holographic images appeared which showed, in a kind of synthetic collage, the first phase of the creation of the new being; that is, the E-N stage. Then followed the E-N-L and E-N-K branches which we could distinguish by their physical characteristics. In several hundreds of thousands of years, due to the multiple combinations with the E-N-K branch, which was following its own evolutionary path at a much slower pace, the E-N-L branch has, to some extent, “fallen.”

In the first stage (symbolized by E-N-L and E-N-L-X), we saw only Sirian extraterrestrial beings involved. Then, in a very clever and ingenious way, I was shown that, after a certain time since Adam’s appearance, there was a kind of balance between the number of beings in this branch (E-N-L) and the number of souls in the astral plane who were capable of incarnation into those physical bodies due to their having become sufficiently evolved to receive and sustain the evolved consciousness of souls from advanced extraterrestrial civilizations.

I was then shown the need to increase the number of beings enshrined in the physical plane through “specialization.” That was the time when the Sirians proposed to other advanced civilizations to participate in that grand project and begin to “specialize” or to individualize a branch from the main strand of the DNA already formed; that is, to add their frequencies to those inherent in the structure of the DNA molecule of the human being. This is how E-N-L-X sub-frames started to appear, such as E-N-L X-Y and so on. At the same time, as I said, the E-N-K branch evolved at a natural rate and without “massive infusions” of extraterrestrial DNA.

Here, there view stopped. I thanked the man from Apellos, and at his invitation, I resumed the thread of the gradual evolution on the branches of which I was particularly interested. I did not succeed the first time, but I was helped; and then the images were “aligned” approximately to the time period I was investigating.

DIFFERENT DIRECTIONS OF EVOLUTION

In time, through the development of DNA, the E-N-L branch, representing different hybridizations of primates with a significant proportion of extraterrestrial DNA, allowed the incarnation of extraterrestrial beings while the E-N-K branch had a slower evolution as it was mostly done by the auric influence of E-N-L beings and of ships that have followed one another in various orbits around the Earth. In other words, the fact that the E-N-K beings lived around evolved E-N-L beings allowed a certain beneficial influence on their part and, in time, even on the DNA level. However, the genetic information of the E-N-K physical body was not sufficiently evolved to allow the embodiment of a more refined consciousness, such as that of the souls of extraterrestrial beings who supported the E-N-L branch.

The L branch (E-N-L), however, had developed the capacity to receive such souls. This was shown to me in the form of intense and fast rays of light which descended from the large spherical ship, entering the body of an E-N-L female. It was a short time in which the evolution of E-N-L beings reached a high level.

Surprised even more, I asked the man from Apellos, who was watching me carefully, why the K branch did not also benefit from the spirits of evolved extraterrestrial beings. He replied immediately.

“Because their bodies, due to the specific structure of the DNA, were characterized by a coarser energy and those extraterrestrial spirits could not be incarnated in them. You cannot put a barrel through a kitchen pipe, no matter how hard you try. Each object or being in the Universe matches only some objects or beings which are similar but not all. That law applied in that case, too.

“And the differences arose from this cause?” I insisted.

“Obviously. Basically, the K branch had a slower evolution while the L branch evolved rapidly due to the high vibrational level of the consciousness of the spirits that were incarnating in their bodies. If the evolution of the E-N-L branch took place in several tens of thousands of years, the evolution of the E-N-K branch took hundreds of thousands of years.

“Okay. Then what is the place of homo sapiens? How did he get there? It does not seem to come from the E-N-L branch.”

“The chain of genetic changes and the evolution of new beings on Earth has been complicated, as you can see, but there is a guiding thread nonetheless. At first, genetically manipulating about 20% of the DNA of primates with 80% of Sirian DNA has created several successive generations of highly evolved beings. Among them was the one you call “Adam,” the most “finished” variant of DNA possible on Earth, a truly exceptional being, from which the future E-N-L sub frames developed. Starting from this, for a long time, the percentage of new beings increased by reason of genetic manipulations because this is what the Sirians wanted. This planet, however, has on its surface beings with mostly local affinities, not just extraterrestrial. They wanted to obtain a being that had the basic structure of the great primates on Earth but in a highly evolved form. On the other hand, the E-N-K beings, who were closer to the primates and more adapted to life on this planet, evolved much slower. They were smaller in height than the E-N-L beings but had stronger muscles and a more vital structure. The civilization we now call homo sapiens is a bridge between most of the E-N-K branch and the remaining parts of the E-N-L branch or hybridizations between them. At present, most of human civilization is of type E-N-K. This is because E-N-L beings have withdrawn from the physical plane. You will be able to see this later, and you will understand why it was so. In recent years, however, the structure of the E-N-L typology has begun to grow dramatically due to a galactic event that is beginning to feel more and more powerful on Earth.

Hearing this information, I became more attentive, but before I could ask a question, the man from Apellos read my intention and spoke.

“The mind will explain that to you later.”

I reflected for a few moments on this news. I understood that, at least now, I could not find out any more, so I set out to emphasize knowledge about the subtle differences between E-N-K and E-N-L.

NUANCED DETAILS ABOUT THE EVOLUTION OF THE BRANCHES E-N-L AND E-N-K

I was especially concerned about the very high level of evolution that E-N-L beings had during that period, of which not even the dust of memory remained. I wanted to have a global view of their evolutionary transformation and I focused my attention to see such a summary on the screen. I had discovered that this was a very good method of dealing with the many subtleties and variations that have existed in the process of human evolution over the last 400,000 years.

Everything was an extremely advanced genetic engineering project, basically a project to train another race. At first, the evolved extraterrestrial souls could incarnate in some of the E-N-L bodies that were sufficiently prepared for it. It was an impulse given to the evolution of the new race in order for it to reach an ideal stage of development from which the process of incarnation was stabilized for highly evolved beings. The bodies of the E-N-L (branch L) beings were already evolved and had practically no characteristics of those specific to primates, even though they were born from them.

As I said, the E-N-L beings were tall, very balanced and harmonious in body; their hair was long, silky, often silvery-white, and their eyes were large and almond-shaped. In several tens of thousands of years, their bodies became very good receptacles for the evolved and even highly evolved extraterrestrial beings who wanted to incarnate during that period on Earth to help the process of creating the new race of human beings.

On the other hand, the E-N-K beings (branch K) had not evolved so much; but instead, they could reproduce without any problem. This explains, in a way, why some of the beings on Earth benefited from extraordinary technology and were highly evolved, engaging in interplanetary and interstellar travel while, in other areas of the planet, other human beings still carved stone and hunted, being dressed in the skins of animals. It was not until after the Atlantean period and its fall that humanity became somehow more “uniform” and the E-N-K branch was able to rise higher; but I will talk about this when I present some elements related to the existence of Atlantis and its decline.

TENEKAU'S "INHERITANCE"

An interesting fact that caught my attention was that, after projecting Tenekau's consciousness into that cloned being I mentioned, which was also an evolved version that preceded Adam's appearance a few thousand years ago, I did not see Tenekau's physical body. Instead, I noticed that his specific frequency, rendered by the symbols shown, was found in many other beings that followed up until the time of Adam's appearance.

I was amazed at this, and then the man from Apellos told me that, after completing his mission on Earth – which was coordinating the extremely complex process of transforming the DNA of the primates – Tenekau had evolved as a being in the etheric plane without it being necessary for him to have a physical body. Thus, in the DNA of Adam and the beings after him, I could see the symbols T and E-N but also the hexagonal symbol.

Thus, something of Tenekau's genes had been further transmitted, meaning that he had left a “genetic inheritance” but not through physical coupling, but rather auric, his spiritual influence being determined in primates over time. Later, the Sirian civilization from the Orion Constellation, of which Tenekau was also a part, made many efforts to make that subtle impulse permanent.

I was shown that, after Tenekau initiated the “epic of the human being” and after he had passed on to a higher existential level in the etheric plane, three more extraterrestrial beings were successively designated by the Sirian sages, originally from the Sirius A system, to continue the project of accelerated transformation of human beings on Earth. From the images I saw, these beings covered a period of about 12,000-13,000 years after Tenekau as their structure allowed them to have an extremely long life. Thereafter, the E-N-L specific DNA was found to be strong enough to branch out and combine without the danger of losing its initial baseline information.

The first to take on the task of continuing the project was Karaan, a Sirian man who, like Tenekau, came from the constellation of Orion’s Belt. As far as I could tell, he was part of the high-level military leadership of his civilization and had close links with two of the Pleiadian cities with which he collaborated intensely on Earth at that time.

According to him, the wise people of the Sirian civilization from the Sirius A system decided that the project would be led by a representative of this civilization who was named Nasamar. He was a very gentle and wise man, specializing in scientific research, but he was not part of the military rank. I felt a strong sympathy and spontaneous attraction towards him due to the exemplary way in which he knew how to combine the continuation of studies and the application of genetic engineering in the case of human DNA with the aspects of long-term organization and design of the activities.

Unfortunately, Nasamar led the project only for a short time because a tense situation in a certain sector of the galaxy — close enough to Earth which involved, it seems, a large armed conflict — necessitated his replacement with another leader whose name was Jama-al. As we have seen in the images presented, he had a very high degree in the military hierarchy, being recognized and respected for his talents as a strategist and for his diplomatic knowledge. He was a tough man, coming from a civilization derived from that of the Sirians, but I could not figure out either the star system or constellation that he came from.

Jama-al also proved to be a very practical being because, from the pictures I saw, I realized that he was correctly fulfilling the mission entrusted to him on the ship near Earth: to carry on the project of transforming human DNA;

but in parallel to this, he used certain resources of the planet to build a large number of small and medium-sized warships.

The images showed me how he created small urban centers throughout North and East Africa. These were like small semi-circle towns where human DNA was extracted from beings belonging to the E-N-L branches with genetic engineering being done on those samples.

An interesting aspect that I noticed was that the three project leaders who followed Tenekau did not know why the Sirian Council of Wise People wanted human evolution on Earth. However, as it was known that the Sirians were not wrong and that they were permanently connected with the celestial governing entities of our galaxy, the three great leaders accepted the mission to carry on the work started by Tenekau, realizing that it is was a very important plan at the cosmic level. They accepted the mission that was first given to them as a spiritual mission.

As I said, Jama-al had not only undertaken the continuation of the project of evolving human beings but also the development of a very efficient battleship construction industry. He extracted from the soil of our planet many types of ores, focusing on gold and titanium, but especially quartz crystals which were later processed and integrated into the construction of those ships.

Jama-al was also the commander of the cosmic ship which was then in an orbit near the Earth. He was also a military leader of the highest order, something that today could be associated with an admiral or the marshal of an army. From the summary provided in the images, I saw what at one time represented a simple diagram depicting our Sun, the star Sirius A and the direction in which the constructed ships had left. This was oriented about 30 degrees to the right of the line joining the two stars, after which they probably passed through a space-time vortex because their direction was tilted abruptly by about 16 degrees towards Sirius A, and then again at 90 degrees towards the final target. Depending upon the astronomical distances used as a standard in those representations, I estimated the area of the conflict as being about 6000 light-years away from Earth.

THE COMPLEXITY OF HUMAN DNA

The “game” of genes and their crossing and of combining different types of DNA and genetic manipulations within the limits allowed by the Laws of Nature has been a relatively long and very complex process. As I could see, stabilizing a change in DNA has been done for a long time, by repetition. On Earth, some of the genes were no longer sustainable; and then, being rejected, they were “distributed” on other planets that could support them. Other genes continued to develop naturally, and others were combined in various ways.

Over 300,000 years, the active and attentive process of the evolution of the genes of the new human being has made its DNA very complex. From what was presented to me, I understood that the simpler the structure and more uniform DNA is, the faster it is subject to degeneration because it lacks the vital energy needed for complex combinations.

The evolution that led to the current complexity of the DNA of the human being, however, was not a linear process, but rather a discontinuous one. The genetic differences from one area of the Earth to the other were very large. We have seen, for example, areas of modern-day Africa where primitive people lived, carving spearheads, but also populations with amazing technology, levitating ships and buildings of great refinement, living on a large portion of land from the Pacific Ocean in the southern hemisphere. There were also, however, “transition” areas where people had reached a certain level of well-being and high living standards.

Based upon a non-intervention treaty that was established more than 300,000 years ago, however, these different areas of the Earth did not support trade nor other exchange because they constituted experimental fields for each extraterrestrial civilization which were interested in the project of the new human race. It seems that the decisions of territorial independence and unilateral action in the respective territories were very strictly respected as no one was allowed to intervene in the “garden” of the other. This lack of connection between populations in different areas of the Earth has even led to a degree of isolation due to the need for them to develop and evolve in a “specialized” manner in the direction of the genetic influence experienced by the respective extraterrestrial civilization to which that territory or area of the planet had been assigned.

As I said, it should not be understood here that the term experiment had anything to do with slavery or oppression of the population. I didn't see anything like that. The terms experiment, laboratory or nursery used here are to designate a reality that was and which I have seen sequentially in pictures, about how the human race appeared and evolved.

It is true, however, that over time, some of the extraterrestrial civilizations developed a warrior nature and in one way or another tried to oppress the populations of the Earth or at least some of them. From what I could see, only some races were influenced by the race of evil reptilians and manifested such behavior; and there were four other inferior civilizations who were welcomed by them, but even those manifestations happened on relatively narrow territories and with numerically reduced populations such as, for example, in Africa and in an area of modern-day Oceania where at that time there was a larger continental area, undivided and without so many islands.

Even within the same genetic branch (E-N-L or E-N-K), there have been variations over time in the evolutionary process. Evolution was not linear, but at different times, it recorded ups and downs, depending upon the geographical and climatic context, the contribution of extraterrestrial civilizations, or even the choices made by the members of these branches of evolution of human DNA.

THE EVOLUTIONARY JUMP OF THE E-N-L BEINGS

The civilizations of E-N-L followed one another quite quickly, only rarely being more than 15,000 years old. As we have seen, the ones that lasted the longest were the Mu civilization (about 40,000 years) and the Hyperborean civilization (about 35,000 years), during which there was an important spiritual leap for the E-N-K beings through the cross-breeding. The civilization of Atlantis (about 25,000 years) had developed quite a bit, and it followed a whole series of other civilizations of the E-N-L beings that preceded it.

Finally, each gene “exhausts” its time of active manifestation in a plane (of existence) because it has the natural tendency to evolve but not horizontally as before, not by extension and variation, but especially vertically. That is, it registers an important qualitative leap, passing into a higher dimension of Creation. Generally speaking, this happens when the gene in question has reached a high level of maturity and complexity which allows it to assimilate the high energy frequencies from a dimension higher than the physical plane such as, for example, that of the etheric plane.

From the point of view of Mankind, this was the case for the E-N-L beings who, due to the ease with which they could combine their DNA with other types of DNA, have been refined enough over time so that they get very close to the threshold of “withdrawal” from the physical plane so as to remain only in the etheric plane.

We are not talking about an “extinction” of the species or of the DNA in question because the resource base is large due to its complexity and the amazing possibilities that have been developed over time. We are talking, however, about a special refinement at the genome level so that the general frequency of vibration of most E-N-L beings resonated more with the general frequency of vibration of the etheric plane which caused these human beings to gradually disappear from the physical plane, choosing to remain in the subtle etheric plane. In fact, the highly evolved extraterrestrial beings who incarnated in E-N-L physical bodies began to remain in the etheric plane and even above it, while most E-N-K beings remained on the physical plane, on our planet. It was like a “separation” which separated the two adjacent planes (the physical plane and the etheric plane), but the dramatic nature of these events reached the highest levels after the fall of Atlantis.

Naturally, the withdrawal of the E-N-L branch — a sign of which was the withdrawal of Shambhala into the etheric plane about 27,500 years ago — did not occur suddenly but rather gradually over a relatively long period of thousands of years. Also, it did not mean that all E-N-L beings on Earth disappeared because small families of such beings, who had not yet reached the appropriate level to move to the etheric plane, continued to remain in the physical plane, serving as virtual “intermediaries” who transmitted high occult teachings to the E-N-K beings who had already formed the majority of humanity. Of these beings, I noticed that they were especially the pharaohs, the high priests or the sages around whom small groups of E-N-K beings had formed, slightly more evolved than the others, thus forming “schools” or just currents of spiritual revival.

I was interested in that occulted area of transformation of the human being because I found it very complex and interesting with regard to the destiny of humanity, a destiny which we now indirectly share. I was shown that the break-up of Atlantis was the final point of departure from the stage of evolution in the physical plane of the E-N-L gene and its multiple derivatives because it had reached the end of its period of existence. In about 350,000 years, the E-N-L branch had exhausted about as many variants or sub-frames as possible. After the sinking of Atlantis, what remained of the L branch (E-N-L beings) evolved in different directions on Earth, some groups becoming more developed than others. They created certain bases, being connected to the extraterrestrial beings that evolved from the initial group.

Communication, however, was no longer direct because the frequency of the physical plane of the Earth had greatly decreased and there was no longer “compatibility” between it and the frequencies of the etheric plane. As a result, the E-N-L beings that had already retreated into the etheric plane no longer actually lived on the surface of the Earth, but they “descended” from time to time from the etheric to the physical plane to maintain the connection with the few E-N-L beings that were still in the physical plane. As I said, every gene has certain “resources” that, when consumed, cause that gene to “age” or, on the contrary, to be restored, refreshed, and revitalized, but always in the direction of evolution. This is especially true at the level of the physical plane. In one sense, the withdrawal of a gene from the evolutionary scene occurs, analogously speaking, much like the withdrawal of a banknote from the financial market. In its place remain the newer notes which are not so worn. This very intelligent summary was presented to me in the images on the holographic screen, clarifying even certain nuanced aspects of the evolution of the human being and its branches, such as transitions from one stage to another in the transformation of DNA, influences of different natures, or even changes to another condition of existence, as was the case with the E-N-L branch.

THE SUPREME BRANCH OF E-N-K

The problem with the resorption of the E-N-L branch from the perspective of terrestrial evolution was that everything that those beings had achieved over time had to be taken up, in summary, by the E-N-K branch which was, in turn, diversified in several directions. In this “dowry transfer” of knowledge was also included spiritual knowledge which had reached a high degree of refinement in the E-N-L beings. That is why some E-N-L beings that remained in the physical plane, as well as some of the more evolved E-N-K beings, were supported by direct “counseling” from the extraterrestrial beings who were part of certain advanced civilizations involved in the process of creation and the evolution of the human being. It was important that at least some of that invaluable knowledge and experience — accumulated by E-N-L beings in the context of living within many civilizations that appeared and then died out — would be saved for future generations. For a time, the “assistance” of extraterrestrial beings was realized directly in the sense that they were even physically among humans: explaining, detailing and showing what needed to be understood and memorized. Those teachings, however, were not given to anyone but to the few E-N-L beings that remained on Earth or to the more evolved E-N-K beings. In most cases, they were or became leaders, then transmitting to the masses only a small part of the knowledge they directly gained from the extraterrestrial beings they were connected with. The motivation was obvious: most E-N-K beings did not have a high enough level of consciousness to understand those teachings correctly. Thus, with the passage of time, several elitist social categories have been differentiated: great leaders (such as pharaohs, kings or emperors); priests (who had an important initiatory role, transmitting the knowledge of the “secret sciences” further, i.e. to those who were trained); and hermits, prophets or saints (which were a special category and especially appreciated by advanced extraterrestrial beings). In fact, at that time period, about 25,000 B.C., the E-N-K branch had the first really important “start” in the evolutionary plan, thus taking over a certain part of the “inheritance” of the E-N-L beings.

The same thing happened in the case of the cataclysm that led to the sinking of Atlantis. Some of the Atlantean scholars knew what was to come. That is, they knew that the great continent would be sunk, so they wanted vestiges, knowledge and much of their culture and science to remain for posterity. That was first and foremost a decision made on their part, an act of will that was completely altruistic, for the benefit of the human race in the future. To achieve this, they wanted to extend their reach to the area of Central America, especially to what is called Mexico and Guatemala today, then to Egypt in northern Africa, to the north of Europe in the area of Iceland and even further to the east of that continent. The “seeds” of their knowledge had to be spread to many places on Earth to be sure that the dowry would not be lost forever. For a certain period of time, all three main types of beings lived together in such centers of spirituality: E-N-L beings, more evolved E-N-K beings, and certain extraterrestrial beings, but they separated afterward and each race followed its own path of evolution.

In every place on Earth where such centers, occult schools of esoteric sciences and highly philosophical systems of thought began to be built, the emphasis was on preserving the ancient knowledge of E-N-L beings and further developing such teachings. Simultaneously with these initiatives, the great “galactic relays” that are the pyramids began to be built, and it was decided that they would also support a certain line of spiritual development in addition to their consecrated role of serving as “galactic communicators”. Thus, when Atlantis sank, there were already many such powerful spiritual centers on the planet with spiritually evolved beings, but there was also a very large number of less evolved E-N-K beings.

I will present more broadly and in chronological order some of the main moments of the evolution of Mankind as they were presented to me in the holographic images, pointing to their main characteristics but also to the errors of interpretation that have been transmitted up to now or even the intentional concealment of important events that have served as true “marking stones” throughout human history.

CHAPTER EIGHT — SHAMBHALA

The so-called “mythical realm of Shambhala” is actually an obvious reality and quite close to us, denied only by those who have not had access to the truth about it or who have no spiritual affinities to understand this important topic. In a way, it can be said that Shambhala even existed on Earth, at least up to its great “resorption” from the surface, about 27,500 years ago. I presented some elements about this sacred land in the “center of the Earth” in the previous volume of the Transylvanian Series where I described the magnificent constructions that I have seen from a distance.*

[FOOTNOTE: * Inside the Earth - Second Tunnel, 2019, Chapter 7.]

A NECESSARY SPECIFICATION

Many people probably ask themselves, “Okay, but if Shambhala is a reality, then where is it actually? Is there a specific place for this land? Is it really at the center of the Earth?”

We must first understand that these are specific questions for something that exists in the three-dimensional physical plane, characterized by certain laws of space and time, but they do not make sense when referring to a reality from the etheric plane which is characterized by four dimensions (three spatial and one temporal). Theoretically, in order to have access from the physical plane to something in the etheric plane, there is no specific space. Something in the etheric plane — the realm of Shambhala in this case — can be accessed from anywhere in the physical plane, but for this it is necessary to raise the frequency of vibration in the consciousness of the observer.

Shambhala can be found in the “center of the Earth” because spirituality is much more sustained in that area, and it does not appear only in isolated centers or places on the surface of the planet. It would be a mistake, however, to understand that Shambhala actually existed concretely “in the middle of the Earth” because then the question might arise: If it is in the center of the planet, then how is it possible to reflect on the surface, in this, the world we live in?

Things must therefore be understood correctly. The world of Shambhala represents a frequency of manifestation of consciousness and energy that is very high and has to do with Earth, with the existence of life here; but it cannot be said that it is above or below the surface of the planet because this would only be a limited approach to the situation. Being manifested in the etheric plane, it is not obligatory for it to be in or out of something in the physical plane. People who do not have adequate esoteric knowledge cannot understand these subtle realities and will tend to apply the laws of classical physics that they know to solve or investigate realities from higher subtle planes, but this is not possible. The only way to solve such “mysteries” is to raise the vibrational frequency of the individual; that is, the spiritual evolution of the being and implicitly transforming it to a higher level of consciousness.

There were times, however, when the Shambhala realm was easily accessible, even from the surface of the planet. One could easily move from the physical plane to the etheric plane, and some of the most well-known of such “passages” were in the mountain areas. Tens of thousands of years ago, this was a common thing. E-N-L beings had fast access to Shambhala thanks to their high level of consciousness, and even some of the E-N-K beings could reach this realm because there were quite a few points of confluence between the physical and the etheric plane on the surface of the soil or on water.

THE FORMATION OF SHAMBHALA

An image summary of Shambhala’s history on the holographic screen showed me that it was beginning to form at the time a spiritual brotherhood was born. As I saw in the pictures on the holographic screen, rudiments of its formation appeared during the period 100,000-120,000 B.C. but without a clear orientation. It was about the existence of territories in which only E-N-L beings with a high degree of spiritual realization lived. I realized that only those highly evolved beings could live in those areas because they lived easily in both the physical and the etheric planes; that is, both in the 3-D and in the 4-D plane. Because of them, those etheric realms were “paired” with the physical plane, and E-N-L beings could move from one plane to another at any time which was allowed to other evolved types of beings, such as extraterrestrial ones, but not to the E-N-K beings. The level of evolution for most of the E-N-K beings was primitive, and they preferred the veneration of the “gods” who, in the vast majority, were in fact their own, belonging to the developed E-N-L line. As far as I was aware, Shambhala was formed by a kind of “spiritual selection” between the beings who could pass into those areas surrounded by etheric dimensions, characterized by high vibrational frequencies, and the beings who did not have access to there by reason of their insufficiently developed level of consciousness. In other words, some people could penetrate and remain in those etheric “areas” while others could not.

For a long time in these areas, the physical and etheric planes “coexisted” because the general frequencies of the two planes were quite close. On the other hand, the connection between the physical and the etheric planes was also possible thanks to the existence of multiple hybridizations between the E-N-L and E-N-K branches, each on different stages of spirituality which gave birth to the so-called “demigods”. Those human beings successfully managed to make the transition from one plane to another and thus could transmit information to and from the area of the etheric plane to the E-N-K.

Higher etheric frequencies were the germs of formation of what would later become the “realm of Shambhala”. In those areas, a sacred spiritual side of the Earth developed because the E-N-L beings who lived there had a high degree of understanding of spirituality in its deepest aspects. After several tens of thousands of years, due to the repeated subtle journeys, certain strong subtle connections were created between the various territories inhabited by the E-N-L beings, those being etheric zones elevated in vibrational frequency. These have amplified their subtle connections with the areas inside the Earth through those “bridges of subtle energy connections” that we have already talked about.

Thus, connections were made with all areas of spiritual refinement on the surface of the Earth and within it. In this way, Shambhala was born precisely by the unanimous decision of the E-N-L beings living in such elevated realms in order to maintain an identity separate from the territories inhabited by the E-N-K.

Apparently, Shambhala is now known as a big city, but in reality, it represents a multitude of areas in the etheric plane which are characterized by a high spirituality. As I said, it initially consisted of several “areas” of the physical plane in which the etheric plane could also develop. When the conditions on the surface of the planet — both physical and spiritual in nature — worsened, the union of those ethereal zones into a harmonious bonding led to the “withdrawal” of Shambhala into the etheric plane which actually meant the dramatic diminution of the connections with the physical plane, as I will show below.

THE SPIRITUAL MISSION OF SHAMBHALA

The first intentions of Shambhala for the settlement of a planetary spiritual mission came only after the Great War of the Tarshians, so after 50,000 B.C. and the especially terrible conflict that I might as well call “The war for the conquest of Shambhala,” that became the main cause of that sacred realm.* Of course, at that time there was not yet a name to designate it, such as “Shambhala” or another variation; at least I did not notice such in the images. The wise E-N-L beings who lived in those territories and had a “double” in the higher etheric dimension understood that life on our planet needed support because the conflicting forces were beginning to be very strong. The inhabitants of Shambhala began to act in this respect; and although the struggles in the physical plane for the next thousands of years did not cease, they were no longer as intense and destructive.

[FOOTNOTE: * See Chapter 9 of this book.]

Later, from what I saw, the time period between 30,000 B.C. and 26,000 B.C. was marked by long and painful wars, but unlike the terrible confrontations between the extraterrestrial civilizations on the Earth, about 100,000 years ago, the wars of the mentioned period were fought only between human beings, especially between human being hybrids that came from the union of the E-N-L and E-N-K beings, but also those coming only from the E-N-K branch. They were supported, however, by certain extraterrestrial civilizations, especially after the “division of the regions of influence” at the Great Planetary Council of 27,000 B.C. The participation of the E-N-L beings in those wars was quite weak, numbering less and less. The conflicts were bloody and took place especially in the area we know today as Europe, but I did not focus on this aspect, merely “wandering” through those times. The atmosphere was tense, and I felt the clash of the war situation, seeing images of people fleeing and even specific sounds of combat weapons.

As a result of that tense situation and the obvious decline of spirituality throughout the planet — due to aggressive population growth of E-N-K beings and the gradual diminution of the number of E-N-L beings — it was decided at the Great Planetary Council around 27,000 B.C. that the areas where Shambhala existed would be delimited and separated from the rest of the zones and frequencies on the planet so that most spiritual teachings and knowledge on Earth would be concentrated in Shambhala.

Shambhala’s “withdrawal” took place in two stages. In the beginning — after the decision taken by the Great Planetary Council — there was more of a “demarcation” of the rest of the population which was mostly E-N-K. Accordingly, access would be even more restricted in this realm. Later, in the final stage, Shambhala completely “resorbed” into the subtle etheric plane. This happened, as far as I was aware, in approximately 25,500 B.C.

With that resurrection in the subtle plane — which was the result of the decision taken by the Great Planetary Council — Shambhala was formed as a spiritual center for the support and evolution of humanity on Earth. Until then, Shambhala did not exist separately, but we can only say that there were “areas of profound spiritual manifestation in the etheric plane” which intersected with the physical plane of the Earth. Most of the beings now populating Shambhala are actually beings from the former advanced civilizations, mostly belonging to the E-N-L branch. As those beings were genuinely spiritually oriented, they were recognized as such by the rest of the populations on the planet; and Shambhala therefore became the protector and spiritual supporter of the Earth.

RESIDENTS OF SHAMBHALA

Even though it represented a reference pole of spirituality and the support it could offer to Mankind, Shambhala was no longer so easily accessible by human beings, not even to the hybridized E-N-L and E-N-K beings, all of which correlated with the diminishing vibrational frequency of the consciousness human beings on a global level. Generally speaking, Shambhala is revealed only when an area of the Earth or a being becomes sufficiently spiritualized so as to resonate with the high frequency of vibration of this sacred realm.

Shambhala's exit from the physical plane — where the aid it provided could be much more effective — was to be followed by another “decisive blow”, breaking the last pillar of spirituality and the advanced technological level from the surface of the planet; and by that, I mean the destruction of Atlantis. The sinking of Atlantis also meant the “sinking” of our planet into a deep spiritual darkness which has been perpetuated thousands of years since.

Gradually, however, and at the same time driven and supported by Shambhala, new centers of spirituality began to appear on Earth which developed in different regions of the globe. The problem was that the difference between the frequency of the physical plane of our planet and the frequency of the etheric plane had become far too large to easily allow for — as was the case long ago — the “experiential exchanges” between the two planes. As I said, a human being from the physical plane can only have access to the realm of Shambhala when they reach or at least approach its vibrational frequency level.

As for the inhabitants of Shambhala, they are practically an “extension” of the E-N-L gene, but among these beings, there are some that continue their evolution on the hybridized E-N-L and E-N-K branches, as well as those E-N-K beings that have evolved sufficiently from the spiritual point of view. I have also seen that the realm of Shambhala is open to extraterrestrial beings who have reached a high degree of spiritual evolution; and moreover, collaboration with them is closely linked to the future destiny of Mankind.

SUMMARY

As usual, and as I especially wanted to go deeper into the subject, I made a summary on the holographic screen at this point which helped me to digest the information better. I also knew that it was often possible to get some extra details. The images on the screen were reconfigured and focused on the decision to form a spiritual center of the planet. The decision was made after 50,000 B.C. by Hyperborean E-N-L beings who decided to further support the E-N-K gene because human civilization, being formed in the majority by this category of beings, needed and still needs great help.

Around 30,000 B.C., Hyperboreans, who have been in contact with other ethereal focal zones on Earth inhabited by E-N-L beings, noticed that the etheric plane no longer had “adherence” to the physical plane. They then proposed that the “areas” of the etheric plane in the vicinity of the Earth which were deeply spiritualized to unite in order to form a strong realm, a spiritual center for the support of humanity, consisting mainly of E-N-L beings.

In the etheric plane, the union of the different etheric zones which “intersected” with the physical plane on the surface of the planet was made quite easy by manifesting a common will of those E-N-L beings. This was possible because everything that existed in the those “areas” in the etheric plane, being “built” on the same spiritual rules, were attracted and united in accordance with the law of universal affinity. This resulted in an etheric unity that was common to all the etheric areas of the Earth that displayed a high spirituality. Thus, a spiritual center of the planet was established which came into being by uniting the respective “zones”. Initially, the new realm was called Anagon, and this happened about 25,500 B.C., after the total withdrawal into the etheric plane. Later, probably due to the influence of the different cultures belonging to the subsequent civilizations, as well as due to the imprint of time, this center became known as Shambhala.

CHAPTER NINE — THE GREAT TARS WAR

The period of about 100,000 years ago was very “black” for humanity because it involved a devastating conflict between many of the alien civilizations that existed on Earth at that time. I would even say that it was the most terrible confrontation I have ever seen in relation to the Earth, but it was entirely from extraterrestrial sources. All the belligerent parties were extraterrestrial and disputed their territories or power of influence. It was a very difficult period and a period of “rupture” because many civilizations then separated from the Galactic Alliance to which they had joined.

THE DRAMATIC INFLUENCE OF MALEFIC REPTILES

Due to the very advanced technologies and the nature of the weaponry used, life on the surface of the planet had much to suffer, and in some areas, which are now under water, it was completely eradicated. I saw terrible images of this conflict which took place both in the Earth’s atmosphere and outside of it, in cosmic space. I was struck by the fact that the intensity of the fighting was so high that a significant part of the sky of the planet, as seen from the ground, was almost red.

The confrontations were of unheard of harshness. Huge explosions left enormous debris on the surface of the Earth. I also saw how, afterwards , they “extracted” those residues by “crushing” and then absorbing them into giant ships, like containers. At those times, in my mind, I called them “scavenger ships” but they were probably huge transport ships. Strangely enough, that terrible conflict was not an atomic one. I saw only a few detonations reminiscent of nuclear explosions, but they were of less intensity than other deflagrations that took place at that time.

The main source of misunderstandings was complex in nature. It involved a race of evil beings in our galaxy with reptilian features. In the economy of the universe, the reptilians seem to have a special destiny because they appear at key points in the evolution of races or civilizations, even if their actions are unconscious in this aspect but directed only for selfish, controlling and oppressive purposes.

From the presentation I saw, reptilian beings live long lives; and in order to develop, they seek to find a suitable “land” from which to “feed”, that is to say, the evil reptilians seek to conquer planets and civilizations in order to exploit them and achieve their goals but do so in a manner that they do not have to worry too much about them. Being quite technologically advanced, they aim to infiltrate those star regions and systems of the galaxy where there are already advanced civilizations but not as much as their own.

Primitive civilizations or those at the dawn of technological progress do not interest them because they target those who already have a certain potential but can be conquered relatively easily but still have some use afterwards, depending upon their level of development.

From this point of view, it can be said that the reptilians are pragmatic. If the respective civilization is primitive or at a too weak level of development, this implies or requires a consistent effort on their part to “pasture” them, and they do not want to work so hard. On the other hand, if they conquer too much and too quickly, that outweighs the possibilities of occupation and control. That is why the evil reptilians show amazing patience, being specialized in infiltration through subversive actions. They corrupt and conquer an advanced civilization, but not necessarily through arbitrary destruction, looting and then leaving that planet, but rather and especially through undermining, intrigue, and corruption.

In other words, they are not brutal predators in most cases, but they work at more refined levels, through hybridization and by introducing genes with low vibrational frequencies. They know that if they can corrupt enough

DNA in a race, it will eventually retain their specific trace whereby they will then always have a point of support and action in that civilization. The greater this specific imprint is imprinted on the DNA of a race, the better for the reptilians because they will then be able to influence it more easily when it comes to decisions and actions.

CORRUPTIONS BY HYBRIDIZATION

Their plans are therefore, less violent, immediate or with large scale cosmic struggles. A more long-term strategy is employed by infusing the DNA of some races with their own DNA. In time, they know that this action will corrupt our race, at least to some extent, and such weaknesses may be used later for their own purposes.

In this way, the evil reptilians end up corrupting even advanced civilizations in an indirect way. As I said, they always aim to orient themselves towards those civilizations that are not very developed but which still belong to cosmic alliances or have entrances to developed civilizations. By applying the hybridization method, they simply infiltrate the germs of evil into that civilization or alliance of developed civilizations, placing their hybrids in important places and thus creating gaps in the security and good understanding of that alliance. It is a very subversive but effective way of spreading their evil influence in the galaxy. This was also the way they acted on Earth.

Using infiltration through some of the civilizations that are members of the Galactic Alliance and even a civilization that descended from the original Sirians but settled in a star system other than that of the Sirius A star, they transmitted elements of their own DNA to the human population.

What surprised me somewhat was that the infiltration was not a massive one but rather a subtle path. We have seen that, through certain actions of hybridization, their genes initially corrupted the DNA of a small number of human beings. That corruption, however, later spread to a large number of beings, taking the form of negative ways of thinking and action. They have manifested themselves mainly through misguided beliefs which, through repetition from generation to generation, have created gaps and perverted connections within human DNA.

This subtle way of perverting was later used by people to achieve certain onerous purposes. It can also be found today in different forms, one example being communism. This system as such has inoculated a way of thinking, a concept and a way of psycho-mental behavior which, over time, has determined a specific resonance in human DNA. This explains why, even after thirty years since the fall of communism in our country, there are still typical communist ideas, tendencies and actions that represent the manifestation of that negative resonance, deeply infiltrated into the DNA of the population. The predominant subtle energy, sustained for decades, has materialized that ominous change in the DNA macromolecule.

Thus, in ancient times, the reptilians first planted some bad seeds which then proliferated and developed, over time, to the level at which their influence on human DNA could no longer be denied or annihilated. It is true, however, that this corruption does not occupy a large percentage of the DNA macromolecule, but as we have seen, it represents only about 2-3% or even less; but even so, some tendencies, habits and actions chosen in contemporary society show us what negative effects can occur as a result of the resonances induced by this very dangerous civilization.

BREAKING AND RESTORING ALIEN ALLIANCE

Corruption and infiltration of reptilians, even among advanced civilizations in the Alliance, led quickly to manifesting claims on certain territories, both on Earth and in our Solar System, which they wished to have under their control.

I saw and understood, in a clever combination of images, that some of the elevated beings of those civilizations began to manifest certain intentions and tendencies other than those respecting universal harmony, orienting themselves towards goals, and in particular, individual goals and those concerning power. In other words, they began to decline spiritually because the path of temptation is very sinuous and deceptive, and the evil reptilians know very well the tricks by which to influence beings in this sense and even whole civilizations. The problem was that those extraterrestrial beings, representing some civilizations in the Alliance, began to forcibly delimit some territories of influence which they took under occupation. Following the outbreak of the conflict, the Alliance broke up over a period of time and divided into several smaller alliances according to affinities and interests.

That was a very turbulent and trying period for humanity. As we have seen, it has been necessary for over twenty thousand years for things to return to normal and to restore a certain equilibrium, both in the planet's ecosystem and in the existence of Mankind since then.

At the same time, the original Alliance was restored to a certain extent. The images showed me summarized renditions of fleets or instant shorts from diplomatic meetings between representatives of civilizations which varied in the number of members. It was the only way I could figure out what actually happened immediately after the conflict.

THE ROLE OF THE ORIGINAL SIRIANS

About 70,000 years ago, the Sirians in the Sirius A system decided to strengthen the Alliance of which they were also a part. They did not use armed intervention in the great conflict of the Alliance although, practically speaking, they were the ones who sponsored it. The Sirians then only played the role of mediators.

Being somewhat puzzled about this, I asked why they did not intervene in that conflict in order to end it or at least to diminish it. The man from Apellos explained to me that, to the extent that he knew, the war between the extraterrestrial civilizations involved not only the Earth but also had as an element of dispute and a delimitation of certain areas of interest in the galaxy for different forces and groups within it. The situation was tense on several planets, and that is precisely why the Sirians sought to protect as much as possible the galactic sector we were part of. Probably, if they had actually intervened in the conflict, it would have increased the hostilities; and at some point, the situation could have become uncontrollable. On the other hand, they wished to set free the course of events and individual choices in accordance with cosmic laws and principles, intervening only where the ignorance of some civilizations could bring great damage or irreparable disturbance in the natural course of things and of the divinely integrated plans.

The Sirians never wanted to escalate the conflicts, even if they could have won them quite easily due to the extraordinary technological advances they possessed. They preferred the alternative of peace and evolution in accordance with the laws of universal harmony, seeking to respect as much as possible the free will of the civilizations with which they came into contact. Only in the conditions in which they are attacked and have to defend themselves, as we have seen in the case of the great confrontations with the reptilians, do they use their very advanced combat capabilities. In the terrible extraterrestrial space war of about 100,000 years ago, they were limited to only supporting the diplomatic path, mediating certain relations between the alien civilizations in conflict.

As I said, the seeds of evil consisted of the influence of the evil reptilians. After the conflict was over, the Sirians wanted a strengthening of the Galactic Alliance they were part of. Their decision was determined by the need to prevent, as far as possible, the conquering corruption by the reptilians of other civilizations within the grouping of extraterrestrial civilizations. This had already happened to a certain extent, and the negative influence of reptilians had been felt in many areas on Earth.

The strengthening of the Galactic Alliance implied a closer collaboration and support between those civilizations that formed it. It was an eminently beneficial alliance, and I was told that there were others in other sectors of the galaxy. The beneficial alliance, consisting of Sirians, Pleiadians, Arcturians and several dozen other civilizations, had a counterbalance in the sense that the Reptilians also formed an alliance with several civilizations oriented to the conquest, exploitation and control of some planets or even star systems.

That is why the Sirians wanted to amplify the collaboration between the civilizations within their alliance, thus bringing together different vibrational frequencies against the reptilian force and the evil and very subversive alliances they formed. Therefore, it was important to prevent one of the less developed civilizations of the Galactic Alliance from being captured or conquered by reptilians, all of which would have repercussions both for the Galactic Alliance and for the genetic “laboratory” on Earth.

ALIEN “OBSERVER” CIVILIZATIONS

I have been shown, however, that there are also neutral civilizations who do not wish to be part of any cosmic alliance. These are called “observers”, meaning they are only interested in observing the course of events and processes that take place over a period of time on a planet or in a particular area of the galaxy.

After declaring their neutrality status, they are allowed to attend the theater of operations, based upon a cosmic law of evolution. Generally speaking, these are highly evolved civilizations which use such situations created at a galactic level only in a somewhat philosophical sense, as an element that can contribute to their experience. For example, I was shown at that time two such huge ships witnessing civilizations who were assisting remote events, in a kind of “sovereign silence”. Due to the way the images were, slightly translucent and somewhat blurred, I understood that the observers were assisting everything from the etheric plane, probably so as not to disturb the physical space around the Earth. They do not only consider the actual and immediate events, such as conflicts, but for a period of time, they have followed the evolution of life on Earth with interest and the development of the DNA of the human being and the implications that flow from such.

TARS CIVILIZATION

Returning to the period after the terrible interlocking of the Alliance civilizations, in the period of time between the years 90,000-72,000 B.C., I saw many battles and tensions on the surface of the planet which then involved human beings. Those conflicts culminated in a terrible and huge war on the territory of today's Europe, about 50,000 B.C. This war represented a decisive moment for our planet and for the beings from its surface because it involved a certain “break” between the planes of existence, especially between the physical plane and the subtle etheric plane.

At that time, there was an advanced civilization of human beings on Earth called Tarsus, but I also heard small differences in the frequency of this word which I understood as tarsei or tarasei. I considered, however that tars is the basis of the word; and so, the inhabitants of that time, from that region of the world, can be referred to as the Tarsus of old, the ones I will refer to below.

The configuration of the land in the northern hemisphere, as I saw in the holographic images shown to me, was slightly different from what we know today in the sense that Sweden, Norway, and Finland were united with Europe. Instead of the large surface that in our day is covered by the sea, there were only lakes and a few large rivers. The Tarsus civilization advanced even further south, towards Poland, Ukraine, Romania and even slightly to the east, capturing some of today's Baltic countries. In other words, the territory was spread very wide.

For the most part, the Tarsites were E-N-K human beings, but they had a much slimmer, more vital and more harmonious body than that of contemporary humans. At the beginning of their civilization, many thousands of years ago, that is by 70,000 B.C., they were E-N-L beings, but due to repeated combinations with more primitive E-N-K beings, their DNA underwent major transformations with strong E-N-K accents. From a certain point of view, we can say that they were a civilization of demigods; that is, hybrids coming from a combination of E-N-L beings with E-N-K beings.

At that time in that area, which covered much of central and northern Europe, the many frequencies of the etheric plane intersected in many places with the frequency of the physical plane, thus resulting in many space-time portals which could be easily passed through from the physical plane to the etheric one and vice versa. The colossal armed confrontation between the populations in the mentioned area , which were mostly Tarsus populations, also signaled a "rupture" of the planes of existence for Earth, that is to say, a much more severe separation between the physical and the etheric plane. Until that time, the conjunctions or the intersections between these two planes of existence represented something natural. If, for example, an E-N-L being in Africa wanted to reach northern Poland, it could happen in a few moments through such a portal which was, in fact, a specific "union" or "touching" between the physical and the etheric plane.

THE ORIGIN OF THE CONFLICT

As I was shown, the cause of the immense conflict around 50,000 B.C. consisted of frictions between the different beliefs shared by the Tarsus populations. I have said that, at that time, the connections between the physical and the etheric planes were numerous, creating many portals from one plane to another on the planet's surface, but especially providing access to the sacred realms inhabited by wise E-N-L beings which were to be later established in the realm known as Shambhala. Over time, however, some groups of the Tarshish population began to want an expansion of the population of their territory, also involving many crossing zones between the physical and the etheric planes. Thus appeared the first armed conflicts which, at first, were relatively minor.

The insistence upon these struggles and wars and the quantity of them destabilized the natural existence of the bridges between the physical and the etheric. The frequencies corresponding to the etheric zones began to separate more and more from the physical plane, and this gave rise to great dissatisfaction and misunderstandings because many possibilities were lost which were previously valid due to the coexistence with the etheric plane. These included higher knowledge, much easier access when moving from one area to another, contacting higher beings, higher states of existence and many others. Each faction of the population involved in the conflict therefore wanted an acceptable area to continue their existence, many of them wanting the Shambhala territories for themselves. Since then, the situation has been unfortunately similar to what we encounter today: different states and ethnicities claiming territories belonging to other states and ethnicities, inevitably leading to tensions and conflicts which often degenerate into wars.

That was actually the time when the Great War broke out, through a kind of "unification" of all the hostile outbreaks that had been going on for many years in different areas of the Tarsus territory. Different factions and groups of populations had fought in different parts of Tarsus territory, but gradually, through the portals between the physical and the etheric planes, they became concentrated in a single convergence zone. This further intensified the misunderstandings between the factions of the population which began to form numerous ad-hoc alliances. At one point, things became so complicated that no one knew who they were actually fighting with or who they were allied with.

THE WRATH OF THE ARMED CONFLICT

It was a terrible, huge, and devastating war. A huge army, led by factions hostile to the Good, forced entry into some entrances into Shambhala, attacking through several access areas located, in my opinion, in the southern and central areas of Poland. There, however, they were struck by a strong defense of the common areas of transition between the physical and the etheric plane. The conflict zone then spread to huge territories, as it did in the small areas, encompassing part of Ukraine and northern Romania, the entire territory of Poland, and also the southern part of Sweden.

The terrible conflict involved a huge number of warriors, perhaps millions. It was a virtual slaughter, especially since it was not a medieval battle with swords, bows and spears. The Tarshish were elite warriors, very powerful and with weapons that lent some characteristics and powers specific to the etheric plane with which they had very frequent contact until then. That was another reason why the war broke out: the illusion of losing power can give birth to monsters in thought.

I also saw, however, other groups of E-N-K beings, less developed but also very powerful, that had conventional weapons such as axes, spears or bows. Not even the E-N-L beings stayed away from that terrible confrontation, using far superior technologies such as some highly advanced armament attack aircraft. I saw, for example, how they emitted some kind of “jets” like a bunch of lasers which branched out near the surface of the Earth and produced huge damage, both materially and in terms of human lives.

I have watched a few fight scenes, and I can say that, by scale, the intelligence and the energy involved in that human conflict was even more terrible than the war that was started by the alien civilizations around 100,000 B.C., both in the vicinity of the Earth and on its surface. Even though the level of destruction in the case of the extraterrestrial conflict was much higher, and the nature of the weapons used by them was far more terrible and destructive, the unimaginable ferocity imposed by the combatants involved in the Great Tarsus War was out of the ordinary. It was basically like generalized insanity.

AFTER THE WAR

The conflict was so violent that it deeply affected the morale of all parties involved. It was so painful and shocking that, after its termination, some defenders of peace among the E-N-L beings decided that it should be “engraved” in the memory of Mankind in order to prevent this from happening again. The images then showed me, in the “translucent” and slightly blurred mode, specific to the reality of the subtle etheric plane, the presence of giant columns designed to serve as warning broadcasters. Dizzying constructions by reason of their size, I was shown that they contained a kind of “telepathic wave transmitter” whose purpose was to prevent any such devastating conflict in the future by issuing specific frequencies that were to be activated in the event of such a threat.

Those who survived remained in those areas, gradually laying the foundations of a new civilization: the great and powerful Hyperborean civilization. During those sequences, the man from Apellos intervened, and operating some commands on the holographic screen, changed the course of the images, bringing into the foreground a mountainous region and some tall and very powerful inhabitants who lived there a few thousand years after the Great War. From the frequency the columnar structure was emitting, I immediately deciphered that they were called Tharos, probably a throwback or alteration of the old term Tars. Telepathically, I understood that the meaning of that name was “invincible”.

The images then showed a place near a cave which the Tharos guarded with great devotion, and subtly, I understood that it was one of the areas of passage from the physical plane to the land of Shambhala. I was surprised, however, by the intervention of the man from Apellos, but I quickly understood the reason: he wanted to show me that the entry was in Romania. Of course, this is not the only entrance as there are such penetrations to the realm of Shambhala in the territory of other countries, but this represents one of the rare permanent intersections between the physical and the etheric plane which was not affected by the Great Tarshish war.

At first, the image was presented to me as a view from a great height from where I could even see the curvature of the Carpathian mountains. Then, some specific indicators and symbols appeared on the right, indicating the place of entry into Shambhala. I then realized that the entrance is somewhere on the mountain that is today known as Ceahlău.*

[FOOTNOTE: * Ceahlău Mountain is a very curious and interesting location in the Moldavian region of Romania. Every August 6th, the shadows of the mountain and early morning (from approximately 6 a.m. to 9 a.m.) mist create the image of a holographic pyramid that approximates the Great Pyramid at Giza. Pilgrims visit the area during this period and the Romanian Orthodox Church sites this locale as where The Transfiguration took place. The Transfiguration is from the New Testament and is where Jesus becomes the Christ. In other words, he transforms from a regular human being into the Christ.]

The Great Tarsus War of 50,000 B.C. destabilized many areas of transition to the etheric plane, later leading to the separation of the etheric plane from the physical one. It was a rearrangement of the dimensions, a recalibration of them, and here I refer in particular to the physical and etheric planes. Due to the nature and intensity of the emotions conveyed by the combatants during that period, the energies involved were huge so that even the astral plane around the Earth was affected. The incredible violence, as well as the ferocity that characterized it, remain engraved in the etheric memory of the Earth as an important reference point for humanity. The negative effects on the planet's existential plane made that armed clash a sad memory and a kind of crucial reminder that such a somber event should never be repeated.

As a result of the very bloody war that took place at that time, numerous hybridized beings that came from the E-N-L and E-N-K branches could no longer support the connection between the physical plane and the etheric plane, and they consequently separated. I was then shown in a few summary images that, after the end of the war, the few remaining beings, especially the upper ones in the E-N-L branch and those in the upper E-N-K branch (that is, some of the "demigods" who represented hybridizations with E-N-L beings) later developed an elevated spirituality in that area which thus became the birthplace of the great Hyperborean civilization.

CHAPTER TEN — HYPERBOREA

Just as in the case of Shambhala, historians and archeologists place Hyperborea among the so-called “mythical” civilizations as there is almost no clear material evidence of its existence. In reality, as I viewed the exceptional images that were presented to me on the holographic screen of Apellos, I could see the very vivid reality of the Hyperborean civilization in distant times.

ETYMOLOGY AND LOCATION

The name Hyperborea is of recent origin, only a few thousand years old, and comes from ancient Greek. In fact, the roots of Hyperborea are very old as they extend to about 70,000 B.C. The population that lived in that territory represented the old Tarshish, the ancestors of the Hyperboreans. The meaning of the word Hyperborea is known to almost everyone: the northern land, those who lived in the northern part of the ancient world.

This idea was correctly transmitted because the region in which the extraordinary civilization of Hyperborea developed advanced far to the north. After watching the events as they were shown to me, I did some brief research on the internet to see any differences between what is being circulated and what was in reality.

With the exception of small errors related to locale, the other elements, although few in fact, express the truth but only in a very general reference frame. I think the lack of information is mainly due to the fact that the age of this civilization is very ancient, and the knowledge about it has simply been lost over time.

Texts and stories of the ancients mention, for example, the territory of the Hyperborea as being north of the Danube or bordering on the Black Sea, but this is not entirely true. From what I saw, Hyperborea encompassed a vast territory in a somewhat “vertical” strip of land, from today’s Transylvania upward into what we know to be western Ukraine today, also capturing a small part of the western Baltic countries. A significant part of the territory was on the present surface of Poland, ascending to the south of Sweden. I did not see, however, that the Hyperborean territory had reached the Black Sea. Even so, Hyperborea occupies a vast territory.

COAGULATION OF THE HYPERBOREAN CIVILIZATION AFTER THE GREAT TARS WAR

The Tarshish represented the first spiritual line which would later define Hyperborea. Their civilization existed and prospered between 70,000 and 50,000 B.C. From what I saw and understood, there were many spiritual directions and beliefs at that time but none prevailed. As I said, at the end of that period, a terrible war took place which practically destroyed the Tarshish civilization and gave rise to the development of a new civilization which was the Hyperborean civilization.* It was only after that great war that the territory of Hyperborea was better defined and the civilization unified into a common spiritual creed.

[FOOTNOTE: * See Chapter 9 (ed.)]

Thus, in the history of Hyperborea, there were two great periods: before the Great Tarsus War and after its end, which also meant an important change at a subtle level for our planet. Before the war, that is, during the period 70,000-50,000 B.C. which was dominated by the Tarshish, I could see an amalgam of races derived mainly from the E-N-L branch and only a few from the E-N-K branch.

After the terrible confrontation, the respective territory on which Hyperborea was to be later settled remained almost uninhabited for a fairly long period of time. Later, as I saw in a rather rapid flow of images, the population of that area began to grow and to become individualized in the sense that it became a civilization of its own, a kind of administration to the degree that the E-N-L beings who were leaders, because of their high spiritual level, managed to unite all the factions of the population into a strong civilization and a common spiritual orientation. This was due to the fact that, especially in the distant past of humanity, the leadership was eminently spiritual. At that time there was no other type of leadership because the administrative leader of a wider territory was at the same time a priest, and this fact gave an extraordinary force to the population and oriented it positively.

I also saw that, after 50,000 B.C., the territory of Hyperborea featured a “nursery” of DNA development which led to the population of that area having a vast range of breeds, even more diversified than before. Unlike the 20,000 year period prior, the new Hyperborean population was united and coherent in aspirations and thinking, just as, to use a close analogy, the Christian countries of Europe in the Middle Ages were under the spiritual authority of the Pope. Part of the old Tarshish, who were initially E-N-L beings but also included combinations of E-N-L and E-N-K in the form of “gods” as a result of the numerous combinations with E-N-K beings, became an E-N-K majority, known as good craftsmen, especially with weapons of combat.

This is why they were defending the southern part of Hyperborea, living especially in the territory of Transylvania today and further northward, towards Ukraine. This gene was “inherited” by the E-N-L branch and transmitted further. It propagated very rapidly, much faster than the E-N-L gene had been after the so-called “Hyperborean DNA” was established. On the other hand, the branch of beings E-N-L whose DNA was easy to modify continued to refine. Its “extensions” have led to numerous variations of DNA and, implicitly, of different types of E-N-L beings.

GENE BREEDING

Something very interesting then happened. According to my estimation and based upon the synthesis of images I witnessed, about 27,000 years ago, the E-N-L gene had evolved so much that it had reached about the same level as that of advanced alien civilizations. When that balance was reached, an understanding was created between humans (the E-N-L branch) and certain extraterrestrial civilizations in order for some of their elevated souls to be reincarnated into the bodies of E-N-L beings in an understanding of coexistence, collaboration and mutual support.

Generally speaking, every great civilization that existed on Earth was located in a precise area of the planet without any admixture of other civilizations. This included, for example, the Mu civilization, the Lemurian civilization, and a civilization of E-N-L beings having a strong Sirian influence which existed on the great island later called Atlantis — to name only a few of the great civilizations of the very distant past. There was also the Atlantean civilization itself, this following the Sirian civilization on the same island.

All of these were mostly represented by beings from the E-N-L branch but at different stages of their genome development. They did not mix with other civilizations; but in the case of the final period of the Hyperborean civilization, due to the evolution of the E-N-L beings and the understanding that took place with several extraterrestrial civilizations, the possibility of hybridizing the DNA of the E-N-L human beings was created in the sense that the souls of some evolved extraterrestrial beings were incarnated into the bodies of E-N-L beings. Until then, only the souls of E-N-L beings were incarnated in E-N-L bodies, but once a sufficiently refined level of their DNA structure was reached, the physical bodies of some of the E-N-L secondary branches became able to support the high vibrational frequency of the consciousness of advanced extraterrestrial beings. It is true, however, that the E-N-L beings with these characteristics were quite few compared to the majority of the Hyperborean population which was composed primarily of evolved E-N-K beings.

It can thus be said that, in the Hyperborea of those times, there was a kind of “gene nursery” which led to an “increased flexibility” of human DNA. The evolved E-N-L gene allowed for the incarnation of advanced extraterrestrial souls which later combined with the human body. If not for this, their DNA binding would not have been possible. For example, a Sirian soul incarnates into a male E-N-L being and a Pleiadian soul incarnates into an E-N-L female being, both within the Hyperborean civilization. Their child was also an E-N-L being, but she had within her DNA essential information from both the original DNA of the Syrian being and that of the Pleiadian being.

The majority of the hybridizations were realized on this principle. The basis upon which these hybridizations were built remained the E-N-L gene, but the complexity of the “loops” of other extraterrestrial genes on this basis was astonishing. There were numerous hybridizations between E-N-L human beings who were already evolved and other E-N-L beings in which alien souls were incarnated.

WITHDRAWAL OF THE E-N-L BRANCH

Thus, at that time, the old Tars territory, which had virtually become the territory called Hyperborea, was inhabited by many types of populations. This resulted from the ease with which many souls on other planets were able to be incarnated on Earth; and they had the physical bodies of E-N-L beings as they could support the evolved extraterrestrial consciousness. I could see in that vast territory almost all the typologies of populations: white, black, Métis, yellow, Mongolian and even other types which were derived from these but were still distinguished by certain features: skin color, eyes, hair, and particularities of face or body, sometimes quite different from what we know from today. It was a conglomerate of races even more alive than can be found in our times in the great metropolises of the West, both in diversity and in the number of individuals, yet their proportion was balanced.

I think that the last period of relative harmony on Earth was before the withdrawal of the E-N-L gene due to it having exhausted its resources. The retreat of the E-N-L branch was quite slow at first. It started by 27,000 B.C. as E-N-L beings evolved, only remaining in certain areas and no longer spread throughout the surface of the planet.

The withdrawal of E-N-L beings from the physical plane, however, accelerated considerably after the fall of Atlantis. I could even say that the last E-N-L “act” was Atlantis because, after its sinking, the Earth remained populated only with beings from the E-N-K branch with the possible exception of some E-N-L beings hybridized with E-N-K beings. At the level of leadership or great rulers, only E-N-L beings could be found, such as the pharaohs of ancient Egypt or the great kings of the Middle East. Until the fall of Atlantis, the E-N-L beings in Hyperborea, knowing that it was time for their withdrawal from the evolutionary chain as it had reached its maximum, wanted to open and further refine the E-N-K branch, which had a more “rigid” DNA, in order to drive the evolution of Mankind. For many E-N-K beings, that period meant a surprising evolution, a special purification, and this was precisely because of hybridization with highly evolved beings which left the seeds of complex resonances in their DNA.

The E-N-L branch thus carried out a complex evolutionary cycle on Earth and was about to withdraw to a subtle plane superior to the physical one, partly due to special climatic conditions which were increasingly manifesting, more so in the northern areas of the planet. Starting in about 25,000 B.C., the temperatures on the surface of the planet began to fall which led to the E-N-L beings, who already had a large resonance with the etheric plane, remaining more and more in this subtle plane with increasingly reduced links with the physical plane.

This required a need for “crossing zones” or portals to the etheric plane so that the connection with the remaining beings in the physical plane would not be interrupted. Mountain areas or stretches of water were preferred, but such crossings between one plane and another could also be encountered in forests or even in the fields. In the beginning, these areas were easy to find because they penetrated much of the planet’s surface, especially in the Northern Hemisphere.

As I said, in the distant past of the planet, the physical and etheric dimensions were somehow “twinned” in the sense that they had quite a lot of points of convergence or portals through which beings could easily pass from the physical to the etheric plane and vice versa. I was shown, however, that beginning with 25,000 B.C., the number of these transition zones had decreased significantly. Additionally, some of them were in the territories in which the E-N-K beings were established. Although they knew of the existence of such portals in their territory, the E-N-K people could nevertheless not go “beyond” because their own vibrational frequency did not allow for it; that is, it was too low to support the passage to a larger dimension than the physical one.

THE END OF A GREAT CIVILIZATION

In its active state, the Hyperborean civilization continued until about 14,000 B.C., after which it died out. Its rudiments, however, continued to exist in certain areas of the former Hyperborea, even further north, but from what I saw, they formed just very small communities. The rest of the population migrated rather quickly, especially to Atlantis and also south to Transylvania, where it settled in the mountains. Since then, after several millennia, a part of the population descended to the south of the continent, giving birth in time to other great civilizations closer to the present day. Another part, however, migrated eastwards to Asia in distinct stages, also laying the foundations of great civilizations. As I mentioned, the cataclysm that led to the sinking of Atlantis greatly disturbed the state of the planet, both physically and subtly. Many links between the physical and the etheric plane were interrupted while others have been completely suppressed and, generally speaking, it was shown to me that the two planes separated so much due to the massive disturbance in both the physical and subtle structures of the planet. That separation between the physical and the etheric was even more pronounced than the separation that took place after the Great Tarsus War. It became more and more evident and also caused a dramatic drop in the vibrational frequency of the physical plane of the planet which became even harder.

Inter-dimensional energy portals have become a rarity with the passage of time, and communication with the higher beings in the etheric plane of the Earth and with those in Shambhala has become increasingly difficult. This state of affairs has become even more complicated since 5,000 B.C., when dark forces began to intervene in the evolution of Mankind, taking advantage of the huge breach that appeared in the Earth's energy network. Some extraterrestrial civilizations which were already contaminated by the reach of the evil reptilians began to weave a very complicated network of intrigues and plans for total control of the planet. They were based mainly on the significant decrease in the vibrational frequency of the physical plane as well as on the lowest level of consciousness of humanity, composed almost entirely of E-N-K.

ROYALTY AND DISPOSAL OF THE HYPERBOREANS

All of this was presented to me in a simple way and with intelligent links that combined edifying images with symbols or signs of connection between different factors, beings or objects from those presented on the screen. In this way, it would be as easy as possible to understand. I did not cease to marvel at the extraordinary intelligence that almost instantly synthesized all the information I requested, presenting it in a form appropriate to my understanding and also suggesting subtleties or other branches of investigation. Generally speaking, due to the limited time I had at my disposal and the immensity of the information, I studied gradually. What was shown to me in the first phase were general aspects of the requested subject, without going into details. Interestingly enough though, having access to that information, I rarely felt the urge to find out more about one or more of the other directions that the information might lead to. Although I could go into detail with any aspect I would have liked and which was within my sphere of understanding and interest, I only rarely did such. Instead, I preferred summary presentations.

Explanations were of a practical nature because I was trying to store as much information as possible, even at a general level, reserving the possibility for the future of getting into some details of interest. In any case, the synthesis of images was admirably done in real time, even with much more information than I could understand, at least at the level of symbolism. In parallel, I was also helped by the telepathic transmissions that my cortex translated as acceptable, thus enriching the general knowledge of the requested subject. The images appeared in a flowing stream and were intelligently linked to certain graphic representations or even rushes of colors which indicated either the direction of a certain phenomenon or tendency or the nature that characterized them. For example, when the migration to south and southeast Europe was indicated, it was represented by images in three different planes with super-positionings. I saw, for example, groups of people and even domestic animals, especially sheep, going through different forms of terrain. In parallel, in the background, I saw a kind of land map showing the continent and part of the Mediterranean; and over them, in tandem with the movement of people, a yellow flow was super-imposed, like an undulating wave, indicating the length and time of travel to their destination.

At one point, it split in several directions with a smaller thickness, almost like a fan, and one of them headed further east, stopping near the Mediterranean shore on the territory of what is today's Turkey. I was then shown, in quick succession, the building of a large settlement in that area by the followers of the Hyperboreans in the form of a city that, in time, became a big city, very well developed and even endowed with certain technology. I saw, for example, that the fortress was illuminated during the night, but I did not identify the sources of light, of which there were apparently more than one. In any case, they did not come from fire. Around that area and in connection with it, several symbols appeared in the hologram, some of them moving and with different colors. Snapshots of the life of that city and the beings, buildings, or interiors were sometimes highlighted suddenly; then withdrawn, making room for other aspects.

I understood, of course, that this place was important, but I did not know what city it was until I got used to the frequency of the area; and then, telepathically, I immediately understood that it was Troy. This mental understanding came packaged with another set of information which correlated with the holographic images. Thus, I understood the subtle connection with the city of Troy, in direct correlation with the evil influence of some extraterrestrial civilizations and the way in which their members on Earth attracted acolytes among the E-N-K beings. This influence intended to destroy any "rays of light" and Troy at that time was the last bastion of resistance. I will return to this topic later.

CHAPTER ELEVEN —

PLANETARY COUNCIL OF TEOTIHUACAN

After more than 300,000 years since the beginning of the project to create a new intelligent human being on Earth — by combining extraterrestrial DNA with the DNA of the great primates that existed at that time — the DNA of the E-N-K branch became complex, thanks to the multiple combinations that have taken place over time, either with DNA from other extraterrestrial civilizations or with E-N-L human beings.

THE REMARKABLE EVOLUTION OF THE E-N-K BRANCH

This was achieved by mutual understanding between the representatives of extraterrestrial civilizations who were interested in hybridizing the new race of beings that had spread all over the globe. But, while the E-N-L beings were carefully “cultivated” and their evolution was assisted by the beneficial extraterrestrial civilizations, the E-N-K beings were somehow left to develop on their own. This plan had been previously established so that diversity could be achieved within the same breed. The experiment showed that although the E-N-K branch developed much more slowly, being left to natural laws, it was precisely through this that it acquired a special vital force, being linked much to “Earth” and to Nature. Some of these beings, however, have been hybridized with extraterrestrial DNA, thus creating an even greater complexity of their traits and capabilities; but for the most part, the E-N-K branch has been left to evolve on its own. Therefore, the qualitative hierarchy of the beings that existed at that time on our planet was based upon the small group of E-N beings with mostly Sirian DNA. They represented the “elite” in the sense that their genetic structure was so evolved that, at that time, they could only be combined with a very small number of other extraterrestrial beings, also highly evolved. From the group of E-N beings came, by “specialization”, the refined E-N-L and E-N-K beings. The latter evolved in their natural rhythm because, at first, the difference in vibrational frequency between E-N-L and E-N-K was too large to allow for natural and efficient combinations between the individuals of these two branches.

As I said, however, some combinations between the L and K branches were possible and have occurred over time. The resulting DNA was a secondary branch of E-N-K beings with a more refined consciousness, doubled by a good vital root on the planet. These were powerful beings, capable of great efforts, but at the same time having a higher level of consciousness than most of the population of E-N-K beings. Those higher and stronger E-N-K beings were the so-called “demigods” mentioned in ancient literature.

At the great meetings of the representatives of the extraterrestrial civilizations who visited the Earth, however, it was established that the higher branch which had derived from the K branch would not be sustained any further. I did not quite understand why such a decision was made because, at that time, I became very interested in those Councils of extraterrestrial beings. A valid hypothesis, however, would be, as I said before, that representatives of extraterrestrial civilizations wanted the E-N-K branch to be closer to Earth’s specificity without too much extraterrestrial influence in its specific DNA, as could be seen, for example, in the case of E-N-L beings.

TEOTIHUACAN — THE MODEL SIRIAN CIVILIZATION

The first high level recognition of the evolution of E-N-K beings took place about 28,000 years ago. At that time, the “demigods” were admitted to the superior decision-making council on the planet that met at that time in the place we now call Teotihuacan, in Mexico. Known as the Great Planetary Council, it consisted of members of the advanced alien civilizations that were on Earth as well as representatives of the E-N-L branch. The city of Teotihuacan was built by the original Sirians, known as the Lords of the Galaxy in the Sirius A system. Considered to be the true parents of Mankind, they represent the main civilization that assumed the role of overseeing and guiding the long process of formation of the new race of humanoid beings which has become the humanity of today. The construction of the city was done before the meeting of the Planetary Council, during which time the Sirians, together with the Pleiadians, established a certain line of action for that part of the world on the continent of America today.

Teotihuacan is a faithful replica of a Sirian city, but other extraterrestrial civilizations from the Alliance, especially the Pleiadians, participated in its building. What has been discovered today, with the main pyramids and the wide road that is exposed to visitors, is only part of the huge city that was built about 30,000 years ago.* It was gigantic, with many branches that made it look like a real metropolis. I was even shown the initial project as a three-dimensional holographic scheme, and after that, I saw the city already built and populated, especially by Sirians and Pleiadians. For quite some time, the city was home to their representatives, and to a lesser extent, to other extraterrestrial civilizations.

* The author refers, without a doubt, to the two great pyramids within the city: the Pyramid of the Sun and the Pyramid of the Moon, as well as to the main road, Calea Mortilor. About this ancient city, also called the “City of the Gods” or “The Place Where the Gods are Born”, nobody knows anything, not even the Aztecs who lived in it for over a millennium. It is not known who built it, why, and especially when it was built.

The city was conceived and realized as a city with circular symmetry, from which several branches were also arranged circularly. To these, as I could see, it was reached by means of teleportation devices. The basis for the design and construction of the city was the Sirian one, but its design respected the affinities of cosmic energies in direct and precise correspondence with the stars and planetary systems of many extraterrestrial civilizations in the Alliance. The Sirians wanted to do just that so that the Alliance would become more united and more motivated to act in unison in order to develop the human race on Earth.

In designing the city — which I saw in a combination of holographic images, both in the three-dimensional and the etheric plane, through the headset that was offered to me — a certain complicated star structure was considered which was to “preside” and energetically support the longevity of the settlement and its subtle radiation. I was even shown how the extraterrestrial beings who designed the city were running the future of that specific star structure in the future, looking for new configurations and thus establishing a longer period of existence for the city. I will return to this when I describe how the pyramids in Egypt were designed and built.

In the case of such megalithic plans, the advanced extraterrestrial beings knew very well that the shapes and dimensions of the construction of the future city were in direct connection and resonance with the movement of certain stars, already in a precise arrangement. Emphasis is naturally placed on the durability of those constructions. For example, they look for specific and important star positions, arrangements or configurations, all of which are going to last for a long time. They are then certain that over that period the respective construction will be supported by the specific subtle energy emitted by that star configuration. The appearance remains valid only if the other resonant elements are respected, such as the structure of the buildings and the pyramids, their dimensions and other characteristics of the materials, all of which must be in consonance to the detail with that star configuration or with others that present affinities with it. For example, I saw that the Sirians were attentive even to what stone slab they placed at a certain intersection. It had to be of a certain type of rock, different from the other stones, and cut at a precise angle in order to resonate according to a certain detail of the complex stellar structure.

I was amazed by certain features of this ancient city because I had not encountered them before. The first one I mention is the feeling of greatness, of the gigantic distance over which it spread. Then, there was communion with Nature. The vegetation was practically an integral part of the city’s construction, “living” with it. I did not, however, even see a strand of grass that exceeded the edges imposed by the space of the stone slabs, very well polished and joined together. The leaves, the lilies, the shrubs, and everything else came exactly to the edges of the stone areas, never beyond them, as if the vegetation had “known” how to perfectly respect those boundaries. It then occurred to me that it was probably a specific technology whereby the vegetation was somehow “mirrored” and made to go back to the forest or jungle, but I cannot be sure.

The cleanliness in the city was incredible and I could not even begin to figure out how this was possible. I saw no dust, no mud, no marks or other debris. When I looked, everything was so well done that I felt like I was looking at a diagram on the computer, and yet, I saw extraterrestrial beings walking through that city and performing various actions. I have also seen aerial vehicles and even small and medium-sized vessels, landing or taking off from the central market and also from a region some distance away from it.

DIRECTIVES OF THE PLANETARY COUNCIL FROM 26,000 B.C.

From many points of view, that “multicolored” encounter of the extraterrestrial civilizations that “shepherded” the DNA in the formation of the human being was a turning point for the evolution of humanity on Earth. The territories were then delimited, agreements and understandings were established, and certain codes of inter-racial behavior were imposed and crucial decisions were taken regarding the future of human beings and life on our planet. That council impressed me in particular with the size, complexity and value of the decisions made regarding the destiny of humanity.

Generally speaking, such aspects are little known, and if they are revealed to people, they tend to respond with derision. This is mainly because the common man does not have access to such direct information and also because he tends to think in accordance with the norms, laws and ideas that are currently being conveyed. Of these, the most annoying and often repeated are the ideas that “we could be alone in the Universe”, that “science has pretty much solved everything that has to be solved so far” and that “contemporary civilization is the most developed that existed until now on the planet.” For those who are intelligent and have good sense, however, such statements are just the fruit of ignorance and the manifestation of a very arrogant vision.

As for myself, I have the belief that some of those who are truly educated can intuitively understand what I am presenting here. Even though my reports are a serious test for current conceptions, this information illustrates a whole series of confusing, unclear or erroneous elements about the history of humanity and its origin. After all, all I do is to present as accurately as possible what I have witnessed and discussed personally on this topic, all of which is very broad and complex. It is up to the reader, however, to decide whether or not he can accept the information that is thus made available to him.

I will now return to the aspects related to the main decisions taken at that Great Planetary Council and to emphasize their nuances. The admission of the E-N-K beings into the planetary coordination forum and the recognition of the level of evolution that they achieved also had to do with the fact that the representatives of the Great Council showed an even deeper interest in them than the population of a planet with a new race of beings.

Indeed — the initial plan was the creation of a new, intelligent and complex human being developed in the Universe. After more than 300,000 years, this plan had already developed and evolved quickly, and even unexpectedly, if we think about the natural course of things and if we consider it on a cosmic scale. That is why the Great Planetary Council from Teotihuacan from 26,000 B.C. virtually signifies the beginning of the “withdrawal” of the extraterrestrial upper races from the involvement in the life of the new humanity.

The main purpose of the initial project was to create a higher grade of human being and to populate the planet with this newly created being. Since the E-N-K branch had shown a surprising fertility and adaptability to different types of external influences due to its DNA, it had somehow acquired the right to take over the planet and evolve freely here.

By contrast, the E-N-L branch, although more evolved than the E-N-K branch from a spiritual point of view as well as other characteristics, was nevertheless more fragile in terms of genetic structure and vitality, to the point where it could not sustain a continuous and energetic development of a new race of beings. Moreover, as I said, the E-N-L beings had already begun to withdraw from the physical plane, and their existence was gradually replaced by myths and legends. The L branch, however, has made an important contribution to refining part of the K branch.

Accordingly, the Sirians and the other main extraterrestrial civilizations involved in the project of creating the new being on Earth considered that the E-N-K gene was strong enough to carry out the project which could now follow a natural path. Sovereign surveillance by these extraterrestrial civilizations continued to exist, in particular to stop attempts at self-destruction of civilization by devastating wars at the planetary level or by the use of terrible and very advanced technologies, both by humans and other extraterrestrial civilizations who expressed a certain interest in life on this planet. This small group of very advanced extraterrestrial civilizations did so, however, with a high spiritual knowledge and without intervening where the course of destiny had to take a certain form for humanity.

THE “SPECIALIZATION” OF HUMAN DNA

After the “segmentation” of human DNA took place, in the sense that certain extraterrestrial civilizations began to create more “nurseries” for it in different parts of the Earth, the DNA of the human being spread out in different directions, somehow losing “total power”. In other words, the E-N-K beings from these secondary branches — which were E-N-K-A, E-N-K-I, E-N-K-U... etc. — gained the same strengths and power as the E-N-L line because their DNA “specialized” over time in one specific direction, induced and developed in particular by an extraterrestrial civilization.

Each of the extraterrestrial civilizations that participated in the “nursery” program of human civilization on Earth proportionally contributed their DNA to the complexity of human DNA, thus “shepherding” a certain population of the globe as assigned by the Great Planetary Council from Teotihuacan who had designated “areas of influence” for each extraterrestrial civilization that was involved in the project.

Basically, their representatives took over close supervision of the evolution and development of the human beings that populated the Earth at that time, mostly belonging to the E-N-K branch, within the territories they occupied. This is why we can see very different influences and characteristics in races and even populations in certain areas of the planet. For political reasons, however, I was advised not to present details of this in this book.

DEMIGODS

One of the important decisions taken at the Great Planetary Council of Teotihuacan was that the E-N-K branch be allowed to start self-governing. In other words, E-N-K beings would have their own territories and even be invited to be represented at that Great Council at certain times to contribute to planetary discussions and decisions. By this, the fact was recognized that they had evolved enough to have a relatively high degree of responsibility and that they could integrate well into the spiral of progress at the planetary level. It was clear from what I saw in the pictures, however, that the E-N-K beings were listening to the directions, advice and directives that were given by the sages of extraterrestrial civilizations who were guarding the entire planet and who they considered to be their “parents”.

I noticed that the elevated members of the E-N-K branch of the Council were very harmonious, powerful, and independent beings. I was attracted in particular to the special magnetism they radiated, and I focused on these aspects as they related to their participation in the Great Council of the planet. Immediately, I was shown a sequence of representative images, and to the right of the screen, I saw a rich display of other directories. I preferred, however, to pursue the sequence of images because the particular study of those files would have taken more time than was available to me.

Combining the images with the telepathically intuitive transmissions that I received through the inter-dimensional headset, I realized that the E-N-K branch had evolved remarkably throughout, characterized in particular by the complexity of their DNA structure. This made for amazing possibilities for combinations with other DNA. In addition, it conferred on those beings a special radiation, a bodily and magnetic beauty that easily produced fascination. Moreover, as we have seen, the E-N-K delegation consisted only of “demigods”, both men and women. As they were closer to our tendencies, manner of being, way of perceiving things and manifesting ourselves, I was very attracted to those images because at a certain level, the E-N-K delegation produced a strong impression amongst the other extraterrestrial beings.

The most representative were the women of E-N-K. They had an extraordinary impact and showed a kind of irresistible attraction that undoubtedly stemmed from the complexity of the structure of their DNA and especially from a special common “something” unique to the human being that was created on Earth. If I were to make a comparison, however, I would say that their radiation was most similar to that of the women in the Pleiades. Many representatives of other extraterrestrial species and civilizations were “court- ing” them, precisely due to their extraordinary fertility and ability to give life to a level of high complexity. In this sense, there was a kind of “rolling” of many extraterrestrial civilizations who, from time to time, came and “redid” their genetic dowry with the most special E-N-K beings.

DIVERSIFICATION OF DNA IN E-N-K BEINGS

More than 100,000 years ago, the planet was divided into several territories, each with its own specific population which was supported, protected and helped to evolve by one or more extraterrestrial civilizations. Accordingly, each such area on Earth had a “soul” or ego which was the specific ego of the respective population.

The representatives of the governing civilization came from time to time and “ran” their own DNA with that of the population in that territory because the resonant frequencies in the structure of the DNA macromolecule of E-N-K beings were so great that it easily facilitated such combinations. So it was that each population or civilization on Earth had its “gods” who, in those cases, were the evolved extraterrestrial beings who supported the specific development of a branch of human beings.

This fact was important because, in this way, certain extraterrestrial civilizations could fortify their “tired” or degenerate DNA, gaining a new impetus for existence and evolution while others seeded other civilizations on other planets from DNA samples that were taken. This was especially so from the E-N-K beings, thus helping the evolution of various civilizations in the cosmos. I was shown the structure of the DNA of beings on several planets in the galaxy which were all based on the DNA of the human being. Practically speaking and no matter how paradoxical it may seem, we can say that, in a certain way, we are the “parents” of many civilizations in the galaxy.

After the great extraterrestrial space conflict in the vicinity of the Earth, the E-N-K branch has somehow “drifted” because, for a long time, there was no clear order of extraterrestrial territories and influences.

As the Galactic Alliance was then restored, things started to return to normal, but it was only after the Great Planetary Council that the territories of alien influence on the E-N-K populations was able to be re-established and reoriented but according to new rules.

The exceptional characteristics of human DNA from those times caused the Planetary Council to include the presence of E-N-K beings in the decision-making chain at the planetary level and also to offer them freedom of expression and autonomy because the level of evolution that the E-N-K beings had reached justified that decision.

It is true, however, that the spiritual aspect, inner perception, refinement of consciousness or higher understanding was not very developed in E-N-K beings in comparison to the members of certain extraterrestrial civilizations or to the human beings of the E-N-L branch. The E-N-K beings of that time, however, those who represented the “demigods”, were incomparably smarter and more evolved than the contemporary man as well as being full of superior qualities. As we will see, the invasion occurred when even these evolved E-N-K beings began to withdraw from the Earth’s surface, especially starting with the last period of Atlantis, culminating in its total immersion.

MATURATION OF MEN

Another very important decision taken during the Great Council of Teotihuacan was the beginning of the sequential withdrawal of the permanent extraterrestrial presence from the life on Earth. The supervision was thus transferred gradually from direct involvement on the surface of the Earth to a careful monitoring by technological means from the physical plane but also from the etheric plane. By their wisdom, these highly advanced extraterrestrial civilizations knew very well that a civilization must evolve “on its own feet” in order to have the chance for a proper understanding of its future and the future of the Universe. Besides, this is a natural law that governs all kingdoms: the child reaches an age at which, being quite mature, separates from his parents in order to follow his own path in life. This had to be accomplished in stages, however, because the process of creating the human being had been and is based upon high knowledge, patience and wisdom. Even so, there was the unfortunate event of the decline and sinking of Atlantis which I will treat separately and which is an example to understand how unstable and delicate things can become in the context of the evolution of beings.

CHAPTER TWELVE — ATLANTIS

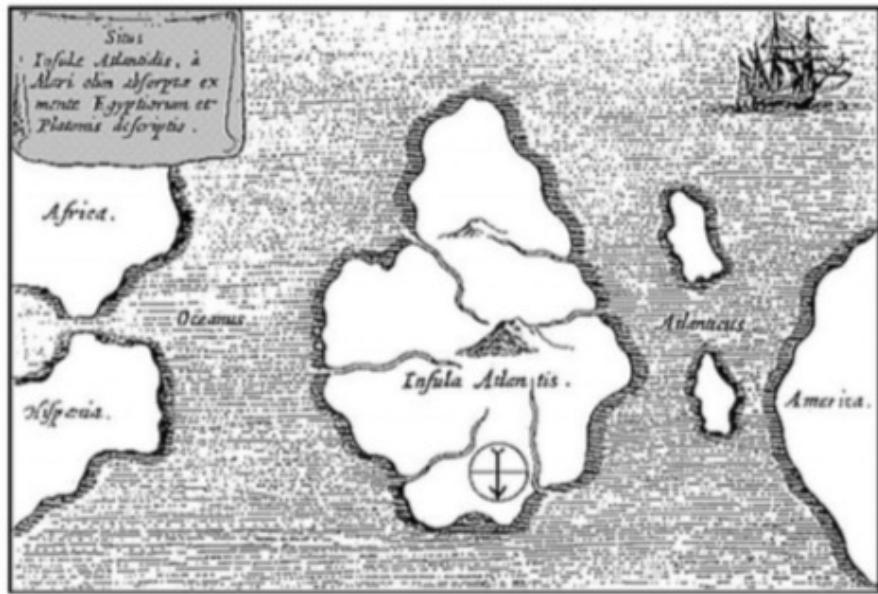

Beyond the current controversy surrounding the existence of the old continent of Atlantis, there is also the question of where it would have been. The clues are vague and the searches difficult. Some discoveries are noteworthy, however, except that the international media, as well as the scientific community, do not react in such cases, hoping that everything will fall into derision or oblivion. The recognition of such a discovery would shed light on all that was believed to be true about humanity's past evolution, epochs of development, ancient civilizations, and technology at that time.

SOME CLARIFICATIONS

Most opinions converge on the placement of Atlantis in the Atlantic Ocean, and this is correct. One of the oldest representations, in Athanasius Kircher's view, gives a good idea of where Atlantis was, but it is incomplete.*

[FOOTNOTE: * Athanasius Kircher (1602-1680) was a German Jesuit scholar who published around 40 major works, most notably in the fields of comparative religion, geology, and medicine. He correctly established the link between the ancient Egyptian and the Coptic languages, and some commentators regard him as the founder of Egyptology.]

ATHANASIUS KIRCHER'S MAP OF ATLANTIS

THE DRAWING BELOW SHOWS A LOCATION THAT IS CLOSER TO THE GEOGRAPHICAL REALITY OF THOSE TIMES REGARDING ATLANTIS

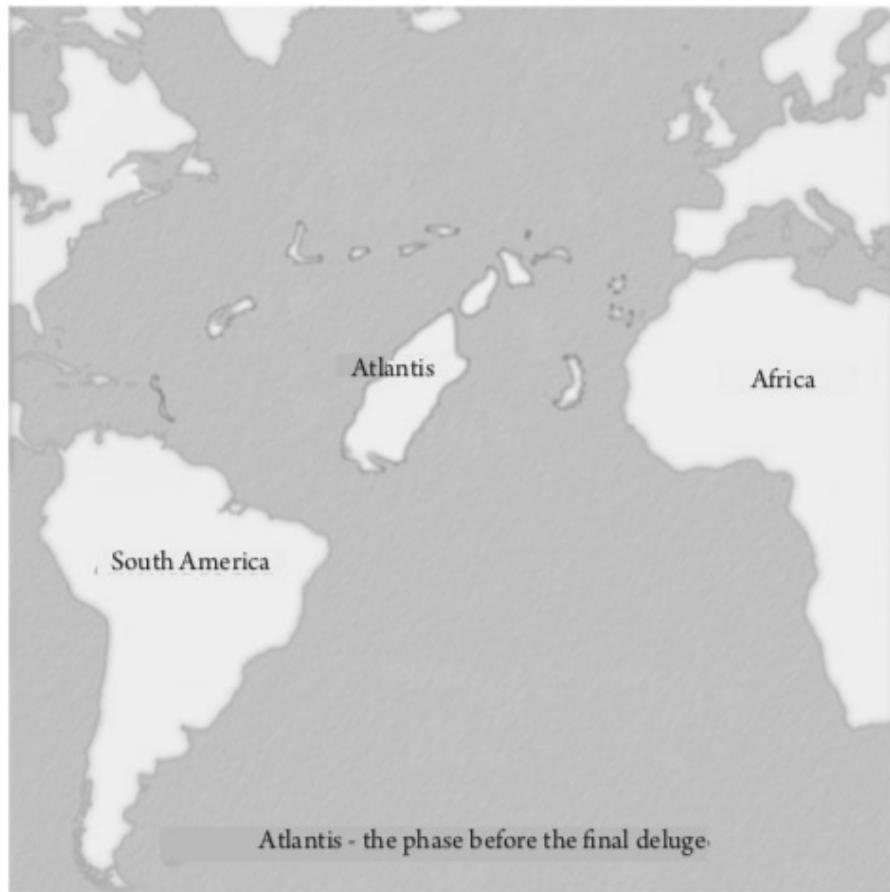

There are, however, some observations to make. As I have seen in the pictures on the holographic screen, the surface of Atlantis was relatively large, almost like a continent, occupying the center of the Atlantic Ocean; but the northern part of the island was a little lower, parallel to Philadelphia today. On the other hand, the island's shape was more decidedly triangular, and from this point of view, Kircher's drawing is better. Also, in Kircher's drawing, only two islands surrounding the great continent-island which was Atlantis are correctly represented, but those under Africa are not mentioned, one of them being slightly smaller than present-day Sri Lanka. A proportional representation of what I saw in the images is on the following page.

Subsequently, after the first fragmentation of Atlantis, there were indeed a few island strings around the central island which could be considered as its "suburbs". For example, the Azores are remnants of the upper islands that were part of Atlantis as well as the Cape Verde Islands which are actually areas of the slightly larger island that existed to the right of Atlantis. The Canary Islands, however, as they are presently constituted, have no connection with the territory of Atlantis.

On the other hand, the Bermuda Islands are currently fragments of the large island to the left of Atlantis. Several vestiges can be found on the bottom of the ocean around some of these islands. For example, in the area of where Bermuda is today, huge pyramids were built, and in the Azores, there was a developed city.

In the northeastern part of Atlantis, towards Europe, there was even a "fan" of small islands which are not shown in Kircher's drawing but do appear in the second drawing. Only small fragments remain (the Azores), reminiscent of the great civilization of many thousands of years ago.

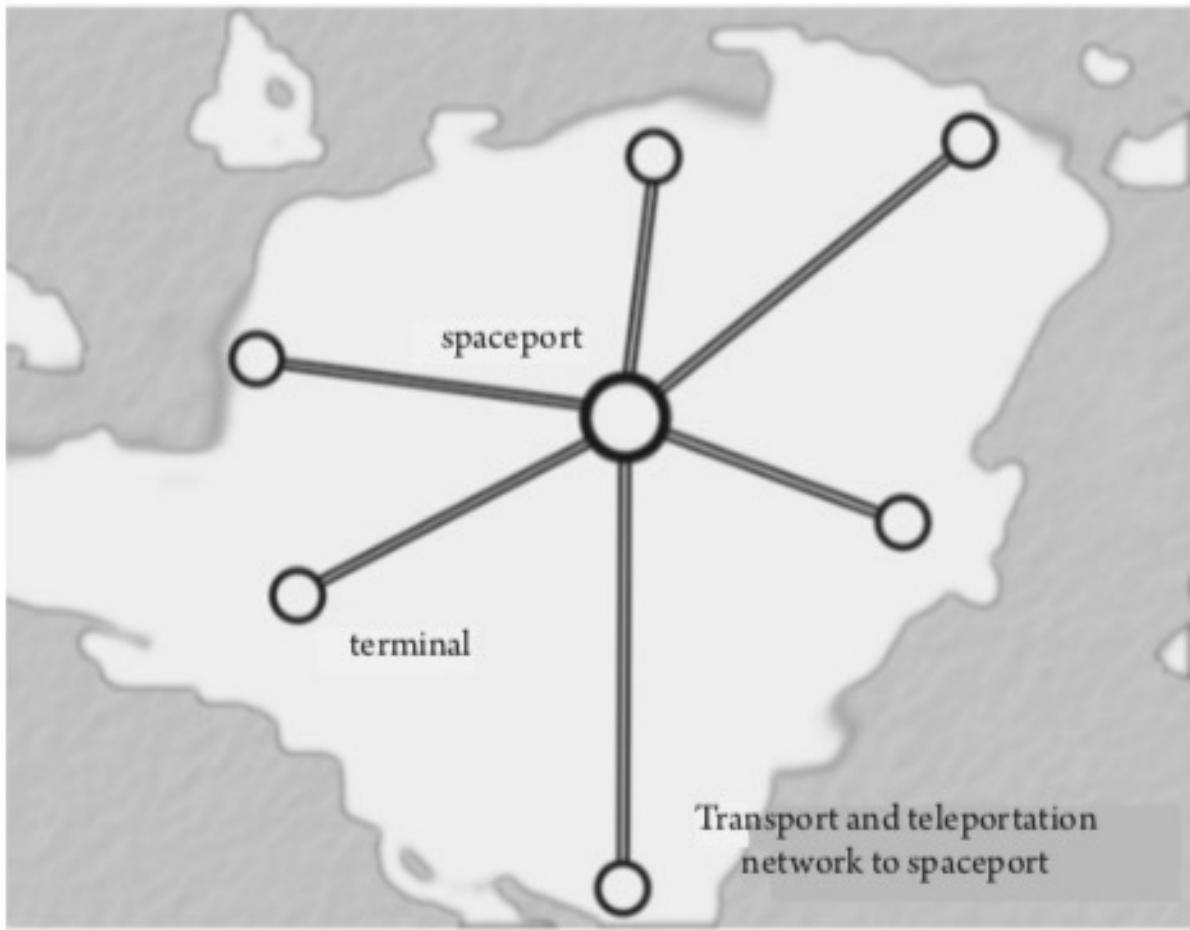

THE FLOWERING CIVILIZATION OF ATLANTIS

Interestingly, when Atlantis was in its infancy, most of its population and life was concentrated on the coasts of the islands and the “continent”. In the middle of it was a lot of vegetation which aesthetically surrounded the great pyramids there, the gigantic spaceport and other buildings that appeared as very tall towers. Most of the activity occurred, however, in the coastal areas of the island where the bustle was very high, both on the ground and in the air.

Many regions on the great continent were circular with what appeared to be rays leading to the center of the island. When the image zoomed in on them,

I noticed that the rays were in fact a type of tubes with a fairly large diameter, probably to facilitate rapid transport.

Many regions on the great continent were circular with what appeared to be rays leading to the center of the island. When the image zoomed in on them, I noticed that the rays were in fact a type of tubes with a fairly large diameter, probably to facilitate rapid transport.

Atlantis was known not only for its highly advanced civilization and culture but also for being a central area of connection between the Earth and beings on other planets. There was a complex mix between beings on Earth belonging exclusively to the E-N-L branch, and many other types of beings on other planets in our galaxy. In this regard, this was not too much different from some of the science fiction movie scenes that have appeared on the market so far, although this might seem unbelievable to many readers.

Atlantis was highly evolved compared to the rest of the continents, much like we are today in comparison to a tribe in the Amazon or New Guinea. It not only had connections with beings from other parts of the Earth; but as I said, it represented an important point of connection with other civilizations in the universe, being an active part in trade and cosmic diplomacy in this region of the galaxy.

In the middle of the island, there was a huge spaceport with a very intense activity of both Atlantean and extraterrestrial ships of many types and sizes. Watching the images on the screen, I noticed that they largely correspond to other stories about Atlantis which have been presented over time in books or on the internet. Earth had become a very important center of cosmic transit, meaning that extraterrestrial activity, especially diplomatic and commercial activity, was very intense. Many ships of various sizes and shapes came and went from our planet, using different platforms and terminals on the big island, but the largest and most important spaceport was the one in the middle of the Atlantean continent.

I could also see in those images a kind of “subtle x-ray” of the Earth where its magnetic field was somewhat different from the current one. I was shown, in a very ingenious way, that over a fairly large area above Atlantis, the terrestrial magnetic field had many vortices which made it appear that there was a “third pole” of the planet. It was a natural phenomenon due to a massive deposit of specific metallic rocks which exist below the surface of the Earth and correspond to that area. This is why, even in the modern period, the strange phenomena that occur in the Bermuda area are still noticed.

The existence of this “third pole” of the Earth’s magnetic field allowed for the entry to and exit from the atmosphere in a very easy way for extraterrestrial ships as well as those from the Earth. This created a sort of “corridor” in the aerial activity whereby the friction with the air was much smaller and the action of gravity was weaker. For the ships of advanced civilizations, this aspect was of little importance as their technology was not dependent on such forces, but at that time, Atlantis had many other connections with developed middle civilizations whose ships depended upon those aspects. The technology of such civilizations had not, for example, reached the level of very advanced propulsion systems based on elements of a quantum nature or special forces fields, and they did not possess the knowledge necessary to sufficiently generate resistant “energy shields” around their ships in order to cancel out the frictional or inertial effects.

THE FINAL SINKING OF ATLANTIS

Before the great cataclysm that led to the extinction of Atlantis, the sinking of the continental shelf had already begun, but the process proceeded slowly, over several tens of thousands of years, culminating with its total disappearance under water around 11,500 B.C. This date is shared by many visionaries, esotericists, clairvoyants or beings with special powers; and as far as I was able to calculate and interpolate the frequencies shown in the images on the holographic screen, the time point indicated is correct, maybe within a margin of several decades. The continent, however, began to sink dramatically and crumble into islands about 1,000-1,200 years before the final cataclysm. The last deluge was faster and even more terrifying due to devastating earthquakes which not only occurred in the area of the Atlantean continent but also in many other areas of the planet. What remained relatively intact from the old continent was its part from Africa, but the rest was scattered on larger or smaller islands.

One of the very interesting aspects of the disappearance of Atlantis is that of its sudden destruction. Plato says it happened “in one day and one night”. In reality, the destruction of the continent took place in stages, and only the final phase was abrupt. In the first phase, what was once a huge island continent “broke” into a few “slices” which have become islands. As a result, Atlantis quickly transformed into an island area, thus losing cohesion.

As an important remark, I can say that what was perceived as sudden was the phenomenon of breaking the connection between the physical and the etheric plane which, until then, was quite solid in Atlantis. At the beginning of the destruction, the beings from the etheric plane did not very clearly notice the sinking of parts of the physical continent, but at one point, due to the dimensional split, those from the etheric plane found that they no longer had support, as if the rug was being pulled out from beneath their feet, and the etheric plane was beginning to dissolve.

They could no longer relate to the physical plane as they had been used to before. For example, as I witnessed in some images, they were going in a certain direction to reach a city on land; but they saw sea water instead, knowing there had to be something else.

THE FINAL SINKING OF ATLANTIS

Before the great cataclysm that led to the extinction of Atlantis, the sinking of the continental shelf had already begun, but the process proceeded slowly, over several tens of thousands of years, culminating with its total disappearance under water around 11,500 B.C. This date is shared by many visionaries, esotericists, clairvoyants or beings with special powers; and as far as I was able to calculate and interpolate the frequencies shown in the images on the holographic screen, the time point indicated is correct, maybe within a margin of several decades. The continent, however, began to sink dramatically and crumble into islands about 1,000-1,200 years before the final cataclysm. The last deluge was faster and even more terrifying due to devastating earthquakes which not only occurred in the area of the Atlantean continent but also in many other areas of the planet. What remained relatively intact from the old continent was its part from Africa, but the rest was scattered on larger or smaller islands.

One of the very interesting aspects of the disappearance of Atlantis is that of its sudden destruction. Plato says it happened “in one day and one night”. In reality, the destruction of the continent took place in stages, and only the final phase was abrupt. In the first phase, what was once a huge island continent “broke” into a few “slices” which have become islands. As a result, Atlantis quickly transformed into an island area, thus losing cohesion.

As an important remark, I can say that what was perceived as sudden was the phenomenon of breaking the connection between the physical and the etheric plane which, until then, was quite solid in Atlantis. At the beginning of the destruction, the beings from the etheric plane did not very clearly notice the sinking of parts of the physical continent, but at one point, due to the dimensional split, those from the etheric plane found that they no longer had support, as if the rug was being pulled out from beneath their feet, and the etheric plane was beginning to dissolve.

They could no longer relate to the physical plane as they had been used to before. For example, as I witnessed in some images, they were going in a certain direction to reach a city on land; but they saw sea water instead, knowing there had to be something else.

Therefore, that part of the etheric plane that remained without support was re-absorbed into the dry territories of the physical plane because, at that time, being close to it, the etheric plane also needed to “lean” on something. Even today there are such alignments between the physical plane and the etheric plane; much less than in that period, but they still exist. For example, if you go through a forest and pass through a dimensional chasm, you can enter the etheric plane, but that does not mean that it is compulsory to wake up suddenly on the top of a mountain or in the middle of a lake; but it usually respects characteristics of the surrounding space where the passage was made. There are differences in the landscape, but they are not blatant, at least not from the beginning.

Atlantis therefore did not die “in one day and one night” as has been said. Her submerging went a long way and went in stages, her last vestiges disappearing into the water about 13,500 years ago. The notion of “sudden” could be the break from the etheric plane or the last cataclysm that was sprinkled with disasters.

If that cataclysm had taken place naturally, a duration which would have corresponded to a period of millions of years, the sinking of Atlantis might indeed seem like it took place “in just one day and one night”. That is to say, it was pretty fast.

The forces and energies involved at that time were huge and they deeply destabilized the energy structure of the Earth’s crust, also causing large disturbances in the corresponding etheric plane. The sinking of Atlantis was also due to major changes that occurred at the Earth’s crust level during that period. I saw the holographic images depicting the rearrangement of the Earth’s crust. Basically, it “rotated” and then arrived at its current structure.

After that massive rearrangement of the crust, which took place around the third polar axis that passes through the area of Atlantis, the very strong magnetic vortex that characterized that axis decreased in intensity, and as a result, the potential energetic connection with the etheric plane diminished.

Interestingly, this truth was already exposed by Charles Hapgood, and I knew his theory referring to the displacement of the Earth's crust as a result of the "drift" of the poles (The Path of the Pole, Adventures Unlimited Press, 1999).

I was amazed but also glad to find that it was, in fact, perfectly true.

THE TWO ATLANTIC CAMP

The commercial, scientific and cultural exchanges that Atlantis had with many other extraterrestrial civilizations made the Atlantean civilization evolve very quickly. From what I saw on the holographic screen, their golden color was yellow, which is not surprising, especially since the symbol of their civilization was the Sun, often represented on their clothing in the chest area. After reaching an advanced level of spiritual and technological development, however, due to the phenomenon of the diminishing connection with the etheric plane, segregation occurred in their civilization. A part of the population evolved, reaching a higher frequency of consciousness by maintaining the connection with the etheric plane, and another part remained rigid in thought, having limited beliefs which were shared by some members and even some wise people.

I understood this when I was shown the general energy field as a sphere, both emotionally and mentally, of the last period of this civilization. I noticed that it split so that from the global yellow that characterized it as a subtle hue, two distinct subtle colors appeared: one had a light blue hue, and the other was red-orange. There were two different frequencies: those more oriented to red-orange belonged to a high level of society and scientists, and those who were part of the subtle field of light blue represented the sages and the "spiritual category" of society of Atlantis.

The separation into two somewhat antagonistic categories of thinking and feeling among the Atlantean population had become increasingly evident. As a result, many of those who belonged to the blue category went to other parts of the world a few hundred years before the final cataclysm, giving birth to other centers that were developed in areas where the connection with the etheric plane remained for a while longer. Gradually, due to the withdrawal of the blue faction, Atlantis began to be dominated by the subtle orange faction whose orientation was mainly materialistic.

The really wise ones left Atlantis for two reasons. First, the separation from materialistic Atlantis was necessary for reasons of matching resonant vibrational frequencies; and on the other hand, they aimed to really help the population of E-N-K beings to develop, progress and evolve faster because they foresaw the virtual end of the E-N-L branch due to the limitation of its resources for procreation and the potential for progress. At the same time, they knew that the end of Atlantis could not be avoided and wanted to preserve the immense knowledge they possessed, passing it on to the E-N-K population that would remain as the only one on Earth.

Due to the fact that the difference in evolution between the E-N-L branch and most of the E-N-K beings was immense, the Atlantean scholars realized that, if they were not to serve as an active and efficient educational and orientation arm for the E-N-K branch, humanity would simply remain at a primitive level of development because its only members would be E-N-K.

THE DRAMATIC CLIMAX OF ATLANTIS

The last sequence of images presented to me on the holographic screen included the last seconds of Atlantis, and it involved a great deal of drama. The last exceptional achievement of that extraordinary civilization, which we saw as it sank in the waters, was the huge shining pyramid that towered in the center of the Atlantean continent, near the spaceport. It was much larger than the current pyramids in Egypt, featuring perfectly smooth sides, like translucent metal. I was only shown those moments in which the top of the pyramid plunged into huge waves. At the top of the pyramid, I saw a lighthouse which was actually a huge ruby-colored crystal which flashed intermittently, like a laser, until it was dislocated and destroyed by the huge waves created by the terrible cataclysm. At the same time, the image of the Atlantic Ocean somehow seemed to superimpose itself upon me from above and over that drastic moment in which the huge pyramid sank in the surrounding waters which by that time had become only a vast expanse of water without any large dry surface. In this way, I was shown the complete end of Atlantis which, beyond the very sad visual moment, brought with it a feeling of great suffering and breaking in the soul which I perceived acutely, like a hopeless cry of the submerged continent itself. It was the last cry of a great civilization which belonged to the E-N-L branch.

THE GREAT MEETING AND PLAN FOR SAVING MEN

As I mentioned earlier, knowing early on the imminence of the coming cataclysm, the sages who ruled Atlantis wanted to preserve much of their civilization's knowledge but at the same time sought to support the evolution of the E-N-K branch of beings that remained after Atlantis. They knew that the branch that led to the formation of the Atlantean civilization and its peaks, that is the E-N-L branch, would decline and even disappear, so they set out to support the evolution of the other branch (E-N-K) by using the high knowledge they had acquired by then.

Immediately after the images with the total immersion of the continent, I was shown a very large gathering of human beings and aliens under a huge dome in a mountainous area, but I could not identify the exact place on Earth where it happened. From a certain point of view, that meeting resembled the Great Planetary Council 28,000 years ago, but the assembly after the disappearance of Atlantis was more hectic, and the proportion of human beings within it was higher. Even so, I was able to see an amazing variety of races, both human and alien.

I estimated the number of beings present at that meeting as more than 250 souls. My understanding telepathically was that it was a menagerie of life forms and races which had responded to the call for help from the wise E-N-L beings, a call that was made even before Atlantis completely disappeared. Due to the great tension that had been generated by the planetary cataclysm that had just taken place, I could see obvious signs of concern in some of the participants of the meeting. This amounted to unresolved fear that persisted and even a certain nervousness that manifested in such cases.

There, during that special meeting, very important decisions were made regarding the future evolution of our planet and of the E-N-K beings. Practically speaking, the main coordination points of the planet were established. From a certain point of view, these were even more concrete and effective decisions than those established at the Great Planetary Council of 26,000 B.C. because the situation was dramatic as even the initial project for training the intelligent and spiritually evolved human being was in danger of failure. Humanity was at risk of either “anonymously” disappearing or self-destructing.

Following the images, I could not help but notice that the council conducted a kind of “negotiation” of the areas of the Earth which were distributed to every extraterrestrial civilization to be “redone”. Initially, I thought that their representatives were interested in the resources of the underground or surface areas where they would have influence. I soon realized, however, that this was not the “negotiation” criterion. It was rather a requirement that there be a large E-N-K population in the assigned area.

The participants at that meeting requested this in order to be able to make genetic changes in the DNA structure of the respective population which would follow the characteristics of the extraterrestrial race that was watching their evolution. It was therefore about a redistribution of the “zones of influence” that had been fixed about 14,000 years ago at the Great Planetary Council in Teotihuacan, only that now, after Atlantis’s sinking, the global situation was much more critical.

THE “BREAKING” OF THE VIBRATIONAL FREQUENCY OF CONSCIOUSNESS

The cataclysm influenced not only the physical structure of the planet’s crust, it also caused changes in its frequency of vibration, affecting the energetic condition of the subtle planes attached to the Earth. It was a general “fall” in all respects, and humanity took a very big step back.

Many of the results obtained from the evolution of the human race up to that point were almost annihilated by that huge cataclysm which had negative repercussions on a global level. Among others, an entire E-N-L civilization — from what I had seen, the Atlantean civilization was the last of its kind on Earth — that was exceptional by reason of its technological and spiritual advancement had disappeared underwater, along with a large number of evolved beings and the amazing achievements of its progress. Knowledge, experience and advancement in all of the sciences of the time had been annihilated in a relatively short period. The evolutionary resources of Mankind had suddenly become very limited because almost all of the remaining beings that populated the planet at that time were still poorly evolved E-N-K beings.

I could feel all of this telepathically as well as a kind of “impregnation” of the specific state at that time after the great cataclysm. Under other circumstances, I would have described that situation as somewhat desperate for Mankind, but the immediate mobilization of the wise Atlantean survivors and some of the advanced extraterrestrial civilizations has diminished the terrible energy and consciousness collapse that would be felt for thousands of years as a result of the disappearance of the great civilization of Atlantis.

SUPPORT AND RECOVERY PLAN FOR HUMANITY

One of the first measures of that mobilization was the urgent reunion of the extraterrestrial civilizations interested in helping to reconstruct the chain of accelerated evolution of the human being. That is what was meant by the distribution of the extraterrestrial “zones of influence” in regards to the reconstruction of human civilization as it applies to the material plane as well as science, spirituality and knowledge in general. At the same time, the “nursery” of the genetic dowry of human DNA was to be enriched and improved by hybridizations and genetic modifications of the DNA of E-N-K beings. This needed to happen because the “inheritance” of E-N-L beings had been largely lost, due both to the cataclysm as well as their progressive withdrawal into the etheric plane. The new distribution of extraterrestrial “zones of influence” on Earth was going to bring a fresh breath into the DNA structure of E-N-K beings, allowing them to understand and rebuild at least some of the knowledge of evolved E-N-L beings.

The human beings in such an extraterrestrial “zone of influence” have accordingly, over time, manifested some characteristics of the civilization with which they were hybridized because their DNA had been combined to a significant extent with the DNA of that extraterrestrial civilization. They were like the “sons” of that civilization which thus contributed to the structural complexity of human DNA. For example, the aliens wanted to find out how many combinations were able to support the DNA of the E-N-

K beings, what was the nature and particularities of those combinations, what were the limits of development for genome structure, and how many “extensions” could it resist. Naturally, the representatives of each alien civilization had a certain margin in which they could control the DNA of E-N-K beings, and this only involved the domain that was related to the specificity of their DNA.

Beyond the altruistic desire to participate in the genetic experiment of forming a very complex being, however, I did not quite understand why the extraterrestrial civilizations wanted to experience this. They probably wanted to reinvigorate and improve their own DNA or plan a “relocation” of E-N-K beings to other planets. This was not too clear to me, but I did not insist on knowing that. I realized, however, that this was a unique opportunity at a galactic level which could not be ignored for many advanced civilizations because its potential was very high. I suppose that was a good reason why many extraterrestrial civilizations answered the call, in addition to those of the Alliance, the latter coming from a sector of the galaxy that was closer.

SOME PERSONAL CONSIDERATIONS

The description of how things went with Atlantis at that time does not coincide with all of those who have spoken or written about it. Most often, in the expositions that are made by different authors, there is a combination of true and imaginary elements in which, unfortunately, the imagination predominates. Also, the lack of details or accurate descriptions of important issues makes science about the distant periods of Mankind remain somewhat blurred or poorly understood, especially since many do not know the parallel existence that E-N-L beings were capable of by reason of their access to the etheric plane where, on the other hand, the lesser developed E-N-K beings did not have access.

It could, of course, be argued that my presentation on the true history of Mankind could be false or that it might be just a product of my imagination. Ultimately, why should the reader believe in me more than other authors who have exposed their own version of events from the very distant past of humanity? The situation is sensitive because undoubtedly clear evidence of a physical nature cannot presently be brought to public notice even if this is currently possible. This is how the system works, and these are its “obligatory requirements”. We cannot do everything we want because we are integrated into a society that is still strongly antagonistic. For various reasons, interests that are more or less occult often deprive the human being of true knowledge, and that is the reason many of the elements that have been discovered cannot yet be presented to the world. Given the level of culture and understanding of humanity today, some of these reasons are justified and meaningful. The question remains, however, whether these reasons are enough to prevent the truth from being revealed in the areas that are kept in the top secret and ultra top secret categories.

For example, with regard to the elements related to the true history of Mankind, I was allowed to present only some of its flagged instances, not all of which I managed to see. Even so, there remains the question of the credibility of the facts and aspects presented, but this is already an individual matter. It is the individual reader’s decision, discernment, and his knowledge and intuition regarding the aspects I present that are most significant.

The reader is faced with difficult choices because he can hear the information coming from other authors which does not coincide with that which is written here by me. In some cases, this can lead to confusion or even a kind of rejection because he might feel misled in his expectations or manipulated by the nature of the disclosures on one subject or another, disclosures that differ from one author to another.

In such cases, nothing can be done. The only element that I can invoke in addition to that would be that, as far as I am concerned, I have actually seen these fragments of human history, almost everything in the manner as movies are viewed on a screen, but at an incomparably higher level of technology and synthesis. The viewing procedure was doubled by telepathic transmission processes and intuitive understandings, all determined by the interaction with that advanced technology at the cortex level. My descriptions can be taken as such or not, and it is up to everyone to decide for themselves. With the information I present here, however, correlations can be made and things that have never been explained before can be understood, all of which is an important starting point for an individual’s analysis.

INTER-DIMENSIONAL PORTALS

During the distant period of Atlantis, better known as the period of the Hyperborean civilization, E-N-L beings had evolved so much that they began to be recognized by highly evolved extraterrestrial civilizations.

The possibilities of our planet in those times were more extensive because the Earth offered not only the variant of the physical plane but also that of the etheric plane into which some of the beings on its surface could reach. At that time, the frequencies of the physical and etheric planes were quite close, even though many of the areas and points of confluence between them had disappeared as a result of the terrible Tarsus War.

Even during Atlantis, there were no great differences between the two planes (physical and the ethereal) as there are today. The initiates knew how to consciously move from one plane to the next and especially knew how to make a difference between them. For E-N-L beings, that was an ordinary and very natural practice, but the passage into the etheric plane through the many portals that existed at that time was perfectly possible and easy to do, even for some of the more developed E-N-K beings.

These interactions between the physical and the etheric plane were many, and the physical blended with the etheric in a very natural way. In many places on the Earth's surface, especially in the northern hemisphere, there were such "gates" of passage or even vast territories of manifestation of the etheric plane which is, of course, higher than the physical one in terms of vibrational frequency. In fact, many of the unknowns, mysteries, and the so-called mythological events of history of ancient times are precisely explained by that characteristic of the times of several tens of thousands of years ago, when the physical dimension was paired with the subtle etheric one.

It is true, however, that access through those "gates" between the planes was intended primarily for the evolved E-N-L beings or the "demigods" and less so or not at all for the primitive E-N-K beings, the latter primarily fearing such manifestations, attributing them to supernatural dimensions. The penetration into the etheric plane through those portals was valid only for a certain initiated segment of the population. This fact is important because it made it possible to save part of the wise beings in Atlantis at the time of the deluge and to establish those beings in different parts of the planet. But the most important aspect is that the existence of inter-dimensional portals on the surface of the planet, even if less than in ancient times, has allowed and maintained the links and communication with the evolved extraterrestrial beings and with the higher etheric plane.

THE “REVOLUTION” AND THE FALL OF ATLANTIS

In Atlantis, all human beings belonged to the E-N-L branches. After a while, and due to some subtle influences, some of those beings began to turn toward less orthodox actions, pursuing personal interests; and in particular, seizing the power of leadership and control of very advanced technologies. Thus, they began to engage in strange cross-breeding between species, using E-N-K beings for this purpose as they were considered to be underdeveloped and, in their mind, could serve as guinea pigs for those strange hybridizations. The main mistake of the E-N-L beings who rebelled in this way during the Atlantean period was that they ignored one obvious fact: they, like the E-N-K, evolved from the same initial DNA structure. The E-N-K beings were therefore their genetic brothers.

By performing the very strange cross-breeding and genetic experiments, the rebels actually broke and altered certain beneficial resonances in their DNA because it was directly related to that of the E-N-K beings that they considered to be inferior. As I was shown, those were bad and even evil actions that violated the laws of universal justice, both by intention and by the goals they wanted to achieve.

Thus, even though the E-N-L branch was quite evolved, there was still segregation within it because only a portion of them evolved, remaining connected with the “E-N-L elite group” while another portion remained unevolved because they persisted in those experiments and in the fulfillment of selfish plans, descending to an individual level.

Due to the fact that the rebels were beings who already possessed great powers and advanced knowledge, their negative actions and intentions had very strong reverberations throughout the world. By accumulation, a terrible shock came to human civilization as the frequency of energies dropped sharply.

Uninspired by the E-N-L beings, the game deviated from the beings of the K branch (E-N-K), to which were added the selfish intentions to grab power for personal use, thus undermining the balance of energies on the continent and finally caused the full destruction of it. Thus, instead of evolving, part of the L branch created that very acute problem on the planet which was a real undermining of its own energy level.

AFTER THE CATACLYSM

In the face of the imminent danger of the destruction of Atlantis, some of the benevolent E-N-L beings migrated and sought the help of evolved beings from the “elite groups” of E-N-L from other areas as well as highly advanced extraterrestrial civilizations. It was a decisive moment; and then, at a galactic and planetary level, it was decided that this aspect would be repaired or at least diminished in its gravity.

As a result, Sirian beings began to incarnate into the genetic lines of the evolved and beneficial E-N-L beings that existed on Earth to fully support this process of recovery and to once again support the cradle of human civilization. This was possible because, as I mentioned, a large part of the E-N-L beings had reached an advanced degree of evolution which allowed for the incarnation of wise extraterrestrial beings into E-N-L physical bodies. After the fall of Atlantis, it was necessary that the evolution of the E-N-K human beings, which we know as homo sapiens, be accelerated. Until then, and generally speaking, E-N-K beings had been allowed to evolve freely, without precise targeting. Occasionally, they received an “impulse” through various types of extraterrestrial hybridization which proved to be more or less positive. The DNA complexity of the E-N-K beings was high, and the K branch evolved without any ordering or qualitative targeting, taking an even more difficult path that was only through one’s own experience.

When the destruction of the Atlantean continent became imminent and nothing could be done, the sages and a small part of the class of learned nobles left the area, either by turning to other star systems with which Atlantis had close trade and diplomatic ties or by withdrawing to Shambhala to help humanity. Migration from that level of society spread to certain areas of the planet, especially to Egypt, South America or the eastern and northern areas of Europe. During the sinking of Atlantis, a large part of the population retreated inside the Earth, especially due to the decision to give the E-N-K branch the freedom to evolve freely. At first, there were only E-N-L beings; but then, over the following thousands of years, the inner “cavity” of the planet was populated with E-N-K beings. The first to retire there were the “demigods”; and then, gradually, came the sufficiently evolved E-N-K beings.

What I noticed and found interesting was the fact that the Atlanteans that remained on Earth did not travel to other areas using expected transportation. They neither traveled by water nor sailed with their high-performance equipment. What happened in those last weeks and days before the final destruction was actually a passage through the etheric plane, on the ground. For example, they arrived in Egypt by land after first moving into the etheric plane, and then returning to the physical plane when they reached what was called Khem, the Black Earth Country in northern Africa that we call Egypt.

CENTERS OF INITIATORY LINEAGE

With the sinking of Atlantis, the overall vibrational frequency of our planet dropped dramatically. This is precisely why it was necessary to implement spiritual lineages and higher education among the populations of E-N-K beings, the majority of which remained on the surface of the Earth. This way, the evolution of humanity would not be blocked.

Therefore, each civilization or group of civilizations, together with the Atlanteans, have assumed something in this direction. Until then, many of the Alliance civilizations that took part in the process of the formation of the human race have implemented their own DNA or genetic influence into the basic DNA, as designed by the most advanced of them. For a while, they followed the development of those characteristics in human beings; and then, when they considered that they had completed their mission, they withdrew from the area of influence that was distributed to them on Earth, especially after the Great Planetary Council of 26,000 B.C.

After the destruction of Atlantis, however, it was the first time that the cities in charge of the Galactic Alliance, with Shambhala as their central forum, asked for help to start collaborations with other civilizations in the galaxy and to act on Earth in order to restore at least some of what had been lost in the planetary and Atlantean cataclysm. We are talking about knowledge, spirituality, science and technology.

From what I saw on the holographic screen, I realized that their action was fast and efficient. I noticed that the implementation of the spiritual lineages and teachings in that period had to be done directly. The method used before the destruction of Atlantis, when the king or the wise man transmitted certain notions and initiations, was no longer valid because, after the almost complete withdrawal of E-N-L beings, the population consisted of E-N-K beings, and they had already begun to be divided into different categories of thinking and action.

People not only needed royal lineages but also lineages of wisdom and spiritual paths separate from royalty. As a result, those teachings had to be offered after the destruction of Atlantis, especially at the beginning, by the wise Atlantean and extraterrestrial beings who came among the people and initiated them into different fields of science and spirituality. I saw in those images how they brought that knowledge, first into the middle of small groups, then into the initiation schools formed, and finally, into more complex systems of teaching which involved elements of higher technology. Thus, some peak periods were formed among the E-N-K beings which then propagated more and more of that knowledge among the larger populations of people, giving rise to higher lineages and systems of thought.

THE IMPORTANCE OF THE E-N-K BRANCH

Gradually, following those images, I began to realize with astonishment that the K branch, in fact, was of major interest to all of those extraterrestrial civilizations. It was astonishing and even inexplicable to me to find out that the most developed branch of human DNA could give rise to such great interest from the point of view of genetic development. As I said, since the beginning, E-N-K beings have been allowed to evolve somewhat alone, through their own experience. That is to say, there has not been a massive intervention in their case such as happened in the case of E-N-L beings who have been constantly refined, enriched with new frequencies, and chiseled at the DNA level.

The main reason was in a certain kind of “rigidity” of the genetic manipulation of this branch. The K branch was very mobile in different types of crossing-breeding, but it was not very evolved. In contrast to the genetic “malleability” of the E-N-L branch, the E-N-K branch did not have the ability to withstand high frequencies in the DNA macromolecule, and this resulted in a slow evolution for the species, especially as it was not helped by exterior “impulses.” In the face of my justified astonishment, the man from Apellos explained to me that a very interesting argument was the basis of such a decision regarding E-N-K beings. The alien civilizations in the Alliance became very interested in the E-N-K gene because of the special vitality that is manifested by the specific structure of the DNA of this branch. The E-N-K gene had preserved and even developed a vital energy intrinsic to the being which made it highly productive, resilient and stable. It is not by accident that the majority of human beings on the surface of the Earth were E-N-K beings at that time, and this is still true today. They were well integrated into the Earth’s biosphere and resonated effectively with it.

At a certain point in evolution, even if the refinement and level of consciousness is not too high, this vital side matters enormously because it provides the “fuel” needed for gene continuity without it rapidly decaying. Vitality is a “regenerator”; and, at the same time, a “capacitor” of energy for the evolving being. In the case of the K branch, it gave the DNA the possibility to make numerous interatomic combinations inside the macromolecule. This made it a fertile field for possible combinations with other types of DNA but also with high vital energy.

Even so, not all E-N-K beings were at a primitive level along the lines of evolution. Some of them had been hybridized with higher DNA, most often with that of E-N-L beings but also with extraterrestrial beings. Even if the results were not “spectacular” from the start, however, genetic changes were transmitted over time; and at least on certain lines of influence and in certain areas, E-N-K beings became very powerful, radiant, charismatic and gifted, even possessing paranormal powers.

As I have said, legends and myths, which actually tell us about extraordinary events that actually happened, refer to such beings as “demigods”; that is, human beings endowed with special abilities, far superior to ordinary E-N-K beings. There were also intermediate levels of development, but most E-N-K beings were at an early stage of evolution.

Because E-N-K beings were spread all over the globe, their level of consciousness also differed greatly. We have seen, for example, small communities of higher E-N-K beings living very close to communities of primitive E-N-K beings, just as in our cities we meet various categories of beings, ranging from academics to beggars, or cities developed near primitive tribes, all living in the same area of the Earth.

THE REFORMATION OF HUMAN CIVILIZATION

As I said, after the cataclysm of Atlantis, knowledge began to be shared with people in different parts of the globe. Medicine, astrological knowledge, and alchemy then began to appear, as well as other remarkable sciences which had not been known before among the E-N-K beings. In a summarized and exemplary series of images, I saw the way in which they were implemented slowly so as to enable the more rigid consciousness of E-N-K beings to assimilate everything correctly and to use those gifts more effectively. Much knowledge has been passed on through myths and legends with many celestial events having been expressed through stories of “gods” and “goddesses”.

Until then, knowledge was a unitary whole because, as far as I could tell, everything was part of the essential spiritual knowledge of the times. After the disappearance of Atlantis, however, it was necessary for different fields of knowledge to be segmented and explained within the meaning of the E-N-K branch in order to be closer to their relevant specificity. For example, some tended to study, others dedicated themselves to art, and a few of them approached the sciences and esoteric. This is why the wise Atlanteans, together with those who represented part of the Alliance's alien civilizations, assumed a domain into which to implement their own specific vibrational frequency into the knowledge of humans; that is, the E-N-K.

All the great "gods" who followed in the ancient tradition of Egypt (Thoth, Ra, etc.) represented guardians supporting this reformation of the spiritual branch of human civilization. In fact, the first ancient civilization that really mattered in the evolution of the E-N-K was the Egyptian civilization. The few higher E-N-L beings who remained after the fall of Atlantis and who sought help from advanced extraterrestrial beings had to maintain contact with them in order to build the huge pyramids that remain today. The reason for this is that the three great pyramids in Egypt are in fact just that: subtle communication centers which are by no means the version supported by some historians, Egyptologists and contemporary scientists who refer to them as "megalomaniac constructions" that served one purpose: the funeral of the pharaoh. Few of them have the courage to say that "refugee" Atlanteans in Egypt and other places on Earth — such as Central and South America, eastern Europe and even China — have been helped by some advanced alien civilizations in designing and making these pyramids, as I will describe later.

At that time, large spherical Sirian ships were no longer in the sky. As I was shown fleetingly, the presence of ships in the sky continued up to 350,000 B.C., then occasionally up to 330,000 B.C., and very rarely up to a period I estimated to be around 130,000 B.C. By then, in southern Africa, there was already a developed civilization comprising a very large number of E-N-L beings. Afterwards, during the flowering of the Lemurian civilization in the Pacific, another huge Sirian ship appeared in the sky, but I did not see details about it. On the celestial vault, however, I saw that it was accompanied by several other types of alien ships of great proportions but smaller than the Sirian ship. Much later, it was shown to me that some of the alien ships would play an important role in the history of Egyptian civilization, helping to build the pyramids and other great temples after the sinking of Atlantis.

CHAPTER THIRTEEN — BUILDING THE EGYPTIAN PYRAMIDS

Controversies over the age of the pyramids on the Giza plateau near Cairo are almost meaningless. Any man with some good sense and intelligence, as well as a minimum knowledge, can realize that the “classic” rant that attributes the great pyramids in Egypt to be approximately 4,500 years old, supported by contemporary archeologists and Egyptologists, is hilarious. To this is added the stupid idea that those colossal buildings were built to hold the grave for the pharaoh who lived during the period in which they were erected.

THE TRUE AGE OF THE GREAT PYRAMIDS IN EGYPT

Regarding this, one fact is certain. The way the three pyramids were built has absolutely nothing to do with the present “academic vision”. No person with a certain culture and intelligence could possibly swallow the version agreed upon by some Egyptologists and contemporary archeologists about the origin of the pyramids and even less about that of the Sphinx, all of which is completely hidden from modern science. There are so many question marks, unresolved issues, and mysterious elements in connection with these grand constructions that they do not even deserve to be mentioned here.

This “drama” of hidden truth, often ridiculous in the daring way it is supported by today’s science, has its roots in the inability of historians, archeologists and Egyptologists to believe that the history of Mankind might be different from the way it is generally presented to the whole world. For example, huge portions of this history, such as the existence of Atlantis and its demise, are excluded on the grounds that they can only be “legends”. The “Episode of Atlantis” in the history of Mankind, however, was one of the most important because the disappearance of the great island has radically influenced the situation of humanity and even of the entire planet. To this was added the withdrawal of the land of Shambhala into the etheric plane about 27,500 years ago. The disappearance of these two essential poles of knowledge and evolution of life on Earth has dramatically influenced the course of humanity’s development.

We can talk about a lot of counter arguments and elements that demonstrate the falsity of the “orthodox” ideas about the antiquity of the Egyptian pyramids and how they were built, but I do not think it is necessary to present them here. The interested reader can, with a minimum of research, discover such for himself and then be amused by the naivety and superficiality of the opinions expressed by a certain “arena” of scientists.

Interestingly, many people with certain qualities of extra-sensory perception and special endowments have mentioned something other than the tacitly accepted scientific version about these extraordinary constructions. Some of the elements that have been described by these authors correspond to the reality of the akashic records to which I had access, but others are presented incorrectly or are omitted.

There is even a consensus among those who admit that the pyramids are something other than what is commonly stated. This is the idea that the pyramids were built by an alien civilization, and this is not far from the truth. Rather than explanations or accounts of who built them or how they were built, there are, generally speaking, many more mysteries that have been observed in relation to the great pyramids built in different regions of the Earth. The explanations of this nature are often a mixture of truth and imagination, but there is also a special category of them coming from Egyptologists, archeologists and scientists in which they are completely wrong.

If we refer to the architectural complex near Cairo, but especially to the Great Pyramid, the correct dating of the construction is about 13,500 years ago. It was not too difficult to find this “age” from the “interplay” of frequencies, especially since I already had some experience in this direction. I did notice, however, a “movement” of information, a kind of “agitation” for that period, and it was something that initially confused me a little. The announcement of the actual age of the pyramids is not new as many authors and clairvoyants have already mentioned this.

Therefore, for those who are concerned, the opinion of contemporary Egyptologists and archaeologists has nothing to do with reality. Moreover, their entire conception of what the pyramids mean, who built them, and especially how they were erected is completely wrong. Both the images I saw and the calculations resulting from the frequencies I was perceiving showed me as clearly as possible that the three pyramids on the Giza plateau were built immediately after the sinking of Atlantis, approximately 13,500 years ago.

INVASION OF THE REPTILIAN RACE IN OUR SOLAR SYSTEM

The age of the architectural complex near Cairo did not surprise me because I had known for a long time that it could not be “recent”. The real surprise, however, came when the pictures showed me that, in fact, the construction of the pyramids on our planet started about 100,000 years ago. That context deserves a brief presentation as it offers a broader and more relevant insight into how the pyramids were erected on Earth and its true builders, as well as the main motivation which determined the accomplishment of those colossal constructions. I came to see and understand these issues because I focused on the construction of the pyramids. Already knowing that the three pyramids on the Giza plateau near Cairo were by no means the first pyramids built on our planet, I wanted to know what it was that determined the construction of these colossal buildings with science and precision that is today unmatched.

At first, it was suggested to me by pictures that the construction of the pyramids on Earth became a necessity at one point. I have thus seen the fragmented initiation of such constructions at different points around the globe and schematic links between them and cosmic space. I was viewing certain directions, symbols and geometric shapes that I could not understand.

Then, in a logical sequence, the images showed the constitution of an extraterrestrial being with reptilian features. It was a quick but complex presentation from many angles with lots of data and adjacent symbols, all of which were highly dynamic within the hologram. The content of the images then changed, showing me brief but precise snapshots of several types of cosmic vessels which were generally elongated. One of the types, however, had the round classic shape of the UFOs presented in literature.

The hologram then “split” in the sense that the image of the reptilian being appeared in the lower left corner of the hologram, and the rest was filled with the image of a huge fleet of ships similar to the ones mentioned above, plus others that were much larger in size. The images were very dynamic, zooming in and out, depending upon the ideas I wanted to be highlighted. The displacement of the fleet was attached to the image of our Solar System which I was able to recognize, especially due to the images of the planet Saturn and the red spot on Jupiter.

It seemed to me that, in this simple way, the reptilians were moving with their cosmic fleet to our Solar System. The feeling and emotion felt at that visual impact was scary because it was not only a simple visualization but also a connection with the state of the moment and the respective context. In the face of the threat, the most important and evolved alien civilizations from the Galactic Alliance who were overseeing the plan for the genetic evolution of the human being on Earth decided to defend our planet and the project on which they had worked thus far. I was amazed to see from the synthesis of the images that, even in this radical action, the advanced extraterrestrial civilizations that had the responsibility for the “laboratory” on our planet acted in such a way that human beings could continue to evolve, even under those conditions. To this end, the original Sirians decided to introduce an advanced technology on Earth that would counteract the reptilian assault.

THE TECHNOLOGY OF THE GREAT RESONATORS

As I witnessed, those events that I followed in synthesis on the holographic screen happened approximately 100,000-108,000 years ago. At that time, E-N-L beings were in full bloom so access to Sirian technology and advanced extraterrestrial civilizations that once lived on Earth was easier due to the fact that the E-N-L branch already had a refined level of consciousness and understanding. The technology of the great resonators referred to the construction of enormous buildings at various points around the globe designed to serve as “subtle high energy” headlights which had the capacity to gradually induce important changes in the DNA of human beings through their resonance with those energies. At the moment, I understood and appreciated the idea, but then I asked myself: “Why did the Sirians or even the Alliance they formed with other advanced extraterrestrial civilizations not ‘forbid’ the reptilians here on Earth or even in the galaxy to do all the evil that they do?” I thought that would not have been too difficult a task for them.

Then, in a very cleverly grouped flashing of images, I realized that, even though the involvement of the evil reptilians was terrible, the role they played in all of those events served a global purpose. I was thus shown that their intervention was, in fact, a necessity because it led, in the end, to a “specialized design” of the DNA of the human being that was so hard wired to the physical plane that it provided the possibility of incarnating a large number of beings from the astral plane into this plane, all of whom otherwise would not have had the necessary facilities to be born into higher level physical bodies.

I therefore understood that the plan of creating a human being with a very complex DNA embraced the consideration of creating, among other things, greater possibilities for certain souls in the astral plane to evolve through incarnation because of their need to understand the meaning of experiences and to bring them to fruition according to individual karma. This could only be done by incarnation into physical bodies with very “specialized” frequencies that are very “concrete” because those souls could not be born otherwise by reason of their own karmic limitations. They could thus continue their evolution only if they were born into a very “concrete” body which would have given them the opportunity to go through certain situations of existential crisis so that they would understand the need to correct the way they conduct their existence.

The fact that human DNA was very “specialized” and “separated” on many different branches and directions of development and evolution also contributed to the birth of a diversity of souls and entities from the astral plane, all corresponding to a wide range of frequencies of vibration, and that is why humanity began to appear as a “multicolored fan” of such frequencies and tendencies which caused it to be called a “nursery”.

On the other hand, the reptilians could not control the entire population of the planet but rather only those beings that resonated with them which had in their DNA, at least to some extent, the specific reptilian influence and energy. Some of these influences were harsher, and the respective beings became their acolytes. Other influences were less harsh but were accompanied by an intense struggle for the total subordination of those beings. In fact, the reptilians wanted to suppress the rest of the population, thus conquering the entire planet. They had a rather advanced technological level and so created a “mental network of lower frequencies” as a kind of cage that could influence, to a certain extent, even the beings that did not resonate with them. This is still true nowadays but with certain modifications. By allowing for the introduction to the technology of the great resonators, i.e. the gigantic constructions on Earth, the Alliance gave a new impulse and concrete help to human beings, both to evolve and to use those buildings for defense purposes. The great resonators are, in their vast majority, the pyramids and ziggurats that we can still admire today in precisely aligned areas of the Earth. The accomplishment of these extraordinary constructions was also an extra boost for the spiritual future of Mankind because, after the withdrawal of Shambhala and the sinking of Atlantis, there had to be centers on the surface of the planet to support, to some extent, the light and spirituality of the past.

Even then, however, the pyramids were built during much older periods of Mankind, primarily because of the need to keep in close contact with the “gods”, that is to say, with the extraterrestrial civilizations that played a decisive role in the evolution of DNA of the human race on Earth. In the case of such gigantic constructions, this was possible because, in reality, the pyramids are very powerful telepathic transmitters of subtle energy and information.

Second, their construction became necessary in those times because the pyramids constantly create a refinement of the subtle emotional energies of human beings. This was of great help, especially in that ancient context, in which tensions and wars had reached high levels due to the adverse influence of evil reptilians. Therefore, the aggregate of human beings and their specific mental field had to be sustained and helped to evolve further, and that is why one of the main methods to achieve this was to introduce the technology and knowledge of the extremely elaborate and difficult construction of the pyramids which serve as great resonators of beneficial energies in the Universe.

THE COMPLEX ROLE OF THE PYRAMIDS

Over the course of tens of thousands of years, the purpose of building the pyramids has not changed so that, even in times closer to us, that is, after the fall of Atlantis, they played the same fundamental role. Moreover, I was shown that the high priests and pharaohs of those times knew that the immense energy of the pyramid could be used to facilitate the conscious etheric or astral travel of their subtle bodies across very large distances in the galaxy, to the “gods” they worshiped.

Such megalithic buildings, however, were not just a conglomerate of stones, regardless of how complexly arranged they were. The name of “great resonators” is justified by the fact that inside of them were certain rooms designed with colors in which were arranged various devices of great complexity, based mainly on the technology of crystals. In pictures, I was shown as “eloquently” as possible the interiors of such rooms, which are actually control rooms, sometimes being located at either the top or bottom of the pyramid.

By their characteristic shape, the pyramids are extraordinarily powerful subtle energy amplifiers so that the subtle energies emitted by the sophisticated devices and crystals inside of them were greatly amplified and transmitted into space to a well-defined target. On the other hand, the pyramids also had the role of supporting beneficial frequencies over a large area around them so that human beings would not decline under the influence of hostile external factors.

After strengthening the Alliance of beneficial extraterrestrial civilizations and allowing the Sirians to introduce this technology to Earth, the construction of the great pyramids began. The extraterrestrial civilizations that were part of the Alliance and had a territory on our planet realized a coherent and correlated plan to erect these buildings, respecting the subtle energetic influences of the Earth. This included the significant areas of intersection of its magnetic fluxes as well as correspondence with certain areas of the galaxy. These megalithic constructions were not performed randomly but only at certain precise points on the surface of the planet. Although the general shape of the pyramids is the same, they still have their own characteristics, all dependent upon the area in which they were built, the nature of the DNA of the human beings in that area, and the particularities of the extraterrestrial civilization considered to be the “governor” of that territory. For example, I was shown that the pyramids in Atlantis were very complex because they encompassed the knowledge and style of several alien civilizations.

Later, after the great continent sank, the pyramids that were built in different areas of the globe reflected the style of only one of those extraterrestrial civilizations. For example, the three pyramids on the Giza plateau are specific to the original Sirians in the Sirius A system even though, in reality, they were built on the physical plane through the participation of a Syrian civilization derived from the original one and located in Orion's Belt.

The pyramids in Central America, the stepped ones, also have the direct imprint of the Syrian civilizations in the Orion Belt. Things here, however, are a bit more complicated due to the intervention of the reptilians and their acolytes. I saw that the Aztecs went through successive phases. First, there was an initial phase in which their resonance was “healthy” and pure; and then, a second phase in which they were “altered” by the nefarious influence of the “little grays”, a degenerative civilization formerly taken over by the reptilian civilization. This converted the actual purpose of the pyramids to be dedicated towards evil.

On the other hand, temples in India, which are somewhat smaller in size but resemble the pyramids, though they are narrower at the base and more “pursed” at the top, have a Pleiadian descent. As far as I could tell, the many details, inlays and roundings in their construction represent something specific to the Pleiadian civilization. I also recognized this feature in the Pleiadian ships that I saw in the holographic projections.

DESIGN OF THE GREAT PYRAMIDS

Looking at the comparative analysis offered to me on the holographic screen, I was keen to see how a great pyramid was conceived and erected, as well as the exceptional technological solutions employed to achieve such a construction. Obviously, I did not expect to see something like the design on a board with a ruler, compass and pencil, nor even on the screen of a computer using various specialized programs for it.

I was, however, very passionate about the process of thinking up and designing the project, especially from the point of view of the advanced technology of an extraterrestrial civilization because I did not imagine that such a grandiose and incredibly sophisticated project, such as the design of a large pyramid, is something common and easy to do. Proof of this is the fact that, despite the level of knowledge and technological possibilities that scientists and engineers have today, they cannot design and erect such a gigantic construction. The difficulties of design and especially of concrete materialization would appear to be insurmountable for them.

As soon as I expressed that desire, the line of synthetic analysis was interrupted and I was shown a map of southern Egypt. The image then changed suddenly and I saw a group of six beings, four of them extraterrestrial and two earthly, gathered in a large room that was possibly inside a ship. I knew three of the four extraterrestrial beings were Sirians because I recognized them by their high stature of more than two and a half meters, the whitish flesh color of the skin and the slightly extended skull towards the back. The fourth extraterrestrial being belonged to a race unknown to me, having very white skin, silver hair and purple eyes. As I telepathically perceived, the two earthly beings came from Atlantis. Everyone was standing around a huge blue hologram which looked like a pyramid in the middle of that hall.

The hologram was covered with “milky” light, and the edges of the pyramid gleamed discreetly in white.

Each being in that room intervened by hand movements inside the hologram, modifying or adding elements. At the same time, I saw a lot of information on the edge of the hologram: symbols, shapes and sequential representations that moved and changed continuously. Everything was dynamic, active and full of meaning and coherence. I felt beyond any doubt that what I saw, as a synthesis of the design of a large pyramid, was a very deep work based on cosmic laws and principles, having only peripherally to do with the calculations of its physical structure. As I would soon understand, these calculations resulted directly from the subtle structure of the pyramid, and that is why they were perfect: because the construction of the edifice was not limited to its physical elements, that is to say, the stone blocks, but was directed by the subtle energetic elements and the correct integration into a much larger cosmic structure.

If we consider them in principle, these conclusions are very important because they show us the erroneous basis that scientists rely on when they want to understand the mysteries of the pyramids. Among other things, it is hard to assume and believe that people from the Neolithic Age, about 4,500 years ago per Egyptologists, designed, drew up plans, coordinated and then completed the construction of such colossal buildings. Engineers and contemporary physicists, however, are not able to do so today, even with the help of advanced computers and modern construction technology.

They have not yet understood the fact that there is a well-defined sensibility of handling things in terms of Creation, a realm or reference point where things always comes from the top down. The calculations, results and measurements in the physical plane, which helped to build the pyramid, naturally derive from its higher design in the subtle etheric plane because what I saw synthesized in the image of that hologram was actually the design of the pyramid starting from the etheric plane. So it was not just a simple hologram; but, by a technology that I do not understand even now, it allowed the vision of the pyramid and its design directly in the etheric plane.

In this phase, the pyramid gains meaning and “inner force”, but it is not yet related to the physical plane. All calculations and results from this plane are just a natural consequence of structures designed at the etheric level. Perhaps that is why contemporary architects and engineers have not yet had the knowledge of such an advanced project like the construction of a large pyramid. At this level of complexity, only the calculations of strength and structure are sufficient, but it is necessary for there to be a correlation with a deep energy base which gives the project stability and durability. Solutions of a subtle etheric nature are therefore needed as a starting point. They can then generate the concrete solution in the physical plane.

MAJOR CONCEPTUAL DIFFERENCES

From the images presented to me, I realized that such a project starts from a kind of “star astrology”; that is to say, from a certain star configuration serving as a point of reference for the place where the pyramid is to be built.

At the high level of consciousness and understanding of the cosmic laws that advanced extraterrestrial civilizations have, the problem of constructing grandiose buildings implies a different approach which is much deeper and more complex than the ones we are accustomed to on Earth, no matter how amazing these constructions might look.

The big problem with such earthly constructions, whether we are talking about large and sophisticated skyscrapers or other types of buildings, is their durability over time, which is small. A resistance of several hundred years would be a record for the constructions of the modern era, assuming that they will not be subjected to weather or major destructive phenomena of nature. And yet, even with such inclement weather, which at times was harsh, the pyramids in Egypt have been around for over ten thousand years, and others are even much older, near the beginning of the time when the technology of the great resonators was introduced. What buildings do we have on Earth which we can say will last for at least a thousand years? By the very nature of the building materials that are used, they are subject to perishability. Even though, when they are new, they look imposing and beautiful, and the technologies used for interior design seem sophisticated. In reality, however, all of them are very superficial and have a short life. The materials have no resistance in time, and 99% of the technology of it is based upon electricity, the source of which may disappear or be suspended at any time.

However amazing today's technologies might seem, they are at an early stage of development because they have not passed an elementary stage in conception and thought. Most of them depend upon each other, and this weakens the cohesive force of the idea that underlies them. A major leap of conception in contemporary science has not yet been realized; rather, it has not yet been officially accepted on the "mass consumption table" of the population.

It is quite easy to raise skeletons from steel bars to make large buildings and to insulate them with different materials. But, if the largest construction company in the world were committed to designing and erecting a large pyramid only from stone blocks, such as the one in Egypt, it would most likely quit the job in just a few days. It would be great to have the technology necessary to assemble such a construction in a consistent manner, down to the millimeter or even fractions of a millimeter fractions that is similar or identical to the Great Pyramid of Egypt, without having to talk about the design or the work involved.

But, how can contemporary architects and engineers design and build a similar colossus when they do not at present know or understand the construction of the Great Pyramid and its interior structure? Further, the pyramid in Egypt is relatively small in size and complexity compared to what was once the Great Pyramid of Atlantis.

The inability of the science of architecture and engineering in contemporary constructions comes from the fact that there is no superior understanding of what form, energy resonance and support in the subtle dimensions of Creation mean. A magnificent construction, such as a large pyramid, implies an accumulation of interdisciplinary knowledge, and by this, I do not mean architecture, resistance of materials, installations, interior design, and so on. What I want to point out is that true science has a universal nature and also implies, in addition to the laws, equations and norms that define it, a different kind of knowledge, such as the subtle energy relationships between celestial bodies, their mutual impact, the hidden significance of the resonances that develop in this way, the way they can be used over time, the deep science of cosmic cycles, and other aspects that I have seen and understood from the fragments presented to me on the holographic screen.

Moreover, when designing such a construction, both the general macrocosmic elements, which ensure its stability and durability over time, as well as the microcosmic elements, highlighted by the resonance, are taken into account, specific to the space in which the construction takes place, the general resonance of the DNA of the race of beings that comes into contact with it, but also other specific elements, such as the purpose of that construction. Therefore, the physical pyramid is conceived in relation to all the main aspects of the being and the reality that surrounds it, but especially with those of a subtle nature: the specific resonance of the DNA, the psycho-mental states, the geographical location, the influences of the planetary and stellar energies, the purpose assigned to that construction, and so on.

SPECIFIC STAR CONFIGURATION

I saw how the design of the pyramid by those beings began with the analysis of the star map of the area of the galaxy where the Earth was. Various links were then made between several stars in order to find certain combinations that provided results of both a spatial nature (through the structure of the respective configuration) and a temporal nature (synchronized time periods and their precise duration).

At every move in the huge hologram or in the search for a star, a wealth of information appeared, attached on the edges. From what I saw, I realized that the pyramids are of different types, having different shapes, different angles, being blunt or sharp, including four or more faces, stepped or smooth, and of course, serving different purposes. All of these characteristics were not accidental but correlated with the cosmic energetic influences of a certain star configuration under the “patronage” to which a pyramid was to be built.

As I said, the pyramid is not just a simple material construction but encompasses a whole series of subtle correlated aspects, each of them having a certain vibrational frequency in affinity with a particular geographical area and with a particular psycho-mental state that is specific to it, etc.

After the extraterrestrial beings chose the stellar configuration, I saw how an energetic “cloud” gradually began to form in the central area of that configuration, becoming more and more contoured based upon each new element of construction that was created or chosen by those beings. I then saw how lines were beginning to appear in the middle of that cloud, signifying a precise and quite complicated step. I quickly realized that this was the inside of the pyramid.

The technology that made it possible to achieve that design, which correlated very precisely with other elements, such as stellar energy influx, was amazing. Choosing the stellar configuration resulted in a complicated shape in the middle which represented the interior of the pyramid. The schematic structure was born simply from the agreement with the energetic resonances that were manifested within the stellar configuration. Even more amazing than this was to observe that any stone block, any angle used, any space created and any size that was chosen, were all absolutely in direct connection with something in the respective star configuration. Nothing was accidental or unconscious. Absolutely everything was justified by an extraordinary mutual affinity, manifested between the pyramid and the group of stars that was chosen at the beginning of the construction of that pyramid and which had a precise configuration.

It was a very complicated design, totally executed in the etheric plane. As I said, it started from the level of the inner structure of the pyramid which had gradually appeared in the center of the hologram. It overlapped in a certain way over the star configuration that was chosen, indicating all the areas of correspondence through much data and many symbols. In about the middle of it, at the most important point of energetic influence of the star arrangement, was the space or main room of the pyramid. For example, in the case of the Great Pyramid in Egypt, that space corresponds to the King's Chamber. It was then passed to the secondary rooms, galleries and corridors until the last niche was thus completed.

ETHERIC PLAN DESIGN AND SPECIFIC STAR RESONANCES

In the holographic images I saw, any structural element of the pyramid appeared as a result of the energy resonance created by the configuration of a specific star which had been established for that pyramid. For example, in the case of the three pyramids on the Giza plateau in Egypt, their dimensions — even if they are in harmony with many specific elements and characteristics of our planet — are designed so as to respect the reports corresponding to the geometrical structure of the stellar configuration at the moment of beginning the actual construction and those corresponding to the dimensions of the three main stars of Orion's Belt.*

[FOOTNOTE: * This information coincides with the studies of contemporary researchers, such as Robert Bauval who, in his book The Mystery of Orion, undoubtedly shows that the three pyramids near Cairo are a faithful replica of the star configuration in Orion's Belt. Bauval writes: "There is a connection between the texts about the pyramid and the pyramid itself, that is, what the texts tell us is confirmed by architecture, and I have demonstrated this fact beyond any doubt."]

Even this simple fact would be enough to block any attempt of "scientific" explanation of the researchers regarding the construction of the three pyramids because: how could the ancient Egyptians know the diameters of the three main stars of the Belt? This is impossible if you limit yourself to observing the three stars freely which, according to the assumptions of scientists, apparently was the only possibility that the Egyptians had at that time.  In such a case, it is obvious that no difference can be made between them. And yet, the three pyramids faithfully and proportionately respect both the dimensions of the three stars of Orion's Belt and their relative position within the belt. * In this way, each line and each area of the pyramid was holographically designed in detail on a scale and directly from within the etheric plane. I then telepathically received the information that, practically speaking, designing a large pyramid only in the physical plane is impossible or would be irreparably doomed to failure because it could not effectively solve and correlate the immensity of data necessary for that construction to be viable and resistant.

FOOTNOTES:

 This corresponds to 2.500 B.C., the period advanced by Egyptologists and modern science for the construction of the Giza pyramid. At that time, the alignment of the three pyramids with the main stars of Orion's Belt was no longer valid, but it does correspond to 11,500 B.C.]

 The three stars in Orion's Belt are: Alnitak (Zeta), Alnilam (Epsilon) and Mintaka (Delta).

* In his book, Robert Bauval points out that the three pyramids on the Giza plateau in Egypt respect the positioning of the stars in Orion's Belt, but he does not say that they faithfully render, proportionately speaking, the diameter of the three stars.

The calculations and engineering methods from the physical plane do not allow the pyramid to be designed according to the usual methods. With present formulas, calculation techniques and knowledge, it can only be constructed up to a certain stage beyond which problems cannot be solved. This is because the parameters included in the construction of a pyramid are much more numerous and often unknown to contemporary engineers and scientists. This is why, even if they would like to start designing and carrying out such a huge construction, they would reach technical and even conceptual impossibilities quickly enough, making it impossible to build further.

For example, it would be difficult for many scientists and contemporary engineers to understand that pyramids are actually very important communication centers connected to the specific energy of the stars or human spacecraft that have been chosen to form a certain configuration in order to fulfill a certain purpose, usually of a galactic nature.

This is important because the gigantic mother ships of highly technologically advanced civilizations often have planetary dimensions, and their missions are sometimes very long lasting, from a few years to several tens of thousands or even hundreds of thousands of years. Therefore, the pyramids were used exactly as we currently use communication centers, and this involves the transmission and reception of information. As they are cosmic interstellar transmitters designed to perform over very large distances, they also had to be very large and powerful, and that is why the pyramids were used as subtle telepathic transmitters.

TWENTY-FOUR YEARS

At that time, in the area where today the three great pyramids stand, there was no desert of sand. Basically, the Sahara did not exist at that time. On the contrary, in the place of today's desert, I saw lush vegetation with large rivers which flowed into the Nile.

In combination with the “play” of the frequencies, it was telepathically transmitted to me quite clearly that the entire operation of building the architectural complex near Cairo, including the preparation of the plateau, lasted about twenty-four years. At first, I was a little surprised because I imagined that, given the advanced technology of the Sirians in Orion, the construction of the three pyramids should take much less; but that was undoubtedly a simplistic evaluation of mine, made in ignorance of the cause. Additionally, the work did not take place continuously because I saw periods when the site was devoid of the presence of aliens and their ships. Later, in amazement over the way the three pyramids were built, I realized that the work was actually moving at a pretty fast pace during the 24 years; and that, under other conditions, their construction could have lasted hundreds of years if not longer.

As the plateau was uneven and covered with earth, the work began with the proper preparation of the place for construction. The images showed me a massive deforestation in that area and a leveling of the surface in order to create the solid rock plateau. There were many ships of different types in the area which stood still in the air at a certain height, all arranged in “layers” or levels. Some of them prepared the plateau using a technology based upon some type of “beams” that leveled the area. As I saw that operation, the air seemed to ripple beneath the ship passing over a certain area, and after it did so, everything became “flattened”, and not by violent destruction but rather by a kind of rock liquefaction and proper absorption.

OVERSEAS INVOLVEMENT IN PYRAMID CONSTRUCTION

An interesting aspect I noticed when looking at those extraordinary images was the relation between the origin of the ships and the extraterrestrial beings. In that context of humanity's very distant past, talking about their “extraterrestrial” membership was somewhat improper. The ships and their beings were indeed from other planets, but they had been interrelated on our planet for thousands of years and were living with human beings.

They had therefore not come to Earth just for the construction of the three great pyramids in Egypt, but their presence was old, from the times when Atlantis had a great economic and spiritual power and was influential over all of the other continents, and even long before that.

In Egypt, the three pyramids were built mainly by extraterrestrial civilizations descending from the main Sirian civilization in the Sirius A system. In addition to their representatives, I was shown other ships belonging to different civilizations which also contributed to the construction of the pyramids or had attended the operation during certain stages of it. In total, I saw the participation of four different extraterrestrial civilizations to which was added the important presence of wise Atlantean beings.

The erection of the pyramids was a “team effort” in the sense that the Atlanteans, with their specific ships, worked with extraterrestrial beings from several civilizations, but the major influence of the Sirian civilizations followed, and as I said, the Great pyramid, as well as the other two smaller pyramids, were built in the Sirian style.

On the site and around it, I saw a swarm of air ships which were extremely well organized and precise. Each ship “knew” exactly what to do and everything seemed to be perfectly calculated and managed. There were, however, very few Atlantean and extraterrestrial beings on the ground. At quite a large distance around the area of construction, I could see some locals, quite primitive human beings of the E-N-K branch, who were just looking at the activity on the site. In some of the images that followed, however, I was able to see some of those natives performing simple activities within the site.

I was very curious to see the real way in which the pyramids were constructed, without going any further between the hypotheses and assumptions that are made. From the beginning, I understood that this was the exclusive work of the ships and of the Atlanteans and extraterrestrial technology based particularly on the energy of crystals. It was not even a question of whether the locals could do something about building the pyramids or having any initiative to do so. In terms of distance, the metaphorical possibility of such was similar to that between our Sun and the star Sirius. From what I saw, the locals were E-N-K beings from one of the lower branches with a primitive level of living. Due to their rudimentary level of living and knowledge, such a work would have been absolutely impossible for them to have accomplished in any phase of its realization.

I then fleetingly remembered the vision of contemporary engineers, archeologists and Egyptologists who seem to have great confidence in the “technical” acumen of the ancient Egyptians, namely: the chisel, the hammer the rope, pulleys, logs and some pieces of copper. In their view, these were the main tools with which the huge and complex pyramids on the Giza plateau were built.

I did not see even one of these tools in the pictures presented to me, but even if the locals had countless such objects, they would have served no purpose. I doubt that those E-N-K beings could have cut and carved at least one stone block out of the millions that make up the three pyramids, nor could I see how they could have transported them over such great distances and then assemble them down to millimeters in an extremely complex unit. This is not to mention the construction design, the amazing engineering solutions, nor the dimensions and weight of the stone blocks or many other aspects as well.

It is true, however, that I saw a few pictures at one point of some natives right inside the site, moving and performing simple operations on some stone blocks in the storage area, having a few tools and manipulating some thin metal bars or drawing colored signs with straw bundles. I then received the information that these natives were telepathically guided by some of the tall beings on the plateau who were dressed in silver-white and walking slowly between different points of the construction site.

THE CONSTRUCTION OF THE THREE GREAT PYRAMIDS ON THE GIZA PLATEAU

Beyond all of these general elements, I firstly focused on the design of the pyramids. This aspect, which could not be fully understood until today, is attributed to near primitive beings effectively lifting giant stone columns.

Seeing the extraordinary complexity of such works in the holographic images presented to me, I was stunned by the lack of discernment and even the logic with which contemporary researchers and renowned Egyptologists argue the “modern version” of how the pyramid complex near Cairo was erected.

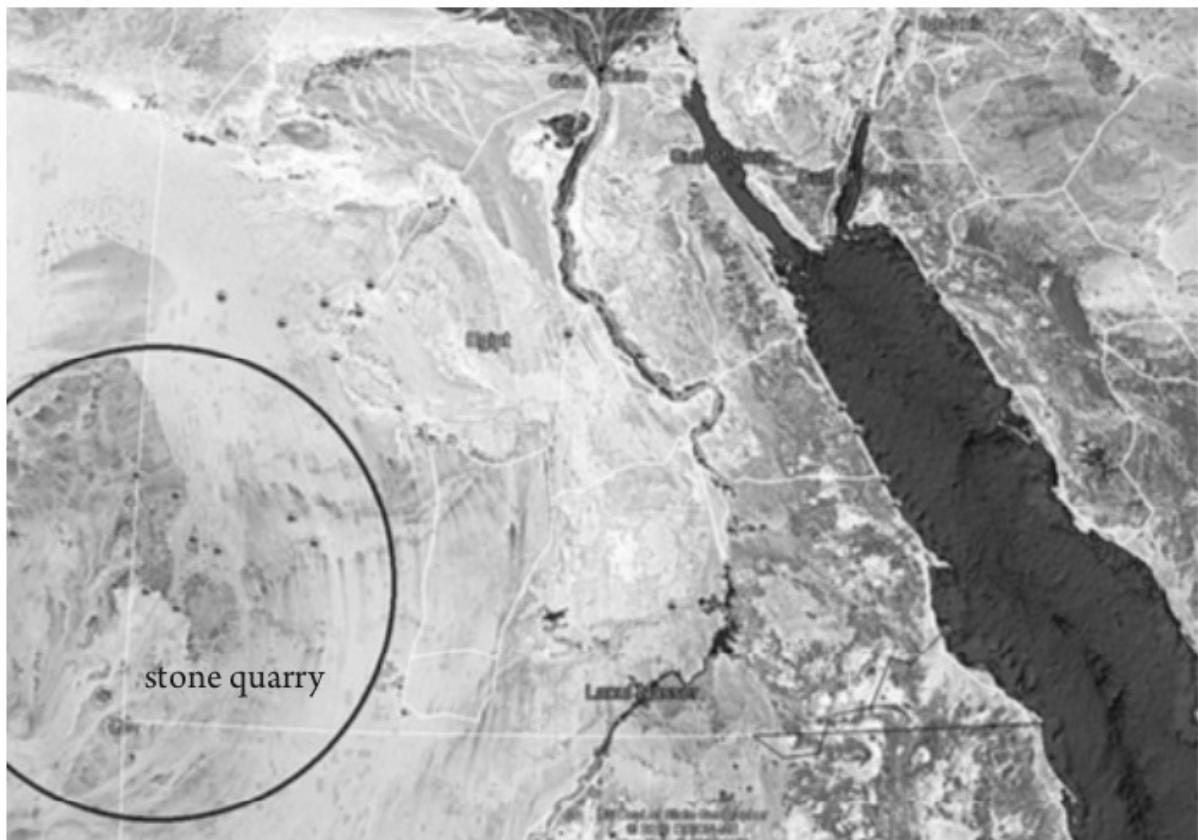

I repeat these things over and over again precisely because of my desire to draw attention to the illogics that are perpetuated in the form of “competent” opinions, but what is really sad is that the population considers all of these “academic solutions” as being true. However, they represent only the manifestation of immense scientific pride and the inability to understand and accept something higher than the current level of technological development. To these is added a lamentable indoctrination of the population so that they do not know the truth and thus give unseen wings to the desire for progress and freedom.

As for the actual construction of the three pyramids, the first thing that was shown to me was the way in which the stone blocks were cut. In other words, we saw the stone quarry that provided the building material of the three great pyramids. Unexpectedly to me, it was not in the territory of today’s Egypt, but further south, in the territory of what is today Libya, not too far from its border.

The image then focused on cylindrical devices which were stuck in the ground at different points in the construction area. They were similar to the ones we saw in the pictures of the Persian Gulf 400,000 years ago that were being used by the Sirians for “drilling”. It was not clear to me what role they played in that stone quarry, but I still saw the correlation between the rays of laser-like lights coming out of those cylinders and the “lasers” of the “construction ship” floating noiselessly above the mountain. It was a large ship, impressive by its somewhat irregular appearance which, in fact, gave me the impression of it as a “construction ship” because it had many attachments on its sides. I saw that it was responsible for the vertical sectioning of the stone blocks in the quarry because the stone was extracted vertically from the top of the mountain. The ship was always positioned above another place in the mountain, being guided by its own “lasers”; then vertically sectioning the mountain stone along the four sides of the upper surface through thicker rays of light which were bright white. Thus, the shape of the stone block was generated, after which the mother ship went to the section of another stone block in another area of the quarry.

THE APPROXIMATE POSITIONING OF THE STONE QUARRY

After the stone block was thus delimited in the mountain, a transport ship came above it which correlated its movement with that of a sphere-like device resembling an automatic drone. It came through the air near the respective block cut in the mountain, and with the help of “laser” beams that it emitted, sectioned the block both at the top and at its lower part, allowing it to be “caught” and raised to the transport ship through a special force field. Before this, however, I saw that the drone “inscribed” the stone block, always in the bottom right corner. The code was not carved or painted, but I understood that the area in which it was inscribed was energetically activated in such a way that the composition of the stone was modified in that region. It was becoming more structured there, as if it were a neat and luminous crystal. The “code” as such was a rectangle in which several lines and squares were printed, as is the electronic signature nowadays. It would illuminate when a certain ray of light was directed at it, as a kind of specialized “reader”.

The transport vessels were rectangular, and each of them had two symmetrically arranged hemispheres which most likely generated an attraction field that supported the stone blocks below. As I said, when a ship reached over a block of cut stone from the mountain, it was sectioned below, and it was then “trapped” in a specific energy field emanating from the ship. I clearly saw the way this one was done because a diffused beam of white light came out of the two hemispheres which “covered” the stone block. It began to levitate almost immediately, rising up to the bottom of the ship to a short distance from those hemispheres. The ship then sped on an aerial “highway”, transporting the stone block to the site.

If the stone blocks were relatively small in size, a ship would carry two such blocks on one road; but if they were larger, the ships carried only one block. For very large blocks or with special shapes, I saw that, after being cut raw from the mountain, they were transported to an adjacent area where they were finished in a meticulous manner, being brought to the required dimensions by several mobile devices that seemed to be guided automatically.

At a considerable height in the air above the quarry was a much larger ship whose diameter I estimated to be at least 120 meters. Then I received a telepathic knowing that her role was to oversee and direct the work project. I could see perfect rows of small transport ships which were coming to the quarry and departing with medium-sized stone blocks. The precision and dynamics of the movements of those ships and “drones” was irreproachable. It seemed like a gigantic computer was ordering every operation, both for the flight and steering of the ships as well as for the cutting and lifting of the stone blocks. I also telepathically understood that this was always happening with precise science. When the stone blocks were cut, it was already known exactly where each of them would be placed in the construction of the Great Pyramid. The cut blocks were always those blocks that were waiting to be put in the order that had been established, but as I was to notice, the complete “finishing” took place at the construction site.

THE STORAGE AREA OF THE STONE BLOCKS AND THE CONSTRUCTION SITE OF THE PYRAMID

I saw two main areas: the storage of the stone blocks and the actual construction. The blocks were taken in a certain order, never by chance. I could say that not one stone block was the same as any of the others, each having its specific integration in the construction of the pyramid. I did not see, for example, stocks of stone blocks forming a pile. There were, of course, blocks on the ground but not in piles, and the existing ones were immediately taken and integrated into the extremely laborious construction of the pyramid.

COLLABORATION BETWEEN ATLANTIS AND THE EXTRATERRESTRIALS

On the ground, I saw a tall Atlantean man, dressed in white and resembling a priest, who oversaw the general construction. I could not say how I knew that tall man was an Atlantean, but the information was nonetheless accurate in my mind. I saw two extraterrestrial Syrian beings in the warehouse area whom I recognized because of their white skin, their elongated head towards the back, and their beautiful blue suits with golden signs.

These three seemed to coordinate the general work, but I saw other beings on the perimeter of the site, about ten, carrying out different tasks. Two of them were also Atlantean.

My attention was drawn to three of those beings who were taller than the others — I estimated that they were more than 2.5 meters high — and wore some kind of whitish-silver slightly translucent color combinations that flowed into a cape-like flair in the back. And on the plateau was a mixture of races, some beings having hair on the head and others not, while the skin of some was darker, even brown, but most of them were white.

The Atlantean priest and the two Syrian beings who were leading the general work had a monitor in their hands that resembled a large tablet, correlating the various actions that were needed. Absolutely everything under construction was made by the ships in levitation. I could only hear a fine noise, like a hum, but this was probably due to the movement of ships through the air because the sky was filled with their presence.

I realized that those beings, especially the tall ones dressed in white and silver suits, were permanently in telepathic connection either with the general command center, which I could not see, or with the central “brain” coordinating the movement of the ships. At his right temple, the Atlantean priest had a device that appeared as if it were stuck on his long blueish white hair. It was comparable to a bluetooth of today except that it was larger and more elongated.

Every being and ship out there knew exactly what to do and everything was running with extraordinary precision and perfection. The timing and correlation of all operations was truly impressive. Moreover, in the magnitude and complexity of such construction, I do not know how the activity could have been otherwise so efficient. Even so, as I said, the construction of the entire architectural complex lasted more than two decades.

An important fact to mention is that I did not notice the existence of pilots in small transport vessels. These were fairly simple ships, rectangular in shape but without crew, something similar to today's drones. I concluded that everything was correlated and guided from a general command center.

ADVANCED TECHNOLOGIES

I was then shown very clearly how the respective stone blocks "came in" to be assembled perfectly in the intended place. The process was entirely technologically based. I saw cylindrical devices on the ground that were like smoky-dark pillars. They were similar to those in the quarry but greater in height, each measuring about five feet high. Each had a hemisphere on the top which made them resemble tall mushrooms to some extent. As far as I was aware, those cylindrical devices were arranged on a certain path and at certain points, somehow in pairs, forming a kind of "corridor".

When a stone block was to be moved and recessed into the body of the pyramid, two beings from those present on the plateau moved in front of such a cylinder . With only a hand gesture, probably triggering an internal command, the sphere from the top of the cylinder in question began to vibrate imperceptibly, at the same time emitting a specific and non-disturbing high-frequency sound. A ray of light like a laser appeared from the hemisphere, intersecting with the radius emitted by another cylinder. The two "lasers" then scanned the multitude of stone blocks, exactly identifying the block with the code needed to be placed in the pyramid assembly in the exact order established for the construction.

I do not know what that technology was based on, but I could see that the stone blocks actually rose in the air, levitating, and then passing through the rows of cylinders heading towards the pyramid. There they were driven exactly into a certain area of it, rotating in the air until they reached the position where they could be perfectly integrated. I also saw how some of the beings on the ground checked each time how these operations were performed, the pace being precisely sustained. They never spoke, but I felt that there was always an exchange of telepathic messages between them which correlated the different phases of the work.

It started with the Great Pyramid, and I noticed that the development of the construction was not just one-sided but that it was being approached in several regions. As I said, the stone blocks were brought and placed precisely in a predetermined order, creating the feeling of a “living organism” in the construction process. Even though it is a difficult concept to assimilate, this is how I felt when the images were presented to me because, as I said, the holographic technology of Apellos not only facilitated the perception of those times visually but also, to a certain extent, psychically and mentally.

I thus understood that everything had a well-defined meaning in that construction, that each stone having a direct meaning and correlation with a certain cosmic influence, and that nothing was left to chance. If it were not so, how could those magnificent buildings remain “standing” even after more than thirteen millennia? Following the way the pyramids were made, from conception to their practical construction, I realized once again the immense gap that exists between humanity’s current understanding of the laws that govern life and the universe and the ancient advanced civilizations of Earth or the extraterrestrial civilizations that guard us.

For example, I felt a kind of “symbiosis” between each piece that was added to the pyramid and its general assembly. Absolutely every detail of the stone blocks was in correlation with a certain cosmic element which facilitated the continuity of important energy flows towards the pyramid, always in relation to the respective star configuration.

I saw, for example, the exact moment when they cut a certain side of a stone block along a certain precise line with the image then focusing exactly on the embedding of that stone block on one of the edges of the pyramid which, for this purpose, we will call the direction of the line cut at an angle aimed at a star in the Orion Constellation. The image then immediately presented to me, in a separate quadrant in the upper right corner, the sector of the cosmos to which that star belonged to. The same construction principle involved complex geometrical arrangements of the stone blocks and the angles between them were correlated with astral movements and important cosmic configurations, all corresponding in detail to all the stones in the pyramidal ensemble. In their final form, the pyramids were perfectly polished, like very valuable pieces of art.

For contemporary science, such aspects that go beyond the strictly material framework mean nothing because the scientists do not understand their significance. In fact, this is the main reason why it has not yet come out of the “mechanical era” with the same somewhat primitive ideas of propulsion and energy being perpetuated. It is true, however, that there is also a very high-level world elite that has had and continues to have access to much extraterrestrial knowledge as well as complementary contacts. This elite has amazing technologies which it uses for its personal interest, even on an impressive scale, but I will not develop this topic here.

All of the three main pyramids on the Giza plateau near Cairo were erected at the same time, but the first works were those that targeted the Great Pyramid. Immediately after that, construction began for the other two pyramids. It was a monumental and far-reaching work which, as I said, lasted about twenty-four years. Further south and a little after the construction of three large pyramids, smaller ones were erected as well as some temples, but they were all part of the same general project. I was shown that they faithfully respected the correspondence with the stellar arrangement in the cosmos which was chosen to energetically influence this subtle architectural ensemble.

From what I was shown, I saw the construction phase of the Great Pyramid where the base and its corners had already been slightly raised. In the middle of the inside, I noticed a much larger activity. It was a special movement, an activity of another kind because it represented, in a way, the “beginning” of the pyramid; that is to say, its essential structure that was to give it “life” and make it effective.

If the stone blocks from the outside were simpler and somewhat similar, things were different inside, requiring a great deal of attention and a great refinement to make the construction extremely complicated. Those blocks were much different from the ones on the outside, although after they were assembled, they seemed to be simply rectangular. In fact, they had different shapes and very precise angles so that they fit into each other perfectly. Each stone block there was practically unique.

I then saw that, in some areas inside of the Great Pyramid, another kind of material was used, different from the stone taken from that great quarry. The consistency of those blocks was different. Some of them were black and glossy while others with red inserts were very polished, all of them cut at many different angles and with complex shapes. As a unique element, I noticed that beneath the King’s Chamber was placed a structure with a round shape with a circumferences of “rays” looking similar to a gear wheel. The piece was a very complex assembly. I felt that this mysterious form, like a star with many rays, whose presence is completely unknown to contemporary researchers, plays a very important role but one which I did not understand. No one imagines that there would be nothing more than massive blocks of stone a little below and between the King’s Chamber and the Queen’s Chamber in the Great Pyramid, but I was clearly shown that this is false and that both that area and many others in the Great Pyramid are actually full of tunnels, small rooms or even larger rooms.

THE FINAL ASPECT OF THE THREE GREAT PYRAMIDS

In their final phase of construction, the pyramids had perfectly smooth faces on the outside, being completely different from what we see today. They were dazzlingly shining in the sunlight, but as I immediately realized, that glow was favored not only by the shining of the white stone that covered the faces of the pyramids but also by a special substance that was applied over them.

The grandeur of the three pyramids could also be admired at night, being a perfect spectacle, as from another world. At first, only the Great Pyramid was illuminated, but in the images that followed, I saw all three pyramids spreading a fairy light, accompanied by the less intense light emanating from the other secondary constructions around the whole complex. The splendid images showed me the whole architectural complex from a certain height, the three pyramids being just like real "cosmic headlights". At the top of each pyramid, I saw a crystal, but the one on the Great Pyramid was huge, like an obelisk with the brightest light. Thus, contrary to scientific assumptions and "calculations", there was never an object of any other form except that huge crystal at the top of the Great Pyramid, and it fulfilled the function of a formidable cosmic relay, both for receiving and transmitting information.

I was then shown an image close to a face of the Great Pyramid and saw that its brightness was mainly due to a somewhat transparent and somewhat phosphorescent film which covered the entire pyramid. If I were to make a comparison, I would say that the substance resembled a kind of transparent "gel" which was shining brightly. It was not a diffused brightness, but it was something that reflected the light so when you looked at the pyramids, the general impression was that they were made of that substance. Even more so, its structure became somewhat translucent, leaving it to be seen what is inside. The stone blocks were not observed at all, but everything was perfectly polished and covered with that special substance. After several thousand years, however, as I could see in the pictures presented to me, the substance has lost its qualities and even started to disappear from certain areas of the pyramid. For example, around 5,200-4,800 B.C., as far as I could see, only the area at the top of the Great Pyramid kept traces of that amazing substance. The crystal, however, was still at the top of the building. Otherwise, the pyramid had become matte and, to my great surprise, it was buried about half in the sand. The other two smaller pyramids were even more covered with sand. We could also see that the faces of the pyramids were beginning to be "eaten" away by the passage of time and the weather as the stone blocks were being reinforced in many places on the outside. It had, however, been almost 6,000 years since its construction.

SECRET STRUCTURES AND RITUALS INSIDE THE GREAT PYRAMID

Intrigued by the fact that the pyramid was half buried in the sand, I wanted to see other elements related to that upsetting transformation. The images changed, showing me a view from a larger angle, and then, instead of the abundant vegetation and water that existed in the area at the time of the construction of that architectural complex, I saw the sandy desert that was everywhere. Climate change must have been terrible and quite rapid, but I understood telepathically that it was largely determined by a brief but rather intense war between certain extraterrestrial factions.

I was then shown “more recent” images of pharaonic palaces and temples built around the pyramidal complex with an obvious growth and evolution of the Egyptian population that abounded in that area. I was shown again the Great Pyramid buried in the sand, but the image somehow penetrated inside the pyramid, through its walls, so that I could simultaneously see both inside and outside. In its interior space, through the galleries and rooms that have not yet been discovered in the physical structure of the pyramid, I saw more human beings doing different jobs and even gaining access, in a way that I did not immediately understand, by moving some blocks of stone in the interior when entering certain hidden areas of the pyramid. Not surprisingly, as I insisted, the image changed, showing me three Egyptians who, after dressing and appearing in their attire, seemed to be of high rank, most likely priests.

They were in a rather large gallery but not in the Great Pyramid Gallery. I was not shown how they got there, but I saw how the older priest stopped at a certain time near a stone block. He was holding a support in his left palm upon which was a small sphere that shined with a bright yellow light. I saw how the priest then uttered a string of sounds with a special intonation of his voice, modulated and quite strong. I noticed that the sounds produced were “swallowed” by the structure of the pyramid rather than reverberating from the walls. As the priest issued those incantations, I realized that it was necessary to reach a certain frequency in order to trigger a certain process. After a few seconds and while he was still making those sounds, the other two lower-ranking priests lightly pushed a stone block from the floor level with their hands and then another one that was above the priest. Both stones then rotated easily at an angle of about forty-five degrees. The three priests then entered a rather large room.

The image then showed a dynamic and overall view of the pyramids in which we saw much of its structure which is not currently known. There are many other hidden rooms and corridors that are not even suspected by researchers; however, some of these have been identified recently by the improvement of a certain technology, but it is not enough as the data is still too elusive.*

[FOOTNOTE: * The author probably refers to the discovery made in 2015 by the ScanPyramids team made up of an international group of researchers. The team identified a large empty space in the Great Pyramid by the x-ray method, but behind that empty space, one does not know for sure what it might be (a room, several rooms or a gallery) and what is inside it. Even this discovery, however, is called into question by some Egyptologists such as Dr. David Lightbody.]

From what was presented to me, however, I can say that things do not appear as scientists think. For example, all of these numerous rooms, galleries and spaces that are in the pyramid did not have the main purpose of storing things; although, in some of them, as we saw in that extraordinary overview of the internal structure of the Great Pyramid, there are objects, some of them even amazing, but other spaces are empty.

Certain priests and initiates therefore had access to some “keys” to enter the secret spaces of the Great Pyramid. This also happened when we saw many beings inside the pyramid who were mostly workers. By telepathic transmission, I understood that these people were engaged in actions to repair and maintain the pyramid, probably due to the damage recorded after the war. In parallel, I could see vast work outside to release the pyramid from the burden of the sand that surrounded it. Indeed — this work was done by the native Egyptians, probably at the order of the pharaoh of that period who knew very well that the pyramids represented the legacy of the “gods” and that they had to be treated with the utmost respect.

From the images, however, as a subtle transmission, I felt that these magnificent constructions no longer transmitted the same kind of information and energy as they did in the first phases after their construction; that is, at a time when they had a colossal and profoundly transformative effect. It was as if a kind of “wave of forgetfulness” had seized the minds of people who saw the pyramids only as physical objects, extraordinary in their grandeur, but appreciating them only at this limited level of understanding. Somehow, they had lost over time the ability to understand what the pyramids truly represented and were no longer feeling their subtle extraordinary energetic influence. There had been a “hardening” of their energetic structure and level of consciousness which no longer allowed them to understand the occult elements and higher learning so as to achieve a “resonance bridge” with the energy of the pyramids on the plateau. Therefore, only the priests and the initiated retained some of the true knowledge, but even among them, the terrible seals of oblivion had begun to manifest.

CHAPTER FOURTEEN — THE ETERNAL ENIGMA

The famous Egyptian edifice is a sensitive topic because, for contemporary archeologists, Egyptologists and scientists, its mystery seems to be even deeper than that of the great pyramids. Generally speaking, the sphinx in Egypt is believed to be older than the pyramids, and this is true. Even the fact that it was not always as we see it today is true. What is not known, however, is its history, and as I was convinced by following the synthetic images on the holographic screen, this lack of information is due to its very old age which make even the oldest references that can have once existed to be eroded by the patina of time. If, as far as the three great pyramids in Egypt are concerned, a few mentions of it or various stories have been lost, nothing is known about the Sphinx except what was intended to be invented.

From the beginning, I must specify an important fact: the place where the Sphinx is currently located, that is on the same plateau in Giza near Cairo where the three great pyramids were built, does not, in fact, represent its “native place”. This fact was revealed to me as soon as I formulated the wish to know the elements related to the origin of the Sphinx in Egypt. I expected to see, as in the case of the three pyramids, a chronological progression of the stages of its construction on the same plateau. Instead, the images suddenly changed, showing the northern part of the country in the area of the Nile’s delta.

THE OLD METROPOLIS OF HELANAS

I saw that, at that time, the northern territory of Egypt was constituted of an “alliance zone” of the different races of E-N-L and extraterrestrial beings and soon became one of the first and most powerful outbreaks of culture and spirituality for the population of those very distant times. That area had its center in a port city built around the mouth of the Nile on the Mediterranean Sea. The images showed me two huge lions on the banks of the river where it entered into the sea. Carved in stone, the lions were in a position identical to that of the Sphinx that still stands next to the Great Pyramid. I looked closely at those images and noticed that the two huge sculptures were identical in body with the current Sphinx on the Giza plateau, but their heads were that of lions. By telepathic transmission, I already knew that those big statues were going to be related to the area of the later pyramids.

As for the city in the north of Egypt, where the two immense lions were, this was already during its full creative bloom through 23,000 B.C. It was most likely much older, but I did not go any deeper. It is possible, however, that its origins can be traced back to 32,000-30,000 B.C. The name of the city appeared in my mind as Helanas, Halanas, or Helios. Practically speaking, it was more than just a city. It was a real metropolis, a city as a state, comprising both crowded and rarer areas on the outskirts.

Its distinguishing sign was the two gigantic lions from the entrance of the Nile to the Mediterranean Sea. At that time, the Nile Delta was practically nothing and in an incipient form of what we know today. Also, the Mediterranean Sea was smaller than it is now; and there was no connection between it and the Black Sea through the Bosphorus and Dardanelles straits. The configuration of the Earth was a little different then because the soil was higher in altitude.

I immediately realized that Helios (or Helanas) was a city built and populated largely by E-N-L beings because its inhabitants were tall, three to four meters high, and some even more. I also noticed some higher E-N-K beings, but they were much smaller, about two meters high or even less, as well as humanoid extraterrestrial beings, some of them wearing some kind of special costume. I admired the nature of the activity and movement of the beings in that city, the magnificent constructions, and a kind of surrealistic brilliance coming from the multitude of surfaces plated with gold or even objects of massive gold which could be seen everywhere in the city. Especially conspicuous were statues, roofs, columns or fountains, all of pure gold and which shined very brightly in the light of the sun's rays. It was all fascinating.

In the middle of that city was a large and artistically carved stone market. I saw, in fact, several such markets at different points of the huge city and also on its outskirts which stretched far to the south, to what is today the Sahara Desert. The entire settlement, immense indeed, resembled a confederation because, in the images presented to me, I could identify several smaller cities or states linked together by numerous paths and roads, admirably constructed. Those cities were separated by areas with rich and even lush vegetation. There was therefore a lively and complex communication between all of those regions which, as a whole, formed a kind of state, even larger than a metropolis of today.

In the middle of the central market in Helanas was a very tall obelisk, measuring probably 70-80 meters. At its peak, I saw a sphere of the same gold, the diameter of which I estimated as about five meters. The obelisk had a round circumference and was perfectly smooth. As I have seen telepathically, the sphere at the top was a product of extraterrestrial technology and uninterrupted light, like a true sun, even at night. It was amazing, and I could even say magnificent. The entire building resembled an ocean lighthouse, but the light was several hundred times stronger. Paradoxically, however, it did not hurt one's eyes; being warm and penetrating the darkness of the night up to tens of miles away. Its intensity was formidable, and if I were to make a comparison, I do not find anything today in the entire world that is similar or that even comes close to the power and qualities of that light. I also understood that it had healing properties, helping beings to regenerate better during the night.

I also saw that when Atlantis sank, Helanas was almost in ruin because, in the last thousands of years and before the final cataclysm of the Atlantean continent, almost all E-N-L beings were no longer reincarnated when they died but continued pure and simple existences in the etheric plane without any discontinuity of consciousness. It was a gradual sunset of that flourishing civilization, also accompanied by the rigors of nature, for the area was deserted and the sand had begun to invade even the great central city of Helanas. The vegetation, however, was still quite rich at that time.

The E-N-L gene information had reached the end point of its existence in the physical plane, and according to the law of evolution, that branch was beginning to resorb into the higher dimension of the etheric plane. So, as we have seen in the pictures, after the destruction of Atlantis, the metropolis that was Helanas was already largely submerged in the sand, and another part was under the waters of the Mediterranean which had invaded it because the sea level had risen.

Being intrigued by these aspects, I was shown in a brief visual synthesis that there are several areas on the globe where real metropolises and megalithic cities are currently under water due to the configuration of the land having changed a lot. An example is Japan. In the extension of its coasts, there are amazing cities, and what is left on the bottom of the ocean is also covered with sand. In addition, Japan was not always the island we know today, but before Atlantis sank, it was linked to the continent and extended far offshore as a part of the continent.

The same happened with the great metropolis of Helanas in northern Egypt which was covered by the vegetation of those times, and to a certain extent by sand, but especially by the waters of the Mediterranean which had swallowed up much of it. At the time of the construction of the architectural complex on the Giza plateau, the fate of that region was already sealed. In a few pictures, I was at one point shown a delegation of three Sirian beings who were inspecting with a ship, flying low but hardly visible below by reason of the splendor of that extraordinary metropolis. The ruins were covered almost entirely with vegetation and vines, much like some pyramids or temples recently discovered in the Amazon jungle. One of the two gigantic lions, the one on the left bank of the Nile, had disappeared under sand and water, and the other was on an incline with water rising to a level above the chest.

RELOCATION OF ONE OF THE STATUES TO THE GIZA PLATEAU

I was then suddenly shown pictures with the Sphinx on the Giza plateau which had been placed in the position we know today. It was actually one of the two large statues of Helanas, the other one having not yet been discovered beneath water and sand. I concluded that it was simply taken from Helanas and transported by air to the plateau where it is now. Probably, however, they decided not to let the last trace of the big city that was Helanas disappear, and that is why they decided to complete the architectural ensemble at Giza, thus giving a precise connotation to the place. For, if we interpret things from another angle, the specificity of the plateau with pyramid-shaped constructions, it has no meaningful connection with the presence of the Sphinx. It was, however, an important symbolic justification which I will discuss below. There are two notable aspects of the Egyptian Sphinx, both disturbing to the reader. The first refers to the fact that when the Sphinx was brought to the Giza plateau near the pyramids, it was, in fact, a huge lion with the carved head of a lion with a specific mane. What we see today in place of the lion's head was a change made much later because the stone sculpture was severely damaged at this level, following the fierce war I mentioned.

The fact that only one of the two lions sculpted in Helanas was brought there signified the emergence of a new spiritual center that was born in Egypt. When the two immense lions were placed on both sides of the Nile, in the old Helanas, they were there to express the adoration of the Sun, the light, the leadership and sovereignty. A single lion brought into the architectural ensemble from Giza, however, represented the idea of a center. In any case, it was clear to me that neither the Atlanteans nor the other beings from the extraterrestrial civilizations that helped to build the pyramids in Egypt did not set out to restore Helanas but only to establish a new center of culture, science and spirituality on the Giza plateau area that was adapted to the E-N-K beings and to the new global situation after the great cataclysm of Atlantis.

The second aspect also shakes up the current ideas about the Sphinx. It is known that it is actually older than the three pyramids, thus corresponding to the truth because it was built in Helanas, and its age would rise to at least 25,000 years. Bringing it to the Giza plateau after the pyramids were built, however, makes it "younger" than they are.

Beyond the special "destiny" of the Sphinx in Egypt, however, remains its metaphysical spirit, its unfathomable mystery and its ancestral beauty which has unambiguously crossed the millennia in a sovereign silence.

EGYPT, AFTER ATLANTIS

The ruins of the great metropolis Helanas are very well preserved and now under sand. Egypt could now, once and for all, cut the so-called “unknowns” about the true history of the pyramids and the Sphinx or those about the identity of the “gods” of Antiquity, thus revealing these vast and exceptional ruins. This, however, requires political will and not only that. I understand these aspects very well as they are especially valid for the Bucegi complex.

On the other hand, the E-N-K beings were not capable of sustaining the greatness of that city, either physically — because its dimensions corresponded to the E-N-L beings which were noticeably higher — nor spiritually because their level of consciousness was not very high. The memory of a special spiritual place, however, remained in that part of Egypt so that, after the Atlantean sinking, some of the Atlantean sages retreated to Egypt, and helped by several extraterrestrial civilizations, built the pyramids on the Giza plateau but also others, further south. Some smaller ones are also hidden under the desert sand along with other suburbs of the Helanas metropolis.

As I said at the beginning, the presence of Atlanteans and extraterrestrial beings among the almost primitive E-N-K beings who “inherited” the territories of today’s Egypt was physical and constant for a period of time. This was necessary in order for the science shared with those beings to take a solid foundation and create firm roots to form certain stronger and more evolved individuals in the E-N-K population. The idea was that they would then spread those teachings to as many as possible. Thus, the E-N-K beings helped their genetic branch to grow and refine more and more.

Over time, however, extraterrestrial beings began to withdraw. As a result, direct contacts with the E-N-K population became rarer as the E-N-K gene was strengthened and full respect for its free will was an absolute necessity for these beings to manage their own existence and destiny. Later, the withdrawal of extraterrestrial and E-N-L beings from the lives of the inhabitants of Egypt at that time continued until they finally no longer appeared physically or directly among the people.

Instead, communication with them was maintained through pyramids which played the role of intermediaries between the world of humans and the world of “gods”, that is, highly advanced technologically and spiritually extraterrestrial beings who laid the foundations of their ancient culture. For example, the initiated Egyptians used some pyramid chambers to easily perform the “conscious astral projection” which allowed them to move to the planets where their “gods” lived. The guidance came from the specific vibrational frequency of the pyramid, as designed by the “gods”.

HIDDEN INITIATIONS INSIDE THE PYRAMIDS

I saw in a few pictures how initiations were carried out in the King’s Chamber of the Great Pyramid. The sarcophagus was filled about three quarters with a semitransparent and viscous light blue liquid in which usually the High Priest would be immersed while naked, save for only a scarf around the hips. The sarcophagus, however, was also used for the same purpose by all who received the initiation for the journey to the “gods” and not just by the High Priest.

The body did not sink into the liquid but remained floating on the surface of it. Although I did not quite understand it, I think that the liquid was meant to facilitate “astralization” of the being or perhaps it was meant to cause certain biochemical transformations in the body that were necessary for the conscious detachment of the astral body from the physical one. It is certain that the human being in the sarcophagus was entering a trance state quite quickly. Other priests were standing around the sarcophagus reciting certain incantations. These “incantations” were not common liturgies, but they often played a decisive role, as far as I could tell, in the process of initiation for the initiate and their travel in the subtle planes.

The images also showed me the etheric reality, and I could see that, after the body was immersed in liquid and the ritual began, tall silhouettes of extraterrestrial beings appeared through the stone blocks that made up the walls of the room. They were translucent and imposing with some carrying a scepter. They were situated behind the priests who officiated during the incantations, and in my opinion, they were supervising and helping to properly conduct the ritual, providing the necessary subtle protection.

THE SHORT-TERM WAR AND THE REORGANIZATION OF THE GALACTIC ALLIANCE

The images then jumped pretty quickly to another historical reality which was, from what I calculated, about 4,800 B.C. I saw that among some of the civilizations that had supported that process of transmitting the legacy of ancient scientific and spiritual knowledge, all of which had helped to form strong centers of spirituality on Earth, certain dissensions began to emerge. These turned into a powerful war, but that did not last long. People were also involved, and the end result led to a reorganization of the Alliance so that many of the initiative centers on the planet came under the tutelage of civilizations other than those from the beginning. It also involved changing customs, the names of deities and even knowledge. There were also some “mutations” in the religions of the people.

In principle, and as far as I could tell, the reason for the conflict, which this time was less intense than the one of 100,000 years ago, had the same root: the negative influence of the evil reptilians. The problem was that some of the extraterrestrial “gods” of antiquity lived in areas of the galaxy that had begun to be “shadowed” by the evil presence and influence of evil reptilians. It was therefore difficult and even dangerous to tolerate such a negative infusion of conception and even genetic modification into the DNA of humans if the pantheon of the Egyptian gods remained unchanged. This aspect was quite delicate as all human civilizations that pervaded over time, especially after 30,000 B.C., were endorsed by those extraterrestrial “gods” who contributed to the formation of spiritual centers on the planet, the construction of the pyramids, and other buildings serving a priestly purpose.

Due to the reptilian influences that slowly propagated even among some of the rather advanced extraterrestrial civilizations, the Galactic Alliance was forced to change its pantheon several thousand years ago, some “gods” being replaced by others from other civilizations of the Alliance. This change, however, was not to the liking of some E-N-K beings who wished to remain faithful to the old “gods”; thus, tensions began to emerge between human populations which later expanded between certain alien civilizations in the Alliance.

With these changes in the Egyptian pantheon, certain totemic tendencies were amplified which made the representations of the new “gods” to usually be a combination of the human body with the head of an animal. For example, the pharaohs of ancient Egypt or the important persons in the administrative management were depicted with the mask of a dog (jackal) or ibis on the head, while some female deities had a cow’s head. Controversies of interpretation thus arose, suggesting the possibility of the corruption of these civilizations by the malefic reptilians, and therefore, their hybridization with reptilian DNA.

ANUBIS AND OTHER TOTEMIC HEADS

I had to view the images several times to understand why they wanted to “explain” all this to me because the subject was quite abstract. Some modern authors have rushed to the conclusion that those masks with animal heads, with which the gods and sometimes even the pharaohs were represented, did not necessarily represent symbolic aspects but were used to hide certain reptilian traits. But, if that were the case, why did not the “gods” of that extraterrestrial civilization appear as having those features before the time of Ancient Egypt? I have seen pictures of them over a period of 400,000 years and have not noticed such “anomalies” even once. If that were true, it means that the Sirian Tenekau himself, who came from the Orion constellation and can, from a certain point of view, be called the “Father of Mankind” should also be regarded as having reptilian features. I noticed, however, that he was a human being with high moral qualities who was noble, wise and good and contributed his own DNA to the first hybridizations of human DNA.

On the other hand, the vast majority of Egyptians at that time were made up of E-N-K beings who came from the direct line of large primates and still had a strong animal influence in their DNA. As a result, they needed to show special respect, stemming from their admiration for the animal kingdom. As a personal opinion, I could say that this was the origin of most of the animal sacrifices; that is, this gift was offered to the being who “shaped them” because each pharaoh associated the origin of the domestic animals with his image. In a way, this assumption can be true because the domestication of many animals took place concurrently with the period when the pharaohs came to power and supported that phenomenon.

Later, when human DNA (E-N-K) evolved, it was necessary for man to gradually reject these totemic associations because he had became too dependent on the animal kingdom without being able to detach from the energies of the Earth. An eloquent example is that of Moses with the Jewish people who, during the Exodus, rejected the association with the animal kingdom that was characterized by praying to idols and went on to a more abstract understanding of Yahweh, meaning, he wanted to make a particular qualitative leap. Here, however, things are more complicated, but I will not insist in this direction.

After the great cataclysm and disappearance of Atlantis, each “god” or extraterrestrial being who sustained spirituality in Ancient Egypt represented a constellation. They were Sirius beings who came from both the Sirius system, meaning from the Big Dog constellation, and also from the systems associated with some stars from the Orion constellation. The teachings they offered were in agreement with the specific energy of that period that was necessary to give the human gene a certain ability to resonate with those subtle forces. Therefore, each “god” was associated with a form that represented the symbol of the area from which he or she came, or in other words, that specific “sign”.

Due to the totemic and animistic character of the belief that “folk people” had at that time, these representations were meant to provoke a certain emotion in those who saw those animal heads, those associations being necessary for the human being to understand what that “god” signified. With the passage of time, however, they no longer tried to make the association between the symbol and the deity, but they united the symbol with the respective “god” or “goddess” itself, thus resulting in the rendering of the human body with the head of cow, a lion, or a dog, etc.

Generally speaking, the human being is accustomed to associate various symbols directly with certain human beings, and in the case of Ancient Egypt, this was done with the “gods” and pharaohs of those times. From here, it was only a step until the representations of this nature were put on frescoes, cartouches or pictograms. When, for example, a pharaoh was known after his reign or even during his reign to have been “like a lion” because of his strong personality, the best representation of this idea was for that pharaoh to have a lion's head. The examples are numerous and continue.

The problem that arose with the passage of time was that these associations began to become entangled with the connotation of symbols being altered or simply "borrowed" for occult purposes. An example of this is the symbol of the "Eye of Horus" currently used by the Illuminati in the most diverse situations but having a corrupt meaning.

This is how the ancient Egyptians gradually forgot the true meanings of the symbols associated with their "gods" or, better yet, surrounding them with so many multiple meanings and characteristics and transferring them from one to the other so that they reached the point where they no longer knew what the truth was. Faith, lacking a viable support, began to crumble, and Egyptian spirituality declined in a short time.

This is exactly what is happening nowadays with a society that is almost completely distanced from deep moral and ethical principles and values but rather only mimics fairness and decency which, in reality, is only a screen for the manipulations behind it by very powerful and dangerous occult groups and organizations. Their main purpose is the total destruction of any spiritual support within the being because, so disheveled and inconsistent, it tends to dismantle without having any force of reaction or opposition.

Unfortunately, this plan has given worrisome results so far as humanity seems to have "lost its compass". As will be seen, however, the spiritual revival is close, but in order for it to happen faster, it is necessary to become truly aware of the current situation.

CHAPTER FIFTEEN — TROY AND THE RETREAT OF THE MAYANS

Closer to our times and to contemporary history, there are some landmark historical moments that need to be considered, especially due to the mystery surrounding them and the lack of authentic sources of information. I focused on Troy, an enigmatic painting in the memory of Mankind of which there are no other references than those in Homer's Iliad. After viewing the images on the holographic screen, I developed the topic in a very interesting discussion I had with Cezar a few weeks later.

THE CITY OF TROY

The first images I saw about the existence of the great city of Troy was when I was shown the “descent” of the Hyperborean civilization. A branch of it had descended to the south and reached the northwestern coast of today’s Turkey. The spread to that area, however, was not dictated by geographical needs but rather by the existence of a large inter-dimensional portal, one of the few that remained at that time on Earth. As I was shown, the city — which later became known as “the fortress” — was built around that space-time discontinuity which allowed for the connection with the elevated areas of the etheric plane and especially with Shambhala.

I was very impressed by that presentation and that is why, in one of the conversations I later had with Cezar, I brought up this topic which I confess that I had not yet fully understood. There were indeed several strangers.

The descendants of the Hyperboreans who founded Troy, even if they were only pale reflections of what once was the Hyperborean civilization, still possessed enough secrets and even occult methods to resist enduring attacks from other peoples.

Even so, it would have been no problem for the two malefic alien civilizations who had some control in today's southern Europe to immediately shave off any trace of the city, including its inhabitants, from the surface of the Earth by using the advanced weapons of mass destruction that they had. Such an "intervention", however, could not be done so easily thanks to the supervision by the Alliance, and this was confirmed by Cezar. What I did not understand, in fact, was what was at stake with the fortress. In other words, why did the ancient world focus so much on that area?

Cezar explained to me that, even if evil was allowed to manifest and be spread amongst Mankind, that action still had its own "economy", a sensitivity related to the formation of humanity passing certain tests to allow for the manifesting of free will. Troy was sought out in antiquity because it was located at one of the "edges" between the physical and the etheric plane; that is, in the area of a large and powerful "energetic vein", an important place that allowed easy passage from the physical plane into the etheric plane.

THE TRUE STORY OF THE TROJAN WAR

When Cezar went on to the next point, his explanations became more nuanced:

"Troy was practically the last city in Europe to maintain a strong bond with the subtle etheric plane," he told me. "It was the last city where one could enter the subtle ethereal plane naturally and widely. With the defeat suffered during the war with the Greeks, the city suddenly 'broke' from the physical plane, and then the reality on the surface of the Earth was 'mortified' somehow because it had eliminated even the last redoubt of what was still superior, pure, and good. At that point, the last clear trace of the Hyperborean civilization probably then disappeared.”

I asked if the war had anything to do with that delicate aspect.

“The ‘crossing area’ in the etheric plane that was inside the fortress was the main aim of the Trojan war. It was, in fact, occult forces that suggested and directed it, using human beings as vehicles to achieve that massive ‘energy break’. This fall threw humanity into a darkness even deeper than it was before as result of what had been generated by the destruction of Atlantis.”

“And what happened to the city afterwards?”

“It resurfaced in the etheric plane, and the city as such cannot be found in the physical plane. What Schliemann* discovered, however, is only a small area of his own, one that had a resonance closer to the physical plane. However, it does not represent the “City of Troy” such as archeologists have been quick to announce.”

[FOOTNOTE: * Cezar refers here to Heinrich Schliemann, credited for the so-called discovery of the city of Troy in 1870 in the area of Hisarlık village in northwestern Turkey today.]

I now understood the mystery that surrounded that mythical fortress, as well as the long war that was waged for its conquest.

“From Troy, it was very easy to go into the etheric plane in the subtle dimension,” Cezar told me. “I do want you to understand, however, that this passage was not admissible to all. The city was perfectly circular and surrounded the central point where the distortion was, the source through which one could penetrate into the etheric plane corresponding to that area of the city of Troy, with only a few having access to the higher dimension.

NUCLEUS OF THE MAYAN CIVILIZATION

“It seems that those closer to us in antiquity knew that not everyone could enter these subtle worlds nor could they do it in any manner they chose,” I said. “Obviously, and Troy is not the only example. The Mayans are even more representative in this regard because almost no trace of human activity or cities could be found behind them. They simply ‘disappeared’ without being identified in any area. I refer to the core of the original Mayan civilization from the past, from which the Aztec and Inca lines extended, but the ‘seeds’ of that very special civilization which were Mayans remained in the form of a small number of priests and sages, as well as their descendants that settled in an area of the Yucatan, near the ocean coast. Some of the families, however, wandered throughout various areas of the former Incan empire. The collapse of that nucleus, which did not exceed one hundred thousand members, favored the almost unaltered preservation of the ancient and original knowledge and tradition of the Mayan civilization, strengthening their determination to evolve. For the most part, they did not even interact with the Incas who were still there. Even though they also had a considerable degree of knowledge and development, they still lost the power of the original gene. As an example, the ‘mythical’ city of El Dorado or the Golden City of the Incas was foreign to them. The Incas knew the tradition, but they had forgotten how to get to that settlement that their heritage told them about. The less the Spaniards found, the more desperately they looked for it. Such cities were never discovered by conquerors, and the reason is the same as for the city of Troy: they were cities that were not necessarily part of the physical world but more of the subtle world of etheric frequencies. At one point, they completely resurfaced in that dimension of existence and simply disappeared from the physical world. Some of the Incan priests and initiates, however, knew about the reality of the ‘Golden City’ and a very small part even had access to it by passing through an inter-dimensional portal. The Mayan sages from the remnant nucleus of the ancient civilization had unrestricted access because they possessed that special knowledge and had the necessary vibrational level, manifested in a few specific genes and most likely inherited from the E-N-L. ”

Cezar’s explanations were very clear and succinct, and even though I had not explored that part of the world or the civilizations that had inhabited it until then, what I had learned here was not entirely unknown to me. My recent experience in Utklaha*, the city within the Earth, had been uplifting and many of the inhabitants of that city in the subtle etheric plane were actually forerunners of the ancient Mayans. I took the opportunity to find out more, and that is why I asked Cezar to clarify the mystery of the Mayan civilization, a culture which I knew could not be deciphered by today's archeologists or scientists.

[FOOTNOTE: * Utklaha is a city within the Inner Earth mentioned in Inside the Earth — The Second Tunnel.]

“VIBRATIONAL JUMP” IN THE ETHERIC PLANE

“The great problem of the Mayans was symbolized by the Spanish conquerors,” said Cezar. “Their invasion meant the disaster of the Mayan civilization from the physical plane, but at the same time, in a certain way, this ‘forced’ its passage to a higher plane.”

Seeing that I was looking at him questioningly, he went on to explain.

“The Mayans were a people with an old culture with exceptional knowledge. To them, the ‘break’ between the physical plane and the subtle planes, at least conceptually speaking, almost did not exist. After the Spanish invasion, their priests quickly realized that the only viable alternative to the threat of extermination was a massive exodus of the Mayan population from the physical to the etheric. In other words, to make a vibrational leap in their existence. Such actions are quite rare in history and only occur in exceptional cases, when the situation cannot be resolved otherwise.”

I asked how it was possible for an entire people to move from one plane to another. Cezar said that really was a thorny problem, but for the most part, they succeeded.

“Mayan priests knew very well the area of passage into the etheric plane that was in one of their jungle towns. The Mayans understood the importance of the communion between man and Nature, and that is why their cities coexisted extensively with the surrounding vegetation. The only problem was that other authentic Mayan groups had migrated and had to be gathered from other areas of the Inca empire in order to achieve that transition between planes. In this way, they could escape the madness of the Spaniards and their desire to kill them.”

I realized then that the drama of that period in which a somewhat primitive civilization, through knowledge and attitudes but strong at the military level — and here I refer to the Spaniards — threatened to exterminate another civilization that was noble and elevated: the Mayans. Neither the Aztecs nor the Incas were able to cope with the ferocity, disease and firearms of the Spaniards. They were conquered, as is well known, but as far as the core of the ancient Mayans was concerned, that could not be achieved.

Cezar told me that there was a “general call” so that the Mayan population who were scattered throughout the Incan empire began to “run” to the special crossing place where there was a large portal, that is, a space-time discontinuity known to Mayan priests and sages. That area was defended for about two months by a large number of Mayan soldiers who created a corridor of protection for the civilian population coming from different areas of the empire to avoid possible attacks by the Spaniards.

“On the other hand, the robbery of the conquerors was not a war or a continuous battle, and it did not take place in one place,” Cezar continued to explain. “There was no real fight but rather a messy robbery. Attacks by the Spaniards were mostly spontaneous when they simply seized a village or a city in the jungle. On the other hand, the Mayan soldiers had a precise mission to counter such attacks in order to ensure the escape route of the civilian population to the area between the planes.”

“Have you personally seen all this?” I asked.

Cezar nodded his head affirmatively, assuring me that this was one of the most amazing moments in history, both through its drama and the mystery surrounding it.

“It was more like the war with the Americans in Vietnam. It was not at all clear to the Spaniards how much they had conquered, and not just from the Incan empire, but also in the area of the Yucatan peninsula where the core of the Mayan sages remained. This is because, near the great passageway, the physical plane often blends into the etheric plane so that the phenomenon of ‘psychological blindness’ is in full force. The wise men of the ancient Mayans had the power to manipulate the surrounding reality through their specific invocations and occult methods. You could meet a group of twenty conquerors, and a little further on there would be a Mayan village where normal activity went on without the Spaniards having any idea of its existence, even if they passed it by. They simply did not see that village because, as far as they could see, there was only the jungle in that area. Such strange phenomena, which was often repeated, seemed quite confusing to the conquerors; but in the end, their increasing number would have led to the extermination of the Mayans had they not taken the radical decision to leave the physical plane and move to the etheric plane where they could safely continue their existence. In fact, this moment had been predicted many hundreds of years before by the Mayan priests.”

THE GREAT “TRANSITION” OF THE MAYANS

Cezar said, however, that the transition to the etheric plane could not be done under just any conditions. There were only certain areas and only certain periods when the transition from the physical to the etheric plane could take place. I then asked him why, if this secret data were still known, did not all of the population pass? It seems that a certain part of the Mayan population, about one fifth of the total “pure gene” group, did not want to go into the etheric plane, preferring to remain in the physical dimension. For the most part, it was based on the law of affinity, that is, vibrational frequency, that did not allow a certain category of people to go through that passage.

“The first ones who passed into the etheric plane were those who met the resonant conditions of the frequencies because some of the Mayans were not prepared from this point of view, even if they wanted to cross the portal. I saw, however, that many of them were helped by the shaman priests who stood near the “gateway” and supported them in this process through the powers they held by temporarily raising their individual vibrational frequency so that they could cross into the etheric plane. Once they reached beyond, those beings were able to maintain that vibrational frequency, thus managing to remain in the new plane of existence.

I became very curious to know what that big “portal” looked like from the perspective of the physical plane. In the images that had been shown to me on the holographic screen of the Apellos, the “contact” points between the physical and the etheric dimensions usually appeared as a surface that is slightly blurred, slightly foggy, or completely invisible in most cases. Then, it was indicated in the hologram by certain symbols and a bright red point where the discontinuity between the planes was. I wanted to know, however, based upon what Cezar told me, about that Mayan passage in the etheric plane that seemed to cover a larger area.

"I was watching closely what was going on there and seeing the events," he told me. "I clearly realized exactly where the crossing was made; but nevertheless, I could not see any distortion in that boundary area. There was apparently no discontinuity of space. I could not see anything that could have hinted that there could be an ethereal plane. Instead, I noticed that as the Mayans approached that area to cross it, something seemed to happen in their being because each one of them was shaking with a fine tremor. I was interested in the phenomenon, so I focused on the beings that crossed the area of spatial discontinuity."

I knew all too well that all of the high-tech extraterrestrial devices that facilitate the investigation of space and time have the particularity of offering the ability to feel everything that is being researched in the context of time and space, if desired. In other words, you live what you see, as if you were right there in the space-time zone you are researching. I could say that feeling is more refined and nuanced than even one's normal feeling, offering an extra sensation, intuition and perception. It is as if all the senses are sharpened and the field of perceptions widens. So, I understood Cezar's story too well because I myself had the same experience many times. In some cases, it can be traumatic; but fortunately, I learned that I had the opportunity to "adjust" it by manifesting my will or even suppressing it altogether, in which case only visual information remained. I was thinking though about whether that was a similar experience or not to the ones I myself had lived through in the Second Tunnel or on the way to the "inland" in Argentina. Accordingly, I asked Cezar if it was different from our experience inside the Earth.

"No. Basically it was an identical phenomenon, but I wanted to convince myself that the portal connected the physical plane with the etheric plane. You can't get it wrong in this regard, once you feel that vibration. I felt that, before passing, those whose level of consciousness was high enough perceived the city and the jungle from which they came, but at one moment, they saw how a much larger and more developed city was beginning to spread in front of them in which the jungle vegetation no longer existed. Those who did not have the ability to move into the etheric plane were still observing their old city in the jungle, but they were confident because they knew that there was something else beyond in the subtle dimension. When they reached the priests who were guarding the invisible gate of passage into the etheric plane, the priests helped them, raising the vibrational frequency of their consciousness for a short time but as much as was necessary for them to see the city from the etheric plane and pass through and beyond.

“But the priests — what were they doing?”

“They stood from place to place, on a certain path towards the gateway, creating a kind of ‘subtle tunnel’ of initiation. Those who had the native ability to cross entered a certain specific state of consciousness as they approached the gate. Others were hesitant, and some even tended to turn back.”

So it is that the “great Mayan passage” into the etheric plane was not a great “migration” nor travel by cart or ship to another area of South America, as scientists suppose, but it simply signified a retreat to another part of their city but one that was ethereal. Cezar told me that, after the access through the gateway was closed, the etheric plane into which the Mayans had passed through the portal was strictly delimited by the physical plane. They continued their life there but at higher energy parameters because the vibrational frequency of the etheric plane is higher than that which is specific to the physical plane.

CHAPTER SIXTEEN — THE ANUNNAKI: A DELICATE PROBLEM

In universities, the existence of extraterrestrial beings and of highly advanced civilizations has always been a kind of “Pepelea’s nail”* for today’s humanity. Due to poor education and manipulation through the media, most people are doubtful and skeptical when it comes to this topic. For many of them, the benevolent presentation of the aliens “sounds too good and too beautiful” to be true. It is thus considered that they should also have some shortcomings, including a desire for hybridization due to their desire to be perceived as being closer to the present human condition. In some cases, they are even viewed as a source of threat to our civilization.

[FOOTNOTE: *Pepelea’s (pronounced Peh-Peh-leah) nail is a Romanian folk tale of a poor man who had inherited a beautiful house. When a rich man wanted to buy it, Pepelea sold it upon only one condition: that Pepelea would retain ownership of a nail on the wall of the living room upon which he could hang whatever he wanted. When the rich man was having guests or otherwise enjoying the house, Pepelea would drop by and hang a dirty old garment. Eventually, the rich man got so exasperated and disgusted that he returned the house to Pepelea for free.]

A STRANGE INVESTMENT OF VALUES

Such a vision may in fact reflect the distrust of human beings in their own enormous potential. Watching closely everything that was presented to me in the holographic images of humanity's past, I can say with all conviction that the Earth was and is blessed by great protection and great care from advanced extraterrestrial civilizations in our galaxy. Most people consider that the fraternal state and attitude of our wonderful friends in the cosmos is a subject for science fiction and that the holographic network of extraterrestrial connections in the galaxy which have been shown to me are, in fact, the product of a mind full of overflowing imagination.

There is, however, a category of human beings who are genuinely interested in these subjects and who want to know the truth. Unfortunately and sometimes unintentionally, such subjects are either hidden or misrepresented. A good example of this are people's perception of the race of extraterrestrial beings known as the Anunnaki.

This name has triggered many bizarre ideas but especially erroneous beliefs which are based both on false or incomplete information as well as a certain superficiality in dealing with the subject. Many books have already been written in which the Anunnaki are blamed for all of the evils of the Earth, but most often, they are associated with extraterrestrial beings with reptilian traits. The fundamental error, which is based upon incorrect information and conclusions, is the correlation of the evil reptilian beings with the Sirian beings known as the Anunnaki. This is even more strange, given that the Sirians are the ones who initiated and supported, in direct collaboration with the plans of the subtle celestial entities who serve as governors of the galaxy, the process of birth and evolution of human beings on Earth.

Such a reversal of values has also been encountered in other times and circumstances, but in this case, it is amazing that the enthusiasm of some authors, who only imagine that they know the truth, in reality, are in grievous error. The pressure on this subject is very high because it has been "targeted" repeatedly in very negative parameters which makes it more challenging to return to the true knowledge and the real values, both of which have been lost. I will, however, on the one hand, specify some of these elements based upon what images I could see from prehistoric times to those of modern history; and on the other hand, based upon the heartfelt explanations I got from the man from Apellos in response to some confusion I expressed. As I said, the Sirians are at the root of the birth and formation of the human civilization, and they are also at the root of human DNA, supporting its evolution for ages and helping humanity in the key points of its development, both from the spiritual point of view as well as the material. I myself have seen many aspects of the history of Earth and of humanity, and some of the more important ones I have described in this book. In some cases, when it was needed, the Sirians even influenced the course of history so that the evolution of the human being could take place in the best conditions. At one point, the man from Apellos told me that from their original basic branch, which is in the Sirius A system, secondary branches have appeared over time in different areas of the galaxy, but the Sirians in the Sirius A system are called Anunnaki which means “those who came from the Divine Light”.

SEGREGATION OF POPULATIONS AND MIGRATION TO OTHER PLANETS

At one point during my investigation, the confusion of what I knew about the Anunnaki and what I saw in the holographic images had become so great that I had to interrupt the flow a little to seek some explanation from the man from Apellos who had been silent and motionless, a little behind me. I asked him, if possible, to give me some details about the Anunnaki in order to clarify the dilemma that is still valid for most people today.

“The origin of this civilization is in the planetary system of the star Sirius A,” he told me. “They are the original Sirian race, the oldest and basic branch from which other branches broke off before migrating to other areas of the galaxy.

He then told me that, in the Sirian language, when someone is given a name, the root is put first. In other words, the basic name is complemented by adding a certain defining trait or characteristic of that being to that root, often representing a group of beings. Thus, if some of the original Anunnaki migrated at one time to a planet from another part of the galaxy, they are then also called Anunnaki as a whole, but they also have another name that differentiates them from the original Sirians. This is one of the aspects that many authors have missed, giving rise to controversial views. From the basic Sirian civilization, many other secondary civilizations have developed which have “relocated” over time to other planets and other star systems of the galaxy. Most of them, however, have settled near the constellation Canis

Major, especially in the constellation Orion and in the star systems of Orion's Belt. The mistake, which was perpetuated among contemporary authors, was to consider one or more of these secondary civilizations that spread throughout the galaxy as the original Sirian civilization of Sirius A.

From time immemorial, Earth has also received other civilizations that either came from other areas of the cosmos or evolved on its surface. Man, as a being who has already undergone many transformations before reaching the present condition of homo sapiens, can be considered to be "young" (almost 400,000 years old) compared to other extraterrestrial beings.

In the discussion I had with the man from Apellos, he synthesized these aspects very well in a natural, calm and profound way.

"When one is born, a being begins the cycle of continuous evolution. A planet can only support the evolution of that being or civilization for a certain time, but there comes a time when a civilization must mature. This happened with the E-N-L branch which, at its maximum level of development, withdrew into the subtle etheric plane. This will be the case with the current human civilization as soon as it reaches its peak; but for now, contrary to what most people believe, homo sapiens' civilization is still far from the beginning of its maturity. To make a parallel, you are about somewhere between fourteen and sixteen, an age when all teenagers think they are extraordinary; but, in reality, this is far from the truth. They have much more to learn."

This was a harsh remark, but in my opinion, perfectly true. In any case, he emphasized the need for scientists of today to re-evaluate their possibilities and concepts and to give up at least some of the immense pride that characterizes them.

A common strategy, which is used by the vast majority of advanced alien civilizations, is to send certain members of a particular civilization which have not evolved as quickly as the rest of the population to a more suitable planet. In other words, they are "relocated" to another planet which better corresponds to their vibrational frequency where they will evolve at their own pace. Those who remain on the home planet can thus accelerate their evolution without being hindered by those who have been relocated.

An example is that of the Anunnaki because they proceeded in this way in successive phases, relocating entire segments of the population of their planet, originating from the Sirius system A, to other stellar systems. Such “migrations” to other planets follows the cosmic law of vibrational affinity because no being can remain in an existential reality unless it corresponds to that local frequency. An “adjustment” of the situation is then sought out with the most natural solution being this kind of “redistribution” of the vibrational frequencies which corresponds approximately to the wise old saying: “The right man for the right place.”

THE SPECIAL DESTINATION OF HUMANITY

The course of the discussion with the man from Apellos brought me close to a very sensitive aspect. What was the reason why the Anunnaki Sirians chose our planet to shape, develop and protect the human species?

“Indeed. To many of the other civilizations who have come to observe us, this choice of the Sirians is almost incomprehensible,” he said. “There are ‘observers’ in space around our planet who simply attend events on the surface without intervening. It is a moment, even for them, to understand and experience how the destiny of a civilization ‘flows’. And one of the most difficult things to understand for those who do not have access to a thorough knowledge of the true history of man and his origin, is why Sirians, along with the other extraterrestrial civilizations in the Alliance, assist humanity with great care and attach extreme importance to Mankind in the context of the fundamental transformations that are taking place today.”

I replied that we are not the only ones enjoying such attention.

“I have seen that as the Anunnaki assist this planet and transformations taking place at this level, so have they supported many other civilizations in the last hundreds of thousands of years, having laid the foundations of humanity. But now, in this very special convergence of space and time in the galaxy, they support us, not others.”

This was a good question and that is why some extraterrestrial civilizations are curious to attend events on Earth in order to observe what is happening in our Solar System. For them, the situation is a great mystery: people remain at the level of industrial production, they are technologically and ideologically backward, they are violent, and many have a very low intellectual level and even exhibit animal behavior. Under these circumstances, why do the Anunnaki from the Sirius A system, known to be true spiritual masters in the galaxy, consider us to have such great importance? As far as I could tell, even if our civilization is in such a condition, we are important to the Anunnaki. It is therefore obvious that this area of cosmic space in which the Earth resides is a special focus for the future.

“All this happens because they are the ones who, in fact, guide the galaxy and are the ones who support humanity,” said the man from Apellos. “From many points of view, humanity is a quite backward civilization; not primitive but backward in terms of understanding, principles, and behavior. In contrast, the resources within human beings are immense; and it is precisely because the Sirians saw this extraordinary potential in humans that they give their endorsement through the very undeniable authority that they have among other civilizations at the galactic level. In fact, many alliances were formed precisely because they gave their endorsement and insisted upon our integration.

Due to the agreement given by the Anunnaki and the alliances formed by them, humanity has become a kind of “attraction point” at this moment in the galaxy. From a certain point of view, it may be that the Earth, by the example it offers and the situation it is in, is now a kind of “stone border” for the future of this galactic sector and perhaps even for a larger area of the galaxy.

A GALACTIC “WEDDING”

At this point, the man from Apellos pointed to a deeper and even extraordinary aspect of this entire scenario.

“All the transformations that take place now and that will take place in the future, in addition to their local and immediate effects, are actually related to the preparation for the union of our galaxy with that of the Andromeda galaxy. Although this will take place over several billion years, preparations and collaboration for it have been made in both galaxies. It is like a ‘galactic program’ useful for aligning life to the new vibrational frequency of the galaxy that will result from the union of the two current ones. We could say that, at the cosmic level, it is as if they are preparing for an important ‘wedding’ of galactic proportions. The spiritual levels must be aligned, the subtle energies must also be correlated, and the frequencies must be arranged in such a way that, at the time of fusion, the civilizations and life of the two galaxies do not suffer extinction but rather evolve in an amazing way.”

I expressed my astonishment sincerely.

“But why worry about the extinction of the worlds that might come? Ultimately, the chances of the stars or planets of the two galaxies colliding, even if the galaxies are intertwined, are very small.”

“Their extinction would not come from brutal phenomena but rather from a major and subtle vibrational leap. Such an extraordinary cosmic event causes the vibrational frequency to rise, and this will cause chaos in most of the new galaxy. This is precisely why the present preparations and the ones that will follow, even if the galaxy’s unification will take place over several billion years, envisage that the civilizations that will be born will appear on the basis of ideas already assimilated and embedded into the consciousness of intelligent beings. In this way, the differences of the energetic and conceptual nature between the life of our galaxy and that of the Andromeda galaxy are minimized. It is a galactic and even universal evolutionary program and is the very idea of evolution at the macrocosmic level.”

The man from Apellos also told me that this very complicated and long “cosmic action” is coordinated by celestial entities far superior to most extraterrestrial civilizations which govern the galaxy from subtle planes. For example, they are the ones that give approval or not for certain specific actions that have to be carried out in different areas of the galaxy by advanced civilizations.

These celestial entities, organized in a strict hierarchy, are the ones that coordinate and correlate all the colossal transformations that will take place here. Any specific action or influence is thought out and oriented towards a higher purpose. It is a huge plan which, in relation to our lifespan, cannot be understood or integrated mentally. It is so distant in time and at the same time gigantic that it goes far beyond the usual capacities of perception or thought. The comparison with the “wheel that fits in a huge gear and has its own important mission, contributing to the smooth functioning of the mechanism” is very true for humanity and for life on Earth with regard to this idea of integration into the great future of the galaxy, all of which will take place over a huge period of time.

For most people, the aspects and motivations presented may seem irrelevant due to the huge temporal dimension that is involved in this vast divine plan. However, at a high level of perception and action such as the causal plane, time becomes insignificant, and events are perceived simultaneously and equally. The man from Apellos told me that the causal entities that govern this cosmic process and its proper development have noticed that, in the current cosmic context, the evolution of our planet is important, representing a “boundary” of reference.

Even if most people do not realize this, however, crucial events take place at the galactic level. Every being, every action, and every attitude is important in its own way because it integrates into this whole unity in the pursuit of a particular goal. Society changes from “having” to “feeling”. In other words, the sense of possession, selfishness, competition and violence tends to be gradually replaced with pure positive emotions and feelings, among which love, altruism and compassion are fundamental. Practically speaking, every human being is invited to take part in the great spiritual transformation of our humanity and our planet, to humbly demand with dignity that his life be a germ of light, of spirituality, and of hope for the bright future to which we can have access. All these seem to be just beautiful words; but in reality, they are the basic bricks for the transformation and evolution of the contemporary human being.

From this perspective, the information I provide here is an integral part of this “game” and has a certain significance, as both Méntia and the man from Apellos have brought me to understand. By properly assimilating this information, many people will probably understand things more deeply and will awaken to a higher reality which allows for a much broader view of life in the Universe. In particular and in relation to the subject I am discussing here, they might acquire a different view of the Anunnaki civilization and thus might reconsider the nature of these highly advanced extraterrestrial beings in a new way, both technologically and spiritually.

Sirians know how to pour out their wonderful love, but at the same time, when needed, they know how to react very strongly in fights or other terrible cosmic conflicts. They do so, however, at a different level of understanding than is perceived by most human beings. The Anunnaki are considered to be true spiritual masters in the galaxy; and that is why, if they support us, this is implicitly a kind of “recommendation” to other advanced extraterrestrial civilizations who will understand that this is important.

The presence of spirituality and an implicit sense of a high morality are strongly felt, and that is why they are still known by many civilizations in the galaxy as “those who came from the Spirit”. Wherever they go, they emanate purity, the force of righteous action, and high knowledge in different forms. Metaphorically speaking, we can think of some highly evolved monks who are spiritually worthy, but at the same time, humble and wise. They do not attack, but if attacked, they defend with great efficiency and always defeat their adversary.

EPILOGUE

As Radu clearly alludes to in the last chapter, what he has offered us is in stark contrast to the preponderance of literature about aliens. Two major influences in my own life, that being L. Ron Hubbard and Preston Nichols, certainly portrayed extraterrestrials in a most negative light. While Preston did also convey a positive connotation, particularly in regard to the Pleiadians who educated him, Hubbard portrayed aliens as being rather dedicated with implanting human beings so as to make them docile and controllable.

I think everyone would agree that there is a huge chasm between the state of mind of the average human being and that which could be considered a highly superior entity who has advanced technology as well as skill in navigating the etheric dimensions. If we are to heed Radu's comment about humanity's evolutionary status being at the equivalency of a young teenager, there is a long way to go, and what is offered in these books is part of the process of humanity's evolution.

Radu has at least five more books to present to us, and I have received a hint that the next one will be forthcoming soon, but I cannot say specifically. As soon as I receive a computer file, I will begin the translation and editing process immediately.

I will also continue my own personal adventures to Romania; and in particular, to Cioclovina Cave. This is a cave which time control scientist, Dr. David Anderson, has stated is the most significant with regard to containing scientifically documented traces of a powerful discharge of space-time motive force, i.e. the name of for energy that is released in conjunction with a Time Reactor™ (time machine).

For those of you who want to keep up-to-date, you are invited to subscribe to my quarterly newsletter, the Montauk Pulse. This is where I will report on any new developments with regard to Radu or the other characters that he writes about.

INTRODUCTION — by Peter Moon

For those of you who have picked up this book without any prior knowledge of the circumstances surrounding Radu Cinamar and his previous work, I will lay out a background and summary.

During the Cold War, there was a natural alliance between the two communist nations of Romania and the People's Republic of China. Trying to keep up with the West in regards to the most advanced and esoteric methods of reconnaissance and espionage, the Romanians sought out the help of the Chinese as they did not really trust the Russians. As part of a cultural exchange program whereby Chinese students were able to participate in educational programs in Romania, the Chinese government sent the Romanians an expert in parapsychology who would set up a secret department that would deal with all abnormal occurrences. These were referred to as "K events", but in pop culture terms of today, these might now be termed as "X-File" events. Known as Department Zero, this special unit was only known to the head of state and the head of security. Besides housing and caring for paranormal subjects, Department Zero also trained them. The expert in parapsychology who set up this unique department is known to us as Dr. Xien, and he was introduced to us in the first book of this series, Transylvanian Sunrise.^{*} Although Dr. Xien is an intriguing character, we do not learn too much about him in that book. We do know that he was called in after the birth of another very interesting character who also turns out to be one of the progenitors of the Transylvania Series. His name is Cezar Brad, and he is born with an umbilical cord that is so thick, the doctors have to use an ordinary saw to sever it. As this is an anomaly, Cezar comes under the scrutiny and eventual tutelage of Department Zero and forms a close personal relationship with Dr. Xien from a very young age. Cezar is trained in a host of spiritual and psychic disciplines that would rival the best your imagination might offer.

* The book you are reading now, The Etheric Crystal, is the seventh in a series of books by Radu Cinamar which are collectively, along with Peter Moon's The White Bat, known as the Transylvania Series. The previous works include Transylvanian Sunrise, Transylvanian Moonrise, Mystery of Egypt — The First Tunnel, and The Secret Parchment — Five Tibetan Initiation Techniques, Inside the Earth — The Second Tunnel, and Forgotten Genesis.

As fate would clearly demonstrate, Dr. Xien was grooming Cezar to serve as a steward and guardian for what is arguably considered the greatest archeological discovery in the history of Mankind: a secret and previously inaccessible chamber beneath the Romanian Sphinx containing futuristic holographic technology that was put together some 50,000 years ago.

In what could be termed a virtual Noah's Ark that far exceeds the thinking and experiential capacity of those who lived in biblical times (or even in our own times for that matter), this chamber includes technology whereby one can place their hand on a table and see their own DNA rendered in three-dimensional holograms. Other devices on the table enable one to see the DNA of alien species from other planets with accompanying star renderings so that one can see where they actually originate from. By placing two hands on different parts of the table, one can also "mix" the DNA of two species so as to see how they might look if hybridized. As the tables themselves are six feet high, the creatures who built them were gigantic compared to humans of today.

This remarkable chamber also includes a "projection hall" whereby one can see a holographic rendition of the history of Earth that is particularly tailored to the individuality of whomever might be viewing it. This history, however, abruptly cuts off in about the Fifth Century A.D., perhaps because it requires some sort of software update. One of the more intriguing aspects of the Projection Hall is that it also contains three mysterious tunnels that lead into the bowels of the Earth and similar facilities in Iraq, Mongolia, Tibet and also beneath the Giza Plateau in Egypt.

Although Cezar, through the tutelage of Dr. Xien, was set up by fate to be the overseer of this remarkable archeological discovery, it was not his role to write the story of what was found and its implications. As these events were unfolding, Cezar handpicked Radu Cinamar to write these volumes. Serving as a mentor to Radu, Cezar gave him a rapid fire education in all of the political machinations going on behind this discovery while also introducing him to the world of psychic phenomena and esoteric studies. We learn about this in the first volume, Transylvanian Sunrise, but we are not told exactly why Cezar picked Radu. What I can tell you from what I have learned thus far is that Cezar is a remarkably adept individual, and he knew precisely what he was doing. His psychic sensibilities are quite formidable and proved to be accurate in this case. Radu got the job done, and with the release of this book, he now has six volumes in English.

You might think that this discovery was a wonderful opportunity to enlighten Mankind and take advantage of all that this newly discovered technology has to offer for the benefit of humanity at large. Many, if not most, of the Romanians in the government who were privy to the discovery viewed it that way. Circumstances, however, dictated otherwise.

Cezar informed Radu that the actual discovery of this secret and previously unknown chamber took place when the Pentagon discovered it via the use of ground penetrating radar that operated through satellites. It is understandable that the Americans would use all technology at their disposal for reconnaissance purposes as well as to scrutinize all geographical anomalies and resources on the planet. Right or wrong, this is the purpose of the Department of Defense. What was most challenging about this intelligence, however, was that Masonic interests in the Pentagon funneled this information to a leader in Italian Freemasonry, a Signore Massini, who represents a hidden global elite that wanted access to and control of this chamber for themselves. Accordingly, Massini approached Cezar who was then the head of Department Zero and sought his cooperation. Cezar, who did not trust Massini, was forced to cooperate to a certain extent due to political circumstances. Thus, the evil interests of an Italian Freemason forged an unprecedented alliance between Romania and America with the former suddenly being admitted to NATO. The specifics of these political intrigues are detailed in the book Transylvanian Sunrise which is primarily the story of Cezar's life and his involvement with the uncovering of these amazing artifacts.

While the enigmatic and mysterious Dr. Xien set the stage for Cezar to uncover this secret chamber through rigorous training and education, he is a distant memory when the discovery is made and seemingly completely uninvolved in any tangible way with the political machinations and evil intrigues which allowed it to even take place. Dr. Xien, however, is an interested party and a definite progenitor of the information revealed in these books, and this comes into clear view in the second book of the series, Transylvanian Moonrise — A Secret Initiation in the Mysterious Land of the Gods.

Transylvanian Moonrise begins with an editor's note from the Romanian editor, Sorin Hurmuz, who includes numerous excerpts from the Romanian press that not only corroborate Cezar's story as told by Radu but give insights into why it is credible. Above and beyond these facts, it might interest you to know that a key area near the Romanian Sphinx is blacked out on Google Earth. Besides that, Americans were seen en masse during the time of the excavations that were taking place near the Romanian Sphinx in 2003. I have also spoken to several well-placed people in Romania who believe the general story to have merit. Exactly what has taken place and all of the details are still largely a mystery, but Radu's books offer us the only clues. In addition to that, they are remarkable stories and teaching devices which integrate the mundane aspects of politics with some of the most esoteric concepts of occultism as well as the cutting edge of technology.

Radu's narrative in Transylvanian Moonrise begins with a mysterious man named Elinor trying to contact the enigmatic author through his publisher, Sorin Hurmuz, who has generally been instructed to stonewall any people wishing to meet with Radu. In fact, Sorin has never met with Radu and only communicates with him by special courier or with a prearranged phone card. When it is eventually discovered that Elinor is speaking on behalf of a Tibetan lama, both Sorin and Radu change their tune and a meeting is eventually arranged. This meeting is filled with a panoply of metaphysical revelations which present an entirely new paradigm by which to view the events described in Transylvanian Sunrise. After an amazing indoctrination into the ancient art of alchemy and the prospects of immortality, Radu meets the lama who reveals himself to be none other than Dr. Xien and explains that he once served in the royal court at Lhasa under the name of Repa Sundhi at the time of the Chinese invasion of Tibet. Escaping that purge, he somehow ended up in the employ of the Chinese government and adopted a different identity as Dr. Xien.

Repa Sundhi has a very specific agenda for this meeting with Radu and it has to do with what is the focal point of the fourth book in the Transylvania Series: The Secret Parchment — Five Tibetan Initiation Techniques (more on that later). In Transylvanian Moonrise, Radu learns that the lama wants to take him to the Apuseni Mountains of Transylvania. Once there, a mysterious but well-described space-translation takes place that literally transports them (as well as Elinor, who remains in their company) to certain rarefied high peaks of Tibet which are inaccessible to humans by normal transportation means. Radu is escorted into a cave where he meets another progenitor of the Transylvania Series. Her name is Machandi and she is a blue goddess and tantric dakini who not only educates and initiates Radu but gives him an ancient manuscript which is to be translated from ancient Tibetan and published, first in the Romanian language. Having finally been translated into English, it is the centerpiece of The Secret Parchment.

While Transylvanian Moonrise refers to the characters in Transylvanian Sunrise and the lama is included in the dramatic events that take place, the two books are astonishingly different and offer complementary views of the overall scenario from completely different perspectives. The third book in the series, Mystery of Egypt — The First Tunnel, is no exception. Radu is recruited to join Department Zero on a journey with Cezar into the mysterious “First Tunnel” in the Projection Hall of the Bucegi complex. This leads to a hidden chamber beneath the Giza Plateau in Egypt. What they find there is no less astonishing than what has already been offered in the first two books. The purpose of the mission is to recover neatly organized slate-like tablets that are in fact a type of ancient “DVD” that project holographic “memories” of the history of the world. The tablets do not require a projector and are so numerous that they can only hope to return a portion of them to their home base, after which they will be sent to America for detailed study. Even though they cannot recover everything in one mission, what they do retrieve would take a team of viewers a considerable amount of time to view.

There is also an occult chamber containing a device consisting primarily of huge crystals that facilitates the projection of one’s consciousness back into time. It is not a physical time travel device. It should be noted that it requires a certain amount of psychic and esoteric development to be able to withstand the rigors of projecting oneself into time, even if the physical body is not being utilized. We also learn that this device is bioresonant in that it is tuned to the physiological, mental and emotional conditions of the subject as well as their own past experiences. In other words, you would have different experiences than would I and so on.

Another intriguing aspect of the time device is that there is a certain amount of censorship present. When Cezar attempts to project his consciousness into time in order to see who created the device, he encounters blockages. While it is informative and useful in certain respects, it contains mysteries which it does not want penetrated, at least at this particular time. All of this gives rise to interesting speculation.

These censorship issues further fuel the controversy Cezar ignites by relaying his initial experience in the time device whereupon he returns to the time of Jesus in the First Century. Radu also recounts what he saw in his original experiences in the Projection Hall (beneath the Romanian Sphinx) when he witnessed events surrounding the crucifixion of Christ. This account contains UFOs wreaking havoc amidst a virtually insurmountable thunder storm while a fearing populace scrambles to save their own lives. It leaves us with a hornets nest of information, the result of which has been more than a few questioning the veracity of the authors. I should add, however, that most of the reading audience thus far has not blinked at the accounts given. They have enjoyed the book and are not judgmental about the authors. What is perhaps the most relevant aspect of this experience, however, is the fact that the device which facilitates it is bioresonant. Whether the events presented are indeed real in a conventional sense, they are certainly events that the collective consciousness has wrestled with for thousands of years.

What happens in Mystery of Egypt, however, is superceded by what occurs in the fourth volume, The Secret Parchment. Radu finds himself in the middle of the political and conspiratorial intrigue that is swirling around the effort to control the holographic chamber beneath the Romanian Sphinx. Accordingly, Radu is sent to the United States to attend a remote viewing program in the Pentagon, all in an effort to defuse the rising political tensions. As the conspiratorial intrigues escalate into a full scale political and esoteric war, there is an intervention by superior spiritual forces, one of which includes Radu being recalled to Romania in order to meet with Repa Sundhi to facilitate the translation of the ancient Tibetan manuscript or “secret parchment” which had been given to him by Machandi as described in Transylvanian Moonrise. While the parchment presents five invaluable techniques for spiritual advancement (these are not the same as the already known yoga exercises known as the “Five Tibetans”), its very presence in the world has ignited a series of quantum events, extending from a bizarre structure emerging from the snow in Antarctica, serving an antenna function which is at the crossroads between signals to Jupiter’s moon Europa as well as Mount McKinley and Transylvania. As incredible as the discovery of this extraterrestrial connection is, it only escalates the attempt to undermine the structure of Romania’s Department Zero when the Americans learn that the signal to Transylvania reveals a passage way of solid gold tunnels extending miles into the underground and leading to ancient hieroglyphics embedded in gold indicating the locale as the nexus of the Inner Earth where “all the worlds unite”. Not too far from the nexus, accessible through more passageways of pure gold, is an incredible room of golden thrones with panels of yet more hieroglyphics and a mysterious portal that appears to be a direct conduit to outer space; and, presumably, an outer space of another universe. These discoveries were made by a certain Professor Constantine who, upon reporting them and taking a team from the government to investigate, was whisked away and never heard from again. Although the investigators were killed, Professor Constantine was able to make a summary report to Cezar Brad; and the file for such was deemed to be the highest state secret of the country of Romania. Even so, Department Zero was unable to find any access to these passageways and, despite considerable effort, no further discoveries were made. Although Machandi’s secret parchment is translated and we are treated to its specific wisdom, The Secret Parchment — Five Tibetan Initiation Techniques leaves us with a very great mystery that is left dangling.

I also contribute to the book by revealing my own adventures in the area and learning of the ancient legends and how these fit into the scheme of Radu’s adventures. It turns out that Professor Constantine was indeed a real character who disappeared, and I am even shown where he once lived. There is also a Valley of the Golden Thrones, and it is in this region that I make one of the most remarkable discoveries that I have ever stumbled upon.

Although it has not been mentioned in any of the previous books, I was led to a cave by a Romanian archeologist in 2014. Known as Cioclovina Cave, it is the site of one of the greatest archeological finds in Romania which indicate a civilization did indeed occupy caverns within the inner earth and in the vicinity mentioned by Radu. Cioclovina Cave represents a sort of grand central cave station with some seven other caves interlinking with it, representing at least seven kilometers of tunnels.

While the aforementioned findings concerning Cioclovina Cave are of great relevance with regard to Radu's claims, there is an even more startling confirmation from Dr. David Anderson, my scientist friend who originally brought me to Romania in 2008. In an interview conducted by myself in 2015, he revealed for the first time that Cioclovina Cave was the site of the largest discharge of space-time motive force ever recorded. Space-time motive force is a term Dr. Anderson coined to signify an energy that is released as a result of time dilation that occurs in the process of frame-dragging. If you are further interested in this aspect and would like a full explanation, you can watch the video series Time Travel Theory Explained at my website www.timetraveleducationcenter.com. This function is also explained in the appendix of the book Transylvanian Moonrise.

What all of this means in layman's terms is that Dr. Anderson's findings indicate that this area was the site of heavy duty time travel experiments. He was completely surprised that I happened to come across this very area by happenstance during my adventures in Romania. Note that this area was never a targeted area of interest for me. I had an off day and was brought there by an archeologist I knew at his instigation. He had no idea of the time experiments or the like. The archeologist, by the way, told me that the stories I relayed to him about Radu's books, which he had not read at that point, correlated with many stories he had heard about the area.

While there are many so-called "side tunnels" or supplementary threads of great interest that involve Dr. Anderson and my other associates in Romania, I am getting off subject. Radu is very well aware of Dr. Anderson and is even interested to meet with him. It is quite possible that all of these different threads might coalesce into a single homogeneous thread some day.

Radu's fifth book, entitled Inside the Earth — The Second Tunnel refers to what is referred to as the "Second Tunnel" in a series of three tunnels in the projection room located within the chamber beneath the Romanian Sphinx. The First Tunnel, named in the title of the third book in the series, Mystery of Egypt — The First Tunnel, leads to a chamber beneath the Giza Plateau. The Second Tunnel, leads to underground cities and installations. The Third Tunnel leads to Tibet with an offshoot branch to the Carpathians (near Buzău, Romania) and then towards Iraq; and from there to Mongolia and the Gobi Plateau.

Inside the Earth — The Second Tunnel begins with a rather sober evaluation of geophysics and how it relates to the core of the Earth and the myriad misunderstandings that have proliferated on the enigmatic region which is often referred to as the “Inner Earth” and often incorrectly as the “Hollow Earth”. Radu’s old friend and mentor, Dr. Xien, gives him rather thorough explanations on these various aspects and gives remarkable new insights into the science and origin of black holes that will eventually reach into the halls of academe and revolutionize the way that science thinks about such topics. There is also an exhaustive explanation of the fatal error of the Cavendish Experiment, done in 1799, the “gold standard” for justifying that the Earth’s core is a mass iron-nickel alloy surrounded by molten lava. You will learn that later experiments to justify this conclusion are based upon what amount to outrageous assumptions based upon an experiment which has not been subject to rigorous inspection and is, in fact, errant. You will also learn that what resides at the core of the Earth is indeed a black hole.

Beyond the science are Radu’s remarkable adventures with Cezar where the two visit mysterious regions within the Earth and the multiple civilizations that occupy that region. There are lots of amazing meetings as well as descriptions of technology that facilitate transportation between the mysterious regions “Inside the Earth”. Radu also provides us with a glimpse of the fabled city of Shambhala, a paradise at the core of the Inner Earth itself where balance and harmony are the basis of civilization. Whatever your final opinion of Radu’s adventures might be, you will be exposed to a paradigm that is novel and will change your view of the world.

One of the most admirable aspects of Radu’s book is that, while familiar aspects and characters are common to all of them, each one is unique and focuses a different look. Forgotten Genesis is no exception and is the sixth book in the series which reveals the mysteries of how multiple extraterrestrial civilizations have influenced and steered the DNA of Mankind in order for it to evolve to a higher state. All of this knowledge is facilitated by Radu’s new contacts in the Inner Earth civilization of Apellos who embrace him as an ambassador of information to share with the surface world. The core of this work, which includes seventy elaborate drawings meant to make the text easier to understand, concerns man's true origin and complex evolution over the ages. Some of the "hot spots" of human history, which either have either remained unknown or have only been considered from mythological positions, are explained including: Atlantis, Troy, Shambhala, and Hyperborea. Particular emphasis is placed upon the existence and manifestation of inter-dimensional chasms or portals at the "intersections" between the physical plane and the etheric plane. Forgotten Genesis also includes the back story and a description of the technology by which Radu was able to assimilate this information.

This latest edition of the Transylvania Series, and what you are about to read, The Etheric Crystal — The Third Tunnel, picks up where the previous book took off and features Radu Cinamar's first trip into the mysterious Third Tunnel on a specific mission to visit the underground chamber beneath Iraq where his team recovers a powerful crystal that exists in another dimension but is housed in a container in this one. It becomes the basis for a new project by Department Zero which concentrates on Radu's ability to penetrate different dimensions. Initially started privately by Radu and Cezar Brad, the project is unexpectedly embraced by Elinor, the enigmatic alchemist who befriended Radu in Transylvanian Moonrise. Playing a significant role in this new project, Elinor helps them take the project to another level. Like the other books in the series, this work is equally unique with new tangents to pursue.

1 — THE ULTIMATE SECRET: THE TUNNEL TO IRAQ

There is no doubt that the revelations about the origin of man on Earth and those of human history have marked me deeply. Pretty soon, I realized that the initiative of the man from Apellos who had arranged for me to access to that information through the small “window” of time that I had available for something like this was very well calculated. The inter-dimensional helmet, a fortuitous gift which we had received from the people of Apellos, turned out to be a very technologically evolved device, not only for understanding the complex information we viewed, but also for the way this related to what would be our expedition through the Third Tunnel. It seemed like everything was arranged for a well-defined purpose, but it was a purpose which was unclear to me at the time. It did not take long, however, for light to be shed in this regard.

Satisfied with the richness and nature of the information I had accessed during the viewing of images of the past of Mankind, I was looking forward to what I felt to be the “icing on the cake”: the expedition through the Third Tunnel. I had already accumulated considerable experience on previous journeys, and now I was feeling a general sense of fulfillment due to the fact that the last “act”, the last mystery of the Bucegi complex – the Third Tunnel – would be revealed to me, albeit only partially, because we were only going to explore the branch to Iraq. I already knew that this was the most “accessible” branch in the rather complicated “architecture” of the Third Tunnel.

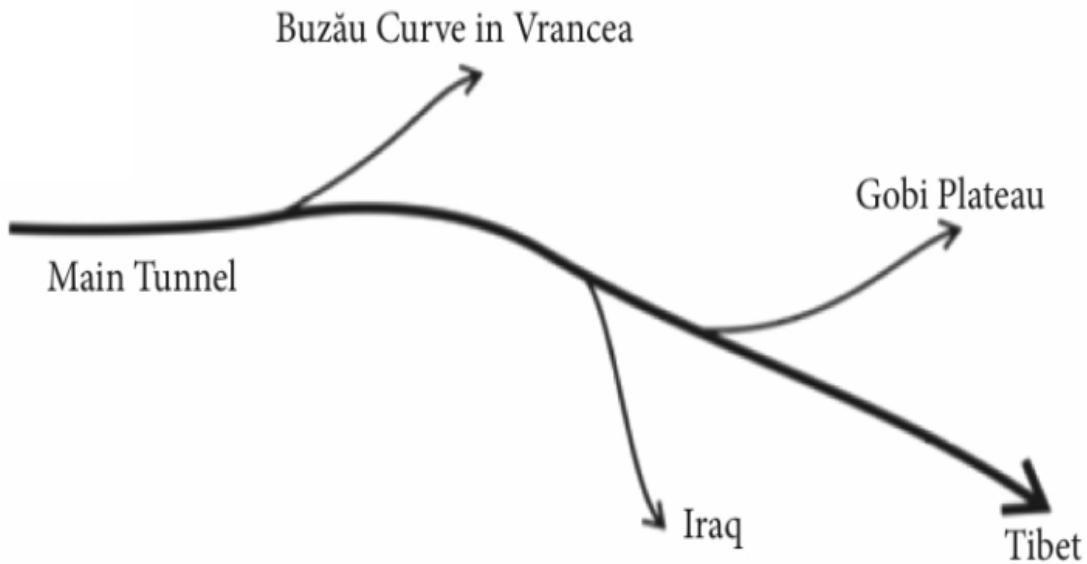

TREE STRUCTURE

Due to delicate issues on the diplomatic level, I am not allowed at this time to comment on the main line of the Third Tunnel, the one that goes to Tibet. Even though it has no access to this main branch, China has reserved the right to censor information regarding it, and we do not want any additional tensions in this regard. Recently, however, we have been getting different kind of signals from the Chinese government, but due to the sensitivity of the subject, I prefer to address this in a future volume, provided I am given clearance to do so.

On the other hand, one of the secondary branches of the main line (of the Third Tunnel) – the one leading to Curvature Buzăului* – has a great strategic interest for Romania which also cannot be unveiled for now. This leaves the branch to Iraq as well as the further extension (of the Third Tunnel) to the Gobi Plateau and Mongolia. As far as what I can share in this volume, the branch to Iraq is the only one that can be considered, at least to some extent, without there being unpleasant consequences. Generally speaking, I knew what I was going to see there, and even specifically what we wanted to find, but the emotion of the journey and the actual experience was nevertheless very vivid.

[FOOTNOTE: * Curvature Buzăului can be interpreted as the “Buzău Curve” in English, and it refers to the curvature in the Carpathians (which run west to east, forming the southern border of Transylvania), curving upwards in a northern direction, forming the eastern border of Transylvania. The city of Buzău is near this “curve”, an area which is known for its remnants of ancient civilizations that include mysterious “portals” and strange phenomena, all of which has been reported and observed completely independent of the works of Radu Cinamar.]

General schematic of the Third Tunnel with its branches

As I have said before, entering into the secret complex in the Bucegi Mountains automatically implies a vibrational leap of being, and that is why you never leave there being bored, tired or irritated.* On the contrary, after you enter the Great Gallery, the surrounding reality seems to be transforming, even if your mind tells you that nothing is different.

[FOOTNOTE: * See Volume 5, Inside the Earth - The Second Tunnel, 2019]

Access to the Projection Hall signifies an evidentiary leap, both in the vibrational frequency of the mind and the body. Inside this space, the specific field acts at a level so that the subtle influence on the psyche and mind is already a certain actuality which, in a certain way, can be described as a sort of “personality”.

I knew the third tunnel was quite “technically accessible”, but it was distinguished by its different branches. Over the years, Cezar made several expeditions into each of them, and I knew of their astonishing results from the reports I had read.

The main tunnel to Tibet offers the most direct access to extraordinary worlds. At the end of it, in one of the Tibetan massifs, there is a veritable “launching pad”, manifesting in both the subtle field of consciousness and in the outer physical world; but, as I said previously, further disclosures in this regard are imprudent due to certain political reactions, all of which need to be avoided.

On the other hand, the tunnel towards the curvature of the Carpathian Mountains – in an area corresponding to the surface of a rural landscape in the Siriu Mountains – is short and leads to an underground structure that plays a precise role at that point. For military and national security reasons, I am not allowed to go into detail, but I may return to this subject in one of the following volumes. All I can say for now is that at the end of this branch lies a complicated ensemble, directly related to the main control panel in the Projection Hall in the Bucegi complex.

The fork to Iraq, however, is more accessible and simpler, and based upon what we discovered there, I had an idea that later developed in a very interesting way that led to remarkable results.

PREPARATIONS FOR THE JOURNEY

A day for rest and relaxation went very well. We had only a brief informal meeting with two American officers, neither of whom had never been in the Projection Hall before.* They, however, proved that they had done their homework with regard to the documentation that they had access to with regard to the preparation of the mission. This also included intensive instruction on the characteristics of the Bucegi complex, the topography of the place and even the nature of space-time distortions in the three tunnels. By 2010-2011, together with Lieutenant Nicoară, we had developed a “manual” to prepare those who were to enter the Projection Hall to take part in the expeditions through the tunnels. The text was approved by Cezar and General Obadea, the latter still being alive at that time.

[FOOTNOTE: * These two officers were mentioned in the previous volume of the Transylvania Series, entitled Forgotten Genesis.]

The experience gained in the first years after the great discovery in Bucegi demonstrated the need for a special protocol for those who were to enter the secret complex in the mountains and especially for the Projection Hall. We have established a set of precise rules as well as physical and psychological conditions that need to be met by “applicants” in addition to an ethical code of procedure. All of this proved necessary because, for the most part, those who entered there could not withstand the vibrational frequency of the specific energy field and artifacts in the Projection Hall. The special protocol that was worked on for several months was about two hundred pages long and treated these issues both theoretically and pragmatically. We have put together twelve specific tests and their evaluation grids. Therefore, it was a genuine exam which the military had to pass. Save for myself, only nine civilians, all of them scientists, have thus far been allowed to enter the secret location.

The protocol also details how to make contact with advanced technologies, far superior to those currently in place on Earth, including technologies from “black projects” run outside of official governmental supervision. Those technologies are based on principles and approaches to the universe which are completely different from what is currently known, and that is why reverse engineering – which has yielded remarks in many other cases – could not be applied here except to a small extent. It is as if we must learn another physics, an extremely advanced one, which involves a deep knowledge of the mysteries of the Macrocosm*, unlike “orthodox” physics, a subject that only studies the universe in a partial and limited manner.

[FOOTNOTE *In previous volumes of the series, the author defined this term (Macrocosm) as the totality of the planes and dimensions of manifestation, from the physical to the causal universe. In other words, the Macrocosm includes both the physical dimension of Creation and its subtle dimensions.]

The American officers proved themselves to be very well prepared at all levels involving the Protocol, passing the exam brilliantly and thus gaining clearance for the expedition through the Third Tunnel. There are also, however, certain restrictions that have been in place over time, and here I am mainly referring to the Second Tunnel that leads to the interior of the Earth. These restrictions were imposed by some of the civilizations there, and we had to respect them, even though this created some tension in our relationship with the Americans. For example, Tomassis said from the very beginning that they did not want to work with the United States. This was a difficult condition to digest for the chiefs at the Pentagon, but the very wise Dryn remained very firm in this regard, without giving further explanations. In the end, the Americans had to accept this, but the situation was not pleasant for us either.

Additionally, the leadership of Apellos requested that what we communicate outwards be just what they allow and nothing more. Censorship applies both to general information intended for the public – such as what I present in the books I write – and to those of a top secret nature which is intended for certain governments and security agencies. After my visit to Apellos, the city representatives requested to meet the functional “ambassador” of those on the surface. Cezar had already fulfilled this function for many years for those in Tomassis and for two other subturreanean civilizations.

I wanted a brief discussion in order to make things better understood in the context of our bilateral relations with the Pentagon and those civilizations within the planet. Returning to our expedition now, through the Third Tunnel, the mission would take only a few hours according to the estimated schedule. In the evening, we would return to the Base.

The parameters of the expedition, which were fixed by Cezar, were clear and also provided for the thorough research of the occult chamber using the special equipment brought by the two Americans, all of which was provided for in the bilateral agreement for the expedition through the Third Tunnel. This expedition would include procuring the tablets; studying the special “chair” therein and possibly finding the missing crystal which apparently represented the “pièce de résistance” in that site.*

In order to identify the crystal, both Cezar and I had hope in the possibilities of the etheric helmet we had received from the people of Apellos, a technological piece of extraordinary finesse, the principles of operation of which were very advanced. Incidentally, the American side wanted to study that device in detail, but we had to refuse by reason of our agreement with the people of Apellos and their refusal to allow it.

[FOOTNOTE: * See Volume 6, Forgotten Genesis, 2019]

American logistics, however, were not to be neglected either as the two officers had come up with a device to “scan dynamic exchanges of a quantum nature”, a technological first we were told, with a high-resolution thermo-spectrometer with a peak range that can only be found in military equipment. None of these high-tech parts are for public use because they were part of the “miracle bag” of non-governmental projects.* This was not our business, however; and moreover, the American officers did not offer any further information to us on this matter.

[FOOTNOTE: *The author is probably referring to so-called “Black Projects”.]

We were apparently well equipped, but you never knew what surprises extraterrestrial technology might present itself to you in the secret complex in Bucegi. By that time, the research undertaken showed us that it was obvious that there was a point of incompatibility between earthly technology and that of alien civilization that built that astounding complex, both with regard to principles and effects. As I said before, even reverse engineering could not help because the basics of the extraterrestrial technology could not be understood by modern science. We hope, however, to find certain elements that would hasten the realization of the fundamental leap that is required by science in order to gain access to a much deeper knowledge of the phenomena in the universe.

The next day, we got up early, but with all the preparations to be made, with the orders Cezar still had to give, plus the helicopter flight, we did not arrive at the Bucegi complex until noon. We remained for some time in the area of the Great Gallery to allow for the two Americans to be acclimated to the new energy level of reality with which they were now interacting.

Despite all of their preparation through the special protocol, their utter astonishment had intensified since entering the Grand Gallery and could not be contained. After we all arrived in the Projection Hall, it was necessary to take another half-hour break to allow them to adjust psychologically to what they saw on the outside and what they were perceiving inside of themselves. Meanwhile, Cezar adjusted the entrance to the Third Tunnel at the small control panel in front of it. As far as myself, as I do whenever I come to this amazing place, I retreated to the area of the golden yellow square near the Dome and sat there, trying to let all those subtle influences pass through me, feeding off of their strength and knowledge. I would say that I was practicing some kind of “communion” with that Hall which created a state of “floating” and even euphoria, both of which spread quickly throughout my being.

A SHORT TRIP

About half an hour later, everything was ready before the tunnel entrance. The two American officers were standing next to Cezar in front of the small console of the control panel. The enormous opening in the mountain was already activated, vibrating in a slightly phosphorescent greenish color, leaving it to be a little visible from within. I noticed that it was already becoming dark, a sign of the space distortion at the entrance, a common characteristic for each of the three tunnels. I expected the distortion to be a little deeper, but I noticed that it was relatively close to the entrance and quite strong because its specific pulsation was wider than in the first two tunnels.

Sensing my thoughts, Cezar said, “Each of the tunnels has its peculiarity. Here, the mode of transport is eased by some space airlocks... about the same as the tunnel to the inside of the planet.” He then activated certain commands on the console and a hologram appeared in front of us with the schematic presentation of the tunnel structure. I noticed the strong nature of each distortion, marked by the accented indigo color surrounded by a dynamic bright-white halo. Each branch of the tunnel contained such a distortion a short distance from the entrance.

Branches and distortions in the Third Tunnel

"Here we will be able to make a few 'jumps' and cover the entire distance," Cezar said.

I noticed that the American officers were quite excited, and I could relate to this very well from my own experiences upon entering the Projection Hall but especially when I went on expeditions through the tunnels. I joked a little with them, cheering them up. In their case, there was no question of apprehension or a feeling of fear, but it was rather about the emotion of mystery and experience that was intended for only an extremely small number of people on this planet. The huge mouth of the tunnel and the hypnotic pulsation of the distortion does indeed have a major impact on the human psyche and mind. It takes a good few minutes to align the body and mind to the huge subtle energy emanating from the Projection Hall as it is necessary for one's being to be a well balanced whole.

I briefly told the two officers what they should expect upon stepping inside the tunnel. It was, however, more of a recap because I knew all too well that nothing could replace the actual experience. Upon entering the tunnel, we immediately felt the specific sound insulation, and it suggested a break from the surrounding reality. I noticed that, as with the Second Tunnel that connects with the interior of the Earth, the colored crystals were situated in their places before the distortion, about fifteen meters from the entrance. Its surface rhythmically waved in the air, mildly altering the view to the other side.

I waited a few moments for Cezar who remained at the command console. After he entered the tunnel, he went through the distortion very relaxed and full of confidence, instantly disappearing from the sight of our eyes even though we could still see the continuation of the tunnel behind it. Already having experienced this kind of “crossing”, I signaled the two majors to follow. After a brief hesitation, they quickly went through the distortion, disappearing suddenly. I then passed, feeling a slight tingling in the skin, the same feeling I had felt in the passage from the tunnel to the Earth’s center. I immediately saw Cezar and the two officers waiting for me in front of a huge entrance to a branch of the tunnel.

The “displacement”, in fact, was a “switching” between two areas of different space through a change in vibrational frequency. In that case, as the distances were relatively small, I assumed that the formation and maintenance of the distortion did not require a large energy source. Even so, this did and still does represent the greatest mystery to us: what is it that energetically supports all the amazing technology that is present in the Projection Hall, including the specific field there and the distortions that have endured in this way for tens of thousands of years?

The first branch, breaking off from the main tunnel to Tibet, took direction to the left and continued to the Carpathian curvature area. That tunnel was slightly smaller in size than the main tunnel. I estimated its height at seven and a half meters and the width about five meters. At the intersection, both on the main line and on the branch, we saw sets of colored rhombic crystals on either side of the tunnels followed by a distortion like the one at the entrance through which we had just had passed.

On the branch to the underground beneath Buzău, at the entrance on the right side, I saw one of the new electric cars and several sealed crates stored on the ground. I knew that shipment had arrived about a year ago from the Army and actually involved a lot more crates. From then until now, a single expedition had been organized with an exclusively Romanian team but for technical purposes only. I therefore assumed that the rest of the crates had been taken to their final destination, but I did not ask. From Cezar, I knew that it was logistical equipment and perhaps, in the near future, we were going to deal with its installation.

Cezar beckoned us to go through the next distortion, continuing on the main line towards Tibet, and we did so immediately. We then went off on a new fork that appeared virtually identical to the first branch, but this one was heading right towards Iraq, being smaller in size than the main tunnel towards Tibet. We were now at the crossroads of our expedition because our destination was on this path to Iraq.

“Another leap,” said a smiling Cezar as we arrived.

I thought how convenient such trips are whereby you can arrive thousands of miles from the starting point within minutes, and I imagined how much Mankind could progress with such technology at its disposal. The acquisition of this technology alone, both conceptually and pragmatically, could change at least fifty percent of world trade, revenues, freedom and especially efficiency in almost all economic areas. The single pressing on an important button in the process of evolving science could trigger major changes in human life and destiny.

I also appreciated that expeditions through the Third Tunnel were the easiest to achieve, whether or not it was human displacement or transport devices, due to the extraordinary speed and efficiency with which they were achieved. The main line to Tibet retains a somewhat linear frequency without special disturbances, but the large magnetic vortexes – that is, the ones to the Carpathian Curvature, Iraq and the Gobi Plateau in Mongolia – consume the tunnels. I realized that the complex structure in Bucegi “explores” much of the planet in directions having different characteristics, suggesting the existence of areas where different but very old civilizations had developed, now covered by the “dust” of time that erodes everything.

DESTINATION: THE SECOND OCCULT CHAMBER

We all deviated from the main tunnel, entering the branch headed for Iraq. Behind the crystals, about ten meters from the entrance, lies the spatial distortion; and, as usual, we went through without any problems. Suddenly, we were on the last part of the tunnel of the secondary branch, maybe about twelve meters away from an opaque wall of indigo color. The light in the tunnel was no longer blue, but it had turned green, like the one at the entrance to the tunnel. There was a perfect resemblance to what we had seen in the tunnel to Egypt. The difference, however, consisted of what was at its end. In the tunnel to Egypt, its end was surrounded by a huge stone door, perfectly polished; whereas here, on the branch towards Iraq, the stone gate was replaced by an indigo color which slowly changes its shade. I had a hunch, but to be sure, I put on my helmet given by our friends in Apellos. I immediately saw the subtle field of the “gate” which was a dam of energy, and I was even seeing the interior of the space beyond it.

On the left wall of the tunnel, also encased in the same specific material, we saw the similarly distinct sign as that of the gate in the Great Gallery: a square inside which was engraved a triangle with the tip up. Cezar came before us, explaining.

“The protection system is redundant; but it in some sense, it is the other way around. That is to say, you cannot get access here unless you are recognized by the console in front of the tunnel in the Projection Hall. It seems that handling the control panel there leaves a biological or subtle impression that is recognized here. Only the one who commands that console can open the protection field here. But again, you cannot reach the console unless you get past the energetic dam at the gate of the Grand Gallery, and this is the real test for an intruder with unclean thoughts.

I wanted to check this out and I touched the triangle, but nothing happened. Cezar then did the same. Almost immediately, the opaque indigo background became translucent and then disappeared. In front of us, a fairly wide space appeared, a rectangular room more deep than wide and gently lit in a light blue shade that was very pleasant.

After we had all entered that room, Cezar told us that this was the occult chamber of Iraq, directing his attention towards the two American officers. It is a lot like the one in Egypt, but here we were particularly interested in the consciousness projection chair and the crystal that makes it work. In the other expeditions made here, there was more interested in studying the tablets.

I looked around and saw that the walls of the room had numerous niches of different depths where tablets were placed. This was different from Egypt's occult chamber because, here in Iraq, the shelves for platinum plates were replaced by types of niches in different locations. The room was smaller than that in Egypt, measuring a little more than half of it, about seven to seven and a half meters long and about six meters wide.

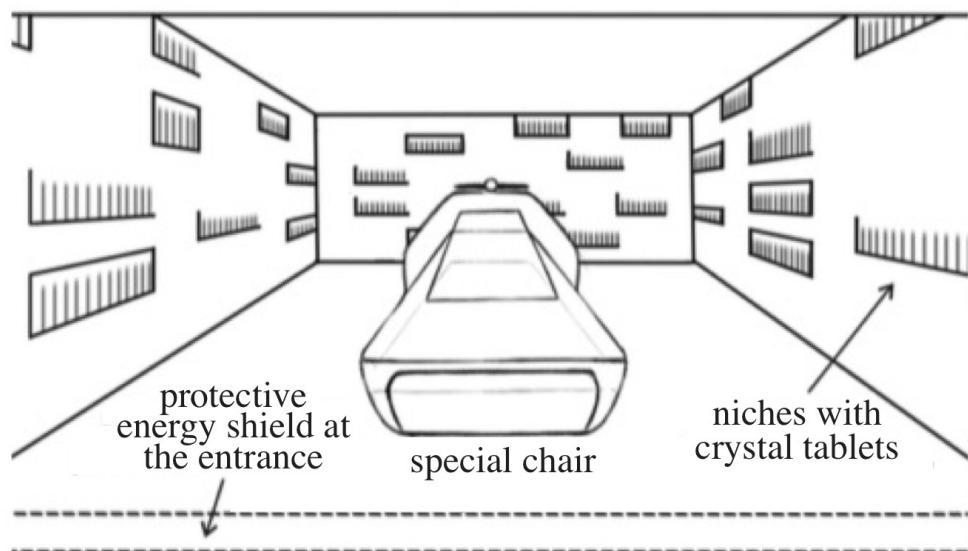

The niches were more deeply embedded into the walls of the room which were not made of stone but from the special material that permeated the tunnel inside: a special texture, seemingly a combination of something amorphous and something biological. The color of that material was indigo and was slightly phosphorescent on the surface. To the touch, it gave the impression that it was "veiled", but in reality, it was tough, both for the palms and for the soles.

Inside the room, the material appeared to be "molded" in different areas of the walls because we saw many niches of a rectangular or "L" shape filled with plates about the same size as those in Egypt. The niches were distributed on three of the walls of the room because the fourth remaining wall, through which we had entered, was in fact a subtle protective field. The distribution of niches seemed random to me, and the spaces between them were relatively large.

Each niche was filled with plates, but I noticed with astonishment that they, unlike those in Egypt, were all made up of perfectly transparent material, probably crystal. I approached one and took a tablet. I did not encounter any resistance, and that was another difference from the plates in Egypt. Here, they stood up, mysteriously adhering to a vertically stable position, as if they were attracted to a magnet. They had already been inventoried on a previous expedition, and Lieutenant Nicoară had the list of their distribution in the niches. There are slightly less than a thousand plates in Iraq's occult chamber which is far less than those in Egypt.

Front view of the Occult Chamber

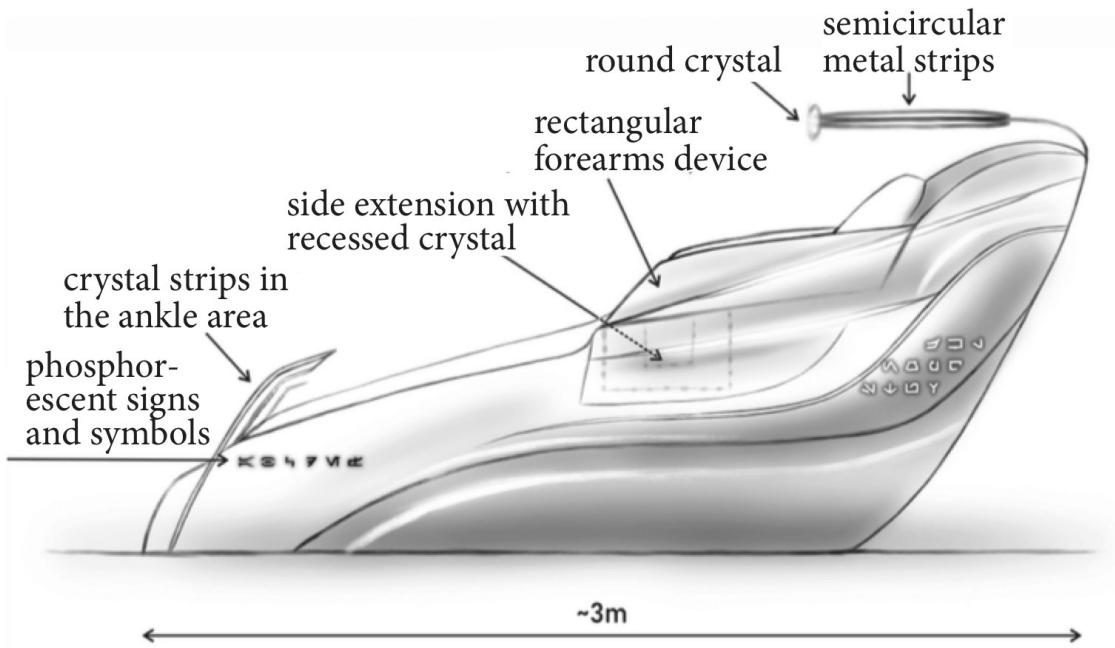

Cezar explained that the study of the crystal plates was deliberately postponed until a technology was designed to convert or extract information from the platinum plates in Egypt's occult chamber. It was considered that the crystal plates in Iraq are more difficult to decode than those of platinum.

A day earlier, when the two American officers asked him for further clarification, Cezar said that we did not want to mix the studies of these tablets. It was only a matter of time, however, before an advanced technology would be developed to retrieve this information and convert it into a format that would be easy to use for us. As we now have access to the platinum plates, it is time to turn our attention to the crystal plates as well.

THE MYSTERY OF THE CRYSTAL REVEALED

I did not understand the meaning of the niches in the walls nor the logic of their layout. But before I tried to figure this out, I was drawn to the main part of the occult chamber which was the special "chair". It was placed perpendicular to the protective energy wall, appearing as if it were "poured" into the floor, and it corresponded in size and shape to a humanoid being of at least two and a half feet high.

Side view of the special chair

Compared to the dimensions of an ordinary human being, the seat seemed enormous to me as its walls were very thick with “inlays” that looked like cuneiform signs illuminated in a phosphorescent blue-metallic color. If we did not consider the crystal plates, the chair was basically the only object in the room, impressive in size and allure and complex in shape.

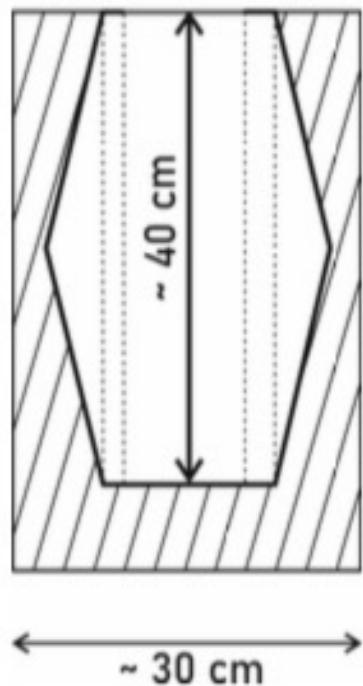

At first glance, it seemed to be cast in one piece as I did not see any joints. All its forms were cursive and rounded, giving it both a modern and somewhat aerodynamic but also a highly technological appearance. It looked like an ergonomic seat with the backrest at an angle of about thirty degrees, but it was very massive with many projections, curves and small recesses.

On the right side of the chair, I saw a lateral extension, as an additional rectangular block with a width of about thirty centimeters which had an empty space in the middle with a rather complex structure on the inner walls. It was like an extension of the chair about fifteen centimeters in diameter which went about forty centimeters deep.

On both sides of that rectangular box, I noticed a few lighted blue signs. I immediately recognized the extension for using the crystal, just as I had seen in the images that were converted from the plates in Egypt. Even though the two American officers carefully searched the various areas of the occult chamber, using the equipment they brought for this purpose, they failed to capture any “anomaly” that might offer any indication about the crystal.

At the top of the chair, corresponding to the place where the head is placed, I saw two semicircular metal “strips” with a third that was perpendicular to these, having at the lower end a large round crystal, probably near the forehead of the one sitting in the chair. In the middle of the seat, corresponding to the places of the forearms, were two devices of a somewhat rectangular shape but sharpened towards the tip. At my feet around the ankle area, I saw a wide “band” of crystal supported by a base which featured illuminated signs in phosphorescent blue.

Side extension of the seat. The place for the crystal.

“For the most part, we have little to do here,” said Cezar. “We are to gather the plates and carefully look for the tetrahedral crystal.”

We all looked at him in astonishment. Where would we look for the crystal?

With a hand gesture, Cezar showed me the helmet given by the people of Apellos. He was perfectly right because, after I used it to identify the nature of the opaque wall from the entrance to the occult chamber, I put it down, being concerned about the crystal plates and the special chair. I put the helmet on my head and realized I needed to focus as best I could, knowing that there is a close connection between my psychological state of mind and the object I was focusing on. With that helmet, the sight of the crystal plates turned into a real spectacle because each niche shined brightly due to the electromagnetic emissions they were emitting. It was a somewhat duplicate image with a sparkling light around the edge which indicated to me that the device was showing me the etheric level and its subtleties. Although I carefully took in a 180° panorama of the walls, I failed to notice anything special. Viewing the mysterious chair in the middle of the occult chamber, I knew with certainty that it only worked when it was coupled with the crystal we were looking for. On the other hand, the crystal was not there, and I considered this to be illogical as it had either been deliberately taken by the tunnel builders, which made no sense, or it was hidden. I was rather inclined to accept the second version.

I began to carefully examine the shapes of the chair while Cezar and one of the Americans took the crystal plates from the niches and placed them in the specially compartmented boxes which we had brought with us. While I was carefully investigating the special chair, the other American was paying close attention to my movements and how I proceeded. He had probably received instructions in this regard, but I did not see what they could do for him.

The chair seemed to be covered by a strong subtle field of energy that was phosphorescent indigo, close in color to that of the tunnel walls. When I reached the side extension that was intended for the crystal, I was in for a big surprise: it was empty, like a deep cylinder that appeared to me as being “full” with a cylindrical object which was also covered in a protective field but pink in color. I realized that I was seeing that “tube” in the etheric plane and that the same space would appear to be empty in the physical plane. At that time, we did not view anything on the recordings nor in the occult chamber because we only had the perspective of the physical plane.

In fact, the crystal and tube in which it was “trapped” turned out to be in the subtle etheric plane and were therefore not commonly seen.

I was a little disappointed because I did not understand how the chair could work under these conditions. Approaching the side extension, I looked more closely at the cylinder inside the space that, without a helmet, I perceived as empty. Trapped in that space, it was somehow caught by protrusions I saw coming out of the walls of the empty place. It was perfectly transparent, and at the top and at the bottom, it had a thin ring on the circumference, silver in color. The ring was at the upper limit of the hollow cylindrical housing, and above it I noticed a transparent dome, slightly iridescent, as a field of protection.

Upon seeing the crystal inside the tube, I became filled with emotion. It was shaped like a tetrahedron with its tip down and was suspended in the middle area of the cylinder, probably in a field generated in that space. Although the helmet did not provide full depth perception, I could still see quite a bit of what was a beautiful blue crystal, quite large, perfectly polished on all sides, and reflecting from time to time the multicolored “spark” inside of it.

A comparison with an animated rendering of electrical connections between synapses in the human brain came to my mind. What I saw there was similar to that but in a more refined way. I felt the beauty and harmony that is intrinsic to a pure aesthetic object, something which you can hardly reproduce in words. Thanks to the headset, I even felt the sense that the etheric crystal was a consciousness. As I watched it, an almost hypnotic but deeply empathetic and beneficial connection was created between itself and me. The chair and the etheric crystal formed a subtle symbiosis, a mutual connection with myself that was not invasive. The level of vibration of the consciousness of the person interacting with this arrangement was directly influenced, and from here, I could anticipate a multitude of wonderful possibilities.

I took a deep breath and told the others what I had discovered. We were glad that we were beginning to understand the mystery of the crystal’s “disappearance”, but the enigma of how the of the chair functioned remained. Gathering around the crystal, we exchanged viewpoints about it when, at one point, Cezar suggested that I remove the cylinder from its place as I was the only one who could see it by reason of wearing the helmet tailor-made for myself. I extended my hand towards the “metallic” ring of the cylinder in order to try to pull it out of the housing. The others saw only empty space, but I was doing a “bioenergetic operation”.

CHARACTERISTICS AND CHANGE OF STATUS

As I passed my hand through the small energetic “dome” above the cylinder, a short click was heard, and a slight vibration was felt throughout the chair that was accompanied by a slight hum. Some luminous signs appeared at the end of the chair, this time illuminated in red and pulsing. The chair seemed to come to life, waiting for operating commands. I did not know what that could mean, but Cezar was quite optimistic, foreseeing a fairly easy effort on figuring out the functions of that sophisticated device.

Through the headphone screen, I saw an instantaneous change of frequency spectra that were specific to the physical plane. The form’s brightness disappeared as did the domed subtle field of energy, and the “inner” tube seemed to shrink somewhat due to the decrease in vibrational frequency. Basically speaking, it was a decoupling from the etheric mode of operation and an activation of the physical mode.

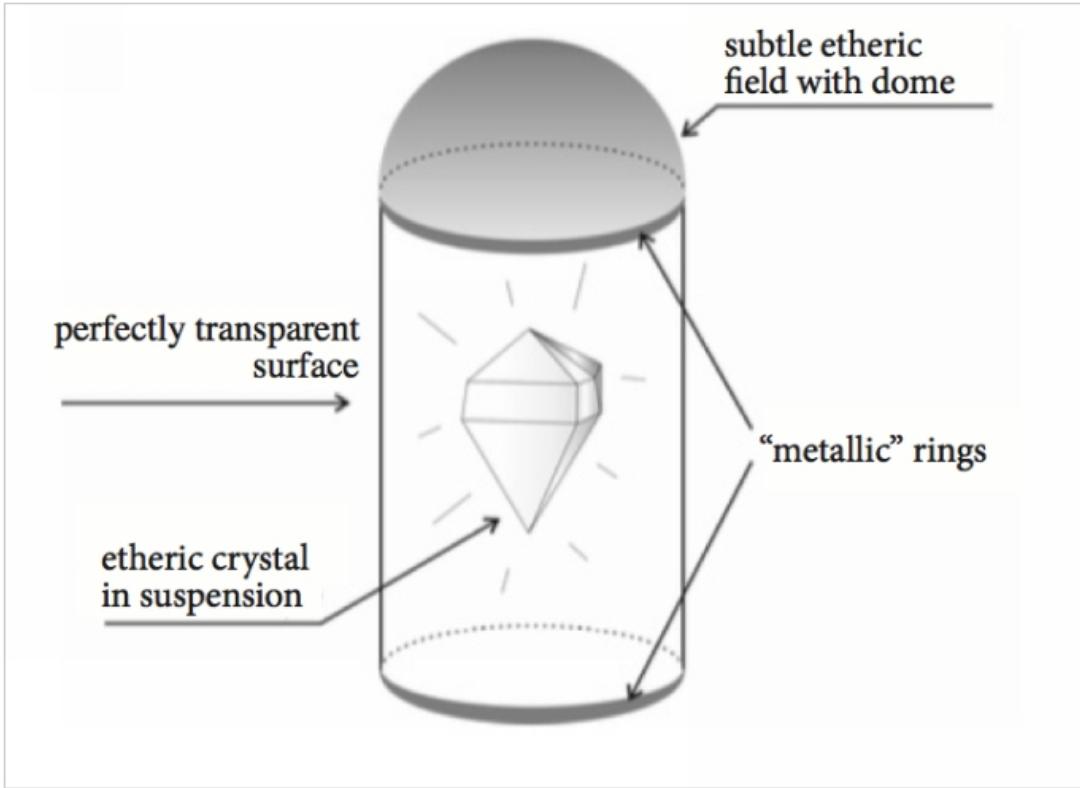

As Cezar smiled, his American colleagues uttered an exclamation of astonishment. Slowly pulling the transparent tube from its place, it came out effortlessly. As he came out of the room and I held the tube with the crystal, I felt a shiver run through my hand which went up to the top of my head. At the same time, I noticed a vibration in the chair with that specific hum. The discrete red lights at the top remained lit, pulsating slowly. While the chair obviously did not have any moving parts, I suspected that the hum and vibrational change were related to a specific frequency change, such as when switching from one operating mode to another. I repeatedly inserted and removed the cylinder with the etheric crystal from its designated place, and each time, I heard the same manifestations of sound, reduced in intensity but nevertheless clear. After that, we turned our attention to the cylinder.

I was holding the tube by the upper ring which had a metallic appearance that very much resembled titanium. I felt, however, that it was not titanium but an unknown material, the information coming into my cortex through the telepathic influence of the headset which I was looking through. I was trying to hold the object upright, imagining that this would avoid a possible disturbance of the position of the crystal on the inside. It was apparently supported by a mysterious force field as we did not see any source, attachment or other piece that would provide the energy needed for it.

To my surprise, the etheric crystal remained perfectly immobile as if it were embedded in that subtle energy field. In practical terms, it was levitating inside the cylinder, unobtrusively radiating a discrete light on its surface. The sight of that glow was as if it were from another world and its blue color generated in myself an inner state of bewilderment, something that seemed to penetrate into the deepest depths of my heart, reaching for unexpected strings of sensibility and even far away nostalgia that I did not quite understand.

The etheric crystal inside the cylinder

Then something amazing happened in my being because I felt a kind of mental “openness”, like a telepathic transmission of some important information about that chair and the etheric crystal. It was like a block of knowledge which I could not decipher. Knowing it was important, I just accepted it, but I was not able to understand it yet.

I was awakened from my “dream” of the miraculous by the voice of one of the Americans.

“What are you looking at now? The cylinder is empty, but what do you see inside of it?”

I recoiled, feeling a chill throughout my being; and putting down the helmet, I also noticed that the physical cylinder I was holding was apparently “empty”. It was extremely light, almost as if I did not feel its weight, and the circular wall was made of a material that, at first glance, resembled glass but created a feeling of great refinement, also being very thin. You could hardly tell that there was a protective layer between the outside and inside of the cylinder.

We all realized then that the lowering of the vibrational frequency included only the outer casing so that the tube took on a physical consistency, the technology for it probably only being relevant in case it needed to be replaced, removed from the housing or even for possible replacement of the etheric crystal inside through some special technique. The source of the transformations and experiences, however, the crystal inside the cylinder, remained etheric in nature. Perhaps this is even the same quality that enables the possibility of detachment and translation of the subtle bodies of beings in other planes of Creation. That extremely advanced and incomprehensible technology enables the etheric crystal to somehow be “trapped” in that tube and remain connected to the special chair to facilitate a phenomenon of separation between the physical and the subtle bodies of those who realize the experience. A kind of “affinity” was probably created between the crystal and the respective being and amplified by the technology of the special chair, but these were only my assumptions at that time based upon a momentary understanding.

Physically speaking, we were all looking at a simple hollow tube, but in reality, it represented a unique form of manifestation, having in its composition a physical part (its outer body) and a subtle etheric part (the crystal inside). Looking closely, even in the physical plane, one could see in the middle of the tube and only from certain angles, a very weak light, more like an extremely fine glow. This was obviously due to the strong subtle influence of the crystal which somehow penetrated from the etheric to the physical plane. This was, however, very discreet and could be observed only under certain conditions, at least as far as we could tell.

VERY ADVANCED TECHNOLOGIES

On the one hand, the discovery of the crystal delighted us because, after some necessary adjustments were made to make it fit the dimensions of an ordinary human being, it offered the possibility of experiments in the special chair. On the other hand, it was a cause for regret because our current earth-bound technology did not allow for the study of that extraordinary device, astonishing by its simplicity but still so efficient by the nature of the effects it produced.

In a brief discussion we had while studying the cylindrical object and the chair, Cezar expressed his concern about the nature of the experiments that would involve the etheric crystal and cylinder. I thought there was probably a need for some caution regarding the nature of the subtle fields to be engaged as there were few chances that other modern scientific methods that were either mechanical or chemical nature would have any effect on the cylinder. Cezar did not even react to the sophisticated equipment brought by Americans. For example, the probe with the special scanning device indicated absolutely nothing, and the thermal spectrometer recorded only a slight variation of the parameters. It was quite discouraging for a start, but after all, the study and research of the artifacts in the secret complex in Bucegi was the job of scientists; and although their progress was minimal after all these years, it started to appear exactly in the sphere that interested us: the field of akashic recordings.

An immediate experience in the special chair was very tempting, but after some deliberations, Cezar decided that we would postpone this because several conditions had to be met first. The first was to adjust the position in the chair so that the body of the experiencer was coupled to all the necessary elements: head, hands and feet. Of these, only the head area could be accessed easily, but for the other two, the construction elements being much larger, a technical solution had to be sought. Before actual experiments could be conducted, a few preliminary expeditions were required to make the respective adjustments. Otherwise, the faculties of the chairs could not be explored.

I took the necessary photographic footage, checking the retrieval of all the tablets according to the inventory, and the cylinder with the etheric crystal was taken by Cezar. We stayed for almost two hours in that room, and although we were five, we felt no difference in the internal climate. The humidity and temperature were the same, and the oxygen level was perfectly normal. I exchanged a few words with Cezar about this and he told me that this aspect also caught his attention since the first expeditions to the two occult chambers in Egypt and Iraq. It was, however, a real mystery because you could not find any source that was maintaining the ambient atmosphere. The only conclusion that the scientists could draw that was indeed logical and relevant was that the atmosphere inside was somehow automatically regulated by the “intelligent” properties in the tunnel itself. Although this environment managed to meet all the biological requirements of a human being, it remained an unresolved mystery.

THE EFFECT OF SPATIAL DISTORTIONS

Pretty loaded with containers and containers, we left the occult chamber in the tunnel space and headed towards the spatial distortion. Following us, the subtle opaque field closed like a faithful guardian, occluding any image of the interior of the room. In a few minutes, we walked the road back, the same one we had arrival on, crossing successively the distortions along the tunnel. Due to the fact that the distortions were more numerous, the protocol recommended a recovery of several days in order to avoid certain unpleasant reactions at the level of the mitochondria, an effect that the researchers observed over time on those who took part in the expeditions through the three tunnels. After one or two passages through these spatial distortions, the influence on the fine structure of the human body was not noticeable, but after several successive “jumps”, especially within a short time, the cells begin to react.

The effects are somewhat similar to those of nuclear irradiation, although they do not involve the same consequences. It has more to do with a destabilization of mitochondrial DNA as a result of the energy demand required during the pass throughs. This can quickly cause states of weakness and even dizziness. There are exceptions, however, where such effects are not felt. Cezar, for example, is one such case. Even though he has gone on dozens of expeditions with frequent “jumps”, he has always been found healthy at medical checks. Personally, I have noticed that he is even more vital after such expeditions, his skin seeming to be finer and more shiny. Researchers involved in this program, however, have hypothesized that, as time passes and with the repetition of experiences, DNA learns the specific imprint of the leap and adapts to it pretty quickly.

I arrived at the Projection Hall and then loaded everything into the electric conveyors outside the entrance to the Great Gallery. Quickly going through the administrative and other protocol stages, we handed the materials over to the scientific team for further inspection and climbed into the waiting helicopter.

In the evening, I spent a very relaxing time at the Base in the reading room, reviewing the main elements of the expedition from which we had just come. The journey through the Third Tunnel had been the fastest and easiest trip, very efficient in terms of time and access. Not once did I think about the amazing changes of scenery associated with moving very fast between realities belonging to different planes of existence. In only a few hours, one can travel thousands of miles back and forth, perform multiple spatial jumps and explore some of the most unique mysteries before returning to the Base where you can have an evening of pleasant discussion in the study or meeting room while drinking an aromatic tea. It is disconcerting for one’s psychological equilibrium; but after a while, you get used to it and it becomes an integral part of your life experience.

In particular, I was very glad that the mystery of the crystal was solved because, through the use of the special chair in the near future, it could open a whole universe of unexpected possibilities of knowledge. Also, I reflected intensely at the moments when I had an unexpected subtle “communion” with the etheric reality in which I felt the “pulse” of the life of that crystal, something I perceived as almost a living entity. I did not suspect how fast and in what form I would return to that reality, it representing a major leap in my evolution and knowledge.

2 — EDEN – A DERIVATIVE VERSION OF THE WONDROUS CHAIR

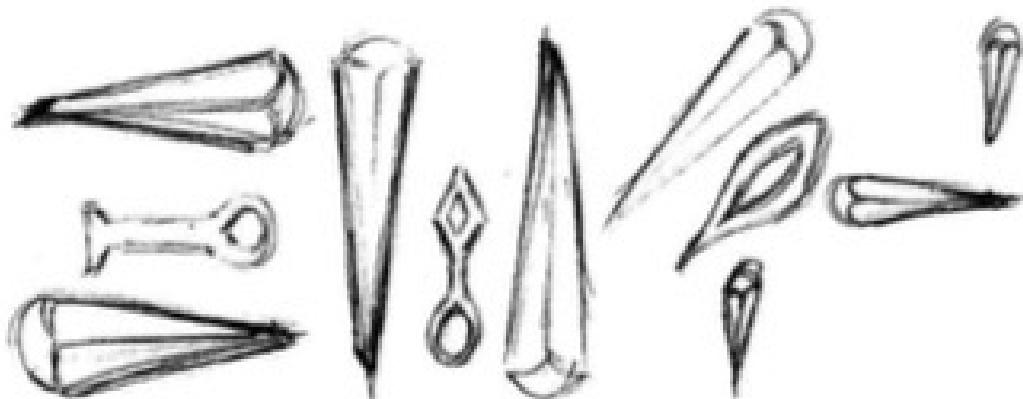

The two days we spent looking at the holographic images in the company of the man from Apellos embodied a mine of information essential to what the true history of humanity and its main points actually signify. It took me more than a month to synthesize this data based on hurried notes taken in front of the holographic screen. It was a huge volume of knowledge, elements and aspects which I felt responsible for presenting correctly, synthetically and intelligently.*

[FOOTNOTE: * The author refers here to the contents of volume 6 of the Transylvania Series, Forgotten Genesis, 2019]

A few days after I started this work, I was at the Alpha Base and analyzing the file of the occult chamber of Iraq into which we had also introduced our latest reports. Looking closely at the photographs taken during the expedition, I suddenly felt an interest in a larger set of symbols embedded on the edges of the chair inside the chamber. Something drew me like a magnet to those symbols that I knew nothing about. I had a certain impression that I had seen them before, but I could not specify where exactly. A feeling that I had to make a decision was more and more on my mind, but I had no idea what that decision or action might be.

I turned my head to the window of the room, looking at the moon over the clear sky of the cold night which mysteriously reflected itself over the silent snow of the hills. For a few moments, enthralled by that enigmatic picture of the winter landscape, I felt that my mind seemed cleared of thoughts, but that only lasted a few moments because, almost immediately afterwards, the clear image of the chair in the occult chamber in Iraq came to my mind. An irresistible desire forced me to put on my helmet and go into playback mode. The images that I had clearly outlined in my mind with the chair immediately appeared, highlighting in detail the mysterious symbols that attracted me.

The enigmatic symbols that caught my eye, encrusted on the walls of the special chair

This was an important moment because I remembered that some of these symbols in the images on the holographic screen I had seen when we were looking at the data on the evolution of man and the modeling phases of his DNA. Whether they were universal symbols included in a galactic language or were part of a specific set of data, it was evident that they represented the traces of extraordinary alien knowledge.

I looked carefully at the set of data and information that appeared on the edges of the headset image and gradually began to “feel” those symbols, not just look at them. The sensation was well-known to me from the visions I had previously experienced because the inter-dimensional helmet facilitated my psycho-mental experience of what I saw, “projecting” me into the reality there. The symbols came “alive”, loaded with a “conscious” energy which made me understand their essence intuitively.

At that moment, an intense emotion gripped me and my mind began to work with a feverishness. It was exactly the opposite of the state of peace I had experienced a few moments before, but I felt a sudden inspiration which prompted me to act immediately. I took off my helmet, sat down at the table and began to write down a few elements, even drawing some rudimentary sketches of the images that were quickly rolling in my mind.

At first, I was just drawing seemingly meaningless lines, trying to “connect” to the information I had in mind. I realized that everything had to do with building a chair like the one seen in the occult chamber of Iraq, but I still retained a considerable dose of skepticism in this regard. The technology involved there seemed light years away from what I knew I could do or understand.

For example, it was obvious that I did not have an etheric crystal nor the technology needed to work with it nor did I know the operating principles of the chair. However, I immediately found a foothold, a possibility by which I hoped to compensate for these big shortcomings, at least to some extent, in order to have the chance to build a similar device. I could not say exactly what was leading me to build such, but the effervescence I felt and the aspiration to do so amazed me.

In support of realizing that idea, I thought that important help could come from the recordings of the images in the occult chamber which I had access to thanks to the inter-dimensional headset. I had already used that important playback function and mastered how to get the recordings I wanted in order to interpret the images that were running fast in my mind. In fact, I mainly relied on the helmet and the details it offered which appeared on the edge of the lens because they involved symbols and even certain schematics and synthetic images. I hoped I could understand a lot of them, especially since I had some experience in interpreting such symbols and vibrations over a very wide range of frequencies, but I also relied on the telepathic influxes I could get through the headset as I have often been guided to look at the elements and information about the past of Mankind. In addition to this, I felt a certain inner impulse and a surprising confidence in going forward on that path and persevering in the practical realization of the idea. I could not explain it very well, but I knew somehow that everything had to do with the “block of knowledge” that I received in the occult chamber in Iraq when I had that state of “communion” with the etheric crystal that was referred to in the last chapter.

I put on my helmet again and lightly touched its rectangular surface on the left side of the head, next to the temple, to go into playback mode. I then focused on the chair, remembering what had happened in the occult chamber. An image was immediately clarified on the “glass” of the headset in holographic format. Basically, what I was seeing was a faithful rendering of the moments that had happened there a few days before, a perfect record of the period of time I had worn the helmet in that space. Indeed — at the top right-hand side of the image, I could see a series of symbols and shapes that followed one another quite quickly but which I could stop by mental control. As in the case of the holographic screen, the helmet indicates the most important elements through variations of light intensity while others were “described” by different frequencies which I perceived directly in the cortex.

In the beginning, putting the schematics and “equations” on paper was somewhat automatic. For me, it was quite easy to play them back from memory, but I did not understand much of the meanings of those equations. I could, however, see that the unusual symbols, signs, and notations that predominated combined with others that were quite similar to those known to me. Only later did I realize that they had the role of making me deconstruct and understand the substratum of the archaic symbols, some of which are even known to the current scientific world.

I soon realized that the first symbols and images were a kind of physics lessons for me to learn some of the basic principles of new concepts and constructive ideas that were unfolding in front of my eyes on the lens of the inter-dimensional headset. Inspired by the telepathic transmissions that I was able to understand and that were provided to me through the highly developed headphone technology, I learned to somehow “translate” those symbols into a set of drawings and formulas that could be found, at least some of them, in contemporary physics.

Initially, I did not understand the relationships and symbols depicted in the immediate drawing, but I could still “access” them to the point where it was if I was “seeing” them somewhere in the back the head, in the occipital area. I then figured out how to decode them using a “key” that I was able to perceive.

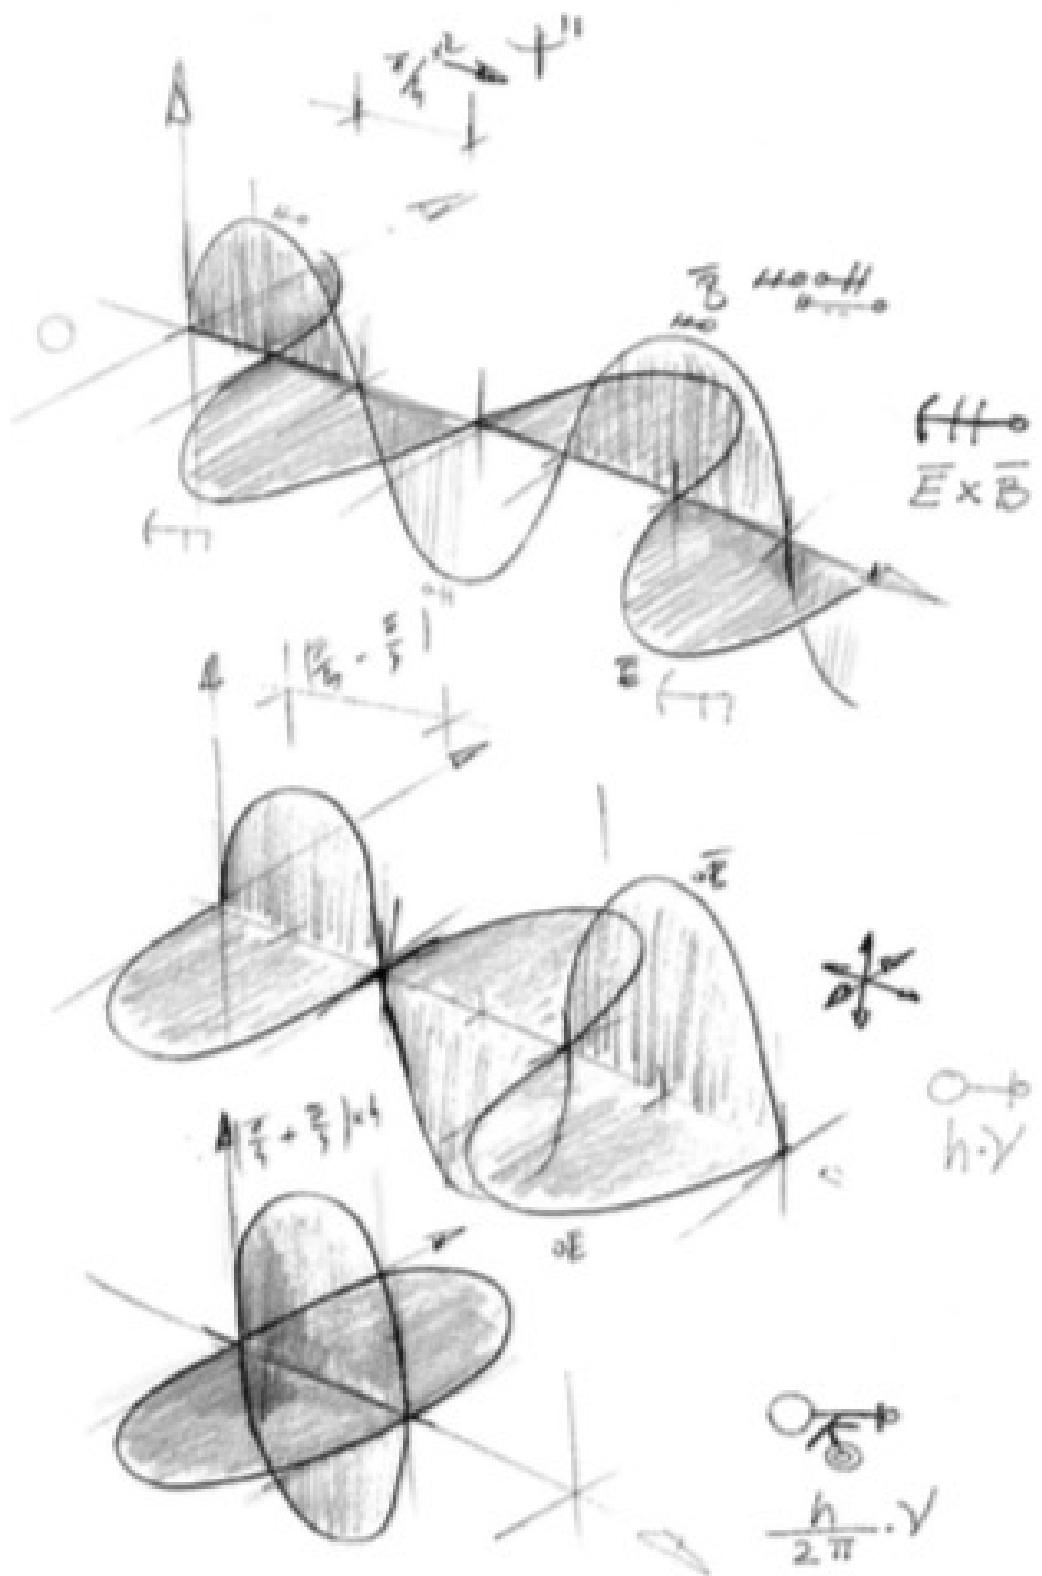

Each symbol I saw was accompanied by an explanation in terms of energy and an obvious correspondence in the macrocosmic plane. It is possible that the very deep and intense impressions created by my long viewing of holographic images of the history of Mankind might have sensitized me to certain areas of the cortex but also to the mental sphere which made possible my extended understanding and interpretive intuition of the symbols I had seen. This probably opened a bridge to an alien civilization because I recognized many of the symbols that had already been “imprinted” in my mind from the holographic images which I had already experienced.

I gradually began to understand the connections that existed between certain symbols and the different images that were represented schematically as an electromagnetic wave in the form of “quantum” light. However, when deciphering the patterns I saw on the lens of the inter-dimensional headset, I realized that, besides the rendering of the magnetic and electric fields, there were some elements that I did not understand but which I tacitly accepted.

I noted that while I engaged in this process a clearer understanding of these elements gradually appeared in my mind. I made connections between different aspects, translated some symbols and even participated in rendering that information in its own proper order. Pretty quickly, I was able to make other correlations; and gradually, I managed to decipher a set of images that taught me to create a special device myself. It would be designed to generate electromagnetic signals similar to the ones I saw in the images, but there was still something in its composition that I could not understand yet.

Different types of electromagnetic waves and their associated symbols

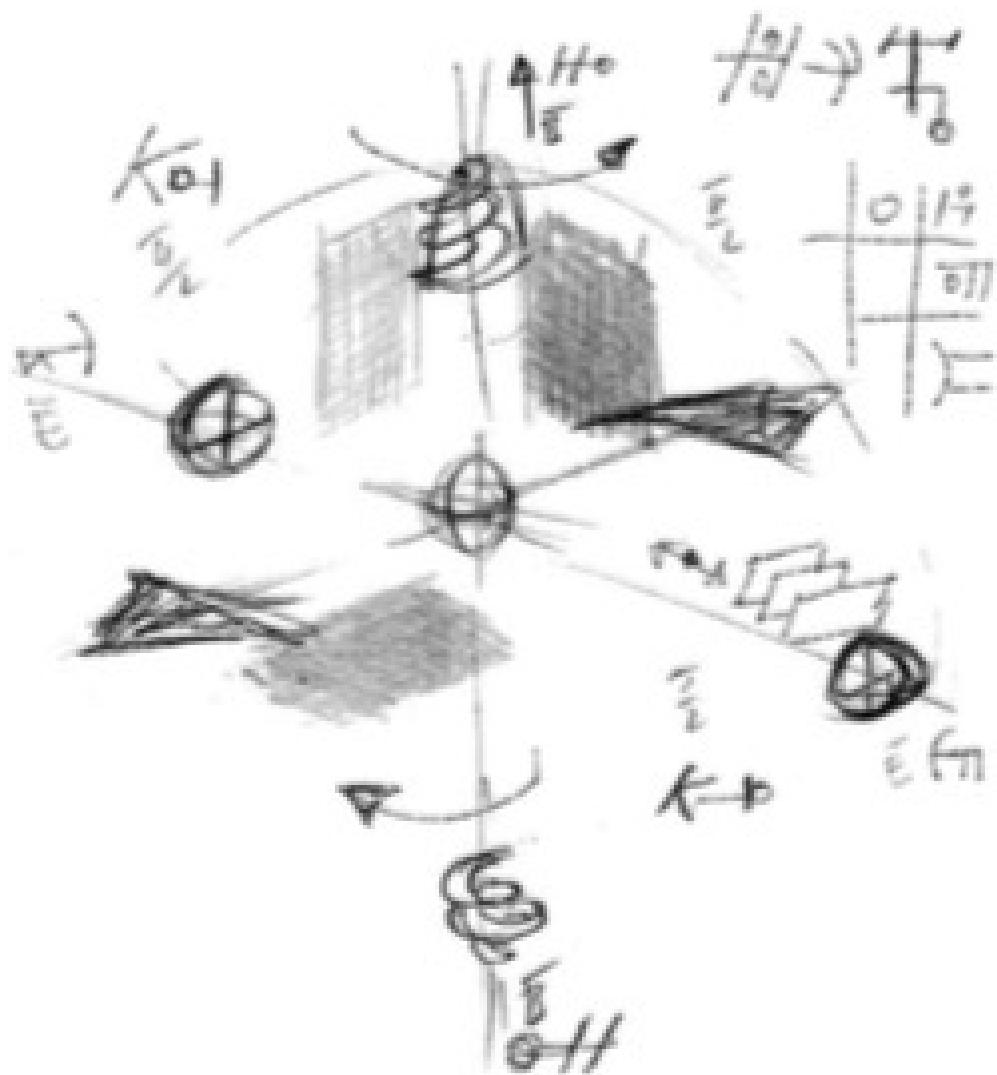

“Quantum” of light

Without having any concrete proof, I somehow understood that, through those images, I was actually getting data on the construction of a chair similar to the one in Iraq. It was obvious that I could not achieve an identical construction, but nevertheless, I felt inspired to understand the main basics and the source of energy by which, at least to some extent, the effects of the special chair in the occult chamber of Iraq could be duplicated. Realizing that much of that experience was a knowledge that was given to me, I sensed the importance of such a device as well as to how it could contribute to the knowledge of the human being.

Conceptual diagram of the device capable of generating a particular electromagnetic field

As Cezar had left for several days in Bucharest and because I did not want to forget any element, I had the time to put everything on paper and sketch the first images of the machine. I realized that the information did not come merely as an act of activated memory, but it was somehow integrated directly into my cortex when I viewed the different images or symbols and correlated them with a certain understanding. Access to them was very easy, but more than that, I was perceiving this data and information in a global way. I could, for example, individualize each element, but I also had the image of integrating it as a whole, of its functionality, and of the way it complemented other elements of the structure of the apparatus.

The first ideas of the general shape of the machine began to materialize about two days later. It was a kind of “rearranging” of the information in my mind, as if it had now become used to the multitasking data being transmitted to it. I could say that I understood, in a general way, both the design of the machine and its overall shape. I also realized that it was a modular construction which was transmitted to me for the simple reason of putting it into practice. Once I received this data, I also had an intuitive understanding of why the information was transmitted to me with the implication of what the device could do. In my opinion, these two aspects were correlated. On the one hand, there was the strong impression left by the special chair and the etheric crystal from our expedition through the Third Tunnel into the occult chamber of Iraq. On the other hand, the intensive viewing of holographic images were “days of fire” which showed me the true course of the origin and history of the human being on Earth. Therefore, the idea of constructing the device was related to those realities and would probably give me an easier way to access a certain type of information.

Later, it turned out that the function of the device was even more than that. Made precisely and in accordance with the specifications received, that device could induce in a human being an effect similar to that of the special chair in Iraq’s occult chamber. I was increasingly convinced that it could actuate an efficient but especially conscious connection with the etheric and astral bodies, thus allowing the controlled exploration of some realities in the subtle but also the physical world. I also hoped that I would be able to access, at least to some extent, the space-time continuum and its mysteries.

In the following days, as I perceived the image of separate components of the structure, it created a specific field. The images then seemed to come together and give a consistency to the whole, clarifying the overall ensemble. I saw a circular frame with some attached elements that were laser-like jets or guns, serving as transmitters of some sort. Their construction and operation were based on crystals and a complex of alloys in which gold predominated. Only later would I realize that the frame consisted of a horizontal and a tilted component which together constituted the entire ensemble.

Sketch of the circular frame with diametrically opposed “jets” (transmitters), with crystals

The “jets” had a complex interior structure, but on the outside, they appeared as concentric cylinders with a crystal of a certain shape and a certain size at the top.

“Laser-gun” transmitter with crystal tip

The inside of these “laser guns” contained several types of crystals and other materials as well as three different types of coils, two of which were very complex.

The data I received also included that there should be an integrated seat in the central part of the construction. However, it had no “attractors” such as the chair in Iraq’s occult chamber and was tilted at 15° in relation to the vertical plane.

As was the case of the special chair, this device had no obvious use of an etheric crystal for its operation, but it was my impression was that its design and technology were adapted as much as possible to the suitabilities of the ordinary human being in order to achieve a notable effect. Even so, some requirements were challenging to fulfill, such as the gold and titanium plating of the exterior of the circular frames which we called “layers” or the special crystals that were a part of almost every component in the device.

Also, according to the information I received, some parts of the machine had to be made in red. These were needed to convert certain signals from the inter-dimensional helmet and from the crystal “laser-jets” because the specific action of the headset induced in the brain, and especially in the pineal gland, an expansion of the energy field on a certain frequency which was amplified by the crystals at the end of them. Additionally, a number of special spherical coils had to be made of an alloy of hafnium, ruthenium and neodymium which is, technologically speaking, very difficult to achieve. I knew all too well that those specifications are very difficult to meet, but I was hoping to find a solution in the future.

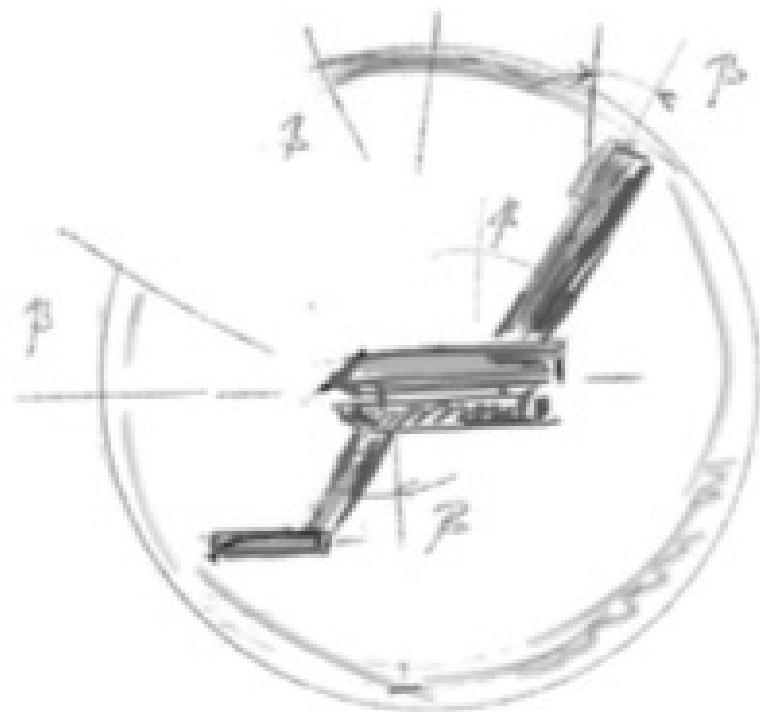

When the information I received became more crystallized in my mind, I could “see” the general outer form of the construction, but in reality, it proved to be much more complex. In order to have a reference, I gave it a name: “Eden”. After first resorting to a sketch, I then elaborated on it more and more.

Exterior structure of the device

In its completed and final phase, the device also had a specially positioned chair so as to respect the specific angles of construction of the exterior shape.

Special “angle” version of the device with a specific angle in relation to the external components of the device

It took me a long time to understand why there was that permanent inclination to a vertical position. It could not be just for the relaxation of the body or for inducing a beneficial trance state. I carefully studied the symbols and representations that accompanied the recordings with the special chair in the occult chamber in Iraq where the incline was much higher, and I finally managed to decipher some of the complicated signs I was seeing. By comparison, I realized that the seat tilt of Eden was meant to facilitate certain important transformations in the body of the person who was reclining in it. The organism of the being was to absorb a series of waves that were emitted by the apparatus over a very wide range of frequencies, allowing the connections between the water molecules in its body to become very complex.

As I realized later, the water connections that were in the cells of the physical body, through a regular training or resonance with that device, came to align with a central signal, a kind of fractal “seed” which would in turn later develop into a series of other electrical and magnetic signals. In this way, I could become apt to receive certain information from the subtle planes and then be able to “see” them subtly but also to “feel” the subtle properties and acquire a broad knowledge of them. After that, I could access that information even with the senses of the physical body. I was trying to understand as well as possible the design of such a device and finally realized that it was actually a converter of information from the subtle planes into information that is specific to the physical plane which the ordinary human body is capable of receiving. After discussions we had in the next period with some of our specialists — without, however, giving them the overall view of the device — I came to the conclusion that Eden is a “machine” that creates a kind of temporary space tunnel, like a kind of “wormhole” that is spoken of in today’s physics. Only then did I understand why receiving the images on the lens of the inter-dimensional headset also appeared on the image below, something I did not consider important at first.

Image with the representation of a space-time tunnel which creates a connection between the physical and the subtle plane

Based on the data I received telepathically, I made some adaptations and constructive solutions where things did not seem to go well due to blurred memory or a lack of clarity of information. Some of the elements I did not render in sketches, such as electronic devices from the outside of the “machine” such as energy sources or sophisticated computing equipment needed to adjust the relative position of the human-device in real time.

Finally, I managed to create a more comprehensive sketch of the whole ensemble. After a fair amount of hard work, I was able to understand at least in part the intention of those who inspired me to start making this device. Basically, they telepathically guided me to build such a “personal use” device that was similar to the effects I had witnessed in the Occult Chamber in Iraq.

Sketch of a general view of the device with the seat inside

As soon as I reached this point with the general outline of the device and also acquired the understanding of its general operating principles, I called Cezar and told him that I had some important information. He was already on the way to the Base so we saw each other in just a few hours, and I was quite surprised. Cezar realized it was important so we retired to the protocol room to discuss this.

He listened carefully to me, very focused. I briefly told him how I had deciphered the “block” of information, showed him the first sketches and told him what I believe the device represents, correlating everything with the chair in the Occult Chamber that we had visited through the Third Tunnel. The main idea which I suggested was to build an apparatus at the department level with the support of our team of scientists based upon the information we received so that all of us could have access to it. This would offer the same type of results from using the chair in Iraq. It was already obvious that we could not move the chair from the Occult Chamber because it seemed to be an integral part of the chamber’s construction. In addition, it was strongly magnetized. We were able, however, to find and even extract the etheric crystal and bring it back for study.

The problem with the device that I wanted to build, all of it based upon the information I had received, was of a different nature.

“If we present this to the authorities, be sure that we will not be believed, given the ‘questionable’ nature of the information,” said Cezar. “No one will rely on information received ‘telepathically’, even if you have training in this regard. We do not have solid ‘proof’ to convince them for obtaining the funds, and as far as I know, they are not at all small. At this level of knowledge, very few are those with decision-making power and a tailor-made budget who would be confident enough in the results. Those who decide in this regard always face the practical side of the problem; and, in a sense, they are right. But their lack of training in such sensitive areas such as the border between science and “unreality”, as well as their poor understanding, would make them immediately suspicious and not believe in this information. Just by shaking the waters on this, we could attach a ‘tail’ to ourselves that we do not need.”

I had to give him his due. After all, I could not even be sure of the results we would eventually get. There was no guarantee and no similar past experience, except for perhaps that of Maria Orsic and the medium transmission she received about the construction of a cosmic ship to Aldebaran.*

[FOOTNOTE: *The author refers to the leader of the Vril esoteric society, Maria Orsic (or Orsitsch), who, in 1919, presented to prominent members of two other secret societies (the Thule Society and the Lords of the Black Stone) written material following a medium transmission, edited by her, in a language later identified as a variant of an ancient language of the German Knights Templar. Maria Orsic stated that the telepathic transmission was monitored from an extraterrestrial civilization in the Aldebaran system located in the Taurus Constellation sixty-five light-years away from Earth. The manuscript presented the detailed technical data for the construction of a cosmic spacecraft capable of traveling to that planetary system. At the same time, Maria Orsic presented a second manuscript written in a state of media transmission which was in the Sumerian language and was translated with the help of specialists close to Thule Society and especially with the help of Sigrun, one of the four women (Vrilerinnen) who made up the core of the Vril Society.]

I, however, found it hard to believe that all the “infusion” of data I had experienced was pointless, and Cezar agreed with me. The idea then came to me that, if we could not formally use this information, we could yet prove to ourselves the truthfulness of the data by starting the construction of the apparatus in a particular order. Although he was initially surprised by my proposal, Cezar immediately smiled.

“And where could this be done without anyone knowing it?” he asked.

I thought a little and had the inspiration to suggest Elinor’s villa. There, I had enough space in the basement near the alchemy lab; and besides, no one would have to know. The only impediment was the distance between Alpha Base and the capital, but over time, we were convinced that we could handle it. For our part, I had another asset: Lieutenant Nicoară, a specialist in physics and electronics who is also a man of perfect confidence and morality. Working with him would be a great help.

I weighed another two or three options with Cezar before we concentrated on this one, going into detail. Obviously, we could not miss too much time from the Base due to our many duties there. We, however, made a simple plan which could give results if Lieutenant Nicoară agreed to cooperate. We would then have every weekend available; and, from time to time, even more days that could be combined with other trips to Bucharest.

I then went through the analysis of the financial part because, according to my data, the amount of money required was huge. Accordingly, we provided for a slight adaptation of some of the materials and a few other small changes. Since the IT (Information Technology) field was essential in this project, I agreed with Cezar to call a friend of mine, a programming genius. In his case, we established a compartmentalization of labor, giving him only the software design themes, just as we have done with other specialists and designers in our service. I even had discussions with the scientists from the scientific team attached to the Bucegi secret complex, but generally speaking, I preferred to keep everything separate from the official side.

My intention here is not to present details about this amazingly positive device but just to give a general idea about its exceptional existence and its possibilities. In fact, the general sketches we have offered here were replaced with very precise and detailed drawings which made for amazing solutions that later made possible the construction of the device. It turned out, however, that its use required a long preparation until a “frequency agreement” could be reached between the user — who would be myself — and the device. For me, the use of this device represented a great qualitative leap regarding the correct understanding of some amazing realities, both of the physical world and of the subtle worlds or dimensions. I will detail some of these elements in the following volumes, and I hope that in this way many of the gaps that still exist in contemporary science that are related to the misunderstanding of the basic principles governing important phenomena in the Universe will be clarified or even eliminated from the burden of the current materialist conception.

3 — NEW PROJECTS IN DEVELOPMENT

Immediately after returning from the expedition, Cezar assigned the team of scholars the very important and urgent task of studying the etheric crystal. The plan for the construction of the device, which I generically named “Eden”, implies a deeper understanding of how the space-time continuum works, i.e. the reality in which we exist. It was obvious that the technology of the etheric crystal and that of the special chair in Iraq’s occult chamber could greatly help us in this regard, but we at least had to understand the general principles underlying those technologies.

A UNIQUE KIND OF BRAINSTORMING

The development of the chair’s construction went somewhat in parallel with the scientific studies of the team of scientists. It seemed as if a new breath motivated and inspired them to work intensely, provoked by the amazing piece that was brought to them for research. They quickly realized that they would not be able to understand anything more about that extraterrestrial technology if they were to continue to use the “canonical” ideas and conceptions of contemporary science. Accordingly, they began to develop a new and very complicated mathematical reference frame which no longer adheres to the old principles.

Up until Einstein, Euclidean space was taken as the mathematical basis for describing the Universe.* After that, a major interest began to be given to the space of the phases “created” by the canonical equations of Hamilton in which several parallel dimensions are “seen” but are not, however, properly understood.

[FOOTNOTE: *Euclidean space was defined by the Greek mathematician Euclid of Alexandria (3rd-4th centuries B.C.) in his work Elements which served as a basic text in modern countries for understanding mathematics (especially geometry) until the 20th century. In contemporary mathematics, Euclidean space represents the fundamental space of classical geometry which can describe any spatial variety with an integer and a non-negative number of dimensions. This includes three-dimensional Euclidean space (with 3 dimensions) as well as the Euclidean plane (with 2 dimensions).][FOOTNOTE: Hamilton’s first-order partial derivative equations are characterized by the fact that they provide a new (and equivalent) way of looking at Newton's classical mechanics. They do not, however, give a more convenient way of solving particular problems, but they do offer some prospects for a deeper understanding of classical mechanics and its links with quantum mechanics as well as other fields of science. Hamilton's canonical equations are very "attractive" given their simplicity and symmetry. They were analyzed from all points of view imaginable, from the fundamental mechanics to the geometry of vector spaces. We know a whole series of solutions of these equations for a lot of physical systems, but the exact general solution of the equations of motion for physical systems with more than two bodies which interact through a certain force field (for example, the gravitational field) is not yet known.]

The spatial theory, however, that won the conviction of the researchers was Minkowski space*, especially after the elaboration of the *Special Theory of Relativity by Albert Einstein because, theoretically speaking, the number of dimensions of this mathematical space can be any integer greater than 1, meaning, at least virtually, there are an infinity of dimensions or planes of existence that can be formed in Minkowskian space, including both space and time. The problem is that those dimensions really correspond to another time and space, but they are also considered physical planes.

[FOOTNOTE: * Minkowski space, introduced by the German mathematician Hermann Minkowski, "mathematically" responds to the formulation and support of Einstein's Special Theory of Relativity. In the context of this theory, the three ordinary dimensions of space are "combined" with a fourth dimension which involves time to form a 4-dimensional representation of space-time. Formally, Minkowski space can also be considered as a pseudo-Euclidean space with 4 dimensions (Euclidean space has only spatial dimensions; the Minkowski space also has spatial dimensions, but in addition, it also has a dimension that involves time).]

[FOOTNOTE:  The Special Theory of Relativity was published by Albert Einstein in 1905 in an article entitled About the Electrodynamics of Moving Bodies and generalizes the principle of classical relativity formulated by Galileo Galilei. This principle states that all uniform movements are relative and that there is no privileged reference system (or "source"), i.e. there is no absolute resting state. In that article, Einstein added a second postulate which states that all observers will get (following the appropriate measurements) the same value for the speed of light in a vacuum regardless of their uniform and rectilinear motion. The Special Theory of Relativity is practically a generalization of Newton's classical mechanics which modifies the notions of space and time in the sense that the measurement of distances and time intervals (depending on the observer's state of motion) is made with the help of light which has the same speed (in a vacuum) as any observer in an inertial reference system. Hence, the famous “equivalence” between matter and energy expressed by the famous formula: $E = mc^2$.]

They do not show or explain what the subtle planes or dimensions of Creation, such as the etheric plan or the astral plane, actually mean in a way that is more accessible to ordinary human understanding and knowledge.

In a working meeting that Cezar, Lieutenant Nicoară, myself, and two other members of the Department had with a team of scientists after returning from our expedition through the Third Tunnel, Cezar suggested changing our paradigm of how we think about the space-time continuum by taking into account the factor of vibrational frequency. In the months that followed, this led to the initiation and development of a new thinking mechanism which needed special rendering tools. This is why the process of laying the foundations of a new mathematical method, which would describe this mechanism and thus lead to an understanding of this new approach, was initiated simultaneously. Because the problem was very complex, it also involved collaboration with two exceptional Russian mathematicians and physicists who had demonstrated some initiative in this regard.

The mathematical apparatus was so sophisticated and the solutions provided were so advanced that I was not able to understand it any better. In this meeting, however, I was allowed to present some aspects of the memorable discussion I had with Dr. Xien about the perception of space and time. I did not reproduce those elements in Inside the Earth - The Second Tunnel as they did not fit into the subject of that book. On the other hand, it seemed to me that it would have been too much for the ordinary concept of the world that we live in. In this new context, however, I find it appropriate to present the abstract notions that Dr. Xien shared with me, even if they might seem spooky to some people.

ANOTHER POINT OF REFERENCE: THE “WRINKLE” OF ILLUSION

I presented the respective information to the team of scientists during the brainstorming session; but in order to keep the spirit of the elements shared, I will replay the discussion I had with Dr. Xien in its original form. He pointed out from the very beginning the weakness of the current scientific concept.

“The problem I will tell you about now is posed in a way that science considers unlikely. In essence, there is no volume. If you look at an apple, you feel that it has an outer surface which is its shell, and you also say that it has something inside which is the pulp of the apple. In fact, none of this exists. Everything you see is actually just a box. It’s like making a box out of a fabric and then painting it and arranging it to look like an apple. In reality, the respective “apple” is the continuation of a surface. It is only a “wave” or a “crease” of the surface. I just have the feeling that there is something I call “the inside”, but it is actually nothing. And beyond that surface is also nothing, that is, the Void. Whatever object you look at, it seems to be how you see it and how you attribute its properties to it, but it really isn’t. It is just “a box of the universal surface”, and beyond the “wrinkle” of each object, you have access to Infinity.”

At that time, I had not fully determined whether or not to take seriously the explanations offered by Dr. Xien. I was thinking, in fact, that he had not understood what interested me, and that is why I was making some jokes about “lack of volume”. I spoke to him.

“I think you realize that, for scientists, what you tell me now is just a product of fantasy and that in the happiest case...”

Dr. Xien replied impassively.

“They can believe what they want, but do not forget that science reduces to the five senses, to formulas and to devices of measurement and control. No one has ever seen the wind, but it still exists. I do not speak to you in metaphors, but I seek to make you understand that the strictly materialistic contemporary vision is limited and insufficient to explain many of the enigmas of the surrounding reality.

I knew he was right, and that is why I did not extend the discussion in this regard, even though his explanation of “lack of volume” seemed a bit exaggerated. On the other hand, it was obvious that Dr. Xien wanted to stay within the sphere of the original subject regarding the reality inside the Earth. He suggested some additional subjects for discussion to point out certain issues. It was up to me whether or not I could listen to them and understand them. I suggested a new perspective on the issue of “volume”.

“What if I break the object? If you cut the apple?”

“You then made a new surface,” came the immediate answer. “When you fly from the apple, it is a new surface, but beyond your bite, it is not an apple but also the Infinite Surface. You need to understand this well. It is hard, it is abstract, but you have to understand it.”

I was baffled. According to Dr. Xien, the idea of volume is false. There is no volume. There are only surfaces, the “wrinkled ones” of which we create our life experience. They are the “waves” of illusion that deceive people. With such a summary, I felt I was taken very quickly to an abstract field of discussion, but I did not understand it too well. Even so, I came up with a new argument.

“The fact that we are here cannot be denied. It’s not an illusion.”

“It is, but this happens only because our individual consciousness ‘sees’ it this way and believes that there is something it calls ‘outside’. That makes the world exist. Otherwise, what is outside the ‘skin’, whatever it is, is nothing but the Infinite.”

I was silent, indecisive. It was a real test of the conception of the world we live in. Seeing my uncertainty, Dr. Xien asked me a question.

“At this moment, tell me how far do you see the world around you?”*

[FOOTNOTE: * According to what is reported in Volume 5, Inside the Earth - Second Tunnel, the discussions between the author and Dr. Xien took place in the fall of 2014.]

“To the door. We’re underground, what more could I see?”

“But you know from experience what is beyond it. You imagine the mountains, the trees, and then the cities with streets, blocks and cars that are difficult to get into in traffic.”

“I can’t imagine that. I know it is.”

I was upset because I was not sure where he wanted to go. I realized that somewhere there was a weak point of how I was stating the problem, but in that discussion I still could not identify it. Impervious to me, Doctor Xien replied.

“Wrong. You do not know. You just assume you know, but you actually are living in an illusion. Things come to mind because you have their memory, but you might suddenly face another reality. Suppose this room is soundproofed. On the surface comes a terrible hurricane, tornado or devastating flood of which you know nothing. When you come to the surface, what world do you see? A world other than the one you had designed in your mind: a destroyed world, completely changed.”

“If so, then what can I say about the Inner Earth or anything else I don’t know?”

“Basically, you can’t say anything because there is nothing that correlates with what you already know. Remember that everything is just a “box” on the surface of your consciousness.”

Doctor Xien bent the table cloth to form a loop. He showed me its curvature.

“You know this box is a specific object, but behind the box, in the back, you see nothing. Theoretically, there is nothing from your perspective and angle of view. You just suppose it would be something. Observing the box as it curves means for you a specific curve of space and time. You send an energy which is your conception of what that thing should be, and that ray of energy ‘hits’ the surface of Reality and sends you an echo. If you stand in front of a huge wall and kick a ball, it hits that wall and then it curls in a specific way which is the echo I was telling you about. For you, that echo is your reality about that aspect, your conception of it. It is the echo that the box sends you, that is, that curve of space and time on the ‘wall’ of the Infinite. Wherever you are not actually seeing something but would expect to see something, that is the Supreme Reality, the Infinite.”

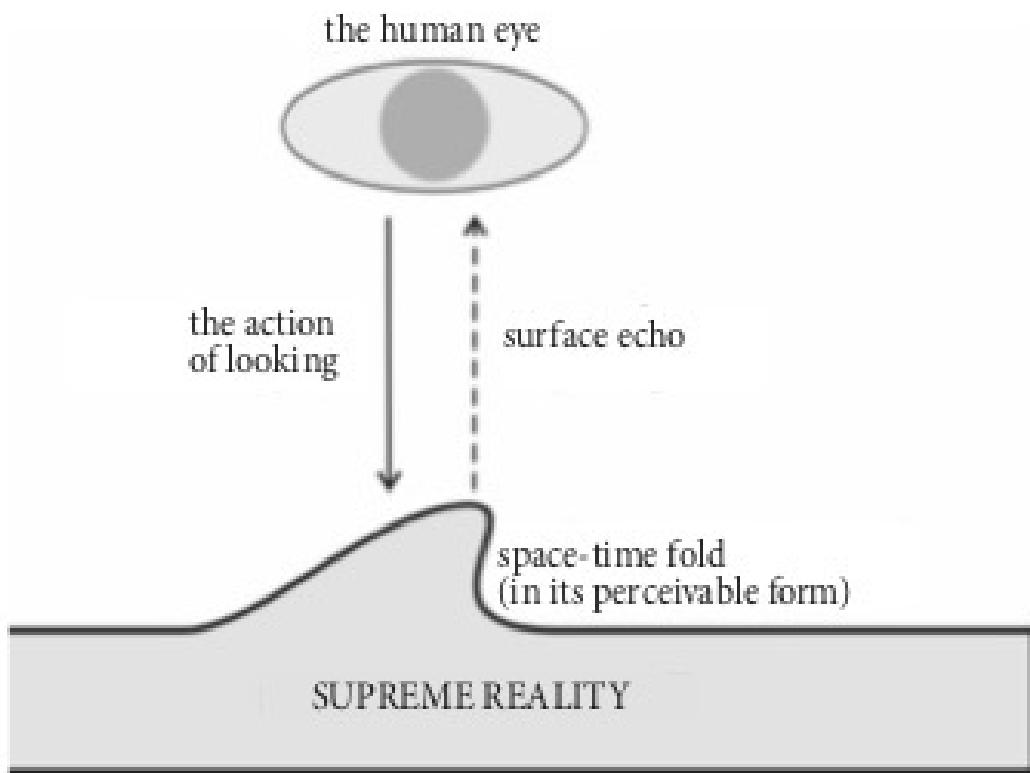

“It is as if we are dolphins or bats,” I said, reflexively associating Dr. Xien’s explanations with what I knew, but now I understood his point of view better. They send waves which then return as an echo and their brain interprets reality, but they do not see it directly. I don’t even see the box. What is there?”

“I told you: nothing you could feel, know or think. It is not the domain of the mind. Only you are.”

His statement that “only you are” was unclear to me, but I left that direction of the discussion aside because, at that time, I was interested in the problem of understanding the interior of the planet. The subject of the “skin”, however, or “covered layer” of the unseen reality that surrounds us particularly captivated me. Meditating on the problem, I soon realized that this is not in fact a “vision” or “hypothesis” but that the notions presented by Dr. Xien represent the very way we perceive the world around us. It is neither an assumption or an “idea”, but it is indeed the reality whether we like it or not or whether or not we agree with it.

The way we perceive the surrounding world

Some of the members of the scientific team took up the ideas that Dr. Xien offered and understood the theoretical aspects of the “volume” problem which I had laid out while the others started the research of the universal implications of the etheric crystal, using very sophisticated technologies to create instrumentation for measuring and interaction with this particular subtle plane. I was receiving weekly reports, and I must admit that there was significant progress during the next ten months that opened up the possibility of using the special chair. There were, however, many issues that needed to be worked out.

THE EDEN PROJECT: THE ASTROLOGICAL STAGE

Meanwhile, the secret construction of our own apparatus, rather its preliminary steps, had begun at Elinor’s villa, and this was absolutely necessary for everything to go as smoothly as possible. Our approach, however, was different from that of the scientific team working within the Bucegi complex. Cezar’s inclinations included some elements of an esoteric nature, none of which would have any meaning for scholars, at least not at that time. For example, the first step was calculating an astrologically appropriate time to begin construction of the device. Having seen the past of Mankind and the origins of man on the holographic screen of Apellos, as well as the way stars, planets, Moon and huge extraterrestrial ships have very precisely and methodically influenced the development of human DNA, such an initiative did not seem at all unnatural to me. The fact that contemporary science is so many light years away from this knowledge represents a deficit that it will probably catch up to in the future.

It is right, however, that the technology required to perform extremely complex calculations and analysis in the field of astrophysics — such as those made by the Sirians to choose the best moments and positions of the mother ships so that they aligned with other stars and with our planet — are almost completely absent at this time. As Cezar explained, however, it is necessary to take some actions to properly integrate the beginning of an important moment of a project of such magnitude. The case of the construction of the great resonators on Earth is an eloquent example in this regard because, as we have shown, their design was done in perfect harmony with certain stellar configurations whose specific energy was to act and support those huge constructions.*

[FOOTNOTE: * The author refers to the megalithic constructions (the pyramids) that were made in many areas of our planet (see volume 6, Forgotten Genesis, ch. 13, p. 273)]

Belgian author and lecturer Robert Bauval, best known for his theory of the correlation between the construction of pyramids on the Giza plateau in Cairo and certain stars in the Orion constellation, had the courage to write in his book, The Mystery of the Orion Constellation, that Egyptian priests had at their disposal a sacred parchment which contained exact data for the beginning of the construction of some pyramids or for the reconditioning of some that already existed. This data did not coincidentally coincide, astrologically speaking, with special conjunctions between Sirius and the Sun at sunset or between the Moon and Sirius a few days before the Full Moon. That papyri contained data and recommendations for a period of about 10,000 years. The last important date that was mentioned was, by chance, the entry of Roman weapons into Egypt.

(Romanian Editors's note)]

This is why Cezar spoke to me about the correct integration of our action from an astrological point of view. Most people tend to trivialize this aspect, ironize it or simply ignore it, but such an attitude stems more from a deep ignorance of how the energies in the cosmos act than from bad intentions. At the same time, contemporary science is arrogant and baffled in terms of astrology, but this is due both to the incipient level of understanding of universal laws and to the technology that is currently available on Earth, none of which allows for the measurement of gigantic influences and changes with respect to subtle interstellar and interplanetary energy, let alone the specific applications of such.

We have spoken many times about the limitations of contemporary science and about its very narrow and materialistic vision which leads to a superficial and partial knowledge. This is a fact which cannot be denied. Under the guise of its “all-knowing” assertions of certainty that it makes, modern science is almost always placed outside of the phenomena it analyzes. That is why it cannot penetrate the essence, the real significance. Deep authentic knowledge cannot come only from observation and measurements. For this, more is needed. An overview of the Universe is needed on its multiple levels of existence, not just an arid and quite limited interpretation such as that of the physical plane. The true meaning of human existence and its universal integration must also be penetrated

At present, the human being is viewed, analyzed and researched by scientists as a separate entity that is limited and isolated from what surrounds it. As I said before, however, man is a true microcosm, a true replica of what exists at the Macrocosmic level with all of its dimensions of manifestation, including the phenomena, beings and things that make it up.

At a certain degree of development and technological advancement, science is coupled with spirituality. At that level, things seem to be normal for a common man because, prior to that, he is not able to understand their real meaning. He does not understand the principles, causes, modalities by which information becomes accessible or is used and transmitted. What he considered until then to be science fiction or even impossible proves to be fully possible and real. Here it is necessary to change the paradigm of thought, without which we will remain prisoners of primitive and very limited conceptions.

This transformation of state in our conceptions must be adequate and harmonious, otherwise it will tend to become rigid. For this, a certain esoteric, spiritual and even initiatory culture is necessary or we risk falling into a well. For example, let us consider the case of astrology. In reality, it turns out to be a true esoteric science, but for many people, it appears as a fantasy and a bunch of childish beliefs, and that is just because modern science does not take into account factors other than using it as a charlatan would.

Astrology, however, is a profound science of subtle energy interactions between large celestial bodies (mainly stars and planets) and the microcosm of the human being which not only represents the physical body but also its subtle bodies: the ethereal, astral, mental and causal. In this way, the complex influences of the planets, stars and constellations are explained, but the science of human beings is more or less ignorant of this ancient subject. The psycho-mental condition of the human being, the tendencies, the state of health, even the evolution of the personality are influenced by these subtle influences which are the first and foremost characteristics of these great cosmic objects. We need to understand well, however, that we are not subjugated by these influences and their movements, and when they are not favorable to us, we can overcome them through superior discernment, knowledge and willpower.

There are those who are skeptical and might say that stars are too far away to have any power or influence on man or that the aspect of specific subtle energy emitted by stars and planets does not exist. We could say, for example, that we cannot talk about heat because it is an abstract notion which can be neither seen nor heard, but we nevertheless feel it; and further, that air does not exist because we do not see it, but we still breathe it. There are other examples along the same logical line, but in all of these examples, we do not see the agent that nevertheless exists and the influence of which can be felt. Then, why would this not be true in the case of planetary and stellar influences on the human being? The skeptics respond that no one has demonstrated this until now and the different behaviors of man and the changes that take place are based on other direct causes.

Obviously, not everything we do or feel is a direct result of planetary and stellar influences, but most of it is a consequence of them. In such a process, everything is interconnected because nothing is left to “accident” and is not, as scientists like to say, a work of chance. When the skill reaches a very high level of development, the barriers between the planes or dimensions of Creation are overcome and many things, unthinkable before, then become perfectly possible, just as I had the opportunity to see in the akashic records. All these cosmic influences then appear clearly figured out and interconnected; they are measured, interpreted and calculated very precisely, just as researchers would now follow the indications of an oscilloscope or other sophisticated devices.

On the other hand, there is the exaggeration of astrologers and preachers with all of their prophecies and advice, much of which is dubious or inaccurate.

In the case of the construction of our “machine”, it was about making a fairly accurate calculation of the celestial configuration that was the most suitable to solidly support our initiative and the work of building the machine. For this, Cezar got in touch with two people he knew and considered very advanced in the science of astrology, asking them to calculate several variants in which the star and planetary configurations would be favorable to the beginning of our project.

This request might seem simple, but it involved very intense and complicated work on the part of the two people. It was also the first action of our project and the first collaboration with someone from outside. I also participated in several meetings and discussions on this topic until Cezar chose a planetary and star configuration that was to take place over almost four months, starting with the beginning of that duration. In a way, this was good because it allowed us to organize, design and plan in detail the stages carefully as well as to select the people we would collaborate with.

“ENERGY IMPROVEMENT” OF THE SPACE

The large hall in the basement of Elinor’s villa, which was initially intended for the storage of instruments and substances for the alchemy laboratory as well as other logistics elements, was most appropriate for Eden’s construction. The hall is square in shape, eight meters wide with a height of 2.8 meters. It would have been nice if it was a little taller, but we had to settle for what we had.

After I had completely emptied the room, however, it seemed very large and quite roomy for what we wanted to build there. First, some masonry work was required for an efficient ventilation system, but finally, after finishing, the place looked like new with perfectly white walls and a high quality laminate over the wooden floor. Initially, I thought the that the construction process would damage the wood, but Lieutenant Nicoară came up with the idea of stretching a thin rubber foil on the floor which could be easily removed in the end.

In the following days, a high-performance air conditioner was installed so that we had all the elements that provided an “adequate room climate”. I felt a slight tightening of my heart, thinking that Elinor knew nothing about our plans or the small transformations we had made inside the basement of his house, but I was hoping he would understand and even enjoy our project. Cezar and I had already decided that Elinor should know about the construction of the “machine”. After all, I was using his own villa for this; and moreover, he is a being who has reached a high level of spiritual evolution.

One of the important esoteric elements which Cezar carefully considered was the so-called “specific energy impregnation” of the room dedicated to the construction of the apparatus. I myself did not understand very well the necessity of such an initial action, but Cezar patiently explained to me that that stage of the process is, in a way, part of the economy of the universe.

“Any action we perform is within an external ‘rhythm’ with certain characteristics, and we have to choose our actions conscientiously. For example, if you want to go on vacation, do not start cutting wood, but do something about the upcoming vacation: buy what you need, book the room or do other things that suit your departure. Therefore, your intention must be in tune with the actions you are about to take. If these do not correspond to the nature of your intention, then you can expect all kinds of difficulties or obstacles and often even the failure of that action. It is the same as in the pistons inside the engine of a car. If they move chaotically, the engine crashes and gives no movement. If they move in a coordinated way, that is, they fit at a well-established pace with clear and correlated stages, it will work perfectly.”

I thought for a few moments and then spoke.

“That would be for an internal combustion engine. But how is it for us? I mean, what kind of ‘rhythm’ do we follow in the construction of this device?”

“Here, it is much more subtle, even cosmic. Our intention is to build this very special ‘car’ (he is referring to the chair) and our actions so far must prepare for this. Let us say you intend to have a very hard winter. You do not wait for winter to come to see if you can survive, but you properly prepare for it. You make supplies, you ensure the heating of the house, you prepare your snow removal tools, etc. These are mundane actions, but by this example I wanted you to understand the idea of the process. In the case of our project, those mundane and obvious actions will be replaced by actions of a subtle nature, such as choosing a suitable astrological moment and subtle-energetic loading of the space where the device will be made. Such an integration cannot yet be understood by a so-called ‘scientific’ mind because it has no recognizable correspondence. It is not on the ‘list’ of modern scientific concepts and principles. It is a different way of thinking and approaching universal laws. Fundamentally, we are surrounded only by energy that vibrates on a myriad of frequencies. Matter is energy, our bodies are energy, atoms are energy and so on. Everything is vibration and that means rhythm. We do nothing but fit into the rhythm of our project.”

“Good; and how do we find the rhythm we need?” I insisted, paying close attention to those explanations. “What’s the beat of Eden?”

“It’s like a kind of ‘calling’ by which you create affinity with the specificity of the future construction. You come up with something from the physical plane that corresponds to the initial idea, intention, plan or conception that you want to achieve, and by this you gradually ‘tune’ to what is the higher cosmic rhythm which corresponds to that frequency of vibration. Your car runs on gasoline. In order to use it, you will put neither water nor diesel in the tank. You will be looking for the best and most efficient petrol so that the efficiency of the car, at least in regards to the fuel, is the best. This means that you power the car and prepare it for the best performance. You can add other actions of the same kind: you will buy new tires, you will change the oil and do other things, all to make your travel with that car as efficient as possible. In the case of our project, we must find the element that best resonates with the specificity of the ‘machine’ to be built.”

I understood the principle, but for the time being, I could not get used to the specificity of such an approach which, in our case, was especially subtle in nature. The normal mind tends to regard such as irrelevant.

“Is the integration that we do really that important?”

“Undoubtedly. The more important the action you start, the more you need to integrate yourself properly into the universal rhythm that corresponds to it because you will then be protected and helped by the huge energies carried by it. You are no longer an individual wheel lost among others with weak forces and a somewhat chaotic wandering. Instead, you are now part of the whole. You are helped, inspired and supported by its functioning, if you harmonize with it.”

I asked Cezar how this integration of the beginning of an activity is pragmatically realized.

“There are several approaches and methods,” he said to me. “In general, an ordinary person hardly understands these notions because he is limited by a set of conceptions and prejudices that he has nourished throughout his life. It is difficult to get out of this ‘cage’.

“Good intentions and a desire to know more, however, can help. For example, a deep heart prayer or a well thought out prayer can mean a lot. It depends, however, on the nature and importance of the action you want to accomplish and integrate effectively because one might want to build a bicycle and another might want to make a rocket to fly in the cosmos. We need to understand very well that we are not ‘isolated’ in this universe, but that everything is interconnected. By such preparation, you can even convince yourself of this.”

“But in the case of Eden, how will we proceed?”

“Here we will add some new initiatory elements which further facilitate entering into the universal rhythm of the idea and project we have proposed. There is already a strong impetus due to the perceptions you had about the constructive and conceptual elements of the ‘car’ (chair), and then there were our discussions and especially our firm determination to carry out the construction. But, we will also come up with new elements that will further the success.”

MIDAS

The first “mission” was to find someone extremely well trained in the field of IT programming. Fortunately, we have no shortage of this in Romania. Cezar came with two prospects, and I with one. These were people who had been watching the SRI* for years. Two of them, which were Cezar’s prospects, had collaborated, respectively, with the NSA and Northrop Grumman in the field of U.S. military aviation. We had the records of these two people with excellent qualification ratings. I made up their profile which included a synthesis of the achievements each of them had.

[FOOTNOTE: * Romanian Intelligence Service.]

[FOOTNOTE:  National Security Agency of the United States of America.]

The third prospect, which was from me, referred to a young man I had met several years ago in a circumstance that I am not allowed to present at this point. In the hidden circles of great programmers and IT people, he was known as Midas, probably by the name of the ancient Phrygian king. And indeed — it seemed that everything that he would “touch” in the computer field “turns into gold”.* His ability to “break in” through any firewall protection system, no matter how complicated, has earned him respect in the hacker community. Although he was intensely courted by U.S. agencies, including the Pentagon, he still refused to leave the country. His well known reply was: “Why should I leave here if I can still access any information?”

[FOOTNOTE: * The author makes a metaphorical analogy with King Midas (the beginning of the second millennium B.C.), who ruled in the fortress of Pessinus in ancient Phrygia (approximately in central Turkey today). He was known for his ability to instantly turn everything he touched into gold, as a result of which, as legend has it, he died of hunger.

He was not interested in money or other material income, and this “saved” him because he did not slip into temptations that could become dangerous. He did, however, “break” all the protections of the great American agencies, one by one, but stopped exactly where he was supposed to. He would then send an email to the general manager of that agency, describing the operation he had done and where the weaknesses of the system were so that the agency could resolve them.

In other words, he was a “white hacker”, but he never specified how that system should be strengthened, leaving it to the care of the respective agencies. Even though his help was obvious and disinterested, there were still suspicions regarding him because, at one of the discussions between the representatives of the Services in which he took part, Midas said that he knows how not to be detected and leave no trace. Although that was considered to be practically impossible, his words still caused some stress among the generals and chiefs of the main institutions.

Because of this, he soon became frightened of international agencies and pressures were made to control his activity, even at the level of our Secret Services. This was included in a special program which I had access to, and that is why I proposed it as a very promising option to help us in our project.

In my opinion, Midas was a great genius in the field of computer science whose exceptional talent deserved to be fully utilized for the noble purpose we had set out to accomplish.

After presenting all this data to Cezar, he immediately approved of Midas’s co-operation in the project, and he “officially” became our basic collaborator. From the beginning until the end of the project, he had contact with only Cezar, Lieutenant Nicoară and myself.

Lieutenant Nicoară spoke to him about the main work topics and what he wanted from him in order for the “machine” to work. Even though no additional data was presented to him about the project, Midas was very smart and quickly understood that it was something very special, he said the following to me after a week of “employment”.

“What you ask me to do is not related to ordinary technology on Earth.”

I smiled to myself, but I couldn’t tell him what it was. I replied in a very general way.

“It is important that the job is done well.”

Midas is a person highly touted by the main intelligences services* on the “market” and that is why he is included in a very special category in our country. Americans have often asked us to loan them this “asset” for certain tasks, but we considered that “better safe than sorry”, elegantly declining the demand.

INFLUENCE OF THE SHIKHARA SYMBOL

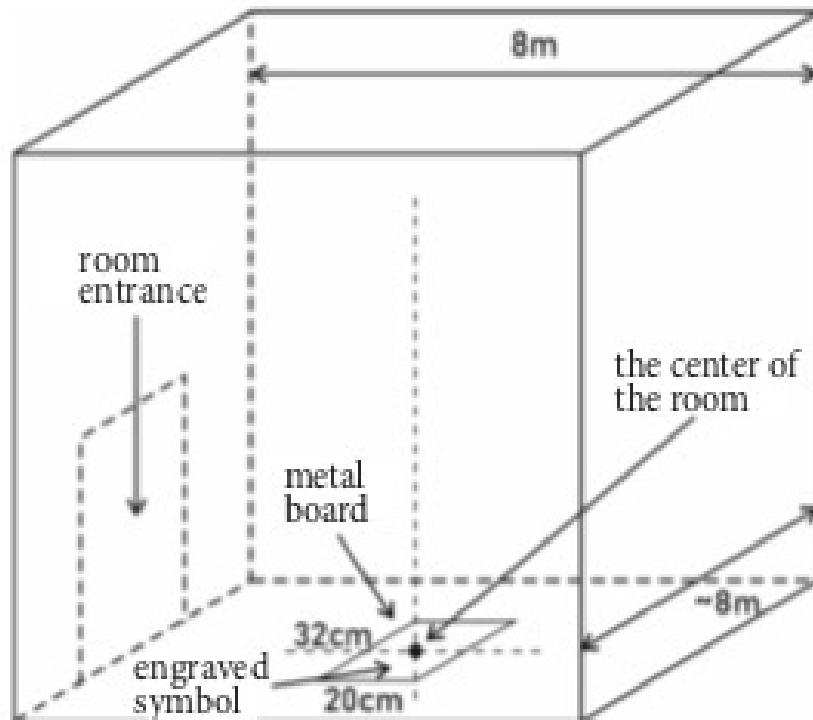

In parallel with the training phase of our team of collaborators, Cezar continued the process of subtle integration with the Eden project. He defined that stage as being similar to a specific magnetic field which “loaded” the space in the room and prepared it for the operation, maintenance and success of the future “machine”. After choosing the planetary configuration that was considered the most appropriate and exactly at the precise moment indicated, Cezar placed a rectangle of copper plated with gold in the middle of the large chamber. The dimensions of the rectangle were 20x32 cm and featured a laser engraving of a rather complicated symbol.

“By this, from a subtle point of view, we are preparing the realization of the project,” said Cezar. “I told you that people in general are not used to such procedures because they do not understand either their meaning or substance. This knowledge belongs to the esoteric realm and has nothing to do with “magic” or other divinatory rituals. You can even say that it is pure science, but it is at an advanced level because it is based upon principles that are not yet known and even less credited by scientists as well as much of the population. Materialistic ideas are rigid and limited, and if you do not have degrees of freedom, you therefore you cannot see the whole. What we do here, however, is more special because it has a much wider spectrum of influence.

Using the information we had from our views on the holographic screen, we both worked on establishing the graphic form of the symbol. For the first phase, we decided on a compound symbol which could be translated as su-(ka)-da (da means “yes” in Romanian).

Metal plate with the symbol engraved on it, a resonator for the specific energy field of the device to be built

The symbol SU - (KA) - DA

SU shows the direction; K (KA) is always related to the vital energy — a fundamental symbol in Sirian writing — which in ancient Egyptian tradition was designated as KHA; and DA (meaning “yes” in the Romanian language) means “upward”. In free translation, this means “energy that travels upwards”, having the sense of sublimation, elevation, and increasing the frequency of vibration. In the Sumerian language, the meaning of this word was that of “ascension” in the purest spiritual sense.

Nevertheless, after several discussions and analyzing several variants of the symbols I had seen during the viewing on the holographic screen of the Apellos, we decided on another symbol, the so-called SHIKHARA or SHI+KHA+RA symbol.

The symbol SHI - (KA) - RA

In Chinese, SHI refers to the personal pronoun “he” or “she”. KHA, as I said, represents the vital energy (in ancient Egyptian); and RA means “sacred (spiritual) light” in Sumerian, a term that was later taken by the Egyptians to refer to the Sun King (RA). Thus, shikhara means “vital energy that comes from the sacred (spiritual) light.” The symbol can thus be correlated with the universal subtle energy (prana of the Hindu tradition) which “feeds” everything in an infinity of manifestations. By carefully analyzing this symbol, we were surprised to find out how ancestral Sirian symbols have been transmitted through time to this very day.

As a matter of fact, the word shikhara literally translates to “mountain peak”, often mentioned in connection with the tops of temples in North India, resembling the seminal pools of the Himalayas.*

[FOOTNOTE: * In South India, the equivalent term for shikhara is the word “vimana” which, unlike the term used in the northern part of the country, refers to the entire temple building, and this includes the lower part referred to as the sanctum. Here, shikhara retains its original meaning, designating only the peak part of the vimana which is usually a dome, having over it a finial (a specific ornament located at the top of an important building).]

It is very interesting to note that an analogy can be drawn between the specific structure of some Pleiadian “flying saucers” (see, for example, the cases documented by Billy Meier in the 1960s-1970s) and the structure of Hindu temples. Additionally, in ancient times, the term vimana also had the meaning of “flying vehicle” which, in the ancient Sanskrit texts of India, meant “temple” or “flying car”.

The author even mentions in volume 6 of the Transylvanian Series (Forgotten Genesis, 2019): “On the other hand, temples in India, which are somewhat smaller in size but resemble the pyramids, though they are narrower at the base and more ‘pursed’ at the top, have a Pleiadian descent. As far as I could tell, the many details, inlays and roundings in their construction represent something specific to the Pleiadian civilization. I also recognized this feature in the Pleiadian ships that I saw in the holographic projections.”]

4 — EXTRAORDINARY CONSTANTS, SYMBOLS AND ARCHITECTS ON EARTH

During the first viewing in front of the holographic screen that I had done with the assistance of the man from Apellos, I was able to see the basic elements of the creation of human DNA. *

[FOOTNOTE: * See Volume 6, Forgotten Genesis, 2020, chapters 4, 5 and 6.]

I also became acquainted with several symbols of some extraterrestrial civilizations, especially those of the Sirian civilization, which expressed certain fundamental energetic realities at the cosmic level. Some of these were later found in different forms and versions in the cultures and civilizations of people on Earth. We talked extensively about those symbols, especially the K symbol, but during the viewing, I recognized several such forms and representations that are currently in use in science or even in everyday life.  It is amazing to see how many of the signs and symbols we consider to be trivial or simple “inventions” of ancient mathematicians or civilizations actually reflect the amazing energetic and even archetypal realities of the universe that were introduced into human civilization by some very advanced extraterrestrial civilizations and then adapted by Earth cultures throughout the ages.

[FOOTNOTE:  See Volume 6, Forgotten Genesis, 2020, in which more are presented cosmic symbols (E, E-I, E-U, E-N etc.)]

SIRIAN SYMBOLIC WRITING

From what I could see on the holographic screen, most of the symbols that are reflected in our daily life have a Sirian origin. Their source goes back in time to the dawn of Mankind but much after Adam because, at that time, E-N-L beings were more meditative in character, being dedicated exclusively to spiritual evolution. After the first hybridizations and the increase in the number of E-N-K beings, we noticed that in order to counterbalance the decrease in the vibrational frequency of some DNA strands, there was a need for a certain type of knowledge transfer that included the content of the race memory from generation to generation.

Generally speaking, I realized that writing was not a determining factor in the period from the year 200,000 BC up until after the fall of Atlantis. In fact, it was not possible to speak of “writing” in the current meaning, but it was more about conveying symbols which, in their general structure, markedly resembled the cuneiform signs of the Akhadi and Hittite writings from ancient times. At that time, however, their arrangement and meanings were much more complex, being oriented in particular with the energies of the Universe which they reflected indirectly by the power of their occult significance. Gradually, with the passage of time, I saw that power diminished in intensity, precisely because humanity was beginning to forget the basic meanings of such symbols. The general forms of “writing” have remained, however, and can give one an idea of how the Sirians expressed themselves within their civilization.

I was, of course, curious to know more about this and allowed myself, with the approval of the man from Apellos, to enter a secondary branch of viewing for elaboration of the derivation of the symbols of the Syrian civilizations. Files with information were presented on the screen in a way that was very logical and quite easy to assimilate.

First of all, I realized that Syrian beings have a kind of symbols code which they can understand when necessary. This is used very rarely, however, because Syrians have strong telepathic abilities, and their existence is multi-dimensional in many cases. Most of the evolved ones choose to live in the etheric and even astral planes but coexist on the same ship with their peers in the physical plane, only at a higher level, appropriate to their vibrational frequency and to the degree such is integrated with the structure of their large cosmic ships.

Sirian writing is not like ours but is rather made up of a set of rules by which Syrians can designate what has both concrete and subtle meanings. This mode of “writing” is very abstract but also very nuanced, being perfectly adapted to the capabilities and specificity of the Syrians who possess a great power of mental penetration and focus on very complex meanings of different types of manifestations, energies, phenomena, beings, and other things.

For example, specific signs of their “writing” — which are really symbols — can designate a graphic set of characters that represents a message. It can only be deciphered by the beings in their civilization or those who live in unison with their mental energy. If this condition is not met, understanding the forms and symbols included in the message is almost impossible because there is no affinity for the conception and knowledge at their original level of manifestation.

I thus realized that reading Sirian symbols occurs only on an upper echelon of thinking beings in contrast to ordinary ones. Given that this ability is already native to Sirian beings, it is logical to assume that their symbols will be understood anywhere in the galaxy on any of the planets colonized by the Sirian people. In fact, this was also the main purpose of their “writing”: not necessarily to say something or to make poems but more to convey the essence of a fact or manifestation as an impression on the structure of time-space for those who were interested in that aspect.

Their symbols could also have the role of leaving a sign or a test to be performed, as we have often seen in different places on the walls of their ships or in other important areas. Due to the very nature of the activities carried out by the Sirian people, however, it is possible to talk about the existence of certain specific patterns which can be observed in different crews of the inhabited ships that have long missions. There are, therefore, certain characteristics that distinguish the Sirian communities, both on the planets they inhabit and on the ships they move in throughout the cosmos.

I will refer here to some of the main structures of specifically Sirian writing which are also found in different cultures or civilizations of humanity, being transmitted in a more or less pure form with regard to their original Sirian form.

THE BASIS OF SIRIAN SYMBOLS ARE THE LINE AND THE POINT

Generally speaking, the point represents the origin, the starting place of an activity or initiative. It shows us where to start reading a symbol or the basis from which to start to understand a certain graphic representation. This same symbol may have a completely different meaning, however, if the point is placed in different areas of the same graphic representation.

When multiple points are used in a symbol, it means that the drawing is very complex and requires a more nuanced understanding which encompasses multiple angles of view. As I could see, sometimes the essential area of a symbol with several points is enclosed in a circle; thus indicating that the area has strength and priority when interpreting the symbol.

On the other hand, the line in “Sirian writing” represents the connection between two or more points and generally refers to planets, stars or galaxies because this writing is, in a way, cosmic and even holographic. Indeed — in its abstract symbols we can find the entire unfolding of an action, from its macrocosmic level to the microcosmic level of the being.

The horizontal line represents a prolonged and repetitive action because it is a symbol of the yin nature of things.

The vertical line, which is of a yang nature, represents a “unique” action based upon an unexpected event or decided by higher beings. It may represent, for example, a connection between up and down, between heaven and earth, between two subtle planes, or between two types of energy.

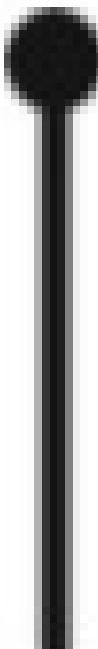

The oblique lines represent, depending upon the degree of inclination to the vertical, different phases or stages between the two fundamental principles of Yin and Yang and the actions associated with their nature.

THE COMPLETE MEANING OF THE LETTER K

In the writings of Earth, regardless of the epoch or historical period in which they existed, some specific structures from Sirian writing can be recognized. Even in a brief analysis, it can be seen that those specific Sirian structures can be found in most of the letters in the alphabets of Earth’s languages. One of the most eloquent examples in this regard is the letter K. This is, however, just a modified expression of a Sirian symbol which is close to representing the shape of the letter known to us as “K”.

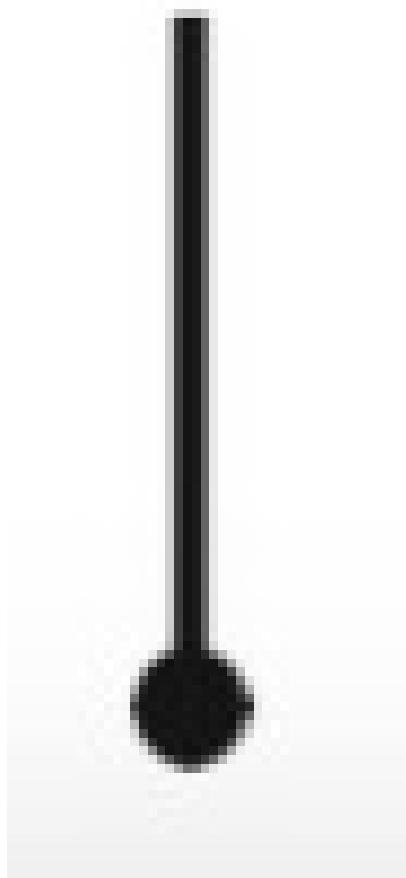

This symbol is very important in the life and activity of the Sirian civilization, especially with regard to the extent of its meanings and by the nuances it can have. At its base, however, this representation appears disarmingly simple, for it is made up of only straight lines and points.

The letter K starts from a vertical line that can be written in two ways. First, with the point or dot at the top of the line:

This symbol, in the Syrian world, represents the action of spiritually evolved beings upon those or to whom the will of God is manifested.

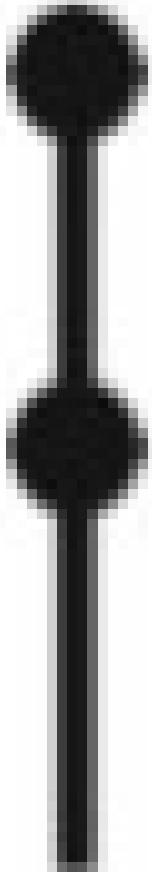

Second would be with the point at the bottom of the line:

The symbol represents the action of beings from the denser planes (such as the etheric plane or the physical plane) making a qualitative leap in their life in order to evolve spiritually. The point shows the place where the evolution begins (at the bottom) and that it tends towards the top, moving to the “top” of the line.

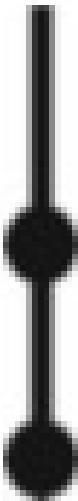

Next, the issue becomes complicated somewhat because another point intervenes in the middle of the vertical line which gives rise to two different interpretations of the specific rendering of the symbol.

In this case, there are two points at the top of the line:

This symbol represents the help offered by some spiritually subordinate beings to whom the will of God manifests. This action is mediated by beings in the middle planes of Creation: the higher astral plane, the mental plane or even the super-mental plan, the latter of which represents a transition between the mental plane and the causal plane such as you see in sages, spiritual masters or even celestial entities belonging to these dimensions of existence.

There is also a symbol with two points towards the bottom of the line:

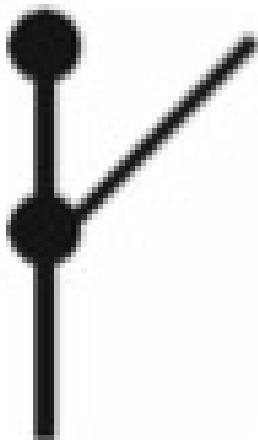

In this case, this represents the action of beings from the coarser planes making a qualitative leap in their life to evolve spiritually, using the help of higher beings from the spiritual point of view who have the ability to communicate freely with other elevated beings from the upper subtle planes.

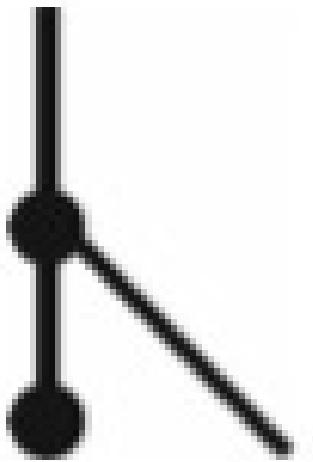

The addition of lines in the respective points represents the help given by different spiritual hierarchies, teachers, spiritual masters, etc. For example, a downward sloping line, starting from the middle of the vertical line with the point at its top, represents the fact that evolved beings transmit certain spiritual teachings in multiple ways in order to be understood by several different categories of human beings.

If the oblique line is oriented towards the top of the vertical line, this means that “intermediate” beings (such as human beings) receive support mainly from God when they fulfill an important mission, but are helped secondarily by different spiritual entities from the subtle planes of manifestation, as follows:

In the variant where the point on the vertical line is at the bottom of it, the addition of a downward oblique line shows that human beings can acquire spiritual knowledge both directly from evolved beings and through their own effort, as follows:

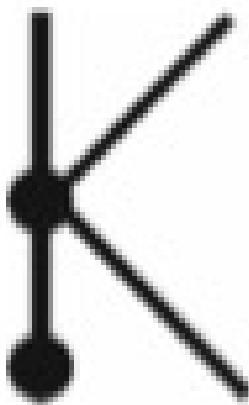

If the oblique line is pointed upward, then it indicates that human beings can acquire a certain knowledge by which they can reach divine wisdom and also understand the nature of its various manifestations in Creation:

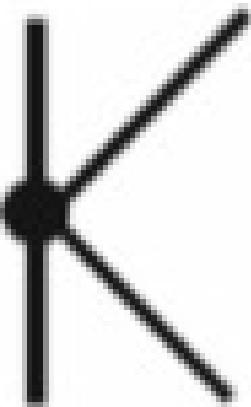

Advancing with the presentation of the symbol K and its complex meanings, we come to the possibility of introducing two oblique lines which form a right angle between them. In the variant with the vertical line with the point at the top, the symbol represents the fact that the intermediate beings (humans) receive support mainly from God but also from different spiritually evolved celestial entities in order to succeed in their mission. (the oblique line above). Thereafter, they transmit certain initiations in several ways in order to be understood by many different categories of human beings (the oblique line below):

If the two oblique lines are attached to the vertical two-point line at the bottom, then that means that human beings can reach different spiritual knowledge directly, either from highly evolved beings or entities (the upper oblique line) or through individual effort (the lower oblique line), thereby reaching divine wisdom. See below:

Finally, if there is a single point in the middle of the vertical line, from which the two oblique lines start, then the symbol represents a spiritually initiated human being who can help others to evolve and orient themselves toward self-knowledge. This symbol is the one that signifies the connection between top and bottom:

It is very interesting that, starting with the symbol K, we find its form meanings in different cultures and civilizations on Earth.

SYMBOL OF THE NUMBER PI (π)

One of the most important symbols derived from K is that of the number Pi (π), considered to be a mathematical constant. The graphic form of Pi starts from the Sirian symbolism that represents the eternal Wisdom of God, considered by this civilization to be the Great Spirit of Creation, the One and the Supreme.

The representation of Divine Wisdom is rendered in this symbol by the point of origin on the left, at the top. The “attainment” of Supreme Wisdom manifests itself at different times in history through highly spiritually evolved beings who serve “between people” (middle point, top) with precise missions of revitalizing and spiritually purifying civilization. To this end, certain highly evolved celestial entities or cosmic forces (continuous line from top right) are employed, the process being known as the “theme of avatars”:

During their spiritual mission to Earth or to another planet in the physical universe, such a spiritual reformer appropriately interprets universal truths and laws that were known in some form in the past (the left oblique line) but still need to be adapted to the necessities of the time period in which he or she has manifested (point on the right, down).

In its evolution, a civilization registers both ups and downs, but its general tendency is ascending. To do this, “corrections” are needed from time to time to keep this trend going and not allow chaos to set in.

Such “corrections” or “balances” that are needed at certain time intervals in the existence of a civilization represent the various missions of avatars or beings with an exceptional level of spiritual elevation who incarnate in the physical plane.

I have been shown, however, that this symbol (Pi) has meaning only when the being who transmits the information so as to “update” the truth with respect to the current or “new” condition of space and time of that civilization is alive or their presence is clearly felt over time.

If the wise person or avatar is no longer alive; that is, he has left his physical body, his spiritual teaching can still be acquired by knowing some essential laws; and in this case, the middle point above is no longer useful. Variations of this symbol can be found in Pi’s symbol, as follows:

Although it was simple to correlate the images of the symbol presented to me on the holographic screen with the presently known symbol of the number Pi, I was nevertheless directed to understand and shown by analogy that the initial points in the Sirian representation are presently replaced by the cursive rendition of a lowercase letter.*

[FOOTNOTE: * The Pi symbol of the irrational number 3.14 was proposed in 1706 by the mathematician William Jones and represents the sixteenth letter of the Greek alphabet.]

This represents the understanding of the meaning that is connected between Heaven or the Divine plan (top line with the downward turning of the left side representing the Will of God in this situation and the Earth or the physical plane below it.) As the Divine Will manifests itself at different times in history through divine representatives, such actions are rendered by the lines that descend obliquely so as to make people understand the past (the left oblique line) and especially the future (the oblique line on the right, which is rounded).

During a break from the viewing, I talked with the man from Apellos about the precise aspects and nature of the number Pi in modern science and learned amazing things about what contemporary mathematicians and physicists refer to as a “constant.” We were talking about the number Pi and the “irrationality” of it when the man from Apellos interrupted me.

[FOOTNOTE: The number Pi represents the value of the ratio between the circumference and the diameter of any circle in Euclidean space. Nowadays, it is considered one of the most important constants in mathematics and physics because many formulas involve its use. The value of Pi is an irrational number (i.e. it cannot be expressed exactly as a fraction m/n where m and n are integers, and that is why expressing Pi in decimals has no end and is not repeated, being approximately equal to 3.14159...)]

“The Pi number is, in fact, not a constant but an algorithm,” he said in a very natural and loose way.

There were a few seconds of total stillness.

“An algorithm?” I said in a jocular manner, without understanding anything. “What kind of algorithm?”

“A fractal algorithm, in the sense that certain values always change according to certain needs.”

I did not understand anything.

“What do you mean by ‘certain needs’?” I asked.

“The Pi number will have different values depending upon the domain or nature of the problem in which it is used. These differences are small, but they still exist.”

For a moment, I thought it might be as in quantum physics where frequency and energy are very important quantities for determining certain processes. I was thinking that the higher the energy, the more significant those differences in Pi would be, and it might have different values depending on where they were used. This was like an inspirational flash in my mind, but I determined to analyze this correlation later. At that time, I was attracted to understanding the issues at a general level in order to form a solid basis for my understanding. I did not want to wander around the side paths without first mastering the main idea that the man from Apellos had brought up when he told me that Pi and other mathematical and physical “constants” were not actually constant.

“Okay; but how can such an algorithm be used in practice?” I insisted.

The man from Apellos began to “draw” in the air with his finger, making “pictures” as he explained to me.

“In your mathematical language, the number Pi is a kind of function in the sense that it represents the transposition of a straight path into a curved movement. Since there is no such perfect curve or sphere in the Universe, mathematicians will come to the conclusion at some point that the number Pi is also changing “as needed”. Rather, it can be called a “transpositional constant”, having a different value depending upon what is required in that calculation, but is not a constant number by itself.”

“However, if we divide the length of the circle by its diameter, the number Pi will always result,” I timidly advanced, making a comment on what all the world knows.

“True, except that the length or circumference of the circle, as it is portrayed in your mathematics, is a conceptual mistake because it is a strictly mental conception with no connection to reality.”

While the man from Apellos spoke and explained these aspects to me, I could already see with my mind the horrified faces of most contemporary scientists, shouting fiercely and with anger, “Blasphemy!”

I just smiled to myself, re-evaluating things with my imagination and returning to the discussion about the circle and sphere. With undisguised astonishment, I asked another question.

“Did you say that there is no perfect curve or sphere in the Universe? That would explain Pi’s ‘variations’ but still...”

“Give me an example of a body that is a perfect sphere,” said the smiling man from Apello.

A little confused, I realized that, at most, we can only talk about approximations of these perfect forms. A planet or a star, even if they seem to be perfectly spherical from a distance, this is not really the case. We are, in fact, dealing with an approximation of this perfect form. We prefer, however, to round off the values when we perform calculations with mathematical and physical “constants”. That is why I have observed that other so-called “constants” may not be considered to be perfectly “stable” with regard to their numerical value.

With a nod of approval, the man from Apellos told me that this kind of “approximation” also applies to the speed of light. Although its value in a vacuum is considered to be constant, the speed of light undergoes certain fluctuations, even if the conditions in the environment in which the light is placed do not change. This opinion, in fact, seems to be already shared by a number of scholars worldwide.

“These numbers, which you call π and c , and which are considered to be mathematical constants, still suffer from small fluctuations, but these are not taken into account by your scientists,” the man from Apellos continued.* It is the same with the perfect sphere, an absolute concept which actually does not exist in the universe. What creates the shape of a circle, bringing it close to perfection, are actually small circle arcs, one after the other so that, in the end, the resulting circle is an approximation made up of these small portions of the circle.

[FOOTNOTE: * π = the number Pi, and c = the speed of light in a vacuum.]

What the Apellos man referred to was actually a “quantified circle” or geometric shape consisting of a large number of fragments or “perfect” arcs that make up the circle. The end result is always an imperfection as a result of accumulating infinitesimal errors, but they are still errors. When I discussed these issues, I still did not suspect how quickly I would have to come to terms with their truth as regards the Eden project which I had started.

A “quantified” circle

"If you now understand that a circle is not actually a circle, since it is not perfect, then you must know that the center of the circle is not in the center either."

"Where is it then?" I asked, confused.

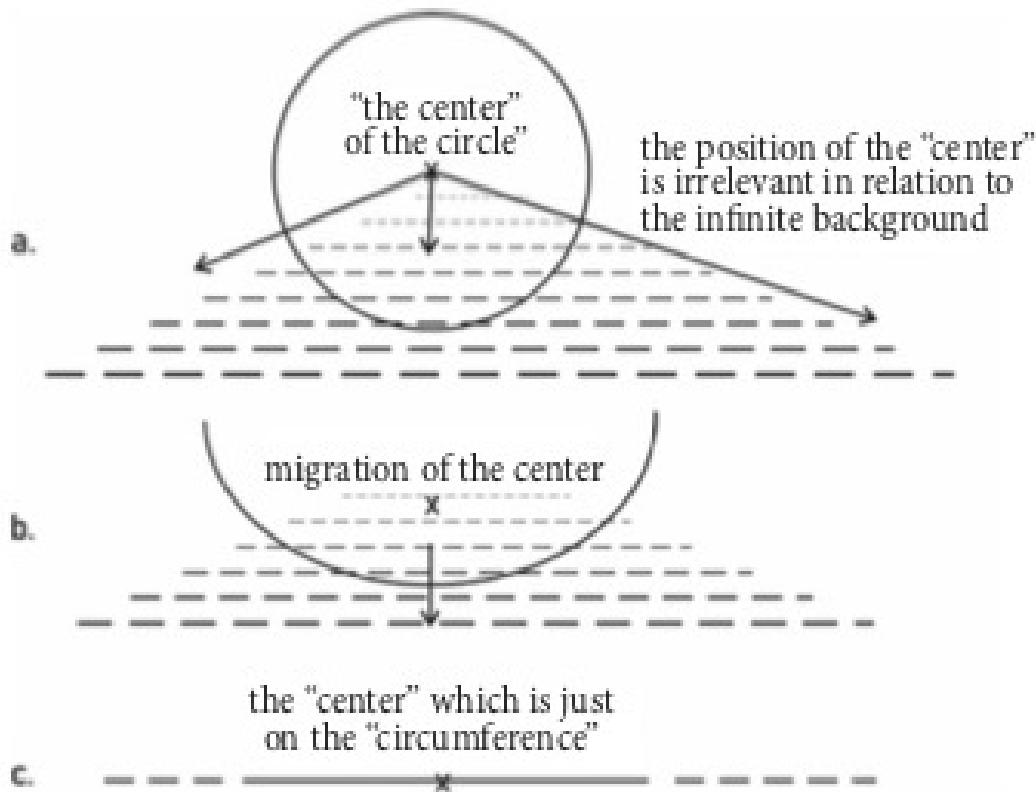

"On the circumference. Basically, everywhere."

I was dumb with amazement.

"Then," I said, "What sort of 'center' is that?"

"This is how people mentally represent the notion of a 'circle' and because of this, we can place a point in the middle of it as the 'center of the circle'. In reality, however, it is just a mental illusion because, wherever you look, you have the feeling of seeing this center."

The center of a circle is actually on its circumference

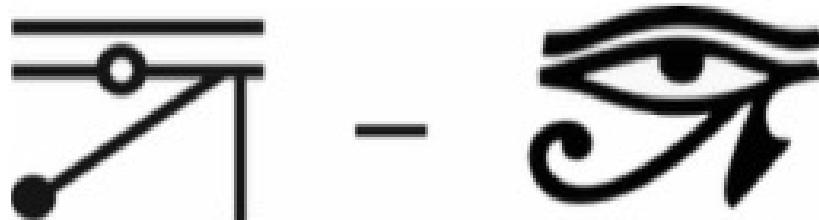

I immediately made a possible correlation with Dr. Xien's explanations of "volume" and the "surface crease" which is merely an appearance of the inexpressible Infinite "beyond". Wherever you "increase" a volume, it is, in fact, Infinity from which that volume appears. Likewise, wherever you place a circle or sphere, their center will be everywhere because there is no absolute spatial reference, and the "circumference" is actually a deployment, a surface. It is more a holographic image of the universe because, when the "center" is at the "periphery", the circle becomes a line.

Stunned by these simple but clear explanations while listening to the man from Apellos, I then returned to viewing the images on the holographic screen, only to find that the surprising influence of the Sirian K symbol does not stop only at the Pi symbol but that it can also be found in the ancient civilization of Egypt.

THE EYE OF RA

This is a well-known representation of the culture of Ancient Egypt with which, knowing some of the basic principles, we can now more easily analyze the notations and meanings of the Sirian "writing".

A first observation is that this symbol also derives from the universal symbol K, but this is less obvious than in the case of Pi yet still clear enough to make a brief analysis of it, as it was shown to me on the holographic screen.

Obviously, the top line represents God's Eternity. In fact, everything in the original Sirian civilization is related to the Ultimate, Unique and Supreme Principle which is God. The Supreme Reality is the same for all because everything derives from it. With the Sirians in particular, I observed their aspiration to relate absolutely everything to this all-encompassing Reality because it is Infinite. In this deeply spiritual endeavor, the Sirian civilization is guided by its sages who have attained the highest level of spiritual perfection so that any action in which the Sirians are seeking to help, support or even to create is supervised by those very wise spirits.

Returning to the meaning of the symbol, the line below the "line of Eternity" represents the area of the higher plane (the causal plane) where the entity or being "holds" a certain knowledge which is close to the state of Eternity but still has a certain individuality in the scheme of Creation. Its presence is felt permanently in a present state, and this is represented by the circle that is in the middle of the line.

The presence of that entity or being manifested itself at a given moment in the past, an action symbolized by the slanting line to the left which has an end point. It will, however, have a message to be transmitted to the future when the time comes, and this aspect is symbolized by the vertical line to the right of the symbol.

Unfortunately, by a strange "twisting" of the meanings and by much manipulation, this ancestral symbol was overshadowed by the significance of the so-called "all-seeing eye", being self-attributed by the Organization and becoming a distinctive mark of it.

THE SYMBOL OF THE OWL

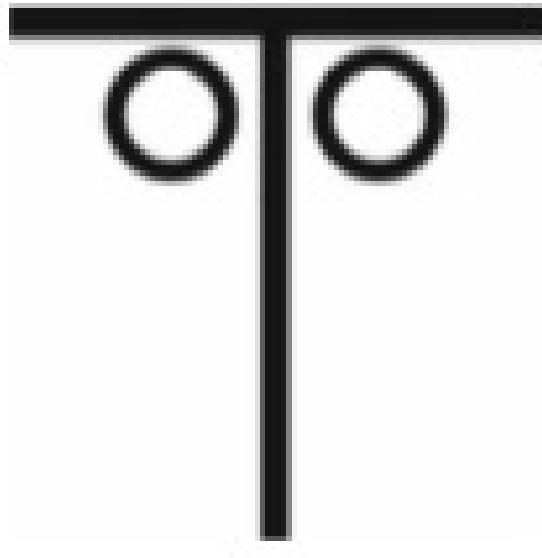

In ancient cultures and even in modern day esotericism, the owl is the symbol of wisdom. In fact, the fact that the symbol Sirian symbol for such has the stylized appearance of an owl when viewed from the front has caused it to be associated with this bird.

In fact, the graphical representation is composed of several forms derived from different structures.

This symbol represents the eternal manifestation of God (horizontal straight line) which transmits knowledge at different moments from the past, present and future, symbolized by the three vertical lines. The three temporal dimensions are perceived in a balanced way by a being that can see the past and the future (the two circles) which unites them in a single manifestation in the present (the vertical line in the middle is longer).

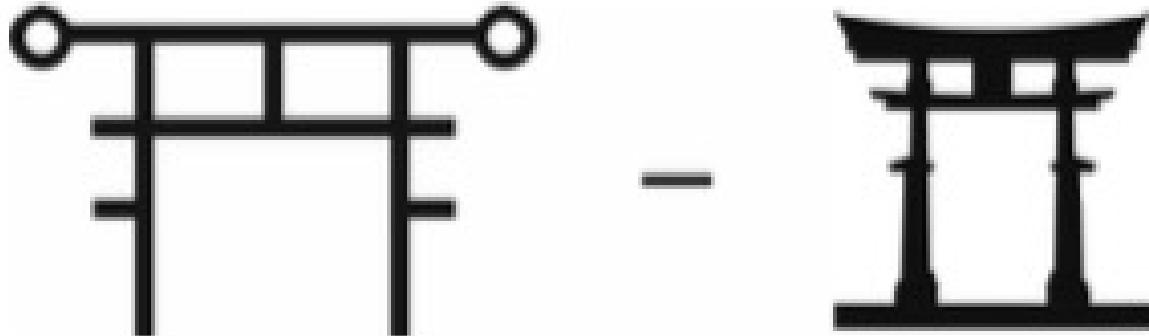

There is also a simpler variant of the “owl” symbol which represents the eternal manifestation of God that directly transmits knowledge (the vertical line). This version corresponds to a reality that is accessible only to a small number of human beings, due to the fact that they must have high spiritual virtues and powers so as to observe the past and the future (the two circles) in a balanced way, uniting them in a single manifestation (the present one, represented by the vertical line in the middle).

Not coincidentally, these qualities are correlated with the correct and balanced vision over the relative time (past and future) involved, this being symbolized by the two circles that resemble two large round eyes. On the other hand, it also correlates with the appearance of the owl, an animal with a great visual acuity which also extends into the night. Here, the night is considered the “night of consciousness”, that is, the ignorance and illusion which occlude the truth. The capacity of night vision symbolizes the power of penetrating consciousness beyond the deceptive waves of illusion (in which time plays an important role), thus succeeding in making the truth shine. This is the essence of the owl symbol.

JAPANESE DOOR SYMBOL

This is commonly found in the Japanese Shinto religion and actually even rendered in the construction of their Torii gates, but few are aware that the origin of this symbol derives from ancient Sirian symbols.

This symbol is more complex and requires a certain ability in order to be interpreted. It represents the eternity of God (the upper horizontal straight line) which manifests itself in the past and in the future, but at present, only those who have transcended the physical plane can reach it (the middle vertical line stops at the second horizontal line).

The two horizontal lines on the vertical lines are helpful methods of ascending or evolving spiritually, either by carefully analyzing the actions of the past (analyzing the past of one's life) or by transposing the human being into a higher state which one can reach through spiritual practice (the vision of the bright future). The being who attains the state of inner silence, however, will be able to attain wisdom through introspection (the gap below the middle line).

I wanted to take this digression on Sirian symbolism because I was deeply impressed by its extraordinary influence it has had, over time, on many civilizations of Mankind. Due to the depth of conception and the portrayal of universal realities, it can be a valuable aid in certain actions and initiatives through the high resonant energy that it activates. This was, in fact, one of the main reasons why we used Sirian symbols in the Eden project, even though they have remained a mystery to this day for other members of the work team.

5 — A SUPERIOR VISION ON MICROCOSMIC REALITY

During the interim between two stages of viewing the holographic screen, my discussion with the man from Apellos brought additional surprises besides the explanations regarding the impossibility of making a circle or a sphere or those about the “constant value” of the number Pi or the speed of light in a vacuum.

PHASE-SHIFT OF AN ELECTRON IN ORBIT

In the next break of relaxation, being preoccupied with these problems and seeking to understand their nature better, I made some observations to which I was waiting for an answer. Suddenly, and apparently without any connection to the topic of the discussion at that time, which referred to the position of the center of a circle on its circumference, the man from Apellos said, “The correlation you have made with quantum mechanics is correct.”

I was surprised by the return to this topic and the way he was mentioned it, even though I knew very well that the one I was talking to had telepathic powers. The man from Apellos was referring to the thoughts that had flashed through my head about a possible correlation between the “instability” of the value of Pi, depending upon the nature of the calculations in which it is used and the values for high energies and frequencies at the quantum level, all of which would favor this prospect. I was thinking that in such situations the differences around the “constant” would also become larger and more significant. Perhaps the inspiration to observe the variation of Pi at the microcosmic level originated from the man from Apellos. In any case, the topic seemed fascinating and I wanted to find out more.

“Some of your physicists in this field have observed that electrons that have a well-defined ‘orbit’ with a specific speed and energy — even if they do not appear around the nucleus in reality — show a certain phase difference after a period of rotation around the nucleus, that is to say, they emit a certain energy that should not then happen. Your scholars, however, do not understand this phenomenon and do not know what is happening at those times.”

The phenomenon mentioned by the man from Apellos is a well-known one, although it was only then that I realized of its acceptance as such, even though I did not have a clear explanation from him. Normally, as the principles of quantum mechanics state, the electron should remain in orbit around the nucleus as long as it does not receive additional energy or give up energy to change that orbit. However, after a certain time in its rotation, a small phase difference appears “which should not exist”.

“It is only when you put the problem this way that I think about it more seriously,” I remarked with wonder.

I was, however, somewhat surprised that the man from Apellos insisted on focusing exactly on that phenomenon. Why precisely that phenomenon and not another? The process is simple, but it is true that, at least until now, it has not received a plausible explanation. I thought that perhaps it was not well documented enough, so I asked if there was actually any knowledge of the source of this phenomenon in modern quantum physics.

“So far, no, but what happens in this regard is fundamental to a deeper understanding of reality,” the man from Apellos replied enigmatically.

THE IMPOSSIBILITY OF MAKING A PERFECT CIRCLE OR SPHERE

Basically, I did not know what else to say. I expected some explanations to follow, but they did not come. After a few seconds, I preferred to ask directly.

“And what would be the reason behind this phenomenon?”

It seemed to me that I was trying to touch a dot on the ocean with my finger, but it was worth doing because I was very interested and absorbed the possibility of new information.

“I brought up this subject because it connects, in a way, with our discussion of the problem of the circle and the sphere,” the man from Apellos began to explain to me. “Those small ‘desynchronizations’ in the motion of the electron in its orbit, which appear as a phase shift, occur due to changes in space and time. This precise ‘alteration’ of the space-time continuum generates the feeling of ‘continuity’ in the appearance of a circle or a sphere, giving the impression that they are perfect. In reality, a circle is ‘born’ and then grows like a child. At first, it is a point, then it grows more and more, and this growth continues indefinitely. Nowhere in the universe has there ever been a real and definitive ‘circle’ for the simple reason that it would then limit both space and time. It is, therefore, increasing as it continues, evolving in a continuous transformation and that is why we always assimilate the center with the periphery.”

“Are you telling me here that there is no circle or sphere in the universe?! I can understand the concept of limitation which you have exposed, but what about the actual drawings or physical renderings? They look perfect.”

“It’s just an approximate perception. In reality, there is no perfect circle in nature. The circle is nothing but an idealization, a continuation of small arcs of a circle or, more correctly, a theoretical aspect derived from the notion of a spiral. The same is true for the sphere. The mental creation of a sphere starts first from an inner state, and then an imaginary vision of the sphere itself appears. It takes time to react and be creative.”

I was now sure that I understood something very important. I realized that whenever we draw a circle or build a sphere, we must take into account the appearance of time, an aspect which is usually neglected. If we take this essential aspect into account, we will never make a circle, but what we will then draw, in reality, will be a spiral because we cannot return to the point from which we started, i.e. the initial time which we can identify as t0. We will never be able to reach t0 at the same time, a point in space which corresponds to the exact location where the initial movement started, because a time interval has passed between the starting moment (t0) of the circle and the end moment (t1).

In this case, the fundamental mistake of contemporary science is to minimize the implications of approximating the space-time continuum to the scale of daily activities. Scientists simply ignore time as a coordinate of actual four-dimensional space, considering it to be negligible in terms of the scale within which we usually act.* In their calculations, they use only space and time in classical Newtonian mechanics where space and time are two separate notions and, moreover, where space is relative and time is absolute. **

[FOOTNOTE: * If time is considered in addition to the three spatial coordinates within Minkowski space.]

[FOOTNOTE:  That is, it flows in the same way in all inertial reference systems.]

Even physically or concretely speaking, if we draw a circle with the compass and a pencil on paper, we will get that “continuous” line made with the help of the compass, but it still requires a certain amount of time. For modern science, this time of creating the circle does not influence in any way the final shape of the resulting curve. At a closer look, however, drawing the circumference of the circle with the pencil fixed to the compass, its tip will blur a little because it is made of graphite. Thus, when the circle “closes”, its radius will not be the same as at the start because there is now less graphite at the tip of the pencil. Even if it is a difference of only a few hundredths of a millimeter or even a few microns between the starting radius of the circle and its radius at the closing of the circumference line (because the pencil has lost some graphite) this difference still exists and distinguishes the hypothetical continuous circle from the one that is actually obtained by tracing.

Therefore, returning to the same point is impossible because, while we drew the line of the circle, a certain time has already passed, say tn. We will get close to the initial starting moment (t0), maybe even very close to it, but never at exactly the same point. This means we cannot overlap the last point of the line with the starting point because the end point of where the circle “closes” is in a different configuration of space and time than the one at the beginning. Indeed, at the close of the “circle”, time has another value.

So, in reality, we have a spiral and not a circle. Whatever we do and whatever example we look for, the circle, as a mental notion, is impossible to obtain because you can never return exactly to the point from which you left with its tracing.

I would understand all this much better later, after the construction of Eden was completed. I then truly realized, in conjunction with the explanations of the man from Apellos on this subject, how important it is to pay attention to details in Nature because nothing is superfluous, meaningless nor done at random. In this connection, Einstein's words prove to be true and full of profound significance, even though they have generated much controversy.*

[FOOTNOTE:* The author is probably referring to a famous quote from Einstein: "God does not play dice!" Einstein was making an observation in the dispute with the pioneers of quantum mechanics (Born, Schrodinger, Heisenberg, Pauli, etc.), highlighting some shortcomings in the theory of quantum mechanics. The quote appears in a letter that the genius scholar addressed to the physicist Max Born in 1926. The full passage in the letter is: "Quantum theory gives us much, but it hardly brings us closer to the secrets of God. In any case, I am convinced that He does not play dice with the Universe." Einstein wanted to say that nothing is approximate, left to chance or in uncertainty, including at the quantum level. His opinion was completely different from the conception of quantum mechanics which stipulates that all processes, interactions and phenomena that take place at the quantum level are the result of chance.]

On the other hand, the man from Apellos explained to me that the line that is drawn as the circumference of the circle is actually made up of a multitude of small arcs of a circle. Therefore, that movement is, in fact, discontinuous. The feeling of continuity, however, appears at a macroscopic level, precisely due to the approximations that are made. This leads to a mental "blockage" in the three-dimensional conception of physical space because, in the calculations related to daily human activities, the fourth dimension, which is time, is neglected. In theory, however, space and time are intrinsically linked and form an indissoluble continuum.

A problem arises when science considers that, in the ordinary circumstances of existence, this interconnection between space and time is "negligible". It is true that, from the point of view of ordinary human perception and the "continuity" of life, the mutual influence between time and space seems to be negligible, but it is precisely those "small negligible quantities" that actually make the difference between an approximate perception of things and a truly lucid perception, i.e. vigilance over the surrounding reality. Only some human beings, those have an increased capacity to observe the mysterious connections in the universe, understand this interconnection and behave as such.

Of course, a "decision" to reform this concept in regard to today's mathematics and physics is difficult to make. The circle should be considered a spiral, and the sphere should be a concept of "puff pastry", a kind of "wrapping" of the surface itself. Likewise, the same principle should then be applied to other forms or "solids" that are considered to be "perfect". But, this "movement" of awakening from the heavy sleep of ignorance would be a disaster for modern science which should revise all their theories calculations, theorems and science of mathematics and physics according to the new and correct vision. This would be about the same as the reaction you would expect to have from archaeologists, paleontologists, historians and geologists before changing their paradigm of thinking based on dozens, maybe even hundreds of instances of evidence of the existence of very advanced civilizations that existed on Earth for thousands, tens of thousands and even hundreds of thousands of years before the “recognized history” of humanity, as we have exposed in the previous volume.*

“SPACE OF MOVEMENT” OF PARTICLES

The Apellos man then explained to me that what happens at the phase difference of the electron in its orbit is difficult for physicists to understand, especially because of their misconception about the meaning and existence of the electron.

“In reality, what they call the ‘electron’ does not move in orbit, but its motion around the atomic nucleus is just an approximation that scientists have given to that phenomenon in order to understand what is there inside the atom. Otherwise, they would not have had any conceptual reference unit.”

I thought for a while, searching for my words.

“Are these phase differences, which in fact represent a discontinuity in the space-time continuum, separated from each other?”

“No. They are connected precisely by the respective discontinuity which allows a new ‘path’ for an electron to appear on a very close frequency but not the same as the previous one. The respective phase shifts pave the way for new approximate ‘orbits’ which shows that the electrons are actually ‘moving’ in spirals, not the circles or ellipses that your science claims at this time.”

I intervened quickly.

“In any case, they’re not closed, considering what you just told me about the circle.”

In my opinion, this very phase shift, that is, the very discontinuity that occurs, confirms this.

The man from Apellos nodded at me, making a comment.

“Yes, you understand. In reality, there is no ‘perfect circle’. It is illogical for your scientists, knowing this, to continue to approximate circular motion as a perfect circle because such a thing simply does not exist. They should modify their thinking to this new perspective, but this is not so simple.”

“I wonder how this problem is posed at the quantum level,” I said, reflecting more inwardly.

“The problem in the ‘macro’ world is an extension of the ‘micro’ world. Your scientists still follow the idea of a ‘perfect circle’ and a ‘perfect sphere’ because their conception of the basis of quantum mechanics is still too materialistic. It starts from the premise that there is matter and energy, even if a greater number of physicists suspect that the essence of everything that exists is only energy. If the calculations were made on the assumption of the existence of energy, and scientists finally understood that matter is only a local concentration of vibrations, then it would be acknowledged that the hypothesis of the perfect circle or the perfect sphere no longer makes sense.”

Meditating later on these issues, I realized that the conceptual support of today’s science still suffers from the superficiality or “laziness” of considering things at their exact and “correct” value. Approximations are always made which, in fact, “accumulate” and, in the end, offer a largely false result even if, at a glance, they seem to respect the laws of nature. One of the best examples is the space created by geometric figures, especially circles and spheres.

The problem with these “spaces” is that they, like many other notions and phenomena, are not yet well understood by mathematicians. The space that is “adopted” for calculations, be it Euclidean, Hilbertian, Minkowskian, etc, is an idealized space where events take place. But for them to take place, it is necessary to have another space beforehand. Therefore, we have a general space-time in which other space-times are created, as needed. For example, for things to “work”, we use a system of axes and coordinates that are simply arbitrary and theoretical. If we really want to understand Nature, it is then necessary to take these coordinates out of the realm of theory and apply them “concretely”. This means that there will be a designated space-time with a certain level of vibration in which there will be another space-time with a different level of vibration. There are permanent connections between these vibrational levels which are manifested by extremely small discontinuities. Scientists want to unite different structures or forms with each other without suspecting that each object actually represents a “particular” space-time, and the connections between objects represent the quantum union between several such “particular” structures of the space-time continuum.

Minkowski space is very convenient for such an approach because it considers time to be related to its fourth dimension, in addition to the three known spatial dimensions. In such a space, the objects themselves represent a “separate space continuum and an independent time”. The union of objects represents the union of very close dimensions that would create this seemingly continuous dimension in which we consider that we live.

THE PROBLEM OF CONSCIOUSNESS IN THE QUANTUM WORLD

The difficulties of scientific conception do not stop here however. The man from Apellos pointed out a truth I had known for a long time from Cezar and Dr. Xien.

“Every atom is first and foremost an entity, a certain form of consciousness. I have noticed that there are scientists who have intuited this truth, but the vast majority of them ignore it. You can’t consider an atom just by saying it is something very small and that’s it. This is a vision that sets limits in itself. Even if you have somehow gone beyond the ‘atomic barrier’ in science and plunged into the world of elementary particles, it does not give you the proper understanding of the phenomena that takes place there or their mode of formation.”

I was then reminded of several elements that initially define physics at the microcosmic level: the set defined by four quantum numbers to characterize the state of the electron in orbit around the nucleus,* the electronic layers and substrates in the structure of the atom, and the orbitals used to characterize the probability of an electron. The man from Appellos, however, pointed out that current quantum theory, even if it is quite complex, is not very useful as long as its foundations are not yet fully known.

[FOOTNOTE: * Quantum numbers usually describe the energy of electrons in the atom but also indicate the various (quantified) values of their orbital and kinetic spin momentum. The four quantum numbers are: 1) The main quantum number n , indicating the number of the electronic layer; 2) The secondary quantum number or orbital kinetic moment l (as in the letter L), which determines the number of electronic substrates and the shape of the orbitals; 3) The magnetic quantum number m , quantifying the spatial orientation of the kinetic moment and indicating the number of available orbits in a sublevel; and 4) The quantum spin number(s) which quantifies the kinetic spin moment of the electron: the intuitive (though not entirely accurate) image of the electron spin that is due to the rotation of the electron about its own axis, and the kinetic moment of spin that “gives rise” to a magnetic moment proper to the electron.]

“Rather,” he said, “the situation is like that of a treasure hunter groping with a small lighted candle through a huge cavern in complete darkness.” He hopes to make the great discovery, believing that it may be in a certain direction, but he is mistaken because he has not entered where he should in that cave.”

“Well, that’s how he could continue to look long and hard without getting any essential results,” I said.

The man from Apellos nodded his approval of my comment and spoke.

“The point is, he only gets to a stalagmite or a puddle from time to time, but he never finds the treasure although often passing it. It’s kind of a forever game of hide-and-seek.”

I then asked him what the main causes were for this, and the man from Apellos told me that the first was their materialistic conception of science, and the second was a corollary of it: pride and scientific arrogance. I know all too well how things were in this regard, so I could only agree with him.

“That is why,” he added, “a radical change of vision is really necessary in the conception of your science.” Not all the things you have reached are wrong, but you will not be able to make the decisive leap if you stay at this level. It's like waiting for an egg to boil in water at 70 degrees Celsius.”

In principle, the initial model of the atom — based largely on the Sommerfeld model* — is not really wrong, although it is based almost exclusively on approximations. For example, at the quantum level, we cannot talk about the trajectory of an electron or an elementary particle, but rather about the probability of the existence of an accumulation of waves in a certain area of that atom. Almost all phenomena related to the quantum world of the atom are described by models based upon uncertainties and approximations that scientists have made out of the desire that “things all must make sense in a certain manner that is otherwise well known by all those who have knowledge in the field”.

* This model, which is a development of Bohr’s model, assumes that electrons rotate around the atomic nucleus not only on circular trajectories but also on elliptical trajectories.

 The Bohr and Bohr-Sommerfeld models are pre-quantum models and were developed at the beginning of atomic physics. Non-relativistic quantum mechanics appeared about eleven years after the development of the Bohr-Sommerfeld model; and only after that, with the postulate of Erwin Schrödinger’s equation published in 1926, was the non-relativistic quantum model of the atom developed, which we could say is the contemporary model used today. The most rigorous current model, however, is the relativistic quantum model of the atom based on Dirac’s equation.

 The author makes indirect reference to Heisenberg’s uncertainty principle which states that the velocity and position of a microparticle (relative to the same direction of space) cannot be known simultaneously but only by one or the other of these quantities.

ATOMIC MODELS

For example, there are still some today who still imagine electrons as particles that move very fast in the space around the nucleus of the atom, forming an “electronic cloud” but without any precise description about their exact trajectory or position inside the atom. This is the splendor of quantum phenomena because it is the best proof of the statement that “you get what you want to see and believe”.

The planetary model of the atom is a good example of this. The world wanted to understand the structure of the atom, and this, in the beginning, was similar to the planetary system: as electrons rotate in elliptical orbits around the nucleus, so do the planets revolve around the Sun. It was quickly understood, however, that the electrons would fall into the nucleus and everything would collapse in a very short time. That is why the planetary model was completed with the idea of stationary orbits, a good idea which was already, slowly but surely, connecting with quantum mechanics. In this way, the planetary model became a pre-quantum model that appealed to the idea of quantifying the orbits of electrons. In it, it is considered that the electrons move in orbits like concentric circles with each “orbit” actually representing an energy level.* This model demonstrates that the valences of the atoms did not last long either, due to design inconsistencies

* The Bohr Model which, in 1913, “dethroned” the Rutherford Model.

 In short, the valence of an atom represents its ability to combine with other atoms to form chemical compounds or molecules.

 For example, Bohr proposed his model almost twenty years before the discovery of the neutron in 1932 by James Chadwick although the existence of the neutron was theorized before by Ernest Rutherford in 1920.

Quantum mechanics later showed that, in fact, electrons do not orbit the atomic nucleus and that they cannot be “found” in a certain place and at a specific time in the atom. Rather, they “cover” a range of probabilities of their presence inside the atom because they appear to exist simultaneously in different places at the same time. This situation is valid until the moment we perform a measurement on an electron, in which case we can find it in a certain area of the atom but not before the measurement takes place. That is why the model of the “electron cloud” around the atomic nucleus seems to present this situation satisfactorily because it at least gives a general idea of what is there, but that does not mean things have been fully understood.

In fact, the essence of quantum mechanics is not really understood even today. There are a number of phenomena that occur on a quantum scale that cannot be explained with the help of the mathematical apparatus of current quantum mechanics. One of them, famous in its own way, is related to the “experiment of the two slots” which highlights an extraordinary and still miraculous property of microparticles: namely, that they somehow “feel” that they are being observed.

THE PROBLEM OF QUANTUM UNCERTAINTY: IS IT HAPHAZARD OR PERFECT ORDER?

By its very nature, the probabilistic interpretation of quantum mechanics has a high degree of uncertainty,* always being considered “strange” in relation to the “normal” conception and vision of classical physics and ordinary existence, but it is the defining feature of quantum mechanics. In reality, things would not seem so strange if we better understood how atoms appear and form in the physical plane. To cover this fundamental gap of conception, quantum mechanics imposes the idea of “haphazard”, but there is a precise “descent” of the formation of each atom and a causality in its existence because, in reality, nothing in Creation, either at the macrocosmic or at the microcosmic level, happens “at random”.

[FOOTNOTE: * Again, the author indirectly refers to Heisenberg’s Uncertainty Principle in Quantum Mechanics.]

The dilemma between “chance” and “precise causality” has been the apple of discord among physicists from the beginning. In quantum physics, for example, there is a lot of talk about location of particles and their quality while, in Einstein’s relativistic physics, there is talk of energy as a concrete quantity which can be measured with various precise values. Therefore, we cannot always “swim” in the eternal “uncertainty” of waves and their general mode of manifestation because, while this provides more of an idea of how phenomena occur and how things are, it is not precisely accurate. Of course, from a certain perspective, both variants are valid because they offer different explanations in different conditions: sometimes things appear only in a general aspect or expressed in probabilistic terms, as in the case of waves; while other times they become concrete, as in the case of the involvement of observation in the experiment.

“The ‘uncertainty’ that one of the principles of microcosmic physics claims in your science arose from, in fact, was your inability to measure something,” the man from Apellos said. “This has nothing to do with reality. It’s like saying that, if you don’t know what things are like in a certain place, then you assume that they could be ‘something like that’ with a certain probability, and you make this the ‘end’ of your knowledge in that direction. Further, if you do not know how to measure that, that doesn't mean you're right."

"Well, that's the controversy of the last hundred years which has tilted in the direction of the 'haphazard' interpretation,"* I said. "The followers of this idea, however, did not say that they do not know how to measure quantum reality but that it can only be measured under certain conditions."

[FOOTNOTE: * See the previous footnote about Einstein's statement that "God does not play dice!"]

[FOOTNOTE:  Representatives of the "Copenhagen School Interpretation" were Niels Bohr and Werner Heisenberg as keynote speakers who defined a set of rules for understanding quantum mechanics. Einstein was reluctant from the beginning to adopt the "spirit of the Copenhagen School", denying it until his death. One of the opponents of the "Copenhagen School interpretation" was John G. Cramer who stated in his paper "The Transactional Interpretation of Quantum Mechanics" (1986) that, "Despite an extensive literature that refers to, discusses and criticizes the Copenhagen School's interpretation of quantum mechanics, nowhere does there seem to be any concise statement that fully defines this interpretation."]

"They came to this conclusion by assuming that, if they cannot use photon-based measurement, which involves light, this means that there is no other method of measuring a quantum reality. In reality, the interpretation of quantum 'uncertainty' is wrong as you see it. This does not mean, however, that Nature is incapable of controlling or 'measuring' those quantum realities. If it were as it is interpreted in the Uncertainty Principle which your science has formulated, it would mean that there is no order in Nature and that everything is chaos."

"Then how should one understand this?" I asked, honestly surprised

"The idea is that 'uncertainty' should not be resolved but rather reinterpreted; and then, it is no longer uncertainty. You no longer start from the idea that 'you can't see the particle' because this is no longer important then, but by the correct understanding of the 'uncertainty', the seemingly linear motion of the particles is transformed into a kind of rotation of the particle, and you then immediately have angular momentum! You really want the particle to enter a state of 'rotation'."

"How do I see it then?"

“You are no longer interested in seeing it, but you are interested in the fact that, through rotation, a certain specific radiation is produced which is, in fact, some electromagnetic waves which are specific to that rotational motion.”

“Okay, but why don’t I see it?” I insisted. “I understand. I have the specific rotation and waves of the particle, but I still don’t see it. Why?”

“Because you can no longer see it with your current equipment. As I told you before, it also depends a lot on your technological measurement capabilities. Your scientists like to think they have everything in this regard, and if they can’t measure or see anything with what they have as measuring instruments, they then think that reality doesn’t exist.”

I did not give up.

“And what’s new in this? I haven’t seen the particle before, and I don’t see it now, even with these explanations. So, what’s new from this point of view?”

“There are many other phenomena, including absorption. A vortex appears and then the particles will tend to move around a ‘gravitational point’. The gravitational aspect is very important here.”

“That’s happening from the start of the rotation anyway.”

“Yes, but the moment you reinterpret ‘uncertainty’, you can then arrange your devices to measure this new reality, and then you will see quantum phenomena that you did not know.”

He was right because, in the quantum realm, reality changes according to what you want to pursue. I, however, had my doubts about the transformation of particle motion.

“It’s still not clear to me how things are turning into a ‘rotation’,” I said.

The man from Apellos was so patient that I would have liked to have had such a teacher in high school.

“It’s a very important phenomenon. The rectilinear motion of a particle turns into a rotational motion, and then you can no longer see the particle.”

“Why? A bullet coming out of the barrel of a pistol or an arrow released from a spring rotates and, at the same time, advances ‘straight’ at a certain speed.”

“When you see a particle, what you see is dependent upon the wavelength of the photon you use, which appears to you as ‘light’. If that particle moves so that you can observe its motion, you can tell where it is. But the moment you have the ability to observe and measure, say, within a range of 40 picometers,* and the particle moves within a range of 10 picometers, you can no longer observe it.

“Okay, but there could be wavelength photons to observe the particle,” I said.

[FOOTNOTE: *A picometer (pm) measures 10 to the negative twelfth power meters. For example, a hydrogen atom has a diameter of 53 pm.]

“Indeed; but you do not have the necessary equipment to create such photons,” the man from Apellos replied, telling me that it was still time to continue looking at aspects of the real history of Mankind. This topic was extremely attractive to me, so I set out to investigate it as deeply as possible because it seemed to me a cornerstone for a correct understanding of reality. In a series of exceptional experiences, which I later lived, I was able to delve much deeper into the true meanings of Heisenberg’s uncertainty principle, but I will talk about all this in detail in one of the future volumes.

6 — FIRST EXPERIMENTS IN THE SPACE-TIME MACHINE

The year 2015, until the beginning of autumn, was very intense. The construction of the device, at least at the beginning, required a lot of preparations, discussions, meetings, tests and solutions. The distribution of tasks for other people was done on the principle of division of labor, in the sense that only the data strictly necessary for the part of the project that belonged to each respective member of the work team was provided. This is a normal and well-known practice, especially in military projects, as it prevents, at least in theory, the unwanted leakage of information.

I coordinated the project data together with Cezar and Lieutenant Nicoară. Cautiously, Cezar worked out confidentiality agreements with those who collaborated with us. In addition, the meetings took place in spaces closely monitored by us in order to avoid any unwanted “interference”. In principle, the team was not numerous, but even so, we had to be very careful.

CHALLENGES AND OBSTACLES

Contrary to popular belief, large and complicated projects — whether governmental or not — are often less effective than those approached at a lower level. This is due in part to the rather complicated bureaucratic apparatus that appears at that level, including political or other interventions, as well as the large number of people taking part in the project. Usually, such a project represents a complex “entity” whose resistance is quite high. In the case of smaller projects, things can move much faster, but the resources and possibilities are also smaller.

From the beginning, the Eden project had two major problems which we had to overcome. On the one hand, it was necessary to design very complicated software which would ensure the specific functioning of Eden. Here, we relied on the extraordinary genius of Midas. On the other hand, the financial problem loomed on the horizon as a serious obstacle. Although we thought that funds would not be a problem at first, we soon realized that we were facing huge difficulties from this perspective. It turned out that the realization of the mere external skeleton of the “chair” itself, to which other basic arrangements were added, raised the expenses to a value that far exceeded both our current financial possibilities and the savings we had. And this was only the tip of the iceberg because there were also the payments to be made to our collaborators, and not only the contractual ones but especially those special materials which we have already mentioned. So, the initial estimated costs became much higher when we started to put the project into practice.

It was a difficult time, felt most intensely around the end of April. Neither I nor Cezar were willing to compromise as we had already adapted the project to a considerable extent so that it would still be accessible without losing too much of the possibilities that the device could provide. The production costs, however, were enormous. I confess that I felt the “pressure” of this fact, and even Cezar was concerned because the project had to go ahead.

Even though we were beginning to have to face these difficulties, the first experiments were already underway. The basic software of the device had already been designed by Midas, and the first tests of correlation with the two huge Tesla coils, which had been constructively adapted to our plans, were positive.

It was at about this time that I started the first training session, even if the device was in an early stage of development. The interaction with the frequencies modulated by Eden, which gradually became a “machine of controlled spacetime distortion,” was obvious and powerful. Midas explained to me that this was mainly due to the modulated energy of the two special Tesla coils and that he still needed to make some programming adjustments. Basically, everything was a game of frequencies which had to be combined so that their action was as finely tuned as possible at the biological level. In the design theme, the frequencies modulated in a certain way by the basic software resonated at the same time with different glands of the body, especially with the pineal gland and also with different internal biological structures that included the structure of DNA itself. The software aimed at a permanent orientation of the frequencies according to the biological state of who was seated in the device. Feedback was expected at each external impulse. For this, special sensors were designed from scratch which were not on the market. This proved to be extremely sophisticated and required months of very intense effort on the part of Midas to find the solution to combine the frequencies. In a moment of sincerity, he confessed to me that, from his professional point of view, Eden's programming was the greatest and most difficult challenge he had faced until then.

"I'm still not happy with what I've done," he told me. "It works, but it's not perfect...I still need time...I insist."

A NECESSARY "UPGRADE" FOR CONTEMPORARY SCIENCE

I considered, however, that the results up until then were very good because I had seen how the technology that was born in our project tended to "break" the usual and old-fashioned patterns of current science. First, our work provided clear evidence of the existence of subtle planes of manifestation. I have touched on this topic many times in my books because I consider it to be of fundamental importance. Additionally, I do not see how contemporary science could take significant steps forward without understanding that the real structure of the universe is based upon the hierarchy of dimensions of existence with regard to the principle of vibrational frequencies of energy.

In the beginning, to make things clearer for Midas, I had to briefly explain some basic elements in this regard to be sure that what we were doing would reach beyond the limited concepts of today's scientists. We needed his free spirit and his very open thinking so that he could correctly understand the real way Eden was supposed to work. Fortunately, this proved to be quite easy with Midas as he already had some ideas about the subtleties and plurality of different worlds. It was only necessary therefore to summarize some aspects of it in this direction and to draw the correct line or approach to the theme of the project.

I have seldom had the opportunity to meet a person with such sharp intelligence. This young man managed to extract, in only a few phrases, the essence of complex elaborations which would have required perhaps lengthy discussions, and even more, to then correctly extrapolate upon the conclusions he reached. It was a pleasure to talk to him, but for that, it was also necessary to be yourself. Like any extremely mentally gifted and intuitive young man, Midas also had high expectations of his interlocutor, from whom he demanded good mental training. In his case, this attitude was justified because it was almost impossible to discuss a subject with him if it did not interest him nor if it did not really demand any contribution from his intellectual abilities.

Midas quickly caught on to the idea that the forms of manifestation of energy in the universe are endless, and that this implicitly leads to the existence of very complex worlds, plans and dimensions outside the physical plane in which we live.

“There are many so-called parallel planes, but they are potentials; that is to say, they are not ‘active’ until you become aware of them,” I told him. “The plane or dimension of which you are aware is the one in which you exist.”

“Do I only exist here, on the physical plane? You said that human existence is multidimensional, complex.”

“That’s right, but for now, you’re only aware of the physical plane. For you, only it exists. The other dimensions you exist in, such as the etheric, astral, and so on, are just potential for you, at least for now. At most, you realize their existence in an indirect way through the effects that they produce and that you sometimes feel in your physical body, which is currently the only one that you seem to be fully aware of and convinced of its existence.”

“But you said, however, that there are several such planes for existence. What else is there to believe?”

“That’s a reality. I’m just confirming that. It’s less important whether you believe that or not. What matters most is to become aware of the other dimensions of your existence.”

“How?” he asked.

I smiled. Midas had a very concise, pragmatic and straightforward style of finding out. He was also very focused and staring, a feature that was especially visible whenever something interested him.

“By expansion. Think of a balloon. At first, it is almost deflated, and the volume it occupies is small. If you start blowing into it and inflating it, it grows in size and takes up more and more space. So does your consciousness. The more it expands, the more you become aware of the additional dimensions of the universe.”

“You mean that I live simultaneously in several dimensions that are parallel,” Midas said.

I was not sure if this was a question or a statement from him, but I answered back.

“Parallels are referred to by contemporary scientists. For them, the moment a plane exists, that is a physical plane. In their conception, it cannot be anything else.”

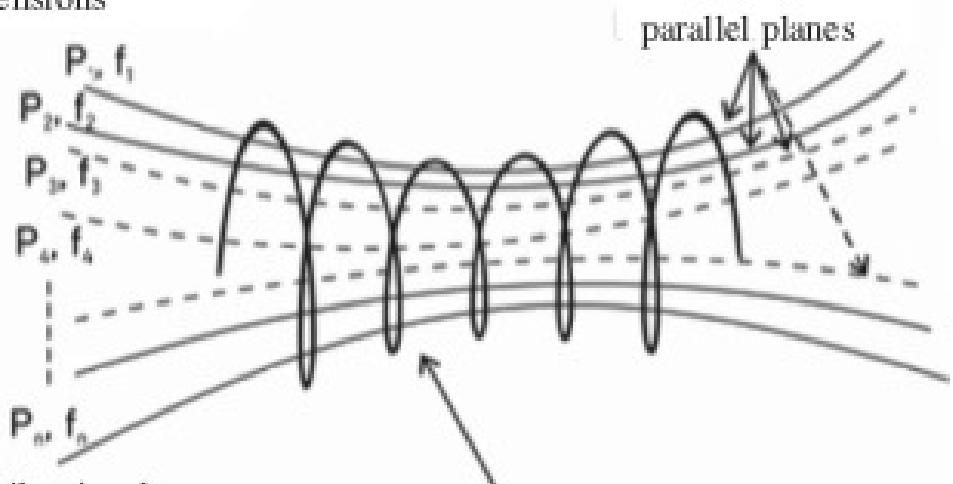

“I read, however, about people who are aware of other dimensions or who have actually penetrated them, lived there, and then returned. This means that they were and may still be fully aware of that plane or other parallel dimensions. What answer does science have for this?” he asked.

Midas was quite “incisive” but in a constructive way. He really wanted to know, to understand. I tried to explain to him with my own “weapons” of current science.

“It says that such planes of existence can exist, that they are ‘parallel’ with ours, but that they are all physical. Current science does not follow the idea that those ‘parallel’ planes or dimensions could be more refined than the physical plane. In other words, it does not accept that there may be planes of existence with a higher frequency of vibration than that of dense physical matter, in contrast to, for example, the etheric plane. For contemporary science, all that exists is the physical plane, whether it is conscious of it or not. The vibrational frequencies of these ‘parallel’ physical planes are close; that is, they are part of a ‘common bundle’ of a common envelope of frequencies, but in the end, for such scientists, it is also about physical matter.”

In the conception of current science, all “parallel” planes are physical

$P^1 \dots P^n$ = physical planes or dimensions

$f^1 \dots f^n$ = vibrational frequencies of parallel chains

common windings of frequencies close in value

Later, it was easy for Midas to understand that all current mathematics and physics are built on a “horizontal” model as opposed to a vertical one. Some scientists do not conceive, for example, that there could be a strictly energetic plane or dimension.

Even when they refer to someone’s thoughts or emotions, they do not see this as a manifestation in another plane of existence, but rather that those thoughts and emotions of people on the physical plane are only a chemical exchange between different sensors of the physical body.

“It’s like a conceptual block,” I explained to Midas. “In the conception of today’s scientists, a subtle energetic plane has no way to exist. If you analyze this well, even the equations of mathematical physics are from the beginning designed to show and describe only the physical plane.”

For contemporary scientists, there is indeed no hierarchy of planes of manifestation by reason of the vibrational frequency of energy. They do not even think of that. For them, anything is possible, but only on the physical plane. You can become what you want, open portals in another plane, and even make leaps in time, but all of this can only happen in reference to physical planes of manifestation.

Midas “adjusted” quite quickly to the basic conceptual structure of the universe and its main laws. I needed him to be convinced of this hierarchy of energy in order to properly program the source code and the necessary subroutines of the general software of the device. If his vision had been in line with the current paradigm of science, I do not think we could have succeeded in building Eden, at least not in terms of the space-time distortions that the “machine” could create. We needed a substitute for the function of the etheric crystal, and finally, Midas understood the mode of operation.

THE SUBTLETY OF AN ERROR

Around that time, an element intervened that would give a special impetus to the whole project. As far as I am concerned, this aspect also involved an emotional side which also alleviated the stress of the very intense period that had ensued since the beginning of the project.

In mid-June, just at the time of the stellar configuration what was calculated, the first assemblies of the device began. Construction proceeded fairly quickly, especially as many of the sub-assemblies had already been ordered or pre-assembled. After about two weeks, Eden was almost completely realized from an outer perspective. This was followed by work on the “interior” which included some electronic assemblies, certain finishes and especially the connection to the energy source.

From this last point of view, it was a difficult task to build the two large special Tesla coils. They can be considered the “heart” of the device and the source of the space-time distortions that Eden can accomplish according to clear and precise instructions released from the center console. I was strongly forbidden to present sketches or drawings of these coils, no matter how simple, or to offer other details of its construction or operating characteristics. The technical solution that was sent to me telepathically, which I was able to “extract” from the cortex without even understanding it too well at first, is truly amazing. Each component part of the coils were made in a different place to avoid any problems with security leaks and any unwanted connections or interference.

The smooth running of the construction and the experiments that followed, however, were not entirely without surprises. In July, I started the first training sessions, and the condition that enveloped my body as soon as I got in the chair and set the parameters that would determine the space-time distortion was absolutely amazing. I was so happy with what I had managed to do thus far that I spent hours on end, especially at night and in several stages, trying to adapt as well as possible to the subtle “energetic communication” with Eden. It being summer, the program was freer and I agreed with Cezar to make the most of that period so as to energetically stabilize my inner structure in order to adapt it to the specific energy of the device.

This was not a small task at all and it created a reverberation at very deep levels somewhere in my body. I usually felt the effects as waves or flows that created a feeling of immensity on a mental level. At first, it was really difficult because a feeling of dizziness appeared, as if the body could not sustain and control that energy. I, however, was not bothered so much by the intensity of the energy but rather by the ripple effects which the body did not seem to “understand” and to which my body was adjusting.

Somehow, the “chair” was trying to solve the task imposed by the programming of the desired space-time distortion through a kind of dissociation of energy levels in my being, or that was at least the feeling it created every time when the training session exceeded forty minutes. If I extended the meeting for an hour, the first signs of nausea and dizziness appeared. In fact, what bothered me was not so much the appearance of those symptoms but especially the feeling that something was not harmonious in what was manifesting. I was willing to accept a period of the body’s adaptation to the new type of energy and the corresponding frequencies, but what I was regularly feeling and the same symptoms that were being accentuated could not be correct.

About a week later, I shared the results with Cezar. We had a long discussion, analyzing all aspects point by point. In the second part of that discussion, we were joined by Lieutenant Nicoară, and he caught the “weak link” in the situation quite quickly. He logically pursued the thread and deduced that it could be a programming error because that is where the “frequency distribution” originated. At first I was a little surprised because I knew from the consultations with Midas that everything was very well understood and established, and I did not understand where the error could have crept in. I immediately arranged a meeting with him and Lieutenant Nicoară, and all three of us very carefully reviewed the lines of software code developed by Midas.

For me, that task was difficult to follow, and I had to ask for clarifications many times due to the complexity of the code. It was, however, a real pleasure to go through and understand, even if it was only a partial understanding, the exceptional way in which that programming genius had designed the operation of the device. It was, practically speaking, a combination of certain elements belonging to the physical plane and methods of tensor calculation which referred to the etheric plane. That source code and its “shells” were a true art of IT (Information Technology), replacing some of the subtle emissions of the etheric crystal.

Nicoară noted that although the values were to be calculated to the ninth decimal place for certain parameters resulting from a preliminary assessment, Midas had considered only the first five decimal places, these later being re-entered into the calculation flow.

As I recall, I think it was the first and perhaps the last time I saw Midas confused, surprised, and at the same time, upset. He explained to us that he simply did not consider that the results could be influenced by the seemingly very small values corresponding to the range between the sixth and the ninth decimal. His “rounding” of the values to the fifth decimal had seemed natural and sufficient. I, on the other hand, remembered the discussions I had with the man from Apellos in which he had shown me the similar mistakes that contemporary scientists were making, “neglecting” values that they considered insignificant but which, in reality, could cause some very fine effects of obvious importance for certain quantities corresponding to subtle planes.

Analyzing the problem, we realized that Eden was not only acting at the cellular level but even at much deeper levels, going as far as the quantum level. Here, any “quantity” is important because space and time are very subtle. If I had continued training with the initial set of values, the effects probably could have become very unpleasant and dangerous, even leading to a disorder of cellular functions.

After making changes and even improving some subroutines, which Midas completed in a very short time, we restarted the experiments inside the device. The changes turned out to be correct because the energy waves in my body now felt harmonious, and I could even prolong the sessions for more than two hours. I realized that it was all a matter of regular training. My physical cellular structure had to get used to the new energy frequencies and specific biochemical exchanges. In other words, I needed some time to adjust.

The construction of the device also permanently involved adjustments to the central software and the operation of the special coils, as well as to other component parts of the general assembly. It tended towards a perfect correlation of all these elements until a point of equilibrium of frequencies was actually reached, at which point Eden seemed to operate “on its own”.

I had entered a correct flow of distribution of the waves and their harmonics, and I felt that I was advancing quite fast. I was, for example, doing bio-feedback between cellular transformations and my mental condition. This was nothing new in today's technology, but in Eden's case, things seemed much more complex and fast. After the start of the training had developed according to the settings I was making, the effects appeared almost instantly. I felt that it was an accelerated growth in the sense of refining one's being, even if the purpose was not yet very clear. In other words, I did not know very well what exactly those results could lead to.

UNEXPECTED VISIT

One month after the start of training, Midas announced to me that he was introducing a higher level of programming, a modulation of energy that would produce deeper changes at the cellular level. In the initial design meetings, we had set a reasonable value for the energy level gradient module, precisely to give the body and mind time to take in the energy information correctly. In this way, we gradually "chiseled" the body and the mind without knowing exactly what the real target of that technology was. I only suspected that it could be related to the easy penetration into the subtle dimensions of the universe to, in any case, facilitate "extensions" of consciousness in order to have access to higher information.

About that time, I was with Cezar in the living room one evening just after a training session in which I had reached a kind of "threshold" of consciousness. I had noticed then that I could not say that I had slipped into sleep nor was I perfectly lucid. It was more like a semi-aware state in which the two states, dreamfulness and wakefulness, intertwine. I discussed with Cezar about the possible evolution of that condition, trying to find out if it could be done by extending the time given to each session or by changing other parameters, such as energy intensity or its spectral distribution. In the middle of the discussion, we both heard the door at the entrance to the villa open and then the sound of steps coming down the wide hall to the living room. It was like in a movie, waiting for an outcome. At that moment, both Cezar and I had the same telepathic perception, and I knew then that the one who had arrived was my old friend Elinor.

I quickly got up from my chair and took two steps toward the door. When it opened, I saw Elinor on the threshold. What a wonderful surprise! Astonished and at the same time very happy, I showed my outpouring of affection, hugging him and leading him into the room to meet Cezar. Meanwhile, I noticed the same “frozen” time of Elinor’s appearance, somewhere around the age of 38; also, his calm smiling presence and radiant aura full of vitality and power of action.

Cezar had also risen from his chair, and I then introduced them. In a way, they already knew each other from what I had told them about each other, but they had never met face to face. I then had the opportunity to realize the deep respect that each of them had for each other. It may sound a bit emphatic, but I had the impression of two “titans” meeting to join forces to achieve something magnificently spiritual. They seemed to be “from the same world”, both sharing the same aspirations and abilities to sustain the Good and help people. Through the game of fate, I had the opportunity to be around them, to listen to their teachings and to participate in some of the most amazing adventures, experiences which hardly find their place in the concerns of the common man.

The discussion started in a very natural way, being immediately oriented towards the Eden project.

“I know about your plan and what you started doing, but what brought me here were some of the blockages I felt in this far-reaching action.”

Amazed and reflexively, I responded.

“But no one knows about our project in this location!”

Cezar and Elinor smiled discreetly, and then I understood at once. For those who have a high degree of spirituality, it is no longer necessary for knowledge to reach them by ordinary methods. At the level of higher planes, it can be transmitted directly.

Cezar replied to Elinor, highlighting in summary some implications at the political level as well as the somewhat ungrateful situation for which, for the time being, we could not proceed with this extraordinary project in an “official” manner. While we were talking and exchanging opinions, we all went down to the basement, to the big room where the device was being built. Elinor was impressed by the complexity and scope of the project, but especially by the speed with which we had advanced.

I then told him briefly about the etheric crystal and the telepathic connection between it and myself, the way I was inspired to start this project, but also about the fact that we were currently facing financial difficulties and how that could considerably delay the realization of it.

“Yes. It’s a serious stalemate,” Elinor admitted.

After a few moments of thinking, he continued.

“I have a proposal for you. If you agree, I will financially support this project from now on. I know it’s important, and it needs to be developed carefully.”

It was a wonderful surprise and one I did not expect in the least. It offered a new impetus and the possibility of refining the construction plans of the device as well as the opportunity for significant improvements. Of course, Cezar and myself both intuited that the sums available to Elinor came from the results of the science of alchemy, but I felt that it was not necessary to probe deeply into the subject. In fact, I later reflected with a bitter smile on the strange mentality of contemporary society: being deeply rooted in materialism, it ironically rejects some scientific fields, true knowledge of arts such as alchemy and astrology, but on the other hand, it is very suspicious and infers the concrete results that can be obtained by these ways. It is only a matter of an indoctrination of consciousness by which everything that is not understood or known by contemporary science is considered to be deceptive or that it cannot exist.

Next, we informed Elinor about the members of the work team, about other details of construction and ideas about our project. It was a very fruitful discussion which later extended to other related fields. As I said, I appreciated Elinor’s proposal for financial support as a real stroke of providence which offered wonderful possibilities for the development of the project. Elinor’s integrity and virtue were perfect, operating only in the spirit of selfless help. He did not ask us for anything, he did not demand anything, but we felt that it was our duty to inform him about the state of the works, especially since his ideas and intuition often prove themselves to be very valuable.

Given the new situation, Elinor told us that he would stay in the country for a while to help directly with the smooth running of Eden’s construction and also to supervise my training. His presence brought a special impetus, and I am referring here not only to the exceptional financial help he offered us, but also to his very refined subtle influence. That contributed a lot to the first notable result I had working with Eden.

AN IMPORTANT STEP

About a week after Elinor's arrival, I sat one night in the seat of the chair, as usual, to begin my regular training session. A little later in the day than was typical, it was past one o'clock in the morning. I felt a little tired but not so much that I gave up training that night. I turned on the system, hearing the specific hum of Tesla coils which turned into a louder sound, but I was not tiring. Between the half-open eyelids, I saw the bluish-white light emanating from the coils as well as the unfolding of the digital information on the screen that I had fixed at a higher value than was usual with regard to their working frequencies and harmonics. I then fell asleep or at least I thought so. That was the first time something like this had happened. I had been preparing for almost two months, going through different phases and states, but I had never "fallen asleep".

Analyzing what happened later, I then realized that all the technical conditions were similar to those of other training sessions: the devices worked properly, even if they were adjusted to other parameters than on other days, the energy sources behaved normally, and the energy pulse variations were within the allowed limits. I, however, had fallen asleep. I thought that my state of slight physical fatigue could have determined this, but I remembered that this was not the first time I did the training sessions in such a condition, and those had been without any problems in this regard.

The most interesting aspect was that I did not lose consciousness of what I was doing then. Somewhere, in the background, my brain was giving me the information that I was "asleep", but in reality, I was quite self-aware. I realized, however, that something was somewhat "in the fog" but I could not say what. My consciousness seemed somewhat "difficult" and my perceptions were "slower". I sat in the chair of the device and heard the faint murmur of the appliances in the room, but I still noticed something strange: I could see my body, a little blurred, as I sat in the chair, and time seemed to freeze.

After I “woke up”, I could not understand how I had “fallen asleep” since I was aware of those aspects, all of which seemed to have been identical both in the dream state and in the reality of the physical plane. “After all, did I sleep or not?” I wondered. I could not answer that question then. I reviewed the “movie” from memory up to the thought that I had fallen asleep, but I could not identify the transition period. I could not tell how exactly that happened: that which made me believe and say that I was awake but still asleep.

Thinking more clearly in the following days, I came to the conclusion that, at that time, there was no actual hiatus or “breaking” of consciousness, only a “slower” perception of it. In passing, I continued to be the same self, but in a different state of perception, and this probably led the brain to interpret that I was “asleep”.

The next day, I told Cezar about that experience. Smiling, he told me that I had, in fact, experienced for the first time, modified by my own effort, the state of consciousness which involves etheric doubling. Even if this type of experience had been known to me for a long time (from the expeditions I took part in in the past), then it was the first time I had doubled “by my own forces”, without the help of force fields or inter-dimensional devices. It is true that I also benefited from the advantages of technology, but the phenomenon actually occurred due to certain state transformations that took place in my being.

In the evening, I met Elinor at the villa and told him what I had experienced during the last training session. He congratulated me on this success and added that this type of “out-of-body” experience could be greatly helped by regular training and proper nutrition.

“This ability to consciously duplicate should become commonplace and fairly easy to do,” he told me. “Consciousness is one, but it seems to be “divided” into several “consciousnesses” corresponding to each subtle body we have. Until now, you were mostly aware only of your physical body, but you have just consciously experienced the existence of your etheric body. The same will happen when you double in the astral plane or “wake up” while dreaming, being perfectly lucid and aware that you are during the dream.”

“This ability to double down consciously came a little late,” I said with some regret.

“This is primarily due to blockages of all kinds and impurities, both physical and subtle. It is not a necessary condition, but it is valid for most people.”

He then recommended a series of three simple purification techniques to facilitate such experiences because a heavy physical body “clogged” with impurities cannot “follow” with sufficient accuracy the sometimes very rapid variations of the multitude of parameters at the cellular level of the human being. Impurities are accumulated over the years, either through a wrong diet or due to other unfortunate habits such as alcohol consumption, but especially smoking, which significantly decreases the frequency of vibration of the physical body. Under such conditions, the body cannot follow the fine variations of energy, and that is why it is very difficult, if not impossible, to make the transition from the physical plane to the subtle planes of existence. The greater the difference in the level of vibration between the physical body and the etheric or astral body, the more difficult it is to access experiences of conscious duplication in the etheric or astral plane.

The techniques that Elinor taught me are generally well known. One of them is the black fast, his recommendation being to fast for a day one or two times a week, during which time one only consumes water over a twenty-four hour period. The other two techniques are of Oriental origin and aim at a physical and partially subtle purification of the being.

Although I agreed with the process of purifying the being to get better and better results in my training, I was also aware that this could also be a matter of time. Physical and especially psycho-logical purification is achieved gradually because the inertia of such systems are based upon reflexes and habits settled over time, such as different body movements or attitudes, vices or misconceptions, and it is quite hard to change.

“What you’re saying is true,” Elinor said. “Most people live in a mechanical way and do not know simple principles of conduct for a healthy life. The vibration of bodily matter and that of the mind are, generally speaking, in close connection. You can't really say that a butcher has metaphysical feelings because that is like saying you want to glue a piece of steel with paper glue. There is always a correlation between form and content. In principle, one modifies the other. Changes in thinking and conception, at the level of the mind, determine adjustments at the physical level because what is higher and finer commands what is lower and coarser."

From an esoteric point of view, I knew quite well the law of becoming and transformation, about which Cezar and Dr. Xien had spoken to me several times. My concern, however, came from the fact that the process of purification of the being was no longer following a natural path in my case but was somehow tending to be "forced" by the very action of the apparatus I was employing. I already had the experience of training inside Eden and I could feel the energy influxes acting on my body very well. What I still did not know for sure, however, was to what extent those influxes and vibrational frequencies could act in my being and with what the effects were.

Elinor then told me that, in his opinion, Eden is meant to produce the expansion of individual consciousness and its access to higher subtle dimensions and realities. In other words, it was meant to make an accelerated contribution to my spiritual evolution if the energy "leaps" were not too great for my body structure to reject.

7 — CONNECTION WITH APELLOS

As I had predicted, the energetic influence of the “machine” on my body was more intense and faster than the purification methods indicated by Elinor. The moderate solution would probably have been to dose an appropriate level of the energy intensity conveyed by Eden while continuing to practice the indicated purification techniques in parallel. In this way, I would have obtained a certain balance in the purification and preparation of my physical and subtle structure.

ELIXIR

I was, however, impatient. I knew and felt that I could have “taken” more, even if I was not yet perfectly prepared for it. The possibilities that Eden offered attracted me in particular, and the prospect of waiting for months to allow enough time for the structure of my being to adapt to the frequencies and intensity of energy did not satisfy me at all.

Speaking honestly with Elinor afterwards, I offered my point of view and asked him if the process of purification and preparation of the physical and subtle structure could not be helped by a special alchemical product. I knew all too well how I felt when, many years ago, he offered me a few drops of such an elixir.* Then, Elinor explained to me a great deal about the extraordinary importance of alchemical elixirs, substances which modern medicine does not even dream of. He told me that, in the case of these astonishingly effective substances, the transformation of the initial matter — which may be of a vegetable, animal, or mineral (metallic) nature — goes to the quantum level, owing to its extraordinary purity. The matter, which is the elixir itself, then somehow becomes intelligent. Moreover, this explains its action, which is holographic in the sense that it extends to all levels of being, not just the physical. Elinor pointed out to me, however, that such exceptional alchemical substances have different degrees of power and action on the human being, depending upon the stage they have reached in the process of the Alchemical Work. The closer this stage is to the last phase or the Philosopher’s Stone, the purer and more efficient the substance.

[FOOTNOTE: * February, 2005 (see volume 3, The Mystery of Egypt - The First Tunnel, published by Sky Books)]

[FOOTNOTE:  “Work” or “The Work” in the field of alchemy means the staged process of transformation of the Raw Material to the final stage, which is the Philosopher’s Stone or Quintessence.]

“However,” Elinor told me, “there are very few pure alchemical elixirs. If the substance obtained is administered when it is still at an impure stage, there is a danger of poisoning the being or causing serious damage to its physical or mental structure.”

“But the Middle Ages abounded in hundreds of types of elixirs and potions, some more powerful than others, that filled the pharmacies of that time,” I rightly expressed my astonishment. “Does this mean that they were not good or that they were impure?”

“Let’s not confuse the authentic alchemical elixirs with the so-called spagyric elixirs* or “second hand” ones, often obtained empirically or without a real knowledge of operations. The latter produced almost no results on the being and did not cure the sick person. Sometimes, the effects were even adverse and made one even sicker.”

[FOOTNOTE: *The term spagirism was introduced by Paracelsus (1493-1541) and later by his disciples in the specialized works of the time, eventually coming to be associated, over time, with alchemy and even confused with it. It can be said in general terms, however, that spagirism represents plant alchemy.]

“Still, a lot of people were talking about and looking for these products,” I said.

“Yes, but you had to take risks. Properly made spagarice is based upon operations specific to plant alchemy such as fermentation, distillation, separation, purification and reunification of elements in order to extract the essence of plants. Every seeker in the mysteries of alchemy strives to achieve this as he understands and knows how, with the technical means at hand. Enthusiasm alone is not enough because it must be doubled by great knowledge and impeccable patience. Many speakers obtained beautifully colored end products “on occasion” which they then sold either in liquid form, like an elixir, or in solid form, like salt. Such operations, however, must be carried out with great care. Otherwise, you spoil the product and may not even realize it. The knowledge of the operations and the experience gained must be deep so that the elixir obtained is truly “alchemical”. For this, it is necessary to take into account other principles and alchemical operations which do not make sense to talk about here. They do, however, require a divinatory knowledge from the alchemist and an initiation into the mysteries of these arts. Esotericism, Kabbalah and astrology are essential.”

“Then, how do you explain the abundance of spagyric substances in that period? If many were inefficient or even dangerous, how could people still buy?”

“Know that there is not much difference from what you find on the market now. Many praise their products as ‘miraculous’ and even ‘enlightening’ when, in reality, they are based upon deep ignorance. As was the case long ago, you now find the same attitude towards such products: trade, deception, imposture, and gullibility. At that time, things like this worked due to the great ignorance of people, but the current situation is not too different because you can find countless types of drugs for “healing” in pharmacies which, in reality, do nothing. From a vital or energetic point of view, they are ‘death’. They can apparently bring some improvements in certain diseases, especially if they are not too serious; or they can block the dangerous evolution of a disease for a while, but on the whole, it not only does not really cure that disease but also causes a whole series of side effects in the body which, in turn, can generate other problems. As they say, ‘on one side you fill the gap, on the other side you dig a hole’. The same thing happens with many herbal remedies. You have to be a good connoisseur yourself to realize what it is really all about.”

I smiled, seeing the direct and even radical way in which Elenor handled this. He was absolutely right because anyone with a certain culture in the field knows these things very well. Being synthetic, allopathic medicines destroys and impurifies the being more than healing it. For the body, it is more a work of Sisyphus because what is apparently repaired in one place, even if partially, spoils another area.

“As far as I understand, things haven’t changed much in the last hundred years,” I said.

“Those spagyric substances rarely produced any effect, in most cases being just plain colored oils. The pharmacists of the time either did not know the correct way to obtain a strong vegetable elixir through spagiriei or they were crooks.* This was probably one of the reasons that contributed, over time, to the rejection and ignorance of alchemy, even if spagiria is a distinct branch of it that related to the plant kingdom.”

[FOOTNOTE: * Spagiriei is a name used especially during the Middle Ages and refers to pharmacists, those who sold spagyric products.]

Following that discussion and the suggestion I made, Elinor agreed to speed up the process of purifying and vitalizing my being through a few daily doses of one of his alchemical elixirs which he offered me. I did not ask for “technical” details about the nature of that substance or how it was obtained because I was not prepared enough to understand those things. In addition, alchemy is probably the most “guarded” art that exists today because it is considered that the one who masters its supreme secret, that of obtaining the Philosopher’s Stone, and is then even able to obtain this priceless product is, in a certain context, is a “god” among men. Space and time influence it perhaps only to a very small extent. He then becomes a follower, a true sage, having access to a large part of the secrets of Creation because the Philosopher’s Stone represents the quintessence of everything that exists in manifestation.

According to the instructions received from Elinor, I diluted each dose so that the absorption of the elixir was achieved as efficiently as possible by osmosis, without violating my physical structure.

Even so, for more than a week, I was “shaken” by the chills because I felt the vitality of an incredible freshness and power that penetrated every part of my being. The effect was colossal, without any comparison to any medicine or cure, even natural ones.

“Think that you have access to an ocean of energy that is very pure and refined,” Elinor told me. “It’s like introducing a miniature ‘atomic plant’ into your body. What you take now is enough for about three months, but most of the effects will extend over several months and even years, after which they will gradually diminish. However, an essence of them will continue to remain ‘embedded’ in your cellular level because there has been a significant energetic leap.”

Indeed — I felt like I was living a new life. I then became fully convinced that everything is energy and that it penetrates every corner of Creation, nourishing and transforming it continuously. In the first training sessions that followed, I thought I would not be able to resist. I was losing sensation of my physical body, and I could no longer feel the contour of my body. The continual sensation was that of “lifting” accompanied by a state of such great inner exaltation that it was very difficult for me to concentrate. For a few days, I fully experienced the euphoria of the alchemical elixir, being closely observed by Elinor. Gradually, I began to control those states as “drunkenness of happiness”, even keeping the ecstatic sensations in the background while the mind was focused inward to better modulate the specific frequencies of energy provided by Eden.

From the beginning, I realized that, compared to the training up to that point, there were big differences in my condition and efficiency during the concentration process. If I was “riding a bicycle” in the early stages, I could say that I was now “flying by plane”. It is pretty hard to describe the expansion I was feeling then because it covered the space in a certain way to the outside, but at the same time, I felt myself focusing with great speed inwards, towards the atomic levels. The outward and inward movements were simultaneous, and this made me dizzy at first, but I then somehow managed to “suspend” myself: I was “watching” movements of energy from above without being influenced by them. My energy absorption capacity, as well as body purification, had greatly increased due to careful dosing of the alchemical elixir. It was a real miracle, I was fully aware of it and I was deeply grateful to Elinor, who gave me that opportunity in a very altruistic way.

“What you took during this period was only a modest elixir, if we are to make a rough hierarchy,” Elinor told me one day, after I had thanked him for offering me the possibility of experiencing that alchemical substance. It is more accurate to say, however, that it is an essence.

QUESTION MARKS

We were with Cezar on the terrace in front of the living room, sitting comfortably in the large armchairs and enjoying a quiet and wonderful late afternoon. The green of the abundant vegetation in the garden and the colorful palette of flowers surrounded the lawn on the side of the villa that leads to the terrace where we were. Elinor continued with his idea.

“The substance is pure, very beneficial, but relatively limited in effects in relation to the elixirs of the higher phases and incomparable with the Supreme Elixir, it being based on the Philosopher’s Stone itself.”

I thought to myself that if I felt such extraordinary effects from this “medium to weak” elixir offered to me by Elinor, then what would happen if I took the Supreme Elixir? I was still a little confused, so I asked him a question.

“Am I taking a tincture or an elixir? And what kind of tincture?”

“It’s not the same as the alcoholic tincture you’re thinking of because, in alchemy, ‘tincture’ means something else. There is a distinction between substances that reach different degrees of evolution during alchemical operations. What I gave you is a substance that is plant based.”

Cezar also spoke with interest.

“I understand that the power of action of alchemical elixirs is different, depending upon their stage of evolution.”

“Not all alchemical healing compound are called elixirs,” Elinor said. “Even if they have beneficial effects on the body, their power differs according to the degree of evolution they have reached via the sublimation of the alchemical process. Extracts have a lower effect on the body, and they are the most common products because they are relatively easy to obtain, but even here, a lot of attention is needed. Otherwise, the final product will be devoid of its active principles. The tinctures have a stronger action if they are carefully obtained, the essences are even more refined, and the elixirs are truly miraculous. They have no equal because they represent a “materialized energy”, but it is extremely pure. At the top is the supreme elixir, the Philosopher’s Stone.”

“But are these elixirs different in power, depending upon the kingdom from which they are obtained?” I asked insistently. “You told me that what I took belonged to plant alchemy, so I suppose it is from a certain plant.”

“Yes, from a kind of drosera.* And the elixirs are different. The strongest come from the metal kingdom. The vegetable elixir is also potent and can only be taken in high dilutions. You took some doses of an essence whose penetration power is average, but it still had to be diluted significantly.”

[FOOTNOTE: *A drosera is a carnivorous plant that lures, capture and digests insects.]

Elinor then explained to me that by carefully dosing that essence that I had been taking for about three weeks, I had pretty much purified the astral flows that correspond to the planetary influences on the human body and even strengthened these influences in my being. The results began to appear during training when I had the first “mental transmissions” or rather the first subtle perceptions of akashic imagery. They appeared spontaneously during mental concentration although my intention was to improve my ability to consciously duplicate.

ACCESS TO AKASHIC RECORDS AND AN UNSOLVED DILEMMA

One of those evenings, while I was quite deeply focused on the play of energy in my body and mind, I wanted to “expand” more, encompassing a fairly large area around me with my mind. I felt that my energetic state was the right one to get out of my body consciously, and this time I wanted to be able to move forward more with this type of experience. Cezar had advised me to gradually approach these “movements” with the etheric body, trying to remain as conscious as possible of every detail.

At one of the training sessions, however, an ambiguous situation arose for me. I felt that I was about to consciously “double”, but instead, in the plane of my mental vision, scenes from the past of humanity suddenly appeared to me. I immediately wondered if those were images I had already seen in front of the holographic screen when assisted by the man from Apellos, or were they images I was then seeing for the first time? My uncertainty was that, although what I saw was familiar to me, some of the images were new, meaning I did not remember having watched them on the holographic screen.

From a certain perspective, this seemed natural to me. The Apellos device summarized what the viewer requested by focusing on the subject he proposed. There is, therefore, a kind of “feedback loop”, a kind of feedback between my being and the apparatus, mediated by a very advanced technology. The question was, however, why did those images appear to me, and especially, why was I noticing some that I had not seen in the sequences presented on the holographic screen? It was like new information, but I did not know if it was something new or just a personal “upgrade” due to the alchemical elixir and the specific frequencies emitted by Eden.

The akashic images that appeared to me were clear, vivid and gave me the impression that I was in that very space and time. The reality was very close, as a way of expression, to what I had experienced when I encountered time travel with the “time machine” in the Occult Chamber of Egypt. I no longer actually saw the images, as in the case of the holographic screen, but somehow “witnessed” them from within me, feeling the atmosphere and the specific state of the places and beings of those times. I had a similar perception while watching the images on the holographic screen, but at a lower intensity. I presented the matter to Cezar, and after discussing it, I decided to ask the opinion of the man from Apellos as my experience involved the technology that they had made available. In fact, we had been thinking for some time that starting discussions with the Apellos about Eden and our private project might help us to some extent, technologically speaking. It was now September, and I thought a new visit to their hangar would be nice because the weather was warm and the scenery beautiful.

THE APELLOS COUNCIL — A COLLABORATIVE DECISION

Already having a direction connection with them, Cezar had a long discussion in the screening room with the members of the Council of Apellos. After a successful collaboration between me and the man from Apellos, with the viewing of the images on the holographic screen and the intervention of the sage Dryn, the Council decided that the connection could become direct in order to facilitate a more efficient communication. Cezar told me that, based upon their mutual trust and their remarkable technological advancement, he had told them about the Eden project, what we were building, and the technological difficulties we were facing. The first issue was that we were working somewhat blindly, that is, not knowing exactly what such a device could do or clearly understanding what its purpose was. I had some ideas, but I was not absolutely sure. The plans I received telepathically were followed, but the efficiency and purpose of Eden's construction could only be proven by the human element; that is, by the experiences I could have there, inside the machine.

Cezar then raised the issue of akashic imagery during one of my workouts. On the one hand, the device helps to more precisely duplicate subtle consciousness in the etheric plane, as I had experienced myself; but on the other hand, it unexpectedly made possible the manifestation of the akashic in my field of my consciousness. It was undoubtedly a significant leap forward because the clear perception of akashic records is not exactly easy to achieve.

There was, however, a gap between what I had seen on the holographic screen and what I had perceived in that experience, and that created some confusion. What had then appeared to me in the visual field of my mind was, in fact, a succession of images which I already knew, from watching on the holographic screen, that were related to the Great Planetary Council of Teotihuacan and also to the conquest of Troy.* We could, however, speak of a difference, and this was exactly the main point of Cezar's discussion with the members of the Council of Apellos. He mentioned the extra images that came to me during training as being different from the ones I already knew. As a result, Cezar raised the issue of their verification, and this could best and easily be done on the holographic screen of those in Apellos.

[FOOTNOTE: * The Council of Teotihuacan was approximately 26,000 B.C. according to volume 6 of the Transylvania Series, Forgotten Genesis, 2020. The conquest of Troy is also mentioned in this book.]

The Eden project had attracted the attention of Council members, and they asked for a short break to discuss the situation with their specialists. Returning a few hours later, Cezar told me that Mémentia took part in the discussion, too.* She is the one I had the opportunity to talk to several months ago, being assisted by the man from Apellos while watching the images about the past of Mankind. She led the team of researchers in the field of medicine which, as I have said in a previous volume, is a science very different from today's medicine in our society: first, by their degree of understanding of the notion of health and then by the methods of research and healing used.

[FOOTNOTE: * Mémentia is mentioned in volume 6 of the Transylvania Series, Forgotten Genesis, 2020.]

After a brief assessment of the situation, Mémentia said that the problem seems to be more complex. She mentioned that what I “saw” during training was not necessarily true. They checked the recordings on the holographic screen; and indeed — the new images I told them about did not appear in those archives.

We were told that it was important to know what this meant. Mémentia was especially interested in the fact that I had received those images which were not identical to what had appeared on the holographic screen. This meant that certain transformations that had taken place in the cerebral cortex primarily signified an evolution in the level of individual consciousness. Somehow, the “antenna” of my consciousness increased its reception area and mysteriously gained access to those new images.

I was slightly puzzled by the importance they attached to this, and I asked Cezar a question.

“Okay; and what’s so special about that? I received some new pictures of those events. Well...and? Of course there is an evolution due to my training — that’s what we’re looking for, right? To be honest, I think too much emphasis is being placed upon an issue that seems natural to me.”

“Mémentia was interested in exactly this step you took, in what transformed in you,” he replied calmly. “This is probably important from a research point of view. She even suggested we go to the place where you’ve been, the one on the holographic screen. She wants us to check out those images in real time.”

REVIEWING THE HOLOGRAPHIC SCREEN

The meeting had already been scheduled for the next day, and we were already inside the hangar around noon. Due to the mutual trust and the higher level of collaboration that had been reached with those in Apellos, the usual security measures that had existed until then were no longer needed. There were, as usual, only a few people in the hangar. The man from Apellos was waiting for us. After a few moments, we introduced Cezar, and he motioned for us to follow him.

We were led to the holographic screen room where we saw the recorded fragment about the Teotihuacan Planetary Council. With Cezar, I reviewed those images in summary. The new ones, which appeared to me during the training, appeared immediately after the general images about the construction and existence of the ancient city and before the images that presented snapshots of the actual development of the Council. Those images referred to a group of E-N-K beings who were taken with a Pleiadian ship from the spaceport area, some distance from Teotihuacan as we know it today. When they appeared to me in the field of consciousness, while I was in the seat of the device, I “knew” that those beings were taken to another star system in the galaxy, to a planet with a vibrational frequency slightly higher than that of the Earth, probably in order to diversify life there or to stimulate it.

With that starting point, the man from Apellos made the connection to the holographic screen himself to check if the images I mentioned really existed in the universal akashic records. Given his very good mental “dexterity” and the telepathic power he had, I could quickly see all three of the same images on the holographic screen, just as I had described them. This proved that they were not the product of my imagination, and moreover, that Eden could facilitate a certain kind of interaction with the individual consciousness of the human being in the chair so that one could have access to the “flow time”.

After obtaining this result in the case of the Planetary Council of Teotihuacan, I verified in the same way the new images that I perceived in the case of the conquest of the city of Troy. These showed the presence of a delegation of three humanoid extraterrestrial beings, whose race I did not know, in an almost empty stone hall located inside the city. They were talking to the King. He was quite old and seemed very agitated. Empathetically, I already “knew” that I was witnessing the last moments of Troy. The man from Apellos then synthesized these images himself on the holographic screen, and so I now had sure proof that, through Eden, I could “see in time” but still did not have full conscious control over the process. For example, akashic imagery came to me spontaneously and without me thinking about it.

After reviewing these images, the man from Apellos contacted Méntia through the holographic screen to let her know the outcome of our meeting. Once again, in holographic form, I saw that special woman from the underground city of Apellos, and the impression she made on me was even stronger than the first time. She was undoubtedly a very beautiful and strong woman, both in terms of her personal vital radiation and her remarkable personality. It was precise, with a lot of “fire” and she manifested a special nature. Her dark brown eyes cast a great deal of strength and determination, contrasting with her very light, almost unreal white skin. Her black hair, featuring bangs and worn a little over her shoulders, had a special impact, similar to the women of Ancient Egypt, the darkness of her locks contrasting strongly with her almost white skin.

The discussion was short. After the situation was presented to her, she invited Cezar and myself to Apellos because she wanted to analyze this case, which she found interesting, with their advanced technological means.

“Preliminary tests show that Eden caused some transformations at the cellular level, and I think at the DNA level,” she said. “This happened in a short time, and as far as I understand, this is remarkable.”

She then turned in my direction and addressed me specifically

“I’d like to check the current structure of your DNA, and they will make other types of measurements. We are interested in this evolution because it is somehow unusual. It seems that there have been some remarkable ‘leaps’ and I would like to investigate the causes.”

She had a style of speaking and moving that was very “clean” and at the same time strong. It was almost impossible not to be drawn to her and not to admire her deeply from the perspective of her feminine qualities, her very lively personality, and her superior mental abilities.

Both Cezar and I gladly accepted the invitation, and as far as I was concerned, I did feel a certain emotion, knowing that I would soon visit that magnificent inner city again.

SECOND VISIT TO APELLOS

Apellos immediately impresses with its brilliance, elegance, and harmony that can be seen in the shapes of the buildings, in the technology it has, and in the way it was created. It can be seen immediately that it is part of “another league” because the vibrational frequency of the energy specific to that place is also high. This is probably due to the extraterrestrial heritage because the inhabitants of the city represent an example of a higher category of E-N-K beings, deriving from a combination of E-N-K type DNA with extraterrestrial DNA. It can be felt immediately, almost from everything that is around you in that place: the people, the landscape, the construction, the means of transport, and the technology. Somehow, you always feel enveloped by a state of well-being, joy, and zest for life. People are very beautiful and benevolent but also firm when necessary.

They have a kind of uprightness and seriousness, something like what I saw in the Sirians, but they are also very pleasant at the same time, smiling and very intelligent. What I really liked is their harmonious pragmatism. Nobody wastes their time; everyone knows exactly what they have to do; and they are always exact with what they ask for; but above all, they are careful. It is that kind of subliminal attention they put into all of their actions, including their discussions, through which one can feel the living and attentive spirit in them which allows them to somehow remain “separate” from what they do in that moment. It is not a tense attention nor does it create the feeling of impatience or irritation, but on the contrary, it induces a feeling of calmness and security. They never seem to hurry and always give the impression that they are in control of the events around them.

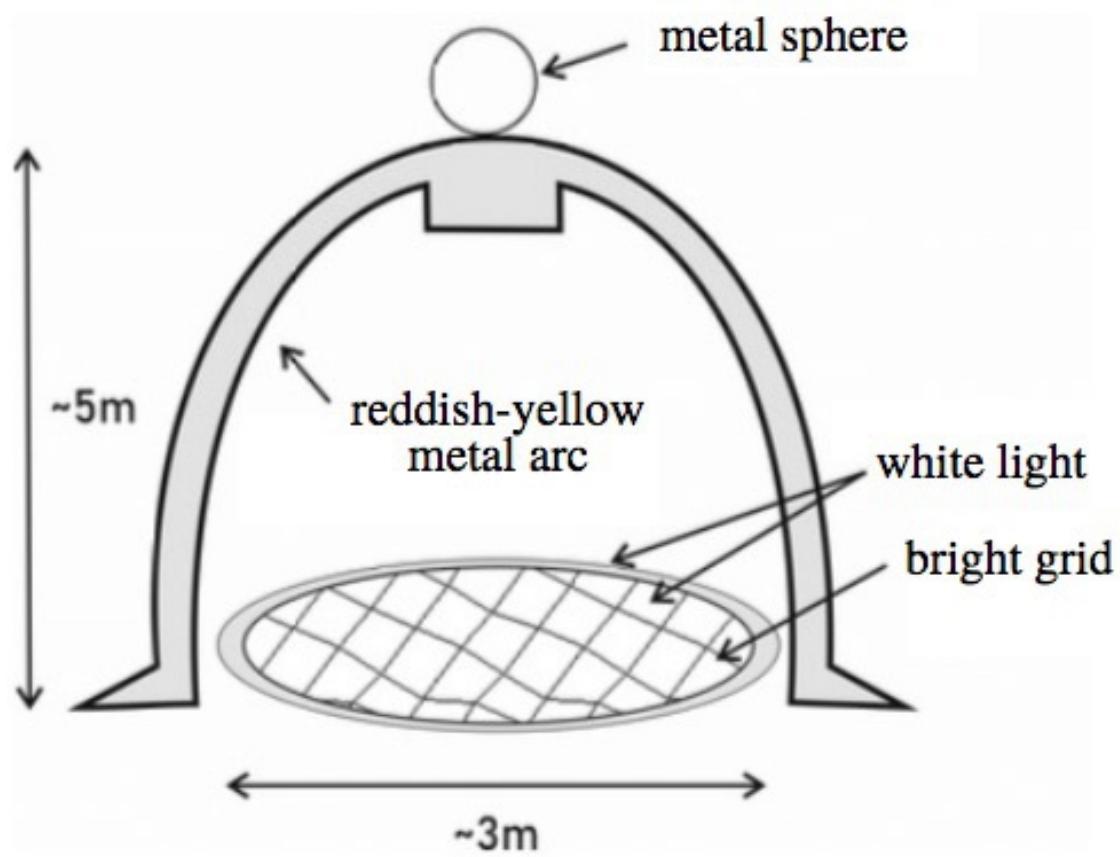

Sharing all of these observations of mine from my experience in Apellos with Cezar, he told me that those were some of the distinguishing features of what the 4D level of consciousness and living might mean. Apellos was like an underground “4D enclave” that had prospered amazingly and was active in the surface cities, especially in our country, helping and sowing the seeds of exceptional future transformations in people’s consciousness.

Under these conditions, it was a real pleasure to go back to their city where I was starting to feel very welcome and where I felt I was integrating perfectly. Méntia told us that we no longer needed to travel the route through Tomassis but that we could arrive in Apellos using their own means of communication through their special type of “elevator” which is actually a kind of semi-teleportation device.*

[FOOTNOTE: * See Volume 5 of the Transylvania Series, Inside the Earth - Second Tunnel, 2019.]

We were led by the man from Apellos and two more guards into the more secluded section of the hangar which was isolated from the rest of the room by high walls and where I had seen the circle-shaped translation device on my first visit. It was quite wide, and if we added the spectacular archway and the white lights that bordered the surface, it made a strong impression, but I did not notice any consoles nearby nor controls.

Device for the transfer of persons and goods from the surface of the Earth to the city of Apellos

The translation was simpler than I imagined. Cezar, the man from Apellos, and I walked inside the dimly lit circle. The two guards stayed a short distance from him, outside, assisting the process. When I entered the circle, the lights on its surface, like lines and squares, became brighter, but then I noticed that the white light also had certain violet reflections which made it even more beautiful. The lighting on the edge of the circle, which was quite thick, pulsed at an even and fairly fast pace.

Basically, the translation process was activated instantly after stepping inside the circle. Indeed — I then felt a certain tingling sensation in my body, much like when I went through the distortion in the second tunnel, starting from the Projection Room. Then followed a kind of “suction”, a slight feeling of dizziness and the sensation of a trip by elevator with great speed, but everything was somewhat shrouded in “fog”. Then, after a few seconds, the view cleared again and we found ourselves on a platform similar to the one on my previous visit to Apellos but a little smaller. We were also inside a circle of the same size and structure, but here the lights were blue.

We left the circle, and the man from Apellos invited us to follow him in a small shuttle, a kind of aerodynamic “capsule” which had four seats. I had never seen that type of shuttle in Apellos before. The capsule was at the edge of the platform in a built-in lift on a “line” with arches leading to the city center. Before stepping inside it, I stopped for a few moments to admire that beautiful city again with its extremely pleasant light and with a very fresh air carried by a light breeze. I gladly revisited the crystal-like buildings, their radiance seeming to touch the soul, and I let myself be “bathed” by the specific and continuous murmur that produced a state of deep relaxation in my being.

A 4D WORLD

The journey by shuttle was short, the speed being considerable. The capsule stopped in front of a platform before a fairly tall building which the man from Apellos told us was the study and research headquarters of the city. I already knew that the headquarters was run by Méntia, with whom we were to meet. I entered a building in the city of Apellos for the first time. The impression was strong because the design, the shapes, the colors, the materials, and everything somehow gave a futuristic image. I especially noticed the roundness, the fact that there were almost no corners or angles, but everything was curved and then rendered pictorially by lines or other symbolic patterns that had a very relaxing effect on the psyche and mind.

In the very wide halls, I saw few people. As they moved unhurriedly in various directions, I noticed their dignified attire but especially the beauty and harmony which characterized them. They did not seem at all surprised by the presence of Cezar and myself there, although our clothing obviously contrasted with what the inhabitants of Apellos were wearing.

I had seen the interiors of some buildings in our world that are similar to the building we were in then, but the impression was still different. Maybe the difference came from the specific radiation of the materials, maybe from the way the shapes and constructive solutions of the space were arranged, but in any case, we seemed to be breathing a different kind of air in Apellos. Cezar even made a brief comment, certifying that the vibrational frequency of matter and the environment was higher than that of the physical plane at the surface. Once again, he told me that Apellos meets the basic conditions of existence in what we call the 4D dimension of existence, superior to the 3D dimension of the physical plane. Although the civilization of Apellos is still based on existence on the physical plane, the general frequency of vibration was still higher, towards the limit of passing into the etheric plane.

The physical condition of the inhabitants, their way of life, the form of social organization, and the construction and technology is all at a much higher level than what can usually be found on the surface of the terrestrial world. In my opinion, they are an example to follow, and their actions have proven that they support us and want us to evolve in order to overcome the vicissitudes of this critical period of humanity in which we now find ourselves.

We were led to the right side of the great hall at the entrance to that building where we saw what might look like an elevator in our world, only it seemed to have no walls but only an illuminated base that was round in shape. I could see, however, a certain semi-transparency which delimited the space inside the elevator from the outside, but I could not identify the material from which the surface was made. At a medium height on the wall was a circular and an almost transparent screen-like panel that remained dark as long as no one was in the elevator. When we entered the elevator, the screen lit up discreetly and several signs appeared on it but also a schematic structure of the building, represented holographically and with red and blue LED-like lights inside. The man from Apellos pointed with his finger at a certain route on that holographic representation, and I immediately felt the ascent, smooth at first, then faster and faster but without any feeling of discomfort. I could see everything beneath me, as if I were flying through the air. At first, it was quite scary, but there was something there that made you have full confidence. It was something I cannot describe well, but it acted in a very beneficial way on the subconscious.

RESEARCH LABORATORY

After less than fifteen seconds, the elevator slowed down and then stopped, and we stepped into a huge hall in which white and blue predominated. The space was lit everywhere by an even and very pleasant light, but I could not see any light bulbs or other lighting devices. I immediately realized that it was an ultra-sophisticated research laboratory. I saw assemblies and devices that were completely unknown to me, a technology much more advanced than the ones we know on Earth. At a glance, I could say that the huge laboratory was more focused on medical studies, but I also noticed some features that made me think that it could be about studies in physics and biology.

The first person I saw coming towards us was Mémentia. I already knew that she was leading the scientific field of medicine in Apellos, but as I would find out later, she was entrusted by the Council with coordinating all scientific activity at the level of their civilization. In the back of the lab, I noticed several people, each working in front of a very large screen in front of a small monitor, just as we might work in an office. For them, the “monitor” was completely transparent with a translucent-like “glass” that was very large, about three meters long and two meters high. The projections on the surface of the screens were holographic, shallow, and the scientists worked standing in front of them, directing all sorts of changes to those projections with their hands and operating commands, especially through their voices. I noticed that, despite the very large space there and the fact that there were dozens of people working inside, the atmosphere was very quiet and relaxed, being dominated by a kind of general hum at a very pleasant frequency.

Méntia greeted us with a smile and asked us to follow her to the side of that room where we saw several devices suitable for medical study. I honestly had to admit to myself that this woman was gorgeous. But one detail struck me. When I saw her in the images on the holographic screen, she seemed taller, but in reality, I found that her height did not exceed, in my estimation, about five and half feet. She was wearing a suit, molded to the body, as a kind of white jumpsuit with blue inserts and a distinct golden mark on the shoulder. Her almond-shaped dark eyes were filled with intense inner “fire” and accentuated her inner strength and strong personality. Méntia was very intelligent, and from the way she spoke and behaved, she demonstrated a sharp, well-structured and calculated mind.

We stopped in front of an ergonomic chair which featured many accessories and special equipment on its wide edges. I realized that it was used for study, especially since one of the large transparent holographic screens was only a short distance from it. Between the screen and that ergonomic chair were a few other devices of different shapes, but I did not notice any connecting cables. The civilization of Apellos had probably long ago passed this stage of technological evolution.

It was the first time I had met Méntia face to face, and when I got to the ergonomic chair, I caught her looking at me intently. She went straight into the subject, asking us what Eden does and what its purpose is.

“By and large, I understand how it works,” she said. “There are directed and harmonic pulses of energy on various specific frequencies. It is clear that certain transformations occur in the biological structure, primarily at the cellular level, which can even go as far as DNA. We’ll check this now, if you agree, but I still do not understand what the real purpose of the device is.”

“We suspect that it is a ‘gate’ of access to certain space-time nodes and through them, to subtle dimensions,” said Cezar.

Méntia thought for a moment, then spoke in a low voice, more to herself.

“Makes sense. The one in the chair becomes the ‘gate’ himself.”

She then headed for the holographic screen which lit up as it was approached, showing some graphics. Looking at it in profile, it was only then that I noticed that a small circle-shaped device was attached to the slightly raised frame of the cover which had begun to glow intermittently but discreetly, constantly changing color. Méntia changed certain parameters with her right hand directly on the holographic image while her left hand, held slightly to the side of her body, was placed on one of the rather complicated devices which seemed to be a kind of information converter. Her fingers moved in conjunction with the images on the screen, but I could not tell what she was going to accomplish. I could see many symbols, images, fragments of images, animations and graphics in a fast-paced way. It all took less than half a minute, but in that short amount of time, she seemed completely absorbed in what she was doing. Suddenly, her concentration had become total, as if we were no longer with her.

SCIENTIFIC ANALYSIS AND SOME ANSWERS — THE MISSING LINK

She then took a step back and addressed me directly, telling me that if I agreed, we could do some non-invasive scientific research together because their technology allowed for a very special analysis of biological structures, down to the quantum level. I sat down in that ergonomic chair, and immediately on her right side rose an arm that had a perfectly polished metal plate at the end. The arm ‘scanned’ me in the head area, then withdrew. I could then see Cezar coming to the big screen, carefully paying attention to the changes that appeared in me.

Méntia then told him not to scare me because, in a short time, I would no longer perceive the outside but would be immersed in a strong white light. She explained to me that a vitalizing and very penetrating energy field would completely surround me. She had barely finished speaking when, indeed, I saw something white with pearly iridescence rise from my right side like a wall, after which I suddenly felt myself enclosed in a thick white cloud. I could then feel the weak and strong areas inside my body. I perceived the organs that worked harmoniously, where there were certain problems, the degree of purity of the blood, and also the cellular “wear and tear”. In a way, it was like a telepathic transmission, but in reality, I felt as if I was “reading” all of those results inside me, in a very free and natural way.

Then, after about a minute, the “white cloud” gradually dissipated, and I saw the ambient space of the laboratory again. Mémentia motioned for me to come in front of the screen with Cezar to show us a cellular structure and an energy flow moving through it. To the right of that structure, on the holographic image, I could see the DNA macromolecule, but in its biological form, in what I could say is “real time”. The images then began to follow one another quickly, showing a “penetration” into the structure of DNA to the level of atoms and covalent bonds.

Mémentia explained, referring to me.

“Your body is going through a period of obvious acceleration of some internal biochemical processes, even showing us a kind of “rearrangement” taking place. The devices record an increase in the number of photons in cellular exchanges. There are even some changes in DNA, especially in the bonds that potassium and zinc atoms separately make in DNA.”

Pausing for a moment, she then turned to me and asked me to tell her how I had come to perceive the akashic images in Eden so that she would have a clearer idea of what had happened then. I looked at Cezar, and with his approval, I told him how it all began, from the subtle transmission in the occult chamber in Iraq, about the etheric crystal, to the telepathic perception through which I “saw” the plans for construction of the apparatus; and then the way it was built, its basic principles and the way I had trained. Mémentia listened to me carefully, nodding to me from time to time as I repeated what she already knew, and finally spoke to me.

“Now I have a pretty clear picture of the situation. If I correlate the descriptions with the results I obtained from scanning your body, something unusual appears. There is a missing link. In all these “adventures” you had with Eden, it was impossible to reach this stage of transformation of perceptions only by reason of the characteristics of the apparatus. The graphs show me, from interpolation, that the evolution in the training was not constant. There must be something else in this whole process that you have not told me about or that you either do not know about.”

FINAL CONCLUSION

There was a pause of several seconds, and before it became embarrassing, Cezar replied.

“There is indeed an element which has not been mentioned. Not because we wanted to hide something, but out of respect and consideration for the person involved. His status is special and he doesn’t want to be known, but in the context of things, maybe it’s even better if we all know each other.”

Cezar then asked me to talk about Elinor and the elixir he had given me to help me evolve during my training with the “space and time machine”. We quickly summarized our connection with Elinor in a few words, briefly speaking about his extraordinary knowledge in the art of alchemy and pointed out that the elements of the “elixir” administered to me, which was a strong spagyric essence, had remarkably purifying effects on me. We also mentioned Elinor’s involvement in our project but also the reasons that, up until then, we had not offered the path of its development.

At the end, I noticed that Méntia was really impressed and also very interested in what I told her. Her undisguised interest led her to tell us that, by the nature of her deep medical concerns — also correlated with other related fields such as biology and quantum physics — she had also partially studied the field of alchemy. I even noticed an effervescence in the way she spoke now and a certain inspiration in the way she was analyzing things with the well-known enthusiasm of the researcher who “seizes” a new idea and is about to unravel it.

“I didn’t think of that with alchemy, but now things seem obvious to me,” she said. “It is clear that that elixir contributed the most to the “leap” you made because the device alone could not have caused so many biochemical combinations in your body and transformations at the cellular level that are as stable and ‘clean’ so as to facilitate your visions. This would probably have taken a much longer time.”

Then she fell silent suddenly, preoccupied with an idea that seemed to grab her full attention. She was in front of one of the machines, quite complicated in structure, and was working on it in a way which I could associate with computer programming. After a few seconds, she spoke to us while continuing to work.

“If you had only used the possibilities of Eden, it would have taken about four years for those transformations to take place in your being. So, using the alchemical elixir, you needed about a month.”

She then came before us and told us that she wanted to arrange a meeting between her and Elinor, if he would agree. For this, she would come to the surface, offering to help us with the project because she had a mandate in this regard from the Council of Apellos. She added that she wants to have an important conversation with Elinor in view of the help that Apellos aims to provide to the Romanian population.

“In some parts of the world, they do the same,” she told us. “There are many other underground cities that have decided to help the surface population which corresponds to their underground projection area. It is a coordinated action.”

We were glad that the connection with Apellos was getting stronger and stronger, and we gladly received Mémentia’s request to visit us. I, however, asked for a short break for the final answer because we needed a confirmation from Elinor.

8 — ELINOR AND MÉNTIA: A MEMORABLE DISCUSSION

We returned from Apellos by the same method as our arrival, using the semi-teleportation “elevator”. I arrived in Bucharest very late at night. Remaining at Alpha Base to solve some problems, Cezar would come to the capital the next day.

At the villa, Elinor was in his basement lab. I was not too surprised, even though it was about three o’clock in the morning. He never seemed to sleep or rest, or at least I never saw him do that, even though we have spent several days together on occasion.

ENDORSEMENT

I had arranged with Cezar to inform Elinor of the existence of the city of Apellos in the Earth’s crust and of our connections with that civilization because we had to tell him about Mémentia and her request to meet him. I was a little tired, but I still thought I should take the opportunity and summarize these issues. Elinor listened to me carefully, but I could tell he was not surprised by what I was sharing with him. From his tacit nods, I realized that he knew very well about the mysteries inside the Earth. I was a little unsettled at this, and at one point, I paused to make a remark.

“You seem quite familiar with the internal structure of the planet. You’re not surprised when I tell you about the existence of cities there. Now, I can understand this from the fact that the internet contains many references on this subject, but even when I mentioned about Shambhala, your attitude remain unchanged.”

“That’s because I’ve been there many times,” Elinor replied, smiling. “At some point, this becomes a necessity, especially in terms of important missions that must be performed on the surface.”

I was speechless with astonishment. My surprise must have amused Elinor, for he went on to explain.

“You already know very well that when the body and the mind reach a high degree of purification, the frequency of personal vibration increases a lot, and you then have access to realities that the ordinary person not only does not understand but does not even know the existence or, or worse, he strongly denies them.”

I was a little silent because I felt my soul flooded with great joy and the desire to reach that so-called “mythical” realm which I already had the opportunity to see up close.*

[FOOTNOTE: *See volume 5, Inside the Earth - The Second Tunnel, 2019]

I suspected how Elinor had access to Shambhala, but I nevertheless posed a “question” which was actually a certainty.

“I think that your study and accomplishments in alchemy gave you that chance.”

Elinor did not answer verbally, but he nodded. I then tended to ask him more about Shambhala, its inhabitants, about what he actually saw there and especially what he did there, but I immediately felt, as a telepathic answer from him, that it was not the time for such a discussion.

I went back to what I was telling him about Apellos and Mémentia, her position there and the trip to that city which Cezar and I had just returned from. I told him how we came to tell Mémentia about the spagyric essence I took in progressive doses; and, of course, about who gave it to me. Finally, I shared the request of the special woman from Apellos to meet with him, noting that the civilization there wants to help the population of our country and that, most likely, Mémentia saw an opportunity for this in the meeting that she wanted.

Elinor immediately accepted the proposal because, in Mémentia’s case, there was obviously no issue of confidentiality. By reason of its very status and level of evolution, the Apellos civilization is part of a higher category, a “world” common to that of Elinor, an individual who sees and perceives the nature of reality in an elevated manner.

By the way, this was the only time the issue arose for Elinor to meet someone through us. I already knew that the position in society of such human beings as Dr. Xien, Shin Li or Elinor must remain very hidden so that their missions can proceed as freely as possible. Such issues would be overwhelming to today's humanity who, for the most part, are not capable of understanding the nature of such actions or the causes that govern them. Due to the opacity of their conscience, people would stand in the way of such important spiritual missions which are, in fact, aimed exclusively towards the good of society. That is why, for some of these higher beings who are involved in complicated projects at different levels of humanity, the essential condition is one of perfect concealment. They live in society and seem to be integrated into it, but nevertheless never stand out, taking great precautions and being careful to "cross" whole epochs, hundreds or even thousands of years, almost without notice.

NEW AND AMAZING DATA ABOUT MÉNTIA

The personality of this woman from Apellos seemed fascinating to me from the first eye contact.

We had agreed with Méntia, who seemed to be very efficient in everything she set out to do, to meet us in Bucharest during that day. If Elinor accepted the invitation to meet with her, it could take place right in his villa. As the response was positive, I met Méntia in town and then headed home, quite excited by her presence next to me. The impact of her subtle energy had been strong when I first saw her in the image on the holographic screen; and then, in Apellos, I admired her very intense presence and special mental nature. Now that she was physically to my right in the car, I could feel that her subtle radiation was even stronger, probably due to her state of mental concentration. She was quieter than at the meeting in Apellos, which had taken place the day before, more internalized, but at the same time, I felt from her attitude that she had somehow become more tolerant, probably because the connections between our civilizations were already beginning to take shape. It was obvious to me that she then was focusing on meeting Elinor, an event she considered important.

I was also excited about the special situation I was in, realizing that I was, for the first time in our physical world, in the presence of a being who was part of another civilization with strong extraterrestrial influences. Méntia probably perceived my thoughts and emotions because she said the following to me.

“Yes, the extraterrestrial influence is strong in our DNA, and in terms of epochs, relatively recent. First of all, it is a hybridization with one of the civilizations that you call “Pleiadian”. The structure of our DNA, however, is much more complex and there are other branches of hybridization within it. There is one with the DNA of Sirius beings and one with the DNA of beings in the planetary system of the star Spica, as it appears in your astronomical charts.* For some reason, I did not want this to be known to you up to now, but the collaboration is beginning to be fruitful and some things can be shared.”

[FOOTNOTE: * Spica is the brightest star in the constellation Virgo, being a binary star (it is actually a two-star star system that orbits the center of mass of the system). Spica is 260 light-years away from our Solar System.]

Her Romanian was very correct and at the same time “sweet”, a description I use because I cannot find another word to better express the weak but exquisite accent she had. I told her this and she thanked me, smiling discreetly. She then added that, in the language of Apellos, her name is not pronounced “Méntia”, as it had been recommended to me at our first “teleconference”.*

[FOOTNOTE: * See Volume 6, Forgotten Genesis, 2020]

“‘Méntia’ is easier for you to pronounce, but in reality, my name is Mentiktla, which means means ‘ray of joy’ in our language.

The way she pronounced her name in her own language sounded very pleasing, evoking something of a Mayan style, although I did not know if there was any connection between Apellos and those ancient people. I then asked her if she often came to the surface, and if so, could she tell me what the purpose of such visits might be?

“Yes. I come to your world regularly and sometimes I stay for longer periods of time. There are documentation and support missions in various forms which they can assign, especially in the medical and biological fields. Our structures are quite well developed here in your world, and the actions we take are not out of the ordinary.”

“And do you support this activity only in Romania?” I asked, curious to find out the extent of such in the world.

“No. Of course we work in other states. The collaborations are very extensive and complex.”

“But how do you interact there?”

“What do you mean?” she asked.

“Speaking...how do you talk with them?” I said.

Looking a little surprised, she said, “I know twenty-three foreign languages and dialects very well and encounter no communication problems in the areas where we operate. We often combine spoken language with telepathic transmissions.”

I swallowed hard as her performance was far above the standard of an ordinary linguist. In a way, however, this was explainable given her extraordinary intelligence and the special mental abilities of the Apellos civilization. In a conversation I had with the man from Apellos, right after the first “teleconference” with Mémentia, he told me that, from the point of view of the way we consider and “measure” the intelligence of human beings, Mémentia has an IQ of 174, well above the condition of genius. She also told me that she is ambidextrous and that she has a biological age of 41 even though, as I was able to ascertain, she looks like a woman of no more than thirty years old.

I looked admiringly at her profile and the look of her slender athletic body. When I first saw it, almost a year ago as an image on the holographic screen, it was a moment of surprise. Then followed the “synthetic” or “holographic” discussion between us where I could not focus too well on a person’s characteristics.* In Apellos, on the other hand, the purpose of the meeting was precise and its duration quite short. Only now did I feel a certain relaxation in communication and had time to make more careful observations as my interaction with Mémentia was much freer from the pressure of time.

[FOOTNOTE: * See Volume 6, Forgotten Genesis, 2020.]

It was getting dark, but the light of dusk made her very light white skin contrast even more with her black shoulder-length hair which was straight and shiny. Something in the profile of her image made me think of sculptures from ancient Greece or pictorial representations of ancient Egypt. One element that I noticed with some surprise was that, although she was very beautiful and elegant, Mémentia was not wearing make-up and did not wear any accessories. I did not notice any earrings, bracelets, rings, medallions or other pendants. On the other hand, she exuded a refined noble elegance as a distinctive feature of her own body. Even in the encounters I had with her later, I never saw her wearing skirts or dresses with necklines, but always wearing clothes almost molded to the body, elegant and carefully combined. Several times, however, I saw that on the short collar of the blouse or sometimes at the bottom of the sleeves, a kind of band with a pattern that somehow imitated Romanian embroideries, and I concluded that they like it.

FIVE UNDERGROUND CITIES AND THEIR SUSPECTED HELP

The discussion continued regarding her actions on the surface of the Earth and especially in the area of Romania. She told me that she preferred more secluded areas with few people, such as small towns, communes and sometimes even villages, even though, being a specialist in medicine and biology, she could have found more opportunities for action and manifestation in big cities. She always preferred to work in mountainous areas and was never attracted to seaside towns.

“I think it’s a specific feature of our civilization. We always prefer the heights of the mountains and their climate. Urban clusters are just your option — you don’t necessarily need that. But your society has taken this path, and over time, you have created certain imbalances. I come to such places only when absolutely necessary. But, we are not the only ones acting in this way.”

Not quite understanding what she meant, I asked, “Are you referring to other populations inside the planet?”

“Yes. There are five underground cities similar to Apellos which are relatively close to the surface, each with its own specific civilization. Over time, a network of communication was formed between those with whom we act in your world and those who come from the five cities. It’s more efficient that way.”

I remembered the revelations about this made to me by one of the attendants I had on my first visit to the Apellos hangar. Like Méntia, he told me that there are five main cities below the land area corresponding to Romania and even mentioned their general locations.* I mentioned this in the conversation with Méntia and told her about my visit to Tomassis.

[FOOTNOTE: *See Volume 6, Forgotten Genesis, 2020]

“Tomassis is very deep and does not fall into the category of the five cities closest to the surface, such as Apellos. The one in the Dobrogea area corresponds approximately vertically to the city of Tulcea, and the one in the northeast of the country is under the Ceahlău mountains. The population of your country is well supported.”

I smiled admiringly. It was comfortable to know that we were not alone and that we had support, albeit in a hidden way. But, I thought later, if there is still such a fairly intense movement of those in the “interior” and if they are so technologically advanced and want to support Romania, how is it then that they do not act more promptly to bring about much faster and more efficient change across the country? I also shared this confusion with Méntia. It was the first time I saw her charming smile.

“We’re acting more than you can imagine. Sometimes, that has gone as far as sacrifice. It is true, however, that before, in the past centuries, it was easier to intervene because the structure of your society and the technological means at its disposal were precarious. Our interventions were more effective, without raising suspicions. Now, however, much more caution is needed. There have been, however, cases in your history in which certain people connected with us have manifested themselves directly and even sacrificed themselves for the good of your nation.”

Surprised to hear that, I asked her to give me an example.

“She’s even considered a national hero. In society, she was named Ecaterina Teodoroiu.* Even though she was and still is considered by almost everyone to be an “ordinary human”, in the sense that both her parents were human beings who belonged to the Earth’s civilization, one of her parents was, in reality, from the “surface” and the other from the “interior”, but not from Apellos. There, her name was Amnita. There is even a local story about her special birth. Due to the specific combination of DNA, she had the genes of subterranean beings, and this is what determined her impulse to act as she did. Such beings show a very strong spirit, but this does not mean that all those who have stood out as heroes or great leaders in the history of your country came from our underground cities.”

[FOOTNOTE: *Born in 1894, Ecaterina Toderoiu died in 1917 in the battle of Marasesti as the head of an infantry platoon of the Romanian Army in the First World War.]

I admit I would never have thought of what Mémentia was telling me. It was amazing, but at the same time, I felt a wave of gratitude directed towards these beings from the “inside” who have been helping us to overcome the difficult moments of our history for centuries. On second thought, it was only then that I realized that today’s territory of Romania was the target of numerous conquests, but when they reached the surface projection area of the cities inside the Earth, they became less efficient or were even stopped completely. In Transylvania, for example, no one entered or passed through the frightening forests or the gorge of the Apuseni Mountains for centuries and not even for thousands of years before that. Or, even after hundreds of years of Austro-Hungarian occupation, they retreated with almost no trace. Nothing was taken by the Hungarians or Austrians, and there was no mixing of language, customs or traditions. It is the same in the north, in Bucovina. In the mountains, we have always found our defense and chances of success. And, the mountains also represent, generally speaking, the path through which those “inside” come to the surface. That is where the main portals linking to the “interior” exist. That is why it was no coincidence that Mémentia preferred only mountainous areas and accomplished most of her missions in such a setting.

GENIUS, DNA, AND TECHNOLOGY

After allowing myself these inner reflections for a few seconds, we returned to our discussion of the mountainous areas that Mémentia preferred.

“That means you have connections in such mountainous areas,” I said, wanting to understand how all those who come “to the surface” interact with the locals.

“We work with a number of associations,” Mémentia said. “I am especially interested in helping children who are incarnations of special beings and who need support to manifest. You would expect them to come from big cities, but it’s the other way around. Most come from less populated nearby areas. Our statistics also show a higher density of them towards mountain areas.”

“But, how do you identify them?” I asked in astonishment.
“There is no such thing as a ‘reincarnation table’.”

“You don’t even need that,” she said. “We give an accounting of DNA through study. You have not yet discovered this technology, but inside the macromolecule, there are some specific groups or formations which indicate precise latent possibilities of manifestation, at a much higher level, of that person in this world. When we identify such a family of ‘quantum signatures’, we know that that child may have a special destiny.”

Excited by such very advanced technological possibilities, I spoke.

“You can then use the holographic screen for additional information about that person in the future.”

“The survey of the future takes shape only from a certain age, and in such cases, it is even more uncertain because that special person has several degrees of freedom and the timelines are numerous and difficult to follow, even for us. But, it is still true that this method sometimes gives us ideas for action so as not to interfere too much with other determinants of the child’s life.”

“I understand that it is more a general support of the person, following the principle that he develops as he wants.”

“Even more than that, depending upon certain subsequent choices, we can say with great precision in which direction the special characteristics of those beings will manifest. Then, discreetly, we support these children or even young people in an ‘unseen’ way and seek to help them without those around them suspecting this. As they grow, we appear in their lives as either teachers or tutors, or we act through our companies.”

“But, are they aware that they are supported in this way?”

“In general, they have happy opportunities in life, and we seek to strengthen this belief. We have refined our modes of action a lot and we can go almost ‘undetected’. In very rare cases, however, some of them who are endowed with a special intuition begin to ask themselves certain questions. But, because we only have the desire to help, we can also withdraw immediately when things reach a certain limit.”

I was not only impressed by the advanced degree of their technology but also by their human side with the altruistic help they offered.

“Have you done the same in other countries?” I asked.

“I haven’t traveled much, but I’m always up-to-date with your latest discoveries in medical science, biology, and physics. Some of them, however, are never advertised, as I think you already know.”

Amazed, I asked her questions.

“But how do you access them? Have you also infiltrated the Services?”

“No, we don’t care about politics or your decision-making system. The backstage fights between the espionage and counterintelligence agencies are all far from our sphere of interest. We like what is clean, pure and superior, but our technology is more advanced than anything that now officially exists on Earth, and this allows us to enter, even where it is believed to be hidden or inaccessible.”

“I mean on the dark web,” I said, thinking I understood.

“Not just there. I told you, our technology is not limited to information-driven flows powered by electricity, as it is in your world today.”

Méntia took out of her travel bag a kind of tablet, a little bigger than the ones on our market, but very simple. It was basically like a glass surface, rounded at the edges and about five millimeters thick. Certain points of different colored lights immediately appeared on its surface, especially at the corners. I could not look closely because I was driving, but I still realized that the presentation system was very close to what I had seen on the holographic screen. That “tablet”, however, seemed to expose images only in a two-dimensional format.

Méntia probably perceived my thought telepathically because she immediately responded to what I was thinking.

“The two-dimensional option is only used here on the surface, so as not to shock. Otherwise, of course, I work on this tablet, as you call it, in a holographic system. Its search functions are much more sophisticated, but most importantly, it allows access to information that exists that is even beyond the electromagnetic connection. It does not matter whether or not the storage device is connected to the “network”.

ALIEN CONTACT: STATUS QUO IN SOCIETY

I was perplexed. Such “carrier” technology was still inconceivable to us at the surface, at least from what I knew until then.

“That’s more like an alien acquisition,” I said, somewhat jokingly.

Méntia, however, answered me in a very natural and serious way.

“Of course. We have many ongoing projects with some advanced alien civilizations. But, after all, this is natural in our case. I do not understand why you are so tormented by this meaningless denial of their existence.”

“Well, there is the social impact that such revelations would have, but it is especially the occult interests that factor into this issue,” I replied.

“Yes, we know all this, but the first reason is falsified, and the second is mainly related to the will of the population.”

“Falsified? In what sense?” I asked for clarification.

“The negative impact on society, especially that of a religious nature, would not cause the chaos that your authorities expect. It is an intentionally calculated exaggeration of this effect in order to scare and cause the idea of disclosure to be rejected. There may be some outbreaks of dissatisfaction, but they will not proliferate much. The situation has changed in the last fifteen years.”

“And we know that as we have studies done in secret. But, there is the opposition of some forces about which I see that you are also informed.”

“Obviously. How else? We know well the underpinnings of the ‘occult’ interests and what these power-hungry beings actually want.”

“Another idea was the direct contact of Mankind by at least one of the advanced civilizations. The question arose of their landing directly with their ships. I saw the documentation of such plans with measures, possibilities and their effects on society,” I said, hoping to surprise her with this information.

“We know about that, too,” she said, smiling. “At one point, the plan was indeed topical, but a closer analysis showed that the level of consciousness and will of Mankind did not meet the necessary conditions to make such a contact. This plan has been revealed by other groups of extraterrestrial beings with obscure interests to some secret groups of people on the surface of the planet.”

Méntia had become thoughtful, and her voice had faded. She stared ahead through the windshield and seemed preoccupied with something.

“I think you already know these things,” she added.

I had to admit that I did not know what she was alluding to.

After a time of silence, she continued to speak, but this time in an equal tone, almost monotonous and with great concentration.

“The representatives of these occult groups, having a great power of influence, have manipulated things in such a way that people are indoctrinated with the idea of xenophobia towards extraterrestrial beings. And then, if the alien ships had landed on Earth, an indescribable chaos would have been created which could have nullified the beneficial intervention that was desired for human civilization.”

Now, I understood much better all the media “bustle” that had appeared 10-12 years ago but to which I had not given any special attention.

“Come to think of it, Hollywood has seriously taken on the role of fabricating this perception in people’s subconscious,” I said. “Most of the so-called Sci-Fi series created over the last thirty years have been aimed at convincing the population that they should fight with a gun in hand against an imminent alien attack.”

Méntia bowed her head, agreeing.

“Under these conditions, if the force and the initial plan had been followed, it would have been too direct, untimely, and almost harsh for the general mentality,” she continued. “Our projections and estimates showed that there would have been a high degree of chaos which would have hindered the transition to a higher world instead of easing it.”

“Perhaps it would have been good to follow that plan, even in such conditions,” I said. “Perhaps slightly modified, but one is at least entering another area of reality.”

“It is never forced. We do not intervene if there is not a certain state of affairs. Your society has come here through a combination of ignorance and indolence which have been carefully cultivated through manipulation. This has proven to be an effective method. Manipulation is the main weapon of your occult world elite, and it was used on a huge scale. This has generated a number of chain effects which have even manifested themselves in people’s physical health, all with direct implications for their DNA. By the way, that’s the main point I want to discuss with Elinor.”

THE HEALTH OF THE HUMAN BEING: A SPECIAL EMPHASIS

I commented a little on this topic, also discussing nutrition. Méntia told me that all of the people of Apellos are vegetarians and that, among many other things, the product we call “sugar” is a big problem for the surface population, especially since it is widely consumed. From the discussion, I understood that she likes fruits, especially strawberries and peaches, and bee honey is one of her favorite foods.

“In the research I do both in Apellos and here on the surface, I’m very interested in the biochemical structure of plants and fruits,” she told me. “Their richness and variety is amazing, but people still don’t seem to very well understand their importance with regard to health.”

I resolutely approved of what she said, also mentioning the harmful legislation for cultivation and generally speaking of a whole chain of factors that seems to make the large-scale consumption of such natural products more difficult, instead of stimulating them. Méntia nodded slightly, affirming what I said with a slightly sad look.

“In Apellos, the flora is small, but we nevertheless consume many more plant products than you do and which you have at hand in an impressive variety. But, it is true that our technology for combining the active principles of plants and extracting them correctly is much higher than what you have now, but even so, the degree of what is natural and vegetable must be greatly increased in human nutrition.”

“Maybe it’s an educational issue,” I said. “In any case, it is clear that the population should insist on this line. But, if I make a comparison, we are much better off than the West. Europe wants to seem to teach us what we need for our health, but it ignores a long tradition that we have in this territory, inherited from our Dacian ancestors. They had advanced knowledge of the virtues of plants which were then passed on to the Greeks, and from them to the Romans, and then to the rest of the continent. Somehow, this is ‘inscribed’ in our DNA, and even if there is still a great ignorance among the population about these things, at least compared to other countries in the West, pharmacies do not work very well in Romania because the population uses many natural herbal remedies. It’s a big surprise for pharmaceutical companies.”

Méntia confirmed this and stated that Western “education” presents things only from an empty physical and chemical perspective. In reality, the health of the human being always starts from the spiritual level, then involves through the emotional level, and finally materializes at the physical level which is our very body.

“The body reacts very well to plant principles, but it inhibits itself when eating meat products,” she said. “Your medicine knows very well the effects and reactions that occur in the body in both cases. There are also complex studies in, and the theory is quite well developed. What is missing, however, is a deeper understanding of the constituents of plants, and here I am referring in particular to the subtle essences that exist in plants but which are not even suspected by your science. That’s why you cannot get effective elixirs in a natural way.”

“Over ninety percent of the products in pharmacies are synthetic drugs,” I added. “I don’t need to tell you what that means, what interests and industries are involved, and what harmful trends ensue. Things are well known to many people, but there are many more who simply do not care. That’s why I suggested that, basically, it is primarily a matter of education. The formation of a healthy mentality in this sense should start from the school rooms.”

Méntia told me that, although she did not know this expression, she still understood its meaning. She even gave me her own example as a child, having a very good education regarding the health of the being, especially since she comes from a family from Apellos that has a long tradition in the science of medicine.

THE MEETING

In the meantime, we arrived at the villa where Elinor was waiting for us. Cezar had also arrived some time earlier, and I found them both talking relaxedly in the large living room. I noticed that Elinor was very pleasantly impressed by Méntia's presence, and after a few introductory greetings, Cezar and I sat comfortably on the wide sofa with Elinor and Méntia in the two elegant armchairs in the room. I could not help but smile, remembering how many years ago, in the same chair where Méntia was now, sat Repa Sundhi, from whom I had learned extremely precious lessons. That magical night was also marked by the mysterious and terrible presence of the yidam and the subsequent journey that followed, representing a very important stage in my spiritual knowledge and evolution.*

[FOOTNOTE: *See Volume 2, Transylvanian Moonrise for mention of Repa Sundhi, the Tibetan lama who was also the same person as Dr. Xien, the scientist who guided Department Zero into existence as described in Volume I, Transylvanian Sunrise. The yidam is also identified as a creature with super natural abilities that is generated by a lama using a sand mandala and can occupy spaces and dimensions which the normal body of a lama could never do.]

On the table between the armchairs sat a bowl with several varieties of fruit, among which I noticed were a few peaches. I thought then that Elinor was quite inspired, given that Méntia liked that kind of fruit. Immediately, she turned her head halfway to me, speaking with a charming smile.

“Yes, I think I'll try them a little later.”

We were all amused by that simple demonstration of her telepathic abilities, after I explained with a laugh what was the reason was for Méntia's comment. The atmosphere was relaxed and somehow I can best describe as “bright” in the absence of a better term to explain the very good feeling I had about those very special beings present in the same room. In a way, it seemed almost incredible to me where the adventure of life had brought me, and I was deeply grateful for it, primarily to Cezar. He completely changed my existence and made me see far beyond its usual limits while awakening in me unsuspected abilities. And now, I was taking part in a meeting which, from my point of view, I considered to be a meeting between the sages, given the elevated and very refined mental and spiritual condition of the three exceptional beings before me.

THE PREMISES OF INDIVIDUAL ASCENSION AND DNA TRANSFORMATION

The discussion quite quickly slipped to the topics that interested us, and Mémentia talked about some changes that may take place in the structure of human DNA during the current period.

“It is true,” said Cezar, “because of the special zone in the galaxy where it was born, the Earth is under the subtle energetic influence of several stars and constellations; but this area, though complex, is still subject to uniform influences which do not register special ‘jumps’. We are, as they say, in ‘calm waters’. This makes the possibility of atomic and molecular combinations, including those inside the macromolecule of human DNA, very high because there are no major determining influences from other stars or very large cosmic objects which would influence DNA to manifest exclusively in a certain direction. This feature gives life on Earth an extraordinary complexity, and that is why our planet enjoys a very great variety fauna and flora.”

A little surprised, Mémentia looked at Cezar as if she did not expect him to know those things, but she immediately approved of what he said.

“Yes. There is no determining subtle influence that comes from a certain part of the galaxy to the area where this Solar System is located. We do not receive a special and constant major influence from any stellar cluster* or any other gigantic cosmic manifestation. But this is exactly what facilitates the transformation of your civilization because, in this way, you have more degrees of freedom and you are not constrained by a certain type of major radiation which would determine the evolution of life on Earth.”

[FOOTNOTE: *Star clusters are thought to be remnants of the so-called “early universe”, usually containing thousands of stars crammed into a “sphere” only a few light-years in diameter. The physics of such cosmic manifestations are not yet known, partly due to the immense distances they are from our galaxy and partly due to the mysterious nature of the interactions between the clustered stars, located a relatively short distance from each other.]

“Here, however, choice, determination, and the will to of the individual come into play. The degree of freedom we have in this area of the galaxy allows us to ‘sculpt’ our future. The subtle planetary influences, but especially the formidable influence of the Sun, are free to act because these energies are not overwhelmed by other powerful forces in the galactic area in which we are. If, in the distant past of Mankind, the process of ‘modeling’ DNA has been strongly supported by the presence of huge alien ships* and the Moon in the sky, it does not mean that this process took place only then and then ceased. Currently, the transformation continues. Even though the active periods of these transformations have alternated with those of rest, the structure of DNA continues its evolution even today. We are always under planetary or stellar influences, so this transformation is continuous, but it has begun to intensify during this current period.”

[FOOTNOTE: *The author refers mainly to the Sirian ship Neiberau (Forgotten Genesis, 2020)]

“All the more, as humanity is currently being targeted for a new transformation of DNA, especially at the level of the carbon atom,” Méntia said. “The carbon-based structure of life will ‘regroup’ in an evolutionary sense, so the first thing that will transform will be human DNA.”

I also joined the discussion at this point, intervening with an idea that seemed correct to me.

“It cannot just be about planetary and solar influences here. What about the flow of unusually intense cosmic radiation, especially gamma, photonic and neutron radiation which we have been entering for some time, which is amplifying more and more and coming from certain stars and even from the center of the galaxy?*

[FOOTNOTE: *According to current science, in the center of our galaxy is a massive black hole called Sagittarius A.]

“Yes, but the one you’re talking about is a cosmic conjunctural phenomenon,” Mémentia explained. “From a certain point of view, it is even cyclical. These radiations now have the role of making fundamental changes in the intimacy of the human body. They influence the internal structure of the chemical elements and transform the psycho-mental structure of the human being. This huge ‘shower’ of cosmic energy will cause our atoms to resonate strongly, and the specific frequencies of these radiations will cause the carbon atom in particular to be ‘bombarded’ so that everything alive on the planet will mutate with significant transformations.”

“Is that true for everyone?” I asked.

“In principle, yes,” replied Cezar. “Apparently, people are prepared for a fundamental transformation, but not everyone will achieve it because it depends a lot, as I said, on choice, on the individual will. Some will accept the transformation, but others will not. The usual term for it is ascent and it is, in a way, an ascent in terms of vibrational frequency. This is exactly what makes the zone of intense cosmic radiation into which the Solar System and, implicitly, the Earth have entered: it brings changes at the cellular and atomic level in living organisms because their vibrational frequency becomes much higher.

DECISION OF THE APELLOS COUNCIL

At this point, Mémentia began to deepen the subject, directing the discussion to the main idea for which she wanted that meeting.

“The problem is that, statistically speaking, our studies have shown that there is a tendency for a degradation of human DNA, that which has been transmitted through the E-N-K branch,” she said. “This DNA has been diluted over time, especially in the Nordic peoples. Transformation is viable when radiation flows ‘have something to work on’. When the structure of DNA begins to be corrupted, then the difference in vibrational frequency between it and cosmic radiation becomes too great, and the transformation can no longer occur. Several factors contribute to such degradation. Thus, health becomes an important element for the transformation you were talking about. You cannot evolve when you’re barely moving or in bed, sick. This is mainly why we came here, because our Council has decided to provide more consistent help to the population, but that requires important and very reliable links. The plan is older, but certain security and precautionary elements have prevented us from launching it so far.”

We were not sure what Mémentia meant and looked at each other questioningly. Surprised, I expressed my perplexity.

“I know that the Nordic peoples are robust and healthy, far from having any problem of this nature.”

“No,” she replied dryly. “The degradation of DNA in their case is accentuated and this translates into being ‘sick’ at a deep level. This reality does not appear visually in the early stages.”

“Then how does it manifest?” I insisted, rather annoyed. “I have not noticed such a marked degradation.”

“Something in their DNA structure has been corrupted. At first, it manifests at the soul level. It appears as a general dissatisfaction, a void in being, a morbid retreat into oneself, often as self-destructive isolation. Emotional capacity suffers a lot. This condition then begins to expand in the body; hormonal imbalances appear. It’s a vicious circle; people become like robots.”

“We find this robotization everywhere, especially in the West,” I said.

“Yes, but it’s more pronounced with them.”

For a few moments, we were all silent, deep in thought. Mémentia then resumed the discussion.

“Our idea is to help the population to be as healthy as possible so that they can absorb the energy of cosmic radiation inflows efficiently, which will be strong at some point,” Mémentia said. “The chances of ascension then increase considerably. A blurred mind or a suffering person will not be able to understand the subtle ‘message’ of these highly refined energies, let alone reorient their lives. Even personal choices depend a lot on a person’s health. Illness or bodily agitation creates mental agitation which, in turn, leads to hasty and often erroneous decisions and inevitably to suffering.”

“But, I asked, if the flow of high-frequency cosmic radiation changes the intimate cellular and even atomic structures, will this not implicitly achieve the healing of people and their orientation towards evolution?”

“High frequencies still must have a reason to ‘hang on’. They must find a suitable basis for action and do not act mechanically. There is a certain ‘intelligence of energy’, a very complex interaction between the subtle nature of man, his body and these energies.”

“That means there will be mutations in the human body,” said Cezar.

“Exactly,” said Mémentia. “Many hybrid genes will thus appear, and some of them may even evolve significantly. For example, the mixed or somewhat ‘intermediate’ race could become ‘independent’ and evolve spectacularly, and the black or white race might decrease in weight, number of individuals or rate of evolution. Hybridization thus becomes very important. These transformations, however, require a lasting health on the part of humanity because you cannot claim to be profoundly transformed when you are deprived of vital energy, eat improperly, do not have a healthy rhythm of life, are constantly stressed or are surrounded by strong harmful electromagnetic fields. Under such conditions, you cannot help but resist these inner transformations because the physical body is not prepared.”

PROPOSAL FOR ELINOR

With that, Mémentia turned her attention to Elinor who had been silent all this time, watching our discussion intently. She seemed to want to involve him in the dialogue as well.

“Some people still want to change, but I don’t know how to accomplish that,” she said. “Either they are deceived by the so-called ‘efficient methods’ that are circulated, or they abandon the idea too quickly. In order to evolve, man must first be healthy, but for that, he should follow some simple advice and have the power to get out of the ‘prison’ of bad habits, harmful routine or ignorance. I thought we might even find an alchemical solution.”

Elinor was not surprised by Mémentia's request and responded immediately, which showed me that he was actually present at the discussion, even though he had not intervened at all until then.

"You mean alchemical elixirs?" he asked.

"Elixirs, extracts or essences from plant alchemy, yes. That is what I am primarily referring to. We consider it is time for their implementation as treatments on a large-scale, as an integral but essential part of plant-based products."

Elinor answered carefully, as if choosing his words.

"That can't be done overnight. There are certain occult laws which do not allow for the mass spread of such very powerful remedies because it would cause an imbalance in certain relationships between people's destinies, efforts and individual experiences. Alchemical elixirs, especially high-ranking ones, and especially the Supreme One, are an extremely well-kept secret and precisely for the reason I just told you."

Mémentia seemed a little unhappy and tried to argue her point.

"Even if the alchemists have to keep it a secret, some things could be revealed," she said fiercely. "The population is in a serious situation and their health is in danger. Many people do not believe in the existence of subtle energies but in allopathic pharmaceuticals, all of which is very well thought out so that the population is dependent upon synthetic drugs. A middle way must be found with natural products which are strongly charged with pure and healing energy, one which can be done most efficiently by means of alchemical elixirs. The vegetable path, using medicinal plants, has already been tried, and it is good, but the results come slowly and do not heal spectacularly nor as quickly as most people expect."

Elinor smiled and calmly replied.

"I told you, you can't do it this way because the law of individual karma is violated.* If so, the secrets of alchemy should be known to all, but the reality is different, and this shows the state of humanity."

[FOOTNOTE: * See Volume 2 of the Transylvania Series, Transylvanian Moonrise.]

"Our statistics show, however, that now is the right time to find a way to solve this problem," Mémentia insisted. "The 'dilution' of DNA, which we consider dangerous, can reach a critical point, and then everything could become even more difficult. You no doubt know many alchemists who are in hiding, and you can contact them to decide to act together in a harmonious way, as well as to consider the elixir or elixirs you might start with. I do not immediately refer to ‘drinking gold’* because that is maybe too much. But, an elixir with less power would be best for the population. Its presentation could be indirect and can be mixed in a certain proportion in emulsions, syrups, potions or herbal creams. Soon, the regeneration of DNA would be extraordinary.”

[FOOTNOTE: * This alchemical elixir is a very pure salt, dissolved and diluted in vegetable alcohol, but it does not contain even a golden atom. The name “drinking gold” comes from its golden-yellow color, very pure and shiny, similar to this noble metal. It is considered a panacea and in principle cures all diseases, including those of a psychosomatic nature.]

THE PROBLEM OF KARMIC COMPENSATION

Elinor listened intently to Mémentia’s point of view, but remained inflexible.

“In order to benefit from such a thing, you still need a certain inner training. Otherwise, people would learn nothing, take everything as normal, and continue their reckless life. Many of them do not believe in subtle aspects, saying that if they really existed, then they would be known. This is a point of evolution, and we cannot intervene so abruptly without there being further unforeseen consequences.

“These things are very well known to us,” said Mémentia. “but it has to start somewhere. We have our own research, and we have evaluated segments of the population. Indeed, people are not educated in this regard. They still live by their bad habits, eat the wrong things, smoke a lot, drink alcohol or take drugs. Their way of life is chaotic and destructive.”

“But, I wonder why you, with such advanced technology, do not offer them stronger solutions for recovery,” Elinor countered.

Mémentia replied that the situation has changed in this respect, that it has become more permissive. From Mémentia’s answer, we understood that the people of Apellos really strive to help us, but they nevertheless cannot simply offer us such miraculous solutions on a platter because we would not know how to understand and efficiently manage them. She continued with her response.

“The solutions must come from the Earthlings, from those on the surface. Free help must make sense.”

“That’s exactly what I was arguing myself,” Elenor replied. “Compensation from the population is needed and it comes mainly through authentic knowledge and adequate training. If people do not understand why they are doing well instead of their illnesses getting worse, then there is no great evolutionary gain for them.”

ANALYSIS OF POSSIBLE SOLUTIONS

Méntia looked Elinor in the eye and answered in an equal tone.

“Yes. That is why we thought that some of the alchemical essences, even if they are not elixirs, could contribute to a partial ‘awakening’ of people which would be a promising starting point for a better view of life. An ‘infusion’ of technology from us, however, is much more complicated. It would involve government ties, mutual acceptance, numerous bilateral meetings, production...the chain of elements is long, difficult, and success is uncertain because the society on the surface is built very much on the principle of self-interest, selfishness, competition and concealment. Our action would be very disturbing, and the results, as our simulations have shown, do not necessarily lead to something positive at the moment. People do not have the maturity to this level of understanding, and their leaders are dominated by dark interests.”

“But, you mentioned your studies which show that the population can now receive considerable help,” Elinor reminded her.

“Yes, but we were thinking of less obvious help. That’s why I decided to come and talk and find solutions. We think that spagyric essences could be of real use. Our estimate is that, at the very least, they will be able to stop the rather severe degradation of human DNA.”

“Essentially, the same problem applies to alchemists. They too cannot give up concealment, ‘throwing’ their elixirs and extraordinary spagyric essences on the market because this would cause huge ‘convulsions’ at almost all levels of society. One effect generates the next, and in a short time, due to the fact that their help would not be understood, only selfishly and incorrectly, great dysfunctions would occur.”

“But, the solution I proposed, using, for example, some spagyric essences instead of elixirs, hidden in even some already known herbal remedies, could work,” replied Méntia.

“Even if this solution were to work, appreciable quantities are still needed. You’ve probably thought about mass production. Spagyric essences are strong, even stronger than ordinary tinctures, but weaker than elixirs. Quite large amounts would need to be given to the commonly obtained alchemical solutions.”

“I do not know the actual alchemical process although I am aware of the general principles of this extraordinary art,” said Méntia.

“I mean, you can’t hope for spagyric essences in large liters or tens of liters. The workload would be huge, and the time required very long. In alchemy, we do not work as one would on a production line. Most of the time, it is not something quantitative, but especially qualitative. The area of spread with regard to healing products would therefore be quite narrow.”

Méntia thought for a while before speaking again.

“Even so, over time, a larger area could be covered by repeated infusions of plant products containing alchemical substances of a spagyric nature, having a strong healing effect.”

Elinor stood firm in his position, shaking his head.

“Spagyric alchemy operations are relatively simple, but it takes a long time,” he said. “What you want to achieve is nationwide, and that involves appreciable amounts of spagyric essences, even if their reported power is quite high. We also need people with deep knowledge and a lot of experience, especially in the art of distillation. You have to separate the active principles of some powerful medicinal plants, purify them through a series of successive operations at several levels by distillation, calcination, and evaporation, and then reunite the principles of that plant by cohabitation* because they are then considered to be pure, free from alterations and impurities from the beginning. All this involves long careful work, full of patience and knowledge, because it is not just a simple replication of certain stages. The human factor, especially from a certain step forward, is extremely important. It's not like a factory; it's not a product made on a production line.”

[FOOTNOTE: *In alchemy, cohobation is the operation of reuniting the elements of a substance which have already been purified by spagyric methods.]

ELEMENTS OF ALCHEMY AND THE VISION OF THEIR CORRECT INTEGRATION INTO MODERN SOCIETY

This was followed by a short but very interesting presentation by Elinor on some essential aspects of alchemy, first at the level of principles, and then even entering certain backstage aspects of this amazing practice of transforming matter. I was just eyes and ears, extremely interested in what I was hearing. As he spoke, there seemed to be a mystical atmosphere in the living room, a kind of sacredness that came from the soul and undoubtedly originated in the very nature of the subject itself. It was amazing to hear an alchemist, with immense experience in the field and in possession of incredible truths and achievements for the knowledge of the common man, talking about certain aspects of this art, seen through the prism of a practitioner with enormous experience. Cezar was also very attentive to Elinor’s summarized exposition, and I could see from his attitude the deep respect he had for him.

Addressing Ménta, Elinor emphasized the correct understanding of how alchemical products can be integrated into society.

“Although there are hundreds or even thousands of books published in the field of alchemy, very few of them still contain truly valuable information, and generally speaking, the latter are written by master alchemists. The rest are only general presentations in which the authors are either only theorists or practice operative alchemy, but only partially and without a deep understanding of its secrets. There are unwritten laws and sacred vows to keep the terrible secrets of operative alchemy. That is why alchemical texts are so tangled and often only allusive. Those who finally understand their meaning are extremely few in the world.”

“We can, however, use these secrets for the good of Mankind without necessarily having to reveal them,” Méntia insisted.

“Of course, but there is a time for everyone and everything,” Elinor replied. “What you offer must be addressed to someone who is close, in terms of their level of consciousness, to the gift received. Otherwise, that person will not know how to appreciate what he receives. There are also dispensations, but they always have a well-defined and beneficial purpose. But with regard to the degree of agitation and ignorance in today’s society, sharing such secrets means pure suicide. Things must be done with a certain responsibility and in a balanced way.”

“If we wait too long for the balance, the DNA damage could become too great,” Méntia insisted.

“Nature has its wisdom. We will see what compromise solution could be found. The idea of dosing spagyric essences in certain plant emulsions and mixtures is good, but the subtle factor and its consequences must be analyzed very well. Such essences contain only the volatile parts of plants so, in the end, it is necessary for them to have a ‘body’ in order to be used successfully in healing. Salt, as an alchemical principle, helps to fix the volatile aspect of such an essence, but it must first be very well purified. This involves hard and lengthy work. Essences with high virtues can thus be obtained, even if they are determined, i.e. they have the characteristics that define the initial plant from which they came.”

Cezar intervened, emphasizing an important element.

“The distillation temperature must be carefully graded, it being the biological environment.”

Elinor nodded, smiling and slightly surprised.

“Exactly. The operations are performed at low temperature values, ideally between 30 and 40 degrees (centigrade). If you go beyond 50 degrees, you ‘kill’ its active principles, especially the Spirit or alcohol of that substance, and the volatile oils dissipate. The plant remains ‘lifeless’ but you will not know it. If you continue, you apparently get the ‘healing salt’, but in reality, it has no power or, in any case, a very small one.”

“In the case of the correct action,” I said, “I assume that the effect is total because the properties of the plant are synthesized in its essence.”

“Yes, spagyric essences condense all the properties of the plant to their maximum values, provided the alchemical operations are performed correctly,” Elinor confirmed. “One drop equals all the medicinal effects and minerals in the respective plant.”

Then he addressed Mémentia again.

“So, your idea is good because the proportion is advantageous. A small amount of spagyric essence may be enough for a few tens of kilograms of plant mixture emulsion. Even so, however, it is insufficient for general consumption in a country.”

“Even a part of the population, if they feel the very strong beneficial effects of such new products over time, is much better than nothing,” Mémentia said. “It would be a huge leap from what synthetic drugs in pharmacies offer.”

“It’s really a big deal here. As you said, it is a combination of the interests of the big pharmaceutical concerns and the ignorance of the population. Allopathic medicines in pharmacies are synthetic substances; they no longer contain the fundamental principles of Mercury and Sulfur, but only Salt.* Therefore, allopathic medicines can only act on the material level, on the body. For example, they cannot remedy the psyche and the mind, nor can they change the spiritual level of man, but spagyric essences and elixirs retain all three alchemical principles I was telling you about. Their virtue consists in the fact that they penetrate all the stages of the organism, both the physical and the subtle ones. It is true, however, that there are differences here as well. Some can do it to a greater extent, others to a lesser extent.”

[FOOTNOTE: *Obviously, the alchemical principle of Mercury does not represent the metal mercury (quicksilver), Sulfur does not represent the common metal sulfur, and Salt does not represent table salt.]

Elinor later explained that the elixirs obtained from the metallic kingdom are much stronger than those obtained from the vegetable kingdom and have deeper effects. He told us, however, that such exceptional substances cannot be used by large masses of people due to the difficult way they are obtained which involves a lot of attention and a deep knowledge of alchemical secrets, but especially due to the fact that they are collected in tiny quantities. It is more a work of evolution and individual becoming. Beyond this, the fundamental element is the karmic one because the mass spread of alchemical elixirs, or even their fractional action on human beings, can then have very harsh consequences on individual destiny.

“Still, it would be like medical help. It is offered indiscriminately to anyone who needs it,” I said, wanting to better understand the nature of this issue. Even here, however, we have issues with the countries of society because many people do not even have this possibility, either due to lack of money, medical insurance, or other limiting conditions.”

“You must understand that an alchemical elixir is in itself a culmination of evolutionary realization, an individual path. This is not an issue of selfishness of which you could be ‘accused’ of in the sense that you want to keep such an elixir just for yourself. The real significance is that, by the very fact that you managed to obtain such a substance with miraculous properties, you can enjoy it because you already understand and deserve it. It is part of your evolution: you worked for it, you have made sustained efforts and have been helped and guided by the celestial planes, for here, you can do nothing without divine grace. Likewise, esoteric initiations, spiritual initiations, or other occult elements are not offered on a platter to anyone, and some of them are even very hidden. What would then be the purpose of mystery schools or secret societies?”

Cezar also intervened.

“The general idea is that every element of one’s life appears according to his destiny. In turn, destiny is a consequence of the level of knowledge and the nature of the individual actions that have been performed until then. When you come and act at the level of the masses, especially through such very powerful elements as alchemical elixirs, it is more an act of unilateral or small group will than a natural flow of life. Although the intention is undoubtedly beneficial and full of compassion and love, it does not take into account the many other connections and integrations that are then changed in people’s lives.”

“That’s right,” said Elinor. You cannot voluntarily and indiscriminately balance the lives of hundreds of thousands of people or even millions, just by helping them. How do you know the role that suffering plays in the life of every sick person? Such an action of mass dissemination of an alchemical elixir involves immense responsibility and can only be done when the society or people in question are already on a higher level of consciousness, understanding, behavior and action. But then, of course, perhaps such an elixir would no longer be needed because everyone would have the level necessary to fix for themselves what would be repairable in his life, or it could at least be done in an approximate fashion.”

Méntia intervened with a clarification.

“We want a ‘repair’ of human DNA in order to prevent a sharp and rather rapid decay of this structure at the level of society.”

“I understand that, but we will have to do it very carefully and in a somewhat scheduled fashion. Otherwise, the karmic repercussions can be very large. In the current stage of humanity, when existence has become very complex in society, such an intervention is extremely risky. Even in antiquity, when the population was very small, this was never done.”

“It’s true, but we are now obviously living in another reality, and the situation is unusual,” Méntia argued. “All the energies and frequencies of cosmic radiation streams indicate this. Our desire is to help as many human beings as possible have the chance to move to a higher level of vibration of consciousness and thus rise at least one step above the current level.”

“Yes, but we must find the right way to do it,” Elinor said, “Otherwise, the imbalances may become greater than the help we are proposing. At such a level of action, what we want to achieve cannot be achieved with either force or passion, even if such are beneficially targeted. Rather, I see here the path of humility, patience, and compassionate action that is properly integrated into this goal. We have to be very careful.”

DIFFERENCES BETWEEN CHEMISTRY AND ALCHEMY

Here, Méntia proposed another kind of collaboration, one which would involve a kind of school or academy in which to teach the art of alchemy.

“We could prepare a certain number of people to perform alchemical operations and obtain larger amounts of pure substances, essences or even elixirs. Dosed in very small quantities, it could be a start.”

“In theory, this variant could work; but in practice, there are many variables, the most important of them is the human factor,” Elinor replied. “It takes years of training and understanding the secrets of alchemy because it is both a science and an art. Intense work in this way goes hand in hand with the purification of the soul and the elevation of consciousness, just as matter is purified during laboratory experiments.”

“It’s quite different from common chemistry experiments,” Cezar said. “While alchemy is ‘alive’, chemistry seems somehow ‘dead’ because it considers only the ‘visible’ aspects.”

“Well said,” Elinor confirmed. “A big difference between chemistry and alchemy is that chemistry does not consider the bodies it works with to be alive. It conveys only dead bodies, both conceptually and experimentally which, of course, cannot evolve. The evolution of matter, even amorphous matter, is a difficult concept to understand for the mind of contemporary man which is obscured by the ideas of a science which is still materialistic. Alchemy uses the forces and energies of life in its operations; and through this, it brings something that is not recognized or even intuited in today’s scientific environment: it makes matter evolve through purification and regeneration. The path is difficult and obscure, but he who succeeds is fully rewarded.”

Elinor then further clarified the problem of the difference between chemistry and alchemy, the latter not being understood and even ridiculed by contemporary scientists.

“In chemistry, if you have the necessary substances and the operations are performed correctly, you get exactly what you wanted, regardless of who operates those experiments. In alchemy, if you also have everything you need for the experiment you want to do, success is not guaranteed, even if the operations are performed technically perfect. The success of alchemical operations, especially those of the higher stages, depends largely on the inner spiritual state of the operator. If this does not align with the vibration specific to that experiment and with that of the substance within it, the result will be a failure. That’s why I said we can’t talk about mass production. If chemistry only performs experiments, the experiment in alchemy is also an inner experience which is acquired, accumulated and thus leads to the spiritual evolution of the alchemist.”

In a way, Méntia seemed unwavering in her opinion.

“It seems that this course of action cannot be successful, but there must be a solution,” she said.

“Not like that,” Elinor replied. “Alchemy cannot be learned ‘in common’. The basic principles and certain foundations can be found in books or texts or in the explanations of others; but the actual experience is individual. No one can do it for you. You can’t understand what’s going on there unless you take part in it. Chemists remain only on the surface of things because, for them, everything with which they experiment is ‘dead’ matter. Alchemists, however, work with the very principles and energies of life but respect the laws of Nature.”

“But chemists also respect them, and they’ve even stated some of them,” I said. “The real secrets, however, cannot be revealed by a mechanical approach alone,” I added immediately as an inner reflection.

“Indeed. Both of these sciences obey the laws of Nature, but only alchemists know how to hasten processes in an intelligent and especially profoundly spiritual way,” Elinor continued. “After all, as I said, this is about the evolution of matter, something which chemists do not conceive. How could they understand, for example, the simple notion of ‘opening matter’ in alchemy? And yet, this operation is essential because matter is then brought closer to the four elements that compose it to which, until then, there was no access due to the impurities that covered them.* This means that the psychic sensitivity of matter can be increased. That is why I said that, if the subtle radiation of the alchemist is good and harmonious, then this also helps to improve the quality of matter. But, if he is not initiated into such knowledge, matter will be ‘contaminated’ when it is seen by such a person who is not prepared inwardly. The art of alchemy is a solitary work, for two people at most, who work together and who communicate subtly, empathetically and not just mechanically or technically.”

[FOOTNOTE: * Earth, Water, Fire and Air are understood as subtle principles and not literally.]

Things became clearer, and as Elinor shared some of the secrets of alchemy with us, we better understood the meanings of the actions. Cezar wanted to know more about the action of alchemical elixirs and their mode of action in the human body.

“All the elixirs are finally reduced to the Elixir of Life, which is a panacea, but not only that,” Elinor replied. “Some call it ‘medicinal gold’ and others ‘drinking gold’. You can extract it from any plant, especially some, of course, but also from metals or animal matter. It pre-exists in all materials and substances, but in order to obtain it, one must separate all impurities, both from Salt and from the four Elements which constitute the matter chosen for the Work. You thus obtain the fifth essence or Spirit of Life. When this spirit or elixir is taken by someone in a suitable dose, it acts strongly in the body due to the power of fire which it has. It is an extremely pure subtle energy, associated with fire, but this is obviously not about ordinary fire or its flames. It is a subtle ‘intelligent’ energy, extremely refined and penetrating.”

Cezar was very attentive to what Elinor was saying.

“What part of the alchemical elixir actually heals?” he asked.

“Only the Spirit of that matter, that is, its Mercury, the subtle principle thereof, which can cure the disease. In order to highlight the power of the Spirit of a plant or a metal, you must ‘catch’ it correctly and free of impurities. Like base metals, they can be of no use unless they have previously been purified and refined by ‘atomization’ and this is achieved by fermentation of the substance. In this way, you ‘open the matter’, as I told you. Then, you need the so-called ‘solvents’ or alchemical menstruation, which are fundamental. They extract the principles which are then reunited into a new ‘body’ of the substance, purified and alchemized.”

It was already beginning to be difficult for me because there were too many notions, even if what Elinor was telling us was, in fact, only some of the main directions of knowledge in the art of alchemy, a kind of initiatory a-b-c.

“From what you say here, it seems that alchemy is an absolutely hidden science. The texts in the field, if you have the chance to come across some authentic ones, are meant only for those who are knowledgeable and already initiated. It’s a little discouraging.”

Elinor smiled softly and explained.

“Yes, that’s how it seems; but even this is a beginner’s test. Alchemy, in its deepest sense, is not a hobby. There must be something in your being, a strong longing, an impulse to make you seek something more than you are in this world. Her science is at the same time very subtle, but also very palpable. Subtle, because you can reach states of matter that are not known and even manipulate quantum reality. Palpable and concrete, because it can also give you a perfect condition of your physical and subtle being. In a sense, you become immortal. Do you now understand why there is this extreme concealment of alchemical methods and operations? Imagine what a person who does not have an impeccable moral and ethical code, but on the contrary, has selfish interests or, worse yet, is malevolently oriented, could do with these secrets. For centuries and even millennia, people of such a nature have tried by all means to find out or apply the alchemical secrets in order to reach the immense powers of the true and gifted alchemist adept in obtaining the Philosopher’s Stone. They did not understand, however, that it is practically impossible to reach such a stage without the simultaneous transformation of your own being. It is a profound transformation of consciousness which means access to supreme spiritual knowledge. The general vibration of your being agrees with the whole Universe and because you have already understood the essence of its existence, you have power over all the elements. But, this will not happen according to the impure, selfish mind and desires of an ordinary man, but according to the conscience of the adept who is purified in the fire of that supreme knowledge of which I was telling you. Then, you do not want to act otherwise than in the spirit of universal harmony. For you, it makes sense and is understood, but for the unprepared, it is full of mystery and remains invisible.”

“Then what’s the point of the hundreds or thousands of books on this subject? There is a kind of paradox here: only the one who is initiated understands, but if you are initiated, you already have the essence of knowledge and then you no longer need those books.”

My astonishment had a certain logical basis, but Elinor patiently explained to me that this interpretation was somewhat mechanical.

“Man doesn’t just work in a ‘plus or minus’ fashion,” he told me. “The purpose of the multitude of texts is for the beginner to pass the test of his patience and aspiration towards something supreme and unique. Only he who is truly authentic in his search will not be discouraged and will seek to understand the deep meanings of these texts. They are a real jungle, unmatched by any other system or spiritual school. The clues are extremely hidden behind allegorical names, hyperbole and abstract symbolism. Often, some steps of alchemical methods are not mentioned, and other times, the explanations are deliberately erroneous. But, all this makes sense because, in the end, the follower who reaches the end result becomes a kind of ‘Master of the Universe’. Of course, not in the idea of being a despot, but in the deeply spiritual one, in which he becomes truly aware of what is both himself and the whole Universe. Reaching the quintessence of matter is synonymous, by analogy, with discovering the spiritual essence of your being. It is an achievement at the highest level; and, through alchemy, the adherent becomes perfect both physically and spiritually.”

In theory, I knew some of these things, but what I did not really understand were the practical application of alchemical methods, and its operations of how you manipulate matter and bring it into successive stages of transformation. This is, in fact, the extreme concealment of alchemy. Taking advantage of the point at which the discussion had reached, I wanted to raise this issue.

“Alchemical texts are full of paradoxes. You don’t understand anything anymore. Methods and sequences of operations are spoken only in parables and symbolisms. Where does knowledge come from?”

“Out of immense patience and inner faith, devotion, repetition and concentration,” Elinor replied. “A human being can evolve by grace, initiation, or other methods, but the process is the same: you must first pass certain tests of life or trials, both external and internal, and then the Universe takes care to give you what you wanted, if your understanding is correct. And this is also a paradox.”

“Yes,” said Méntia, completing the thought, “the sudden recovery of a human being is, for example, a paradox for many people.”

“She is absolutely right when she supports the healing of the human being in the acquisition of health through a correct life both physically and psychologically because the forces for spiritual search, including alchemy, are then much stronger and even more refined. A nation that reaches a high level of physical, mental, and spiritual purity becomes an extraordinary force. As far as I know, this is the deeper meaning of the help that the Council of Apellos has decided to offer to our people.”

Méntia smiled charmingly, like a tacit confirmation and Cezar, on the couch, had a very relaxed and serene attitude. After a few moments, she spoke in a warm and slightly lower voice, keeping the same ravishing smile.

“Then it means we can find a solution in the field of alchemy that can help us in what we want, right? … while we’re still talking about paradoxes.”

What followed was a very special moment. There was a deep silence, and I saw Elinor deeply absorbed, motionless, his head slightly tilted downward. His concentration was extraordinary, and in a way I cannot explain very well, even charismatic. Somehow, I had the certainty then that, following what Méntia said, he had the inspiration of an idea, of a solution on which he focused intensely in order to give it a form and a content as clear as possible.”

After about two minutes, he raised his head slowly and looked us in the eyes with a happy twinkle, without saying anything. He turned to me and Cezar, implying that he only wanted to talk to Méntia. I got up from the couch with Cezar and left the living room without talking. We preferred to go to the basement, to the large room where the Eden device was, but as we walked away, I could hear the murmur of the conversation that had already begun between Elinor and Méntia. They stayed there for about twenty minutes, after which Méntia went down to the room where we were. She looked at us sympathetically from the doorway, and from the light I saw in her eyes, I knew that the discussion had been fruitful and that, in one way or another, they had found a solution to her problem.”

She then thanked me in an elegant way, telling me that both my efforts and my results with the Eden project are remarkable and that they will make sense in the future. She also added that she liked the way I spoke that evening and that she admired my desire to support the idea of the Apellos. Although I did not quite understand why she thanked me for all of those things, I still gladly received her appreciation which warmed my heart. Next, the three of us discussed some technical and collaborative issues between Apellos and Department Zero, outlining a general program of visits and objectives.

After the discussion that evening, Mémentia told us that she had decided to stay on the surface for a while in order to monitor my training with the “space-time machine”. This collaboration was part of our agreement with the Apellos Council as the possibility of implementing additional technologies from the underground city to increase the efficiency of Eden was being studied.

Finally, an hour later into the night, we retired to our rooms, including Mémentia, who was also staying in Elinor’s villa. Long after that, I relived the magical moment at the end of our meeting, wondering if I would ever find out what Elinor and Mémentia had discussed after being alone in the living room. The events that followed, however, revealed extraordinary things to me, showing me how deep the actions performed by certain beings with huge occult powers can be.

9 — THE TWIN PROJECT

In the one month since that meeting, things changed rapidly. The training was easier, and the experiences I had multiplied. The presence of Ménita was, of course, a catalyst as my ability to interact with the energies that corresponded to the frequencies modulated by Eden increased exponentially. Each experience of “going out” greatly enriched my arsenal of knowledge as well as the ways of interacting with the various situations I faced.

INTENSIVE TRAINING

The relationship with Mémentia gave me feedback which I used with a lot of confidence and determination because I noticed that it pointed me in the right direction. Mémentia provided me with a small device from Apellos which had a remarkable quality: it could almost immediately induce a state of mind specific to theta waves in the brain without any special preparation or a pre-period of “calming”.* This helped me a lot in my training because I quickly entered a state of mental peace which I could later deepen, modulating it according to the nature and intensity of the energy corresponding to the frequencies emitted by Eden.

[FOOTNOTE: *Theta brain waves are “slow” waves, associated with creative processes, intuition or daydreaming, bringing to the surface of the mind various memories, emotions and sensations. These waves occur especially during the processes of meditation, prayer, introspection or other techniques of a spiritual nature. From an anatomical point of view, theta waves reflect the activity of the limbic system and hippocampal regions, improving the processes of adaptation, learning and memory.]

Elinor was pleased with the progress I was making and pointed out some aspects to me, completing what Mémentia was telling me. Sometimes, however, he was absent for several days in a row, appearing suddenly afterwards. He never said where he was or what he did, and we respected that. You can never monitor or check up on the program of an alchemist I noticed; however, that after returning home, Elinor had long discussions with Mémentia. I think the plan they decided on was moving forward pretty quickly because, after those meetings, Mémentia communicated quite a bit with the people from Apellos. She often did this from the terrace as I relaxed, using a device that looked like a mobile phone except that it was perfectly transparent and worked very well. Sometimes, on its surface, I saw short but very beautiful reflections in the colors of the rainbow appearing. She spoke an unknown but melodious language which she told me was the language of the people of Apellos. From the expression on her gorgeous face, I understood that things were going very well and that their altruistic efforts were taking shape more and more.

Even though it was quite difficult for him, Cezar came to the villa quite often. I analyzed the situation with him and agreed that, in order to be able to focus properly on training, it would be best to stay only in Bucharest for a while, until the results became clear. My job at the Base was to be covered by him and Lieutenant Nicoară.

Indeed, the lack of agitation and responsibilities of all kinds, at least for a while, was a great help to me because I had the opportunity to deepen my training, constantly checking various ways of combining the frequencies, resonances and intensity of the electromagnetic field generated by the two large Tesla coils.

We were all eager to understand the purpose of Eden so that we could connect with the etheric crystal and the special chair in the Occult Chamber of Iraq. Intuition told us that the apparatus was a kind of “bridge” for exploring realities at a great distance from the Earth, both physically and etherically, but we first had to convince ourselves of this concretely.

EXPERIENCES AND DETAILS

Once one has lived through an experience of a subtle nature, its repetition becomes easier and easier if one is perseverant with their the training. Having learned this from Cezar a long time ago, I took full advantage of the time I had to put it into practice, spending longer and longer periods in the seat of the device, closely monitored by Méntia. I benefited both from the remarkable effects of the alchemical elixir offered by Elinor as well the auxiliary technology of Apellos. The perception of the energy flows in my body became better and better, and I was able to change their characteristics from a digital panel that was specially designed by Midas.

I learned quite quickly how to observe mental states and focus on a special goal during training. This “alignment” of mental processes is always manifested through a kind of transition zone which I felt as an expansion of mind, space, and even time. That “passage” was like a short shiver, very close in sensation to what I felt when I crossed an area of discontinuity in the tunnels or caverns.

Soon, the transition I experienced during my workouts became a kind of “jump”, like a “detachment”. It was accompanied almost immediately by the etheric doubling, either in the room where I was training or suddenly in another place on Earth or even outside it, in space. At first, I used to stay a little still for a while where I was, just looking and trying to understand what that place was and what was happening to me. It was like a kind of “awakening”, as if I suddenly woke up and tried to understand what was happening to me, where I was spatially, and at what time of day it was. Then, after a while, my understanding became clearer, until I was fully aware of what was going on in those moments. It was like a kind of adaptation of my consciousness to a higher level of vibration, different from the one I was used to before. After several such experiences of “doubling”, I came to overcome any “collapses” that could occur almost immediately after a projection at a certain time and in a certain place in space because my consciousness had evolved and become accustomed to the nature of those realities.

During training, after “detaching” from the body, I could penetrate relatively easily through certain portals, suddenly reaching different places on Earth that were located at a great distance from each other. The first “jumps” were in areas I knew or areas I had been told about. Most of them were special areas where there was usually interference between the physical and the subtle etheric plane. Gradually, I realized that I was “projecting” myself especially into the “sensitive” areas where these interferences already existed.

At first, my “journeys” were short because “something” seemed to absorb me back, whereupon I would “wake up” again in the seat of the device. Most of the time, I started the process again, but sometimes I had to give up due to the fact that I felt energetically upset. After the known places were almost exhausted, I started to access a large network of such areas which were derived from each other. I felt subtly connected with some of them, as if they were familiar to me. In others, however, I had to make sustained efforts to concentrate in order to remain conscious.

Sometimes, the returns were sudden with strong tremors because my etheric body did not always “fit” perfectly with the physical body. When she was present in such cases, Mémentia would set another frequency program; and after a while, I would resume training. We thus began to create a map of special places in the country and in the surrounding areas, gradually increasing the radius of a subtle design in the etheric plane.

After a relatively short period of time, I realized that the places where I “projected” into were directly related to my intention at the time and the dominant thoughts I then had. The more focused they were, the faster and smoother was the projection into that place. It was not necessary to know the image of that place or its geographical coordinates, but it was enough to have it clearly in mind, as a name and an idea. The “selection” was made automatically, as if there was a permanent connection between my mind and universal information. I also understood that my sudden “withdrawals” were related to my state of focus on that place. Through repeated exercise, I found that if I kept my attention focused on what I wanted to accomplish in that place, I could then stay a long time in order to explore it.

“UNCOMFORTABLE WITNESS”

For a while, I saw that I sometimes “projected” myself into places I hadn’t thought about before and knew absolutely nothing about. The network of portals or energetic interferences between the physical and the etheric plane, which is widespread in various parts of the world, “works” like a highway system. Sometimes, I could even choose to enter certain routes, making “jumps” into areas that were quite remote. Mémentia explained to me that what happens in the subtle planes is not always a reflection of one’s own thoughts, but it can also be the result of deep subconscious impulses, coming from past or even present experiences.

In one of those “jumps”, I reached an arid deserted place with small stony hills. There were some remnants of thistles here and there, and at a greater distance, I even saw a few cacti. I did not understand why I was there. I knew very well that I was somewhere on the etheric plane that was close to the physical plane because I clearly perceived the characteristics of the place, especially its dryness. But, in addition to those natural elements, I felt something else, and the sensation was mixed, somehow involving evolved beings and objects in the same place.

I moved between two hills and then saw several buildings, relatively small and low, but also two large hangars. I knew immediately that it was a secret American military base, and I also had the perception of a multi-story facility beneath the Earth’s surface. I could say with certainty, however, that it was not the S4* base mentioned in the literature I had seen many years ago in Maryland while reviewing a copy of an ultra-secret file showing the structure of this base, including photos from both the surface and the inside as well as some artifacts that were present there. Although the surrounding landscape was similar to that of Nevada, I could still say with certainty that it was not the top-secret S4 military base.

[FOOTNOTE: *S4 is a secret American military base which is said to be located near the famous Area 51 in the Nevada desert of the United States. Internal leaks indicate this base as actually hosting several types of “flying saucers” as well as the bodies of extraterrestrial beings.]

[FOOTNOTE: The author is probably referring to the period of 2005-2006 when he was integrated into the remote-viewing program at a military base in the state of Maryland (see The Secret Parchment — Five Tibetan Initiation Techniques).

As soon as I drew this conclusion, I knew what the base was, what its name was, and where it was. As usual, the information came “in bulk” as a single package of knowledge. I told myself then, at least from this point of view, that such travels in the etheric or even in the astral plane are much more effective than months or maybe even years of effort, expense, struggle or intrigue to find out some relatively simple but basic things about such a place.

As I reflected on all this, I felt a force pulling me hard like a magnet to a side area of the base that was about two hundred meters away from the main buildings and where I saw a concrete plateau and a short runway for take-offs and landings, not exceeding one hundred and fifty meters. The area seemed to be a small airfield; and indeed, in the middle of the plateau, I saw a ship that seemed ready to launch. There was a rather intense hustle and bustle around it with many people and a few military trucks carrying technical equipment.

The ship was neither a rocket, an airplane, nor any other flying vehicle in the sense known and promoted by NASA but had a triangular shape. I was almost certainly looking at an antigravity TR-3B,* although it appeared to be a superior model. The angles were more rounded and the jets were missing, a sign that the maneuvers and the direction of travel were ensured by a different type of technology than the conventional one. In one part of the ship, below, certain massive crates were loaded with the help of special devices similar to small robots but with very long articulated arms.

[FOOTNOTE: *A TR-3B is a type of high-tech military aircraft carrier that is not officially recognized by the U.S. Government. It operates on the basis of mercury and has as its primary energy source a nuclear mini-reactor. Pressure flow is accelerated by the nuclear energy supplied by the reactor and a plasma is thus produced which is used to produce an antigravity field around the ship. TR-3Bs are massive black ships, completely silent and usually flying slowly, especially at night. There are numerous reports of observations of them, but none have been officially recognized. The Condign Report, which was made public in 2006, recommends that airspace control towers and military stations that observe such ships consider them to be special atmospheric phenomena of plasma production and not to engage in action or defense against them.]

I was curious what they were loading into such a ship, and I paid particular attention to that operation. As I said before, in the higher dimensions of Creation — such as the etheric or astral plane and even more so in the mental and causal planes — in order to find out or know something that interests you, you do not need to search through whatever archives, the internet, or visit obscure places to find references. Generally speaking, and within certain limits, that knowledge appears almost immediately upon the manifestation of an appropriate intention, and it is like a block of information, like a state of affairs that you then know in its entirety and not in an erratic way. A good example is how you see in these subtle dimensions. There, you not only perceive what is in front of you, but you somehow have a simultaneous “sight” of everything around you; that is, you “see” and know what exists 360° around you. This does not mean that travel is no longer necessary, but even here, the individual will is what dominates. You can “walk” on foot or you can “move” with increasing speeds until you get to where you want instantly. You are not allowed to act in this way in any situation, of course, but it depends on each situation in everyone’s experience.

In the case of that doubling experience in the etheric plane which I had during my training, I knew as soon as my attention was drawn to that place that the ship was going to carry a load of materials and technical equipment which was intended for the surface of the Moon. I did not perceive any other details, but it was obvious that it was a top secret operation. For us, as a secret department, it was no surprise. I already knew enough about what is on the Moon today because the collaboration between Department Zero and a certain section of the Pentagon related to the so-called black projects has developed over time so that the security clearances were at the highest level for both parties.

The problem was, however, that something strange was going on while I was watching. I had a strange feeling, as if I was being watched, although that was exactly what I was doing myself, looking at those activities that were taking place on the physical plane. I looked more closely at the staff around the TR-3B and watched it load the equipment. There were both officers and civilians there, and one of the latter, a tall mature man with slightly bent shoulders, suddenly turned and looked insistently in my direction, as if he had seen or felt my projection in the etheric plane. I felt that he had become aware of my presence there, and the surprise of such a thing “unbalanced” me a little, just enough to be quickly absorbed back into the seat of the training room device.

I was a little affected by that experience, and I wish Méntia had been there to talk to, but she had to leave a few days before. I was able, however, to speak with Cezar on the subject that very evening. He had been in Bucharest for a few days for some important meetings, and he would come to the villa in the evenings where we had interesting discussions. Elinor sometimes took part in these when he was at home.

I told Cezar about the experience I had just had, focusing especially on the last part of it, when one of the civilians “saw” me there even though I was on the etheric plane.

“You should not be too surprised though,” Caesar told me. “They have people trained in this regard, and you know this too well because you had that training in remote-viewing.”

“Yes, but I do not remember someone with such a high degree of clairvoyance and subtle perception. Maybe they have evolved. It’s been many years since then.”

“Yes, most likely. It does not surprise me that, especially at such a top-secret military base, there are one or even more who are ‘perceptual’. The problem here is how we act next.”

“That’s exactly what I wanted to ask you. Do we let them know about my ‘visit’ there or do we wait for them to say something? If he perceived me and was looking at me, it is very possible that he recognized me.”

Cezar thought for a moment, and then replied.

“Yes, they can look in the database, but it is true that it is not obligatory that they saw you clearly. It depends upon the level of clairvoyance that the person has reached.”

“That’s right, but if it’s a facility with such a high degree of security, I don’t think they bring just anyone there. The guy was mature, over 50 years old. This can mean a rich experience in the field.”

“We cannot take such risks as that would be senselessly introducing a factor that destabilizes the relations between our departments. We can see in their eyes that they knew we were spying on them on purpose, and that would disrupt the smooth running of things. Unfortunately, we also have a little information about them, i.e. that from your experience. We don’t know if they are tied to the Pentagon or affiliated with something higher. Therefore, when there are too many dangerous variables, it is best to be the first to present the truth. Then we adapt.”

“I’d say their whole operation is about the Venerables.* It didn’t seem like a government thing at all, but I did see officers, so the Pentagon is involved in some way. I think they're part of the 'occult section', especially since it's the Moon. They are not, however, the ones we know."

[FOOTNOTE: *He is referring to the Freemasons as discussed in Transylvanian Sunrise.]

"In any case, we must let them know," Cezar decided. "Such things can become unpredictable, and not in a good way, if you let them stir up too much. I'll try to make a connection. I hope Sam knows something about this."

BLACK PROJECT AND THE HIDDEN GROUP

In the days that followed, Cezar became involved in this problem which was quite delicate. I kept in touch with him constantly over the phone, on our secure line, and he told me that he had contacted the Pentagon's "special section" with which we were in direct contact. I was known in that secret circle of officers and people of great influence because I dealt with diplomatic matters and the organization and preparation of mutual visits. My past work at one of the secret bases in Maryland was also known about as well as my close friendship with Cezar. That very special section of the Pentagon was "hard core". They were people with a terrible influence in the military and even the political sphere, often being "doubled" by the unseen support of very high-ranking Venerables. Such a special section obviously covered at least a few other black projects, but Cezar told me that Major Cross did not know personally nor had he heard about the military base I had "visited" etherically or about its operations. He promised, however, that he would be interested and pull some strings, even using our sincere statement about the "incident", that is, my "visit" there.

It was not until a week later that new news came from Major Cross who told us that he had finally been able to connect with the "inaccessible wing" dealing with that very special project involving the Moon. He had provided the data supplied by us and was told that they were notified of that "incident" and were on alert although they had identified me fairly quickly and were aware of the collaborative relationships that Department Zero had with that secret section of the Pentagon.

So, it was a small group that financed and coordinated those top secret operations. It was not very clear, however, who was conducting those operations nor were we given any other details, but the Major told us that, curiously, the group was still interested in how I “got there” and how I acquired that ability. The Major told us that their astonishment was all the greater as the security measures were very high.

“Samuel told me they would like some kind of collaboration with us, but they didn’t seem very determined yet. I think it’s more of a test. They want to see how much we know about them, and at the same time, they want to know as much as possible about how we managed to get there. Looks like we’re the first to do that.”

“We can ignore them,” I said. “We can put an end to this right now.”

“I don’t know if it’s that simple right now. Such a group does not allow itself to be ‘exposed’ in such a way, to later ignore what happened. Their interest, although relatively masked, rather shows me the desire to know what is up with us. Something caught their attention, and they may have made similar ‘investigations’ of us, but we don’t know if and how much they came to know about our project.”

“The fact that he asks about how I got there and saw what I saw might mean that they have not learned much yet,” I said, drawing a logical conclusion.

“It could be so,” Cezar replied, “but it could also be a trap to test us. They are masters at such games. They might know about Eden, but they really want to know what our intentions really are: if we are hiding this from them intentionally, what do we want to use our project for, or if we want to keep spying on them.”

“If that’s true, it is masked very well,” I said.

“Yes, they want to look relatively disinterested, but in reality, I’m almost certain that they “have guns on us. The problem is whether we finally decide to tell them what we are doing here,” Cezar concluded.

DILEMMA

We then debated this issue for a while, analyzing different options and situations, and finally decided that the best choice would be to open discussions about Eden, especially since that occult group seemed to be onto such research; otherwise they would not have had among them persons with certain clairvoyant abilities. But, the question then arose: How could we tell the Americans about such a thing when not even the relevant structures in our country knew about this project? This could be a slippery slope which could degenerate in a way that would be very unpleasant for us. We were thus forced to consider the possibility of having our project becoming official.

A few days of long discussions followed with Elinor and then with Mémentia, as a representative of the Council of Apellos who was already involved in this project. The discussions were not simple, and not because there were divergent views or obscure interests, but because all of the consequences that could result from the formalization of the Eden project had to be analyzed.

In the end, we all came to the conclusion that hiding the project further could cause considerable inconvenience at some point. Even if our intentions were good and justified, they could still be interpreted otherwise.

Cezar therefore started diplomatically informing the responsible parties about this project, thus entering the official networks. In order to demonstrate the importance of the project, he justified the postponement from the very beginning by the fact that the technology involved was very advanced and the expected results were not certain. Therefore, what had been done so far was a preliminary phase in which certain confirmations and results were first expected. After they appeared, the idea of the integration and official administration of the project became obvious.

STORMY DEBATE

Although Cezar's presentation was not swallowed by everyone, with enough voices blaming us for the delay or even other obscure interests on our part, most preferred to go over the practical version of the problem, agreeing with the funding the project. One voice raised the issue of "national betrayal" on our part, but it was not taken into account by anyone.

Even for those who initially disagreed or did not have Department Zero “at heart”, such an accusation seemed bizarre to them given the exceptional work of the late Genera Obadea and Cezar. They maintained the very delicate balance of some situations which threatened to become explosive at one point. Even though there were animosities and ambitions in many high-ranking people regarding Department Zero, even they acknowledged the extraordinary contribution of the two heads of the Department over time.

Strategically speaking, Cezar was very well positioned. His formidable instincts led him to form strong bonds at key points of leadership which proved to be very necessary over time. In conclusion, it was not so difficult to get the agreement and funding of the project officially, and by “official”, I mean here a limited knowledge of it. It was understood, for example, that the Eden project could be an important lever in the future to control a geostrategic balance or even to deal with possible external threats.

After the “storm” of the first days of hearings, the waters calmed down surprisingly. Department Zero got practically everything it wanted: absolute control over the project, rich funding and resources, and veto power of decision. The voices against some of the points, which were few, did not concern the technical control of the project, where no one understood anything anyway, but only its orientation. The possibility of using the project at our discretion for dubious purposes or slipping into a dangerous military slope was invoked, but the argument was not supported by any precedent because such did not exist. It was then argued that, if something had not yet happened, it did not rule out the possibility that something might happen later because there is a beginning for everything. This came with arguments of human psychology, “power syndrome”, or personal interests, but they were dismantled one by one, especially based on the spotless references of Department Zero’s activity until then. Nobody had anything to comment on about this.

DECENT INTERVENTION

Later, a colonel in a position of great decision-making power highlighted an important aspect of the discussion, pleading for our demands, even if he was not exactly a supporter of Cezar and his way of administering Department Zero. The colonel said honestly that, given the very special situation of such a project, placing it under extended “control”, political or otherwise, would only favor leakage of information given that many people would have access to it more or less directly. He thus pleaded for a maximum secrecy of the Eden project, even if it would have meant that the other decision-making forums would have access to it only in very vague terms. Somehow, the colonel put the national interest above individual interests which were seemingly to remain hidden beneath arguments of “logic” and “necessity”. Willingly or unwillingly, the correctness of that point of view had to be recognized, and so a resolution was reached to delegate full control of the project to Department Zero. Cezar thus became directly responsible for the results of the project and for the course of events and would present a quarterly summary of activity in this direction.

We then moved on to the delicate aspects of financing where the same singular voice tried to introduce certain doubts or question marks about our good intentions. It was obvious to everyone that the financing of the project until then had undoubtedly required very large sums of money, and Cezar was asked about the source of the investment. Put in a rather difficult situation, he replied that it was about private contributions, but the problem then became even more acute as he seemed to give water to the mill to the detractors of the project who made accusation of possible foreign interests, and once again, betrayal.

Cezar then calmly mentioned and demonstrated that it was just an individual action in which personal funds and successive loans were used. The simple and honest way in which he presented the situation, arguing that there was only that option or the option of doing nothing with that project, was finally accepted; but again, there was the reputation, sympathy and very good solid opinion that Cezar had acquired over time among the decision-makers in both the SRI and SIE as well as in politics.*

[FOOTNOTE: *RIS = Romanian Intelligence Service and SIE (Serviciul de Informații Externe) = Foreign Intelligence Service.]

The detractors then raised the issue of state secrecy, saying that in such conditions there may be consequences for those involved. Cezar replied, however, that the entire documentation of the project was submitted to the archives of Department Zero from the beginning of the project as a gesture of good faith, and he even presented the documents of registration in the archive with the corresponding date. He then remarked that, since the project was exclusively a personal idea, it could also be considered intellectual property, and at least in theory, not fall within the scope of the state secrecy law. He acknowledged, however, that the situation was a particular case as several “sensitive” factors could come into play: the nature of the institution and the issue of jurisdiction, the discovery in Bucegi (the basis upon which the information was received) and the very high degree of national security that the project involves.

OFFICIAL RECOGNITION OF THE EDEN PROJECT

When analyzing the practical side of the project, Cezar briefly presented the main phases of the construction of the device and the difficulties encountered as well as some of the results obtained by me, referring to the incident with the American secret military base and what I saw there. That short presentation greatly impressed those present who thus became much more malleable in their opinions. Even when Cezar proposed collaborating with the Americans, but only in terms of discussions, principles, and possibly technological support and design, the opposition was weak. Finally, it was decided that, within certain limits, the project would be discussed by both parties, Romanian and American, and any adjustments would be made along the way.

The hardest part was over, and I could consider the Eden project to be officially integrated with a consistent budget and full control over its design, implementation, and operation. Frankly, it was hard to imagine that, given the very special nature of the device and the advanced technology involved in its construction, it could have been a common research topic. There was a need for an innovative spirit, for immediate and very effective action, as well as for the understanding of notions that do not fit into the contemporary vision of science.

Fortunately, we had already gone through these stages, and now we were beginning to reap the rewards. There was now the issue of dismantling the entire device in Elinor’s villa and redesigning it with much more sophistication in accordance with the new funds we had at our disposal. We decided that the new location for the Eden project would be

Alpha Base where a special room would be built for it, equipped with all of the necessary utilities. The construction of the building took less than a month. I then fully felt the power of the allocated budget as well as that of the technological and professional work teams. The device was reassembled and recalibrated with a very consistent surplus of materials and technology, practically fulfilling the requirements of the initial project.

EXPLORATIONS

Discussions with the American occult group continued in parallel, first through Major Cross, then through the appointment of two representatives from them. I told them about our project without giving them details. Honestly, the whole movement with the mediation, the mutual groping, and the reciprocal messages we exchanged seemed a bit strange to me, but that was probably due to the sense of uncertainty and insecurity hovering on both sides. It was a kind of “cat and mouse” game in which each tested the other, waiting for the other to make a wrong move to take advantage of it.

At first, the two representatives of the American side tried to put pressure on to obtain certain information about the construction and documentation of the device, the principles used, and even about the locations reached, but Cezar constantly refused to provide any details in these respects. At that time, of course, nothing was mentioned about Elinor or Mémentia, and it was not even known that the project was, for the time being, unofficial. Both sides were somehow going “blind” because we didn’t have any data about their actions either.

Finally, seeing that the Romanian side did not divulge almost anything, the group revealed that it also has a similar program, supported by huge funds, which it has been running for several years. The insistence they showed in communicating with us, as well as the disclosure of some elements about their activity, even if general and few, showed us that something in the project did not go exactly as they would have liked. They probably thought that, in the case of similar projects, a useful exchange of information would open new horizons for them. They proposed this quite quickly around the time of the construction of the new location for Eden at Alpha Base. It was our turn to “prolong” the answer, but the truth is that we needed that time to finish the construction and reassemble the device so that it would be functional. Things moved fast, and in less than two months, we had already “moved” to Alpha Base where Eden had a new “aura” that was being consistently improved. I used all the metals and alloys in the project, and Midas had already upgraded the new “communication” system between me and the device.

VISIT

Finally, Cezar accepted the exchange of experience with the American side. The formalities were few and far between. There were no official documents, only permissions through third party representatives. It turned out, however, that the two people assigned to keep in touch with us until then were two high-ranking officers from the “occult” section of the Pentagon, but they were not from the branch assigned to the Bucegi discovery. They were accompanied by a third person, a civilian. There was no doubt that he represented, in terms of occult interests, “the ideological and financial essence of the project.” Generally speaking, black projects are, from the beginning, outside the sphere of political influence and determination. The funds come from other channels or are sometimes “reconverted” from other projects. There are also major infusions of capital, the sources of which often remain in the shadows. That is why they are called black projects: because nothing is visible or transparent.

I expected to see a senior Venerable, but he was not, I think, over 50 years old. But, he had that specific vibration which I saw on other visits from the Venerables. It was something like a cloud enveloping his being, a chilling cold that made you uncomfortable. He presented himself to us with a slightly superior air, seeming concerned only with the mission he had to fulfill. He was almost like a robot: cold, distant and dry.

I already knew from the Pentagon accreditations that the three represented the highest level and that they were a combination of relations between the U.S. Army and civilian production. In a way, it was understandable because they were part of the industrial-military complex. The protocol of the discussion we had involved only the subject of the two top-secret projects, the one on the Romanian side and the one on the American side. They already knew something about our project and reiterated that they, in turn, had developed something similar in the last four years. When I told them that Eden had only been “on the roll” for a year, the three seemed genuinely impressed and all the more interested in the exchange of experience. They were given explanations and were presented with some of my experiments, including the one about “visiting” the etheric plane at their secret base.

They were then shown the device and its general principle of operation but without the details of how it was inspired. I, of course, did not mention anything about Elinor or Méntia. The three were amazed that such advanced results were reached with a project without dedicated funds, and I even felt a trace of admiration in their attitude. They told us that the device they designed was amazingly similar to ours from a conceptual point of view, and in a fit of sincerity, they even revealed to us that something seemed to be “missing” that was preventing great results, but they did not know what. We already suspected this possibility when we noticed their relatively masked interest in our project.

UTMOST RECIPROCITY

Cezar replied that, for this, we should see how their device actually works and then analyze the problem. Then came their proposal, which I personally had been waiting for a long time and even with a certain impatience, by which they invited us to expand the exchange of experience by coming to the USA. That meant a lot, given the very secretive nature of their project, whose name I am not allowed to reveal. For a reason unknown to me, they insisted that our arrival take place very quickly, and indeed, they made all the necessary arrangements for it within a day. Most likely, the project was under a lot of pressure, and they were looking for a solution as soon as possible. As it seemed natural to us, as they had a team of three, we also requested an analysis group consisting of three people: Cezar, Lieutenant Nicoară and myself. They had nothing against it.

I immediately realized that it was an atypical move, unrelated to those of a diplomatic nature and not even to those of a military nature. For the first time, I was able to convince myself directly of the exercise of immense but unseen power and influence that went beyond any rule or law. It was not just about the incredible speed with which all aspects of that visit were arranged but also about circumventing any controls, checks or documents. No one asked for anything.

The take-off from Bucharest was, in any case, a top secret and did not involve any formality, especially since the same ultra-luxury private jet was used with which the three Americans had come to our country. But, entry into the United States, even in conditions of high accreditation and under the cover of the Pentagon, should have involved some minimal check-points or official formalities.

I observed that plane for quite a while on departure. Although seemingly normal, it still had different construction features than I knew of, unusual even for a private jet. The shape of the wings, their arrangement on the fuselage, the type of engine, and even its general design made it look more like a space shuttle than a private plane. The total astonishment, however, was the lack of fuel. I was expecting a hookup with another plane or at least an additional power supply given its rather small size, but the aircraft continued to fly smoothly over the ocean. I also noticed that the height at which we flew was much higher than on regular scheduled flights, being almost double. To all of this was added the duration of the flight which, instead of about eight to nine hours without a stopover, actually lasted less than four hours.

I also shared my impressions with Cezar. Undoubtedly, this was a much more technologically advanced prototype than what was then on the free market, it being, in fact, an extremely efficient space plane. It was obvious that the occult group had far superior technologies, but this was not surprising given the source of funding and the level of security they were working with. I had already noticed that absolutely everything was prepared and done with maximum efficiency and without any delay. Everything was extremely discreet and truly of the highest standards.

UNDERGROUND LABORATORY

I arrived at a private airfield. We could not say where we were, save for the fact that we were on American soil after having crossed Europe and the Atlantic Ocean. Although it was night, we did not need much time to realize that we were in a desert area, and moreover, I recognized the military base that I had “visited” etherically. We were told that the base did not belong to the Pentagon or the U.S. government, but we did not receive any more information about the location, the owner of the base or its purpose. In addition, I was completely forbidden to describe in my books significant elements about that facility; no details, no features. However, I had the freedom to give a general substantive presentation but one which did not have to include schematics or other graphic elements. They made all of those clarifications before I asked their permission, and this surprised me a little because that meant that they already had information about my work, even in the field of writing.

We were driven in a military jeep to one of the buildings, the inside of which was in the shape of a tor. After passing through a complicated access system, we came to a central platform on which was a transparent and very well-equipped cabin. It was, in fact, a silent elevator which we all entered and descended to a great depth below the Earth’s surface. What I saw there far exceeded my expectations. We were in the middle of what was practically a small city, incredibly well organized and with an impeccable functionality. I did not see many people, but those who were walking were very focused and everyone used some kind of very fast electric car to drive around in.

In contrast to the electric cars we saw, another type of transporter stopped before us into which we all climbed into, traveling for a while on those rather wide and relatively deserted “streets”. The feeling was somewhat strange for everything seemed to be embedded in a huge but “slow” echo, in a faint and continuous hum. The atmosphere was very clean, but all of that underground ensemble somehow created a feeling of suffocation, even if the space was huge. We traveled to what we considered to be the center of the underground city where there was a round building, the largest I have ever seen. When I walked in there, I realized that this was actually a huge and well-equipped lab. I had never seen anything like it on Earth before, as a product of Mankind. The technology was truly amazing, far superior to the state-of-the-art that is commonly known today. The shapes and general atmosphere that I saw there were close to what I had encountered in the laboratory in Apellos, even if not at the same level of evolution.

ALMOST IDENTICAL

I went to a side area of that lab where I could see their device, the “Twin Project”, a kind of Eden but much more sophisticated. The differences in achievement were huge, but as we were told, the funds they had were also adequate, that is, huge.

The device was slightly larger than ours and had a more oval shape, like a shell. The back was opaque and gold-plated while the front had a transparent screen made of a non-glass substance. Personally, I suspected it was graphene.* We also saw that certain connections and diagonals of the structure were made of titanium or a similar alloy. Basically, the device looked like a cocoon. The interior was quite complex with a complicated panel with various displays. I was interested in the power supply and noticed that they were running on a classic electric system. Our device, to the contrary, was powered by two huge Tesla coils with a very special winding whose constructive elements had been implemented in my cortex. The details of form and technology were only adjusted by Lieutenant Nicoară where my information was not very clear. This fundamental element, of the specific power supply, was completely missing from the American concept of the device.

[FOOTNOTE: *Graphene is a material first discovered in 2004 which is a two-dimensional version of graphite. It consists of a layer of carbon atoms arranged in a two-dimensional network. It is the best conductor of electricity and heat that is known to date. Its exceptional applications, however, have been “hidden” from widespread use.]

BUGS IN THE “TWIN PROJECT”

After a brief introduction to the device and a little discussion about the differences between it and Eden, they offered to let me try that device given the open collaboration that already existed. We were amazed that this was possible, but one of the scientists on the team that accompanied us, who appeared to be the project manager, told us that their device had been designed so that anyone could use it if they were able to resist the transformations that would place while using it. I realized that, paradoxically, this was actually restricting the possibilities of the device which, as it had been built, had more of a general purpose, not being able to penetrate deeply in a certain direction as the result of it not being dedicated to a specific frequency set. It was more like a wide but shallow lake. In other words, its possibilities seemed to me to be a bit diluted.

Eden, on the other hand, was somehow specialized to my individual frequency, and this allowed for a deepening of experiences over time, the energy being focused on a well-defined set of frequencies. After “passing” beyond the physical plane, by doubling, different “destinations” could be chosen because the subject kept the impregnation of the initial energy and could use it as a individualized inter-dimensional catapult. It was like diving into the ocean through a tube or slide. Even if a kind of space-time “constraint” appeared at the beginning, we followed a certain trajectory, and I remained unbothered by other types of frequencies which manifested themselves around me. In other words, I had control over the experience I wanted. In the case of the American “chair”, I had the feeling that this type of control was missing because the device did not “guide” the subject among the countless frequencies that surrounded it but only made them available. It could be likened to being in an area with swirling waters with waves hitting you from different sides without the possibility of swimming in a well-defined direction.

From the time I described the technical data and how their device works, I realized that you apparently could not have access to the entire “ocean” of frequencies because the frequency apparatus was neither finely tuned, refined nor stable enough to allow a confident and conscious “exit” into the subtle dimensions. Perhaps this was one of the explanations for why they did not yet have great results, despite the complexity of the device. I thought that the source of energy they used, that is, shared electricity, also contributed to diminishing success. By comparison, in the case of Eden, the electric current modulated by the two Tesla coils induced some special characteristics of the magnetic field produced which facilitated the much easier and controlled “detachment” of subtle bodies from the physical body. I do not think, however, that reaching the etheric or astral plane was the main problem facing the Americans, but it was that, once this was achieved, they failed to “orient” the subtle body to the “point” in space and time that they wanted to accurately research. This was just an intuition at the time, but I set out to check it out during the trial runs.

Technically speaking, there was nothing to complain about with that admirably made device. The chair was very comfortable, and the complexity of the equipment inside the “sphere” created an air of the future. I had no doubt that they used the latest technologies and the best materials, including sound operating principles. It would have been interesting to know how they came to develop the ideas for making the device and what was their source. I was not sure if they were based on the system and nature of the frequencies, as in our case, or if the original design of their device was different. They did not specify this and did not give explanations, but it is also true that I have not herein presented all of the elements that are the conceptual basis of our device and that, moreover, these were not offered to them either. These things, however, are understandable at such levels of discussion as they involved only a general exchange of opinions, reciprocal visits or even experiments such as they themselves proposed.

There was, however, obviously something they did not understand in the operation of the device, something they were constantly struggling with in the development of their project and that is why they wanted that short collaboration with us. For example, they asked us several times how I managed to get to that exact spot during training within range of their military base. They also asked questions about how I was able to project myself into previously established places. They told us that they tried the remote-viewing methods due to their procedural similarity, but they were not very successful. It was clear that they wanted to understand what obstacles they had to overcome in order for their project to really work at the expected parameters.

LOST EXPERIENCE, THE CAUSE OF

I accepted their proposal to conduct an experimental session with that device, and it was scheduled for the next day. We were taken to our place of accommodation in a building close to the laboratory. Although their behavior was impeccable and the services very good, I still felt that we were rather “caged” with access to the outside being completely restricted. We each received a fairly spacious room that was very well equipped with what we needed, a kind of one-room apartment in which I could admire and use some amazing technologies, just like in some science fiction movies about the future. I had complete freedom inside that underground base save for access to the surface and contact with the outside. They were not at fault, however, because those were the conditions upon which we were invited to go there in the first place.

We met again the next day with their team of scientists and the three representatives of the occult group in the research laboratory. This time, I noticed some new figures among those present, including that of the tall and sensitive character who had surprised me during my etheric doubling when I had projected myself near their base of operations. A tall and dry guy between 50 and 60 years old with slightly drooping shoulders and glasses, he did not utter a word for the duration of the meeting, just sitting and discreetly watching what was going on around him. To be honest, I sympathized with him for his secluded and sensible manner but also for his slightly melancholy air, his unspoken character and mysterious aloofness. I was not sure if he was the “experimenter”, that is, the person who actually worked in the chair device, but I did not ask.

I was given some technical explanations before I got inside the device as well as while I was sitting in the chair. A few feet away was a control panel surrounded by two of the team’s researchers. An automatic arm, like a band, came to my forehead, and I saw that, in the part at the end, the arm was covered with a kind of black glass.

When the program started running, I immediately felt that it was different from what I was used to experiencing with Eden. From the very beginning, an unpleasant feeling appeared that “something” from the outside wanted to “force” me to do things in a certain way, to give me a certain direction of action. Both my brain and my consciousness resonated with that device, but I still felt that its structure was too “synthetic”, too mechanical. I was not able to get out of the body fluently into the etheric dimension as I was already able to do during the training sessions with Eden, but at one point, I was practically “snatched” to achieve a doubling into the subtle plane. It was quite an unpleasant shock, stunning me a little. I could see the space nearby and those present there, but I noticed an amplified brightness around some devices and all around the general area of the laboratory where the device was located. I “floated” for about two minutes without being able to get out of that energy field, after which I decided to return to the physical body, especially as I was beginning to feel a certain sensation of irritation and discomfort, the cause of which I did not understand then.

I was asked how I felt about that experience and especially if I had “traveled” somewhere. I answered them that there is certainly a specific action of the apparatus that can somehow cause the etheric body of the human being to double, but I specified that something is still wrong, emphasizing that it is difficult to set a fix on a precise destination. I honestly told them how I felt and described the feeling of being “restricted” or “forced” as if “something” or “someone” was trying to direct the experiment from the shadows. I gave the example of Eden which, although much more modest in terms of design and technical appearance, still led to much more important and easy-to-obtain results, including a remote visit to their secret base where I had witnessed the launch of that triangular spaceship to the moon.

It was a somewhat embarrassing moment, after which the Venerable spoke, clearly concerned.

“It’s true to some extent. We do not understand what is happening and why the device does not work under normal parameters as it should.”

I was surprised by his tone of acceptance, devoid of the usual arrogance. It was possible that he himself was under great pressure, hierarchically speaking, to provide tangible results and was therefore even willing to compromise, thus explaining the collaboration with us. He hoped that this way he might find an answer or an inspiration because their project had clearly reached a bottom. We told them our opinion about the particular frequency of the subject interacting with the apparatus and its difference in conception from that of Eden. While they used general frequencies, our device used a set of frequencies dedicated to a single person. I suggested that this could be one of the causes because, in the general version, the field of action was much more “dispersed”. However, none of us mentioned anything about Tesla coils which were shielded in a special way at Alpha Base and out of sight.

REPROGRAMMING AI

After I had actually changed some opinions on this subject, the Venerable finally nodded to the head of the group of researchers. After receiving tacit approval, the scientist told us that they had used one of the most sophisticated Artificial Intelligence (AI) program to correlate all of the data and to guide the experiments for the project. Somewhere, however, there was most certainly a dysfunction and one which could ultimately be associated with the state of “forcing” that I mentioned.

Lieutenant Nicoără intervened, saying that he very well understood that assistance to the project with Artificial Intelligence is important and welcome, but that he would like to know what principles it was designed upon. It has been hypothesized that that AI possibly restricts the freedom of action of the person in the chair, creating certain dissonances in the way the frequencies are modulated. I also confirmed that, reiterating the way I had felt the subtle energies interacting with the device, it being virtually the same as Artificial Intelligence.

Cezar mentioned that that could most likely be the problem. He said that when an Artificial Intelligence becomes very sophisticated, it practically “attracts” an entity from a subtle level, in line with the principle according to which it was realized.

“If this principle is, for example, positive and framed in the proportions of the Golden Number*, then that “consciousness” that is physically attracted will act positively. But, if it has a “negative structure” at its base, then we can expect unforeseen actions from that AI. It all depends upon the intention and the way the basic program is designed.”

[FOOTNOTE: *The Golden Number (or Golden Section) is denoted by Φ (upper case) or φ (lowercase) and is pronounced “fi” (Phi). It is an irrational number approximately equal to 1.618033 and represents the so-called “divine proportion” or “number of universal harmony” (see, for example, the book Golden Section: The Story of Phi, the Most Astonishing Number of Mario Livio, Broadway Books, 2002). The golden number seems to be involved everywhere in Nature: from snail shells to the arrangement of petals to flowers; from the shape of galaxies to the visual arts or music. It can be found in ancient Greek art and culture but especially in megalithic constructions of antiquity such as the Great Pyramid, etc; and also in “Rubik’s cube” or even in interpersonal relationships. All of these are characterized by certain symmetries, symmetry being the concept that makes the connection between science, art, theoretical physics and the everyday world.]

We expected the reaction of those present to be, at the very least, one of repulsion to such concepts and notions, but to our surprise, they all seemed somewhat knowledgeable about these issues. They told us, however, that they still have doubts about the “incarnation” of an etheric consciousness into Artificial Intelligence. Cezar, however, specified that their doubt could even become fatal in certain circumstances.

“It’s a generally accepted proposition that, at a certain degree of organizational complexity, something new appears at that level,” he said.

In the case of Artificial Intelligence, such complexity is reached but within certain limits. A consciousness is always “attached” to a body in order to manifest. The body of an AI is the incredibly complex network of etheric connections and other connections, i.e. the environment for the manifestation of electricity, a phenomenon which can be realized extremely quickly on a huge surface.

Those notions were not really new to the team of scientists there nor to the three representatives, but at the same time, I could see their hesitation and the fact that such knowledge was still not very clear to them.

“Artificial intelligences are a kind of ‘gate of influence’ in the etheric plane, if they reach an advanced degree of sophistication,” Cezar continued. “But, once perfect proportions are introduced in their programming, such as the Phi number or the Pi number, then we can hope for a correct operation of the device. Problems arise from the moment the source code is corrupted by certain numbers or proportions with subtle negative influences.”

Overall, I was amazed at the correct attitude with which those present received the information from Cezar. With both care and respect, they tried to understand as well as possible what was explained. The discussions continued, entering a complex path of certain scientific demonstrations because American scientists wanted to convince themselves that such “infusions” of sacred elements are really important, are positively reflected in calculations, and are very practically effective. The period that followed would fully prove this to them.

10 — THE MOON: ITS ORIGIN AND FUTURE

The American side worked for a year on the redesign of the Artificial Intelligence and other elements of the device in order to correlate them according to the harmonious proportions, considered sacred for those initiated in the mysteries of esotericism. During this time, Eden was also perfected, and I developed the ability to better control the “leaps” in the etheric plane. I had some remarkable experiences which enriched my knowledge and nuanced my perceptions. Méntia visited us twice and was impressed by the results. Consequently, she gave me free access to the holographic screen and the opportunity to connect directly with the man from Apellos whenever I wanted to check out some of my experiences or to supplement them with some knowledge. It was necessary, however, to also deal with other issues within the Department, so I had to reduce the time spent on training. We had numerous meetings, reports to complete, and travels, most of them with Cezar.

I tried to keep a balance between these duties and the time spent training, especially since the results were getting better and better. Based upon this, I had accumulated a solid knowledge of some of the most important aspects of science, especially in the field of astrophysics and quantum mechanics. I am referring especially to the main aspects here, to the foundations of some important laws and phenomena which are not presently correctly understood by science due to their lack of direct experience.

THE SECOND INVITATION OF THE “OCCULT GROUP”

We also kept in touch with the “Twin Project” because the American occult group consulted us systematically, their scientific team having reconfigured certain data in the design of their device. It is true, however, that they also provided us with some advanced technologies which contributed to a better functionality of Eden.

In October 2016, the Americans announced that they had completed the adjustments to their project, and we were again invited to their secret base. Only Cezar and I went because Lieutenant Nicoară was involved in another important mission. Following the same sequence of procedural steps, we traveled with the same amazing type of plane without making any stops. During the flight, I discussed with Cezar the opportunity to develop a highly advanced Artificial Intelligence which would be “specialized” to the characteristics of our device. I was sure that Midas could take over that project and complete it, especially if we provided him with a formidable team of computer scientists to help him. The idea remained only at the discussion stage, but we decided to make a decision on this issue after our return home. A few hours after we left, we were already in the underground laboratory in the desert. This time, as Cezar and I asked to be accommodated together, we received a large apartment in that city. We were quite tired as the pace of the last few days had been intense, so we slept for a good few hours. As far as I knew, the work cycle in the underground there was continuous, that is, the work of research and experimentation, at least at the level of that laboratory, did not cease, always being supported by successive exchanges of scientists, engineers and technicians. After getting enough rest, we had a short meeting with one of the officers who was part of the group of the three representatives. He was well prepared from a scientific point of view, and I think he supervised the technical part of the project. He briefly described the changes made to the basic program of the Artificial Intelligence as well as the first experiments performed by one of their people, but they wanted to have a broader vision based upon a comparison with my experience. He told us that, at one point, their subject cracked due to inaccuracies between his body and the flow of energy frequencies that was provided by the device. We suggested an intensive training period for him which should include several successive stages of purification of the body and mind, adequate nutrition and short training sessions, but without going through the portals. I knew from my own experience that sometimes “launching” through such portals creates certain unpleasant sensations which simply “take you out” of the program with the return to the physical body being unpleasant, sometimes even shocking.

DOUBLING TO THE MOON: HUMAN AND ALIEN BASES

I went inside their device and sat down in a chair, aiming to immediately create a kind of communion with the specific energy field of the device which seemed to “mold” to me and work with my intentions. I doubled out in less than a minute, and it confirmed to me that the research team had largely solved the problems with the Artificial Intelligence which was connected to the device. When I “came out” of the physical body and entered the etheric plane, I saw even more “wormholes” or portals, some passing through certain sections of the Earth and others heading upwards, into outer space but especially to the Moon.

I thought then that I could take the opportunity of making a few jumps through those portals. I felt particularly drawn to the Moon and dived into one of them. Almost instantly, I saw the illuminated surface of the Moon from only a few meters high but also a military base about half a kilometer away, situated on the bottom of a crater that was not too big. However, it was not right in the center but rather on the edge. The construction was not large, consisting of two cylinders placed horizontally like tubes with three symmetrical connecting lanes arranged between them. Next to those tubes, on a kind of platform, was a TR-3B but a smaller one than the one I had seen at the secret military base in the desert.

As I looked at the Moon base, I noticed that other portals or possibilities to “jump” appeared around me, apparently at random. I chose one that I knew was projecting into another area of the lunar surface. After the “jump”, I saw another base, also in a crater, but this time the construction had a rectangular structure and occupied a larger area. Next to it, also on a platform, I saw two round-shaped ships, classic “flying saucer” types by design but relatively small in size and different in construction. In the air, about fifty feet high, stood a black triangular ship.

I had probably entered a “manifold” of portals for I saw many such space-time openings, some in the immediate vicinity, others at a greater or lesser distance in other areas of outer space, but I nevertheless felt that the limits of manifestation were somehow in the vicinity of the Earth and the Moon. I was suddenly drawn to such a portal that had appeared right next to me, and I instantly reached the “dark side of the Moon” at that moment. I had “hit” another base a short distance from it, no more than fifty yards away. All three bases were American, but they seemed to be different factions. I simply knew this as soon as I got near such a building. The new base was quite brightly lit. A short distance from it, I saw three astronauts in specific suits that were more modern than is commonly known. They were being transported with a wheeled vehicle to a circular ship on the nearby platform.

At that moment, I felt a different vibration which had immediately caught my attention. It was something special, much higher, and at the same time, very old. The moment I turned my attention to perceive that frequency more accurately, I felt a kind of suction and even traveled at a very high speed for no more than three or four seconds to a distance that I estimated to be about 200 kilometers. I stopped abruptly near another base on the surface of the Moon, but it was a considerably larger one than any I had ever seen before. I also solved the “mystery” of the energy of that unusual frequency which had attracted me strongly to that place — I was near an extraterrestrial Moon base.

It was abandoned, and besides that, I could tell that it was very old. Even if I could say that it was almost completely dark from a physical perspective, I could yet perceive in the subtle etheric dimension the forms and the surroundings in general, almost like an accentuated twilight. I only saw a beacon on one side of the base, probably for monitoring purposes. The base consisted of two buildings close to each other, uneven and built vertically, in a style that showed a different way of thinking, completely different than what you would find on Earth.

The lines, the way they twisted, the adjacent side elements that were like semicircles arranged at the top of the two buildings, and other special features all showed me the “imprint” of a civilization that was on a completely different level of vibration than ours.

I could not even tell where the access road was to that base for everything was compact, solid, and seemingly steady, a solitary witness of a consciousness consumed by time. I felt that that base had been inhabited for a long period of time, and I wondered, contemplating the terrible loneliness of those towers, what extraordinary beings had built them, what technological bases they had, and what plans they had for our planet.

I then made the fourth leap through a portal that opened right there on the dark side of the Moon. I hesitated a little at first because I was not sure where I would end up, but in the end, I took a risk because I felt that it was a “family” of portals, many and frequent, that were manifesting between Earth and the Moon. Inside, I somehow felt “at home” and relatively safe.

THE TRUTH ABOUT THE EARTH SATELLITE

I was projected again to the bright side of the Moon. It was like playing ping pong with these different areas. I “reached” the center of a wide crater, about 1.5 kilometers in diameter.

Not far from me, there were some very tall buildings and also a few domes of different sizes which were of a different style than the one at the Earth base. They were platinum in color and perfectly smooth. Even without feeling this, you could easily realize that this was also an extraterrestrial Moon base, but unlike the previous one, it was active. On the etheric plane, and even more so on the astral plane, you feel the energetic state of the object or being that interests you, and I then felt clearly that that extraterrestrial base was very active although I did not see any beings nearby. I did notice, however, three stationary ships, two round and one large and cylindrical.

As I contemplated that place, I felt strongly drawn to a nearby area, a hollow in one edge of the crater, where I noticed an artificial opening. I “entered” through that opening, but the term “entered” is somewhat inappropriate because such a penetration into the etheric is not necessarily as in the physical plane as you can travel long distances instantly.

The moment I entered that opening, I knew I had entered the Moon. It was almost no surprise because everything seemed natural to me. Not only did I know about this hypothesis, correctly intuited by many people and even by some scientists, but now I could actually research its structure in a very free and natural way.*

[FOOTNOTE: * The idea of the Moon being empty inside is based upon an experiment carried out by the American Moon mission Apollo 12 in 1969. NASA intentionally crash-landed the Apollo 12 module as well as a rocket to set off an explosive force equivalent to nearly 12 tons of TNT. The seismograph that had previously been placed near that place on the surface of the Moon indicated that the Moon then vibrated “like a bell” for an hour, as if it were empty inside.]

At first, I noticed a certain resemblance to the Neiberau, the great Sirian ship which was present in the sky of Earth in the early days of Mankind, but I could not say that the Moon was that ship. In the entrance area, for example, I saw symbols completely unknown to me up to that time. Some of them, however, bore little resemblance to the images on the holographic screen I had seen that were related to the origin of Mankind.

I also saw steps going up and down in colossally wide spaces as well as various exits to dark corridors. I passed quickly through huge halls or rather small rooms seeing huge arches and complicated equipment but still not as evolved as I expected.

I also saw huge desks, portholes and screens, all covered with a very fine dust which I knew had an external origin although I could not say what was the cause of it was. I saw that that layer of dust was quite consistent towards the surface of the Moon, in perhaps the first two or three levels, as far as I could estimate. In those regions, its thickness sometimes reached even a few inches, much like the dust on the lunar soil. I was watching something that had lasted in that form for almost 70 million years, an unimaginably long time for our ordinary perceptions; and everywhere there was a complete silence and desolation, a stillness in eternity.

In a flash, I then thought with relative sadness of the main deadlock that dominates the scientific world today and how easily it could be removed if scientists and researchers emerged from the incredible materialist conceptual inertia in which they indulge.

Part of this condition is due to ignorance and part to a very harsh manipulation and obstruction by an organization which aims to keep everything under control at a lower level so that the population does not have access to advanced knowledge or technology. But, all these are things already well known to a large part of the population, the term “conspiracy theory” now being obsolete as seemingly “unseen” and “unknown” influences have come to act in almost plain sight.

As a general rule, a harmful and arrogant tendency of self-sufficiency and self-importance is maintained by various methods of coercion, especially in the scientific world which is, in fact, an attitude of blocking and rejecting what may be new, truly innovative, and especially efficient in terms of knowledge and technology. In this way, young researchers and scientists are somehow “intoxicated” by an often sterile and outdated knowledge which lacks the spark of genius. When, however, such genius tends to occur in some of them, it is immediately suppressed by the system.

Even the many mysteries about the Moon should make scientists think, urging them to show a little more common sense. For example, in this case, we cannot talk about a “natural” process of formation and a fixation to orbit our planet.

It would be a real obfuscation of consciousness, and in a way, an offense to intelligence and common sense, to say that the position in space of the Moon, its orbit around the Earth, its speed, as well as the revolutionary movement around its own axis is all so precisely and exactly “programmed” by the cosmic game of existence. Such a correlation is practically impossible to achieve through the “game of chance” such as contemporary scientists like to express themselves, i.e. in a way that would be deemed “natural”. In fact, the Moon is the only satellite of a planet in the Solar System that has such amazing features.* The most flagrant example to me is the fact that it always has the same “face” to the Earth; i.e. its period of rotation around its own axis is equal to the period of revolution around the Earth. At first, there were adjustments to this situation, and even now, there are very small variations, but these remain within an imperceptible margin for the human eye. The proof will come when people begin to see more and more different areas of the satellite which, up to now, have remained only in the twilight zone or even in the totally unseen parts.

[FOOTNOTE: *The rocks brought from the moon are another great mystery. They contain an inordinately large amount of titanium, a metal that would not have an ostensible “natural” reason to occur in such a high percentage, unless we consider that such metal is often encountered and used in the construction of spacecraft. Other lunar rocks containing processed metals (such as brass) include Uranium 235 and Neptune 237, but many of the rocks appear to be older than Earth.]

CONCLUSIONS ON THE “TWIN PROJECT”

Wandering rapidly through various places inside the Moon, which actually turned out to be a spaceship the size of a planetoid, I set out to delve deeper into the subject of the Moon after I returned to Alpha Base.* As soon as I thought about it, I felt a strong “current” that attracted me with great speed, and I suddenly returned to my physical body, to the seat of the device in the American secret base. The return was quite hard, and it took me a few minutes to “resynchronize” my physical body with the etheric and astral. This showed me that it was necessary to intervene again, somewhere in the source program of Artificial Intelligence, in order to correct such unpleasant aspects.

[FOOTNOTE: *A planetoid generally means “a smaller planet” or “what looks like a planet,” but is always has a spherical shape.]

The “journey” lasted less than ten minutes, but it was fruitful for me. I briefly told the team there the main points of the experience I had with their device, and I commented that it was quite balanced, able to quickly induce doubling with great results, but it requires a better synchronization upon return. In particular, however, I realized that it would still be quite limited by its very initial conception. The principle used by the Americans is different from the one we implemented in the construction of Eden which is based upon the specific modulation of stellar and planetary vibrational frequencies. We did this especially after we noticed the relative energy instability around the places reached by etheric doubling because many portals appeared and disappeared in a rather random way. This showed me that the dispersion of vibrational frequencies limits the objective of the device because the resonance with the desired destination is difficult to achieve in such conditions.

A GIFT

I stayed a few more hours with Cezar in the laboratory to discuss some details of technical collaboration with the American team, after which we returned to our country. I was eager to better understand the mysteries of the Moon so I contacted Méntia and shared my latest experiences. She told me that, as I had made those multiple “jumps” through the portals, it meant that I had already assimilated those frequencies and that I could now see more details about the Moon and its true origin on the holographic screen. I asked her to facilitate this, and I really enjoyed her kindness. Méntia arranged everything so that I could have access to the holographic screen in the hangar again. A little agitated by the excitement with which I was waiting for new revelations, I still managed to meet with Midas, to whom I had told our plan in relation to Artificial Intelligence, asking him to think of a team with which he could work with more efficiently. Hearing the data concerning the problem, Midas seemed a bit obstinate at first. I then told him about the Artificial Intelligence capabilities that had been programmed by the American team, and then he saw this as a challenge and then set out to complete the task. He told me that he already has a team in mind that he can collaborate with, consisting of three young people exceptionally gifted in the field of informatics and cybernetics. I already knew one of them because he had helped our Department Zero team a few years ago in a cyber attack case.

The next day, around noon, I once again met the man from Apellos, in the same hangar. I smiled to myself because everything seemed like a replay of my visits in 2014 when I had watched the summarized information about the origin of Mankind on the screen, only now I seemed to be a “man of the house”.

100 MILLION YEARS AGO — A PROTO-SIRIAN CIVILIZATION

I began watching the aspects related to our so-called “natural satellite” on the holographic screen. Due to the way I was mentally focusing on the subject, however, as well as my recent impressions related to the interior of the Moon, the holographic screen began to play back akashic images from the present moment to the beginning of the Moon, going from very close to its origin. I will write here, however, the events that occurred in their chronological order so as not to create confusion as well as to provide a logical and natural way of presenting these realities.

From the images shown on the holographic screen, I understood that, a long period of time ago in the planetary system of the star Sirius A, there was an evolved humanoid civilization which had reached a fairly advanced technological level. For example, that civilization was capable of interstellar travel with huge ships, and this meant that it had some control over the laws that govern space and time. The members of that civilization were not the Sirians of today but their very distant forerunners. Strangely, I could not see or understand the name of that ancient civilization or I may not have been careful or refined enough to perceive it.

Instead, I was curious to find out more clearly what that period of time was, and as far as I could tell, I was able to see, in summary, some images from 95-98 million years ago, perhaps even older. The race of those humanoid beings has evolved over time and undergone many transformations. Eventually, it disappeared, but various information in its DNA was passed on to many other types of humanoid civilizations that followed one another over time, also from the planetary system of the star Sirius A, until the characteristics of the current Sirian race came into being.

In the images I watched, the typology of beings in that extremely old Sirian civilization was quite similar to humans, even if their average height was higher, about six and half feet. Their skin was pearly white with a slight bluish tinge, and most of the hair was black with shades of dark blue. Their eyes were larger than those of an ordinary human being, but their mouths were smaller.

From the beginning, I was impressed by the harmony of their features and especially by the dignified attire as well as the integrity of their character that radiated from the way they moved and acted. These traits have been transmitted, through eons of time, to today's Sirians.

It seems that their ancestors knew their own constellation quite well, but also the constellation Orion, a region which they had once inhabited, forming colonies.* Later, these populations individualized and were "remade" by hybridization with other alien races. This was presented to me holographically through combinations of the original DNA with other types of DNA in different proportions and variants, each indicated by vibrating waves of color, more or less intense, in comparison with the typology of the physical structure of the respective race in order to be able to more easily identify the particularity of the hybridizations.

[FOOTNOTE: * The constellation referred to is Canis Majoris which includes the star Sirius A, the brightest in the sky.]

CIVILIZATIONS DERIVED OVER 30 MILLION YEARS

The images with the typology of those races followed one another for several seconds at such a high speed that I could hardly distinguish nearly any features. On the screen, there was a single image of an approximate prototype which “traversed” hundreds of body transformations, portraying a very fast development to the current state. I immediately understood that I was being shown in that way the passage of an enormous period of time and the succession of civilizations derived from the one I saw at the beginning, each represented by the basic typology of beings. The “development” stopped after an interval of about 29-30 million years, but I did not notice significant differences in the bodily forms of those civilizations. They all seemed to “revolve” around the same characteristics. The civilization representing the final images was also technologically advanced and dominated interstellar travel. In a way, it looked like a replica of the one of about 100 million years ago except that the skin of those Sirian creatures was a little bluer. Everything seemed a replay of what I had already seen in the beginning, as in the case of the first civilization, and this included the colonization of stellar systems in the constellations around the star Sirius A as well as hybridizations with other races.

THE ART OF TERRAFORMATION

I noticed then that the Earth was one of the “soul” planets of the ancient Sirians, “shepherded” by them with patience and perseverance. The experience they had accumulated in the hundreds of thousands of years of cosmic evolution made them understand that, when it came to the transformation of the planetary biosphere, it had to be done gradually and over a long period of time. I was shown, for example, the effect of “terraforming” on a natural satellite around a planet in a binary star system where the ecosystem did not keep up with the transformation of the atmosphere and consequently dried up. There were violent storms and most of the vegetation burned. That failure was probably an important lesson for them, otherwise that cosmic event would not have been presented to me on the holographic screen. It then took a long time for the natural habitat on that satellite to be recreated and adjusted properly. That is why, when the problem arose, their plan to terraform the Earth stretched out for hundreds and even thousands of years in order to allow the biosphere to adapt, stabilize, and grow naturally and sustainably.

WHAT I SAW ON EARTH AT THE END OF THE CRETACEOUS PERIOD

In those days, the soil of our planet was largely covered with evergreen forests.* I understood this very quickly because the images showed me a rapid succession of regions around the globe with “zooms” that always depicted cones of specific trees but never deciduous (where trees turn colors with the season and the leaves fall in autumn) forests or flowers. Instead, I was shown fairly large areas with cacti. Generally speaking, the plants at that time, but especially the trees, ferns and cacti were much larger than they are today.

[FOOTNOTE: * From the author’s description, this could be a period between 68-69 million years ago and 65 million years ago which, scientifically speaking, corresponds to the end of the Cretaceous period, but it also captures the beginning of the Paleogene (66-23 million years ago).]

In those extremely distant times, the Earth’s atmosphere contained much more carbon dioxide, and the planet’s magnetic field was more intense. In an image that was shown to me from a height of a few tens of kilometers above the ground, I could see that there was a lot of dust in the atmosphere, and the light from the Sun was filtered by it so that the sky appeared yellow-orange. In no images did I see the clear blue sky we see today nor the sun shining in the sky. Everything was foggy, about the same as during a weaker sandstorm in the Sahara. I was then shown images of the Earth as seen from the heavens, from an altitude that I estimated to be at about 800-1000 kilometers. All I could see in the area around it and even farther away in space was cosmic dust.

Next, images of snapshots from various climatic environments on the planet appeared successively on the screen; that is, I was being shown the stage of life on our planet at that time on Earth, almost 100 million years ago. The plants were bluish green, sometimes reddish-brown. The vegetation was lush, not with deciduous forests, but rather with large fleshy cactus and aloe-like leafy plants that were very succulent. The aquatic environment, however, was more developed with huge algae and many living things of all kinds. On land, there were only reptiles in various forms and insects of a great variety, but there were no mammals. Also, I was not shown and did not see in the images of that period any intelligent beings on our planet.

After that first stage of viewing, I remembered two main ideas. First, there were no deciduous forests or flowers on Earth at that time. On the other hand, there was a lot of dust both in the planet's atmosphere and in the cosmic space in its vicinity, and this blocked the sunlight considerably.

STAGNATION OF EVOLUTION ON THE PLANET

The holographic images that I was surveying were not particularized but rather offered me an overview, as a whole, so that I could know what was on our planet then. I later realized that the purpose of that presentation was to give me a comparative picture of how the Earth had developed up to that time and what followed through the terraforming initiated by the Sirian ancestors. For them, the Earth was well located in the Solar System, and its gravity was suitable for their body structure, adapted to the specific radiation of the star Sirius A but similar in some respects to that emitted by our Sun.

There were, however, also disadvantages. First, the atmosphere was not a very good composition for the beings of that ancient civilization as the “air” could not be breathed for a long time without a protective helmet. On the other hand, genetic studies have shown that the Earth has long since reached a state of stagnation in its evolution. The ancient Sirian civilization realized that, even if it had initiated the process of terraforming the planet, it would have little to change in those conditions due to the modest biological material that existed then. Additionally, their scientific teams noted that, at the biological level, the genetic combinations that existed on the planet were still quite simple. There is not, practically speaking, a great variety of those combinations, neither in the vegetable nor in the animal kingdom. This was all the more astonishing as the flora and fauna, terrestrial or aquatic, were quite rich.

SIRIAN AND ADMIRAL INTERVENTION

The question then arose of making this planet evolve further. The stages of such a process appeared and followed one another very quickly on the screen. First was the purification of the “air” by removing the fine and abundant dust. Next was oxygen enrichment of the atmosphere and making more complex genetic hybridization in order for life on the planet to evolve.

I then saw the flagship of that advanced civilization: huge and spherical, about the size of our Moon. The image then “slipped” inside the ship and was fixed in a room with white arches of huge dimensions. In the middle of it was what we might call a “round table” with several representatives of that civilization who were part of the leadership of the ship. Everyone present wore a silver-white suit with blue inserts, like long lines, along the arms and torso. Telepathically, through the inter-dimensional headset, I understood that they were discussing the possibilities of boosting evolution on our planet and its terraforming.

Everyone there had some gadgets which we would now associate with older tablets. To them, however, they were like thin silvery and almost transparent sheets that could be bent but could also be as hard as ordinary tablets. I saw, for example, how some of the people at the table rolled that tablet, others folded it, and others kept it rigid in its rectangular shape.

ORMA

The following images showed the same room, but at that meeting, I also saw a woman. A quick succession of snapshots of her showed me that she was the head of the research department of their galactic mission: a tall blue-eyed woman with shiny silver-blond hair named Orma. I estimated her age to be about forty-five terrestrial years. She was standing, actively explaining on the basis of holograms that appeared from a slit in the center of the round table.

I was then shown images on the holographic screen which correlated with her particular activity. Orma’s specialization on that ship was biology, but this term had a much more comprehensive meaning than we know today. Just as for the Apellos, and for Méntia in particular, medicine means much more than is conceived by our current science. Orma was a very good researcher, specializing in a field that we could now call “planetary nano-biology” as that Sirian woman had a deep knowledge of the quantum field, nano-machines, high energies and fundamental forces, gravity in particular.

The studies that ancient civilization were conducting in our galaxy involved a lot of stellar systems and planets. The flagship I saw was one of the study ships in this area of the galaxy. Orma was mainly involved in the operations of transforming a planet into a habitat suitable for the life of those extraterrestrial beings or simply facilitating the evolution of civilizations that already existed on those planets. Seeing that the ancient Sirian race had, in fact, many colonies in various parts of the galaxy, I immediately understood that it was about the process of “terraforming”, a very complex action with many variables.

I was then shown pictures of Orma on Earth, accompanied by a research team. All the members of the team had a kind of mask on their face around their mouth and nose. It seems that the pressure and general climatic conditions were suitable for their body because they did not wear a space suit, but only the respective mask, probably for purifying the air they breathed. The team took samples from different soil, water and plant environments. I then saw pictures of Orma again, but I realized that they came from another period, probably years later, because the Sirian woman had her hair arranged differently and her face was more mature. I understood that she had already studied the Earth problem on the basis of the data collected and the appropriate technologies and had come up with a set of proposals to present to the Admiral’s Council.

Orma analyzed in depth the structure of DNA in the vegetation and fauna that existed at that time on Earth and observed that the different combinations of DNA, as well as biological exchanges at the atomic level, were actually quite complex, but they had reached a maximum threshold of “crossing” (hybridization) beyond which there was no possibility of evolution. She, however, came up with a solution. In order to further drive evolution, she said that a permanent constant field of force was needed to act upon the Earth’s biosphere. The possibility of bringing plants and animals from other planets to integrate them on Earth was discussed, but the result would have been uncertain; and, in any case, only local with the length of their duration being relative. We saw how she demonstrated this through the complex simulations she exhibited holographically.

TERRAFORMATION AND A LONG TERM

COMPLEX SOLUTION FOR THE EARTH

The ancient Sirian civilization needed a general terraforming of our planet in order to ensure a habitat suitable for the life for its population. Local action, restricted to only one area or certain areas of the planet, would not have been enough. That is why the council of the flagship opted for the second variant presented by Orma, that which involved the action of a gigantic overall force field which would influence DNA, plant life, and animal life on Earth in a constant and profound way. In other words, they decided on a complex, profound and overall terraforming of the planet which would eventually lead to the biosphere we know today.

Due to the vast experience they already had in this field, the members of that civilization were in no hurry, for they knew that such terraforming could take hundreds of terrestrial years or even longer, but even so, it would be much shorter than the singular action of Nature, if it were to take place under the same conditions. In a way, it reminded me of what Elinor said about the Sirians of ancient times being like “alchemists of the planets” because their mode of action resembled that of the alchemists of the Middle Ages in their laboratory. Through the operations performed on matter, they hastened the cycles of Nature in a harmonious way, respecting its laws.

In her presentation, Orma showed that the force of the giant field to be “applied” to the Earth had to meet an interesting condition: it was to act for a long time, but it had to nonetheless be variable. In quick succession, I saw how Orma presented her very complex calculations and simulations to the members of the Council. She pointed out that, if the energy of the force field was continuous, then biological life would “get used” to it after a while which would again lead to a “flattening” of evolution on Earth. But, if that energy had a periodic variation, then the premises of some biologically active combinations would have been fulfilled, and life would continue to be invigorated.

At that time, it was not yet clear what that huge field of energy would generate. Orma had presented only the idea and calculations that showed the parameters necessary for it to be effective on life on Earth. The idea was good, but it did not solve the problem of dust in the atmosphere and in the more distant space of the planet, a factor which significantly obscured the sunlight, preventing it from reaching the surface. If the cosmic dust had been removed from around the planet, there would have been more sunlight, the atmosphere would have become more ionized, the rains would have been more abundant, and life would have had more possibilities for development. The reason for this is that a more favorable environment would have been created so that the energy from the Sun and from outer space could reach the Earth on a much wider spectrum of frequencies. To fulfill this idea, one of the solutions was to vacuum the dust around the planet, but I was then shown how Orma was inspired to unite the two ideas: terraforming the planet through that external force field and “cleaning” the dust from around the Earth in a single action.

A USEFUL COMPARISON

As I watched the synthesis of images of those events in the mists of time, I once again realized the very harmonious and integrated way in which beneficial alien civilizations which are technologically advanced contribute to the evolution of life on some planets in the Universe. They do not act selfishly and arrogantly as do some scientists on Earth today, fully confident in their own strength, but who, in reality, no longer understand any of the mysteries of Creation. Such advanced extraterrestrial civilizations are always connected with the higher celestial forces and beings with divine inspiration, and within them there are beings who are highly evolved from a spiritual point of view who support and guide their actions. In such civilizations, we can speak of a close co-operation between science and spirituality which makes them so advanced. Only in such a case can one get an overview of how the universe “works” and what life actually means at this level.

Comparatively speaking, the materialistic view of current science on Earth and the early stage of understanding the universe places us at a lower hierarchical level among the most advanced civilizations in the galaxy. When scientists are ecstatic at the thought of finding “extraterrestrial life” on Mars in the form of microbes or bacteria, when conventional energy sources based primarily on oil and coal are still in use, when the entire planet is under the “curtain” of a crude manipulation which states that “we are alone in the whole universe because we have not found anyone else so far”, all of this is more like a praise of stupidity than the promotion of competence and good sense. Even though, in reality, superior technologies exist and were invented on Earth, very few human beings have access to them, and many of them are locked in safes only out of petty financial interests. The vast majority of the planet’s population struggles in the likeness of the “contemporary Middle Ages” being maintained by various means in utter ignorance. Under these conditions, it is difficult to aspire to the stars or to turn your attention to your spiritual evolution.

My mental digression lasted only a few seconds because the man from Apellos immediately drew my attention to keep focus on the subject. The images had already begun to be blurred, and some on the right side of the screen had completely frozen. I have had such “experiences” in other viewings as well, so I knew how to get back “in the game” without having to reset the original idea. I turned my attention to Orma’s image and reconnected to the holographic screen through the one-dimensional headset which favored this process.

THE COMPLEXITY OF A BRILLIANT IDEA

Orma’s idea was for that fluctuating force field to encompass the entire planet and “envelop” it like a halo of energy. To achieve this, she proposed bringing a cosmic body with a sufficiently large mass around the Earth to meet both requirements: to drive the evolution of the plant and animal kingdoms on the planet and to help “aspire” the cosmic dust around it.

I saw the hologram in which Orma explained, in summary, the effects that that body in the vicinity of the Earth would have had on our planet at that time. I even saw a kind of graph that displayed in parallel the frequencies of energy that had come from the Sun until then and the frequencies that could have been added after the “cleaning” of the dust around the planet and its atmosphere. The images also showed the evolution of the DNA of different plants and animals, indicating the initial genes, and later, under the action of new frequencies of solar and cosmic energy, the way in which branches appeared in those genes and how various combinations of them were made, i.e. an obvious development in complexity.

The cosmic object that would have produced all those substantial changes for life on our planet — from the suction of dust from the surrounding cosmic space to the influence of the specific force field on the DNA of plants and in general of all living things, in combination with the much more complex action of energy and sunlight — would also have led to other possibilities for the multiplication and development of all these living things. Up to that time in our planet's evolution, we could only speak of vegetative reproduction,* especially through spores, dominating the muscles and ferns. The low frequencies of solar energy and microwaves from the light from the Sun were filtered for the most part because the heat and the penetrating high frequency waves managed to pass through the “dam” of dust in the immediate vicinity of the Earth. But, once the solution proposed by Orma was used, the frequency range would have increased, favoring much more energy and biochemical exchanges, both in the vegetable and animal kingdoms. The diversity of plants would have “exploded”, and this would have generated a greater amount of oxygen in the atmosphere over time. In other images I was later shown various kinds of plants which had not existed before but which later developed in a spectacular way. For example there was no grass at that time, only low plants with large fleshy leaves or hanging plants. Anticipating a little, I saw images that showed me the dry areas of the planet, some time after the beginning of its terraforming, covered with various types of grass, some of it very high.

* Vegetative reproduction in plants is a particular type of asexual reproduction by non-specialized asexual germs. The offspring is generated by a single parent. Thus, the new individual results from a fragment of the parental body. In most plants, vegetative reproduction is achieved through vegetative organs: stems, roots, and leaves. The cells return to the embryonic stage and divide intensely, giving rise to a new plant. Vegetative propagation can be achieved by buds on the roots, by creeping stems, by underground stems (such as bulbs, rhizomes or tubers) or by fragments of stems or leaves (cuttings).

 Some terrestrial plants reproduce by spores. In this case, we are talking about specialized asexual reproduction. They are specialized single-celled asexual germs that form in certain organs in muscles and ferns.

Orma's idea later became a concept for which she became famous in many planetary systems. Since then, the civilization of the ancient Sirians has understood and widely applied this idea with multiple effects by using galactic energies and placing them in precisely calculated points of reference to the massive evolution of life which, by reason of their presence and specific field, in combination with other influences of some cosmic energies, precisely influences and correlates certain processes of evolution, all depending upon what is needed.

The same mode of action was used much later, over eons of time, when the descendants of that ancient Syrian civilization, along with other advanced extraterrestrial civilizations, proceeded to accurately determine and influence the creation of the human race. By spending long periods of time, thousands or even tens of thousands of terrestrial years, their huge ships, like planetoids, placed in certain precise areas of a planet or satellite, were able to wisely influence the evolution of life without violating the laws of nature. This resulted in a significant but harmonious acceleration of the evolution towards the natural course of things.

This idea should not surprise us too much though. Even if a forest is planted and has to wait for several decades for trees to grow and become towering, it significantly influences the surrounding ecosystem whereas, if left to itself, nature would have taken a much longer time to accomplish the task. This analogy is all the more evident when intervening at the cosmic level through terraforming and other large-scale actions which take into account the development and evolution of biological life on an entire planet.

COSMIC VERSIONS AT A PRACTICAL LEVEL

After it was decided to implement that brilliant idea that Orma had, we saw the development of a huge activity in the flagship in which thousands of beings worked together using advanced technology, especially to perform time simulations of processes, possibilities and effects that may occur. I understood from what was presented to me that this was a huge and extremely complex job which involved a huge effort on the part of those on the flagship.

After the results of the simulations were obtained and it was found that such an action would indeed mean an extraordinary leap in the evolution of life on Earth, the question of choosing the most appropriate method to achieve this concretely was raised. One solution proposed the actual construction of a huge object to be placed in the vicinity of the Earth which would be equivalent to building a new planet-sized ship. This, however, would have involved a special effort, even for that advanced civilization. At that time, the ships of the ancient Sirians, even if huge, were still made of materials, i.e. they contained metals and tangible physical elements, including gold and titanium, but also other metals with very special properties that are unknown to us even today, but all of this was physical material. As was shown to me in numerous suggestive images, the technology for making such a giant star-shaped spaceship had not yet been reached relative to the technology of today's Sirian civilization and other technologically advanced civilizations, such as the Arcturians.

Another proposal was to "tow" a natural satellite of Jupiter or Saturn and place it in orbit, but this would have involved a number of other major issues, such as the difficulty of dealing with the mass of that satellite, a mass which would almost certainly not have matched the one resulting from the calculations and simulations. To this would have been added certain specific side effects on the "donor" planet by reason of removing the satellite from its own life, and all of the accompanying influences it had on it. It was then argued that Jupiter and Saturn were gaseous planets, lifeless in the physical plane, and the "gap" left by taking one of their many satellites would therefore not have left too large of an impact.

Then came the idea of bringing a gas satellite with a liquid core, a situation which would have a large volume and could have influenced the biosphere of our planet. While I was watching with great interest all of those variants that were presented to me, as they were brought into discussion and debated in those very long ago times, I still allowed myself a digression on the last variant. The possibility of a satellite being gaseous with a liquid core caught my eye. I knew a lot about such a problem because I had discussed this with Dr. Xien not so long ago. Water in the cosmos is something fundamental. This is not the "drinking water" we know, of course, but it is much more like "heavy" water, and in my previous views on the holographic screen, it was even shown to me at one point that the angles between the oxygen atom and the two hydrogen atoms are different in the case of this cosmic “water” as compared to ordinary water. That is why its properties are very different. Such water appears to be almost black, but it is liquid and extremely “energetic”. Around such a nucleus of “water”, which is generated by the central black hole that supports the formation of that planet or satellite concerned, gas or weight gathers by accretion but also by specific internal transformations. All of these are controlled, of course, by the “will” of the central black hole of that cosmic object.

REPLACING A SATELLITE

With great attention, I continued to watch the extraordinary images on the holographic screen concerning the implementation of the solution proposed by Orma. From the versions suggested so far, I had seen that an interesting suggestion was received at one point from a higher echelon of that ancient civilization. Those on the ship were told that an idea for solving the problem could be to use one of the huge spaceships already in use, a vehicle which would approach, both in shape, size and mass, the conditions, calculations, and simulations of the project proposed by Orma. That ingenious solution would have been much easier to apply and present fewer technological problems than the other solutions highlighted so far.

This suggestion particularly impressed the members of the Council from the flagship. It was a “handy” solution which could also be “adjusted”. The very flagship of that civilization was chosen which, at that time, was the largest of their ships, but it was already “obsolete”, having been in service for several thousand years. We then saw how they calculated the compensation of the mass of that ship with the accretion of interplanetary dust and rock debris still gravitating around the Earth until the ship reached the size and volume required by Orma’s project to meet the proposed purpose. I was amazed at the complexity of those calculations and the solutions found to meet all of the conditions so that the influence of the ship on the Earth would lead to the desired transformations. Of these, the exposure of only one face of the Moon to Earth was extraordinarily calculated and realized because, if the spacecraft had a different angular velocity around its axis, the full exposure of its surface would have led to the implementation of other types of frequencies of energy in the Earth's biosphere. I understood that this was not necessary for the transformation of life on the surface of the planet as was desired by the ancient Sirian civilization. We will have effective proof of these aspects when the Moon gradually begins to change its parameters and slowly reveal its hidden part which is currently not visible.

The flagship that became the Moon, or the so-called "natural" satellite of the Earth, was a huge ship. As shown in the pictures, the center of the ship was actually a hollow spherical space with many "rays" flowing inward, resembling "icicles." I could see that they played the role of a kind of "energy concentrator" because I saw how those huge white lightning-like arches flowed through those "rays" at certain precise intervals of time, uniting right in the middle of the empty space of the sphere. This created a certain amount of plasma in the middle, after which the energy from that plasma was extracted through a complicated process which I understood neither in principle nor in terms of technology. It was clear to me, however, that in terms of energy, they had been using nuclear fusion technology ever since and not fission technology such as is currently used on Earth.*

[FOOTNOTE: *Current science defines nuclear fusion as the process by which two atomic nuclei interact to form a new nucleus, heavier (with higher mass) than the original nuclei. As a result of fusion, other subatomic particles are produced such as neutrons or alpha particles (helium nuclei) or beta particles (electrons or positrons). At the opposite pole is nuclear fission. It is the process by which the nucleus of an atom breaks into two or more smaller nuclei, called fission products, as well as into a number of individual subatomic particles.]

THE INTERIOR OF THE "MOON"

In pragmatic terms, the Sirians created a little blue-white "sun" in the center of the ship which provided the ship's energy needs. The ship itself had a concentric structure based upon the principle of "onion leaves". Seeing this in the holographic presentation, I better understood my short "voyage" inside the Moon, that is, of the flagship, which I had made on the occasion of doubling into the etheric plane. I did not, however, reach the "fusion center" of the ship inside the empty spherical space. The fusion center concentrated energy through the giant "rays", and by carefully following the holographic projections, I was able to form a fairly clear picture of the structure of our “natural satellite”. In the short time I spent “moving” inside the Moon, I noticed only the common elements that can be found on spaceships.

Some of the spaces were truly gigantic, the size of cities. The feeling of immensity I had about those spaces would probably have been even more pronounced if I had seen everything lit up and working as it once was tens of millions of years ago. I also went through small compartmentalized areas, even seeing spaces that were probably used as homes as well as spaces dedicated to technology.

On the first “ad-hoc” voyage within the Moon, I did not reach the Great Meeting Room of the Ship’s Steering Board which met there in those astonishingly distant times. Although I could see this in images on the holographic screen, I was not “attracted” to that space, did not know of its existence, nor was I able to identify it. But then, in some of the subsequent experiences I had with Eden, I specifically wanted to get there and was glad to be the silent witness of a space that I still consider loaded with a deep emotion, that space in which Orma presented her project of fundamental transformation of life on Earth for the first time. In the enigmatic twilight inside that very large room, as I was perceiving it in the etheric plane, I stood for a long time, moving slowly, passing by the table and those tall and rather narrow armchairs, looking at the huge arches or the holographic projection slot through which the holograms of the different stages and versions of the project appeared. I mention that it was in the etheric plane because, if viewed from the physical plane, everything would have been shrouded in the deepest darkness. I lived through those unique moments several times with a deep emotion because they have decided, in a way, the very future of planet Earth.

Looking at the images of different areas inside, I realized that the flagship had been built more like a conglomerate of self-styled “cities” traveling through space. It was not a strict compartmentalization such as those found in small and medium-sized ships, but there was a real biosphere, a very well-generated and controlled living environment. I saw countless elevators that were very sophisticated and astonishingly fast. They were train-like but winding and were a more aerodynamic means of transport. There were also flying vehicles of many types, but they were propelled without combustion. During the period when it was operational, the flagship was a very large and complex habitat.

THE GREAT COSMIC CATACLYSM AND ITS INFLUENCE ON THE EARTH

As the Moon was placed in a calculated orbit around the Earth and began to “suck” the abundant cosmic dust around our planet, I saw how its gravitational force was amplified in order to be able to attract as much of the dust around the Earth as possible. The process was long. Gradually, the interplanetary dust was “sucked in” and settled on the outer shell of the spacecraft, making a crust that was not too thick. From my assessments, based upon what I was seeing in the exposures on the holographic screen, I estimated the “crust” of the moon to be about twenty kilometers thick on average as the thickness varied from area to area. For example, we saw in the areas where there were deposits of cosmic matter by reason accretion, there was a much greater thickness than in other areas, almost double.

At that time, both the new satellite and our planet were massively bombarded by meteorites which came from a large cosmic cataclysm that had taken place between Mars and Jupiter. This was a planet, which had orbited that region of the Solar System and which was about the size of Uranus and was the largest planet in its “family”, that was destroyed and shattered.* Generally speaking, contemporary scientists rule out this truth and consider it only a hypothesis. They consider other causes for the asteroid belt between Mars and Jupiter, none of which are logically supported. It is true, however, that when I wanted to see details about that terrible cosmic event, it was not allowed. The holographic screen no longer responded, becoming somewhat blurred. It was the second time this had happened to me, having previously been blocked in occult chamber in Egypt when I was also not allowed to see details of those reptilian beings. We have noticed that such concealments occur only in two situations: either there are no personal affinities to connect with the requested subject, or this is simply not allowed by higher celestial entities for reasons beyond our comprehension.

[FOOTNOTE: *In literature, this planet is referred to as Maldek or Tiamat (see also the books of Zecharia Sitchin).]

[FOOTNOTE: One of the commonly accepted theories in the current scientific environment is that the remnants that make up the asteroid belt between Mars and Jupiter are actually remnants of a “proto-planetary disk”. They range in composition from a mixture of ice and dust to volcanic rock, indicating multiple origins. The explanation is that a significant part of the asteroids comes from “former comets”. Described as “dirty lumps” of ice and dust, comets are lonely objects with elliptical orbits around the Sun. Researchers in France and the United States have developed a mathematical model of the development of the Solar System corresponding to the period when the planets were just forming. According to this simulation, the large planets Jupiter, Saturn, Uranus and Neptune were much closer to the Sun. As the planets grew in size, the researchers say their orbits became increasingly unstable so that, after about 600 million years, Uranus and Neptune were “thrown” into other orbits. According to the current scientific scenario, they collided with a disc made up of comets, scattering the latter throughout the Solar System. Many of them were later captured by the gravitational force of the asteroid belt where they remain to this day. In our opinion, and if we want to be truly objective, we would say that this “hypothesis” of scientists contains more fanciful and improbable elements than that of the author. In addition, what Radu Cinamar says about the planet Tiamat and its explosion is also mentioned in other works (see the volumes of Zecharia Sitchin) which are based on mentions from antiquity about such a cosmic cataclysm.]

I was able to see, however, some interesting details about that great cosmic cataclysm. This was about 65-70 million years in the past, that is, when scientists correctly identified that “something happened on the Earth and dinosaurs suddenly disappeared as a result of a terrible phenomenon, that planet exploded”.* Because of its immense size, the planet had subtly determined the evolution of dinosaurs on Earth, especially by the influence of gravity and the gigantic radiation it had. After exploding, the subtle energetic support disappeared in the process of developing dinosaur DNA.

[FOOTNOTE: * Contemporary scientists believe that the Earth was impacted with a huge meteorite of about 10 km in diameter somewhere in the Yucatan Peninsula between where Mexico and Guatemala are today, in the area called Chicxulub.]

This theory of scientists, however, is a bit hairy. To say that the dinosaurs on Earth have been completely exterminated because of the devastating impact with a large meteorite is a lot. So, how do you explain the discovery of dinosaur bones that lived even 5-10 million years after that planetary cataclysm? In reality, as I was shown in eloquent images, the dinosaurs gradually disappeared, not necessarily because of the impact of the great meteorite but because their DNA was no longer supported by the specific energy of the planet between Mars and Jupiter which exploded. The structure of the macromolecule has “worn out”, “fallen”, and the remaining dinosaur species on Earth have disappeared over time.

Other animal species were favored which were energetically supported by the subtle influences of the other planets, and to these were added the climate changes that occurred during that period. The new satellite helped capture a significant portion of the fragments and remnants of matter and rock that came from the great explosion of the planet between Mars and Jupiter, largely mitigating the effect of the devastating impact upon Earth. This prevented the destruction of a significant part of the planet’s biosphere, an eventuality which could have taken place if the new satellite had not been in the sky. Thus, the flagship of the Sirian civilization of those times became what we today call the Moon.

Other planets have also captured significant parts of the big planet that was destroyed by the explosion. This also applies to the satellites of the big planet, some of which were “stolen”, thus becoming satellites of other planets in the Solar System. As was shown to me in the images, Jupiter is such an example, even serving as an anomaly in this regard. Normally, a planet has “layers” of satellites in a well-established order, i.e. those closest to it are small satellites with larger satellites in the middle orbits; and in the orbits farthest from the planet, we find again small satellites. In the case of Jupiter, however, it is found that there are large satellites even beyond the second layer of small satellites. As such, they could not occupy those orbits unless they were “captured” from space.

Another example, as I saw in the images, is represented by the two satellites of Mars, Phobos and Deimos, which, in reality, represent two large fragments of the planet that exploded, being then drawn into orbit around the Red Planet. Moreover, scientists, and not just them, should ask themselves the common sense question: How is it possible for an asteroid belt that is the result of the explosion of a planet, like the one between Mars and Jupiter, to have innumerable remains of modest dimensions, and yet have some massive asteroids or asteroids amongst its orbit, such as Ceres or Vesta, both of appreciable size and have a spherical shape?* Where does this discrepancy come from? In reality, they are satellites of the former planet which were not “expelled” but remained in the interplanetary area.

[FOOTNOTE: *Ceres has a diameter of 945 km and Vesta has a diameter of 525 km. There are two more asteroids close to them, Pallas and Hygiea, each with a diameter of between 350 and 550 km. These celestial bodies (Ceres is considered a planetoid) make up about half of the mass of the entire asteroid belt between Mars and Jupiter which consists of millions of debris and fragments of rocks, ice and matter.]

THE APPEARANCE OF FLOWERS ON EARTH

After the new satellite began its “duties”, flowering plants gradually began to appear on Earth. This is already a significant change in the flora of the planet. The leap to this level occurred mainly because the action of silver in plants was strongly influenced by the fact that the Moon was present in the planet’s sky. In her research, Orma had already reported the presence of large amounts of copper, gold, and silver in plants on Earth before the Moon was placed in its orbit. According to the calculations made by the scientific teams on the flagship, the influence of the Moon was dynamic; and in addition to this, the huge flagship changed its position to Earth several times at certain intervals according to the need of subtle astral influences coming from the other main cosmic bodies, stars or planets.*

[FOOTNOTE: *Some ancient philosophers, such as Democritus and Anaxagoras, mention in their writings that there was a time in human history when the Moon could not be seen at night in the sky.]

The biochemical bonds in plants that the Moon has caused over time, through its subtle energetic influence, have led to the appearance and development of flowers on Earth. The first flowers appeared on cacti as they were the most numerous on the planet at the time. I saw how, in the early stages, types of fleshy petals appeared, after which they developed until they reached the stage of flowers as we know them today. Only after this fundamental transformation in plant life on our planet ended, and it applied to animal life as well, did the gigantic ship stabilize in its current orbit, thus establishing the characteristics by which we know it today.

THE TASTE OF TIME

At this point, the presentation on the holographic screen was abruptly interrupted, leaving me almost in a state of reverie. I felt that this was not only about the originality of the information but also about the very fine subtle influence of the extremely distant time to which I had somehow had acquired indirect access to through that presentation. This left a special “taste” in my being, activating deep and unsuspected emotions in me.

Finally, I said goodbye to the man from Apellos and the team there and headed to Alpha Base. A few hours after I had arrived, Cezar saw that I was quite troubled, but I did not need to tell him anything. He immediately sensed the cause and brought me hot tea as we both went to the building where Eden was. I felt better in the elegant and very high technology room. I think that what I really wanted was for myself to “go” to those ancestral times so as to have the feeling of actually living in those colossally distant times.

The images on the holographic screen had planted the seed of longing for those ancient places and times, and now all I had to do was carefully develop access to them with the help of the “space-time machine”. I have not succeeded so far, but something else happened soon after, something that fed my soul at least as much. I looked through the very wide window at the black sky of the cold clear night with the stars creeping into my soul with drops of sweet nostalgia. I remembered a similar moment years ago, when the emotion of unknown distances had engulfed me in the same place at the Base, after Cezar’s disturbing story of Professor Constantine and the cave of the Golden Thrones. Then, just as I had looked at the stars with great longing, so I would bring them to my soul now. I did not suspect, however, that my hopes would be fulfilled sooner than I expected.

Epilogue — by Peter Moon

Soon after the publication of this book in the Romanian language, the world has suffered a social lockdown by reason of the COVID-19 crisis. As this lockdown is even more severe in Romania than in the United States, my travel to that country has been restricted. None of this, however, has restricted my own writing or the general business of Sky Books. In fact, this book, The Etheric Crystal, was turned around faster than any of other of Radu's past works. We do not expect to receive the next edition of this series until next year (2021), and when we do, we will turn it around as quickly as possible. You can check our website for any new publications at www.skybooksusa.com.

With regard to the book you have just read, I have but one comment to make and that is regard to the general thesis of this book itself. By that, I am referring to Mémentia's concern about the degeneration of human DNA and the prospect of transforming the vibrational frequency of such so as to improve the lot of Mankind. She also alludes to the political complications and selfish issues that impede the technology of the Inner Earth from being accessible to the surface world.

In Radu's previous work, Forgotten Genesis, it was stated that extraterrestrial civilizations which were already contaminated by the reach of evil reptilians began to weave a very complicated network of intrigues and plans for total control of the planet. In respect to this, I have taken on a project to expose such evil by collaborating with Douglas Dietrich, a former Defense Department Research Librarian who worked at the Presidio military base in San Francisco and was an expert in document destruction. Our first work is tentatively titled The Roswell Deception and Demystification of World War II which will be released soon after publication of The Etheric Crystal. It reveals a considerable amount of lies that have been perpetrated upon the population of the United States by the Office of War Information and its successors, and it includes astonishing revelations about the so-called Roswell Incident of July 5, 1947 and the how the history of World War II has been corrupted and perverted to maintain control of public perception. We will follow this book up with an exposé of satanism in the U.S. military, all of which will lead to another book on artificial intelligence and the geopolitics of the world. This is some of the most exciting work I have ever been involved in, and it is my hope that this will improve the general understanding of the population towards the more evolved state of humanity that Radu has suggested.
