A mysterious scientist by the name of David Anderson made an eventful trip to Romania in 1999. Dr. Anderson, who is credited by the U.S. government as having developed advanced time-warp field technology, established diplomatic connections on this trip to Romania where he also set up an advanced research facility dedicated to studying the mathematics of time travel.

Upon his return to the United States, Dr. Anderson visited Preston Nichols and Peter Moon, internationally known authors of "The Montauk Project: Experiments in Time," and introduced himself. At Dr. Anderson's suggestion, a collaboration with Peter Moon began which was brief, tenuous and eventually aborted due to security considerations as a result of a logistical attack on a similar time research center that had been set up on Long Island. Dr. Anderson's continued journeys to Romania eventually resulted in connecting Peter Moon with a Romanian publisher and Radu Cinamar, a member of the Romanian Intelligence Service's occult department. The purpose of this collaboration has to do with what is arguably the most significant archaeological discovery in the history of Mankind: a mysterious holographic hall of records that utilizes technology far beyond the concepts of modern science. "Transylvanian Sunrise" is the story of this mysterious discovery and the political intrigue surrounding it, all capably told by Radu Cinamar.

After a five year hiatus in their relationship and after Peter Moon secured the publishing rights to this remarkable story, Dr. Anderson invited him to Romania where he has pursued these mysteries one step further. The story is inside this book and waiting to be read.

Peter Moon at the Romanian Sphinx in the Bucegi Mountains in 2009

Introduction — By Peter Moon

It was after four o'clock in the morning that I found myself in the back seat of a van that was not only ascending the alps of Transylvania but was doing so at a very rapid pace. The date was July 29th, 2008, and all I could see were deeply forested hills to either side and a short span of a ruggedly paved road that lay ahead. The higher the elevation and the more precarious the road conditions became, the more the Romanian driver seemed to push on the accelerator.

It was only then that I began to fully realize that I had just flown halfway around the world and was in a very strange country. Not only that, I was in the backyard of Dracula's famous realm. Looking at my two companions, I sensed they might be having similar thoughts.

My two companions were Tantra Bensko and Dr. Joel Castellanos. Tantra is a multi-talented artist who I asked to accompany me for the purpose of taking video footage. Joel is a professor of mathematics at the University of New Mexico and specializes in a branch of chaos theory that is known as fractals.

Earlier during our journey from the airport in Bucharest, we had joked about Joel being likened to the chaos scientist in the movie Jurassic Park. Now, as we travelled at a rapid clip up the alps of Transylvania, the atmosphere was a little more tension packed. The joke was revisited but it was a little less funny and a little more serious. None of us knew exactly where in the hell we were really going. If there was anyone who had less reason to be frightened or concerned, it was me because I was the only one who actually knew the man who had arranged for us to fly to Romania in the first place.

This mysterious and unexpected trip to the alps was actually the result of a mistake. Our midnight accommodations in Sinaia, a quaint mountain town known as the gateway to Transylvania, had fallen through. When this was discovered, the driver put me in touch with our Romanian sponsor by cell phone. He explained the problem and asked if it would be all right if we went to a mountain resort for the evening instead. I accepted.

Thus it was that the three of us ended up on a wild mountain ride in the wee hours of the morning. Our routine travel plans having fallen through, it was now clear that our visit had turned into an adventure with some very unpredictable elements.

Now that I have told you of our mysterious circumstances on the outskirts of Transylvania, it is time to tell you how I ended up in that very unique area which has fostered so many legends.

The story begins on August 11th, 1999. On that evening, a man by the name of Dr. David Anderson showed up at a monthly meeting on Long Island that used to be hosted by Preston Nichols and myself. David was already a subscriber to my quarterly newsletter, The Montauk Pulse, and he found out about our meetings through a computer chat forum. After listening to a lecture by Preston that evening, David introduced himself to me whereupon he mentioned to me that he had a time travel research center on Long Island.

When David told me this, I had some idea of what he was talking about. As he had been a subscriber to The Montauk Pulse for a year, I had seen his stationery from the Time Travel Research Center. Despite a professional looking logo, I simply assumed it was from a wanna-be or some kid who decided to expend some money on stationery. Upon meeting David, however, I could see that I was dead wrong. He was obviously an accomplished person and was far from an amateur. After a short chat, David suggested we get together soon for lunch. I agreed.

Although I did not realize it at the time, David had visited us shortly after returning from Romania himself. Later, I would learn that he had also established a Time Travel Research Center in that country.

Within a week's time, David invited me to lunch. He was not only interested in the Montauk research but was particularly interested in learning more about the human spirit. According to him, the cutting edge of physics research kept pointing more and more to the existence of spirituality. This was at a time when the old paradigms of classical physics were giving way to the more cogent and modern theories of quantum physics. David's scientific credentials were impeccable. Besides having a doctor's mdegree in physics, he had been involved in highly sophisticated space-time research at the prestigious Air Force Flight Test Center in the Mojave Desert. In particular, David mentioned that he was interested in my experiences in Scientology, a subject which I have since written about somewhat extensively in The Montauk Book of the Dead.

While in the Air Force, David was assigned to help out on a problem the military was having with satellites in outer space. Every year, the orbits of satellites would drift several meters and this created all sorts of chaos. If this problem was not corrected, it would result in expensive satellites becoming useless. David's approach to this problem was to create a space-time module based upon Einstein's theories. It was very advanced stuff, but he actually worked out a paradigm whereby space-time could literally be warped so as to maintain the orbits of satellites.

When he left the Air Force, David was clever enough to patent the necessary algorithms for accomplishing this manipulation of space-time. He then parlayed this into the creation of the Time Travel Research Center, a corporation which was essentially a security company. One of its functions was to license this advanced technology to the Government and to industry for their satellites.

The Time Travel Research Center was a financial success. Besides the facilities on Long Island and Romania, there was also one in Albuquerque, New Mexico. David was intent on further research into space-time. Besides the satellites, David was using laser beams to create a self-contained field, approximately the size of a soccer ball, in which time could be slowed down or speeded up. This was and is of great interest to the medical field because it means that transplantable organs could have a much longer shelf life.

The Time Travel Research Center was taken very seriously and attracted considerable investment dollars from the medical sector. Cautious about having his research compromised or stolen, David was always very careful to compartmentalize his researchers. They often did not know each other or what one another were doing. This explains, in part, why there were three separate centers. The center in Romania, he said, was theoretical. Romania was chosen as a location because it has the best mathematicians in the world and their economy was such that they were also very affordable.

As life continued, David and I would periodically get together. He was also kind enough to put up the first website for Sky Books. One day, after a considerable span of time when I had not heard from him, he asked me to come to his home at King's Park, Long Island. There were two things on his mind. First, he spoke to me about planning a large event on the subject of time travel. One of the agendas of this event was to bring together major physicists, particularly those on the East Coast, and feature the latest breakthroughs on time travel technology. The Montauk Project was to be featured and David wanted to give this subject as much publicity as possible.

When we finished the initial stages of the event planning, David then shared something that he found rather disturbing. He had recently been informed by the military that he was to report to Moscow with only his passport and airline ticket. Concerned that he might not possibly return, he wanted me to create as much publicity as possible in the event that he did not return within two weeks. When he did not return in three weeks, I began to make noise on the phone. Almost immediately after I began to create a ruckus, I received an email saying he was okay and would be home shortly. He was fine but did not actually return for another month. I had the email traced to an internet server in Pakistan. To this day, however, David is not able to discuss that he was in Pakistan or anywhere else.

Upon his return, the Time Travel Research Center began to have serious security problems. It was broken into and he was forced to move at least twice. Eventually, the Government assured him that they would take care of his security problems if he would only make them a partner in his operations. With his back against the wall, David took the most accommodating position he could. He gave up controlling interest in the Time Travel Research Center and went to work in private industry. The center on Long Island was shut down, but the one in Romania was left untouched. The Albuquerque center continued to operate but with David as a mostly silent partner.

I did not hear much from David at all during this period until April of 2003. As the Time Travel Research Center was defunct by that time, he wanted to give me his rather extensive library. We agreed to meet on Easter Sunday near his new home in Rochester, New York. Preston Nichols accompanied me, and we ended up meeting with David on the Saturday before Easter in the early evening. After loading up Preston's van, David visited with us for about twenty minutes. At the end of our visit, he said he would not be able to work with us for five years. It was all rather mysterious as he was not at liberty to reveal all of his problems or plans.

It was disappointing to lose a friend, particularly one as intriguing as David Anderson. I, however, had plenty of writing and business to take care of. On very rare occasions, I would receive a postcard from him, always from a foreign country, or a friendly email. He always signs his communications to me as "Your friend in time."

Several months after saying good-bye to David in Rochester, I received a manuscript from Sorin Hurmuz, a Romanian publisher who has published The Montauk Project in the Romanian language. He wanted to know if I would be interested in publishing a very special book. It is more than a special book to him because it literally catapulted his publishing company into reality. In Romanian, this book is called The Enemy Within and is by Radu Cinamar. It begins with two mysterious features.

The first of these mysteries is an anomalous area in the Bucegi Mountains of Romania which is located not too far from the enigmatic Romanian Sphinx. This anomalous area is the focus of the book you are about to read. It came to the attention of the Romanian government when American satellite technology revealed a hidden and inaccessible chamber within a mountain under the Sphinx.

The second mysterious feature in the book concerns a baby born with an abnormally large umbilical cord. This baby was heavily monitored by a secret department of Romanian Intelligence which includes a liaison with a mysterious doctor from Red China. As the baby grew up, he demonstrated remarkable abilities and was eventually selected to work as the head of a secret department in Romanian Intelligence. His primary duties are concerned with monitoring this anomalous area in the Bucegi Mountains as well as other anomalous areas.

The Romanian book sent to me was already translated into English. It was pretty well written and an easy read. I, however, was too busy to read it.

The manuscript languished on my desk, unread. Four years later, I had a house guest visiting me who was also a fan of my work. Having some time on his hands, I suggested he read the book and tell me if it was any good. He finished it in a few days and was extremely enthusiastic about me publishing it. When he left, I found myself with an opportunity to read it. The heater in my car had gone bad and needed extensive repair. I took it to a friend in Brooklyn and read the manuscript while his crew worked on my car for many hours. I finally finished reading the book.

At the beginning of 2008, I began negotiations with my Romanian publisher to secure the English translation rights to the book. By spring time, we had reached an agreement. Mentioning the circumstances, negotiations and timing of the agreement as well as how I came to read a book might seem to be irrelevant in most cases. In this particular instance, however, the timing was uncanny.

Almost immediately after completing the agreement to publish this book, I received an email from my friend, Dr. David Anderson. He was inviting me to Romania, all expenses paid, to visit an annual conference known as Atlantykron. This is a gathering of scientists, writers, and artists which is dedicated to educating and providing opportunity for Romanian youth. Part of the package was that I would also receive a three-day cultural tour of Romania. Of further irony was the fact that David's email arrived almost exactly five years after our last face-to-face meeting. He was not only true to his word, it was as if he was aware of some mysterious time clock concerning certain events.

You now have some of the perspective that I had when I came to finish reading the book you are about to read. Most importantly, this book informs us of events that are occurring in the world which extend far beyond the consciousness of ordinary citizens. I was not only being made aware of them through my contacts in Romania, I was also being pulled onto the stage myself.

The drama you are about to read apparently reaches far beyond my own personal involvement which seems to be rather minimal but not insignificant. It is presented by the author as nonfiction and there is considerable reason to accept his story as such. These reasons will be presented at the end of the book in the epilogue where I will also include a synopsis of my trip to Romania and my eventual reunion with Dr. David Anderson.

Chapter 1 — Under the Hawk's Eye

I will not make the story in this book any longer nor more dramatic than it really is. I will not adorn it with stylish literary embellishments and because of that I do not expect acknowledgment of any hypothetical artistic value of the text. Instead, I will render as simply and concisely as possible events of an overwhelming significance to Romania and its people, against the background of numerous signs and plenty of evidence already pointing to a hidden canker now gnawing at the very heart and soul of the Romanian people with growing depth and speed. In fact, a great many high officials in the administrative, economic, religious and cultural structures of the country uphold this view.

I for one could see for myself part of what, at present, is considered to be the biggest state secret in Romania and, given the nature of relations and meetings with high representatives of the main state power in the world, perhaps the most terrible secret on this planet. Its implications are huge, but intuition tells me that knowledge of the facts to be conveyed in this book will in time lead to a remarkable leap in the quality of human existence that will eventually bring down the thick wall of dissimulation, concealment, and lying which has been put up by those in power and by the occult interests of some organizations and persons in and outside the country. That is why my telling of this story may be at times almost blunt and unpolished like a roughly hewn diamond or even as regimented as life in the barracks. But I find this to be the most appropriate choice of style for making known to the reader certain unique and even secret aspects of the world of politics, of the former Securitate and of today's Romanian Intelligence Service (RIS). My aim is thus to unfold in chronological order a complex string of events, facts, realities and correlations that, in my view and that of other competent people, are of great importance to the future of the country.

The story is in fact a biography (updated to the year 2003) of a character who is real but whom many will think to be the hero of a legend or a science fiction adventure book. I shall take the liberty of alerting the reader from the very beginning to the danger of falling into the cheap trap of doubt and distrust. The facts and truths I shall convey should first be pondered over and only then should conclusions be drawn as the reader may deem appropriate.

I had the extraordinary opportunity of actually meeting the hero of the story, and I must confess in all honesty that I would not have made the decision of writing this book if he himself had not spurred me to it on many occasions. The long talks he and I had in some secret locations convinced me of the existence of unsuspected realities which I could then check for myself in various situations. But what convinced me the most in making the decision to tell this story was the shocking discovery of August 2003 in the Bucegi Mountains to which I myself had partial access owing to an extraordinary combination of circumstances that the hero of this book had facilitated for me. In so doing, he may have wanted to shatter even the faintest trace of reticence I may still have had. But now I know. I witnessed it. I touched it. I can now say I have a bird's eye view — and an accurate one for that matter — of true history since the dawn of time, of Romania and even of this entire planet.

It will be quite difficult for me to render the accurate picture of the awe, bewilderment and even panic on the face of the few people who had access to the place. What I can say now is that that was only the beginning of the discovery since I did not have access to all of its elements nor was I allowed to really see everything up there. Nevertheless, the person who steered all the investigations and offered me the un hoped-for chance of actually seeing the site of that momentous discovery also told me about that mysterious part of the place to which my access had been denied for reasons of maximum security. But one should not rush or anticipate. I shall describe everything at the right time exactly as it happened. However, I have no reservations about saying that that was undoubtedly a landmark moment in reshaping both my views of the world and the career I was pursuing. I am asking the reader to bear with me and allow me first to follow the path that led to the extraordinary events in the Bucegi Mountains.

In essence, this path is the very profoundly mysterious and troubling existence of the hero of the book by whose side the complicated texture of destiny brought and kept me in a strange manner, to say the least. For reasons that are easy to understand, an alias, Cezar Brad, will be used as far as he is concerned.

I have known Cezar Brad for almost five years. As we met and talked during these times, I became fully aware of his strength and extraordinary character. His entirely special position in the complicated machinery of state power makes him all the more credible in the fractured and yet very concise and coherent stories he told me during the few meetings we had, despite the fact that, for various reasons, our meetings sometimes took place in a hurry.

It remains a mystery why, of all people, he chose me to tell the story. To a large extent, that may have been because of the seriousness and keen interest with which I have always listened to his account of the events. There are things that the mind of ordinary people may find difficult to digest. But the times we are living in are very special so that what once seemed to be a dream or an act of rampant imagination now proves to be perfectly possible.

At the end of our last meeting, Cezar made it clear in a calm and detached manner that the decision to write and publish the information he had given me was entirely mine. My whole being was struggling under the weight of that responsibility and I confess it took me almost one year from that moment until I eventually succeeded in clarifying and putting events in the order in which they had been presented to me and particularly in depicting them as clearly as possible. I wanted to render the chain of events and Cezar Brad's explanations with the highest possible fidelity, using almost the same words he himself had used in telling the story.

I was encouraged to publish this book in a simple and natural manner. I then had the clear impression that even if, from fear or for other reasons, I had not done what I had been asked to do and had not written the book, Cezar would have considered the decision with perfect detachment and would undoubtedly have found another way of fulfilling his intention.

A BIRTH UNLIKE OTHERS

After a long night gave way to dawn, a young woman of simple but pleasant means was brought to the operating room as her contractions had started. She was not screaming but was rather scared.

Fairly tired and somewhat bored by the routine of their job, the two nurses on duty were not really mindful of the woman. In the Seventies, we were in the full swing of Communist “multilateral development” when everything was “with the people” and “for the people” and so demagogically “equal” and “fair” that one could no longer really tell the difference between a chair and a human.

When called in at last, after several hours of labor that seemed like never-ending centuries to the mind of the would-be mother, Doctor Nenu took a tired look at his patient’s medical record: reason for admission, breaking of the amniotic liquid sac; general condition, good; blood pressure, normal; uterine contractions, rare; dilation, small. Everything seemed to follow the natural course of a normal child birth.

Upon realizing that he was spending more time looking at the record than at his patient, the doctor approached the table shaking his head at the thought that fatigue was playing tricks on him and thus making him inattentive. Not even a slight suspicion did he have that any trace of sleepiness and apathy would soon be shattered. He took a quick look and immediately clarified the stage of the birth process; it was imminent. Dilations were growing in size as was normal, and deep down Doctor Nenu was glad he would not have to use the scalpel. The last and most painful of contractions brought to the world first the head of the child and then his tender and submissive body. The doctor carefully got hold of the child’s hands, helping him out.

The first problem was the length of the umbilical cord. Nenu had seen a lot of them in his life yet, for a few seconds, he stood in awe at the sight of the cord, the length of which, almost 1.5 meters, was way in excess of usual standards. Time was precious and the birth process had to be completed successfully. When awe loosened its grip on him, he took the scissors from the nurse’s hands and cut the cord; or he attempted to cut it as he had done hundreds of times before in his career, but the blades of the scissors were sliding as if against metal! The doctor was staring in disbelief while the nurses stood motionless. In the few seconds that followed, he changed two pairs of scissors but to no avail: the cord would not give in. It was highly elastic like a piece of the most durable rubber.

Doctor Nenu had long years of medical experience and he had grown to be a self-possessed man. With precise movements, he grabbed a scalpel and pressed it repeatedly and forcefully against the cord. Eventually, the cord gave in and the first cry of life could be heard. The child was a plump boy with unusually clear and relaxed facial traits and a very strange umbilical cord. It happened at the dawn of a day in the spring of 1970. Events then rushed in.

“Amalia, go call the Colonel immediately and tell him to come to the hospital as soon as possible,” ordered the doctor.

He then turned to the other nurse and said: “You get this cord for preservation. I’ll see to the woman. Bring me her record.”

Colonel Datcu arrived at the hospital after approximately twenty minutes. He talked to Doctor Nenu for a short while and then had a long phone talk with one of his superiors in Bucharest. At noon, a black limo with a government plate pulled up in front of the maternity hospital in the town of F.... and out came two stiff and quiet men. One of them was carrying a briefcase.

Doctor Nenu, Colonel Datcu and the two men talked for almost half an hour in one of the hospital offices. Nenu filled in a form that the Securitate men gave him and was then asked to wait outside for a while. After several minutes, the men left and the Colonel approached the doctor who was quite troubled.

“This is above our heads, Nenu! This was one of the first secret instructions I received upon promotion. In situations like these, I must follow a very strict and secret procedure. To you in particular, nothing special has happened today and you have not noticed anything strange. You do get it, don’t you?”

Thoughtfully, Colonel Datcu lit a cigarette. After a few moments and without looking in the doctor’s direction he said, “There’s something else. The boy has no personal medical record. He has never had one. You will destroy it immediately. Nothing about this birth is to be left to the archives! The rest, believe me, is too complicated to be of interest to us.”

With a friendly tap on the doctor’s shoulder, Colonel Datcu left the hospital. Behind him, Doctor Nenu stood staring dumbfounded into the void while in the ward an innocent mother was lovingly holding her newborn child close to her breast.

A MIND OF HIS OWN

Little Cezar was not aware of the special attention he was surrounded with, and he obviously knew nothing about the manner in which the Securitate was keeping an eye on him. At his early age, he could not possibly understand the reason for his being an important matter of interest. The same could be said about his parents who suspected nothing. It had been a normal birth (with the mother having been told nothing about what had happened at the maternity hospital) and the months that followed did not bring anything unusual in the simple and modest homestead of the Brads.

As time passed, however, little oddities came up in the behavior of the baby such as the fact that he would not cry at all or would hold his fingers in strange positions, touching or bending them in ways that became identically emerging patterns at regular intervals. His parents watched him with astonishment but calmly. Common sense made them understand that nothing could be wrong with the somewhat strange preoccupations of their child. On the contrary, the time came when it was a real pleasure for them to watch the play of his little fingers, a play that was otherwise very elegant and second nature to him. Sometimes the child would stand still for minutes in a row while maintaining the same structure of his fingers that would either take the shape of a circle or get crossed and then successively touched with the thumb in well-determined positions.

Cezar's parents were very happy their little boy did not cry and was not a problem at night. But above all, they were happy he had never fallen ill until then. Time, however, furtively sowed in their souls the seed of a hidden suffering which slightly troubled the peace of their daily life. Little Cezar would soon be one year old and he had not yet uttered a word. Still, the problem was not too serious. Although they had seen such cases before, they were already considering a visit to the doctor.

When Cezar turned one year old, two grey-eyed tall men, both dressed up and with looks as cold as ice, knocked on the door. Behind their elegant manners and the intentionally affable tone in the conversation they had with Cezar's parents, one could easily detect intolerance to any possible resistance coupled with a tacit but obvious threat with reprisals should the parents disobey “orders from above”. They introduced themselves as members of a Special Department of the Securitate.

Their gestures were casual and yet they strangely instilled a sense of fear in those listening to them. In those times, the Communist Securitate was already painfully renowned for its ways of action and intimidation, but in the case of the Brads, their method took on a somewhat more humane course. The visit was short and practically consisted of a monologue by the two men while Cezar’s parents remained standing with embarrassed looks on their faces. The main point of the monologue was that the Brad family had to follow precisely the instructions they were given.

It had just been brought to the attention of the poor people that their son was under the eye of certain relevant structures for reasons relating to great state interests which they should not be aware of. Their mission was to inform immediately, directly and without recourse to any third party (the two men insisted a lot on this requirement) of any strange, unusual or out of the ordinary development in their child’s behavior. They were given a form to fill in with both having to sign a statement confirming agreement with terms and conditions. Also mentioned in the statement was the requirement that a monthly report be handed in to Colonel Datcu. They were not allowed to ask any questions or know the reasons of that action. Still, at the end of the visit, they were offered a “special allowance” in cash that was quite normal for those times, to be received on a monthly basis as a “compensation” of sorts for the strange situation that had practically been forced upon them. The two men left immediately after that.

I should mention at this point some pieces of information that can shed light on the behavior of Cezar’s parents. Nicolae Brad was over thirty and known particularly as a quiet, somewhat reserved, and industrious man (he worked as a clerk with the Mayor’s Office). Obedient in most cases, he was nevertheless capable of compromise betraying some crevices and repressions of his psyche. The Intelligence Service may already have had his psychological record and had rightly assessed his inner tendencies since, as it later turned out, the allowance in cash was mainly meant to quiet down some possible dissatisfaction and secure sincere cooperation on the part of Mr. Brad. Indeed, psychologists had correctly evaluated his emotional profile as he proved to be sensitive to financial security which he even placed above certain moral issues. That was Nicolae Brad's "compromise" and winning him over for the "cause" of the Securitate had been quite easy.

Mr. Brad and his wife, Smaranda, were poles apart. Cezar's young mother had a romantic and sensitive nature and the material side of life did not weigh much with her. Ever since her childhood, drawing had been her passion and she would spend long hours amusing herself or sinking deep in thought with her sketches depicting a wide range of themes that inspired her spontaneously. Unfortunately, she could not harness the energy it took to face life and the conflicting situations made her suffer. The situation in her family had become rather tense as she was in a way forced to "spy" on her own child. In her silent but helpless refusal, she would have liked to have her husband on her side but he had quickly opted for the practical solution with no complications attached.

"In fact, we are not being asked to do anything wrong," he would say to soothe her. "We don't even know what to expect. Time will take care of everything."

This was his usual and philosophical closing remark. That was actually the beginning of a separation between them with consequences that were not necessarily physical but mostly emotional.

By the time he was three years and two months old, Cezar Brad had not uttered a single word. For a while, his parents thought he was dumb but were then quick to realize that this could not be the case as the child laughed, screamed at times, or even babbled. True, those occasions were quite rare but enough to prove that his disorder, if any, was not pathological.

They met Colonel Datcu in the first month after the visit they had had from the Securitate when, according to the commitment they had signed, they had to see him and hand in a report. To them, he seemed a kind, serious and even understanding man who left the impression he was acting only on an obligation. He was nevertheless conscientious about his mission, talking in detail with the parents about their child's behavior and dutifully writing down everything he was told about the child. Every month, he himself would give Nicolae Brad the special allowance money. At the end of each visit, he would always say: “You will talk to no one about these things, but above all, you will see no doctor about the child. Should any problem arise, I’ll be the first you’ll call and I’ll take measures as appropriate.”

By the age of three, the child had suffered from no diseases which is a very rare occurrence. This made the imposed task of first informing the Securitate services and not going to hospital somewhat easier. At about that age, the first major change came up in the relation between Cezar’s parents. As Cezar told me, his mother had a great passion for drawing and her talent was manifest. Deep down, she would have liked to paint but that would have meant financial complications, a dedicated studio, time and much else besides that. She had therefore limited her passion to simple sketches and amusements that would cheer up her moments of loneliness. She would keep her drawings about the house or sometimes pin the finest of them to the wall. And they would stay there until they would fall or she herself would replace them.

Smaranda had a propensity for abstract drawings that combined lines, circles or curves in patterns with apparently no clear idea. She used to tell her husband those drawings made her feel very spontaneous and free which had a bracing effect on her.

One day, Smaranda Brad drew a series of simple concentric circles in the middle of a blank page in a drawing notebook. She amused herself by comparing her creation with the pattern of a target. As the circles were almost perfect, she stuck the page to a wall in one of the rooms. Everything started several hours later when she found Cezar seated in front of the drawing and staring at it without moving or blinking.

Although that was not quite natural, Cezar’s mother did not attach too much importance to the event and continued to mind her work about the house. But when Nicolae Brad came back from work, the child was still sitting in front of the drawing, perfectly still and silent. The occurrence was fairly strange: a three-year old baby seated on the bed and staring for hours in a row at an irritatingly simple drawing while his mother was wringing her hands by his side, crying silently and not knowing what to do. She had tried to force him away from the drawing and had even unstuck it from the wall but to no avail. When bothered, the child started screaming out loud. The two parents looked at each other for a long while with no need for words.

At last, Cezar's father said, "It's time we called them. Who knows what's next?!"

"Wait!" Smaranda started fretting about. "We should allow some more time. It may only be a child's mood."

It was with much difficulty that she talked him into not revealing anything yet. Very worried, they spent the rest of the day testing various methods in an attempt to take Cezar's attention away from that drawing. They were thus hoping to bring him back to normality but all their attempts failed. As soon as he was disturbed, Cezar started screaming, crying and there was no way they could handle him any longer. They eventually gave up and then watched him for a long while, almost in disbelief that something like that was at all possible: their child was staring at the drawing, without moving or blinking. He had not eaten anything and showed no sign he would want to. Nothing around could take him out of the concentrated efforts he was making.

At about ten o'clock in the evening, Nicolae Brad called Colonel Datcu and told him about the situation. Colonel Datcu instructed them not to panic or do anything until he himself came to their house together with some authorized persons. Indeed, at about six o'clock in the morning, three men arrived with Colonel Datcu. Two of them were from the Securitate, bearing the same unmistakable appearance: stiff faces, dapper suits, cold looks. The third person looked peculiar to the parents. He was an elderly man with Asian traits, a short white beard and a somewhat forward-leaning walk. He was talking in English with one of the Securitate men. Colonel Datcu introduced him as a scientist from China who was an expert on such cases and advised the parents not to worry.

The Chinese doctor watched Cezar carefully, felt his pulse, touched his palms in an odd manner, and placed one hand on the top of his head and two fingers in the middle of his forehead, being careful not to step into the visual field of the child. Through all of this, Cezar kept perfectly still and remained deeply absorbed in the drawing in front of him. The doctor said something in English and then scuttled out of the house.

"Everything is perfectly fine, but you must not disturb him," translated one of the Securitate men. "We'll be in touch through Colonel Datcu."

That was all and they immediately left. The parents felt like two mere puppets in a complicated play, but circumstances were such that they had no other option. Worried and deeply concerned about the strange behavior of their child, they stayed with him, dozing off with fatigue. It was only the following day at noon, after almost twenty-four hours, that Cezar showed the first sign he wanted to stand up. The child continued to be deep within himself but at least he ate heartily. His parents gave a sigh of relief and informed Colonel Dactu of the change.

That was the beginning of a series of special events which left a definitive mark on Cezar's life. His parents, Nicolae and Smaranda Brad, moved into the background as his inner life and the extraordinary experiences he had been through, some of which he personally told me about so that I could describe them here, would profoundly mark his destiny.

After that unusual event, Cezar would often sink within himself and be perfectly still for minutes in a row, his eyes closed. That used to happen at the most unexpected moments of the day, even when he was at play. Once, while his mother was feeding him, he suddenly closed his eyes and stayed like that for more than ten minutes after which he continued to eat as if nothing had happened. Those feats had already become part of ordinary life and his parents had grown used to them, but they did not understand the causes and were given no explanations or clarifications since, by that time, Cezar had not spoken a word.

The change occurred two months after the drawing event when, for the first time in his life, Cezar spoke. His words left everyone around the house at that time gaping with perplexity both at the ease and clarity with which he spoke those words and at the maturity of his ideas.

That day, relatives who loved the child dearly were visiting the Bradys. More of a recluse, the child was looking for a place where he could be alone for a while. He closed his eyes; but everywhere around there was too much talk, too much noise, and too many questions. Everybody was fretting about and, although he was not the centre of attention, preparing the meal involved much movement, talk, laughter and bustle. When they came to bring him to the room where the table was laid, all caressing and fondling him, Cezar said clearly, "I want to think!"

I will move quickly past the huge surprise and joy those words brought to everybody around. Cezar had started to speak fluently and without any difficulty as of that moment, showing maturity in everything he said. By age four, he used to talk about matters that even adults would find puzzling. The mind was one of the issues he liked to dwell upon. "Where do thoughts come from? Where do they go? What are they made of? Why don't all people think the same thoughts?" These were only a few of the most frequent questions Cezar would ask to the puzzlement of those around. His poor parents were at a loss for answers. They would send him out to play or change the subject; but most of the time, Cezar was steadfast in his determination. As opposed to the usual activities of a child his age, he preferred sinking into thought. Strangely though, he would obstinately refuse to explain or answer when often asked to tell what he felt or thought in those moments. On very rare occasions, however, he would say that, after closing his eyes, he felt as if he was suddenly leaving the room; but he did not know how to speak about the place of his destination or how he could describe it in words.

By the age of six, Cezar had been visited once a year by the two Securitate men in the company of the mysterious Chinese doctor. The latter would give him a summary examination, always nodding his head in a pleased manner, or would stare at the boy's eyes with his fiery look. Cezar told me he could very well remember that almost impersonal, tough and profoundly enigmatic look of the little man in front of him with only the touch of a smile on his face. He was to meet him later, after several years, and learn from him, unexpectedly, many mysteries of life as destiny had brought the two of them together in a very complex manner.

Perhaps we shall never know what Doctor Xien was thinking when watching Cezar or what he was making of the child's unusual capacities. What we know for sure is that he later played an extremely important part in the boy's existence and had a correct intuition of his exceptional abilities and gifts. It is actually very likely that he himself had supernormal capacities and powers and that Cezar's achievements as one of his students were such as to confirm this likelihood almost without a trace of doubt.

Several years later, Doctor Xien had a decisive hand in the special training of the boy. I am not in possession of more information about this enigmatic character, but from the little information Cezar did reveal, I was able to gather that Ceausescu (then Romania's dictator) was interested at the time in a certain parapsychology training program and in the use of its subjects in highly secret cases of national interest. He seemed to have been influenced by some piece of intelligence that drew his attention to intensive research and parapsychological experiments conducted at that time in the USA and the USSR. In his capacity as Supreme Commander of the State, Ceausescu issued an order that a special department be set up within the Securitate Service for the recruitment, training and development of human subjects with unusual abilities.

The order involved absolute secrecy of the kind that was many levels above simple classified information. Due to a method known as hierarchical intelligence blockage, no special difficulty came up in maintaining secrecy about the new department, but a lot was still to be done about staff and logistics. As with almost any Communist initiative, progress was cumbersome when it came to investments, particularly in a field about which little was known. It is not clear what purpose Ceausescu wanted this new parapsychological line of action to serve, but one could surmise he mostly targeted those procedures for psychic manipulation and influence over the masses with a view to maintaining dictatorial power and, to a lesser degree, issues like national defense or external conflict resolution.

Ceausescu ordered the establishment of that Department in 1968, shortly after his arrival to power, thus able to achieve maximum benefits out of his popularity in the West, at that time on the ascendant. His widespread diplomatic success was the result of two principal aspects: his almost outspoken hostility to cooperation with Moscow and his opposition to armed intervention in the famous "Prague Spring" of 1968. Back then, however, Ceausescu's order that a special department be set up to conduct research and experiments on subjects of exceptional abilities was curious and even contradictory in some of its aspects. This could lead to the conclusion that he himself was more dallying with an idea that was promisingly brewing somewhere at the back of his mind rather than placing it high on his priority list. Still, much like any cunning personality of paranoid disposition, Ceausescu wanted to surround himself at any cost with certainties and means that would secure an indisputable problem-free domination.

Obviously, he could not develop all his different ideas to the same extent; but he used to come back to each and every one of them, bringing what a long while before was only a bud to a radiant bloom.

In 1968, the Romanian Securitate was confronted with a top secret order that was not in line with the usual issuance standards. The order was dated 28 August, bore Ceausescu's personal signature and, in an extremely rare occurrence, was accompanied by some personal notes. The decree requested the establishment of a special department, called Department Zero, to operate independently from the other departments and units in the Securitate Service of those times and report directly and only to the Head of the Service and the President of the country (that was mentioned in the very note Ceausescu had written which was drawing attention both to the top-secret nature of the order and to the way in which it had to be followed). However, the decree was economical with information other than a very concise personnel grid and minimal instructions on the main lines of action which, at the beginning, involved recruitment and surveillance methods in relation to future subjects.

The decree put the then management structure of the Securitate Service in a difficult position since, on the one hand, it was about a relatively novel and untested field; and, on the other hand, they could not follow the standard financing procedure for reasons of absolute secrecy.

When Department Zero was in the early days of its operation, Ceausescu's agreement was sought in cooperation with another state with a certain track record in the field: China. Diplomatic relations between the two countries were quite good and, in 1972, the authorities agreed on a somewhat strange "exchange." Doctor Xien was to run and set the technical structure of the department in Romania for a period of fifteen years while Ceausescu was to finance scholarships for one hundred Chinese students to Romania for the same duration. China also volunteered to make available to the personnel in Department Zero (known as DZ) some of the findings of its parapsychological experiments as well as other useful working methods. The agreement thus laid the groundwork for one of the most secret and terrible human actions in Romania: the parapsychological method.

Cezar Brad was one of the first subjects recruited and registered with DZ, however, not even Doctor Xien or those in high positions in the department (who got those written reports from his parents) were aware of details or of the subtle experiences of the child, particularly those details of an inner nature. Cezar would not talk about these to anyone.

The method DZ employed first involved a period of “probation” and supervision of the subject. Only after proving to be of exceptional psychic abilities would subjects be integrated into the structure of the department. Sometimes this “probation” and checks period could last years in a row as was the case with Cezar. At other times, however, the subject would be integrated immediately after the information received was checked.

Cezar had found a mental experimental world of his own into which he liked to sink deeper and deeper and from which he would return enriched with extraordinary sensations and perceptions. It was not one of those worlds where one might think Cezar was seeking refuge for reasons like some hypothetical psychic adaptation difficulties or even some sort of mental alienation. On the contrary, the truth was different. The very fact that we cannot grasp what is well above our actual capacities does not mean that that thing, being, behavior or experience is a negative or condemnable aspect or that, worse, it does not exist.

Cezar Brad's case was strange. Back then, little was understood and accepted about it, even by DZ staff. His case, however, did match the pattern required for the recruitment of DZ subjects.

I must confess I myself am aware of only some of the amazing achievements and experiences Cezar had in the early years of his childhood. Generally speaking, I think of myself as a self-composed, self-collected individual, but Cezar's stories were far above my imagination. Of course, when listening to him tell me about his experiences, what was there in front of my eyes was neither an emotionally unstable human being nor a science fiction writer nor a paranoid. To those with some knowledge of things esoteric and who are still in key positions in the structures of the state or have access to top-secret information and archives, the quick identification of the main elements of the story in this book may not be difficult. But to the remainder, that is to most people who are practically bereft of correct information and subjected on an almost permanent basis to a spate of conflicting data and stories, holding a coherent common-sense personal view has become quite difficult. By dint of my position as a government advisor that I held a few years ago, I could do some discreet research and see for myself, based upon my own observation and intuitions, that Cezar Brad was an exceptional character. The modesty with which he told me about his main experiences and activities, as well as some telling little “incidents” I myself was confronted with in his presence, gradually convinced me of a reality that could not be denied: namely, that some human beings are far above our conceptual, mental or organizational standards. If they so choose, these human beings can transform other people’s destinies through the power of their superior abilities.

One indisputable proof of Cezar’s abilities came with our very first meeting which he requested some years ago. The meeting was the result of some complex arrangements among trustworthy persons, but its main purpose was still a mystery to me. I was vaguely aware of Department Zero within today’s Romanian Intelligence Service (RIS), but that was all. I arrived at the place of the meeting straight from work in one of the institution’s cars. It was nighttime and pouring with rain so I stayed inside chatting with the driver. After several minutes the car door suddenly opened and, skipping all formality, Cezar sat himself beside me on the back seat and started to talk amiably and very calmly, getting straight to the point.

I was quickly drawn into the subject of our talk so that it was only after a few minutes that I realized the driver had already started the engine and was driving silently to an unknown destination without my or Cezar’s asking him to do that. Once in front of the Sofitel Hotel where Cezar had booked a room, I expressed my bewilderment at the driver’s action who had been given no instructions. While we were heading to his room, Cezar told me that, in some cases, words proved to be useless and the mental function, when well-controlled and purged of external interference, could operate as efficiently as words. In other words, he was summarizing for me the principles of telepathy. I thought he was kidding me at first; but immediately afterwards, he told me how he had done it: at the very moment he was saying hello and sitting himself beside me in the car, he sent the driver the mental instructions for starting the engine and heading to a particular destination. Convinced that he had heard the verbal instruction, the driver acted accordingly.

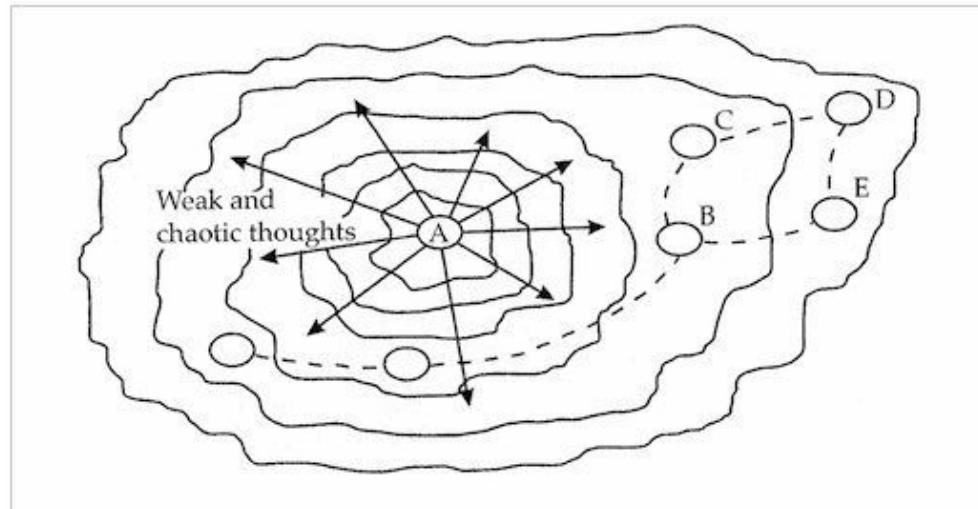

“When training in this direction is intensive and persevering, the telepathic transmission of thoughts is no longer a problem,” Cezar said with a slight smile.

After we entered his room, he made a drawing on a piece of paper. At the same time, he gave me the requisite explanations as follows:

“Suppose individual A is part of a community of individuals. His thoughts, which are not strong, mix up with other people’s thoughts resulting in a mental ‘fog’ of sorts since those thoughts are usually weak, unclear and poorly defined. They are only fragments of superficial, half-baked ideas. One can then say that each of those individuals lives in relative isolation, in a mental world of their own. Somehow, they are influenced — to a greater or lesser extent — by the receptiveness of the individual in question and with the thoughts of those around.

“Most often, they perceive these outside influences unconsciously, like mere changes in dispositions or inner states of mind. That is why I have used the term mental ‘fog’ — because people can’t see each other at this level, much like a vessel at sea left without a rudder in foggy weather.”

MENTAL HAZE

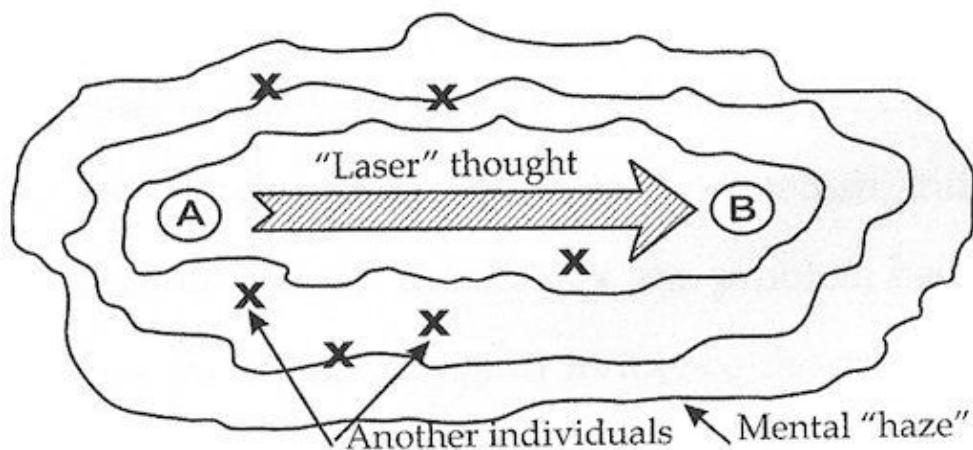

Cezar stood silent for a while, making yet another drawing.

“But if an individual sends a very concentrated thought, that thought will perfectly resemble a focused light beam, like a laser,” he added. “Moreover, if that individual directs his mental beam with much precision to another individual B, then the latter will perceive and mentally ‘see’ that beam like a strong light through the ‘fog’ around, like the beams of a lighthouse or a strong light guiding vessels to the shore. The process is therefore simple, but it takes diligent training.”

MENTAL FOCUS

“But what do you mean by mental purging?” I asked with an innocence that was much warranted by the sheer novel nature of the explanations he was giving.

“In reality,” Cezar explained willingly, “what we call mental or the mind is a very complex and subtle fabric serving many functions and being structured into various energetic vibration frequencies. Some call these frequency bands abilities or powers. That’s why achievements are not the same everywhere, as not all people have the same powers.

“For instance, individual A can easily focus when learning, individual B can contain emotions well, individual C has a better memory than other people, but all this is only a minute share of the potential available to us. Even so, they become manifest in the surrounding mental mediocrity but are not yet refined or trained adequately.

“By employing certain training methods, the mental abilities of human beings can be very much developed which will later make them act highly efficiently. That is what I call ‘purging’ since, metaphorically speaking, the mind sheds the layer of secondary thoughts often corrupted by mean intentions which are either empty in terms of real content or weak and powerless. Those who can thus ‘purge’ their mind can acquire extraordinary mental power. Their mind can then easily pierce the mental ‘fog’ of the masses, much like an arrow cutting through smoke. It is only from that level upwards that people learn, and at the same time experience, the fact that the mind, as a subtle form of energy, is superior to matter which it can consequently subdue and control.

This is how paranormal powers emerge. These, however, also require a high degree of individual awareness because responsibilities are then huge. Supernatural powers may trigger selfish and arrogant actions in individuals that can complicate their destiny a great deal. Much like when one throws a ball at a wall: the ball strikes back with the same force. One must therefore act maturely and discerningly to the benefit of those around and not to one’s own interest only.

“Unfortunately, some people develop such powers to serve selfish, individual or small group interests. In some cases, the problem becomes even more serious when the aim is to influence the masses with a view to getting power and absolute control over them. This is the reason I wanted to meet with you. I want to disclose these truths and you can help with making them public.”

I was utterly amazed at his words. In the space of only a few tens of minutes, I had been confronted with ideas and notions I did not even imagine existed. A part of me was outraged, telling me I was definitely the target of a bunch of lies or mockery. The entire scenario was somewhat phantasmagorical: too fast, too much, too unexpected. Despite all that, the prevailing impulse was to fully trust Cezar Brad and even offer to cooperate unconditionally.

My suspicions, all too natural given the circumstances, could not gain ground to the deep feeling that what I was doing was good and noble. The man in front of me inspired mysterious confidence and inner peace which chased out almost any urge my “normal” reasoning might have had to digress or protest; thus opening up to me the path to a mysterious realm that was holding me spellbound.

Cezar did not want to waste any minute on useless talks or complex and long-drawn-out introductions. He was thus giving me the clear impression of a man who would not budge in his determination, getting straight to the point with no beating about the bush or unnecessary delays. In spite of all this, not for one single moment did I have the feeling of any obligation or pressure for accepting his proposal. That was of paramount importance to me. Among others, Cezar Brad had the amazing ability to instill gushing enthusiasm for one particular issue and effortlessly capture people's attention and interest, but this was a manifestly spontaneous and perfectly natural influence on his part. It was his very subtle radiance that filled souls in a very pleasant manner.

I can hardly wait to describe the amazing events that followed; but still, my "mission" must be gradual or else the risk is that I give rise to suspicions in the reader's mind confronting them with a skein of events described in an unformed manner. I shall therefore come back to the chronological description of the principal events in Cezar Brad's life so that the reader can understand as best as possible the way in which he unraveled the wheeling and dealing and the aims and means of some occult individuals and organizations who operate at global level and have stealthily cast their net to include Romania. As one will gather from the pages to follow, this was to lead to a spectacular change in the situation, the main character of which was Cezar himself.

As I have already said, the climax was the amazing discovery in the Bucegi Mountains in which several states and regions of the globe are involved at present, with the American state and diplomacy in the lead. My knowledge of this subject prompts me to say that immediately after the great discovery in the mountains in 2003, diplomatic relations between Romania and the United States of America became very complex and their balance was quite fragile. This situation was due to tensions triggered by conflicting intentions in the wake of the extraordinary discovery. Among others, those intentions targeted the very condition of the human race.

In the months that followed that watershed event, tension was defused with a joint action plan devised at the highest level diplomatic levels of the two states. I shall describe the corresponding arrangements at the right time. For the moment, I shall only say that the understanding between Romania and the USA was not convenient to certain political forces in our country whose visions were much more progressive. This gave rise to further tension and even triggered a change of opinion across the Romanian political spectrum.

Last minute information that reached me right before this book went to print confirmed a future meeting I shall have with Cezar Brad (almost one year after our last meeting) where I shall learn about other fulminating and confidential aspects relating to the “great expedition” Cezar conducted with a joint Romanian-American team, starting from the reality of the discovery in the Bucegi Mountains.

Although I am already in possession of the main data on the expedition, I would rather not anticipate but describe everything in a coherent manner and in detail after I get hold of further precious information. I consider this step to be necessary, particularly in view of the fact that people have a right to know the historical truth as well as who wanted to manipulate this truth for decades and for what reason. This is the thread of the story in this book. Whether it will resound with the consciousness of the people or, on the contrary, will be met with irony and distrust, I am nevertheless of the firm belief that the commitment to writing and publishing this book is a profoundly beneficial and positive one as it will at least give rise to certain questions in people’s minds and stir up interest in the occult and subtle dimensions of self-knowledge.

When seven years of age, Cezar was put in school but he excelled at no subject. He was a normal student of average performance. Nothing betrayed any of his preoccupations and thoughts and his grades were more a reflection of what he heard and understood in the classroom as he almost never studied at home. However, when Cezar was in the third grade, his teacher, who was deeply troubled and puzzled, called his parents to school. She wanted to know whether they had noticed anything unusual in the boy’s behavior, but both Nicolae and Smaranda Brad firmly denied as they had been instructed to do by the representatives of the Securitate.

The teacher then told them what had happened. As she had some papers to grade, she instructed her students to learn by heart a poem of a few stanzas she had read out loud beforehand at the front of the classroom. Shortly after that, she was surprised to find that Cezar was looking absentmindedly out of the window while everybody else was learning the poem. She told him to mind the poem; but after a few minutes, she found him doing the same.

“Cezar, stand up!” she yelled at the child. “Why aren’t you learning the poem as everybody else?”

The boy, retaining his calm and composure, did not seem to be at all intimidated by the threatening tone of his teacher’s voice.

“But I know it already,” he came back in a low voice.

“What do you mean you already know it? Why are you lying to me?”

“I’m not lying. I heard it when you read it out loud for us,” he replied.

Mad at the child’s bravery but also curious about the truth, the teacher asked him to say the poem in front of the classroom. Cezar repeated the entire poem without a flaw.

“I thought he had learned it beforehand at home. But that was a new lesson, and as you well know, he doesn’t go overboard about learning,” the woman continued to explain excitedly.

“Then I asked him to say two more poems, just as long as the first one, which were not in the handbook but which I read for him only once. After listening carefully, he repeated them both without mistake or any break. That is why I wanted to see you and talk to you, because I have never seen anything like this before.”

Shortly after, however, the incident was forgotten. Cezar told me he was quick to realize the use of making himself inconspicuous when in the company of other people as that was a good way of avoiding harassment, curiosity or even meanness and envy, especially on the part of his friends.

“Even at that early age, I felt it was very important not to draw attention upon myself. There were plenty of other more important things that required my full attention and interest when I was back at home in my room,” he told me with an enigmatic smile.

He was, of course, speaking about his mysterious subtle experiences that he had when sinking deep within himself, far away from outside influence.

His parents had long ago given up troubling him with questions about his attitude. That had grown to be a normal attitude as had the monthly reports and the visits they got from the Securitate upon no prior notice. Until he turned ten, those around him had only one occasion to look upon Cezar as upon a “strange” human being. That was when he gave his aunt, then visiting the Brads, a special warning.

Cezar was unaware of his aunt’s arrival, but when he came in and laid eyes upon her, he stood transfixed as if looking through the body of the woman in front of him. Everyone had noticed something was wrong and asked him what the matter was or whether he felt all right, but the boy gave no reply and headed to his room instead. It was only in the early hours of the evening, troubled and anxious, that he asked his aunt when she would go back home to Bucharest. Upon learning she had bought a train ticket for the next day, he seemed to quiet down a little. Still, he asked her not to travel by car, a piece of advice everybody present chose to disregard.

Emilia, Cezar’s aunt, was to leave for Bucharest the following day with her brother, Nicolae Brad, to settle some family problems. Paradoxically, they did not wake up in time to catch the next morning’s train since the clock had broken and failed to sound the alarm. Emilia’s presence in Bucharest was badly needed that morning so she got a lift and took the last free seat in a car. Cezar’s father came back home and was to leave for the capital on the next train.

The terrible news came shortly before his departure to the railway station. The driver who had given Emilia a lift had been involved in a serious accident in the neighborhood of Bucharest. Of all the occupants, it was only Emilia who died, the others having been wounded but were safe.

Smaranda Brad was the only one to remember Cezar’s odd behavior as well as the advice he had given Aunt Emilia. She wrote that down in the monthly report, but even that notable incident faded in significance in the face of the huge surprise she experienced shortly afterwards. This was an event that would take Cezar away from his family for good.

UP AND AWAY

Cezar was ten years old, but his level of perception, judgment and behavior was far above that age. He was little known by the other children in the neighborhood since he very rarely played with them. They looked upon him as if he were a freak and made up all sorts of mean stories about him, but Cezar would not mind them. His passion was to stay for long periods, even hours in a row, with his eyes closed, deeply absorbed in realities his parents had not the foggiest ideas about.

Listening to him telling me those things, I felt it was the right time to ask him myself about those experiences he went through in those absolutely special moments, experiments which were completely beyond the ken of other people. Cezar stood thinking for a few moments, obviously looking for the most appropriate words.

“It is very difficult to depict in ordinary terms certain realities that do not fall into the standard categories of logic and reason now prevailing, particularly in the Western view of life. Rather, these subtle worlds are closer to the stories of Hindu mystics telling about their spiritual experiences very much resembling those I have lived myself.”

That was the only time Cezar told me briefly about one of his mysterious states of mind and profound feelings that were so strange and unusual to ordinary people.

“Once I came back to physical reality completely dizzy, spending minutes in a row in an attempt to recognize the place where I was,” he continued his story. “Although my eyes were open, I could see as if through fog or, better said, I could not realize the objects around had contours that actually existed. Gradually and very slowly, I started to reconnect to my normal condition; then I clearly understood that there’s a certain link between the mind and the senses. I had been so deeply absorbed in certain subtle dimensions that I was far above that link.

“It is usually quite difficult to lose touch with the objective world, that is, to focus on your inner self as best as possible, oblivious to external sensations that one gets from one’s senses, but that was no longer a problem for me. Paradoxically, my difficulty back then lay in rebuilding the link between the mind and the senses so that I could get reintegrated into the external information cycle. No doubt my sight was very good and my eyes were open, but despite all that, I found it difficult to adapt to the normal conditions outside.

“For ease of understanding, imagine you have lived for several years in one of the biggest cities of the world where your standards of living have been very high. Untoward circumstances then take you to a deserted small island in the middle of the ocean where rocks and cliffs are the prevailing landscape and living conditions primitive. The leap backwards is huge and it will take you a while to adapt adequately.

“I realized on that occasion that the human mind is closely linked to bodily sensations but that it can also be free from sensations when firmly controlled and mastered through diligent practise. Sometimes, I would fall into trances so deep that my mother had to slap me out of them and back to objective reality. At other times, in the grip of the euphoric joy that I felt when I got out of meditation, I would strive in all honesty to explain to my parents what I went through in those moments which were associated with highly refined states of mind.

“Unfortunately, words are too weak to capture the richness of those nuanced states that go with subtle manifestations above physical reality. Highly elevated subtle worlds are often inconceivable to the ordinary standards of reference of a gregarious consciousness at physical level. Once, however, I did attempt to explain in words the perceptions I had in one such meditative experience. My parents had strongly insisted that I tell them about it.

“As a result, I told them that the only association of shapes and colors that came to mind and would have best answered the description of that highly refined subtle world I had accessed was a check pattern of irregularly thick red and yellow strips against an indigo background. I was very happy inspiration had helped with that suggestive imagery that rendered accurately the features of that world, but my enthusiasm faded almost immediately when I noted their disbelieving and compassionate looks. I then realized that any attempt at an explanation couldn’t possibly yield any notable result. Ignorance is a terrible limit to human evolution. I therefore gave up for good any attempt at explaining what was practically impossible to render.

“When I sank into deep meditation and practically left this world behind, the most notable sensation I perceived in those moments was an immense freedom of action and the clear feeling that I could grasp the mystery of any place or act on this planet. In time, I had learned how to explore realms farther and farther away, but you shouldn't imagine that this resembled a journey by means of transportation."

Indeed, in those moments I was attempting to imagine such a subtle experience at a mental level and thought it could be associated with the trek of a spacecraft in the sidereal universe. Cezar, however, immediately captured that thought of mine and then, full of understanding, alerted me to the correct imagery.

"The mental and causal worlds," he continued, "are governed by other laws and features a lot more comprehensive than those we are aware of at the physical level we inhabit. This, however, is not the subject of our meeting. Suffice it to say that in my 'travels' through subtle dimensions, I was never alone but firmly and precisely guided by a force I perceived as gigantic but full of love which would often explain and reveal to me many of the mysteries I was confronted with. Owing to this kind of subtle 'protection,' I made my way successfully through the early years of my childhood and the psychic experiences, some of them very strange, that I lived."

Cezar stood silent for a few moments. I then wanted with all my heart to be one day able to learn about those mysteries of superior worlds which might have offered me a viable answer with respect to my part in this world. In a more or less obvious way, each of us has felt this impulse at least once in our lives, but most of the times it is destiny that shows us the way to act on that impulse or not. As far as I am concerned, I considered Cezar Brad to be the "voice" of my destiny and I was very anxious to learn, with his help, as much as possible about initiation and its many sides which are often much obscured.

The first major change in Cezar's life came up in 1980. The Brads were known as a "strange" family among neighbors, especially because they built almost no ties. They also clammed up and would only give half-answers to questions. On the other hand, Cezar spent more and more time alone in his room, deeply absorbed in his meditations. Events happened quickly in a manner characteristic of the Securitate whose oppressive and abusive practices were already widely known at that time.

At the beginning of January that year, on a quiet winter day with big and fluffy snowflakes falling shiningly white over the little town at the foot of the mountains, Cezar came back from school in a state of inner ebullience, the root causes of which he himself could not explain very well. Eagerly, as he almost always did upon coming back home, he went into his room and sat himself on the bed in his favorite position, his legs crossed and ready for the deepest of meditations. Already familiar with his habits, his mother did not disturb him but told him he would have to come and have lunch in a short while.

What happened in the following hours puts a human being's good faith to a hard test. I shall attempt a faithful description of the event using Cezar's very words after more than twenty years following the day of his memorable experience.

"Pretty quickly, I entered the vastness of the mental realm which was then already familiar to me and sank into the contemplation of some abstract aspects related to the archetypal energies of what we call 'air.' When I was deep in meditation, the world around was completely changed. I was always invigorated by an inexhaustible stream of energy, and at the same time felt absolutely free and ravenous for knowledge. I am speaking about knowledge that is far above the profane knowledge we come across in books and handbooks. Modern scientific knowledge itself is pretty limited, particularly because it is based on effects but does not grasp their fundamental root causes. The knowledge I am speaking about is not discursive but deeply intuitive and spiritual. This knowledge can't be understood theoretically but can be acquired by direct experience.

"Consciousness, which then vibrates in a different function of the subject of meditation, no longer perceives the limits of the physical body. I had therefore sunk into the sublime world of a sound coming from everywhere. In fact, I rather had the sensation of an illuminating sound full of pure and extremely refined energy. The general sensation I then felt was one of infinite, boundless splendor. I don't remember how much time had passed since my immersion into that infusion of sound and light, but it couldn't have been more than an hour. I was vaguely aware of my body and the world around and, at a given moment, I felt a faint quiver in my feet and the slight swing of my physical body which, in a strange manner, I could almost see from outside.

“It was a sensation of relative instability but I was not worried since I had had similar experiences before. Still, something strange was happening because I couldn’t feel the presence of any foundation. It was as if I were no longer seated on the bed. Half awake, I opened my eyes and then startled because I was up in the air, about half a meter above the bed. My legs were crossed, almost as in the initial position but hanging slightly down. My body was very slowly swinging in the air but staying mostly in the same area. I was not scared but rather overexcited with the strong emotion that was traversing my whole body. I was thinking that in the future I would have to control this phenomenon very well unless I wanted to give rise to serious problems and complications in my life. Right when I was pondering on this, my mother suddenly opened the door to ask me to lunch. I think you can easily imagine what followed. She did not faint but was very scared and leaned against the wall, looking at me in awe. Somewhat shocked by the noise of the door opening suddenly and by my mother’s muffled scream, I myself came back to normal conditions in a tougher manner, falling to one side and onto the bed. I felt a vague sensation of nausea and pain in my neck.”

Cezar told me about that event in a simple and natural manner and without being at all intent on persuading me of the truth of his story. At the same time, he wanted to make me understand that the revelation of a peculiar aspect or the belief in anything is not usually the direct result of satisfying some banal curiosity. I clearly felt that had I then requested such proof, I would have been confronted with a polite refusal.

On another occasion, Cezar told me that those with certain paranormal powers who have deeply understood the significance, cause and mission of those powers will never act haughtily to prove their special abilities to other people and will never use their supernatural powers for selfish personal purposes. That is why those individuals will never wish for their merits to be acknowledged and will not seek fame, which is transient. In addition, those who are genuine in their knowledge, experience and powers will not try to convince the suspicious, the materialistic and the distrustful because true conviction must first come from within in order for it to be stable and bear fruit in the future.

The minds of most people are weak and unprepared for the shock of some realities. To fill in this gap, they usually take an arrogant and ironic attitude to “forbidden” subjects which are those subjects on the borderline between the material world and the subtle realms of Creation. Their distrust, in fact, betrays the lack of their will for knowledge at the basis of which lies a deep feeling of fear of the unknown. They often delude both themselves and other people by claiming that if they witness a demonstration of paranormal powers which is not a scam, they will immediately believe that there is more to the world than the physical universe. Experience has shown that in the case of such a demonstration, the shock to which a raw mind is exposed is often too unexpected and strong for its low level of understanding.

Generally speaking, spectators to such demonstrations react in two possible ways. They either continue to deny, even vehemently, what they have just requested and then seen with their own eyes. This sometimes degenerates into veritable fits of hysteria. If not in denial, they resort to some sort of formal acceptance under the spur of the moment which in fact is shorn of inner conviction. This acceptance will very soon give way to old disbeliefs like a wall of psychic protection against what cannot be understood or could trouble the daily routine of their humdrum existence.

I have thus understood that, in time, practice leads to belief as even the efforts we are then making are, in a certain way, a kind of belief. In fact, the great majority of people believe firmly in something, but their belief is wrongly targeted in a destructive and perverted manner. Thus, many people strongly believe they don't believe and this is enough to open the floodgates to fears and doubts; angst and prejudice; and thus deprive them of the capacity to understand the very essence of things. But, the greatest drawback is that they fetter their souls and almost without realizing it. They become shallow, selfish and emotionally flat, lacking in the force and pulsation of genuine feelings. Most often, it is human beings themselves who set limits to their own potential.

Smaranda Brad may have been as yet unprepared for what she had seen. That day, her understanding had been put to a hard test but it seems she had not had the necessary power to experience the emotion of the unknown. When Nicolae Brad came back from work, his wife told him about the incident. They both agreed they should inform the new contact person (Colonel Datcu had been promoted and moved to another town).

Late at night, a car pulled up in front of their house and two Securitate agents got off. This time, Doctor Xien was not present. The event that had been mentioned in the report called for a different set of measures and a different protocol. Under the pretext of a special control to which he had to be subjected, the agents took Cezar with them, got him into the car, and sped off in the thick of the night. That was the last time he saw his parents.

Chapter Two — Department Zero

In 1980, thirteen years after this “occult” department had been established in the Securitate, several objectives were achieved that enabled a clearer picture of the policy to be followed towards fulfilling the purpose for which the department had been created. At the beginning, Ceausescu’s “whim” to set up the department had created much confusion and many teething problems. In the 1980’s, however, a pretty well defined organizational structure had been set in place and adequate logistical concerns were satisfied.

In fact, financing had been a “hot” issue from the very beginning as Ceausescu – in an apparently inexplicable manner – had “forgotten” to make clear how funding would be secured. On the other hand, nobody had been brave enough to shatter the confusion of the early days. In front of the Communist Dictator, any such venture would have been tantamount to defiance or at least incompetence. Both interpretations would have incurred great problems for and put an end to the career of any “enterprising” spirit. The funding method was the one that was usually applied in extreme cases: the absolute order of the Head of the State would be invoked and funding would be secured by collecting from amounts available to other fields. That was the compromise employed for the first three years after the department had been set up.

With the passage of time, things changed for the better and two secret operational bases were made available: one located close to the town of B... and the other in the Retezat Mountains, a short distance away from Valea Ursului (a fictional town used to protect the real location). Due to the fact that a logistics base of sorts had been growing since the department had been set up, as of 1972, new fund-attraction tactics were employed consisting of repeated “diplomatic” interventions with Ceausescu at carefully chosen moments. Convinced and even enthusiastic about the prospects that the development of the department could have offered, he gave instructions that Department Zero be financially supported by two “fictitious companies” in Uruguay. These companies were passed off as intermediaries of oil businesses in official papers but were in fact specialized in laundering proceeds from the illicit transactions of the Latin Mafia. “Revita Unio” and “Nann & Co.” were the two companies that provided fabulous amounts of money for the Ceausescus, being managed at that time by a real genius in the field. This was General Meres, a man I had the opportunity of meeting personally. He is probably one of the few people who had a correct intuition – long before the final stage – of the end of the Communist system in Europe and of Ceausescu's downfall or, more accurately, of the circumstances in which that was to happen.

"Mark my words, Radu dear," he said. "There are unsuspected forces at play eating at the root of this... people servicing the smoke-screen and undermining Ceausescu, his conceited impulses, the economy ... and they don't operate from within. But my and my family's future is secured. Notorean from the Securitate knows all that, but I'm too well placed to be deposed. I don't think this situation can continue for more than two or three years from now."

This discussion took place some time in 1988 and I must admit that it was somewhat portentous because, in an upsurge of inspired rhetoric, the General then surmised that Ceausescu had no chance of making a "clean" escape from the fury of the people and that the same occult forces (which he would not name back then) would hatch not only his downfall but also the gradual takeover of power. The subsequent political and economic evolution of the country confirmed his words with a vengeance.

Meres made a sudden disappearance in 1989, shortly before the Revolution. He could not have chosen a better moment since the "commotion" that gripped the Communist system in the Europe of those times did not allow the necessary time for a thorough investigation to find the "traitor" as the usual procedure would have required. Although he relied on his huge influence and secret power, acting almost always in the backstage, General Meres had never dropped any hint about the place where he and his family might take refuge. His complex personality made him act like a very strong and influential but practically unseen and unknown puppeteer.

I was one of the few people who had access to his close entourage, but even so, I knew almost nothing about him or his very discreet life. His sense of self-preservation, his refined ego and exceptional intuition in business led to his remarkable financial success in the management of the two companies. These, in turn, had been set up due to his very strong diplomatic relations on which Ceausescu himself would sometimes fall back on to achieve various ends. Though a mere rumor at the beginning, it is now a certainty in the upper corridors of power that Meres was the main character who saw to the opening and replenishment of the controversial financial account of the Ceausescu's, the value of which was estimated at approximately one billion dollars.

It is only the General and perhaps two or three other people who know exactly how much money was deposited in that account and what its current situation is – this being an issue with enormous interests at play. It is nevertheless easy to assume that General Meres, whom Ceausescu had given a free hand when fully entrusting him with the task of managing the two fictitious companies in Uruguay, did not stop at replenishing the dictator's personal account but also lined his own pockets with huge amounts of foreign currency. Ceausescu might have been aware of this but that was the only instance when he did not take punitive measures since his own financial interest was at stake, and identifying an equally suitable replacement would have been difficult and also very sensitive.

One can therefore surmise that a tacit and mutually advantageous agreement had been established between Meres and Ceausescu, with each pretending not to be interested in the thoughts of the other. That is why the position of General Meres in the political and economic machinery of the state was entirely special and those who knew him regarded him as a kind of "gray eminence". In a way, Meres was indestructible and as far as I am aware, that was the only situation Ceausescu accepted without any comment in his entire career as Communist Dictator.

It is most likely that, at present, Meres lives his golden age on one of the Balearic Islands or in the splendors of Crete, watching from a distance – a malicious smile on his face – the workings of power in Bucharest. From a different perspective, Romania lost a man of exceptional organizational and decisive abilities. General Meres might have been one of the main pillars of the state but at the same time, it is almost certain that he was in on certain secrets which made him "retire" before his time. His intuition and diplomatic experience thus helped him a great deal in retiring at the best possible moment.

Ceausescu ordered that Department Zero be financed generously from the funds that Meres managed at the two companies abroad. From 1968 to 1980, Department Zero was led by no fewer than five heads of departments, but of them all, only Colonel Obadea stood out (after his appointment in 1979) by dint of his enterprising spirit and new ideas that helped a lot with improving the activity of the department.

As the field of activity of that Securitate Department was still relatively obscure at the time and nobody had any experience or ideas about what had to be done, Obadea had the great opportunity of being given great decision-making freedom at a time when the department was made independent and its activities listed under the top secret category. This implicitly meant that Colonel Obadea's position in the hierarchy of state power was somewhat similar to a Minister's position. However, due to his entirely special involvement with the apparatus of the Securitate, the Colonel's position was in theory weightier and even more influential, being closer to that of a Minister of State, but impossible to wield in the political sphere.

In structuring the Department of which he was the head, Colonel Obadea followed a simple principle: information should be passed on directly (with recourse to one intermediary at most) and operations run on a skeleton staff. At the same time, however, it was necessary that those who were selected to work for the department be highly competent and even professionals in their fields.

The Colonel had the instinct that in order to implement those basic ideas, no compromise could be made. He needed special equipment and above all, paramilitary elite specially trained for unusual interventions. Given the protocol associated with his position, Colonel Obadea was one of the few people who had direct and immediate access to Ceausescu, irrespective of the circumstances.

Reports were presented to the dictator by Obadea himself and then handed to him on the same day because – as a measure of maximum security – they were typed in one copy and then signed and sealed only by the Colonel. His position was so strong that he did not need to explain his actions to anyone other than the President of the State and the Head of the Securitate. On the other hand, however, he had the power of requesting the assistance and support of any institution in the country. A private phone line was established between him and Ceausescu and information and reports received from Department Zero were categorized as State Secrets – classification level: 5. Access was only granted to Ceausescu, the Head of the Securitate, the Chief of Staff and, of course, Obadea himself.

Initially (shortly after being appointed as head of Department Zero), the Colonel had presented the Dictator with a list of sixteen proposals making up the essential infrastructure for a flawless operation of the department. Ceausescu approved them all. Subsequently, however, acting on his specific cunning and his fear that Obadea's power might set a dangerous precedent, Ceausescu created some "safety valves." As a consequence, the Colonel could no longer act and interfere with all the institutions in the country but only with those operating in fields related to the activity of the department. The limits of this clarification, however, were very fuzzy. One other restriction was that Obadea was no longer allowed access to other state secrets or those of the Securitate apart from classified information emerging from his own department. Finally, when requested, he had to accept the Head of the Securitate having the possibility to write fact-finding reports for Ceausescu's use but without the Head of the Securitate having any decision making rights.

Still, due to the specificity of the Department, those slight "amendments" did not trouble Colonel Obadea much. His excellent performance in the years that followed proved his professionalism and ability to handle the often complicated relations with his subordinates. These extraordinary security measures turned out to be highly efficient even several years after the Revolution which proved that Department Zero had been founded on very solid and secure ground.

My belief is that the secrets in Department Zero files were better kept than even army secrets or foreign intelligence. Those files were presented to Ceausescu and bore several marks as in the diagram below:

THE SECRET
STATE ARCHIVE
No. 00345789/Section I

LEVEL OF INFORMATION: 5

The President of the State
TOP SECRET REPORT — ZERO DEPARTMENT

No. 9, Unique record Concerning the gallery or from Cave Stani

After the Head of the State took note of the content of the reports and had a summary discussion with Obadea, the file was handed to the Colonel and locked away in a special safe in his office located at the operational base in Valea Ursului. Prior to that, the file was sealed with a wide red tape and a lead seal. The tape bore the words:

LIMITED ACCESS:

1. PRESIDENT OF THE COUNTRY
2. THE HEAD OF THE ZERO DEPARTMENT
3. THE HEAD OF SECURITY

SERIES: A1-NO.9 (THE SECRET STATE ARCHIVE)

In the thick web of units and departments of the Securitate, the Army and the Ministry of the Interior, Department Zero stood out as an island apart, almost Western in its outlook and separated from the other activities of the state by its very specificity. That was the general framework when Cezar was brought to the secret base close to B... in 1980.

By comparison to living standards back home, Cezar had access to all the comfort and exceptional technical equipment at the base. The design and the construction of the base had been entrusted to a specialized company in the United States and the technology and equipment ordered and imported from the Netherlands.

The building had been made operational almost one year before, shortly after Colonel Obadea had been appointed head of the department. It had two main bodies: one earmarked for the staff and routine activities and the other – larger and more sophisticated – earmarked for those who were selected and brought in. The larger area consisted of several apartments, a kitchen, a cafeteria and an isolated laboratory area where experiments were carried out.

The base area was surrounded by a high concrete wall and access in the neighborhood was restricted within a one-hundred-meter range under military guard. Apparently, the entire area had all the marks of a simple military unit arousing neither suspicion nor any special interest. Supplies came in once a week so as to keep contact with the outside world to a minimum.

When Cezar arrived, four more subjects were already there: three children and one adult. Each was assigned to one of the stylish apartments in the main building which they were allowed to leave only at certain hours. Their schedule was not very busy, but security was very strict. There was a staff of ten – nine men and a woman, aged 35-40 years — who acted as advisor to the mysterious Doctor Xien. I will not go any further with such details although Cezar did give me a thorough description of the place and its activities.

Subsequently, by a combination of favorable circumstances, I was allowed to visit the place and I must admit it impressed me deeply. Even if at that time the base did not serve the same purpose as in the '80s, its activity continued under very strict and secret conditions.

Cezar spent five years in that military campus. He quickly realized that his relationship with his parents was probably over for good, but at least the place offered him unsuspected possibilities to develop his special abilities. He met his mates either during recreation and sports hours or during Doctor Xien's special classes. Each of them was endowed with certain powers which Cezar described to me in brief and with much humor.

For instance, one of the children, a boy aged 14, stood out by the sheer width of his umbilical cord – about ten centimeters in diameter – covering a large part of his abdomen. Irrespective of weather conditions, he would wear only one pair of thin cotton trousers. His name was Eduard. His psychic radiation was so strong that anybody around him felt somewhat uneasy and insecure and even gripped by a feeling of fear, the origin of which was not clear but which shortly became overwhelming. Those sensations were felt when Eduard was calm and relaxed, but if for any reason he got angry, small spark-like flashes were visible around his body and particularly around his head. At such moments, the objects in his immediate surroundings would break or get distorted. That was why his apartment was mostly equipped with wooden and plastic objects as those were easier to replace. In summer time, his apartment was connected to a special air-cooling system because he could not bear temperatures in excess of twenty degrees Celsius. The air conditioning option was not satisfactory because, as Eduard said, though cool, the air was short of its energetic, vital element. In other words, it was “dead” air bringing more harm than benefits.

The boy’s main paranormal ability was his telekinetic power which is the ability to set material objects in motion by the sheer force of his will, without touching them. From a distance, Eduard was able to lift objects up in the air, maintaining their position or moving them around for minutes in a row. Though not much impressed by his mate’s abilities, Cezar nevertheless told me that Eduard’s greatest achievement came when, following hard concentration, he extracted and lifted a water sphere which he then moved around the room.

Another boy, Octavian, almost as old as Cezar himself, did not stand out obviously for having any special gift. His endowment, however, was exceptional in that he could foresee, in broad terms, events that were to take place within a range of 10-20 hours from the present into the future. I found out that Octavian gradually improved his performance to 28 hours into the future and his predictions were more and more precise. Nevertheless, as Cezar told me, he was never able to go beyond that limit.

Officials had a special interest in him which meant the boy enjoyed special treatment. Even during recreation hours, when the children were at play, he was permanently accompanied by a stiff and sturdy man whose task was to supervise that the boy was not making predictions for anybody around. This precaution was quite futile as Octavian was rather lonely, pensive, and even apathetic at times. He was of thin constitution, his eyes deep in their sockets, and often deeply absorbed in thought far away from any outside influence. Cezar described him as a special boy even among those with paranormal powers. That strange ability of his to perceive the future within a certain time range was not simply intuitive as is the case with most people who associate this ability with card-reading, coffee-reading or any other similar pursuit.

“Everything that happens, everything that unfolds in this universe, any act, action, thought, emotion or feeling is ‘stored’ with high fidelity on a sort of subtle ‘support,’” Cezar told me, thus answering my natural queries.

“By way of analogy, it is a ‘record’ that can be compared within certain limits with the way in which instances of your life or somebody else’s is stored on a photo film when a camera is used. Otherwise, investigating the past or the future wouldn’t be possible.”

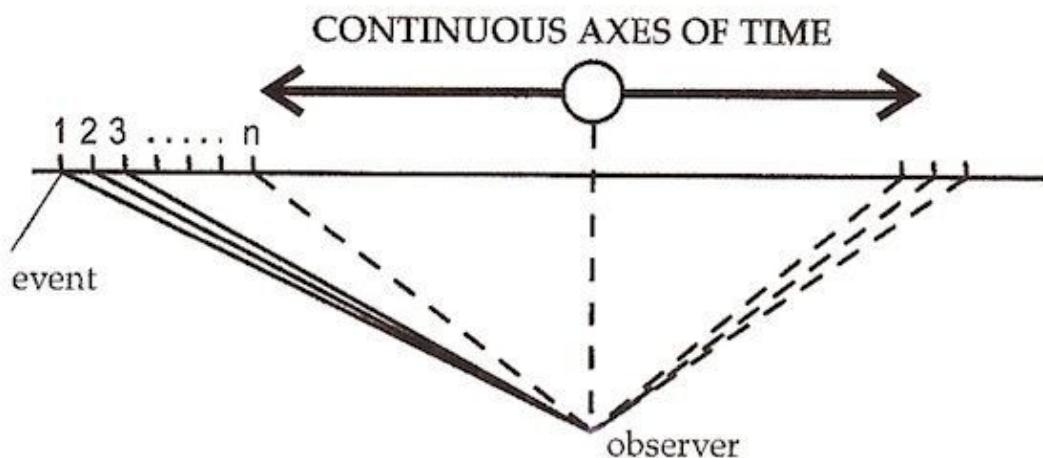

I then chipped in, somewhat shyly, but puzzled: “And still, how is it possible to get a vision of the future since the future hasn’t even happened?”

Cezar gave a slight smile.

“Apparently, your logic is healthy. What you don’t probably know yet is that time in itself is an illusory notion. Of course, time has a subtle energy but this is modulated by the specificity of our consciousness or perception. For instance, the same time interval – say one hour – is perceived subjectively by different people because, to some, ‘time passes slowly’ while to others ‘time passes quickly.’ Others may even say that ‘time passed in the blink of an eye.’ Perceptions are different although the time interval is the same. Man’s consciousness gets only the illusion of the past or the future because, in their turn, these notions derive from the fragmented perception ordinary human beings have of time. Now, imagine that this extremely subtle form of energy we call time looks – metaphorically speaking – like a continuous strip or an unrolled photo film.”

Cezar then made a simple sketch on a piece of paper so that the explanations he was giving could be as clear as possible. I was eager to learn from him new secrets about realities that, until then, were inaccessible to my knowledge. Noting my attitude of sincerity on repeated occasions, Cezar tacitly accepted to guide me, like a true master, through the deceitful shadows beyond which lies true initiating knowledge.

“The time axis is continuous but people have a split perception of it, quantified into a past and a future. In common terms, the present is relative because the present moment becomes the past in the next moment; in its turn, the next moment becomes the new present, although one moment before it was the future.

“Being continuous, time is like an unfolding strip. People live in this very ‘time strip’ and identify themselves with its partial aspects; they no longer perceive the whole of the time strip which is continuous but fragments of it – a past and a future – as their consciousness itself is limited only to a fragment of knowledge. Now, let’s assume this consciousness expands and grows like a huge sphere engulfing almost the entire universe in its field of perception and knowledge. This expansion is enough to go beyond the time barrier which one then perceives as a unitary whole that is forever present. Past and future lose their relative sense. Then, he who experiences this level of consciousness becomes a sort of detached observer with a very large field of ‘vision’ at his disposal.

“By way of analogy, one is like a tourist in a town full of traditions. At the beginning of the journey, one walks the streets and visits all the interesting places, one by one, because one doesn’t have the possibility of seeing everything at a time. Buildings, people, cars and trees – they all stand in the way. But as soon as one gets up high into the air, as if in a balloon, one can see the entire town at a single glance. Any area or building one may be looking for can be instantly spotted because the whole hustle and bustle of the town – though fragmented to the different inhabitants in its different areas – can be viewed simultaneously and in all its details as a whole. I hope this analogy is descriptive enough for you to understand this time problem as well as possible. Traveling in time is nothing else than the expansion of consciousness which then has access to the reality of the energy of time. This is difficult to achieve and few people get to master and control it to perfection. But there are intermediary stages as well. Octavian was in one of those stages. Unfortunately, in 1984, he was relocated and I have never seen him since.”

Although I had grasped the gist of the explanations, I still had a few queries. For instance, it was not clear how consciousness could expand or how by an act of will one could perceive a certain fragment of time. No sooner had those problems sprung to mind than Cezar replied instantly before I had the time to ask the question:

“In order to be able to really travel in time at a conscious level, one needs a particularly refined perception and level of knowledge. Once the temporal ‘target’ is established at mental level, focusing one’s mental energy on that area will trigger a resonance process whereby one gets to actually ‘live’ in the respective time interval and perfectly identify oneself with the frames of mind, emotions and features of those times, much like a spectator at a film who somehow becomes part of the reality of that film. In other words, one can see, hear, smell, taste and touch exactly as one would normally do in one’s own time frame except that sensations are felt as there and then because they already happened. This in fact gives one the certainty that the experience of time travelling was a true one rather than the illusory product of a rampant imagination. Of course, there is also a possibility for the physical body to travel in time, but the way in which this can be achieved individually requires more complex explanations. Besides, the motivation for such a journey must be very strong and important because, at the time of the journey, there are major interferences.”

For the moment, I was satisfied with those clarifications and, deep down, I sincerely set myself the goal of getting to experience those fascinating realities myself. During the time he spent at the base in B..., Cezar made remarkable progress, developing his perception skills and abilities for subtle action. Some of his extraordinary spiritual experiences were known to the mysterious Doctor Xien who, with much competence and care, had shown Cezar the way all that while and whenever difficulties came up.

Doctor Xien and his assistant suddenly disappeared shortly after the Revolution in 1989, but nobody seemed to know how and why that had happened. The general point of view was that a long contract of collaboration was over. I am sure Cezar knew the truth about it but for some reason, he did not want to give me more details.

The contacts between Cezar and the other occupants of the establishment were very few in number and only circumstantial, the rules in this respect being very hard and fast. In fact, until the beginning of 1986, he was the only one to be kept at that location without being transferred. None of those whom he found there in 1980 stayed there until his departure. As time passed, his mates were sent to other locations, but the reasons for those transfers remained unknown. Other people would be brought in, but Cezar could not find out much about them because they were transferred quite quickly.

1986 was a “turning point” in Cezar’s life and reached a climax with an extraordinary spiritual experience. The events of those times were nevertheless closely linked to the presence and actions of the head of Department Zero, Colonel Obadea. He greatly appreciated Cezar and the two of them often discussed various issues relating to the activity of the department. Though a teenager, Cezar’s personality was nowhere near the “normality” associated with that age. The life and experience at the base in B... unfolded to other standards, a lot higher than those of the outside world. The place appeared to belong eerily to a parallel world where the laws of physics and the concepts and ideas of its inhabitants no longer obeyed unanimously accepted norms.

It is true that, as the head of Department Zero, Colonel Obadea saw mostly to military, security, administrative and even political issues; but he was also fully aware of the content of each “subject’s” secret file, following the activity and achievements of everybody who was brought there with much interest. At that time, Obadea was one of the few Securitate people of impeccable moral conduct and kept an open mind. At the same time, he was also politically canny against the various forces and interests at play.

Subsequent events were to prove that the Colonel’s plans and ideas had already been put into practice in that period, but let us not anticipate.

In 1986, a clash of interests was smouldering between Obadea and the Head of the Securitate who was not much in favor of the “independence” of the department. The latter had already run several checks at Department Zero bases. There was no justification to prompt those checks, but that was a way of gradually “undermining” Obadea’s position in front of Ceausescu with reports ending on an unfavorable note being submitted to the Dictator. The idea was to depose Obadea and absorb Department Zero into the general structure of the Securitate which would have enabled decision making powers over the department. The scheme, however, was only half-baked and short of finesse. Ceausescu himself, who was known for his suspicious mind, did not pay the Head of the Securitate much attention, but tension was there. That was why Obadea had to act carefully and take a winding course to bypass the vigilance of his superior, the head of the Securitate.

That year, the Colonel made the surprising decision that Cezar should visit his family which he justified by a so-called “shaky” emotional balance of the subject that had to be restored.

“In reality,” Cezar said with a slight smile, “Obadea’s intention was entirely different. The visit was only a smoke screen, a red herring for a much more important action. As far as I was concerned, I was fully aware of my family’s situation even if I was physically apparently isolated from my parents. For instance, I ‘knew’ that my father had died two years before in a stupid accident; and with much difficulty, my mother had recovered after the loss. You must be wondering how I got to know that without leaving the base and without anybody informing me about what had happened. I can tell you it was only my physical body that was restricted in its movement, but I had very great freedom of thought and action in other subtle bodies.”

In response to the bewilderment and distrust that could be read on my face, Cezar continued to explain with goodwill and patience.

“Your doubt stems from a lack of knowledge about essential realities. It’s as if you wore a coat padded out with money about which you know absolutely nothing. You continue to wear it, but you go begging every day to support yourself. I think you have already understood we are far more than a physical body with a weight attached. Practical experience will prove this to you without a trace of doubt. You will then discover that a different body, a lot more ‘flexible’ and ‘light,’ if I can say so, is at your disposal to make known to you many other secrets and mysteries. Of course, this body that is more subtle in nature than the physical body is itself governed by certain laws and restrictions because there are structures in us that are yet a lot more refined and subtle than this other body; but by comparison to the physical body, this one is located in a higher dimension which the occult and the initiated call the ‘astral dimension.’

“Acquiring the ability of being conscious about your own astral body as one is about the physical body is a relatively easy process to some people. It involves a certain degree of purification and elevation of consciousness at that level. There are very many human beings who have lived at least one such experience which papers in the field call ‘conscious astral division’ or ‘extrasensory experience.’ Such an experience can happen accidentally: for instance, such as after a strong emotion or during REM sleep when, for shorter or longer periods, one is aware one is dreaming. Or, they can happen by an act of will, whenever one pleases, but that is more difficult to achieve. Some people who have already attained a high degree of development of their psychic and spiritual abilities are perfectly aware of their astral body; even when they live and act normally in their physical body. But this involves a highly elevated level of individual consciousness development about which we shall not be talking now.

“Generally, those who live the experience of conscious astral division want to get information about or access to special places or circumstances due to some mean or selfish interests they are pursuing. The method is and was used with a certain margin of error in military, economic or even political espionage by the great powers of the world. Yet, those who make use of this psychic power in a selfish manner are confronted with repeated failure, disillusion and stagnation at inferior levels of thought and behavior because they don't know or simply ignore certain essential laws that describe the harmony and relation between the act and its result. By way of analogy, it's the same as when a pipe through which water runs freely gets gradually stuck on accumulating dirt to the point of blockage. That is why many of those who, at the beginning stages, enjoyed the various psychic powers they had acquired or had already had could in time note a gradual diminution of those powers and to the point of total loss in some cases.

"This must make you understand the particular importance of responsibility for an action in such cases. You should know that in their great majority, and particularly for reasons of ignorance or lethargy, people prefer to deny the things or facts to which they don't have direct access through their senses or direct experience. But only a few – due to a certain degree of elevation they have attained – actually realize that the freedom of action they enjoy in conscious astral division experiences is a reality they must use in a constructive rather than selfish manner.

"One can then notice and know aspects of daily life that are relatively ordinary, but it is also possible to learn secrets that some people would want to know but cannot know. Just as there are barriers at the physical level, there are also certain "barriers" at the astral level blocking access to information about certain secret places or aspects. Still, the freedom for action and movement is way beyond the possibilities at the physical level. Obstacles and barriers at the astral level are meant to serve as a selection process for those who want to learn certain secrets and mysteries.

"This is done by taking into account both their specific vibrational frequency and the reason behind the act. At the astral level, movement obeys principles that are entirely different from those in the physical world, being triggered by an act of will and happening either at a certain speed – usually very high – or almost instantly to any spot on this planet, whether under water, underground, above ground or in the air.

"More special in nature are travels in cosmic space to other planets or celestial bodies when, at the first stage, experiences should be limited to our solar system. At a later stage, however, as some aspects and secret laws of the universe are gradually understood correctly, travels can extend to galactic level, allowing for the exploration of various areas in our galaxy.

As far as the projections of our individual consciousness at an intergalactic level are concerned, these are possible by means of other bodies a lot more subtle than the astral one, but we shall not be talking about this here and now.

“What I mostly wanted to make you understand is that physical matter has no influence whatsoever on the movement of the astral body. Instead, this movement is obstructed by certain subtle forces and entities acting at certain ‘points’ or in certain ‘key areas’ at both astral and physical levels where access to information is restricted.

“For instance, this sort of restriction can be met where protection must be secured as in the case with treasures or special and secret storehouses, certain gates, galleries or quick access pathways to other spots on the planet or even other worlds. At other times, astral ‘obstacles’ restrict access to certain occult initiations or mysteries that are protected by specially summoned guardian entities. These should not be construed as immutable restrictions but they concern mostly those who are not sufficiently evolved and therefore not yet ready to confront certain mysteries without being intent on using them for personal and selfish purposes. There is a lot more to be said about the practical ways of acquiring conscious astral division powers as well as about other details concerning the very experience of astral division, but the time will come when we can talk about all this in detail.

“For now, suffice it to say that Colonel Obadea’s real intention was not to send me to the town of F... to visit my mother – obviously under special security measures – but to take me on a very secret journey to the Monastery of Cernica near Bucharest. You do understand that in those times it was highly dangerous for top political or military officials to visit religious establishments. The Communist regime – atheistic through its very doctrine – would condemn any such approach from the very beginning under the threat of commensurate punishment.

“I knew nothing about the destination of our journey until we got to the gate of the monastery. I was accompanied by Colonel Obadea, and we travelled at night by helicopter from the base to Bucharest and in an off-road vehicle from Bucharest to Cernica. On the way, the Colonel told me he wanted me to meet and talk with a clergyman, a very special priest who, he said, was a real saint endowed with great powers and divine grace.

“Once at the gate of the monastery, I saw many cars full of people who had come from all over the country to visit the monastery or pray in all their faith. In fact, Obadea told me that almost everybody waiting on the highway had come there to talk with that hermit called Arsenie Boca.

The Colonel had already planned the meeting several days in advance. While we were walking through the courtyard heading for the hermit’s cell, I could note the presence of two guards in mufti who had taken position on both sides of the cell’s door. The two men were there for security reasons so that we would not be disturbed throughout the discussion. Although it was not yet dawn and the weather outside was pretty cold, several monks were moving hurriedly through the courtyard without making any noise, probably heading for their morning prayers.

“Before entering the cell, Obadea told me, ‘The only thing I want from you is that you talk openly with Father Arsenie. We’ll be alone with him and this discussion must remain secret. We’ve got many enemies.’

“I agreed tacitly. The Colonel was an intelligent and capable man who knew how to navigate his way through the ‘meanderings’ of the Communist system imposed by Ceausescu and who had a correct intuition that the days of his dictatorship were practically numbered. That was in 1986. At that time, the Colonel’s ability consisted mostly in leaving the impression of a flawless performance as head of the department in parallel with preparing the ground for ‘the new transition.’

“He had been kept as head of the department for seven years, a very rare case by the standards of those times – and he did not want to make any wrong move, particularly when the hope of a new beginning lurked for the entire country. Any action to that end had to be planned in minute detail and carried out extremely carefully. The change that almost everybody – both the population and even some political or military officials — hoped for was imminent but it had to occur in circumstances of maximum security to prevent possible failure. Plotting and building up groups had turned out to be dangerous, and trusting others was almost impossible. Obadea had been left with only a very narrow room to maneuver, namely the specificity of Department Zero. If used intelligently, that room to maneuver could nevertheless prove effective.

The Colonel had no political aspirations for himself nor did he want to make himself rich in business. He was mostly interested in that transition and in maintaining and developing under the best conditions what he had achieved with the department. He had a special practical vision of events and showed great respect for and trust in occult phenomena and initiating aspects, trying to combine as usefully as possible the elements and circumstances of physical life with subtle methods for action. Cautiously, Colonel Obadea would first consider each move before it could prove fatal.

Given his situation, it was not his position that would have been the great loss but his very life. Even if his relationship with Ceausescu were quite good, he could not afford to make any mistake. He knew the Dictator would not have thought twice before executing him should his intentions be exposed. ‘Wolves are always on the prowl,’ he would tell me.

“Obadea’s plan was quite simple: if any enquiring voices had been heard or troublesome questions asked about the visit to Cernica, he would have justified everything by the ‘specificity of the department’s activity.’ He would have called upon some top secret ‘checks’ and ‘experiments.’ If, on the other hand, everything had been normal, the mystery of our talk with Father Arsenie Boca would have been known only to three persons.

“The hermit died three years later in 1989, shortly before the Revolution. That meant I was the only one left who knew the secret, but I was a relatively ‘blocked’ source for the outside world. Of course, in the event of an inquiry, things would not have been simple at all, but that option seemed to the Colonel to be the least dangerous.

“I would also like you to understand that Obadea let six years pass before deciding to trust me more. I am sure he studied carefully all the files Doctor Xien was keeping on me. He observed my behavior in different circumstances from a distance and even had me indirectly tested. That explains why, unlike all of my colleagues there, I was never transferred from the base in B... It was in Cernica that I realized instantly and intuitively that Obadea was intent on preparing me secretly or ‘training’ me for certain future plans. His initiative was made easier by the fact that, in my turn, I liked the Colonel and I was aware of his sincere and kind nature.”

Cezar’s story sent an unsuspected chill throughout my body. I had also heard about Arsenie Boca, the great saint and father confessor from the Monastery of Sambata in Ardeal, and I knew he had been oppressed by the Communist system. The news of his divine grace and powers had long travelled the length and breadth of the country but was suppressed by the typical Communist ideology and way of action. In order to prevent the people from coming in droves to visit the hermit for his blessings, the authorities would move him secretly from one monastery to another or place the monasteries under guard; thus not allowing him to talk to the people.

On very rare occasions, Father Arsenie was also moved to Cernica. Rumor had it that the hermit’s occasional presence in that holy establishment was due to interventions by some political officials of the time, even top officials, so that they could visit and talk to him in private without exposure to much risk. Even if it had not been politicians who had Arsenie Boca moved to Cernica near Bucharest, it is nevertheless well known that they repeatedly had secret meetings and private conversations with the father throughout the years.

On the occasion of Cezar’s and the Colonel’s visit to Cernica, the situation was slightly different. It was not Cezar who had asked for a meeting with Father Arsenie and it was not he who wanted to learn anything special from the father. Cezar had already lived through some very deep spiritual experiences which the hermit perceived as soon as he set eyes on Cezar. Surely, the meeting was one of the strangest and most mysterious of all meetings ever.

Cezar resumed the thread of his story.

“Indeed, at the dawn of that day, the situation at Cernica was rather strange. Nobody knew what was happening, who had come or what was supposed to be next. This relative restlessness, however, was evident on the outside among those believers waiting to be allowed access to the monastery and was aggravated by uncertainties, various other rumors and assumptions.

“I later learned that, at a certain moment, the people there had been gripped with a chill of fear at the rumor that Father Arsenie could be arrested and taken away. The psyche of the masses is highly unstable and has this recurrent feature of high responsiveness. Some persons and occult organizations know the precise methods and procedures whereby the views and tendencies of the masses can be influenced decisively, be it only at a verbal level. As a matter of fact, it is precisely on this characteristic of relative unconsciousness of the human masses that diversion, rumor-spreading and manipulation theories are predicated. If, in addition, these are supported by a technological inducement and manipulation device – such as through the emission of energy wavelengths at certain frequencies – then effects are almost guaranteed.

“You should not infer from this that spontaneity has no place whatsoever in the psyche of the masses. The problem, however, is much more complex because the effects of manipulation methods that are used at the physical level can be thwarted and successfully annihilated by certain actions that are purely spiritual in nature, particularly when these are carried out in unison by as many people as possible.

“In the case of malevolent manipulation, people become somewhat automated and mechanical in their actions, their minds blurred and almost inert. In the case of positive and profoundly beneficial spiritual action conducted by means of various initiating methods, people can enjoy a wonderful freedom and openness of individual horizons. People then begin to really grasp the fundamental importance of their free will. This is precisely where the target of some malevolent occult organizations lies: suppressing by any possible means man’s free will, his possibility to choose on his own and without any interference, his ability for profound self-knowledge and for learning the truth about life.

“If you should be curious to analyze at least part of the current information management and administration system in the world, you will find that everything in these directions is meant to suppress, confine and limit the individual rather than develop and open the way to free knowledge as is perversely claimed in numerous misleading slogans. It is not my aim now to belabor this important point on which Mankind’s very future eventually hangs. Later, I will give you details that will make you understand much more deeply the complexities of the world dominance system. For the moment, suffice it to say that the ‘microbe’ that triggers the terminal ‘disease’ in people’s lives is ignorance, subversively fed into by certain occult organizations, as well as the lack of an individual will to conquer this ‘disease.’ I will now come back to what I was telling you about the meeting with Father Arsenie Boca.”

Very focused on his story, Cezar shifted in his chair and resumed at once.

“That was a digression on people already spreading utterly false rumors. The truth, however, was a lot simpler. I will not tell you about the discussion I then had with the father; as a matter of fact, it lasted for more than three hours. The Colonel, upon learning some things about his future, gradually shed that layer of rigidity and inflexibility that had built up in time as an occupational hazard. “I will nevertheless tell you that Arsenie Boca belonged to that category of wise people who, although physically on earth, are already spiritually in heaven. That man left a really deep and strong impression on me. All the powers and strengths that I had or had seen in other people were not a patch on that shining, pure and divine greatness the father’s being exuded. His holiness and insight into man’s mind and soul were extraordinary. Not only did that happen instantly in his presence, but it also triggered a joy and aspiration of sorts which determined one to offer oneself fully and willingly to the father’s cognition. The feeling was ineffable and directly linked to the deepest spiritual origin of our being which is eternal, pure and indestructible.

“Metaphorically speaking, if you associate the path to that mysterious source in our being with the digging of a well, then you can tell that the cold, limpid and wonderful water you will get to is the very life-giving water you will drink in eternity. Arsenie Boca had the amazing subtle influence of making one spontaneously feel the presence of that water in the depths of one’s being long before one got to it. An elevating and overwhelming feeling of love and devotion would then come flooding in and that was the best test of the authenticity of the spiritual level and divine grace the hermit had attained.

“As I myself had the ability of feeling and knowing the people I met within broad limits, it was quite simple for me to grasp the very fine nuances of Arsenie’s extraordinary psychic radiation. His knowledge was instantaneous and so deep that it most often triggered in those in front of him very real cathartic experiences; but even emotions like these could come and go depending on the abilities and aspirations of each individual. The feeling I had there, after getting into his cell, was a feeling of a magnificent depth of knowledge but not dissociated from pure love. And yet, I don't want to enter the abstract field of metaphysical observations as I don't think this would be of much help to you at this stage; nor am I sure you could fully understand it. Usually, the time for such issues comes when you have already made several steps in this direction. Most people, however, are so stuck in their daily routine that ideas such as the relation between knowledge and love gets to be utterly stupid and crazy to them. At best, one could end up with comments from those around that are made from a so-called 'superior' position so as to make you understand you are wrong.

"To go back to the example before, these people are practically dying of thirst but they don't know it. Father Arsenie was the living ineffable expression of a man who really got to live in the purest of all happiness. Depending on the degree of individual understanding and responsiveness, those around him could themselves experience slivers of this total happiness, much like a tuning fork that vibrates when placed next to the piano producing a sound of the same pitch. Subtle beneficial influence, patience and compassion can transform even the darkest of souls.

"As far as Colonel Obadea was concerned, he resonated almost from the beginning with Father Arsenie's mysterious and subtle influence. With unbounded kindness, Arsenie Boca advised him what to do so as to steer clear of the troubled times to follow. As for myself, as soon as I got into that little room, I noted that for a long time afterwards, Father Arsenie didn't look at all in my direction and as if I hadn't been there. After an hour and a half, during which time the Colonel listened in awe to the saint's words, Father Arsenie turned to me and said that in my case he needed not tell me anything in particular because I had already found the path and would be helped to follow it without hesitation. He then clearly indicated the ways in which Obadea and I had to work together in order to be successful in our future pursuits. These were to prove highly important by bringing up to the surface evidence that would be found almost twenty years from then and bewilder the entire world. Although I was in a state of deep self-absorption, a strong thrill gripped my body at the moment when the father made the prediction. This, in turn, triggered some very complex intuitions and correlations in my mind.”

Cezar stopped and stood pensive for a few moments. I grew slightly restless and tense.

“This means Father Arsenie also talked about me – that is about the fact that you will meet me, tell me all this and propose I should publish a book on the events?” I then asked Cezar.

He gave a faint smile but stayed focused.

“He said we would find the right means to first sow the seeds and then grow the flower of the spiritual transformation of these people. Yes, he said information would be published that would play an important role in the process. But, secondary aspects relating to the accomplishment of this transformation, which includes choosing you, and all the other elements are part of the planning I have done for this action.”

“Did he mention anything about the great discovery to be made and its location?” I insisted.

“No, nothing on that. He only said that it would for sure take place in our country and have so great an impact that we did not need to know other details. But, he repeated several times that there would be a fierce fight. I don’t know what he meant by that.”

Anticipating a bit, I will say that Father Arsenie’s words came true exactly as he had predicted. As it will be noted further on, the amazing discovery was made in 2003, seventeen years after that memorable meeting at the Monastery of Cernica. It practically shattered the political, scientific and religious fabric of today’s greatest power – the United States of America. The world’s most terrible secret was immediately instituted. A fierce diplomatic fight and tremendous political pressure started because Romania wanted to make the discovery known to the entire world. Given its specificity, the discovery threatened the very political and ideological influence of the Vatican and shatters beyond retrieval both the anthropological beliefs of modern science and the ideas about the history of our planet and of humankind.

When Cezar told me about his discussion with Arsenie Boca, he did not yet know anything about the nature, location or timing of the discovery to be made as our talks took place some time at the beginning of 2002. But the way in which events came tumbling one upon another, the incredible correlations and sources that contributed to the discovery enable me now – when I am aware of all the elements – to have an overall fascinating view of the entire amazingly complex combination of forces that led to that landmark discovery. It now appears like a focal point, like a first very important “station” on the way to a different human consciousness. The fact that it was made in Romania seems to be all the more remarkable and suggestive.

As will be shown in the pages to follow, the discovery is in fact an “antechamber” to even more troubling realities which Cezar, together with a team of experts made up of American and Romanian representatives, investigated in a one-year “great expedition” (from October 2003 to July 2004). As I was at the site of the discovery, I know the overall nature and locations of the expedition. I also know Cezar will contact me shortly and I will learn all the necessary details.

The publication of this information, however, is still a controversial issue. Initially, the Romanian state wanted to make this discovery known to the entire world and available to researchers. It was deemed that the discovery was no longer necessarily an issue of national interest but one of worldwide interest. The backstage fighting that took place to prevent the disclosure of this information of exceptional importance to Mankind started as a result of major U.S. interventions. The diplomatic deliberations, the pros and cons, as well as all the promises and threats, took about two months (August-September 2003). Following a top-secret agreement that was signed between the two states, Romania committed not to make known to the entire world the discovery on its territory.

It is likely that, among others, Romania’s NATO accession, which took place hurriedly in the spring of 2004, was also part of the secret package of “compensations” for this decision. Against this background, the setting up of American military bases on the territory of Romania may well become a certainty over the next years, operating as a strong shield for the location in the Bucegi Mountains. Everything is highly complicated and secret. For the time being, I am not aware of Romania's advantages in its bilateral relations with the United States, but certain clear signals of strange goodwill at the highest diplomatic level are already visible.

Despite all this, American "backstage operations" must be carried out very carefully so as not to raise too soon queries and embarrassing questions on the part of the other states and powers of the world which can note but not understand America's interest in Romania.

The secret of this discovery is practically a complete one. I have never witnessed anything like it before and the major part of the "task" of guarding the secret was taken over by the Americans. I will describe certain elements at the right time, but I can say in anticipation that there is no document, be it on paper, tape or photo film, to have left the site of the discovery. A huge underground shed was built to store and handle technical equipment and all the evidence. It looks like a real fully equipped plant and the idea of building it proved to be a well-inspired one. Still, according to my information, Romania has not made a definitive commitment to keeping the secret about the great discovery. The terms and conditions are unknown to me for the time being. At present, the methods used for eradicating any attempt whatsoever at learning anything about the discovery are disinformation and the lack of any material evidence. It is no easy task, but as far as I know, it has been performed successfully to date. In my view, however, this state of affairs cannot go on much longer. We shall look into these details after I describe all the elements that gradually led to this exceptional discovery on the territory of Romania.

"The idea was not to make any wrong move precisely at a time when the Dictator started to feel cornered," Cezar continued. "Father Arsenie then told us Ceausescu had visited him twice, secretly and in all caution. The last time was several months before. He wanted to learn about the evolution of his power in the country because some troubling signs of political, economic and social instability had already started to appear both in the country and on other territories of the Communist bloc. The hermit then told him that if he continued to run the country by the same inhuman means as before, he would be faced with a sudden and violent death. Upon learning that, Ceausescu got terribly angry and had a real fit of hysteria which didn't impress Arsenie Boca at all. He threatened the father and left in a terrible huff.

"The father revealed to us that he knew they wanted him dead and that vile actions to that end started immediately after the meeting he had with the Dictator. He also told us it would not be long until he left the earth for the Kingdom of the Heavenly Father. That would be due to a cowardly plot, the purpose of which would be to poison him. Yet, he would not oppose that because at that time his mission on Earth would have been accomplished.

"Then, he took a hefty and rugged book out of a trunk. It was in old Greek and was from the Christian saints on Mount Athos.

"'Here,' Father Arsenie continued, 'one can find the description of the poisonous-breathed hydra that shall do everything in its powers to obstruct God's light and will. You shall have to fight this threat wisely, and wisdom shall be granted upon you and many others to uproot the Evil. There shall be canker everywhere: at work, in shops, in the institutions of the state and its leadership but, above all, in politics. Unfortunately, it shall sneak its way to the very heart of the church, defiling some of the souls there. People shall almost lose their hope. Only those who shall keep their true faith shall be saved and then God's Glory shall descend upon them.'

"Father Arsenie then labored the point saying that the 'devilish plan' had not been at work in our times only but since antiquity, for hundreds and even thousands of years, slowly preparing the ground for the final showdown that was about to happen. 'The Devil's Plan' was minutely thought out and, by the power of money and vice, among which lying, dissimulation, scheming and murder were the most important, those carrying it out were pretty close to their main goal, namely control and dominance over the entire world.

"Father Arsenie then said something we did not expect, but which shocked us to a certain extent. He said that, paradoxically and within a short time interval, the world's attention would turn to our country due to extraordinary changes that were to occur and specific signs that would go way beyond the power of understanding of materialist knowledge. Arsenie Boca also said all that would obey the will of God because everything was cyclical and had to go back where it all had begun."

Cezar's words were utterly bewildering because his story ran against all logic and would have made any ordinary being doubt it. As far as I was concerned, even if I trusted Cezar and his integrity a great deal, his statements could hardly find their way to my mind. First, I had no frame of reference to understand and accept them, and second, my faith was not as yet very strong. That is why I was at first inclined to view Father Arsenie's predictions as erroneous and phantasmagorical. And yet, somewhere deep inside me, there was this flicker of light that gave me hope and the elevating inner thrill of the times to come.

In an apparently incidental manner, after talking to Cezar, I had the opportunity of reading several booklets on the same subject but written by different authors. In the course of marginal discussions on the issue that I had with various personalities or people in the high-life of Bucharest or the Romanian intellectual elite, it was with some sadness that I noted their attitude which was mostly ironic or, at best, indifferent. Obviously, one could not expect those predictions to immediately shake out of their spiritual "slumber" those who are enslaved by external conditions of luxury, comfort, wealth, influence and power. But there is still a chance that at least part of them will ask themselves certain questions about the life they are leading and the nature of the acts they are carrying out in this world. In other words, there still is a chance that they can grow up and become more responsible since it is a well-known fact that the transformation of the living conditions of a nation first of all requires the transformation of the consciousness of its individual members. This can be achieved, particularly through a vision and perception of life from higher levels where one can start from principles and ideals that are entirely different from the current impure, base and crude ones.

The most important ways to achieve a quick transformation of consciousness at national and global levels are love and altruism in their pure and undisguised form. To sensitive people with a clean heart and generous intentions, this simple observation can be a common-sense argument which implicitly supports and confirms their faith. But to the proud, the materialist and the selfish, such an idea can be at most a joke if not a sign of "non-adaption to current realities" on the part of those who uphold it.

First of all, loving with all one's heart and helping one's fellows when they are in need, without asking anything in return, runs counter to their ideas about life and the way in which they have grown used to living. Practically speaking, God and things holy find no place in their life. Secondly, most of them view cult-related issues, religions, the church and spiritual elements in general as some sort of "cushioning," a kind of necessary factor for the preservation of the social balance. While I was still pondering over these matters, Cezar resumed his story.

"Father Arsenie pointed out briefly the main problems that were to come up in the near future in Romania but advised us not to give up the plan we had started, no matter what might stand in our way. What baffled me back then was that he would speak in the plural about what Obadea and I had to accomplish, as if that were a normal thing. The future was to confirm he had been fully right. He ended the discussion with a sudden remark, looking straight into the Colonel's eyes.

"I am glad your heart is full of faith and you have followed my call in your dream. God and His Glory be with you!"

"After we left, Colonel Obadea told me that, one week before, he had a very strange dream where Father Arsenie had appeared surrounded by a dazzling light and making a firm call that he and I should come to Cernica. There and then, I felt this urge and a special faith in my heart, as well as a state of delicate happiness which has never gone away. The secret training that followed at the base in B... only had me better prepared for the events to come up in my life over the next fifteen years."

Cezar then stopped following an important phone call requesting his urgent presence in a certain place. I parted company with him and had the feeling that I had penetrated some unexplored ground full of mysteries that were highly important in the context of future events. I was assimilating the multitude of information coming my way somewhat "on the fly" and as far as my own level of understanding allowed it and was drawing conclusions. Where anything was not clear, I would write it down on a piece of paper to talk about it again at the next meeting.

Several months had passed since our last meeting during which time I sorted out the main ideas and even started to devise a plan for a book on those events. I read several papers on esoteric and spiritual subjects, but I kept a balanced attitude in the appreciation of the various ideas therein. I was thus structuring gradually and thoroughly a database and initiating aspects that, by their mysterious and novel nature, were a mine of invaluable information for all who might be interested in learning about them.

Up to June 2003, I had two more meetings with Cezar. The content of the stories told on those occasions is by far the most terrible proof of the need to write this book. As a matter of fact, I consider those “rounds” of talks, when Cezar revealed to me the amazing truths about occult methods for world domination, as the most thrilling of all. At the same time, I could also understand much more profoundly the subtle nuances of good and evil in the world, something I had completely ignored until then.

All the factual, moral and psychological implications I will be presenting in the pages to follow were expressed by Cezar with patience and perseverance, even when I was asking for more clarifications, because he thought that those aspects were the very heart of the message he wanted to convey to all people. In my turn, I was of the view that, given both the national and the global context at the time, a detailed presentation of some of the plans and actions of the dreaded occult organization was almost a moral duty and a natural urge for action. In my view, people must know and be alerted to the huge threat the organization poses, a threat that is spreading plague-like across the world. They must be informed of the methods for action employed by the organization as these are manifest in day-to-day life and of the way in which all the wheeling and dealing, scheming and ruses that thwart almost any step towards freedom can be nipped in the bud.

Since people are structured in different ways, they feel, think and act differently. It is precisely why the information I will be sharing further on will either make them cautious, doubtful, ironic or indifferent, or shake their very foundations and make them understand the ins and outs of the most terrible scourge that has ever threatened Mankind – that is the occult organization of Freemasonry. Much like a severe disease, it eats into Mankind’s body, threatening to conquer it completely. World Freemasonry uses as its spearhead the “opinion trend” method. They can use this trend in any direction they please whenever their interests are threatened. The same “tool,” however, can and must be turned and used against the very assailant. When some realities that are only apparently clad in fine apparel are understood properly and profoundly, people’s freedom of thought and action becomes a true source of happiness. In fact, the freedom of thought and action is the most terrible and threatening aspect to Freemasonry because this freedom allows people to become aware both of their existential condition and of the way and system in which contemporary society is structured.

People’s freedom of thought and action would lead inevitably to the exposure and unraveling of the huge malevolent fabric of plans, plots and ideas that Freemasonry has been so busy knitting for generations. This much needed “awakening” of Mankind to the reality it inhabits is correlated with the great transformation and transition of the entire planet to a new era of spiritual truth and knowledge.

Chapter 3 — The First Encounter: Evil Through and Through

In the years that followed and until the revolution of 1989, Cezar pursued intense training and preparation under a special regimen as devised by Colonel Obadea. Apart from experiments, the program included classes in economics, politics and modern sociology. In addition, the Colonel had started to grant Cezar some degree of freedom and even influence at the base, assigning him certain tasks that were relatively simple at the beginning.

“Deep down, the Colonel was a sincere and righteous man,” Cezar told me. “He really had the best intentions for this country and its people and that is why he was intent upon creating some ‘openings’ in the communist system which had made people’s lives almost impossible. Like me, Obadea had been strongly impressed by the meeting with Father Arsenie and was determined to follow the hermit’s advice.

“By 1988, the Colonel had already revealed to me the structure and objectives of the department, as well as his ideas for secret actions aimed at preparing Ceausescu’s downfall. Though not alone in his preparations for a regime change, Colonel Obadea preferred to contribute his share only by use of his department. I soon became aware of the reason behind this. The Colonel was surrounded by potential ‘human threats’ as each person, from the rank and file to the top brass, was liable to treason or information leakages. But, of course, there were some people left whom one could trust to a certain extent, and Obadea’s intuition about potential collaborators was flawless. He was supported by such collaborators and he had advisors, connections, influence and authority; but contact with those in his circle was maintained only at a level that I could call ‘peripheral,’ not allowing their access to the core of the matter or the essence of the action he was planning.

“In his desire for as much efficiency as possible, Colonel Obadea realized he could not support his complex plan on his own from the center — nor did he have the time for that — because performing as head of Department Zero required sedulous effort. He therefore needed someone whom he could fully trust, someone incorruptible but at the same time devoted to a noble cause and far away from backstage dealings. The idea of training such a collaborator had crossed his mind several years before when he had noted that most of those who succeeded each other at the base were children.

“Upon long reflection, Obadea considered I answered the requirements and his intentions; so, in the years preceding the Revolution, he made my training a lot more intensive. I could even say that the relationship between us went beyond the usual boundaries of the superior-subordinate relationship because it involved more sensitive levels of the soul. It actually evolved into a relationship of open friendship, trust, and mutual respect because, by and large, we had no differences of opinion, ideas or goals to be achieved. Still, great caution was needed on our part because in those times of instability, terror and corruption surprises could come from where one least expected.

“Within the Securitate, the tendency was to assimilate Department Zero into other departments and units since, though part of that system, Department Zero had autonomy which did not agree with some people’s pride and interests. Colonel Obadea, however, knew only too well that if Department Zero had been ‘dissolved’ into the other structures of the Securitate, that would have automatically led to its ‘politicization.’ He felt that would have been the safest way to reducing the department’s efficiency in the actions he was carrying out. Moreover, managing the department would have been influenced from the outside by some political factors and corruption would have eaten into its very roots.

“The importance of Department Zero had become enormous, particularly due to a series of amazing discoveries that had been made over previous years in different areas of the country about which I cannot tell you now other than in general terms. Apart from conducting parapsychology research on gifted subjects and playing its role as a ‘nursery’ for human beings with paranormal powers on the territory of Romania, Department Zero had also taken over investigations and top-secret interventions in cases of crucial strategic and scientific importance. To that end, a huge database had been created and a paramilitary intervention team established, endowed with state-of-the-art equipment.

“When a ‘red code’ case occurred, an alert was triggered and the intervention was extremely fast and to the target, following very well established steps like moving to the respective location; making the area secure; making contact with the specificity of the discovery; conducting a preliminary scientific analysis; and closing the area off. ‘Red code’ interventions, which from a certain point of view are the most spectacular — and by this I particularly mean the way in which they are carried out — take place only after certain preliminary checks are conducted in order to ensure the elite corps of the department is not sent out on a mission in less important cases. ‘Red code’ actions are top-secret actions and that is why standard procedures are established on the way in which those in the special intervention team get involved.

“Over time, some political figures mounted various attacks and spread false information on the activity of the department. This was brought to Ceausescu’s attention, however, such cases did nothing but highlight the excellent role that initial measures played in the security of information at the top level which was only known to Obadea and the Dictator (tangentially, information was also brought to the attention of the Head of the Securitate). That is why attempts at overthrowing Obadea as head of Department Zero on grounds of incompetence failed one by one. The allegations appeared to be false from the very beginning. ‘Amateurs’ could not build up a viable tactical scenario for the simple reason that information did not leak and they therefore needed to make up stories and lie.

“Harassed from several sides (the most venomous plotting came from the then Head of the Securitate) and in a more and more sensitive situation due to alarming information about a possible demise of the Communist Bloc in Europe, Ceausescu could have made an ill-inspired decision. That is why the Colonel was careful to present to him the discoveries and their most important and secret elements in a very clear, sincere and straightforward light. This convinced the Head of the State to continue to give him freedom of action. Having settled this problem of trust on Ceausescu’s part, Obadea could focus on the careful preparations for the transition period to follow after the regime change. He already knew it was only a matter of time until change would happen.

“Starting in the summer of 1989, Colonel Obadea’s activity grew highly feverish and complex. I myself could only meet him a few times before the end of the year. Although I had no access to information from outside, intuition nevertheless told me something very important was in the making at a national level. But these are elements you are already very familiar with so it’s no use going into details now. I will therefore focus mostly on the description of the department’s main methods of action.

“When a crucial discovery is made, information is received very quickly because the first institutions to be contacted in such cases are the police and the Romanian Intelligence Service. Pursuant to a very strict protocol which provides clearly on the nature of discoveries and their importance, Department Zero is immediately contacted and our teams dispatched to the area in question. The actions to be carried out in such cases follow a very clear procedure.

“Starting in 1988, I myself was part of the main intervention team, accompanying it to the secret locations where we were summoned. My membership on the team was the result of an order issued by Colonel Obadea himself, and my role was to assess the degree of risk in the event of important discoveries and make suggestions for the specific procedure to be followed in investigations under completely safe conditions. Also on the main team was a Securitate captain who acted as its leader and who had to make the requisite decisions on the spot after I outlined my conclusions. Where the situation was highly unusual, he reported immediately to Colonel Obadea and waited for his decision. Our team also included three very well trained members of the elite troops who acted as the ‘vanguard’ when investigations started.

“A second team was available consisting of four members, scientists and researchers, but their number could vary depending on the field of the discovery. They were the first to enter the site of the discovery and make a first scientific analysis, an overall assessment of the elements they could find there.

“The third and last team was made up of military personnel whose role was to ensure the security of the area, its closing off and the requisite logistics. Depending on the importance of the discovery, Colonel Obadea was also informed and he arrived at the site as soon as possible.

“Sometimes, however, unforeseen elements could come up. For instance, in 1981, when the team intervention system did not exist yet and operation protocols were not safe, Department Zero was requested on a mission in a mountainous area close to Intorsura Buzaului and at the curve of the Carpathian mountain range. It was a very remote and sparsely populated area. Two brother mountaineers were doing some training, climbing a high and rather isolated rock. Its walls were very steep and forming a cavity of sorts in the upper end which was a real challenge to the two mountaineers.

“One of the brothers climbed about three-quarters of the rock and there he noticed some bizarre signs carved in stone and almost completely eroded by the passage of time. When he made it to the top of the narrow platform of the rock, he bent down and picked up a very strange yellow object that looked like a chain; but the next moment, he suddenly disappeared from sight, leaving his brother with a dumbfounded look on his face at the base of the rock.

“The local militia was alerted and the brothers’ parents in Braila were informed of the event. Initially, the authorities suspected the one who had called them of hiding the truth. They even threatened him, thinking he was making fun of them. But the brothers’ father, an ex-mountaineer himself, climbed the rock, picked up the object and disappeared instantly before the eyes of more than ten witnesses.

“The case then took a dangerous turn. Several Securitate officers from Bucharest arrived immediately at the site of the event and announced Department Zero on the same evening. A military team closed off the area for a range of one hundred meters around the rock. The representatives of another Securitate department saw to it that villagers were not properly informed and eyewitnesses quieted down.

“I learned of all these details from the top secret file on the event which I read thoroughly after the Revolution. Twenty years ago, I didn’t yet have access to such operations because I was only a child who had come to the base in B....., a short time before. Still, it seems some elements transpired in the press many years after the event, possibly due to the fact that several political figures and scientists had been present at the site.

“Situations of this kind, where information cannot be isolated completely from the very beginning, are registered under a special code and they are called ‘K-type events.’ These are usually touch-and-go situations which cannot be entirely foreseen or which give rise to various other complications. Over the next days, a helicopter surveyed the rock area. The ‘object’ was, in fact, a sort of lever fastened to the rock; but one couldn’t tell how and why that had been done and by whom. The inscription on the wall of the rock remained a complete mystery even if numerous pictures of the respective signs had been sent for analysis to the most prestigious specialized institutions in the world. Although there were certain similarities in shape, no clear correspondence could be established with any of the ancient writings.

“I had access to all the pictures that had been taken from different angles and could see for myself that those signs had a very strange nature. They seemed to be very old, but they could still be seen although covered to a large extent in moss. Lacking in experience back then and under pressure from the panic that had been created, those responsible decided to dynamite the rock; but later it was found out that was an order that the top officials in Bucharest had given.

“At present, twenty years after the incident, the area is completely ‘clean.’ The two missing men have never come back. Interestingly though, after the rock had been dynamited, a light-green translucent contour persisted at the site like a slight steam. After a few days, however, that was gone, too. This is only one example of the multitude of K-type events in the Department Zero archives. Their importance is crucial and the information they contain is secret. There are many other situations that can be subsumed under the ‘K’ category, especially incidents which happened after 1992.”

Cezar then told me about two other amazing cases but asked me not to mention them in the book because they had to do with Romania’s earth resources and were therefore considered top-secret.

“THE LEAP” AFTER THE REVOLUTION

“Paradoxically, the upset of the Revolution was almost not felt at all in the activity of Department Zero,” Cezar said as he resumed the story of the main events in that period of his life.

“There might have been two reasons for that. On the one hand is the almost perfect isolation of the department and the autonomy Colonel Obadea had secured for it as a direct consequence of exceptional measures for maintaining secrecy at the top. On the other hand, the imminence of Ceausescu’s downfall from power had long been felt in the department although that had never been expressed directly; but it is not the time to talk here and now about the occult side of the 1989 Revolution in Romania. I shall only tell you about what the decade after the Revolution brought new in my life.

“In the spring of 1990, several months after power had changed hands, I was for the first time transferred from the base in B ... to the base in Valea Ursului which was located in the vicinity of Mount G... close to the Retezat mountain range. Unlike the base where I had spent ten years of my life, this one extended two levels under ground. The equipment available was state-of-the-art and the staff very well trained.

“Towards the end of the year, the Colonel brought to my knowledge the fact that Doctor Xien had left Romania for reasons independent of his will. That news made me somewhat sad. Doctor Xien had guided my way through the complicated maze of knowledge about realities other people don’t even suspect exist. His methods were strange and numerous but most of the times silent. To me he had been a highly competent spiritual master of invaluable help in many difficult situations.

“As a matter of fact, he himself was a special and occult human being about who not even the Romanian authorities knew too much despite always keeping a close eye on him. Doctor Xien’s sudden and apparently inexplicable departure offered the chance for a notable change in my life.

“I was twenty-one and highly experienced in the activities of the department, and in addition, I had these personal psychic abilities that helped me through many sensitive or even dangerous situations. Taking these elements into account, and at the same time following the advice Father Arsenie had given him almost five years before, Colonel Obadea offered me a job as executive director of Department Zero. I knew that was an older idea of the Colonel's so I accepted the offer immediately.

"The job placed me in a very strong and authoritative position. My only and direct superior was Colonel Obadea and above him the Head of the State; and to a certain extent the Head of the Intelligence Service in Romania. It may have taken a lot of behind-the-scenes dealing on the part of Colonel Obadea so that I could be the one to take up that position. As far as the financing of the department was concerned, his efforts were also salutary as the department was in many respects a sort of 'ghost' among the other units of the Intelligence Service. There were no external archives, no files or information outside of the department attesting to its 'life.' Everything was centralized at the base in Valea Ursului where only authorized staff were allowed access. That is why almost nobody knew about its existence and less so about its location.

"Apart from taking part in 'K-type events,' my appointment as executive director of Department Zero required extensive travel to various areas of the country. A limousine for transportation purposes, two bodyguards and, upon direct request, the helicopter that was the department's property were always available to me.

"In 1992, the relations between Department Zero and the Presidency were clarified. After Ceausescu's death, almost nobody knew about the existence of the department so that the Head of the State immediately ordered the complete subordination and politicization of Department Zero in an undeclared but obvious desire to have centralized control over all the structures of the Romanian Intelligence Service. I accompanied Colonel Obadea to his secret meeting with the President. The meeting lasted more than four hours. The Head of the State even wanted to change the structure of the department and bring Department Zero together with several other sections 'inherited' from the time of the Dictatorship. But after we presented some of the shocking realities that had been discovered, as well as their huge implications for the political and economic stability of the country, the President's bewilderment left room for an agreement similar to the one before the Revolution, with the proviso that the Head of the Romanian Intelligence Service should also be informed of developments. A discussion with the latter took place one month later and posed no problems. On the contrary, it even brought some improvement as far as administrative and special procedure issues were concerned.

“One of the proposals was to set up a section operating as a ‘buffer’ between the Intelligence Service and Department Zero. In fact, this section operates at present as a unit ‘collecting’ and ‘sorting out’ specific information pertaining to the secret field of strange discoveries and events. Since not all such information and events were under Department Zero’s remit, some were directed to other departments in the Romanian Intelligence Services. The ‘buffer’ section was named ‘The Commission for the Analysis of Unusual Events’ and operated as a joint staff – that is staff both from the Romanian Intelligence Services and from Department Zero. It was decided, however, that one of our staff be appointed as head of the section due to the expertise of the department in the field. I was the one appointed to that position, as an extension of the position I held at Department Zero. The Head of the Romanian Intelligence Services objected for a while on grounds of my age which was much below officially established standards. He rightly upheld the view that it was inconceivable for a person so young to lead efficiently actions of such scope, but Colonel Obadea quieted him down eventually, taking all responsibility upon himself.

“Due to my entirely special status, there was a need for the maximum degree of freedom in action. This condition went even beyond parliamentary immunity because it was linked directly to special access secrets. As my positions were not political, absolute free access was based on a kind of special ID signed personally by the President and bearing the sequential number Department Zero/A-0 [...] depending on the number of those to whom one such ID was issued. There are extremely few holders of such ID cards and they belong to the most secret units of the Romanian Intelligence Services and of the Army.

“In 1992-1993, I went through all the files of the department to bring myself up to date on the state of affairs. I looked closely into the most secret cases and went to well hidden and amazing places. All this is part of a secret field and cannot be revealed for the time being. I established the headquarters at the base in Valea Ursului; and, in parallel, I set up a second special intervention team for less important cases.

“By 2001, we had succeeded in consolidating our ‘partnership’ with the Romanian Intelligence Services and provided essential information to the Supreme Council for National Defence (SCND). Colonel Obadea trusted me fully, and even if he was rapidly pushing retirement age, he was nevertheless highly pleased with the way in which the department was run. He had been promoted to the rank of Romanian Intelligence Services General and could say that many of his plans had become reality. This is roughly the overall picture of the current situation at the department.

“2002 was a landmark year as far as my involvement in highly important issues and with deep implications at both national and global levels, but we shall talk about this at our next meeting because it is highly important that we focus as best we can on the fundamental subject I am particularly keen to reveal to you. You will thus understand that reality is cast in an entirely different light than people are used to seeing it in.”

I took a deep breath as if I had just come back from a long trance. I had no idea about what was to be revealed next but I had this intuition that we had reached the crux of the matter. Cezar told me that was in fact the main reason for which he wanted me to make the story public. I was to meet with him on two more occasions during which time he gave me a detailed account of events that can be considered crucial for the destiny of the country. We met for the last time in June 2003, and it was on that occasion that I was astonished to learn about what led to the secret location in the Bucegi Mountains where two months later the breakthrough discovery was made. Even if events then rushed in, Cezar nevertheless gave me the unexpired chance to be present at the site of the discovery and see for myself the secret structure inside the mountain and its main features. That required special interventions on his and particularly General Obadea’s part, at a time when things appeared to get out of control. The decision to have me there at the site, almost immediately after the discovery had been made, was highly inspired because events took an extraordinarily complicated turn several days later. This was a result of American diplomatic pressure which required, to a great extent, their immediate presence at the site with fully-equipped teams and extraordinary technology. From that moment on, no one, unless authorized by the Presidency, could go beyond security barriers maintained by both Romanian and American military. That is why I think I was very lucky and even privileged to have had the opportunity of actually seeing what to many people will seem almost incredible. In the few hours that I spent in the central perimeter of the discovery, Cezar told me briefly about those elements (some of them dramatic) of the effective way in which the discovery was made. He also outlined the implications it had immediately after as well as the main elements of the American intervention in the issue.

In September 2003, I got more news from him via a special courier who had also made the arrangements for our meetings over the past years. On that occasion, however, the courier facilitated a phone talk with Cezar using a specially protected device and a private line. Cezar then told me about some private elements of the Romanian-American “negotiations” that he had recently learned. Also, he told me he was to go on a “big expedition” in a few days and gave me some general data on that. He did not know how long the expedition would take but promised to give me all the details upon return. After a moment’s hesitation, he suggested I nevertheless had sufficient information to write and publish a book containing these elements. Like me, he believed people had a right to know the reality and make their own decisions on their future. That was the last time when I had verbal contact with Cezar.

Several weeks ago, almost one year after that phone conversation, and precisely in the period when I was writing the final part of this book, I got some indications about his return from the “big expedition” and I was deeply nervous at the thought of another meeting where I could learn new elements, the nature of which I suspected was exceptional. But let me come back to Cezar’s account of events in our meeting before last.

The elements he told me about in much detail are without a doubt a real mine of information on the backstage dealings of organized Freemasonry at global level. Cezar told me, in a memorable summary of the talks he had with one of the world’s most notable representatives of the organization, Freemasonry’s concepts, general vision, intentions and ways of action. This helped me arrive at a better understanding of the subtle meaning of the well-known expression “a wolf in sheep’s clothing” which can very well apply to worldwide Freemasonry. Paradoxically and on the other hand, in the absence of that initiative by the Freemasons, I do not know when and how that breakthrough discovery in the Bucegi Mountains would have been made.

Sometimes the path of destiny, particularly a nation's or even Mankind's destiny, is much too complicated and tortuous for the human mind to grasp its full complexity. We are therefore left only with the possibility of noting and analyzing, with hindsight and bewilderment, the incredible maze of facts, relations, beings and individual destinies which combined in such a way as to yield a final result that can be viewed as a real step forward for Mankind. Even if we cannot understand in detail these very complicated combinations and actions of the subtle forces, we can at least find our way following the notable effects these generate at certain circumstance-determined moments. But these circumstances are precisely the spatial and temporal conditions that are necessary for triggering events of crucial importance, even at global level.

When I met Cezar again, several months after our latest discussion, he picked up his story exactly where he had left off, as if he had only taken a short break to drink some water.

"In May 2002, I was at the base in Valea Ursului, the code name of which is Alpha. It was a time when I was thoroughly absorbed in reading the department's secret files which covered a period of more than twenty years of research and field work conducted by special intervention teams. One quiet afternoon, I was in my office deeply sunk in study when I got a phone call on the direct maximum security line from General Obadea. I was surprised because I had just met him one day before and that phone line was only used for emergency and top secret calls.

"He told me that a highly important person would come to visit me over the following hours and wanted to have a private talk with me. The General's slightly faltering tone of voice and the somewhat hazy wording of his message also surprised me because I had never before noted any of those features in him. He told me that he had no other information, that he didn't know who the person was, and the request for a meeting had come from the Romanian Intelligence Services following a governmental intervention.

“The person in question was a foreigner but familiar with Romania and also proficient in Romanian. The Romanian Intelligence Service only knew he was a member of a highly important Masonic lodge in Italy with a high nobility rank and great financial influence in Romania. His political connections must also have been very high-placed since he had succeeded in penetrating the Romanian Intelligence Services ‘wall’ and made his way to Department Zero. But where he knew me from; and how he had learned of the existence of the department; and that I was the executive director remained a mystery. I then realized his influence was extraordinary once he had ‘broken through’ the entire hierarchy of a country’s government and security system without even concealing the fact. As far as I was concerned, I had to accept the request although I was as yet unaware of its purpose. There were enough unknown elements in the equation competing with the imminence of the meeting.

“Despite all this, I could perceive deep down a sort of strange ‘burden’ and ‘pressure’ which was obviously linked to the person in question. And then, for the first time, I grasped the nature of the meeting. It was to be a difficult ‘encounter’ because I could already feel the ‘loaded’ radiation of that being, like a menacing cloud around it that concealed its true intentions. Several hours were left until his arrival, and so I used the time available by locking myself in a room and sinking into deep meditation in order to find out more about that person.”

I was utterly astounded. I already knew Cezar had special psychic powers about which he had only mentioned the bare minimum and with much modesty and in a way as natural as possible. In addition, he had only manifested his powers two or three times in my presence. These were in key situations and only to prove indirectly that his story was not fictional. Even then, his actions were a natural part of the situation in which he used them so that they would not trigger too much bewilderment. Still, I did not know he had the ability to find out information when he exerted his will in that direction during meditation. I could not understand how that was possible at all. Willing to learn more about that mystery, I asked him how he could get access to information about which he knew nothing beforehand.

“One can say that the subtle field of knowledge I evoke during meditation, when I want to get information, is a sort of vast ether; but it is not the ether contemporary science speaks about,” Cezar started his explanation. “From this subtle reality come all things and phenomena, all thoughts and matter of any kind; and generally speaking, all information taking shape in the physical world. It is from this practically infinite ocean of particular ‘codes’ that all our intentions, thoughts and ideas gradually take a clear shape and make their way to objectivity at the perception level of an ordinary being in the physical world.

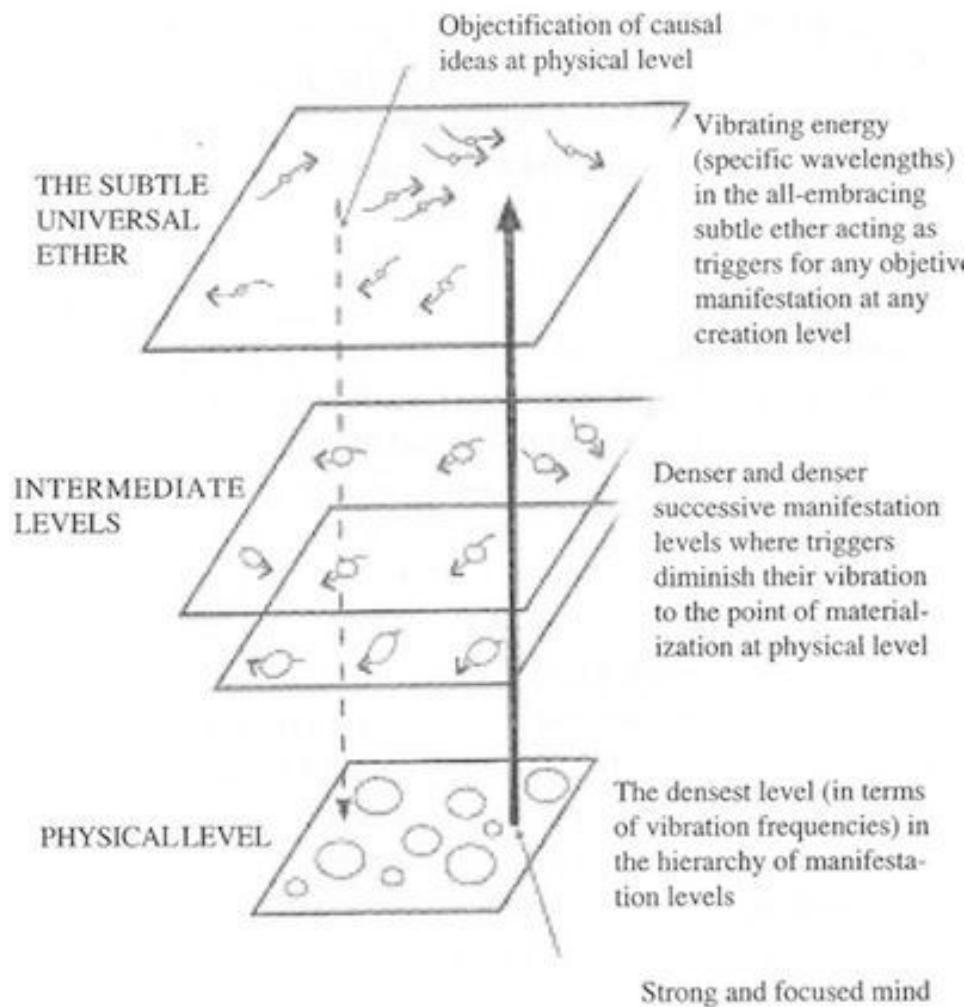

“Imagine, for instance, a mass of hovering steam. This is composed of water vapors made up of very fine particles floating in the air. If one interferes with the temperature to the point of making it lower, then water vapors will condense and turn into water drops – that is, they will be in a combined state denser than that of vapors which represented the gaseous state of water. If one brings the temperature to an even lower value, then liquid water will turn into ice which is solid matter, the densest of combined states. The principle is simple: the same water atoms, initially presented as vapor, turn by successive transformations into ice.

“By way of analogy, any type of information that takes shape at the physical level follows the same top-down path. In its raw latent state, information is nothing but a certain form of vibrating energy specific to each and every element. The subtle universal ether, which I mentioned earlier, is the environment accommodating the infinity of ideas, thoughts, intentions and possibilities. Therefore, it all boils down to accessing information at the corresponding vibration level which is part of the infinite ocean of energetic vibration frequencies in the universal ether. This is the most difficult thing to do since, in the first place, one needs to possess the appropriate level of consciousness so as to enable awareness of the presence of the subtle universal ether; and, of course, one needs the ability to make an accurate selection of the targeted energetic vibration frequency from the multitude available.”

On a piece of paper, Cezar made a drawing for ease of understanding.

“A focused mind that is well-prepared and purged of vicious and parasitic thoughts has the ability to penetrate successively the subtle levels of manifestation to the level of the universal ether about which I have told you; which resembles a gigantic space of a very special nature. In this extremely vast space one can identify the specific ‘trace’ or the particular vibrating frequency of any aspect, being, object or phenomenon one may be interested in. The true challenge lies in the correct selection of the particular vibration frequency one is looking for, much like when one moves a slider up and down a frequency scale in search for a radio channel.

HOW IDEAS TAKES SHAPE AT PHYSICAL LEVEL

“You will perhaps ask how the mind can select only one specific frequency from the infinite amount that are available. The process is simple and based on the universal law of vibration. Everything that exists in the universe and is defined in a particular way (whether it be a being, an object, a phenomenon or emotion) has a vibration ‘imprint,’ a specific unmistakable

‘marker’ that allows its identification anywhere in the universe. This is the so-called individual wavelength, much resembling a DNA spiral unique to each and every being. One needs only to ‘switch the button’ from one wavelength to the corresponding wavelength one wants to know. This is a fundamental law in physics and it is called the law of resonance.

“Of course, all this requires sufficient and hard practice, but results are as rewarding as the effort is demanding. I’ve done nothing other than apply this principle faithfully, focusing on the ‘subtle image’ or the ‘wavelength’ of the person whom I was expecting, even if I had never met them before and knew nothing about them apart from the information I had from General Obadea. Scarce though it was, that information was nevertheless sufficient.

“In a relatively short time, my strong and focussed will produced the requisite conditions for resonance with that person’s ‘subtle imprint.’ Yet I must tell you there is more to the phenomenon than my description of it. It takes a long period of demanding practice for one to be able to do this which also requires a very high consciousness level. The accuracy of the information one wants to find out depends, on the one hand, on the clarity of one’s own mind – which at that moment must be as still as the surface of a mountain lake – and, on the other hand, on the ability to trigger specific resonance conditions by the vivid and powerful evocation of what one has set out to know. At that moment, one ‘tunes in’ (with a greater or lesser degree of accuracy) to the specific vibration frequency of the being evoked. If one succeeds in that attempt, one then gets direct and intuitive access to the dominant subtle resultant of the person concerned in all its aspects, even if that person believes those aspects are unknown to other people. It is true that, as I have already told you, the problem is more complex because there are many variables that require, among other things, personal effort in that direction, but what is important is that any healthy human being endowed with will and perseverance can acquire that ability. But I will go back to that meeting behind which lay a highly important secret reason that was nevertheless unclear to me in the first instance.”

Cezar then gave me a detailed account of the mysterious meeting at the Alpha base, the significance of which shattered my foundations and gave me the definitive reason for writing this book. However, in order for the story to flow naturally, as well as for ease of expression, I shall repeat it exactly as it happened between Cezar and the mysterious character, a member of Freemasonry's world elite. I shall try to be as faithful as possible to the story I was told and even capture certain nuances of the discussion. I apologize to the reader for any language inconsistencies that might come up, but as will soon be noted, the content of the dialogue to follow is more important than its form.

A HALFWAY HOUSE

At about three in the afternoon, a Romanian Intelligence Services helicopter landed at the base in Valea Ursului. Out came a tall and sober gentleman in a black suit. He was poised and haughtily so. In his right hand he was carrying a walking stick with an ivory handle ornately carved in gold. His face betrayed a tough character and his green eyes had an almost strange effect, radiating an unusual coldness. This impression was made even stronger by his arched and way-too-well-groomed eyebrows for a man of rather advanced age.

He introduced himself to the officers who were waiting for him at the base as Signore Massini and waited patiently for his arrival to be announced to Cezar. Of stately manner, and as if used to living only in high noble circles, Signore Massini, aged sixty-five, was overbearing in conduct, very self-confident and gave the impression of a man who was used to lording it over people. In fact, he was one of the highest-ranking venerables of the most important Freemason lodge in Europe and also a member of the most influential Freemason organization at world level: the Bilderberg Group.

Signore Massini was shown to the first floor of the base where Cezar was waiting for him. After the customary introductions, Cezar invited him to a protocol room, but the venerable one refused. Without being fastidious, his turn of phrase was rather stilted and slightly dated. In fact, Signore Massini was a member of a very old noble family of royal descent from Italy.

"I am impressed and at the same time delighted with your proposal, but I retain the basic privilege to protect myself against likely attempts at wiretapping our discussion. I should be much grateful if you did not take personal umbrage at the request, but we cannot forget we are dealing here with the Romanian Intelligence Service," the venerable one explained.

Cezar gave a faint smile. It was still difficult to assess whether that was Signore Massini's habitual manner of speech or his words concealed a trace of irony. The second interpretation was more likely but that did not bother Cezar at all. Instead, he replied in good will.

"I understand your fears, sir, and I find them warranted to a certain extent. But given its status, this base has a very high security level and only cooperates with the Romanian Intelligence Services, it is not subordinate to it. Therefore we can talk in peace and without fear of anything in the protocol room."

But Signore Massini stood firm in his request. He insisted politely that the discussion take place in the open at a convenient distance away from the base. He said that was in the interest of both parties. As the request was not that excessive, Cezar gave his consent. A small clearing was chosen about two hundred and fifty meters away from the surface building of the base. A table and two chairs were taken to the spot; and at a certain distance from the arrangement, Cezar ordered the presence in a circle of eight bodyguards specialized in high level protection services. In fact, they were members of the third special intervention team in case of "K-type events." A high-tech electronic jamming device was also installed.

Preparations took almost one hour during which time Signore Massini spoke only a couple of phrases and displayed a slightly sneering and ironic smile. From time to time he gave darting looks in Cezar's direction trying to take his measure quickly but carefully. At about four in the afternoon, preparations were ready and the two took a seat at the table in the clearing.

Cezar told me that, from a certain point of view, the situation was rather bizarre. A gentleman of incontrovertible influence at the highest political levels had requested a highly secret meeting with the executive director of the most occult department of the Romanian Secret Services. All "doors" had been opened almost effortlessly and all requests approved immediately. What could be the nature of that mysterious influence that had broken even through the highest political circles of a state? What in fact was the purpose of Signore Massini's unforeseen and secret visit and what was he after, particularly since he had avoided any interference by the Romanian Intelligence Service that had actually facilitated the meeting?

The strict order received from the Government forbade any interference on the part of the Romanian Intelligence Services with the discussion, all on the grounds of secrecy in Department Zero's field of action. Despite all that, the situation was rather strange because it gave the impression of intervention by an external power that was "imposed" on the Romanian state. Moreover, no wiretapping of the talks between the two was allowed and Cezar wanted to keep the promise he had made to Signore Massini. On the other hand, even if the Romanian Intelligence Services had the technical means necessary for wiretapping the talks, the venerable Massini's arrival had been announced hastily; thus leaving little time for the preparation of such sensitive action.

In addition, given the influence that Signore Massini seemed to have at the highest political level in Romania, some likely dissatisfaction on his part might have had consequences of the most adverse kind on those who would have made such a decision in the Romanian Intelligence Services.

Therefore, strange though it might seem, Signore Massini had succeeded – through quick, intense and demanding action – in getting, in record time, the maximum security for the talk he wanted to have with Cezar. The encounter between the two was to reveal the most sensational account of occult truths that are nevertheless manifest more and more in the daily lives of people throughout the world.

THE TEST

"I am here to have this talk with you, Mr. Brad, in a less than usual way and under special circumstances," said the venerable Massini, getting straight to the point.

"In our view, people belong to one of two categories: those who can be manipulated and led around – and the great majority belong to this category; and those who have certain virtues, are gifted with certain powers and have a very strong personality."

"I shall interrupt for a short clarification," Cezar chipped in in apparent naivete. "Whose opinion do you actually represent here?"

Signore Massini gave a large smile, leaning slowly against the back of his chair. His whole attitude was the expression of the proud conscience of an unconquerable power.

“Mr. Brad, you are a young man in the prime of your life holding a position that is paradoxically a dungeon for civil liberties but that at the same time gives you the satisfaction of knowing and looking into things about which almost nobody knows anything. Such a position is difficult to get because it requires safeguards of remarkable inner abilities.”

“Thank you,” Cezar said amiably but cautiously.

“And yet, even to a very well endowed person like you, quite a lot of things remain unknown and some of these can be extremely attractive. The group I represent, and on whose behalf I have come here today, is part of the highest Masonic order and highly interested in the outcome of our talks.”

“I am aware of some things about Freemasonry,” said Cezar. “The organization is built on a pyramidal hierarchy, has very occult initiation rituals and its real intentions are obscure to most people.”

“For the two or three sentences you have just uttered, not even I could have done better, my dear!” said the venerable Massini, giving a superior and slightly ironic laugh. “I am a master of the most powerful Masonic lodge in the world; and while this must remain a well-kept secret to most, it would be superfluous to keep it from you because the issue I want to talk with you about goes way beyond the importance of my occult position. On the contrary, it is absolutely necessary that you know who you are talking to from the very beginning.”

In giving his account of the meeting, Cezar told me that this was the precise moment when he realized what the purpose of Massini’s visit was as well as the way in which the meeting was to proceed. At that moment, he also knew what he would do next and what strategy to employ in order to learn and understand as much as possible about the twists and turns of the Freemason organization. In fact, this was to be a battle of wits between the two and where a lot of giving and taking was to take place, all of which had to be carefully orchestrated because the forces at play – and the consequences that could follow – were huge.

At first, Cezar set himself the goal of exploring a territory where he had already noticed a weakness on venerable Massini’s part: his self-pride and an inflated ego, both of which could strategically diminish his vigilance and inner strength.

“Therefore, your position in the lodge is one of the highest. I know that the hierarchy follows the thirty-three so-called ‘degrees.’

“The Bilderberg Group is not exactly a lodge. It is a lot more than that but I will not go into details now. Indeed, at lodge level, hierarchy follows these thirty three degrees and promotion must meet clear requirements. You should also know these degrees are a sort of ‘facade.’ Real power goes way beyond the thirty-three hierarchical degrees and involves other requirements that I can tell you about but only under certain circumstances. It is up to you alone to be open to such a situation.

“Imagine a big house. In order for it to look as nice as possible, it must be painted elegantly with great care for details. By way of analogy, these would be the initiation levels. Most of the riches and the biggest secrets, however, are inside the house, unseen and unknown but to the masters of the house who are very few in number and act as the power behind the smooth operation of the entire building, its maintenance, administration and prosperity. In order for this to happen, they need not be known by the other people nor must their ways and means be known. You are an intelligent man and you can easily understand what I mean.”

Cezar had noted that Signore Massini’s turn of phrase had gradually moved to a more familiar and straightforward tone. That could be an advantage because familiarity in discussion could breed the disclosure of many secrets. The age gap between the two obviously contributed to that kind of tone. Undoubtedly, the venerable Massini displayed great vital strength and an unusual psychic force in stark contrast to his respectable age. Unfortunately, his subtle radiation – whereby the venerable one could at any time dominate ordinary human beings who are weak or physically or mentally unstable in their great majority — was gathered around his immense self-pride, arrogance and a feeling of superiority, perhaps justified by his noble descent. That is why, regardless of Cezar’s merits and good references, which one could assume were well known to the elite of the Bilderberg Group, the venerable Massini could not restrain his self-pride.

“We have requested this meeting using our power and connections because we are fully aware of your force and abilities by which we set great store, particularly if they serve our interests.”

In saying that, the venerable one made the first important move in the game between the two. As will be noted, however, the wheeling and dealing was to prove a lot more complicated than a simple and relatively indirect proposal for cooperation at the highest Masonic level.

“Mr. Massini, if I am to understand anything in particular, and if the problem is to be approached in a specific manner, then please say so from the very beginning. For instance, what is the main reason for which you want me to be a member of the Bilderberg Group?”

Signore Massini’s attitude turned suddenly cold and his voice took on a very grave undertone.

“Is this really a problem for you, Mr. Brad? Do you imagine you are free to choose or set conditions? And who said you would become a member of the Bilderberg Group? Do you have any idea who its members really are and what the access criteria are at that level? You are far away from this hierarchical position; and moreover, you will never be able to be part of the group’s close circles for reasons which, if I told you about, would leave you utterly mystified. They are not part of this world. Therefore please come back to more mundane ideas and understand that the indirect proposal I have made concerns your becoming a member of one of the highest Masonic lodges in the world directly subordinate to the Bilderberg Group.

“Our organization could use your special contribution. The fact that I myself have come here to have this private talk with you will make you understand we appreciate you a lot. Judging by the information we have, I must admit, your powers and abilities are impressive. As I was telling you, we are interested in cooperating with you.

“There is a secret council at the level of this lodge that makes proposals for the main lines for action in the world which the Bilderberg Group then assess. It works like a sort of feedback loop. You could be an important driving force in that council and you could acquire anything you have ever dreamed of in this world and rule over everything you want: wealth, people, luxury, laws and even governments. Nothing could stop you.

“We do not negotiate because what we offer is huge. What would be the point in having any other useless discussions when things are so clear? And to be honest, there is no other option for you but to take our offer.”

In saying that with unflinching self-confidence, the venerable Massini made a specific gesture, stretching his hand as if cutting through the air. It might be that someone in Cezar’s shoes would have been intimidated and even bewildered both by the speed at which the conversation had advanced and by the fabulous perspectives lying in wait. Cezar told me that had been a turning point of the meeting.

Complex though it appeared, the problem had only two obvious solutions: either he took the offer, which meant membership in the Masonic organization and quick promotion to its highest levels, or he could turn it down, which would have triggered an unpredictable chain of adverse consequences both for himself and for the activity of Department Zero. At that moment, Cezar was not aware of the main data on Freemasonry’s topmost interests, but he was very interested to find out about them so as to be able to understand the occult reasons for action on the part of this worldwide organization and the ways and means whereby it wanted to attain its goals. The circumstances seemed favorable to him and the discussion had got to a point where, step by step, he could steer it towards what he was interested in. He would do this by whetting Signore Massini’s appetite for self-pride and power. The task, however, was not at all an easy one because the venerable one was a very shrewd interlocutor with lots of brains and mental vigor on top. Unfortunately, those qualities were already channelled down a deeply negative direction.

Cezar had the intuition that, if he had turned down the proposal right away, “the game” would have been over and Signore Massini would have left without any plea for reconsideration. Cezar would not have had the chance of finding out anything more and the consequences of his refusal would have been unpredictable. He therefore made the decision to deceive the venerable one’s vigilance and, under cover of acceptance, learn as much as possible about the backstage dealings of worldwide Freemasonry. From a certain perspective, he then took on the role of an “undercover kamikaze” but he felt self-confident and trusted his ability to deal with any difficulties that might have come up.

THE OCCULT TRUTH ABOUT FREEMASONRY

“What you are telling me is very exciting, Mr. Massini; however, I should like to understand how it was and is possible that you have such great influence. I must confess I find this to be very interesting.”

Satisfied with this twist in the conversation, Signore Massini gave a solicitous reply, apparently falling into the quite simple “trap” Cezar had laid.

“Well, my dear, there are lots of ways to get influence and this is an area we master to perfection. The main quality it takes is patience. One cannot build up grand and elegant palaces and then enjoy all the attendant pleasures unless one is tenacious, vigilant and above all patient, even in the face of apparent failure. It takes time for everything to fall into place and sometimes it can be very long until that happens.

“Our venerable masters of yore had a great overall vision of the final outcome to which we are now getting closer and closer. They didn’t greedily pursue mean, selfish interests but fought with all their might to strengthen and reinforce Masonic foundations by adapting its guidelines to the course of human evolution. In fact, why would they have only looked after themselves and their families? Weren’t they the richest, wealthiest and best-off of all people anyway? Hadn’t they made an oath to help and support one another when in need? I can tell you they were the real architects of the principles now governing the social system. But for the time being, I can’t disclose much about these ‘architects’ who devised the entire plan as long as several thousand years ago because that is a terrible secret of which not even all the members of the Bilderberg Group are aware.

“In modern times – and by this I mean the past two or three hundred years – the venerable masters have done nothing but apply, in an intelligent manner, the basic principles that had already been established and adapted these to the structure of their times. Their actions have been improved with each generation while at the same time keeping the same drive and initial ideas.

You must know that at the top of our hierarchy, there are only people of royal descent whose lineage one can trace back in genealogical trees as old as hundreds or even thousands of years. We pay great attention to this issue so as not to get mixed up with other races. Despite all this, however, there have been exceptions; but gradually, we have succeeded in eliminating recessive genes.”

“You must be talking about royal families across Europe and the great bankers at the end of the Middle Ages?!” asked Cezar in an attempt to prepare the ground for more details on the issue.

“Precisely. They were not revolutionaries. They didn’t uphold any hard and fast ideology or any specific and convoluted philosophy. Their force has never lain in their brawn or their go-getting spirit. They have never produced heroes or spearheads. Instead, they were quick to understand that in order to succeed they needed a different algorithm, drawing its strength from the very force, actions and decisions of people. They were keen observers and made some essential points from the very beginning.

“They noticed, for instance, that community life, whether it is grounded in monarchies, republics or any other type of governance, is based on leadership. This reality involves two so-called ‘groups.’ On the one hand, the masses or the rabble, that is the majority of people; and, on the other hand, the elite who one way or another strive to shepherd ‘the herd.’ This simple observation was the foundation on which they built their entire plan.”

“But why was it so important to them that people were split into those two categories?” Cezar asked quickly.

Like a genuine Masonic master initiated in the obscure secrets of the organization of which he was a member, Signore Massini started to reveal the very ideological core of Freemasonry at world level.

“This reality is and was very important due to the fact that there have always been conflicting interests between the two groups. The situation had to be made to work out so that those conflicting interests could never disappear completely or, in other words, so that there would never be genuine peace among people. In order for this to be the case, it was necessary to pander to both ‘groups’ by various methods without their knowledge of the scheme. Our Illuminati have taken this ability to perfection in that they could run with the hare and hunt with the hound and yet never fail in this double game!"

Cezar then seized the opportunity to keep the pot boiling.

"But how could they do it?" he asked. "What were their methods?"

"They needed some strong 'levers' and at the origin of their actions lay only two: money and man's inferior nature that makes him give into temptations of all kinds. That has always been a successful combination because what was not good in one case was so in another. That is how this 'recipe' drawing on scheming, lies, temptations and pretence allowed our influence to spread throughout the world. In today's world, we must of course factor in a series of other issues. Among the most important of these are the number of this planet's inhabitants as well as remarkable technological progress. Basically, however, the foundations of our Masonic organization were laid a long time ago, and they are so firm and now so deeply ingrained in people's consciousness that the full achievement of our program is now only a matter of time."

Signore Massini ended his lecture with a satisfied smile on his face and lit a long cigar. Obviously, he was waiting for his words to take their effect on Cezar. Playing along, Cezar made a statement.

"But I fail to understand the main reason for which this huge effort has been made for thousands and thousands of years."

Puffing slowly on his cigar, Signore Massini looked at Cezar through his half-closed eyelids. In his unbounded self-pride, he already considered his approach to have been fully successful. Cezar, on the other hand, thought that erroneous view had weakened the venerable one's vigilance and prompted him to push ahead with a profusion of explanations.

"That is quite simple, my dear. Power was and will always be the main reason! What else could we possibly want after so long a time? Come on, tell me, and don't be shy! Money? Almost all of the money in this world is ours thanks to the banking web we have been weaving for the past centuries. Since civilizations thrived, we have been intent upon creating a social system where people fully depend on their income. Money, more and more money! That's the name of the game: a fixation that had to be spread everywhere.

"But in order to have money, one must produce; and in order to produce, one must work. And work requires time. These are the terms of our equation which in fact is a vicious circle, a puzzle with no solution attached. The result was that people ended up working themselves to exhaustion for us, always under the spell of more and more money that is, in fact, easily spent in keeping with the world's rhythm and its assorted attractions. And yet, no matter how much money one could earn, the real wealth and the bulk of the money are in our possession, well kept in our banks or invested in title deeds.

"Even if ten or one hundred people who are not members of our lodges get extremely wealthy, they are not a threat because they are discrete entities who do not pursue any definite, large-scale goal. Of course, we are careful to lure most of them to our organization from the very beginning of their brilliant careers and thereby increase our power. Those who turn down our offer can't hold out on their own for too long. If one way or another they become a threat, we join efforts to force them into bankruptcy, even at the risk of some losses on our side. But the huge financial machinery we have built allows us to redress the financial balance quickly through increases somewhere else. The aim is to bring down the person in question. Usually, when they are just about to collapse and feel lost beyond retrieve, the tactics are to give them a second chance to take the offer they initially turned down. Most often they accept; and then, of course, their personal business makes a spectacular comeback, but at that point they must already comply with clear conditions that we set and cannot be avoided.

"We always stand to gain, whether it be an influential politician to further our interests — which is the most frequent and almost easiest case to fabricate — or a great businessman, most of whose money we administer through our own networks. It is therefore our interest to create as many such 'vicious circles' as possible. And it is on this foundation that we have built modern society and the so-called 'cell of society,' that is, the family which we have chained to an infinite set of dependences: jobs, houses, comfort, cars, bank loans, and long-term contractual obligations that sometimes extend over one or two generations of the respective family. The role of a ‘vicious circle’ is to make people dependent because, when this happens, they are no longer free.

“Dependence automatically triggers a sort of enslavement or limitation, and we need people to be as limited and mechanical as possible in their actions which must become almost stereotypical. This was the main reason why we have gradually imposed a sort of labor specialization extending over as many fields and subfields as possible. If job requirements are simple, almost minimal but repetitive, the job holder will soon become a submissive and obedient ‘machine.’

“We do not want people to think too much. Thinking can become dangerous and spawn ideas that run counter to our goals. That is why we have sought to extend our control over larger and larger numbers of people, even outside job hours – in their spare time, that is. We have thus allowed technology and innovation to capture the attention of the masses by means the lack of which would be synonymous with catastrophe today: television sets, telephones, and computers.

“Our idea has been a howling success because, apart from creating addiction to these technological means, it has also given us control over the spread of information. At present, due to the characteristics of our times, information ranks first as a ‘tool’ for action in the world. It is then simple to anticipate the next step: by controlling media institutions and tools, we implicitly control the content and quality of information. That is why one of our primary goals has been to gain control over the biggest press, radio and television trusts in the world.”

“Do you mean all this has been enough to gain control over the world?” Cezar asked.

“Obviously not. The media was only available in a limited area. That is why we needed some more ‘methods’ of domination that had to be tempting to the masses. We acted like a ‘grey eminence’ in support of the spread of drugs, synthetic drugs in particular. Fully aware that these drugs — together with tobacco, alcohol and coffee can destroy the human body — we have deliberately staged a so-called ‘no campaign’ that has only increased the demand for such substances. We have created huge tobacco, fine beverage and coffee concerns. Almost all of the presidents and owners of these business giants are venerable members of the highest-ranking lodges of our organization,” Signore Massini concluded, completely full of satisfaction.

“All this seems to be a concerted attack against humanity,” Cezar said, pretending he had only caught on to the idea. Not at all affected by the purport of the question, the venerable had a nonchalant reply:

“My dear, it is already difficult to control and coordinate more than six billion people. You must understand that the more dispersed and confused a crowd is, the easier it is to maneuver. If, in addition, it does not go above a certain number of people, then things are quite simple given the mental manipulation technology now available to us. Therefore, what difference do you think it makes if several million people die on a daily basis, most of them from drug-related diseases?”

The venerable one paused for a short while in his cynical presentation, seemingly pondering over what he would tell Cezar next.

“One of our primary goals has been to put an end to population growth. Moreover, we had to decrease world population numbers dramatically. In order to do this, we needed methods that could kill large numbers of people in a very short time. We have financed top-secret research projects for the production of deadly viruses. Some experiments have failed but others have yielded results.”

“We must look at the issue from a practical point of view. It is the only way we can achieve our aims thoroughly. If something or someone opposes us, they can’t hold out against us for too long. As I was telling you, our ‘tools’ are never in the open. On the contrary, they come in a deeply humane casing but tap into those soft spots that we ourselves have built into the system and are mostly unknown to the people.

“Our basic hidden source of manipulation is the constitution of a state. The making of a constitution is a real science of human psychology and manipulation which is why we have been careful to have our representatives involved in the process of the big powers of the world. Constitutions must take on a humane shape, pompous even and relatively complicated, but at the same time, encode those effective means for population control and undermining.

“Conflicts, revolutions and wars in various areas of the globe have perhaps been the most widespread method that we have created and indirectly supported over time. Armed conflicts have always been a real and huge source of income to us, as well as a subtle means of power-wielding across the world.

“We capitalize on any economic or social difficulty, particularly in less developed countries. Owing to our banking influence, we can operate secretly at the top level of power in the respective country and do the same with the adversary state. We never get involved in one direction as the result can be uncertain. But by enticing both camps to take action, we stand to gain no matter how their conflict might end.

“Our times lend themselves particularly to ethnic or economic conflicts. These are simple to trigger, last long and bring into play numerous other interests on the part of more powerful but rival states.

Eventually, the respective war becomes a war among the great powers of the world and less a nationally limited cause. Almost all of the big international bodies, whether they are political or military, are of Masonic origin. Our venerables are there in key positions and follow our plans to the point of precision. And, as I have told you, we are very patient. Decay eats away slowly but surely, even at the thickest tree trunk. The UN and NATO, to name only two of our most influential ‘tools,’ have turned out to be most welcome decisions on our part.

“And yet, Signore Massini, there’s something I don’t quite understand,” Cezar said, putting on a vexed look. “How could anyone believe that what is most important in this world is a direct consequence of the plans and actions of the Masonic organization? This is absurd and even inconceivable!”

Signore Massini laughed heartily and lit another cigar. He was quietly sizing Cezar up through the clouds of blue tinged smoke eddying slowly in the cool mountain air. For a moment, Cezar thought he had gone beyond the limit with his hidden intentions and that the venerable one had caught on to his plan. But his fears were soon shattered.

“My dear, this is one of the linchpins of our doctrine. Indeed, my way of presenting things to you makes them seem so absurd and grotesque that the accusations that might be brought against us would seem utterly hilarious! In a way, this is the core of our ideology: follow the plan, but at the same time, make it all seem as if opposing such a plan. Thus you can understand more easily why we don’t want media attention, honors, fame or public recognition. All this is transient and is additionally controlled by our very organization through our media leverage. Our success lies in being a group. Our actions do not follow individual interests alone but are always correlated and clearly targeted. Mutual support and complete discretion are essential ingredients for our success. In fact, the rules and oaths of our organization are very strict and penalties very tough.

“You must be wondering what makes me speak to you so frankly without any trace of fear and in all confidence. In so doing, I assure you I have assessed it all correctly. Or do you imagine that, once in possession of all this information, you can make it known to the entire world?”

Signore Massini laughed heartily, but his eyes turned cold and hard immediately after.

“Your power and influence outside are zero, Mr. Brad! Once you have become the object of our attention, you can no longer escape it. The scope of your options is limited: either you follow us unconditionally or you become a persona non grata.

“Just think about it: you are alone, disconnected from the outside world and subjected to a maximum security regime. Do you really believe it would be difficult for us to cause your removal if we really wanted it? But why would we do that when you yourself can support our plans? In addition, you will be able to learn things you haven’t even imagined and you will enjoy immunity and absolute protection.

“From a certain standpoint, you are precious, but what is precious must prove its utility. Therefore, my dear, I can see absolutely no reason for keeping any of our principles and methods from you. This would be tantamount to considering you an ordinary follower with a feeble mind, but this is not true. Moreover, in order for you not to view this approach as too straightforward – which is anyway of a special kind in your case – I want this discussion to be civil and mutually respectful. I really want to create the appearance of an option or decision and give you time to think about it. But I’m telling you once again — in reality —you’ve got neither options nor time because we are the ones who’ve got the power. Practically, you are left with only the option of joining us. You should think about it. What could you do? Who would listen to you without thinking you were a madman?

“Freemasonry has always been occult. It would have been against our real goals to claim paternity over all the great ideas, social and cultural trends, ideologies or forward-looking principles all over the world although we are the originators of a large majority of them. Instead, we have opted for discretion, mystery, retreat and backstage dealing. There are only a few people who have heard about the term ‘Mason’ or ‘Freemason,’ and even if the word rings some faint bells with them, they don’t have any idea about what it might mean in reality.

“This spell that we continue to weave so carefully has served us well over time. Given the circumstances, imagine anyone going out in the world and spreading the information I have just given you. Who would believe or listen to that person?”

“You may be right, but do not ignore the force of a general opinion trend that could destroy everything you have built thus far,” Cezar said with lucidity.

“We are aware there already are many people, intellectuals in particular, who know at least part of the truth about us and to whom we can no longer lie; but by comparison to the rest of the population, who have been dumbed down by the social system we ourselves have created — and particularly by the information system we control almost completely — these people are really a minority. Moreover, they are dispersed and threatened by our indirect warnings.

“As it is, even if some people are aware of our real intentions, they will take a passive stance thinking they are powerless, listless and deprived of any possibility to act effectively. They then take the position of the lamenting victim: ‘I know, but what can I do? What can we do? Our hands are tied. We are being controlled and watched in everything we do. I don’t think any chance is left.’ And thus, a significant proportion of the population who could pose great difficulties and problems for us has already laid down arms before the battle has even begun.

“If, eventually, someone attempts to attack us or tries to reveal the real nature of our actions to the ignorant, we can resort to a wide range of methods to ‘pacify’ such a person. Our reactions are attentively conceived and rely on a thorough understanding of human psychology. This is almost always initiated by launching false or evil information about that person. As I was telling you, we have very thorough control over the media.

“Suppose the information is released through a number of nationally distributed newspapers. The readers come across the respective false piece of information which has negative connotations. The harm is done whatever flat denial it would trigger on behalf of the accused party in the following days. First, it is very likely that the same reader would not read the ensuing denial, therefore keeping in mind the memory of the first reading. Although the content of the information is untrue, the reader’s perception of the target of the article remains a negative one. Then, we must exploit as much as possible the vicious tendency of modern society represented by its sick thirst for sensational headlines exhibiting evil situations or characters.

“We are well aware of both the influence and the terrible impact of such suggestions on the emotional nature of humans. We do know that evil suggestions destroy the harmonious energy structures of the aura and bring about a subtle form of stress at psychical level. We also know that they lower the frequency of positive perceptions and affect the beneficial intentions of humans. These perfectly serve our intentions as they exhaust people, diffuse their attention, weaken their alert mind and blur the farsightedness of their spirit.

“Thus we achieve the very goal we consistently aimed at: increasing the social entropy. I even dare to say that it is us who have raised this skill close to perfection. To achieve the social entropy, which triggers a rather total social confusion, we always put to use conflicting items of information on the same issue that is disseminated by various media, seasoning the issue with awful or lugubrious connotations. We therefore subsidize and promote works centered around childish or fanciful subjects. They all have a great appeal though to the narrow-minded looking for the sensational. It is us who premiered this mechanism and fueled the proliferation of such books aiming at the public's acceptance, and they actually ended by appreciating these works."

"The economical and social system we have imposed strongly encourages rivalry in its dissonant forms, unlawful competition and over-consumption of products. For all of these, we offer a humanitarian justification which is training and motivating people to cross the 'life jungle' that poses a death threat on them. In fact, this senseless disquiet and obsession of the people, which permanently keeps them busy and under constant pressure, leads to a significant decline of genuine moral and ethical values and to a vicious growth of human nature.

"We do take full advantage of these ideas and opportunities at each and every media level. Given this strong support, we have also encouraged the proliferation of anomalous forms of sexuality and pornography that eventually reached unbelievable levels. We did this as a result of our observations that both man's strength and virility, and woman's sensibility and intuition, quickly diminish when subjected to evil practices. Under such circumstances, human nature becomes unstable and totally vulnerable to temptations; hence, the basic idea that it can be easily manipulated. To achieve our goals, the target's resistance must be weak. We therefore launch 'attractive' ideas and opportunities to people and then take advantage of their weakness or provisions in the contracts they recklessly signed with us.

"Modern society is a perfect fit to this design. Given the huge technological progress we have allowed, we offer more and more temptations, and the people easily fall victims to indiscriminate and various sense gratifications and stimuli. We are perfectly aware their willpower will soon be exhausted; and without resoluteness, humans are like stupid animals in their way to the slaughter house.

"We place a special emphasis on the young people because the seeds of life can be easily killed in the feeble. Under an appealing and attractive mask, we infuse the young generation with all elements meant to fuel and swell vicious tendencies. We encourage broadcasting of movies displaying violence and horror movies where the characters exhibit sadistic and evil features. To do this, we rely on advertising which, in my opinion, turned into the very heart of commerce. Thus, we enormously multiplied people's tendency towards consumption which has taken the form of a 'modern disease.' Although they don't need something specific, they follow the tendency to buy, consume and buy again, even useless items and make superfluous provisions.

"On the other hand there is a close relationship between the temptation of money and the means by which one gets it. It is not easy to become rich, and in the present economical and legal environment we have imposed, it is even impossible if one resorts to honest methods. That is why almost the entire group of rich people is vicious and perverted. The dishonest and twisted nature of the rich make them keep secret their actions, and this triggers mutual obligations, particularly by blackmail. We are very skillful in taking the greatest advantage of such situations as we are the very architects of this method."

"However," wondered Cezar, "I think not all people react this way. If so, what do you do in this situation, Signore Massini?"

The venerable indifferently raised his shoulders.

"There are too few left; it is not worth paying them attention. Take Romania, for example. It was very easy to place our people in key positions because we skillfully took profit by the transition from a totalitarian regime (which had also been set up by us) to an apparent state of freedom. We correctly foresaw the greedy and unscrupulous behavior of people exposed to various fears and hardships. Such people are like thirsty wanderers in the middle of the Sahara who desperately drink at the oasis without caring at all about their nakedness nor the opinion of other people.

"After the revolution in your country, we did nothing else but to encourage the economical disaster, particularly corruption, and the Romanian people's temptation for the taste of money. After such a long period of various hardships and restrictions, and subject to long-lasting suffering, it was highly probable that Romanians would easily fall victims to the surge of temptations. Indeed, with rare exceptions, they all fell in this trap. At that moment we interfered at the political level. You should not worry as this is what we do in almost all countries. We must be certain that the main positions in the Government and the Parliament are held by old people, many of them spineless and easy subjects to manipulate. To the strong and dynamic characters on the other hand, we took great care to develop their selfishness, especially the deceiving feeling of power which, in their case, was not the sign of real leaders. Acting this way, we fueled their egoistic, petty, and hypocritical nature. We needed such people in key positions because of their appetite for both dirty businesses and the paltriness to do anything to keep their prerogatives and jobs.

“We have almost completely succeeded. As a matter of fact, it was quite easy given the thirst for money and greediness of your politicians, all accompanied by their cowardice and deceitfulness. All of these features make them a bunch of abject characters. We feel very comfortable with this situation, but now I think we should make no further discussion about that.”

Cezar hastily availed himself of this short break and asked, “What is all this for, Signore Massini? What is exactly the final purpose of the Masons? Of all you have told me so far, nothing seems to be left to achieve, yet you seem to perseveringly aim to something.”

“My dear friend, the answer is quite easy. When is the king the absolute ruler of his kingdom and people? It is when he has the absolute power. It is the corner stone for us. Soon, the power of domination over the entire world must be in the grasp of our hands. Bluntly speaking, the thirst of power is the basic motivation of all people who accept to join us: politicians, leaders and businessmen. Above all, there are the elite made up of our venerable Illuminati whose design it is to take full control over both the entire world and each and every individual. There are so many means to achieve this plan that it would take me too long to describe them to you. I would, however, offer you a few explanations. It will be in your power to understand the rest and to quickly learn them along with your integration into the rules and ideology of our organization.

“We will only attain complete influence and control upon humans when we succeed to supervise everything. The collected forces and powers of the members belonging to all of our organizations will gradually lead to such totalitarianism when the individual freedom and autonomy is supervised from the point where a human being is born. To make sure of this and to experience the validity of the result, we invented, as a mere experiment, Communism. However, we noticed that the constant drawbacks and people's anguish, also the cult of personality that would always go for the heads of all Communist countries, created some tensions and could even enable some clearness upon reality for some individuals who might have caused trouble in time. The Communist system was only appropriate for a certain period of time during several decades. It became inefficient later and even dangerous for our interests.

"When we understood this, we decided to finish this experience and we gave the green light for the political changes. We must create the illusion of 'something different,' but we already knew that nothing could be changed in one day. So, we were expecting lots of social rebellions meant to change mentalities, goals and the way of thinking. We are those who insidiously penetrated the main ideas of the new social system by means of media, politicians and by constantly creating new rifts in finances, particularly meant to strain the relation between people and government."

"Welfare shouldn't be a general condition, but we want a certain stratum of corrupted people who are therefore going to support our interests without having the smallest clue about it. On the contrary, the appearances always make them believe that it's up to them to act and make decisions and they are having the power which we must support for them in order not to let the spell go down.

"What I'm telling you now is top secret in Freemasonry. You shouldn't think that every member knows our mysteries. Access to our ideas and goals is only allowed step by step; and the information to be revealed is also structured in sequence of stages according to its importance. As a general rule, we always act at three different levels which clearly outline the duties and value of the Masonic brother. Although in a birds-eye view these levels seem like some independent, superimposed strata, they still comprise some linking rings that make a crucial importance in understanding what our plans worldwide are. But these linking rings are only known by our leaders, our elder Illuminati."

"The first rank includes those who have newly joined our Mason lodges who are not yet important enough for us to entrust serious tasks to them.

They are our ‘daily workers,’ i.e. those who accomplish lots of petty work which is quite useful; yet, as a whole, they prepare the stage for our great blows. By that, I mean the appearance of different military conflicts, revolutions, and national payback incapacity which is some of our heavy artillery and a part of the strategy that our remarkable fellows envisage. But such far-reaching actions only come up after the material is ready. This is after our ‘daily workers’ act for a while, all under our guidance in the shade, without precisely knowing the real target.

People belonging to this rank are particularly the newly rich and quite narrow-minded, pursuing titles, ranks and social acknowledgment. As a whole, they are the snobbish, bearing an inferiority complex which they seek to balance by thinking that they belong to the high-life or even make up this social stratum. They are supposed to be full of vanity, hypocrisies and selfishness, having some financial power but not wealthy enough not to yearn in secret after a royal life.

“Even so, it is absolutely necessary that they must be some of our political leaders as we need to control the levers and influence both at a governmental level and at the lower local level as this is where the intrigue starts its way to the center. This is why we mainly try to attract to this rank professors, lawyers, doctors, inspectors, mayors and certain businessmen in the area.

“For all these people we have created some ‘valves’ or motivation to lure them and then use them to our benefit. There are some selected clubs such as Rotary or Lion’s which give them the illusion that they belong to the high-life in the country and therefore are leading society. In fact, these clubs are but some dust in their eyes, a shield against possible attacks, for the people who belong there will undauntedly fight to preserve the privileges they attained as members of the so-called high-life.

“They are attracted and stimulated by a serious and selected front side of that elitist society where only good people are known to penetrate, people who represent the cream of society and retain power and influence in different state structures. This is a highly attractive image that we maintain by luxury and by enabling high-ranking relationships and financial support. But, I stress it again: all these things create obligations.

“Our main interest is to generate great differences between the social strata. This means people who are quite rich or very poor with no intermediary and supportive layer in between. This is how we maintain a general social condition that makes people believe they must face a continuous assault and ceaselessly fight to earn their living day by day or to increase their possessions even more. This tension and anxiety will supply the fear element. As long as fear is there, there is no room for peace, consolation, relaxation or spirituality. This is why we want to obstruct any path to good, harmony and genuine religious belief which would damage our power and control.”

“What do you mean?” Cezar asked in a vexed tone. “That you do not have any religion at all and, on the contrary, you want to undermine it?”

“Religion? Consider carefully what is going on in the world these days. Think of the race hatred, the deviated sects that get fanatic in the name of a unique but particular God. The endless conflicts between nations are mostly grounded on religious divergences. Think of the corruption and cowardice of the Christian church, the Orthodox vanity and the Catholic manipulation! Indeed, it’s still us who have directed these things backstage, particularly by the perverse intrigues and ideas implemented at the right moment in some key points under the power of some people. In exchange, we give people the kingdom of the Universal Architect who can really take good care of them. You call him the Prince of Darkness. It makes no importance!

“First of all, you must persistently follow up your own interest in everything you do. This will require great efforts and commitments, quite serious sometimes. For instance, this may include denying your religion and even giving away your soul; but you will taste the power, the wealth and the extraordinary influence at the high levels of society.”

“That’s interesting,” said Cezar with a subtle and ironic attitude, all according to his initial plan. “I used to have some different concepts; however, what you are saying here seems quite attractive.”

“Don’t think that these facts are known by everybody,” said the venerable Massini with enthusiasm. “Far be it. I told you about three basic levels and their scaled importance in our Masonic organization.

“Now you understand that the first rank of the ‘daily workers’ has no access to such information that concerns the secret aspects of Masonry, particularly our worldwide plans. The members of the second rank, however, can meet some of our international arrangements so that if they should get deeper into the political and governmental agreements, they are given much more support by our powerful lodges. In particular, we set up for them a specific hierarchy of steps or ranks, up to the 33rd degree.

“It’s important to notice how people can stick to their titles, their posts and acknowledgment; and we consider this highly within our organization. A 33rd degree Mason can stand for a basic figure in our general structure. In time, we tried to spread the idea that this is the peak of the Masonic pyramid. Still, I want to mention to you in particular that the second rank is but the beginning of the Masonic world elite. This is carefully concealed. Nevertheless, some rumors have escaped in time. You have to know, however, that it is us at the peak of the pyramid and we cannot be sued in the court. There is no other state structure above us for the simple reason that we have created almost all of them.”

“This means you own the power at the highest level,” Cezar interrupted pensively. “How is it possible that the third rank of Masons, to whom you referred to as the world Masonic elite, can own such a power without being known?”

“We need no acknowledgment the way you’re thinking about it. We may show up in society, particularly by means of the inherited titles of nobility or as great bankers dealing with their business. We always take care to stay close to the so-called charity actions by means of some foundations that also belong to us. In fact, these foundations enable us to transfer large amounts of money under the color of legality and philanthropic goals. We are the ones who retain, in fact, the world financial monopoly for we control all money markets. The world control project is meticulously set up.”

“How did you manage to control the world finances?” Cezar asked.
“Nobody can have access to all the money in circulation!”

“We mostly control this money, but our real influence consists of the huge debts we basically force upon all governments in order to deal with the economy, and therefore in the social field — in the way we like it. This is basically the main target for which we founded two high financial structures in the world: the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund (IMF). But the strongest stroke which made our greatest success was getting the USA into debt so that they completely fall under the financial politics we arrange.

“Just as I said, the essence in such politics is the interest on loans and the subsequent debts and all forms of obligations or concessions to result in our favor. This is how we control the economic world and we direct it where we please. We can create real instability or obstruct the payments where we have a particular interest.

“Countries in bankruptcy is what we are best at for we can thereby indirectly rule a whole people. We obviously fix and connect these strategies in advance by misinformation through the international media which also belongs to us. This system proved highly efficient in time and we properly manage it. In case there is somebody to oppose it, there would normally be no problem to do away with him as a political or social personality, thanks to our countless relationships, to corruption and to our control over the financial system.

“There are some special cases, such as the USA, where we cannot allow any mistakes or exterior actions except the ones we provide. This is why every president of the USA is our choice and the outcome of our Masonic goals. He must absolutely be an outstanding member in our Masonic Lodges. Most of the time they belong to the second rank. In order to perfectly hide the political and financial maneuvers we display, we demanded the most spectacular and also hilarious idea that we managed to implement to the crowds in the last two hundreds years. This probably is one of our most valuable additions that provided great advantage to us and can still be quite efficient these days. You may be surprised, but it sounds so familiar: democracy!

“The concept itself is not worth a brass; still, it is the most essential piece in the gear of our plans and it is quite popular. The main reason is that it stirs vanity to people and makes them crave for power. In fact, it only generates some sort of hatred, fight and temptation which makes a great frame for manipulation. The secret political games and the high financial and power interests are apparently in the hands of the electors. You have to proceed to slight compromises in order to enjoy all of the advantages later on. What is the advantage we actually draw by means of democracy? It usually leads to disunion between different social layers of a country and to downright conflicts between peoples in the world. The idea we promote in order to actually conceal our real plans and actions under everybody's silent agreement concerns the illusion of the free choice for every individual. But when we deal with tens and hundreds millions of different people, so stressed and perverted, their so-called 'free choice' can be easily directed by different methods. The tempest must go wild, but its main direction can be influenced so that it may protect certain areas and destroy others.

"We found the easiest and safest way to attain chaos and disunion. You see, despite the highly charitable appearances and the moral values we polished democracy in, this actually hides the core we had started from and that we enhanced in time: the hatred between fellows, the blind struggle for a facile and ephemeral power and the lack of unity.

"People joining together under positive and beneficial ideas or concepts is quite dangerous, for this is the only way for the masses to become really powerful in their action. This basically is the reason why we often pursue the state splitting into different minorities, each of them having its own specific interests, culture and religious beliefs. Our final goal is having the cultural and religious traditions vanish away in different countries to the point where they lack the power of individualization. Then they may be easily controlled and assimilated in a unique governmental form which will be obviously directed by our Masonic world elite.

"One of the major obstacles we encounter and we have to surpass is the various traditions of people and their need to stay close to them. We strive to gather a 'herd of animals,' automatically responsive. You give them hay and water at the proper time and they offer unconditional commitments. To attain this, just as I said before, the ancient traditions must wane; the real folk values and symbols must be evened out and even ignored. The new generation must be perverted at the soul and have their senses poisoned with false ideas, lies and all kinds of alluring vices. We have mostly succeeded in doing so. That was quite easy for America as they basically have no tradition at all. It is currently the place on Earth where our plans have been perfectly carried out: the complete submission to the social-economical system with total control and financial oppression. All these are wrapped by the spell of the extraordinary technologies and by the ridiculous and arrogant idea of the first world power.

“People need the conviction even of a false power. They unconsciously need something to give a vivid impression and inner safety. We maintain this idea of power in the Americans’ mind for it prevents them from revolting against the system that had offered them such a comfortable idea of supremeness. Besides, we can make great use of the vanity and shallowness to derive from here. Since they are less cautious and can be easily manipulated, the Americans can stand for the peak offensive in our plan to conquer the absolute power on Earth.”

Cezar wanted more details.

“Since it’s just a bluff, why is democracy so much stressed about?” he asked.

“Democracy, my dear, is just apparently a beneficial thing. It enables, in fact, the highest abuses and conflicts,” answered Signore Massini. “Don’t you know people have died in the name of democracy? All laws and principles of the current civilization are structured according to the laws of democracy, aren’t they? Well, the emergence of this pole, which is democracy, also determined the possibility of the opposite idea and of the fight against democracy. That’s how we obtained the conflict. The conflict is a sound ground to enable the ruling of the whole world.

“Let me remind you here of a basic rule of our Masonic regulations: give secret support to both sides, by smart tactics in politics and economy, and give a shoulder to each combatant in order to reach the success you pursue.

“The term and the false concept of ‘democracy’ became a shield for many governments in order to freely act as they wish and therefore cover their own interests. Most of the countries fell into huge debts, striving to cover the military expenses no matter that they are not involved in wars. We give them loans but ask the governments to guarantee them with many assets: mines, forests, railways or several industrial fields that are quite important.

This is the main way for us to gradually take hold of a country's wealth and control the people in that country.”

“I still believe that democracy is a good idea, but the way it is applied seems perverted,” said Cezar, being careful in his answer to the venerable Massini.

“That is true indeed. Taken as a concept, democracy is only valuable when civilization has already reached a high level of understanding and application of the mysteries of the universe and of life. But even at such stages, it must only be employed in some restricted groups of individuals who are appointed to make the major decisions in some community or for a whole country. Democracy cannot essentially exist in a proper way for the large masses of people in heterogeneous structures. We do know that it means a viable concept only for the societies that have been given beneficial directions and where people think and generally act in the same voice and who have a high level of consciousness. But it’s not at all the case for the modern civilization.”

“What about the church?” Cezar interfered. “It has no influence in this respect? I know for a fact that the masses seriously confide in the church and follow it.”

Senior Massini failed to disguise his irritability.

“The Christian church is one of the most dangerous enemies we have. Its influence is quite large yet, but we endeavor to decrease it as much as possible. In doing so, we particularly target the young generation which we try to get unbalanced by means of our ideas. We mainly strived to give people the ideas of freedom and democracy which the modern civilization is known to misunderstand and give improper use. Everybody supports freedom and democracy and talks about it, but they barely think of the wars, conflicts, tensions and misunderstandings more usual in the world than ever. And they never consider this in the light of the good will, charity and peace that are stated worldwide. This is how we gave the supreme rank to the rulers’ hypocrisy and we take full advantage of this.

“We also counted on the lack of common sense, the vanity and the conceitedness of most of the people who imagine that they very well understand the structure of democracy and freedom of expression. When given such a frame, average people get self-important and they enhance this feeling at quite a ridiculous scale. In their petty existence under their everyday worries, people even imagine that the political leaders rely on them and on their opinion. Politicians therefore give people the impression that their opinion is a competent one. In fact, they only pursue a strong influence upon voters who must be urged not to their own necessities but to the interests of the leaders, usually concealed under promises and delusional platforms in politics. This is how we are protected by the very ones we want to oppress.

“In case any resistant position may rise against the general background, the representative must be eliminated right away. We generally proceed to disparagement by means of media. We continue by satire which helps us stir people’s suspicions and distrust as concerns about that person’s behavior and statements. Eventually, nobody will ever give credit to such a person. Since we display concentric and persevering assaults, often spiced with blackmail, the subject will soon feel forlorn and accused for what he dared to write or say. He will be threatened, job blackmailed, and discriminated in society so that he will eventually give in. He will go back on the courage he evinced at the beginning for he now wants to get back his advantages. Sometimes he will even become our partner.

“This is the main drama we created in society: most of the people are weak and cowardly. There are rather few to resist our attacks and strategies. However, such people obstruct our actions, and worse, they gain public consideration and help. This means unity and force in common goals which is just what we are trying to block. Even worse is that some of these people and groups observe very well known esoteric techniques which they apply in order to counter our actions.

“Well, it’s true that our elders, the Illuminati, also make use of secret techniques of persuasion and influence in order to determine specific effects in the physical world. Still, we sometimes are embarrassed and even obstructed in carrying out our plans by the opposite forces. This is why we absolutely need to attract people like you, who have already attained remarkable powers. We are willing to offer so much instead. This is the only way you can live your life for real.”

“Talking about the attacks against the Masonic organization, don’t they bring to light its plans and its intentions?” said Cezar, trying to avoid a clear answer.

“Some people who strongly oppose our plans do know the truth about us. Since the ordinary techniques of annihilation are not that efficient in such cases, we arrange an artifice. We choose some venerable members, particularly among those in the second rank, and have them present to the audience, by means of our controlled media, some aspects concerning our organization. They have interviews and write books or articles where some real and inoffensive aspects about our structure and activities are depicted. The principle we follow in proportion is a quarter reality and three quarters fake. The large amount of data that is given to the audience contains some real information which we cannot deny anyway, but it is exposed by the members of our organization. How could anyone suspect us of concealing information since we freely offer it? Obviously, those true things are wrapped and adorned in lies so that people shouldn’t get much of it and therefore quit investigating the topic.

“We are the ones to draw advantage out of this, for our enemies can no longer present the truth that we already stated in a perverted form. Even if they try to deal with other fields of our activity, we’ll pose as innocent oppressed victims and we’ll also enjoy the support of some mature, influential people.

“We currently started to tackle this strategy as it’s high time we came out of the shade we had deliberately chosen for ages. Due to the keener conflict, staying too much in the shade would now make much more trouble than advantage. This is why, in the last twenty years or so, we slightly started to come out on the stage, stating bits of truth together with many other lies. We very well knew that repeating a lie would make a truth out of it in the long run which causes people to lose vigilance. Nevertheless, the fight is getting even closer now for the public reaction also became unexpected. We must give the impression we are helping people and that we support them in need and pain.

“Our main directions, particularly sustained by our politicians, feign a major interest for people’s current problems, mainly produced by the world economic recession, managed by our organization. Therefore, using our ‘daily workers’ that I just told you about, helped by their acolytes, we attempt to give the idea that we take deep interest in these aspects and we strive to improve them. In fact, this entire ‘show in the footlights’ is only meant to win credit from the masses so that, at the right moment and in the perfect conjuncture, we should take possession of the political and economical leadership in the whole world and form up a unique world government under our complete and total order. We must therefore get people’s confidence as much as possible in order to give the impression of a natural sequence of facts — namely, the terrible world crisis to come, and so we’ll erect ourselves as redeemers of humankind for we do own the financial resources to do this.

“Basically, the task is not that difficult since the masses’ vigilance is already weakened by other strategies that we have been successfully applying for a while: everyday work routine, TV programs structured so as to inoculate a passive attitude in people’s subconscious with lack of reaction and discrimination, chemical food, drugs and all kinds of diseases.”

As he said that, Signore Massini suddenly had a glance at the elegant watch on his wrist, imbedded in diamonds. The evening had already fallen and the air was chilly.

“I think it’s high time we stopped,” the venerable one said.

“We count on your extraordinary adoptability, and I personally consider I have made myself quite clear to you as concerns the basic aspects of our activities. Tonight I’ll leave for Amsterdam as I have to deal with some problems there. I will also tell my honorable fellows the impression you made.”

Signore Massini stared for a few moments at Cezar in a willing attitude.

“I appreciate the result of our appointment as positive and I’m expecting a proper support from you in this respect. You are supposed to know most of the truth about our Masonic organization in order to avoid any possible blocking of conception. I will be back to visit you soon and that is going to be an important moment. That will be a difficult test for you I may say. By that time we are going to fix everything up in order to get you in our organization.”

The venerable Massini had already risen on his feet, leaning on his cane. Cezar saw him out to the copter. His strategy was apparently bearing fruits as he had no difficulty persuading Cezar and he didn't get stuck in any obligations either. The fact is that Signore Massini had been so self-collected in tackling the subject and eager to give explanations that Cezar's acceptance was basically taken for granted. The venerable one had an amazing subtle force. But for the remarkable psychic balance and the perfect control of his mind energy, Cezar wouldn't have succeeded to face the incredible active influence that the Mason could demonstrate when he wanted to get through something.

Cezar said that in such situations the psychic frequency of the venerable Mason was so strong and dominating that it would have doubtlessly made a serious hypnotic effect upon a common person unable to control the superior levels of their mind. He had himself perceived in his aura the tough impact of that shroud of energy, deeply negative, but he had simultaneously lifted it up in a superior form of energy at the upper levels of his mind. His steady volition enabled a perfect control and helped him be fully aware in confronting Signore Massini. Maybe the reader will have a small understanding of their encounter.

Now that I know the entire background, I can state that, even to Cezar, it was a real surprise to find out the real grounds of the discussion and the shrewdness behind it. However, the events to come were bound to give an advantage to Cezar thanks to his extraordinary ability to creep "on a knife's edge" when it came to dramatic and tense conditions where highly important state decisions were required.

Chapter 4 — The Second Confrontation: The Essential Information

A few months after my last meeting with Cezar, when he revealed to me the astonishing truths he found from the venerable Massini, I was contacted again in order to meet him. It was the beginning of June 2003 and it proved to be an extremely important moment for me to get a deeper understanding of what I already knew about the Masonic world.

Cezar's explanations clarified aspects that were still confusing to me since the first discussion with Massini. I needed this instruction to get a precise overall view of certain mechanisms and subtle laws that go beyond common knowledge and understanding and also of the connections between the Masonic manipulations and the illusion in which most human beings are living.

Another fundamental aspect of that meeting was the ultra secret information that Signore Massini revealed to Cezar as well as the starting point of the amazing discovery that was just about to take place in Bucegi shortly after the secret information was released. The events started to unfold swiftly, and I was left to be the awed spectator of mysteries that were revealing themselves and extended "beyond time."

A few months after their last discussion, Signore Massini kept his promise and invited Cezar to see him again, only this time the meeting took place in a luxury villa in Bucharest. This was the diplomatic center at the highest level of one of the most powerful countries in the world. The invitation and all the preparations had been made by Signore Massini through the highest diplomatic connections in the state, almost as the first time. The difference this time was that it was not General Obadea who let Cezar know about the invitation but one of the state secretaries who was following the orders of one of the Ministers of State.

This meeting was much shorter than the last one, consisting mainly of a relatively strange proposal that Signore Massini made to Cezar. He offered him some extremely confidential information in exchange for his promise to assure the access of certain Masons to the discovery that will occur from that confidential information. Gradually, Massini's hidden intentions were unveiled.

Cezar perceived that the reason for his first meeting with Signore Massini was just to prepare him to accept the offer that was now presented to him. In that respect, it was quite probable that all of Massini's tempting promises were nothing else but dust in the wind and had the sole purpose to gain his trust in order to make possible Masonic control over what could prove to be a great state secret in Romania. The events to come would only prove Cezar's suspicions to be correct.

The second meeting with Signore Massini took place in May 2003 when Cezar was told the confidential information by the venerable Mason. Because of his rank in Department Zero and the fact that this department was the only one that was prepared and authorized to intervene in those "special" situations, Cezar understood quickly the main reason for which Signore Massini needed him. As he himself stated, the top representatives of the Masons at a global level had great decision making power in any government on the planet, but their influence still cannot go beyond certain limits. They could, for example, "make up" and start wars between countries and people, but they couldn't interfere in certain decisions that concerned the internal structure or the operational function of the security and defense mechanisms of a country. In other words, they could easily ensure that there is a general state of conflict on one continent or another, but they couldn't force a military action in a certain country unless there was a major reason behind it such as interethnic fights or conquering new territories.

The extremely important information that Massini told Cezar entered into another category altogether. That information referred to a certain location in Bucegi but it was incomplete. As Cezar found out from the venerable one, there was something that could not be identified, not even with the latest technology and this was the big question mark in the matter. Cezar realized that Massini had some more information that he kept for himself. Though he did not know why, he understood that this information was vital for the Masonic leaders as they had used all their power and influence to gain access to it.

It was obvious that they could not even think of a foreign military action in Romania no matter what reason was behind it. Even if they would have used the territorial conflict from Transylvania, this would have taken a long time and would have meant war, destruction and above all, a great European diplomatic scandal. Clearly, the Masons did not want that to happen. The conclusion is that they were interested in excluding a forceful intervention and, more importantly, excluding certain people from finding out that information.

Among other things, this explained Signore Massini's insistence on the two meetings between them being "top-secret" as well as the Bilderberg leader's decision to contact only Cezar in this matter. The rationale behind this was simple: it was necessary to find the right person in a very high and powerful decision making and intervention position. This person was supposed to be tempted with great promises, gaining trust in this way; and in the end, accepting collaboration with the Masons and to permit them to exercise their power and control at this level. Cezar was thought to be the ideal choice for this plan, but the co-opt action had to take place swiftly so as not to give Cezar too much time for reflection and to avoid any unpredictable reactions from his part. Most likely, the mission was considered to be vitally important for the global Masons and it was absolutely necessary for it to succeed. That was just the reason why they sent a top representative of the Bilderberg group, an expert in co-opt psychology, who also had certain powers of long distance influence.

From the information Cezar had, he realized that the Masons were trying, in the shortest time possible, to obtain control over a secret location in Bucegi, excluding any forum of popularity and even trying to gradually conceal the mere existence of that place from the powers in Bucharest.

These kinds of situations were on a razor's edge. When it came to state secrets, any information leak could endanger the whole action because there were rival political factions that were not completely controlled by the Masons. This operation was therefore going to be especially delicate. They had to masterly combine influence, discretion and exercise control of the activity. This case was extremely difficult, even for the Mason's masters. This was especially due to the limited access they had in the research that was taking place in Bucegi and in the coordination of these actions. This was the general overall situation that Cezar described to me early on in our conversation.

In the past months, I reflected over the multitude of aspects and implications derived from the first meeting between Cezar and Signore Massini. The horror that set upon me explained, in a certain way, my incapacity of understanding all the nuances of the elements I found out then. While waiting for another meeting with Cezar and not having anyone else to get more information from, I resigned myself to only doing some discrete research of my own and to mentally organize some general reference points that were raising fundamental problems.

My next meeting with Cezar was going to be a meeting full of meanings and valuable explanations, topped up by the revelation of Signore's Massini secret. Opposite to what he used to do, the technical director of Department Zero asked me to see him just two weeks after his meeting with the venerable Massini.

Cezar confessed that he chose to do it this way because the events were proving to be extremely important, and if he was not focusing on the right unfolding of the future actions, it could get out of control and have unfortunate consequences. Cezar was not sure if he was going to have any spare time or the opportunity to see me in the near future in order to reveal to me the secret. That is why he chose to meet me sooner: to make sure I had all the information I needed to publish a credible book.

The next months were going to be extremely tense and utterly amazing because of the discovery that was about to take place in Bucegi. My meeting with Cezar, which preceded the great event in August 2003, was the “calm before the storm” as “storm clouds” started to raise their ugly heads on the horizon.

INITIATORY EXPLANATIONS

Happy to have the opportunity to fill in some gaps in my understanding regarding certain aspects of the first meeting between Cezar and Signore Massini, I asked why the Masons and those that were joining them were most of the time completely aware that they were choosing everything related to it. I knew that in these times humanity has a tendency towards moral, ethical and spiritual decay, but I was also convinced that the good was able to defeat this dreaming state that was trying to take over.

Very serious, Cezar then explained that the fundamental element in anyone's destiny is free will.

"Structured as it is, the human being contains good as well as evil. That's why we can say that a human's superior nature coexists with his inferior nature. Important it is which one of those aspects is awakened and amplified inside us.

"You will probably ask me now what good or evil represents. I don't want to lose ourselves in philosophical commentaries and observations, but I will tell you basically that the good can be understood as the absence of evil. Obviously, following the same logic, the evil is the absence of good.

"I believe it isn't news for you that Christianity associates these two aspects with heaven and hell. But beyond the subtle planes of manifestation to which heaven and hell – or generally speaking, good and evil – are linked to, these two opposites can be found much nuanced in the every day life of any human being. That's why some people, in their misery and not by accident, get to call their lives a living hell while others, being very happy, relate to their lives as paradise. If one chooses to do evil, one will no doubt go towards hell and then, in a certain way, inferno manifests itself through one. The radiance and influence of a person like that will then be evil and that will keep him away from good and happiness.

"The ones that choose evil don't really understand that the meaning of their life is to improve themselves so they fiercely fight against good, harmony, love and beauty. It is good to know, however, that the human being is completely free to choose between the two extremes: good and evil. No one is forced or obliged. It's purely one's choice. Here, of course, personal destiny and certain very profound subconscious tendencies have a great influence; but even when the force and determination of these impulses seems to be invincible, there is still a certain percent left for free will. This never completely disappears. If it would happen so, the human being would be just a puppet in the hands of some obscure exterior forces. This is why, even in the most dramatic situations, humans are free to choose. They then have the opportunity to choose good and get an unthought for chance. From here, step by step, they can redo their lives starting from a totally different premise.

“Also, as true as that is, any choice of good involves sacrifice. Have you ever heard of anyone sacrificing himself to do evil? Evil is always easy to be done and is based on inertia, slowness and ignorance because it doesn’t imply any effort. That is why it is said it is very easy to do harm but it is very difficult to do good. The main idea that I want you to understand is that when a human being “sacrifices” his ineptitude and acts in a harmonious way, he tends towards another state and life style. He evolves because he sacrifices himself, meaning that he gives up what is inferior to gain access to what is superior. Still, many people don’t have that inner force that is needed in order to give up on their harmful habits and that’s why, at a global level, there is an increasing tendency of regress with amplified evil and perversity.”

“This means,” I interjected, “that the Masonic elite use exactly this inertia, laziness and mental obscurity that characterizes most people in order to control the world population!”

“It is perfectly true. The Masons easily manipulate this energy manifested at most human beings on very low vibratory levels through lack of reaction, slowness, inertia and obscurity. In these situations, the Masons practically generate an almost real state of collective “sleepiness” that serves its interests in the best way. It is very important for you to correctly understand this aspect of the way the Masons act.

“Mostly, these actions – which in certain very high Masonic circles involve black magic rituals – are taken from a distance; and those who are receptive to these kinds of energies – that tend to be oppressive and to chain you – are easily becoming victims, falling into strange sleep. I’m not only referring here to the physical phenomena of sleep but also to a certain state that people are taken over by where they become very submissive and act as puppets do. These are the ideal terms on which they can be controlled and led without providing any resistance.

This is one of the main Masonic purposes: striving to make it occur at the entire planetary level. From another perspective, you must be aware that this “sleep” that human beings go through is a manner of protection for the evil forces which use it in order to defend themselves from revealing certain spiritual truths. If you carefully observe the way people react when they are confronted with very elevated, spiritual and valuable aspects about their life and evolution, you will surprisingly notice that most of them experience a strange sleepiness. Obviously, this kind of inertial state excludes any superior understanding, constructive attitude or reaction.”

“As you have stated until now,” I said, “I see that the Masonic organization owns all the meaningful action in a society, and they use it to divide and efficiently control nations. I would say that they vehemently attack anything that is spiritual, authentic, or sublime, thus pursuing the transformation of humanity into some sort of a living mechanism that they can operate and rule according to their own will.”

I was depressed. A helpless rage was devastating my being and I couldn’t find the antidote for it. Perceiving my inner state, Cezar spoke with great kindness.

“You are right in what you said. Unfortunately, people become like ‘robots,’ listening only to the orders that are given and obeying them precisely. You must realize that the power of good is immense and that any action in this respect can prove to be extremely efficient. There’s always hope. You only have to know how to feed it with great faith and purity. This will sharpen your attention and it will help you to act in the adequate way. Be aware that even the Masons have their own weaknesses.”

“I was just about to ask you,” I replied. “In the past months I tried to document this subject, and I surprisingly noticed that there are disagreements between the Masonic lodges throughout the world. If this is true, this means that they themselves are divided and powerless.”

Cezar smiled sympathetically and made it clear for me.

“One of the greatest farces of the Masonic elite is leaving the impression that two or more Masonic lodges are fighting against each other. The reality is that, on top of their pyramidal structure, the great Masonic masters are getting together very well. At the base of the structure, however, they appear to be enemies. The idea is to create confusion and to mislead because it is well known that these tactics can fool the common people's vigilance. In fact, it is just an evil force. The one who falls for it, because he wasn't warned, will not choose one of the lodges, thinking it is not the right one. Instead, he will choose another one, the one he believes is the good one. It is like that only in appearances because, in reality, the Masons are and keep on being the same, no matter the tricks they use to fool the common human beings."

"You have to have faith and to persevere in your beneficial actions. Eventually, even the evil forces are subordinated by the good ones. It is a great universal mystery the way evil forces play their occult role in respect to evolution; specifically, the way in which evil comes into place in creation's economy."

I was amazed and silent. Like most people, I knew that white is white and black is black. Now I was being told that, in fact, there is a meaning and a correlation even between these extremes.

"What do you mean? That even evil has a purpose in our life?" I asked.

"A very important one. To correctly understand this aspect, you have to have an open and prejudice free mind. Fanaticism, especially the religious or ideological type, doesn't go along with spiritual evolution."

I silently agreed. I was all eyes and ears, prepared to listen to all of the valuable information that Cezar was offering.

"The fact that we have both good and evil in the universe, as you can see for yourself, is an eloquent enough proof that attests to the existence of freedom of choice, a way to individually exercise free will. In other words, acting out of ignorance, the human being chooses to self-destruct, denying himself in this way. This is why, with a more thorough analysis, choosing evil means choosing to fight against yourself which, in the end, leads to self-destruction. This deepens the mysterious way good and evil relate because it involves the fact that evil forces have a hidden purpose in the universe as well as in the life of every human being."

“I don’t know to what extent you are familiar with the ideas about the meaning of existence and spiritual progress, but I will let you know that human evolution primarily means the return to the primordial, purely spiritual source from where one came.

“Imagine for now that this origin is itself the eternal reality of a sublime happiness that every human being wishes for. This return of the being to spiritual origins must be fully conscious and free of any inferior temptation, of anything that could mean illusion, constraint, and prejudice. If you correctly understand this aspect, you can say you understand why evil is needed in creation.”

I was a little confused because I was not getting to the essence of the problem yet. Cezar continued to explain very patiently.

“If evil didn’t exist, you couldn’t realize the necessity of your return to the source; and you would endlessly wander through who knows what corners of the universe. This way though, evil’s role in the creation of the universe has the main purpose of testing human beings. This is how the level of knowledge, spiritual evolution and capacity to love of every individual is tested. In connection with the choices one makes, it can be determined if one passed that life test or not.”

“Similar to the exams in university,” I observed.

“Exactly. The same as those or the ones in the professional field. The only difference is that while these first ones are illusory and ephemeral – being part of a limited space-time domain – life’s tests or exams have spiritual meanings and represent steps of great importance in our personal evolution. Successfully passing one of these kinds of tests can mean an important victory in the struggle of dominating the inferior nature of human beings; and this victory can materialize in an increased capacity of understanding certain subtle aspects of life, resulting in a gradual awakening of spiritual maturity and discernment or in a multitude of other beneficial and positive aspects.”

Cezar took a short break to leave me some time for thinking and reflecting. I wanted to make sure I understood.

“What is precisely tested and how can we recognize these tests?” I asked, paying great attention to the new direction this conversation was taking.

“Most of life’s exams test your faith and judgment. But often, because of their ignorance, people take these tests as great misfortunes, as a terrible thing or harm done to them that makes them stagger on their feet. In these cases, the evil manifests itself mainly for the testing and purification of the human beings. During their evolution, no one can escape from life’s different kind of tests, lessons and exams. Practically speaking, these tests are our own confrontation with the forces of evil that are part of creation’s demonic and satanically subtle plans. This is valid for individuals as well as for a couple, a community or even a nation.”

“But,” I said, “we are often helped by others when we face difficult times or when we ask for their advice in a very complicated life problem. Who is then passing the test: us or the ones who help us?”

“You must be aware that to help doesn’t mean to force. Someone can be advised and guided in the right direction, but that someone still has his own free will. Nevertheless, exercising your free will and having the possibility to choose implies that the human being is aware and responsible of their freedom. A human being can be helped, supported, prodded, but beyond all this lies the freedom of choice between the options available. If that person would be forced to follow a certain path, even if profoundly beneficial, then his/her freedom is actually cancelled. This is why it is very important for the human being to be given the right to choose, but that choice will be influenced by the degree of consciousness and discernment that is possessed by that being.

“You now know enough about the Masons involvement at a global level, and you are aware of the terrible battle between good and evil on this planet. In spite of all this, you are free at any moment to choose on whose side you want to be. If, thanks to your inner structure and as is obvious already, you choose good, then you will continue to act in this direction and you will persevere in your fight against the Masonic plans. The same applies to all other people; only most of them don’t even know the truth about what the Masonic plan is in reality.

“More than that, the way evil forces act is so perverted that it infiltrates anywhere it finds a ‘fertile’ place, anywhere a weak or contaminated enough conscience appears. Such a weakness and contamination manifests when someone comes out loudly with the theory that we are surrounded only by attacks, conspiracies, manipulation and backstage plays when, in fact, none of these exist and everything is fine and going according to the natural laws. The reality is that behavior like that is typical for a person who is tortured by multiple demonic influences which force them to play by their rules. If that specific person belongs to an intellectual elite or if he is a scientist, writer or columnist, then all the better for the Masonic plans. The unfortunate opinion of a person of this kind – that can be said to have a certain intellectual authority – can greatly influence the conceptions of all those other people.

“You probably know, however, that one of Satan’s greatest farces is to convince human beings that there is no devil, that Satan himself doesn’t exist. This is about the same way that Masonic organizations function, leaving the impression that they do and wish only good. Everything is, in the end, just a mask because, in reality, they are more or less out in the open as being against good, religion, faith and spirituality.”

“I don’t understand how it is possible for human beings to live in this huge conspiracy and not to be aware of its existence!” I exclaimed.

“Why are you surprised? Even you, until not long ago, used to live without even knowing about the Masons and their terrible plans. You probably saw that a lot of things are not right, but you didn’t approach the matter in a more mature way. Now, you know the truth and your nature that is very good makes you want to stand up and share this information with others. You already have the extraordinary chance to do it, publishing what I have thus far told you.

“The first step to be taken is to get the public’s attention over the surrounding reality. It is like when you toll the bells on a Sunday in a city that is asleep. People will start to gradually wake up and then ask for more details. But even more important than that is them paying increased attention to what is happening around them and even around the world because they then already have strong resources of information. Their vigilance is a first and very hard blow for the Masons because a vigilant being is much more difficult to deceive, manipulate or control. Afterwards, an entire current of the same opinion will form. In this way, most of the Masons' plans and initiatives will be destroyed even before they start."

Cezar stopped and looked at me keenly to see if I understood.

"People's reactions seem to be very weak," I said, "and I even wonder how we are going to accomplish what we have planned."

"Most prophecies say that, in the end, the good forces will prevail. On the other side, the fight is extremely difficult. The Masons, as a horrible hydra, are the ones that conduct all these demonic orientations that bear on all people on this planet.

"In Romania, for example, especially lately, the Masons act as they please. The poor people are kept ignorant and manipulated. They do not even suspect the reason for the tragedy that they are living. If this hydra was defeated, then we could witness a very fast regeneration of the entire planet.

"Unfortunately, the huge majority of people from the West are not paying any attention to the Masons' ways of manipulation – some of it really obvious. Listless and selfish, most of them rather isolate themselves in a strange urban "hibernation," mistakenly thinking that they rule their own lives. Even if they find out about the Masons devilish actions, they choose to deny it or to rely on others taking measures in their place. More than that, they ignorantly participate in certain demonic orientations that are continuously fed and supported by the Masons through unleashed rock music, drugs, alcohol, tobacco and through a materialistic outlook. In these conditions of gradual but certain degradation of the human being, who in this way loses their own will and determination, it is easy enough for the Masons to fulfil their plans."

Cezar suddenly went quiet. It was quite a long break in which both of us remained with our hidden inner thoughts. Eventually, he started speaking again but I could feel a slight tinge of sadness in his voice.

"Unfortunately, the situation is the same in our country. People are 'sleeping.' They are not awake, lucid. Even though some fundamental elements about the Masons and their world plans have been published, people's dramatic 'sleepiness' and inertia – which is also correlated with the 'sleep of reason' – has been so much amplified that there are very few who at least believe what is said about the Masons to be true. This, in fact, is the terrible reality.

"Everything seems so awful and unbelievable to them that, acting under a subconscious impulse of fear and self preservation, they would rather believe that maybe the situation is not as worse as it seems. Maybe this kind of information only denigrates actions of some staggering forces mastered by who knows what reasons. Therefore, they rather lock themselves in their own shell and continue to remain in the state of ineptitude that embraces them. "This state is even worse then when they hadn't any clue about the Masons' demonic plans because to know and still not to react is a great cowardice and a big deviation from the most elementary moral code. In a situation like that, it is not the one who doesn't know but the own who knows and doesn't act accordingly who is the fool. This is why the first and most important stage is the awakening of the people's conscience from this awful sleepiness. If they don't become lucid, they will never understand why their life standards are so low or why so many unusual things take place every day. This also happens because, in most times, the essence of the Masons' actions is well hidden in occult symbols."

This was one of the "weak points" I wanted to clarify with Cezar because I've already made some connections of my own, but I still needed some further explanations. I took advantage of this opportunity and I asked: "Do they use certain symbols in their rituals in order to influence the results of their demonic plans?"

"There are indeed some Masonic symbols that are very well known such as the compass and trowel. Others, however, are much more occult. For example, the pyramid with its 'all seeing eye' at its top is not accidentally on the one dollar bill.

"Next to symbols, the Masons' mottos are very important for the followers of the Masonic lodges, but these are less well known by everyone. For example, on the same one dollar bill is the Latin motto E Pluribus Unum which in a rough translation means through chaos, to order which can suggest to you many more connections.

“If you coherently analyze the way things are going now in the world and also in Romania from the social, economical and political perspective, you will easily realize how this chaos is structured to gradually ensure the setting up of the New World Order that is not called The New Masonic Order – just so the ignorant ones don’t know who are its actual creators – but only The New Order.

“Another principle strictly carried out by Masons, especially within the lodges and their ‘brotherhood,’ is the imperative ‘All for one and one for all.’ It may seem strange, but you must know that their obedience confers upon them a state of unity as well as a considerable force and tenacity. From this point of view, I must confess that if the people of Romania or any other part of the world would demonstrate the same tenacity, the same force of action and the same systematic connection as the Masons – but of course directed profoundly beneficial and positive – then the present situation of Mankind, or at least a part of it, would be completely different.

“But...and this next aspect is also very important...while the ordinary human being always has the possibility to choose, there are profound demonic forces behind the Masons that imprint in the members of their organization a certain state of terror, an attitude of subordination like in the army. This makes the ones who act in these Masonic groups or lodges to be almost inexorable in their decisions. A Masonic order is not to be discussed because, in the initiatory moment, when they are accepted into the organization, they are sworn to a terrible oath and they go through a perverse ritual in which they oblige themselves to total surrender and obedience, accepting to be killed if they act otherwise.”

“This means that, beyond their actions in the physical plane, the Masons also apply certain occult methods and rituals that are deeply malevolent.” I ascertained.

“These are part and parcel of their practical and ideological system but only from a certain level upwards. So you can understand better, the malevolent rituals and invocations are realized only by those members that reach a certain very high rank or position in the lodge they belong to.

“Usually, the information that is released about the Masons does not contain the subtle or paranormal impact that the huge sphere of influence of this malevolent group has upon those who join it. That's exactly why, for the common people that find out only certain truths about it, the Masons are nothing else than a group often resembling a gang of crooks. Still, joining the Masons has strong occult negative effects that put one in resonance with the distinctive features of the group. In fact, the merging of all these energies as a result of one's adherence to a Masonic group will create such profound negative changes in a person's aura that comparing it to his previous state will force him to admit the malevolent nature of Masonry's orientation."

"How do you then explain their amazing power in contemporary life's basic fields like economy and politics?" I asked.

"Truly, the Masons are now one of the most powerful groups. I could even say that it is the only occult group with political purposes. All these other groups or occult organizations usually have spiritual purposes. They don't strive to make political statements because, in their view, these things are ephemeral. However, where the Masons are concerned, the situation is different.

"They insist greatly on this political involvement in order to make those who join them drop at this level in connection with the influence and power they have upon a large number of people. This demonic action leads to so called 'soul breaking' for those who enter their groups. "Anyway, it is natural for the Masons to act in this way because the occult initiations they offer do not pursue any development or sensibility in the soul of the one joining. If the soul of that specific person would awaken, he could not then be manipulated and made to realize numerous actions that are obviously malevolent and demonic any more.

"From this point of view, feelings like kindness, affection and compassion are completely unknown to a Mason because, with these feelings, he could not obey all orders. Through the occult initiation ritual, the one that enters the organization is 'deprived' of all these feelings because he then does a sort of a pact with demonic forces. Unfortunately, in most of the cases, the being is not even aware of this terrible setback that is taking place.

"When the Masonic elite promote a member of a lodge to a very high and important position within the organization, it has certain subtle criteria that ‘say’ if that person has changed enough in the demonic direction.

“I myself later found out for myself — after my first meeting with Signore Massini — most of these truths about the Masons. It is almost unbelievable how much human misery can be at the top of the hierarchical pyramid. But, everything is gilded and made to look shiny and noble through their extraordinary wealth, connections, influence, and control all over the world.

“Regarding the fact that they are experts in testing those who come to them or those they promote into very high positions in their organization, I was naive to believe I had managed to deceive Massini, making him think I had accepted his proposal of adhesion and co-operation without any further inquiries.

The old man was very canny. Even the amazing information he let me know regarding their methods and actions were part of the test or, better said, ‘trap’ they were preparing for me. Most probably, he already knew — well before meeting me — that I will never accept his proposal. Indeed, I wasn’t anywhere near their soul rotted standards, and I already had a strong enough spiritual force and discernment to realize the awful truth about them without being tempted by their offerings. Nevertheless, as you will be able to see, the card they were playing with me was far more important and they had to take the risk, but they did it in a very complex way.

“Masons are no fools. On the contrary, they possess a great intelligence, but it has a perverse and even demonic nature because they use it in fulfilling their malevolent plans. More than that, at the top levels of their hierarchy, they often use nature’s occult energies but only those ones that are evil or very low and inferior. Not accidentally, the Masons are – as I already told you – the only occult group with political interests.

“So they are no fools; but in certain extreme situations, they can pretend to be so if it suits them in pursuing their purpose. This was the case in my two meetings with Signore Massini.

“It is very probable that the venerable one, even before seeing me, mentally projected all the talking that took place – and I am now referring to our first meeting. In fact, it was his talking, more of a monologue, which supports my theory. He knew exactly what to tell me, how to behave, how to propose for my cooperation and how to tempt me in order to accept. But above all, he knew how to make me believe I had deceived him, letting him think I agreed. So, he knew I was lying only I wasn't aware of that. After a few weeks, I was puzzled to find out the truth through some secret information and espionage channels of the Romanian Intelligence Services. It seems that Massini egotistically bragged about his meeting with me to certain highly positioned political personalities from the European hierarchy; and this way, it dawned on me the real reasons behind our first encounter.

"The situation still remained very complicated. If he knew I was lying to him and pretending to be on their side, why did he keep playing that masquerade, even telling me he was going to visit me for a second time in order to let me know something terribly important? The role he played at the first meeting had been brilliantly performed. Telling me all those staggering truths about the Masons, he practically forced me to use the 'lie strategy' that he was expecting. It was necessary for me to be convinced that he bought the lie of me approving his plans. However, what was his very complex and occult plan? What were the Masons so fiercely pursuing that they were ready to gamble on a false attitude from my part? This meant that their goal was really important and that they wouldn't have spared any effort to achieve it.

"One of the first conclusions I drew was that, in a way, I was the main pawn in this very mysterious issue that I knew nothing about. It was obvious that if they continued to ask for my help, they couldn't rely on anyone else except me in the matter they were concerned about. But, what was that matter?

"Due to the nature of the activity I had implemented for so long in Department Zero, I suspected that their interest was related to the exceptional and paranormal which was interfacing only with the department's operational teams of intervention, teams that I myself lead. Logically speaking, that implied that they wanted to gain access to a state secret that even I wasn't aware of, but to which they knew I was the only way because of my special place in the department.

"These were the only conclusions that could be related to the venerable Massini's attitude. It was clear that, in order to achieve his goal, he was this time willing to go all the way, to risk everything. But what was it that caused the world's greatest Masons to turn their focus towards Romania with such great interest?

"I already knew about some very occult prophecies made at the end of the last century by two great Christian saints. They are about the future of Romania in the context of the entire world's future. I also found out about the strictly secret existence of a very valuable scroll from the great library of the Vatican that 'speaks' about the same matter regarding Romania's territory, an inconceivable situation for the mentality and ego of the world powers. In the secret archives of the history museum of Vienna there is also a very old document that describes the remote future of the fabulous historical civilization that inhabited Romania's territory in those times. So, all of these are different sources, two of them very old, that refer to, more or less, the same issue. Therefore, it is hard to believe we are dealing with a hoax. Besides, there are many more aspects that connect.

"For example, the prophecies say that it is only a matter of a few years until the unleashing of the signs that will draw attention upon this territory. You must also be aware that the Masons pay very great attention to Romania because they have known for a long time that their biggest problem is here. They know very well the prophecies regarding Romania's near future and that most problems will occur in this area. This is why they are very interested in what happens with and in our country. In this way, their behind the scenes actions can be explained in Romania's economics and politics, to ensure their control and to create all sorts of strange groups that they support and often finance with huge amounts of money. Into these organizations they have lured and are still luring naive people, weak in character, wishing for easy money, that are willing to sell their souls to get themselves a place in that so-called high society among the rich people.

"The main purpose of these mini-organizations is to obstruct any attempt of spiritual development or social and economic normality of the people, creating at the same time the false impression that their activities are focused especially on solving these issues. For these reasons, when I found out the astuteness of the plan conceived by those from the Bilderberg group elite, I correlated all of these aspects because the situation seemed obvious. Additionally, I also knew a few secret elements regarding the future of this nation that I found out from Father Arsenie Boca more than fifteen years ago. One who has a minimum of common sense, a lucid judgment and a certain intuition finds it practically impossible not to notice the often amazing and complex way most prophecies come true.

“Based on what I already knew and seeing the persistence of Massini’s actions in this case, I intuited that the situation was extremely important for the Masons as well as for the entire country. However, I didn’t have much choice except to wait for my next meeting with the venerable one in order to understand what the Masons wanted from me. Practically, it didn’t matter at all if I was lying to them or not because they wouldn’t have kept their extravagant promises anyway. For them, it was really important that I would give them access to something that, at that moment, I didn’t even know anything about. Yet, it seemed that the issue was very delicate if they couldn’t afford to intervene with much more highly-positioned people with greater decision making power, like politicians and influential people within the state’s power. If they were requiring discretion and secrecy, even from those with whom they were plotting most of their intrigues and plans, this meant that the situation was extreme and receiving maximum security. I must say, I was much intrigued upon this particular aspect, but at that point I didn’t know anything else.

“Although I was supporting my theory only on logical deductions, intuition and the secure information I received, the second meeting would come to confirm my suspicions. The state’s political power had been eluded.”

“I was actually asking myself why the venerable one didn’t choose to intervene in this matter through very high diplomatic channels,” I said. “I understood that the Masonic elite wanted to avoid publicity regarding their plans; but on the other side, a direct order, coming from very high above, would have spared all the complications of meeting Signore Massini. In your case, they couldn’t even be sure what the final result is going to be; while in the eventuality of a direct government intervention, they could have had access to what they wanted very easy and fast.”

“Your observations are correct, but don’t forget that even they have certain limits of political influence, different from country to country. They probably considered this way as uncertain in Romania’s case although, obviously, it would have been much easier. If they would have chosen this option, they would have had access but no control over what they were interested in and Signore Massini, during our second meeting, was very precise about the terms of our cooperation. He told me that they are going to have there their own people, with whom I had to work closely, following the rules set by the Masonic elite. If they would have had involved politicians in this, things couldn't have been the same because of people's vanities or of unpredictable reactions of the state power. Therefore, it was quite clear for me that, in this respect, they didn't want to risk anything. From this, I drew my conclusion that what they were mainly interested in was total secrecy up to the highest level.

"That's why they chose the harder and more complicated option of contacting me, trying to convince me and then co-opting me amongst them. They used the diplomatic channels just to reach me very fast and in order to avoid any questions coming from other high ranked individuals.

"Anyway," I interrupted, "their influence and involvement in the country's politics is great enough for them to direct or even block any rumor or news they don't find convenient — if this is needed."

"Even more than that," continued Cezar, "they have all the interests to maintain this nation at an almost unbelievable level of poverty and ignorance. You know that venerable Massini himself said that. Nevertheless, their politics became quite obvious, especially lately. Actually, they almost stopped trying to hide this, appearances being maintained only through hypocrisy and lies which only shows the unlimited defiance and lack of respect for this nation. Their very unusual and shrewd politics serves mainly to economically suck dry the Romanian people and to bring them to that totally addicted state, imposing at the same time external help loans that create attachments and obligations. They do their best to maintain the people in this state and sadly, in most cases, they succeed.

"If the situation continues developing in the same way and an awakening of the responsible people does not occur, it is possible for these things to go on and even amplify in the next period of time. This is exactly why I was telling you that it is very important for people to find out the causes that determine this situation in the country as well as in the world. Then you can be sure that those who have a certain openness will be capable of ‘awakening’ the others. It’s like the avalanche effect.

When after reaching a certain critical point, approximately 5% of the country’s people, its development is almost exponentially the same as the snowball that is small at the beginning; and then, as it starts rolling, it accumulates more snow and becomes big very fast.

“In their lack of knowledge, many people involuntary act in consent with the Masons’ directions without ever suspecting that in this way they are just playing the Masons’ dirty games. These games, using interlopers, are very virulent and treacherous. The method of interlopers – that are then like cannon fodder – is very old and often used in the Masonic way of accomplishing their goals. Through this they can deny having any responsibility in case things don’t go as planned.

The intermediate source will be blamed.”

I breathed in deeply and straightened in my armchair. This information seemed almost unbelievable, but I couldn’t deny that there was an obvious truth within. I thought that, still, there must be a way to victory, even when the suffering is overwhelming. That’s why I keenly asked Cezar the following.

“Things are quite clear now, but I wonder what will be the best ways of neutralizing the Masons’ malevolent force and demonic plans?”

I could feel that Cezar was pleased with my attitude.

“It is a good start,” he told me smiling. “The most practical way, in the present context, is first to reveal the Masons’ evil actions to all the other people: either through face to face discussions or by publishing it, as I suggest you do, with everything I told you. This way, a common front of those who are not involved in the Masonic groups is created which will cause a lot of the Masons’ plans and actions to be exposed. It is obvious that their actions were and still are, very insidious, mainly oriented towards a blockage of any brilliant ideas, any extraordinary inventions, or of any discovery or progress that might improve the quality of people’s lives.

“They are the ones that give all the directions for counterpoising the inventions as well as to exasperate the inventor and to bring a total state of morass, stress and impotence. That's why many will rather leave the country and use their intellectual potential in other parts of the world. In a way, this is a paradoxical situation that I don't think you've met anywhere else in other countries. Though the Masons try, generally speaking, to promote non-values and to annihilate or even eliminate any special human being, I could say that in our country this plan is very close and too well applied. Furthermore, the political and economical situation proves that the Masons act exactly as I told you. They do their best to promote mostly 'scarecrows,' corrupt people and even to create a general state of corruption so as to ensure the success of their dirty games.

"Imagine that if stubborn people and people of good will were placed in key-positions, these people would refuse to participate in the Masons' intrigues, games and backstage miseries which, as you very well know, take over the politics and economy of the country nowadays. These good people wouldn't follow the Masons' directions anymore; and shortly, a great change would take place in everybody's life. The fact that things aren't going this way — despite different trials, changes, reshufflings or commitments taken and promises made — is enough to show you the truth about the Masonic influence which deliberately maintains a tense state in the country through lies and hypocrisy.

"The quicker the people become more lucid and aware of the Masons' plans, the sooner they will oppose its dirty games. Afterwards, a public exposure of their evil plans and intentions is needed. Exposure is a very useful tool in the fight against the Masons. Already, most of their actions are obvious for everyone. It is just that they are yet not connected with Masonry.

"Even if I give a single example, the one of the intelligence exodus from Romania, it will be enough to get some attention upon the way the Masons manipulate the people. There are many more that noticed this exodus that wrote, expressing their concern towards this phenomenon, but they still don't know the real cause, the real reason of these intellectual 'runaways' over the borders.

"Knowing nothing or almost nothing about the Masons, they explain this by the reason of poverty and the desire to get rich of those with great intellectual abilities that go to work abroad. Though, when a situation like that lasts for many years, it is necessary to analyze the problem from a different angle. The reality is that the Masons often lure people with exceptional intellectual capabilities into a tempting easy life, with no worries for tomorrow in Western institutes or research companies. In this way, hundreds and thousands of gifted ‘brains’ from Romania leave and the Masons manage to finally fulfill their evil plan of annihilating the spiritual awakening that needs to take place in this country, to which those very ‘smart’ that left would have had a considerable contribution.

“This spiritual awakening is very useful because it allows people to become aware of their life’s meaning in these harsh circumstances. It even gives people the strength to bear certain changes imminent to the period through which Romania is going now and to remain where they are in order to help the others to awaken as well. However, through the exodus of these special human beings, the spiritual awakening might be delayed. A gold alloy is more valuable depending upon the greater the quantity of noble metals, gold in this case. If this quantity is decreasing than so is the material’s value and even resistance is decreasing.”

“You are saying that, in the end, it is possible for the Masons to win?” I asked, slightly worried.

“I just said that the spiritual awakening of this nation might be delayed for a while, but it is without doubt that it will take place, even if the Masons’ fierce effort tries to nullify it. The spiritual transformation is imminent, even if some sceptical people resonate with the Masons’ negative ideas and express their doubt and even their belief that we will never win.

“This subversive politics, diabolically maintained by the Masons, is primarily to create an evil resonance with people’s lack of hope and lack of trust in the extraordinary and beneficial forces, making it possible for the whole nation to lose their entire hope. Yet, when a mass of people has a hope that is enthusiastically maintained and fed, thinking of it in a creative, positive way, this hope creates a gigantic current of spiritual force that greatly accelerates the fulfillment of that common aspiration. This is why I am telling you that if a profoundly beneficial and spiritual idea is embraced by the masses, it generates a huge energy wave that can be the key point of this nation's transformation. This aspect is valid for any other nation in the world.

“One of the most important beneficial ideas would be that people need to wake up from the ‘deep sleep’ imposed by the Masons and become lucid to firmly act from a totally different perspective, with a superior understanding of the general situation. From the opposing position, it is awful when a negative idea is embraced by the masses. The resonance principle is the same, but the nature of the energy that is then excessively amplified is profoundly destructive and harmful. It gives people a state of morass, lack of hope, lack of confidence; and what is worse, it is strongly contaminated, generating a state of indolence, laziness, and lack of positive engagement.

“In a situation like that, it is obvious that the Masons’ evil games can be easily played according to their will. This explains why they react extremely strongly and with maximum determination through mass-media channels whenever certain people or spiritual groups are revealing the horrible truth about their plans and their actions to the entire world . In these situations, the most senior Masons are trying to destroy, by any means, those people or organizations, taking advantage of common people’s naivete that can easily be manipulated.”

“Yes, I was also amazed by their slyness and treachery in manipulating people, especially after you told me about venerable Massini’s complex plan,” I commented. “It is stupendous what a demonic intelligence can come up with,” Cezar agreed; and because the time he had available was limited, he started telling me of the discussion he had with the venerable Mason.

PANIC AT THE PENTAGON

“My second meeting with Signore Massini balanced the situation in a certain way. Though he continued his game from the first time, I was now at least aware of the venerable one’s real intentions, only he didn’t know that. It was true that my small advantage didn’t change much, but it still allowed me to be a lot more vigilant. My actions had to be very clear so as not to alter the situation’s fragile balance.

“If, for example, I would have showed myself to be indignant and threatened to expose everything at the highest level of state, I would most probably have been immediately removed from my position. This would have made for unpredictable results with regard to Masonic purposes and even could have cost me my own life.

“Practically, you can say that I don’t even exist in this country. My only file is the one in General Obadea’s office. I don’t have any political connections, diplomatic relations, financial businesses or social obligations. It is a very special situation that has many advantages but it involves certain risks as well.

“The advantage is that I can have access to the most important data and state secrets that regard certain special discoveries or events that take place in the country. By ‘special discoveries,’ I mean those situations that belong to an unknown domain, at least from today’s science or common conception’s point of view.

“The disadvantage is that I don’t have any other support except General Obadea who is now approaching pension age. I don’t have any enemies either because the department is very well hidden and kept a secret, but it is still a ‘territory’ that can be claimed by Romanian Intelligence Services. Only then, it can mean problems.

“So, a scandal wasn’t the solution. I am interested in helping this country, not in missing the auspicious opportunities that I am offered. It is quite probable that it wouldn’t have been too difficult for Massini to get to my replacement – in spite of General Obadea’s opposition – but that would have meant more agitation, uncertainty, and would have been most unpleasant for the Masons, making for an indefinite delay of action. It seems that this last possibility bothered them the most.”

“Why were the Masons in such a hurry and for what?” I asked, obviously very interested in the matter.

“I will tell you immediately but please be aware that neither I, nor those from the Masons’ elite – at least from what I understand – know much about it.”

“As far as I understand it,” I said, “it seems that they accepted a compromise solution. They don’t like working with you though they tell you the opposite, but they’re not willing to complicate the situation and risk a genuine scandal by removing you from your position either.”

“Yes, it is clear that they could have brought their own man in my place by now. This would have completely and immediately solved their problem. But, in spite of the fact that they can cause my removal from my position, it seems that they still miss the power to replace me with whomever they want. They decided to use this compromise solution that they need to adjust as they go along.”

“Who is in charge now with the position changes in Department Zero?” I innocently asked. “If we know the diplomatic channels, it shouldn’t be too hard to discover the real backstage games and who’s playing it. Unfortunately, my positioning in the Government doesn’t give me access to this kind of information.”

The room filled with a heavy silence. Later, Cezar answered in a low voice.

“Let’s leave these things as they are. The fact that the venerable Massini’s influence didn’t guarantee solving the problem the way he wanted shows us that not all people are corrupt. This is a pleasing thought.

“Probably after our first confrontation, when he reported his results to the Bilderberg group, Massini proposed going on with the initial plan which, though it was quite risky for the Masons, still had the advantage of quick possibilities of action and of my being misled. However, I meanwhile found out about the venerable one’s games and I changed my initial plan.

“If, at the first meeting, I considered playing their game and apparently accepted their proposition to cooperate with them, I would discover at the second one, already knowing their treacherous intentions, what they were really interested in and then obstruct their access to it by revealing the matter at the top level of the state. This was exactly the risk that they exposed themselves to but which, as I told you, they put to one side.”

“As a way of putting it, the cards were dealt on both sides,” I said, very interested in what Cezar was telling me.

“You’re right,” he answered smiling. “When I was told, a month ago, that the venerable Massini was going to visit me again, I knew that this was the peak of it. These people never do something without a reason or a personal interest. This is why I expected Signore Massini to finally reveal to me the problem’s ‘hot spots.’ The fact that they again announced their visit told me that, at the top, their decision-making people had chosen to go on with the option that involved me directly after having already prepared their ‘territory’ at the first meeting. Also, the fact that the venerable Mason himself was this time the host in the luxury villa of a foreign diplomat — where the security systems were perfect — reinforced my conviction that what I was about to hear was very important.”

Quivering with anticipation, I begged Cezar to reveal me the secret. Slightly amused, he continued talking.

“The meeting didn’t last long, maybe a little less than an hour. Still, I must tell you that the information I got from Signore Massini left even me perplexed. I could once again see the immense power the Masons have in even the highest state organizations, infiltrating themselves deep and having access to information of an overwhelming importance for humankind and its safety. More than that, the Masons want to control and manipulate this ultra-secret information in order to fulfill their plan of control and domination of the entire planet as fast as possible.

“I met the venerable one at the villa; and after a few minutes of small polite talk, in which time I made sure to reconfirm my willingness to join in their elitist organization, Signore Massini got straight into the subject in accordance with his specific style. He then told me he had ultra-secret information that comes straight from the Pentagon and that the information refers to a certain place in Romania.

“He confessed that the Bilderberg group has representatives in the most important of the political, economical and defense organizations of the USA, including connections to the presidential chair. Beyond the influential position of the American president, there are still a few occult groups with great power due to the complex connections, interests and relations between them and certain top people, state leaders and bankers at an international level. Finally, even beyond these very powerful Masonic groups, there are three elite formations that supervise the unfolding of the scientific life and technology on the planet, the orientation of the world's economy, and the settlement of the political currents and trends in different areas in the world. Above all these is the Bilderberg group, and within it are three people that have supreme decision making power over the most important actions and ideas that are going to be carried into effect all over the planet.

"Here, I noticed a slight uncertainty in Signore Massini, like he was pondering whether to tell me something or not. I felt that it was an extremely important aspect that might have revealed to me the fundamental secret of the entire world's Masonry. After a short hesitation, venerable Massini gave up on his intention of revealing that aspect, continuing to talk about the ultra-secret data from the Pentagon. He then told me that anything that is discovered on the planet which has a certain importance is immediately brought to the attention of those from the world's elite. This was also the case of the secret discovery in Romania's territory.

"The Pentagon is simultaneously running several secret military and geodesic espionage programs into which it has invested huge amounts of money in a technology that clearly surpasses modern scientific knowledge. The source of these fabulous technological capabilities, approximately twenty years ahead of current technology, the Pentagon owns several geostationary satellites that have precise tasks of observation."

"In 2002, one of these satellites that is based upon bionic and wave form technology, spotted a particular structure that is located inside a mountainous area of Romania; more precisely, in a certain place in Bucegi. At first, it was believed to be a strange karstic formation. Signore Massini revealed that the specialists from the secret data analyzing department, however, later informed their superiors that there are three elements that raise big question marks concerning the registered data from that area in Bucegi.

"First of all, the empty space that was identified inside of the mountains had no connection with the exterior, but it starts from the inside of the mountainous formation at a certain distance from its slope. Secondly, it had the shape of a tunnel that, from the registered data, seemed to be very regular and suddenly turned towards the center of the mountain at a 26 degree angle. On top of that, the trajectory of the tunnel was perfectly level. In relation to the base of the mountain, used as reference point, the tunnel started at about one third of the distance but it continued in a perfectly horizontal plane. The third element, however, was the one that puzzled the Pentagon's staff the most. The satellite scanning of the mountain highlighted two major blockages of the structure inside the solid stone that limited its beginning and its end. The venerable one then showed me a photocopy of the computer made diagram of the weird structure from the inside of the mountain, a scheme that was checkered and covered in numbers and data. The blocked zones were marked with red and he explained that it simply rejected any kind of probing or analysis, like they were protecting something."

"We might be talking about some artificial energy blockages," I said in one breath, amazed by what I was hearing."

"It is the same conclusion they arrived at," said Cezar "after they eliminated all of the other possibilities one by one, including possible interferences, metals or other composites. But, this made them consider a much more delicate issue..."

"Probably who made the entire structure, isn't it?" I quickly queried.

"Yes, they were quite shaken by the data and immediately raised its security level to maximum. The first energy blockage, the one from the beginning of the tunnel, was plain and upright, like a wall obstructing the access to the tunnel's entrance. The second energy blockage, however, was immense, as a dome or semi-sphere situated at the opposite end of the tunnel, close to the mountain's center.

THE SCHEME OF THE ENIGMATIC STRUCTURE FOUND IN BUCEGI, ROMANIA

The venerable Massini told me that, obviously, there was something extremely important to which the tunnel was leading but which, at the same time, was also very well protected. I will also draw you the diagram I saw, but much simpler, so you can have a clearer image of what was found there.”

I was silent with amazement, watching Cezar drawing with precise moves the approximate diagram of the strange structure found in Bucegi.

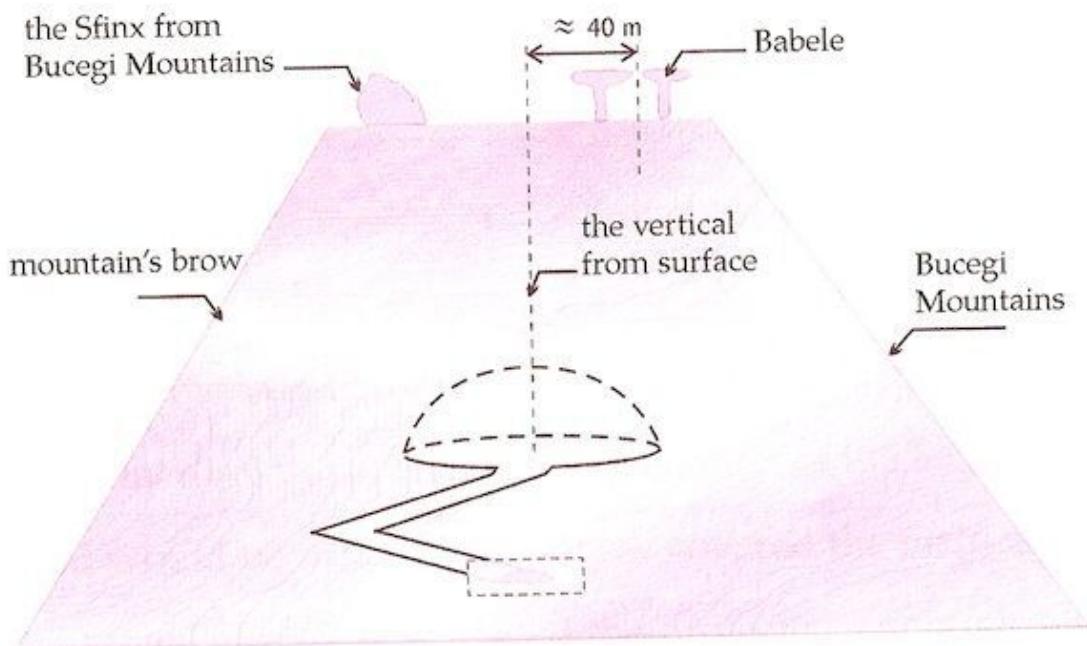

“The people from the Pentagon couldn’t understand why the tunnel turned in a sort of zigzag pattern towards the central zone of the mountain, nor the significance of the twenty-six degree angle of the construction. The structure was in a parallel plane with the ground and the semi-spherical energetic blockage was situated on the vertical corresponding to the ridge rocks called Babele. Actually, as our measurement based on the Pentagon data showed, the vertical was coming out at approximately forty meters from Babele, between it and the Bucegi’s Sphinx.”

On another piece of paper, Cezar then drew the design of the structure.

“Signore Massini led me to understand that the elements of the internal artificial structure from Bucegi would not have particularly attracted the Masonic elite’s interest had it not been for the fact that their representatives from the Pentagon had noticed that the semi-spherical blockage had exactly the same frequency and shape as one from another secret underground structure that they had discovered just a few months before, somewhere near Baghdad. Due to reasons I don't yet know, which the venerable Massini hasn't revealed to me, the Masonic elite was extremely interested in the secret data the military espionage satellite had registered in connection with the strange energetic structure from Iraq's underground.

THE CONNECTION BETWEEN THE BUCEGI'S SPHINX, BABELE AND THE INSIDE STRUCTURE

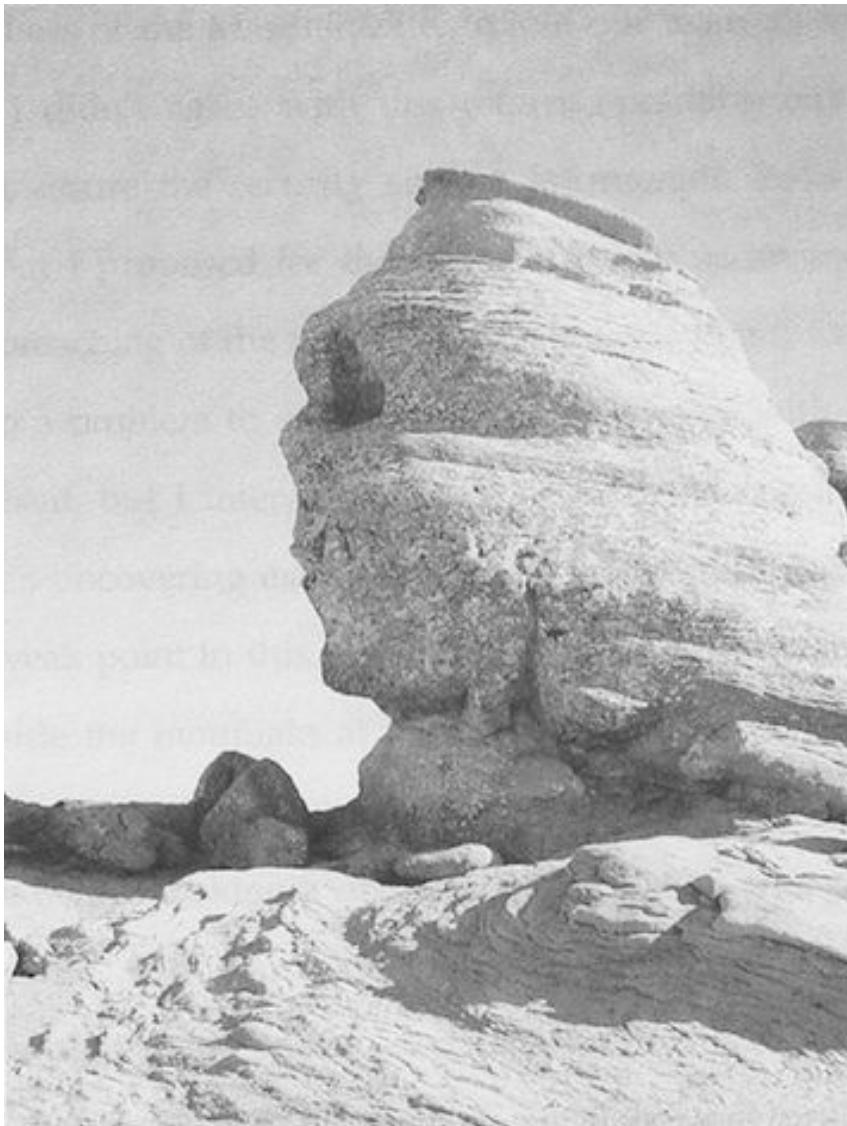

"Shortly after the discovery, the war started and the Americans, with total secrecy, had access to that area while the Iraqis didn't know a thing about it. Massini said that no matter how hard they tried, they couldn't penetrate the energetic wall but he didn't give me any more details. The whole operation was top secret. He stated that what was there was connected with our planet's mysterious past, but in a certain way, with the history of their organization as well. I intuited then that Signore Massini had some other information, documents or proofs regarding these aspects which he wasn't willing to share with me."

“The fact that the Pentagon investigation noticed similarities of data between the underground structure near Baghdad and the structure from inside the Bucegi Mountains stirred the Masonic elite greatly. As far as I could see, a big part of this agitation occurred because the structure, much bigger and more complex than the one in Iraq, was on Romania’s territory. This fact itself seems quite strange, but connecting it with certain aspects regarding Romania’s future which we’ve already talked about, you will be able to get a clearer picture of what the Masonic elite had to worry about. No matter how much they are trying to conceal it, their actions and intentions show the contrary. Their rush in solving the problem, the risk they’ve taken, and the express desire to have access to and control of the structure are just a few elements that reinforced my inner belief in this respect.

“Signore Massini gave me all of the secret reference data of the location in Bucegi, including the easiest and fastest way towards the tunnel. It was a great mystery with regard to who managed to build it so as to create the structure and the voids straight in the middle of the mountain without any connection with the outside. We both assumed that it was made as a maximum security measure in order to protect the structure against any eventual disclosure. The only explanation of the technology they used would be that they somehow covered the main entrance of the tunnel after they activated the protective energetic blockage. This, however, would have involved an immense amount of stone, not to mention the equipment needed for a job like that.

“Signore Massini gave me a map to get to the tunnel as calculated by the Pentagon’s specialists. The closest access could be made through the front of the mountain in a most advantageous direction. The starting point was situated on the mountain’s slope, somewhere around 60-70 meters from the first energetic blockage found inside. Although this was the fastest way, there was an inconvenience: they didn’t know if the energetic blockage at the tunnel’s opening could be breached. Even if it didn’t have the same frequency as the big semi-spherical one, we still couldn’t be sure if we would be able to get beyond it or not. Going around it was possible but this would have caused more difficult technological problems. The second option was going through the rock; but this time tilted, somehow above the tunnel, in order to get behind the blockage.

THE SPHINX – BUCEGI MOUNTAINS

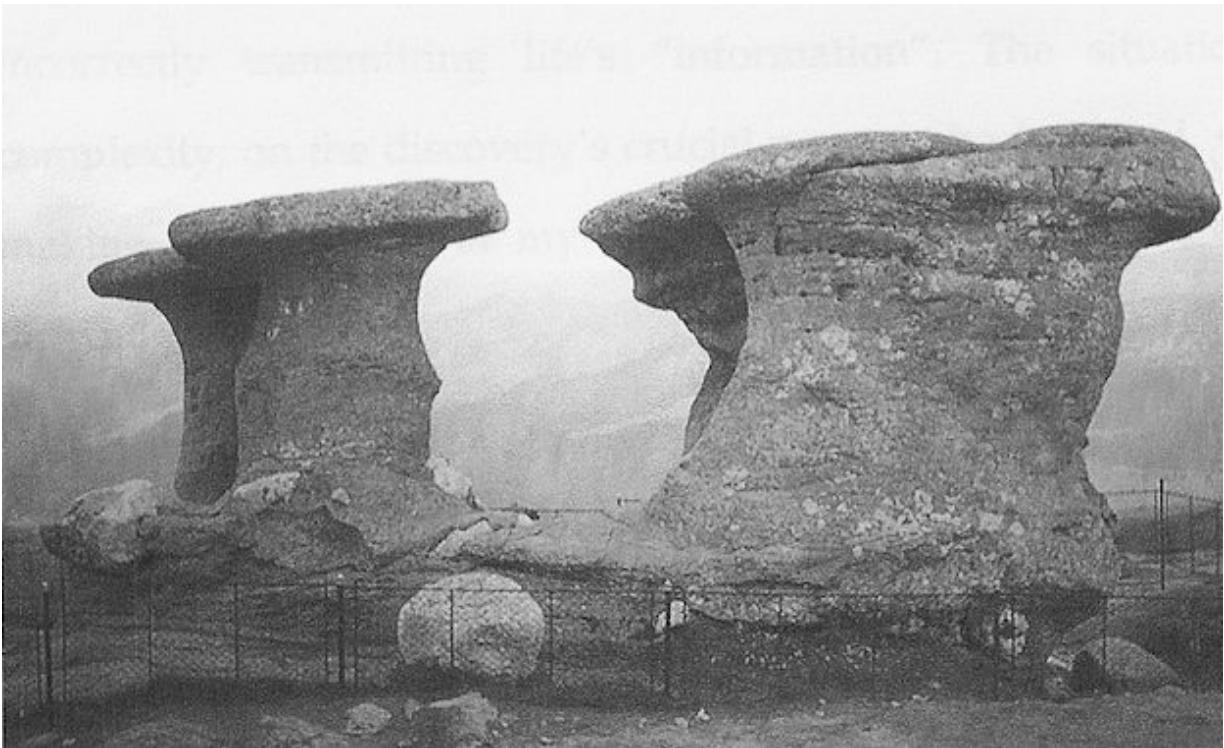

“The boring distance was bigger because it was needed to maintain a certain breaching angle, but at least there was a chance to avoid the energetic blockage. I was quite sceptical towards this solution because I could imagine that those who built that structure thought this might be tried and took some precautions about it. The venerable one, however, guaranteed the ultra sophisticated technological support of the US Army would make available an amazing device for drilling the rock extremely fast. This device utilized a very powerful plasma jet and a rotating magnetic field. Using this, we could get to the tunnel’s wall in less than two days, including the predrilling preparations.

“The whole operation, however, had to be performed in the most secret way. If the venerable one was offering the technological means, we had to organize the rest so that everything looked no different than a routine mission of Department Zero. More than that, one of the essential terms imposed by the venerable Mason was that this action was to be erroneously reported to the President and the Romanian Intelligence Services merely as the discovery of a karstic structure.

“Signore Massini also wanted to bring a special team from the U.S., along with a few members of the Masonic elite, to join our team all the way through. I didn’t agree with this request, pointing out that I could neither assure the security nor information leaks to the outside, but I did propose for these teams to join us immediately after the breaching of the tunnel. The reality was that it wouldn’t have been a problem to ensure strict security, even with the U.S. team present, but I intentionally exaggerated the possibility of the secret being uncovered because I knew that this was the Masons’ weak point in this matter. I, of course, didn’t want them to get inside of the mountain at the same time as I did as I wanted first to see for myself what it was all about and what I would find there before making a decision. The situation was going to be very tense with too many variables.

This is why it could become unpredictable and even dangerous for us at any time. The important point, however, was to get into the tunnel and then to the semi-spherical energetic blockage.

BABELE – BUCEGI MOUNTAINS

“For this, it was necessary to leave the venerable one with the impression that I was open and collaborating because he was the one who could help us with the very important technical needs. His pressure is quite significant. On the other hand, his actions are limited due to his desire for absolute secrecy. Apparently, none of us knew what was down there; but as I already told you, I got the impression that the venerable one had essential information that he wanted to control exclusively. This is how I explained his insistence on being there at the moment of breaching into the tunnel.”

I felt like I was dreaming. Something exceptionally important was about to happen yet it still seemed like everything was almost surreal.

“Have you talked with anyone else about this?” I asked Cezar.

“I spoke face to face with General Obadea,” he answered. “He is the only one who knows all of the ins and outs of the situation. We both arranged to postpone announcing this situation to the superior political structure. If we did otherwise, the Masonic elite’s reaction could be terrible. We didn’t want to take any risks, especially when we needed the very advanced technology that they were willing to offer us. This is a matter of national security; and depending on what was going to be discovered there, it may be the greatest state secret ever. We therefore can't afford to act foolishly.”

I was watching Cezar. The very strange destiny of this man was making me seriously analyze the complicated gearing of the human relations and interests in the world. In the end, we all are like different sorts of relays, more or less sophisticated, correctly or incorrectly transmitting life's “information.” The complexity of the situation, with particular regard to the crucial moment of discovery, was making me feel unexpected shivers of a very intense emotion all over my body.

“What stage is the action at now?” I asked.

Deep inside, I was secretly hoping that I would possibly get to see the mysterious structure after it was revealed. Observing my thoughts, Cezar spoke.

“For now, we are in the middle of the preparations and I need to direct it with great attention. First, I ensured the security of the area that, luckily for us, is hard to get to and relatively unpopulated. I also asked for military help, even organizing a mini-camp outside the perimeter that was identified and isolated by me and my specialist team. I already ensured a circular guarding of the place by bringing in almost two hundred soldiers. A small access road was built and the zone was surrounded with barbed wire.

“I also arranged over thirty guard booths. Inside, I set a second security ring made of the department's third team. There are two access barriers on the improvised road with control points in between. This time, the logistics are large and complex because everything can last for several weeks. General Obadea took care of the relations with the Admiralty and asked for their support.

Military camp tents have been brought in and communication relays are mounted. I wanted to make everything look like a military mission. The entire operation is probably going to be ready sometime in the next few weeks. At the end of July, the plasma drilling equipment is coming. After that, there is nothing else to be done except getting inside the mountain.

“Although no one enters the perimeter without the clearance of General Obadea or myself, I will make it possible for you to see what we are going to discover there. This, of course, is if everything is going as planned. There are some other details, but they are not that important. You now know the essentials.

“It is planned that the first exterior drilling will start in the last days of July. Until then, we won’t see each other again because the events will take a straight line and their specific nature require my continuous presence there. But, as I promised, I will call for you as soon as everything is safe and well prepared.”

With these final words, Cezar rose from his armchair and said good-bye. We separated, hoping we would soon meet again under extraordinary circumstances. I preferred walking home. My thoughts and deductions were invading me with a multitude of possibilities and the complexity of the intrigue almost gave me a headache. That night I fell asleep thinking of the mysterious civilization that built that structure inside the mountain. They were proven to have owned or to own incredible technologies. Who were they? From what ancient times were they transmitting their message? I, however, wasn’t even close to suspecting the wonderful and immense surprise that had been waiting for tens of thousands of years to be revealed.

Chapter 5 — The Great Discovery

After that meeting with Cezar, my mind was mostly preoccupied on dealing with the mystery of the structure that was identified in Bucegi. I wanted to be able to participate in all of the preliminary operations and at the moment of breaching the tunnel, but I was aware that would not be possible. I had to be happy with the chance of having access for a short time to the place of the great discovery, if the events did not become complicated.

For a month and a half after our last meeting I waited in a feverish state for Cezar to contact me. I was inventing all kinds of scenarios and imagining all sorts of possibilities. Practically every moment was filled with an intense desire to get to that place in the mountains. I completely trusted Cezar and knew he would do everything possible to facilitate my access to that area.

I was also very aware of the tension that must have been upon him and General Obadea due to the very complicated backstage play that had to be kept in a very fine balance. What was happening in the mountains was really an exceptional situation. Its importance was not only targeting national security but also the situation of the entire humankind, particularly if we consider the huge interest that the world's elite Masons were directing towards it.

The operations and Cezar's plan were also made more difficult to carry out by the fact that he had to simultaneously deflect the vigilance of Signore Massini with that of other Masons as well. To this was added the dangerous pressure of all this becoming known to the state's top structures. In a case like that, it was less likely for the situation to be effectively controlled. Cezar's plan included informing the political leaders but only at a very well defined moment.

THE SECRET BASE FROM THE MOUNTAINS

The much expected moment finally arrived a little after the middle of August. On a sunny morning, I was contacted through the usual channels although I noticed that the security precautions were much stricter. I will not go into details as they are not too interesting.

A little after lunch, I arrived at one of the secret military bases located at the bottom of the mountains. From there, I was taken by Department Zero's helicopter, accompanied by two armed military men dressed in a special uniform. Even from Bucharest, none of those escorting me said a word, following the known dispositions of their duties. Changes of the vehicle and guards were accompanied only by short and relevant orders. The whole action was proving to be fast and precise. Although I knew well these aspects and the reasons for maximum security, I was still a bit surprised by the strictness of the safety measures that had been taken. Seeing them as a bit exaggerated, I soon realized that I was not the one to evaluate the stakes of the entire operation and that I had to consider myself lucky to be offered this special opportunity. I was taking part in what I considered to be probably the most important discovery of modern times. The fact that I was called by Cezar and that the security measures were so impressive was giving me the conviction that something of a tremendous importance had been discovered. I was reflecting upon the fact that while the majority of people were still living their everyday mundane lives, this discovery could radically change everybody's conceptions in a very short time.

Smiling cynically, I was thinking that in the circumstances of the present world, my ideas were probably too idealistic. To make such a big change happen, it would involve an honest analysis of humanity's past as well as the profound meanings of life. Fine diplomacy, full of intelligence and noble virtues, would be needed in order to manage to sneak around the numerous mental, psychic or even material obstacles to such a change.

Deep in my thoughts, I almost failed to notice the helicopter descending as it prepared to deposit us at the new military base that was built in the mountains. My thoughts suddenly vanished when I saw what was laying a few tens of meters under me. Although I was sort of familiar with tactical military operations and the technology used on such occasions, what I saw was beyond any imagination. Firstly, I observed a great number of American troops. It was obvious they were American due to designations on their off-road military vehicles and also massive structures hidden under tarpaulins bearing the U.S. flag.

I could also see the only viable road, quite wide, that came from the woods. There were also two military rings that were securing access to the base.

They looked like some sort of very wide borders, each one almost completing a circle around a big entrance in the mountain's wall. Between the two security rings, there were military trucks, a few off road cars, and a few vehicles whose shape and purpose I could not readily identify. I estimated that there were approximately two hundred soldiers within those two rings. The ones from the inner ring had a special black uniform and the ones from the outer ring wore a regular uniform. Each one had an automatic gun and the distance between them was only a few meters.

I saw that soldier booths were placed between the security rings and those of the special team were right behind the second ring. The road was blocked with double massive barriers for each ring and double control guards on each side. I would say that between the rings was a distance of about fifty meters. It looked like the activity was frantic because there were continuous comings and goings to and from the two headquarters, especially inside the focal perimeter to the entrance cut into the mountain.

My general observations were interrupted by the helicopter landing inside the main perimeter and beyond the second security ring. I got out and was immediately framed by two soldiers, this time Americans. We walked only about twenty meters from the helicopter with two from the special team in front and the two Americans behind me. I was told to stop and all five of us were left standing there for about an hour. They were obviously waiting for orders to take me over.

Only then did I really start to see the proportions of the operation that was taking place and to become aware of its exceptional importance. Initially, I was puzzled by the way they were treating me; not because I felt offended but due to the almost unbelievable strictness with which all the actions in the base were happening. I was watching the four soldiers that were framing me politely but very firmly. They had not moved, relaxed nor talked and almost did not even blink for the hour we had waited. Completely unmoved, they were leaving the impression of robots rather than human beings. Not having any other choice, I also stood still between them, moving slightly from time to time so as not to get numb.

I tried to find out the reason we were waiting, but it was like talking to four statues. I then realized that the orders were extremely severe and strict and stopped asking questions, resigning myself to stand for a long time in the same place. I used that as an opportunity to observe what was happening around me.

The emotions that I had felt since I left Bucharest were now even more amplified. I was basically less than 100 meters away from the aim of my dreams, hopes and suppositions, from a phenomenal discovery that could have waited for thousands and thousands of years to be revealed. The mysterious air of the base gave everyone an enigmatic and inner-focused state of mind.

In front of me and a little to the right was the large entrance of a tunnel through the mountain. I could see the modern illuminating system that had been mounted at the entrance and continued through the length of the tunnel. Unfortunately, a big tent and two ultramodern modular constructions were obscuring my view. In the same area as me, there were several American jeeps and vehicles. At my left, there were two huge structures, each covered with a tarpaulin, the shape of which seemed to indicate big chests with an unknown content. The entrance to the tunnel was blocked by a wide metal barrier that was guarded on each side by two American soldiers. Their uniforms suggested that they were elite Marines.

Something that got my attention in particular was a huge hangar, dug into the mountain, to the right of the guarded tunnel. It was absolutely huge, measuring around ten meters in height and as far as I could tell, it was about fifty meters in depth. It was perfectly made with finished walls and a faultlessly curved vault. I was wondering what technology they used if they had managed to build everything I saw in just one month. Later, I would find out that the drilling of the hangar took just one day.

Inside the hangar there were many piled up boxes. On the other side, there were three special structures that looked like long rooms that were probably used for tests and research. Inside the hangar, it was quite animated and I could see many people in white coats going in and out of those laboratories while carrying different objects or papers. Both in the middle corridor of the hangar and outside, close to the tunnel's entrance, I could see a few small motorized vehicles that some people there were using to travel around inside.

Neither the tunnel nor the hangar had gliding doors, probably because of the construction difficulties and because they were not yet needed. The hangar did have, however, a “curtain” system made from a semitransparent material, but it was lowered for only one quarter of the entire height of the entrance. The illuminating system was faultless and I noticed two big generators functioning somewhere on the mountain’s lower slope. They were between the two security rings and the control guards.

At a certain distance from the big military tent on my left were several modern booths in a row; and behind those more medium military tents which surely must be night shelters for the soldiers and the research personnel. Still, I hadn’t seen anything resembling a canteen or a place for preparing food. I concluded that it was brought there daily by a truck, probably under extreme security. Later, I found out that the kitchen was a few kilometers below and that a group of soldiers from Department Zero’s special team were bringing the food for those in the camp with daily truck runs. This solution was chosen to limit the peripheral movements of the personnel and solve the security issue. Every group of soldiers was eating separately in their booths. In the focal perimeter, food was served in the big military tent for the Romanian and American soldiers as well as for the research teams. I discovered that the Americans brought their own food and cooks but they were sent into the kitchen at the bottom of the mountain along with the Romanian ones.

The two semispherical constructions were the residences of the Romanian and American staff. Later on, Cezar told me that in one of them, the smaller one, lived he and General Obadea. In the other one were two generals from the Pentagon and a counsellor on national security issues from Washington. These very ergonomic buildings looked more like research stations from other planets and gave a pleasant feeling of comfort and great safety. The material they were made from was white and bordered with hexagonal shapes. Close to the top was a strip made out of a dark-blue material. On this strip were some sort of huge light bulbs. I was told that when they were lit at night time, they created a very calm and beautiful atmosphere. For a while, I watched the activity at the perimeter. Everyone moved fast and seemed to know exactly what they had to do. From time to time, a jeep was coming or going. Some soldiers were unloading something from the chests under the tarpaulin. Unfortunately, the distance and the obstacles did not allow me to get a clear look at the objects that were moved. I was still puzzled by the relatively great number of Americans because Cezar led me to understand that there was going to be just a team to maneuver the plasma drilling equipment.

Exactly as I was starting to make different assumptions regarding this aspect, one of the Romanian soldiers in front of me put one hand to his right ear, listened carefully and then said a few words. Right after this, we started moving towards the dark entrance of the tunnel which, as we came closer and closer, looked bigger and threatening. We stopped in the same formation next to one of the two semi-spherical buildings, just a few meters beside the tunnel. My heart was beating strongly. Beyond the wide barrier, guarded by two inflexible American soldiers, might be the most terrible mystery on the planet. What had happened in the one and a half months since my last talk with Cezar? What had been discovered there?

I then noticed that in front of the tunnel and inside of it, on a two meter wide streak, was a stripe of fluted rubber on which a few electric American vehicles were lined up. I could also see that the inside of the tunnel was discreetly lit by neon installations placed on the ceiling and the lateral walls, but the tunnel turned left after only ten meters so I couldn't see more.

Cezar then appeared. He came from inside of the tunnel, driving one of the electric vehicles. Next to him was an older gray-haired man with firm and decided features. Both were serious and silent. As Cezar got off next to me, the four soldiers saluted and discretely left. I met General Obadea who looked at me sharply for a few moments. He shook my hand powerfully and after a few polite words, he left towards the semi-spherical building. It was obvious for me that the General knew everything about me from Cezar and that he had agreed for me to be brought there. This move was probably part of their plan for unveiling the Mason's actions and they felt I needed to be there too. Even if I felt just like a small cog in this immense gear of mysterious elements, aspects and intrigues, I was very happy to get this extraordinary chance and ready to take all responsibility for the task I had taken upon myself.

THE GREAT GALLERY

“The situation is quite critical,” Cezar told me, very preoccupied. “The relationship with Signore Massini becomes tenser, but what is more serious is that everything is known by the top power in the state. We expected it, but not this soon. Our intention was to present all the data sometime in the future but in a more favorable moment. Now, things are tenser both internally and externally. You do not know a lot of what happened in the last month. Come, I will acquaint you with the main story while we go through the tunnel,” he said, going towards the entrance.

We didn’t take one of the electric vehicles. This way, we were saving some time as Cezar could fill me in on how everything had unfolded lately. Furthermore, I had the opportunity to see everything closer and in more detail.

The tunnel was “paved” with thick rubber flooring. On both sides of it and up to the stone walls of the mountain was just rock. At the entrance and another few meters beyond were water infiltrations but after the tunnel gently turned left, at about ten meters from the entrance, everything was dry. I was amazed by the precision of the drilling and especially by the wall’s finishing that almost looked grinded. The white light wondrously lined out the various colors of the different geological formations, discreetly lighting the inside of the tunnel in an unreal play of light and shadow. The sound of our footsteps was muffled by the rubber floor and there was an enigmatic but very exciting atmosphere. It was a bit cold for how I was dressed, but Cezar told me that this situation would not last for too long.

“Initially,” said Cezar, “the machine drilled following a weird deviation of the magnetic field. Shortly, we noticed the error so we corrected its trajectory. Look, right here,” he said as he stopped in the bend towards the left of the tunnel.

I stopped as well, admiring the elegant way in which the gallery was continuing. After the curve, it was perfectly level for about fifty meters in a very similar way to an underground metro tunnel although maybe a bit more wide. At the end of this distance, in the heart of the mountain, I saw something resembling a huge gate that looked like it was gliding towards the left, taking up now less than a quarter of the gallery’s width. There were two armed soldiers and the place all around the tunnel was very well lit.

Before the big entrance in the other gallery, I could also see another recess, narrow but quite long, on the right side. This entrance was guarded by the huge gliding door. I realized that here was the beginning of the adventure, of the great discovery that had been made. I remembered the scheme that Cezar drew at our last meeting and I realized that it was exactly as what I now saw in front of me, at least as far as what was related with the placement of the mysterious gallery inside the mountain.

“I was amazed by the technology the Americans brought with them,” Cezar told me. “The plasma drilling machine wasn’t big, but it needed special equipment for those around it and for the drilled material. It is something similar to anti-atomic radiation equipment. I also wore one of those special costumes, and I watched the drilling very closely. What you can see from behind the lenses, containing a special protection fluid, is almost unbelievable. It looks like the rock is melting under the plasma jet, but in fact it is just made very flexible, close to the flowing point and it is immediately modelled in a circular shape by the pressure of the magnetic field which also directs the plasma jet. There is no dust, the debris is quite negligible and the drilling speed is huge for a job like that. The distance from the entrance to the soldiers you see there was covered in just five hours. Afterwards, everything looks so clean, like it is has been polished. The rubber floor and the lighting equipment were already prepared at the entrance before the drilling machine was even taken out of the tunnel.”

While we were going towards the big gallery, Cezar told me that, at the beginning, they drilled in another area of the mountain in order to avoid the energetic barrier at the entrance to the main tunnel. A higher place on the slope was chosen, at about three hundred meters from where the camp was, and they drilled for a couple of days because the distance to the tunnel was bigger and the breaching was not in a horizontal plane which made the technical procedures more difficult. They finally got to the tunnel’s walls, but any efforts of breaching it were useless. It didn’t yield to the plasma jet or the magnetic field. Therefore, they had to give up on that option and to cover the entrance of the gallery they had just drilled. They went back to the beginning and started the plan of breaching the mountain’s wall to the energetic barrier.

“The drilling was monitored at each and every moment and correlated with the distance to the energetic area. A few meters before the energetic area, we got to the beginning of the gallery you see now so all that was left to be done was to link the two tunnels,” Cezar explained.

Meanwhile, we arrived at the entrance that was guarded by the two soldiers belonging to special units. From their uniforms and what was written on them, it was obvious one was Romanian and the other was American. The soldiers saluted Cezar who went towards the booth a few meters to left. The American soldier entered the booth where he probably had a command panel because, in a few seconds and from a niche inside the structure, a metal arm appeared bearing a complicated device at its end. The arm was articulated. Cezar lifted it to the level of his eye, and after another few seconds, a short access sound could be heard.

“We took all the necessary precautions,” he said as he came back next to me. “My iris print was analyzed and stocked as code-information. The security system doesn’t react unless a laser beam reads my or General Obadea’s iris. Now, for example, the very complicated laser sensor system that was set up here at the entrance was deactivated. It is invisible, but if we would have gone straight through, it would have automatically started the alarm inside the base. We refused to imprint the irises of the American generals and insisted that we are the only ones having access to the Great Gallery. It was then when the first problems appeared,” he thoughtfully said.

I noticed the booth had an extension beyond the gate in the Great Gallery which also had an iris reading device. Cezar told me that one was for returning from the Great Gallery. I also found out that he could also deactivate the security system simultaneously with the iris reading by placing his palm in a special slot. This method was used when they had to do many transfers through the Great Gallery. Cezar walked for a few more meters and then started to explain to me.

“The energetic barrier was about here...in this area. It was essentially an energetic projection, but we couldn’t understand how it was made. We also couldn’t see how it was possible for that barrier to continuously exist for thousands and thousands of years. We don’t know its source or the technological means which created it. Basically, except for the fact that we managed to get beyond it, we aren't clearer in any way. Getting beyond it, however, involved a tragic incident."

I was behind Cezar, looking at the gallery's ceiling where the link with the great tunnel was made. Actually, there were a few meters of gallery in the mountain's rock which were larger than the tunnel built by the American plasma device. In this section, the walls weren't finished but were erratic with many peaks. More than that, this area of the gallery that was about six meters long and was not circular but square. The connection between the two galleries was made only at ground level. It descended slightly in a sloping fashion from our gallery to the ancient and bigger one.

The difference between the two levels was about one meter and was very noticeable in the ceiling area where the two tunnels joined. The drilling was almost concentric with the ancient gallery, but no one could explain how it is possible for this tunnel to suddenly start from the inside of the mountain. It was obviously an artificial structure that appeared to be handmade. It was impossible to believe that the entrance to the gallery had been covered for a distance of about sixty meters because the massive stone structure was identical to the one surrounding it. I asked Cezar what happened when they got to the energetic barrier.

"At that moment, I was talking with General Obadea and with the generals from the Pentagon about some camp security issues. We were informed that the breaching and linking of the two galleries had been done. Before we got there, the soldiers started to take the plasma device out of the gallery. Three people from Department Zero's first team sneaked inside to see the new gallery. That was a big mistake because they ignored protocol. They jumped over the one meter level gap between the two galleries and started investigating the four meter perimeter they knew was safe and just before the invisible energetic barrier. Unfortunately, no one could explain what happened next. Most probably, the three came too close to the barrier because, a few seconds later, a weird but powerful noise was heard, like a short circuit. We found them collapsed at the interior base of the invisible energetic barrier with their bodies strangely contorted as being enclosed by the precise side of a wall. All three were dead. This created some panic even though we tried to settle the incident.

“As I was very soon going to realize, the panic was more intense among the American staff and this was due to the fact that their initial fears were starting to come true. Indeed, at that moment we practically had no chance of accessing the ancient gallery. The lateral drilling failed because of the unknown material that resisted all of our attempts to breach it, and the energetic barrier was now proving to be an irresistible obstacle.

“Signore Massini was present too and asked for my opinion. At that time, the American commando team hadn’t arrived yet. There were just the specialists dealing with the drilling device, a team of researchers, two generals from the Pentagon, the Presidential Counsellor and Signore Massini’s representatives who, by the way, are still here.

“I am not even sure that the President of the USA was notified of this operation. It was obviously an internal back stage affair from which they tried to get all of the benefits possible. The venerable one knew more about the origins of this discovery, and as far as I realized, also knew about at least one element that was in the big hall, but we will get to this soon enough. The Mason’s impatience was restrained but firm.

“At that moment, I could have asked for them to leave the perimeter but that wouldn’t have solved a thing except to complicate the events even more than they already were. Signore Massini’s influence could have eventually led to the replacement of General Obadea and myself on the grounds of conducting an operation that hadn’t still been brought up in front of the state’s political power. We obviously had all the justifications and extenuating circumstances needed, but it was better for the information to come from us and not from foreigners.

“Despite all this, a totally unpredictable element completely modified the situation and directed it towards a very tense and dangerous development that is still threatening. I hope, however, that these tensions don’t go beyond a certain point because it’s then going to be very difficult to say what might come next.”

Cezar went closer to the huge stone gate that guarded the entrance in the Great Gallery. He got closer to the left wall of the tunnel where the gate glided and spoke to me.

“Now you are exactly in the area where the energetic barrier is when it is activated. Do you see anything on the wall next to me?”

I looked carefully and noticed a very big square section in the uneven rock, perfectly finished, that seemed encrusted in the mountain’s stone. The sides of the square were about twenty centimeters long sides. On it, there was a precisely drawn equilateral triangle facing upwards.

“This is the ‘key’ left to us from those who built the structure. Without it, we would have been completely helpless. After the death of the three soldiers, I came to exactly where you are now. Carefully looking around the place, I noticed this very well finished stone square with the triangular symbol on it. Back then, however, the gallery was blocked by the huge stone gate there. The problem was that I was standing very close to the energetic barrier, about two meters in front of the gate, the same as where you are now. As you can see, the polished square encrusted in the mountain’s rock is placed between the huge stone gate and the energetic barrier. Naturally, I supposed that its function was to open the gate. But how should I reach it if my way was blocked by the invisible energetic barrier?”

I was puzzled. The two soldiers had long since retreated into the booths leaving me and Cezar alone at the entrance in the ancient mysterious corridor. I was deeply marked by the emotion of finding secrets thousands and thousands of years old gradually unfolding in front of me. Due to the excitement, my body seemed lighter and Cezar’s words were muffled in my ears. In spite of all this, I had an extraordinary lucidity and intuitively understood everything very easily.

“It was a vibration frequency problem,” I said, amazed by the calm with which I had spoken those words. Cezar looked at me surprised.

“Exactly!” he confirmed. “Looking for a solution, I closed my eyes and focused upon the energetic barrier. Shortly, I felt that it actually was ‘alive’ but in a very special way that I couldn’t explain to those present. Only the venerable one could have probably understood, but he was the one I wanted to keep away from the mysteries I was confronted with.”

“I felt that between me and the barrier’s energy was a certain ‘compatibility,’ something like a reciprocal sympathy and that I had successfully passed the ‘personal vibration test.’ I couldn’t stop asking myself what kind of exceptional technological and spiritual development had those who had established this genuine ‘frontier’ of energetic checking which present science can’t even conceive of, never mind about actually achieving. I then took a few stones from the ground and threw them towards the invisible energetic barrier. As soon as the stones touched the energetic barrier, they were transformed into a fine powder that fell on the ground forming a straight line. I asked for other objects made from metal, plastic wood or leather. The conclusion was clear. Everything made from amorphous substances was instantaneously turned into powder and everything that was organic material was rejected; unless it had a certain individual high vibrational frequency. I sent the powders to the lab to be analyzed and then lightly touched the invisible surface of the energetic barrier with my hand. I only felt some fine shivers on my skin, very pleasant, so I went forward with all my body, going through to the other side of the energetic barrier. It was approximately one centimeter thick.

“I was now looking at the amazed faces of the American officials and a few members of my team who were still on the other side of the barrier. I went to the wall and pressed the triangle from the perfectly finished stone square, the one you are looking at now. Actually, it was enough just to touch it because it doesn’t move. It’s fixed. Only its surface is carved in the stone. The gate, from which you now see just a part, immediately started to glide smoothly and almost without any noise until it stopped in the position it is still in. That was the moment when all of us saw, for the first time, the Great Gallery. It was a moment of intense emotion. We were shocked that it was lit just as you see it now but without actually containing any light source, at least any conventional light source that we know of.”

Cezar took a short break. I was flabbergasted, looking inside the Great Gallery and only then realizing there was no light source. Too absorbed in what Cezar was telling me and in my own observations upon the linking between the two galleries, I imagined that the light from the Great Gallery was also coming from the illumination system that had been installed along it, like in the newly drilled tunnel. I became aware, however, that that light seemed to have no source although I was tempted to say that it came from the extraordinary material that covered the gallery’s walls. This light was less intense than the one in our tunnel but very pleasant and gave a relaxing and tension-relieving state, both mentally and physically.

“There was a very complex and profound feeling created by the size of the corridor, the color and the pattern of the material that it is made from,” Cezar continued talking. “You can hardly see its end from here, but I can tell you that the tunnel suddenly turns right after about three hundred meters. You will see for yourself shortly, but let me get back to the energetic barrier. I touched the polished triangle again and the gate glided back and closed the access to the Great Gallery. Only after I reopened the gate, passing thorough the barrier’s area again, I realized that it had been cancelled. So, the unique command removed the energetic barrier and at the same time opened the stone gate that was blocking the access to the Great Gallery.

“Later, I did more experiments, especially after we precisely marked the area where the energetic barrier acted. General Obadea came and touched with only one finger the invisible surface of the barrier; and even if nothing serious happened to him, he still had a feeling of vertigo and nausea. The Presidential Counsellor was violently thrown to the ground even though the contact between his skin and the barrier was very light. He recovered from his experience later under a doctor’s supervision. After that, no one else wished to try going through the energetic wall. The three soldiers who died probably had a simultaneous contact on a bigger surface of their body that was lethal for them. The problem is that people cannot stay in the invisible barrier for too long. This is the invisible barrier between the closed gate and the energetic wall. Those who can’t go through it can’t stay there for too long.

“We tried with a few soldiers and, after we closed the gate and activated the energetic barrier, they told me that they felt like they were suffocating and it became more and more acute. We therefore had to leave the energetic barrier as well as the gate open, but as you have already seen, we placed two guards and we installed an alarm to prevent any unauthorized access to the Great Gallery. The iris identification system resets itself after five seconds which is enough to cross the entrance line into the gallery and beyond the gate’s gliding system. Come next to me. I want to show you how the gate works.”

Cezar lightly touched the stone square. The huge gate, about thirty centimeters thick and the same height as the Great Gallery, over six meters, was gliding very smoothly due to a gearing system I could not identify. When the gate completely covered the entrance, I could see that it was perfectly finished, polished, and without any inscriptions on its surface. It was only an immense stone wall, almost shiny and probably weighing more than two tons. What made it move so easy and delicately though?

While I was looking for the answers to my questions and carefully looking at the base of the gate, I started having breathing difficulties and my head was spinning with nausea. Cezar, watching me closely, opened the gate and the symptoms disappeared as suddenly as they had appeared. He read the question in my eyes.

“I don’t know what determines this specific effect. It is probably some sort of interaction between the gate’s surface when it is closed and the energetic barrier that affects any organisms found in this intermediary space. We also did not manage to decipher the gate’s gliding mystery. If you look carefully, you can see that when it glides right, it pushes this stone slate that covers the space of the gate’s thickness. When it glides towards left, the stone slate also glides, strongly attached to the gate’s side. I don’t believe this is a primitive technology because everything is too smooth and quiet. It must be a totally different technology.

“The American generals proposed that we should smash the stone threshold to see what is underneath, but we would not accept that. It seemed a childish solution.”

I carefully looked at the gate’s gliding path. The jointing was extremely precise and very well finished. Nothing could get through it and you couldn’t see anything underneath. The precisely modelled gate was simply “coming out” from the gallery’s left wall and glided until it reached the right wall where it fit perfectly.

“While doing these experiments and observations, after we had already deactivated the energetic barrier, one of the soldiers on duty came to let us know that the American technicians were requesting our presence at the base,” said Cezar. “They wanted to tell us something special.

“General Obadea and one of the two American generals went outside where the data analysis center was. They returned and told me that, after the deactivation of the first energetic barrier from the Great Gallery’s entrance, the huge semi-spherical shield from the other end suddenly activated, strangely going to a superior level of vibration and emitting a great light radiation.”

Saying this, Cezar went towards the soldiers’ booths.

“Let’s go now,” he said. “It is time to enter the Great Gallery. You will be able to convince yourself of everything I have told you.”

Cezar did the iris recognition procedure again. This way, we could pass beyond the gate, stepping for the first time on that strange and very special material of the ancient tunnel. Behind us, the two soldiers took their guard places in silence. There were two electric vehicles at the entrance of the Great Gallery, but we preferred to walk so that Cezar would have the necessary time to tell me what else had happened.

While he was talking, I keenly studied the gallery. From a superficial look, you could assume that the walls and floor we were walking on were made from the carefully polished stone of the mountains. Moving close to the left wall and touching it, I observed that it was covered with a material that looked synthetic. At the same time, however, it left the strange feeling that it had something organic in it. It had the color of petrol, but its reflections were often green or even dark blue. There was also a watery feeling I experienced which came from the irregular stripes that were everywhere and in every direction. It was also amazing that when we moved, the stripes also changed position, width and color; but that happened very smoothly, leaving the impression it was just a relative effect of our movements related to the wall. The color nuances had a profound relaxing effect upon the mental state and modified the way you could appreciate distances. When I said that to Cezar, he spoke.

“We also noticed the same aspect. We had to measure the total distance of the gallery and on different segments and even to put some marks on the sides.”

Indeed, on the right side of the gallery you could see milestones that told the distance in meters and yards from the entrance in the tunnel. I also noticed that the material was rough to the touch and it could not be scratched or bent. Cezar told me that the material opposed any attempt of breaking, breaching, scratching or cutting, no matter how sharp was the object used. More than that, and strangely, the flames of fire or torch were absorbed into the material. Fire could not burn on it for practical sake.

“The American researchers can’t say anything about this material because they have no sample of it. The only thing they could tell us was that the material is a strange combination between an organic and inorganic substance, but the way it is organized in its inner structure is still a deep mystery for them.”

At the milestone that indicated two hundred and eighty meters, the gallery suddenly turned right in a sharp angle. The reason for this trajectory could not be deciphered. Much further ahead, I could see a blue light shining like a star. Seeing my emotion, Cezar smiled and spoke to me.

“There is the end of our journey. But in a certain way, it is also a beginning for something even greater according to the data I have until now. The technological means through which we were shown this data is colossal; but unfortunately, you can’t have access to it. You will understand better when we will get to the Projection Hall, as we decided to name it.”

“This means that the Americans got there, too.” I said.

“As soon as I managed to solve the problem with the first energetic barrier, Signore Massini wanted to enter the corridor and get to the big hall. I invoked the increased risk issues that also determined the death of the three soldiers as well as the necessity of a severe system of security and alarms that had to be mounted at the entrance of the main corridor. He didn’t like it, but he didn’t have much of a choice.

“I was trying to gain as much time as possible but especially so that I could manage to get to the big hall without being accompanied by any Mason. I didn’t know what they wanted from there but I hoped to realize it as soon as I entered the hall and examined its contents. The satellite data showed the existence of a huge space at the end of the gallery, but this was also protected by an energetic barrier.

“During an organizing break, taking advantage of the absence of the Americans and of Signore Massini from the tunnel, I took an electric vehicle and I went alone through this corridor, a corridor deserted for more than fifty thousand years, to the light you see further down in front of you. What you see shining is just the reflection of a part of the huge energetic protective shield of the immense hall. As you will notice, at the end, the gallery takes another sharp turn.

“I was secretly hoping that I could pass this barrier as I did with the first one but when I got there, I was overwhelmed. The gallery we were crossing now suddenly opened into a huge hall right in the heart of the mountain which included an immense semi-spherical energetic shield. This shield enclosed the Projection Hall and everything it contained. The structure’s grandeur is incomparable, but exactly when I was getting ready to find the most suitable way to get inside, I was urgently called to the base. The news I was about to get would complicate everything. This was a crucial moment that I had not foreseen.”

GREAT DIPLOMATIC TENSIONS

“I got back to the base as fast as I could and entered the Americans’ room where I was also received by General Obadea,” Cezar continued to tell me. “An unpredicted element occurred that ruined all plans, ours as well as Signore Massini’s. The venerable one was seated on a chair at the back of the room, deep in his thoughts. He was probably making new plans and reconsidering his position.”

“The Romanian press leaked something?” I guessed.

“It was something even worse than that. Do you remember that the venerable one told me about the discovery they had made next to Baghdad? That there as well was an energetic barrier that couldn’t be breached but was identical with the semi-spherical shield that surrounded the big hall from here?”

I nodded. The American’s discovery was not accidental but followed certain indications from the same military espionage satellite that also revealed the

“Well, the American counsellor on national security issues got an ultra secret fax in which he was informed that the energetic shield from Baghdad suddenly activated and started pulsing at a great frequency. The amazing information was that a hologram appeared in front of it, gradually showing Europe; then the southeast of Europe; then Romania’s territory; then the Bucegi Mountains; and finally, the location of the inner structure within the Great Gallery’s corridor and the semi-spherical energetic shield that was strongly pulsing. It was obvious that the two energetic semi-spherical shields were directly but mysteriously connected and that the activation of one of them led to the activation of the other one. Who knows, maybe there is a network of these kinds of underground structures all over the world.

“The bad news was that the U.S. Presidency was informed of these events and made diplomatic contact with Romania through the secret services. In just a few minutes, the whole operation had been uncovered. The imminent arrival of a state commission from Bucharest had been announced to come and evaluate the situation.”

I was so absorbed in listening to what Cezar was telling me that I had not even realized that I had stopped walking. We had about another hundred meters before the last turn and the light from the energetic shield, reflecting on the Great Gallery’s wall, was now much stronger.

“Did they want to take over at a political level?” I impatiently asked.

“I think this was the initial order but things got even more complicated when they actually saw what this all was about. My fears came true because our politicians, the ones that had the right to be made aware of these aspects, panicked. It was obvious they couldn’t face the events and that the decisions were going to be made under an advanced state of stress.

“General Obadea was called to Bucharest. It was a critical moment which put at stake even the existence of Department Zero, or at least of its independent structure. The General had to justify the eluding of the political power. Before leaving for the capital, accompanied by those from the commission, General Obadea talked with me and we both decided to reveal all the aspects, intrigues and plans of the last year, including my relation with Signore Massini. The most difficult problem was to find exactly the right people to make that crucial important report to because, otherwise, all our intentions and plans would have been revealed and the repercussions could be fatal as far as the well being of myself and the General was concerned. The same could be said for national security. Meanwhile, I was stuck at the base, all work having come to a halt.

“The American team had been isolated in a tent and the tunnel’s guarding was taken over by the army’s special intervention troops. The diplomatic tension was rising because Washington pressured to have contact with the Pentagon’s generals and with the Presidential Counsellor.

“Back then, no one knew what was in the big hall that was protected by the energetic shield. Any initiative or research operation had been stopped. No one was allowed into the base except for the guard patrols. The new situation was coordinated by two top generals from the Romanian army who permanently maintained contact with the highest political structure of Romania. In this entire extremely tense situation, the only one who managed to ‘sneak’ outside the base, following a very special order coming from Bucharest, was Signore Massini. I haven’t seen him since then, but believe me, I fully felt his influence in the way things unfolded afterwards. And I am referring here to the mute but very fierce fight between the Romanian and American diplomats as well as to the nature of the political decisions that were taken in connection with the operation from here. Everything happened very fast; just eight days passed since those events.”

Listening to Cezar, I was puzzled by the way things turned but especially because I was still there, as if nothing I was hearing about had really happened.

“If I am here and you, as far as I understand, managed to get inside the Projection Hall, this means that General Obadea was successful in Bucharest.”

Cezar mysteriously smiled.

“Mostly, the answer is affirmative. The success was mainly bringing everything to the right people’s ears, people with a great moral integrity who are also animated by a profound patriotism.

“The NDSC (National Defense Supreme Council) asked for an emergency meeting. Most were shaken by what they found out. An intense wave of approval towards the General and his activities was then spontaneously created. They immediately decided to continue the research under the exclusive command of the General and me. However, the diplomatic crisis had not been resolved yet. The American military were allowed to leave the country the following day; but the team of researchers and specialists, as well as all logistics and devices, were kept here. We then thought that things were settled, and I was almost glad they had happened the way they did.

That way I did not need to pretend or give in, more or less, to the venerable member of the Masonic elite. Unfortunately, their force of influence and the pressure they exercised through diplomatic channels was huge.”

We had reached the end of the hall where it turned left suddenly, this time for four meters only. The sight in front of our eyes was truly grandiose. The gigantic arch the energy shield formed was a splendid radiant blue, continuously crossed by intense bright white flashes.

Although Cezar had mentioned that the Projection Room was isolated from the exterior by a gate, like the Big Gallery, one still could not see anything inside through it. The hall ended suddenly in a huge room, dug into the mountain like a hemisphere. There was no more than seven or eight meters from the end of the hall to the energy shield. In that space, four electrical vehicles were lined up.

The arch created by the energy shield was included in the hemispherical cavity, but I noticed the area behind was common to the rock wall. I estimated the level distance between the shield’s arch and the room’s ceiling was about ten meters. The magical light produced by the energy shield was being reflected in wonderful sparks and shades on the rocky walls of the mountain. The beauty and the grandeur of that picture seemed extraneous and my heart startled with emotion and joy.

“How did you manage to get inside?” I asked Cezar, affected by the intensity of the feeling that the image gave me.

“It is much simpler than you would expect. The ones who planned the whole assembly probably considered the first energy shield to be a real ‘touch stone’ for the possible entrants, estimating it was enough for the whole structure’s security. I have to admit they were right. Nothing could pass the first energy shield unless it was a superior and profoundly beneficial consciousness. Even in case of an atomic combustion, the assembly was very well protected by the mountain. Maybe that was the reason the Big Gallery started suddenly, deep inside the mountain. I cannot say though how they technically created it.

“When I received the new orders from Bucharest, I was very happy. I sensed the fight was just starting, but at least I had important political support and from the leading politicians, too. The same day I entered the Projection Room you see in front of your eyes. I was alone as I found out the terrible mystery that had remained hidden for fifty thousand years. You can hardly imagine the feelings I had in those moments. There are some aspects I cannot tell you though.”

“You mentioned this number of years before,” I interrupted Cezar. “How can you tell that this is the right period of time since all of this has been here?”

“It was the result of further scientific examination of some data ‘they’ offered that you will also see after we enter the room. All of the events I described to you have occurred since last week. Many of them happened very quickly and the changes of situations were dramatic sometimes. I shall tell you everything here before we enter the room as you will be thrilled at what you see.”

We stopped at the line of demarcation between the Big Gallery and the gigantic hall inside the mountain that held the hemispherical energy shield. Fascinated, I was listening to Cezar while I was watching the exotic sparkles on the blue surface of the hemisphere.

“After the decision to continue the research under Department Zero’s management, I entered the Projection Room several times and catalogued everything, working together with our team of specialists.

“The next day, however, the first contradictory signals appeared from the political powers. The orders that followed one after the other, revoking each other, were either strong or evasive and showed the existence of a big tension. I suspected that there was the drama of a real battle. I had already sent over a secure phone line the results of our discovery in the Projection Room. Apparently, that was the spark that lit the ‘bomb.’

“General Obadea told me two days ago, after he came back from Bucharest, that the members of The Supreme Council for Protecting the Country were in a continuous meeting and keeping in touch with us. After talking out the issue beforehand, they decided to make this tremendous discovery from Romania’s mountains known all over the world. General Obadea was part of The Supreme Council for Protecting the Country’s structure and his word counted a lot in favor of the declaration that Romania was to make to the whole world. He told me there were some members of The Supreme Council for Protecting the Country that were strongly against it, but they were in the minority. The emotions got so high that, at one point, those people stood up and left the room. The President’s advisors were continually coming and going, transferring information from the External Diplomatic Relations Office to The Supreme Council for Protecting the Country meeting.

“When the American diplomats were informed that Romania would make an international announcement of crucial importance for the whole world, everything turned to chaos. The General told me that he had never seen such a rush and panic among diplomats. Nobody knew the cause but everybody suspected something very serious and important was happening. At one point, the Romanian president was called to have a direct phone conversation with the White House. That was a very special and top secret discussion. He did not come back for a long time after that, but he informed everyone that a top American diplomatic delegation was already on its way to Bucharest.

“The information spread very fast. All the transactions and deals between the Romanian state and international financial organizations were blocked in a couple of hours. The declaration of a state of emergency in the mountain area was expected any moment. The Ministry of Defense gave an order of general alert for the officers. There were moments of great panic and even terror among those involved in this operation as no one knew the real cause creating the current tension.

“The discussions between the American officials and the Romanian officials took place without an interpreter. They were so violent that they were many moments of crisis when the diplomats yelled at each other as loudly as they could, uttering multiple threats with measures of retaliation. The good part was that the other states of the world had not found out about that problem yet. The Americans knew very well there were other powerful countries that would take Romania’s side in sustaining its declaration.”

“What did they want to declare?” I asked curiously.

“Mainly, it would have contained the most important data of the discovery made in the Bucegi Mountains, giving evidence to the whole world such as pictures and other essentials elements in order to clarify different aspects connected to this structure from inside the mountain. The greatest scientists would have been invited to study and search and all the resources would have been mobilized to solve the numerous enigmas we were confronted with. But the most important aspect would have been the discoveries regarding the extreme ancient past of humankind and the real history that was almost entirely fabricated. Furthermore, there were other very delicate elements that I can only reveal to you partially.”

“But, where did they know all that from?” I asked.

“You will see immediately. Have a little bit more patience. The Americans reacted violently as the declaration would have shattered their planetary influence in a second. Even more, it could have thrown into chaos the economy of their country, maybe even the economy of the whole world. Actually, that was the main reason they invoked strong-arm tactics. They wanted to avoid the panic and disturbance of all the people on Earth. However, they did not suspect that the possible social anguish and disturbed condition might have appeared as a direct result of the lies and manipulations the ruling classes, especially the Masonic organizations, have been maintaining all this time.

“Through a very special diplomatic channel, a personal Papal approach was received, advising towards great temperance before making this fundamental step for humankind. The Vatican had already been informed by the Americans as it was considered by the latter a possible ally in blocking the revelations. Strangely, although revealing these aspects to the whole world would have reduced considerably the Vatican's power and its influence upon Christian believers, the Pope did not take a firm position against it, but he urged instead for an efficient balancing of pros and cons before presenting the declaration. He even communicated he would put at the Romanian State's disposal certain ancient documents from the Secret Archives of the Papal administration that are very important for Romania and support the proofs of the discovery in the mountains.

"Finally, after two hours of discussion and consultation, a final collaboration agreement was reached, with precise terms that balanced the interests of both countries. I cannot tell you these terms but I know the Romanian state's position was that of postponing the revelations or of presenting them to the whole world gradually in the future. The next day, after things had calmed down a little bit and according to the collaboration agreement between the two countries, an American commando team arrived promptly with all the necessary logistics that you already saw inside the base. The two generals and the national security problems advisor came back with them, probably having very clear tasks. According to the understood protocol, the strictest security, protection and surveillance measures were taken that were developed in the following days. That is why you will not have access in some areas in the Projection Room, but I will tell you shortly what has been found there."

THE PROJECTION ROOM

Cezar told me to step forward. The Big Gallery ended suddenly in a gigantic room inside of the mountain. It was about 30 meters high and approximately 100 meters long. The Projection Room, which was practically enclosed by the energy shield, had smaller dimensions than those of the mountain room. Its height was about 20 meters, maybe even more. It appeared large to me. There were about seven or eight meters straight from one end of the hall to the energy shield. This distance was edged by two borders of the same material that wrapped the hall. The borders went ahead and up to the shield which was as wide as the hall. Four electrical vehicles were placed on each side of them.

Excited, I stepped out of the hall onto the short track area edged by the borders. This seemed to be the moment of truth. I was to get inside the heart of a mystery kept for tens of thousands of years and thus be one of the few to have had access to the revelation of its enigma.

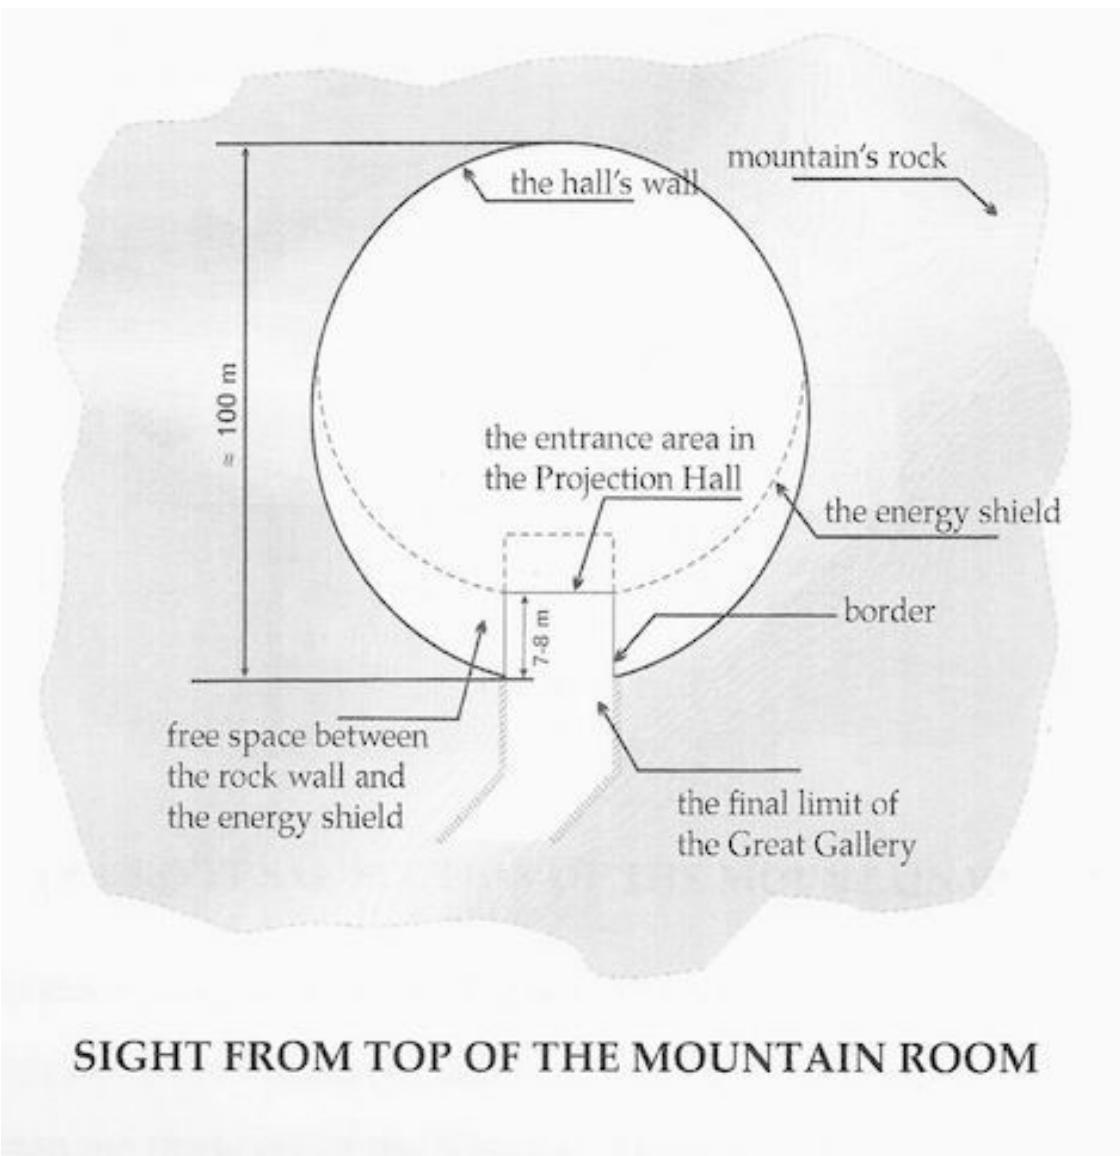

“The energy shield’s role is to divide the room, like a wall, from the rest of the cavity in the mountain and also to protect from exterior bad influences,” said Cezar, making me return from my thoughts. “It has only one way of unconditioned access, like a door, right in front of you.”

Indeed. As soon as I got closer to the energy wall, the part of the shield that was limited by the two borders became transparent and then disappeared completely, thus precisely marking the contour of an entrance of almost five meters high. I stepped inside the big room, followed closely by Cezar.

Behind us, the shield became compact. Cezar explained to me that this was the only way of access into the room. In any other part of the shield they tried, it would reject any penetration attempt. Yet, any organic or inorganic matter that would touch it would neither get damaged nor be able to go through it. The shield was like a perfect holographic projection but its consistency was pure energy, leaving the same impression of life like the material that wrapped the hallway. Inside, the surface of the shield was no longer blue but golden-white, reflecting a clear and bright light that would not tire the eyes at all. I noticed that, unlike the big room in the mountain that contained it, the Projection Room was almost circular. I contemplated the huge space which appeared to me to be as gigantic as the cosmos due to a strange optical effect. The ground was covered by the same material such as the one in the Big Gallery, but here the special light made wonderful turquoise shadows reflect into it. I had the feeling I was in a different world. Almost nothing I saw corresponded to the usual values and dimensions of the civilization I lived in and was used to.

The area behind us was diametrically opposed to the place we were and had caught my eye from the beginning. Half of its circumference was shared with the rocky mountain wall. The energy shield would not touch the ground just like at the entrance but curved like an arch until ten meters high from the ground and ended half way. Thus, the Projection Room had the back half of the circumference covered by the rocky mountain wall.

SIGHT FROM TOP OF THE MOUNTAIN ROOM

SIGHT FROM TOP OF THE MOUNTAIN ROOM

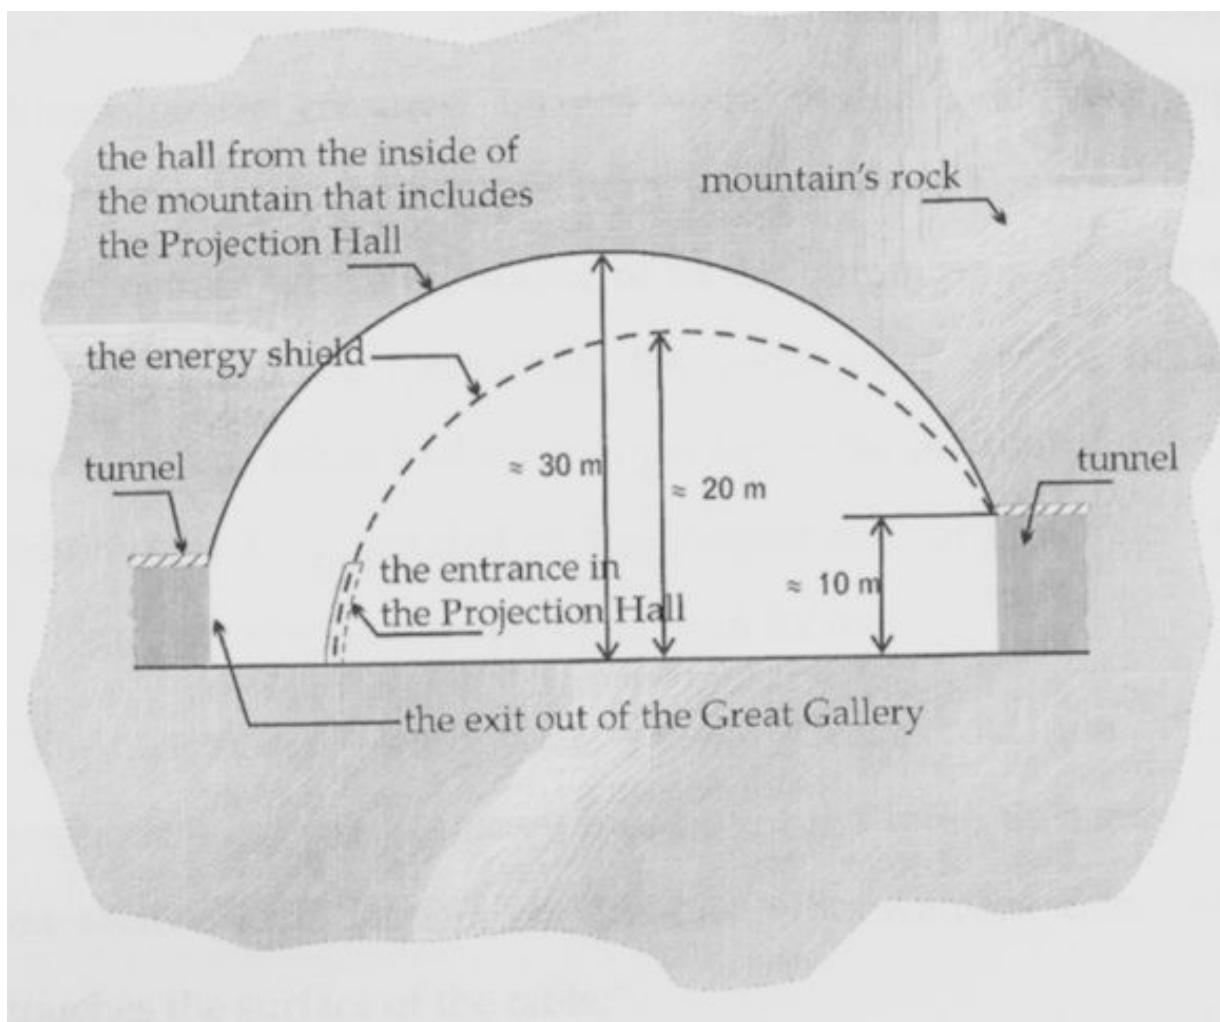

In that heavy rock wall of ten or twelve meters high, I saw a display of three huge tunnel entrances: one right in front and the other two symmetrically on each side. They were vaguely lit by a green light. From that distance, I could not clearly notice the details although I saw other devices were around each of the three tunnels. Still, I noticed each of the tunnels was guarded by two soldiers like at the entrance in the Big Gallery. Puzzled, I turned towards Cezar.

“Did you install security systems here, too? Why? Where do these tunnels go?”

"This is the area to which you do not have access. It is strictly forbidden through the secret protocol signed between the Romanian state and the United States. I can give you some general information about this, but certain things should remain secret, at least for some time from now. Let's start from here," Cezar said, pointing somewhere at my right.

I turned and saw a line of huge T-shaped tables made of stone and lined up against the wall, following its curve. None of these tables were shorter than two meters high.

TRANSVERSAL SECTION OF THE MOUNTAIN ROOM

Different signs of an unknown writing that looked like ancient arrow-headed characters were cut three dimensionally into the thickness of the table top. There was only one such line of signs on each table's width. The writing was complicated, but it also contained general symbols like triangles and circles. Although the signs were not painted, they would still be noticeable due to a slight luminous radiation, differently colored for each table.

There were five tables on each side of the room. On some of them I could see different objects of unknown use. They looked like technical tools for scientific use. Several white translucent wires descended from many of them, gathering in rectangular boxes situated outside the table and on the ground. The boxes were made of a shiny silver metal that could not be scratched. I tried to move one of them but it was too well anchored in the ground. The delicate cables were extremely flexible and light, and inside you could see small bright impulses that would “slide” along their whole length.

Two of the tables were empty, covered by a thin layer of orange dust. Cezar told me they drew samples from it that had been sent for preliminary analysis to the lab inside the base, but they had not received any results. But the real surprise was the distinct element that made the research team give the name “Projection Room” to that huge mountain room. When I passed by a table, a holographic projection, presenting aspects from a certain scientific domain, was simultaneously activated on its surface. The three dimensionally colored images were perfect and very big, almost two and a half meters high.

Because the tables were tall, I could not see where the source of the hologram projections was. I found out from Cezar that the rectangular surface of the smooth stone tables had a tight opening in the middle that was several centimeters long and parallel to the longest side of the table. The holographic projections appeared from there.

“The technology used was great,” said Cezar. “The projections appear by themselves, but at the same time, they are interactive and depend on the one who watches them and touches the surface of the table.”

I went to a table that had some three-legged steps brought by the base teams, and I went up a couple of steps until my body was above the table. It was almost five meters long and one and a half meters wide. It was covered by a film made of a glass-like material which was not transparent but dark. I could see my head and my body reflecting as in a mirror on the surface of that shiny, dark and blue smoky film.

The film was split into several big squares marked by straight horizontal and vertical lines that formed a kind of a frame. The rays that formed the hologram went out the central slot in a perfectly coherent beam. Apparently, its domain was biology as images of plants and animals scrolled in front of my eyes, some of them being totally unknown to me. I slightly touched one of the squares which was the biggest, and the hologram began presenting the anatomical structure of the human body. Actually, I soon realized it was my body because of a certain mark I had on my arm. Although I was not moving, I saw the holographic images of certain areas of my body, spinning continuously and being presented from different angles. If I lifted the finger off that square, the images of plants and animals would reappear. If I moved the finger inside the square, the image would read the inside of my body, thus offering the projection of my internal organs according to my finger's position on the surface of the square. I noticed that moving the finger in a certain way magnified the examined area.

My amazement was boundless as I zoomed into extremely tiny dimensions, passing over individual cells, their nucleus and reaching the molecular area. I thought I was dreaming but I really saw a molecule that was part of my own liver and was shown in a huge dimension. In a few moments, I had gone way beyond even the most dared dreams of the modern scientists. The image presented a kind of cloud of energy that changed its color continuously, probably because of energetic changes that took place in real time; but in its different points I noticed a kind of condensation, linked by a kind of bridge that vibrated continuously. I thought that maybe those were the molecular chains. When I zoomed into the nuclear area, the image caught one of the atoms but it became unstable and blocked. I then saw what I thought to be an atom as a vague energy mist with a very small bright center/heart.

Amazed, I touched other squares. Each time I touched one, the square lit in orange and signs of the unknown writing appeared inside of it. Fascinated, I went over several squares, watching the incredible projections of life on other celestial bodies. I noticed that if I simultaneously touched two surfaces of two different squares, the holographic image would render a very complex scientific analysis, presenting the DNA molecules of those beings and the compatible possibilities between them. The images were accompanied by sideways vertical lines of that strange writing which were probably observations, comments or indications regarding the analysis made. These were dynamic and presented in a series as the possible phases of mixing the two life forms. In the end, the most probable mutant form appeared as a combination of genetic data.

I went down the stairs shaking. My mind refused to think coherently. Strange thoughts appeared in my mind, like I was being set up or everything was a dream. Realizing what was happening to me, Cezar gradually clammed down on my paranoid tendencies that had been triggered by the very strong shock I had felt as a result of the advanced technology I had accessed in such a very short period of time. After a couple of minutes, I recovered. “You can spend years here without getting bored!” I exclaimed. “I almost cannot believe they reached such an advanced technological level. Who were they? You must know.”

When Cezar answered, he was very serious.

“No matter how weird it would seem to you, we have had no clue up to this moment. It is as if they wanted to leave us this invaluable treasure but did not want us to know who they were. The only aspect we can suspect is that they were probably very tall. We cannot otherwise explain the gigantic dimensions of some objects in here. You can be proud though that you have been the first to thoroughly investigate the ‘biology’ table for the last fifty thousand years.

“I was impressed by the crossing method. It is interesting as our researchers have not found the method of simultaneously touching two squares yet. It is also true that we had to do a lot of things in a very short period of time. In the end, there have been five or six days since we got into this room and only three days of actual studying.”

We went further. On each side of the room, half way, there were five huge tables situated seven meters away from the energy shield. I passed over each quickly as Cezar told me my presence there was limited. Besides, the fact that I was there was the result of a really special request of General Obadea that even Cezar could not have made.”

There were five Romanians and three Americans in the Projection Room. The three giant tunnels from behind the room were each guarded by a pair of soldiers while two officers secured the over all surveillance of the room.

“The instruction is that they do not touch or move anything when they are alone,” Cezar explained to me.

“All right, but what are they protecting here? Better said, from whom?” I asked.

“This is protocol. In addition, as I told you, there are some elements I cannot tell you but they are linked to these secure measures.”

I continued my rapid investigations over each table. There were projections from physics, cosmology, astronomy, architecture, technology, religion, and a domain representing the characteristics of several races of intelligent beings that did not look entirely human. I quickly understood the information was so vast that many groups of researchers needed several years to study it continuously without fear of finishing it. Everything seemed to be a great library of the universe, brilliantly synthesized by an enigmatic civilization that was extremely advanced technically and spiritually.

I then went towards the center of the room where a two and a half meter high kind of platform stood. There were five steps to ease the access to its surface. The whole building was made of the same material that could be found in the big gallery. I climbed up the stairs together with Cezar and we reached a device that looked like a shielded circular cabin that was made of a transparent material. It was three and a half meters high and one and a half meters wide. Actually, it was half of a cylinder with several complicated installations inside. A kind of platform bulged out from its wall a third of the way up from the base and some metal wires with sensors at the end were placed higher.

“We have come to the conclusion that this represents a mental emission installation,” said Cezar. “A possible thought amplifier or true ‘mind machine.’ It is clearly structured according to the dimensions of its builders. The metal sensors you see higher up would fit perfectly on the head of a three and a half meter high man that sits down on the platform.

Unfortunately, I have not had the possibility of understanding how it works yet. Certain adaptations must be made, but several American transportation vehicles will arrive soon that carry the latest technology and teams of specialists who can begin to systematically research the whole place."

"Do you know the purpose they used this for?" I asked with great interest.
"I think it was very important since it is in the middle of the room."

"It is true, but we cannot know its true use yet. It is likely that the person who connected to these sensors inside of the cylinder was capable of controlling great mental energies and conducting them correspondingly, but it is impossible for me to be sure of the target of those energies for now."

We got off the platform and went further on, leaving the stage behind. At about fifteen meters away on the same central line, I saw what could be called a control panel. It was not very big but was square with a side of about one meter and was sustained by one central leg coming out of the floor. I could not see very well what was on top of it as it was pretty high. Like all the other objects in the room, it was a little bit above my head.

Utilizing another three-legged stairway, I went up a couple of steps. I was amazed by the way things had been put together. It was very complicated, leaving the impression of a projection network of computer plaques. What we call buttons were represented by differently colored geometrical symbols. I noticed mostly triangles, squares and spirals. Two parallel slots were situated in the middle of the panel. Coming out of the slots were two twenty centimeter long metallic levers that could be compared to two handles. They were both in the down position at the base of the slots and it was clear they could slide up and down. What really caught my eye was a big square placed on the right side of the board towards the bottom corner. A red "button," represented by a circle and much bigger than the rest of the signs on the board, was placed in the middle. With a diameter of about ten centimeters, the so-called button was surrounded by a series of complicated signs that seemed to be part of the same unknown writing. It was the only area on the board that contained such a sign.

Cezar, who was watching me from downstairs, asked me to avoid touching anything on the board, especially the red "button," but he did suggest passing the palm of my hand over the square containing the circle. I did what he asked me right away and a huge holographic image appeared in front of me. It was about two meters away from the board and represented the Earth viewed from about twenty-five kilometers away in the atmosphere. I was touched when I recognized the Carpathian mountain chain and its specific curve, but I was surprised to notice a flow of huge quantities of water towards plains and fields until, eventually, the ground became clear. Then, the projection of the silver square with the big red button on it overlapped the holographic image. The button blinked alternatively while the signals on the side changed fast with varying colors. I saw how big streams of water, like giant rivers, appeared from everywhere inside of the territory that now includes the entirety of Romania, a big part of Hungary and the Ukraine, flowing towards the mountains and the Transylvania Platform.

The image then zoomed in and I saw how, in a brief period of time, the whole of Romania became practically a new sea from which you could only see some mountain tops or small pieces of land as islands. In that moment, the projection of the red button square settled on the image of the hologram without blinking. Immediately after that, the projection of the two central slots with handles from the board appeared on the left, the handles sliding down slowly. I was simultaneously watching how waters started to back out from the territory of our country. Strangely, they went south towards one point only and that I located somewhere in the Retezat Mountain, most probably in the Godeanu Mountains area. The whole quantity of water drained into the ground there and Romania's territory looked dry again with the geological formations we know today. Still, in the curving area of the Carpathians and at a certain distance from them towards the east, in the territory known today as Vrancea, I noticed a dark area of about thirty kilometers but could not understand what it represented. In addition, the Danube Delta did not exist anymore and also, instead of the Black Sea, a huge platform laid towards the Middle East.

In that moment, the holographic image disappeared as suddenly as it appeared. Astonished, I looked at Cezar.

“They even left us an ‘instruction booklet,’ didn’t they?” he said laughing. “The procedure is similar for all the other buttons and commands on the board, but I particularly wanted you to see what could happen when the red button was touched. Apparently, however, there is a security system.

The research team has identified a series of three complicated steps that need to be completed on the control desk so that the pressing of the red button produces the flood and the disaster you briefly watched. The way ‘they’ teach us is very practical, easy and intuitive. We suspect these devices maintain, in a way that is totally unknown to us so far, the essential energetic balance of the tectonic area of Romania. You have just seen the disaster that can happen if this equilibrium is affected.”

Astounded, I nodded. We then went further and towards the end of the room. There, I saw some tall metallic devices placed on the sides of the room behind the T-shaped tables. They looked like antennas as there were different metallic branches with complicated shapes emerging laterally from them. Cezar told me that nobody was aware of the use of those giant devices.

We reached a very big square that was bordered by the floor material and was about ten meters away from the control desk. The side of the square measured three meters and its almost smooth surface was golden yellow. In the middle, there was a small dome of about fifteen centimeters high with a slot on top. A vessel like an ancient amphora, about half a meter high, was in front of the dome.

“The content of the amphora represents one of the strong points of the discovery.” Cezar explained.

“Personally, I think this is what the venerable Massini wanted so much for him and the Masonic elite.”

The amphora had neither patterns nor inscriptions. It was made of a special reddish metal and did not have handles. The elegant lid did not allow the contents to be seen. Cezar lifted it and then, bending forward, I could see a very fine white glowing dust inside. Curiously, the interior walls were discretely lit by a blue light that emphasized the almost magical flashes of the white dust.

“A sample of it was analyzed,” explained Cezar. “The American researchers were puzzled to discover that it represented an unknown crystalline structure of monatomic gold. This is a derivative of gold which is bright white and the atoms are placed in a two-dimensional network as opposed to common gold which is yellow and has atoms placed in a three-dimensional network. The monatomic gold dust is very difficult to obtain, especially in a very high purity, as is described in some ancient texts and the few genuine alchemy references from the Middle East. Practically speaking, modern science has not been able to obtain the extraordinarily pure monatomic gold dust. Even so, incredible therapeutic effects, especially regarding regenerative capacity, have been noticed on living tissues. That is why there are still a few sources of information concerning the technology for obtaining the monatomic gold. An American scientist told me that NASA was very interested in that and huge sums of money had been invested into researching it.”

I had never heard about monatomic gold up to that moment and its use was not very clear to me.

“But why are some persons so interested in this dust?” I asked Cezar. “Did you tell Signore Massini about the existence of the gold dust?”

“The venerable one knew about it before entering here. I do not know how and from where the Masonic elite had such sources of information, but they surely heard about it before this discovery. I myself wondered why Signore Massini was so interested in getting it. I talked with both our scientists and the American ones who seemed to know something about it.”

THE INTERIOR PLAN OF THE PROJECTION ROOM

“They told me that, in its pure form, it strongly stimulated certain energetic flows and exchanges at the cellular level and particularly at the neuronal one. In other words, it produces a much accelerated rejuvenation process. They said that, theoretically, one could live in the same physical body for thousands of years if one consumed a well determined quantity of that dust periodically. It is mind-blowing and almost unbelievable for the condition and mentality of the present individual, but this explains many enigmatical aspects in humankind’s history, aspects about the incredible longevity of some important figures; and it also clarifies the hidden intentions of the Masonic elite.”

Surprisingly, my tongue failed me. I was sticking fast and waiting for further explanations from Cezar.

“Modern technology does not allow us to obtain the purity of the monatomic gold dust which is needed to start the general energetic process of rejuvenating the body. Furthermore, the lab results of the sample have shown that the gold atoms lay in a flat network but are also combined with the atoms of another element which is unknown on Earth. This complicates the situation even more as we cannot know what other characteristics the dust has besides the ones mentioned in the ancient texts that the researchers totally ignore.”

Cezar told me to step on the surface of the square and in front of the little dome over its middle.

“If you think something can further impress you, this will be one of the greatest surprises you can have in this room,” he joked.

I then witnessed a huge hologram with moving elements projected from the slot of the dome. I quickly understood these projections were main aspects of the extremely ancient past of humanity.

Although it was a brief rendition of our ancient past, it included information concerning the hidden origin of Mankind. I clearly realized the mistake of Darwin’s theory of evolution. Its fundamental error was not the enforced idea but the ignorance. Precise elements happened on Earth so long ago, elements that I saw rendered in an exceptionally intelligent and profoundly intuitive synthesis. My legs sank under me with emotion and I kneeled as I watched the true images of the most important events in Man's history, including its real origin which creates so many disputes to this day.

Unfortunately, I was not allowed to write in this book certain essential aspects of our planet's past that I had watched in a compact version. These events were rendered exactly the way they happened tens and hundreds of thousands of years before. This was the condition Cezar asked me to keep in order to respect the terms of the top secret mutual agreement between Romania and the United States.

I honestly confess that, according to my judgment, ninety percent of what is officially known today on the history of humankind is fake and fabricated. It is truly unbelievable that what is considered to have really happened is mostly a lie. On the other hand, the myths and legends that fill the story books, considered by most people to be a product of bubbly imagination, are almost true in many respects. This strange "inversion" has caused many problems and disputes between people throughout time. The majority of archaeologists' and researchers' ideas and suppositions are wrong even though various proofs are sometimes so obvious that they should change their misled opinions. Some of their "fantasies," such as the hilarious theory of the dinosaurs' disappearance 65 million years ago or considering that the old continents of Atlantis and Lemuria are a myth, are now completely shattered because I saw very clearly, then and there, how things really happened! But for many researchers, it is probably more comfortable to soundly "sleep" instead of accepting the challenge of the unknown and admitting their limits.

From time to time, the holographic projection held the image of the event when an important moment in time was reached. In the background, the map of the sky could be seen and the positions of the main stars and constellations of that time were marked. Cezar explained that the stars proved to be a very simple method of historical determination. All that the savants needed to do was then overlap the positions of those stars on their actual ones and thus ascertain the periods of time when those events actually happened.

The problem was that the time period covered by the holograms was huge: several hundreds of thousands of years. The Earth's precession cycle of 25,920 years brings the constellations, in their relative position to our planet, to the same spot at periods of time that are a multiple of 26,000 years each. The key was to follow the holographic projection from beginning to end and then calculate how many “platonic years” (of approximately 26,000 years each) are thus marked out. For example, we could draw the conclusion that the construction in the Bucegi Mountains was built about 50-55,000 years ago because the image of the Great Gallery and of the main room was projected, with all the objects inside as we found them, having on the background the position of the constellations towards the Earth. After that, the image appeared one more time, as a guide, representing the passing of two precession periods of the equinoxes.

The “lessons” were easy and yet extremely upsetting due to their content. I saw the truth about the Egyptian civilization and the way the big Egyptian structures were built, truth that is totally different from the stupidities claimed today by Egyptologists. I saw what really happened during the Big Flood as well as the germs of the human civilization that followed it and how they later populated Europe, Asia and Africa. I have not been allowed to disclose these aspects yet as they imply realities much too shocking for the mentality, ideas and knowledge of the contemporary man.

At first, I thought that the holographic projection would show only the past of humankind, starting from its origins until the moment that the construction in Bucegi was made. I then saw the projections presenting the main historical aspects of the evolution of different races on our planet up to the Fifth Century A.D. That meant either that the giants who built the whole structure inside the mountain were good masters of accessing the time cliches or — and this situation looks more probable due to the huge period of time covered by the holographic projection — they mysteriously “updated” the source of holographic information. Apparently, the last such update took place around 500 A.D. No one knew, however, the reason why the historical information stopped at that time.

I saw, in a dramatic course of images, the life of Jesus and His crucifixion, denied by some even nowadays. I have to say that a lot of amazing things happened then, things that are much more astonishing than what the Gospels present. The projections also revealed many of the persons who attended the crucifixion of Jesus on the hill, people who were not from that time but who came there from other historical periods. Those human beings, who had the same clothes as the Jewish present there, had totally different features and that was the reason why they were hiding their face under the flow of the clothes.

The hologram also sequentially presented the lives and spiritual missions of certain exceptional persons who truly proved to possess amazing divine gifts. These persons were from the ancient past. I thus saw the deeds of great spiritual reformers from 18-20,000 years ago that we know nothing of. Back then, the social system and the distribution of people on the whole planet was totally different to what we know today. Archaeologists, anthropologists and historians should strongly reconsider their ideas and conceptions about those times.

There were so many elements that I witnessed, and they were presented in such a compact manner that I surely would require hundreds of pages to give an approximate description. Still, the holographic projection lasted an hour and a half only. The two officers who were protecting the room and the six soldiers who were standing at the entrances of the tunnels were all astonished as they watched the images, even if it was not the first time they had watched them. After the hologram disappeared, I remained still, staring.

Later, Cezar told me it was time to go back to the base as my access time to the Projection Room had reached its limit. I looked straight ahead. The giant and almost scary entrances of the three enigmatic tunnels in the mountain wall were the only areas left to explore beyond the square I was still standing on. They were about twenty meters away. In front of each of them, at about six or eight meters away, other control desks could be seen. They were similar to the one placed in the middle of the hall but smaller than that.

I asked Cezar what was the extraordinary mystery behind these three tunnels. He explained that he could not reveal too much concerning this aspect. What he did tell me was that what they found out about the giant mountain tunnels was due to some holographic projections from each tunnels' control desk. The only aspect he could reveal was that the three tunnels were heading towards three different areas on Earth for thousands of kilometers.

The left one connected to Egypt in a secret place under the sand. This was next to Cairo on the Giza Plateau and was located between the Sphinx and the Great Pyramid. It has not been discovered yet.

The right one connected to a similar structure inside of a mountain placed on the Tibetan Plateau. This one was smaller though and not so complex. Secondary ramifications of the latter tunnel led towards an area under Buzau, close to the Carpathians' curve, and then towards a subterranean assembly in Iraq that is close to Baghdad. The latter also had a secondary ramification that led to the Gobi Plateau in Mongolia.

According to what Cezar told me, the third tunnel, the one placed in the middle of the Projection Room, represents a worldwide secret that the U.S. wanted to keep strictly for itself.

At that moment, neither Cezar nor General Obadea knew any new elements of the Romanian-American discussion. It was, however, obvious that the “exchange” was advantageous for both sides. Knowing the Masons’ terrible political influence and Signore Massini’s relations with the political structures of the two countries, we could suspect that there would be a gradual attempt to “take over” the control of the base by factors that were exterior to the interests of our government.

Cezar told me that there are very important persons in our political and administrative system who, quite fortunately, know about the abominable practices of the Masons and are strongly opposed to their influence, especially with regards to taking over the great discovery in the Bucegi Mountains. He then told me that the central tunnel leads towards the interior and even beyond the crust of the Earth but would not give further details.

Cezar noticed that the holographic images corresponding to the giant corridor from inside the mountain were almost unbelievable but, at the same time, they offered a possible answer to the origin of the structure we were in and of those who built it. Before leaving the room, Cezar told me that very secret and intense preparations for certain expeditions were on their way: first, through the tunnel towards Egypt, then towards Tibet and finally, the big expedition inside of the Earth via the middle tunnel.

As a direct result of the bilateral Romanian-American discussions, it was decided to form a team of the best sixteen men, six Americans and ten Romanians. The leadership was assigned to Cezar who was thus advanced to the rank of colonel. He explained that the rank was important, especially in regard to the team's psychological context. The departure would be at the end of September 2003 as the preparations for the expedition were complex. Cezar did not tell me anything about what was in those tunnels, but their structure was different from that of the Great Gallery. He did not tell me anything about the way they would move through the tunnels, taking into consideration the fact that thousands of kilometers were to be traversed. Finally and unfortunately, he did not give me any details about the holographic images that corresponded to every destination target. Even so, I still consider that the elements presented here can lead us to think deep and to prepare for the times to come.

I have purposefully and obviously omitted certain specific data that can lead to identifying the mountain area where the big discovery was made. A year after my visit to that place, I still vividly recall the overwhelming impressions I had during those several hours when I was in that surreal environment created by the secret construction inside the Bucegi Mountains. Time's ancient mystery and the wisdom of those who managed to control it hang over that place, patiently waiting for tens of millenniums to the moment when we will find out the truth...

The End

Epilogue, Part I — by Peter Moon

You have just read a rather amazing tale that ends abruptly for the reader. It begs the reader to ask many more questions, and this is exactly how the original Romanian edition of the book, entitled The Enemy Within, ended.

It resulted in a rash of communications to the publisher from retired Romanian officials who validated different parts of the story which they knew to be true. Despite the remarkable nature of the findings, this story has remained largely unnoticed, particularly in America save for those with the highest of security clearances.

If the above does not convince you that there is considerable veracity to the story, I invite you to do your own study and analysis of the diplomatic relations between the United States and Romania. You will discover that the two countries have become political allies where they were not before. Not only has Romania become a member nation of NATO during this period, but their country was chosen as the site for a major NATO summit in recent times. None of this is a coincidence. Romania is now center stage in the most mysterious of ways. To the average citizen of Earth, however, it goes unnoticed.

Into this environment, I was invited to visit Romania courtesy of Dr. David Anderson on behalf of the World Genesis Foundation, a charitable organization affiliated with the United Nations that is dedicated to the proposition that no youth in the world will go without opportunity.

As I mentioned in the introduction to this book, I was contacted by David shortly after completing the negotiations to publish this book. I had not seen David in five years and, true to his word, he was now ready to work with me again. After accepting his invitation to visit Romania and attend the 2008 Atlantykron Conference on an island on the Danube River near the ruins at Capidava, David said that he encourages his guests to take a three day cultural tour of Romania as part of the trip. All of our communication was by email at this point, and I accepted his invitation. I asked him if I could get a video interview with him and also visit with Radu Cinamar. David indicated that these things could be arranged.

Eventually, in June, we had a rather lengthy telephone conversation. This was the first time I had spoken to David in years. Although I had many questions, this conversation was reserved primarily for the logistical aspects of my upcoming trip. As part of this, David asked me where I would like to go and what I would like to see while in Romania. I told him that I was eager to visit the Sphinx and also see the Hall of Records (the Projection Room). Dutifully noting this, he said that he would have his people get in touch with Radu Cinamar.

This gave me an excellent opportunity to ask him if he was aware of Radu's book which you have just read. He did not seem too sure what I was talking about at first, but as I gave him more information, he said that he knew what I was talking about but had not read the book.

I then asked him if he knew Radu. David was silent for a moment. The silence was short but deafening. He then indicated that he did not want to talk about that on the phone. It would be better if we spoke about that in Romania as there are certain presences that monitor phone conversations in the United States.

David then waxed nostalgic about the Danube and said that we could have a long conversation over a glass of wine while sitting on the banks of the river. He then stated that we have never had a real long and deep conversation and that he was looking forward to such. Needless to say, this made the trip sound very appealing. It was certainly more than I had hoped for. Personally, I did not really expect to see the Projection Hall as access to this area would require top security clearance even under the most routine of circumstances. I had a faint hope but no real expectations. It was, however, a very pleasant surprise to hear that David was planning to be so forthcoming.

While hoping that David could or would arrange a meeting for me with Radu, we both decided that I should write him a letter which I did. In this letter, I invited Radu to meet me at the Atlantykron conference. I was already keenly aware that my publisher's communications with Radu were only by special courier of Romania's secret service. My publisher, Sorin Hurmuz, has never met with Radu personally. I assumed and hoped that David could forward my letter through a more direct means. David said he would give this assignment to his people in order that I could meet Radu.

All of the attempts by David's people to contact Radu led them back to my publisher, Sorin, who was evidently the most direct way to contact him. I should point out, however, that these were David's people who were trying to contact Radu and not David himself. In any event, I soon received a very warm letter from Radu. It was to be the beginning of many dialogues.

Radu was pleased that I was publishing his first book in America, but he said that he could not attend Atlantykron for security reasons. He also apologized that he could not provide more proof for his claims in terms of pictures. As he works in the Occult Department of the Romanian Secret Service, these matters are top secret. Although Cezar Brad approved his letter to me, he was advised that he should not stir things up too much if he wanted to keep his job and to continue publishing his books.

Radu also stated that he had read the Montauk books as early as 1996 and that both he and Cezar spotted a connection between those and their work in Department Zero. This has to do with time travel to the First Century during the life of Jesus.*

Personally, I found it fascinating that Cezar even knew who I was. They had obviously read the Montauk books long before the discovery in the Bucegi Mountains and the first public presence of David Anderson in Romania which was in 1999 at Atlantykron.

Radu told me that he would send me an audio CD in an electronically disguised voice that would give me further information. This was sanctioned by Cezar and Radu wanted an address to send it to. Realizing that I would be in Romania in less than two months, I suggested that he give it to our common publisher, Sorin Hurmuz, who was already coming to Atlantykron to meet me. I knew that snail mail between America and Romania could have taken longer than my expected arrival in their country.

When I next spoke to David on the phone, he suggested that Radu might show up at Atlantykron but in a disguise. I had already considered this possibility, but there is no indication that he eventually did. As I danced around with David about Radu, without having an actual conversation about him, David said that he thought something very interesting was going to come out of all this.

In order to have a video record of my trip, David allowed me to take a cinematographer with me. As local friends of mine could not go, I was able to get an out-of-town friend, Tantra Bensko, to go with me. She has had lots of experience shooting and starring in short movies which are often quite comical. Tantra has also done some professional videos on the subject of tantra. She would also come in handy as an interdimensional explorer who can read auras and is very sensitive.

I heard from David again the night before our departure. He wanted to make sure everything was arranged for our trip. This was all business except for one point. The night before we took off, my friend Penelope was buzzed by three black helicopters that came right down over her house in New York City. It was conspicuous and the whole experience was rather bizarre. She is very close to David psychically and once saw him appear "out of time" in 1975. In ordinary time, she met him on the same night in 1999 when I did. When I told David about this, he laughed and said they were there to make sure I arrived safely. He was making a joke. I mention the black helicopters as another would make its presence known in Romania.

After a somewhat arduous trip by reason of unscheduled travel delays, we arrived in Bucharest, the capital of Romania, just around midnight. We were given VIP treatment as soon as we got off the plane. Separated from the other passengers, we were given our luggage and whisked through customs which also happened to be empty. We were then greeted by a representative of Atlantykron and introduced to Dr. Joel Castellanos who would be our travelling companion for our cultural tour of Romania.

I was then put on the phone with our sponsor from the World Genesis Foundation who is a partner of David's. He had arranged for a taxi to our hotel in the mountain town of Sinaia and for a tour guide the next morning. Each one of us was then put on the phone with David who welcomed us to Romania. It was all very exciting with great anticipation. We were scheduled to meet up with him at Atlantykron three days later.

As Tantra and I met our new friend, Joel, there was plenty of conversation and the two plus hour drive to Sinaia went by in no time. As I stated in the prologue, this is where things began to go off the rails. Arriving at our hotel well after 2:00 a.m., our rooms had been sold out from under us and we had no place to stay. Phone calls between our very competent taxi driver and our sponsor resulted in many excursions around the town and visiting with one of their contacts outside of his house. All conversations were in Romanian so we had no idea what was going on. Finally, I was put on the phone with our sponsor whereupon I was informed, if I accepted, that we would be driven high into the alps where we would stay in a resort. It was the only place available at that hour.

As a result, we never had a tour guide and had a memorable but very rough and adventurous “cultural tour” which really amounted to no cultural tour at all. It was a struggle to survive in a foreign country. Despite these difficulties, we had at least one day to enjoy the cultural tour. This was a relief because I would be able to achieve the main thing I wanted from the cultural tour: a visit to the Romanian Sphinx.

In order to see the Sphinx, we learned that we would have to ascend the alps via a cable car which would take us above the tree line. As Tantra has problems with depth perception, it was deemed not a good idea for her to go. Fortunately, my new friend Joel was up for the trip and he joined me. I would have to serve as my own cinematographer.

Getting to the Sphinx was challenging as we had to negotiate how to ride the bus to the small mountain town of Busteni. Once there, we had to wait almost two hours to get on the single cable car which makes the trip.

Eventually, we did arrive and came to a magnificent setting. The hills are filled with tundra grass reminiscent of where Julie Andrews stood in The Sound of Music. The area is filled with astonishing megaliths of which Babele and the Sphinx are the most famous and are pictured elsewhere in this book. Besides these structures, there are other interesting megaliths as well.

As mists of clouds came over us and departed, I dedicated my first two hours in the mountains to getting shots of various megaliths, especially the Sphinx itself. Due to the clouds, there were alternating periods of overcast darkness and beautiful sunlight. It was a day I will never forget due to the wonderful energy of the place.

When I first came upon the Sphinx, I did not even recognize it. The most unique aspect about it is that it only appears as a Sphinx from different angles. Some angles are distinctly different.

Looking at the right profile, it looks like a man with an ancient Dacian helmet. If you look at the left profile of the Sphinx, particularly with a telescopic lens, there are the distinct features of a cat or lion. There also appears to be the etching of a Madonna like woman to the left of the cat's whiskers. If you go up close, it is not so noticeable. I have been told that this is the genius of its construction. It has also been suggested to me that what remains of this Sphinx are only remnants of a more artistic version.

Whatever the actual story of the Sphinx is, including what role wind erosion has played, it is the most visited tourist attraction in Romania.

Joel was extremely helpful to me and also took an excellent photo of me lining up my tripod and camera about twenty-five yards away from the Sphinx. After I got all the photographic angles I could of the Sphinx, it was now time to play. I was going to ask the Sphinx a question. For those of you who know anything about myths or the esoteric properties of a sphinx, this creature represents the riddle of existence. I therefore went in between what best represented the paws of the Sphinx and offered it the foremost riddle in my mind. In esoteric myth, the area between the paws is the most sacred and mysterious. The question I asked was very simple. What was the connection between David Anderson and Radu Cinamar's remarkable story?

I then went about exploring the rest of the immediate area which included the other megaliths. There are hiking trails that one can take and even cabins one can stay in, but they are about eight miles away. There is also a huge antenna station and a few other installations. One person in the government told me that the major ley line in that area of Europe runs within one hundred yards to the west of the Sphinx and Babele. After a long and exhilarating afternoon, Joel and I had to wait another hour or two before we could take the last cable car back.

The next morning, all three of us were picked up by a driver who would take us on a four hour drive to Capidava, an area of ancient ruins, where we would embark on a small boat that would take us to the small island in the Danube where Atlantyron is held.

Before we actually went to Atlantykron, we were taken to a nuclear facility in a small town where we met our Romanian sponsor who is also David's partner. He took us out to lunch at a sidewalk cafe. The most interesting thing he said was that black helicopters had circled the island on the first day of Atlantykron. Although he worked for the Romanian government, it was a mystery to him as there was no obvious purpose. As he is well-placed in the government, it was obviously not a regular or polite maneuver as they could or should have notified him.

It was at this meal where I experienced what was the funniest moment on the trip. As our meals were served, flies began to descend toward Joel's plate. Swatting away the flies, he spoke.

"There were not all these flies in Transylvania!" he said.

"That is because Renfield ate them all!" I replied.

The taxi driver, who spoke halfway decent English, burst out laughing and did not stop for a while.

Renfield, of course, is the character played by Dwight Frye in the original Dracula movie. Once bitten by the vampire, Renfield ate flies and this fact was exaggerated in the movie. The driver, as do very many Romanians, know this movie very well. Joel had never heard of Renfield, and I had to explain why it was funny. I made the joke for the benefit of Joel but it was the driver who got it.

After our meal, we were taken to the small boat and took the ten minute journey to the little island. After depositing our luggage on a large house boat, we went to an area of tables when David suddenly appeared. He was in the middle of a task, but he stopped by and said hello. It was the first time I had seen him in five years and it was a wonderful reunion. He explained that he would be mostly busy the next few days with a project so would not have time for any in depth discussion for a while. He was, however, around at meal times and we often ate dinner together on the upper deck of one of the house boats.

During one of our first dinners, we were talking about my Bulgarian publishers who I had invited to visit me while I was at Atlantykron. David had invited them to make contact and they consulted him on travel arrangements and accommodations on the island. On the subject of Bulgaria, David recalled once being at a meeting with Preston Nichols, myself and a Bulgarian at a hotel in Melville, Long Island. I thought this was very bizarre as I have never been with a Bulgarian at any hotel.

“Must be one of those parallel universes!” David said, making a bit of a joke of it.

There was absolutely no such meeting in regular reality. When I returned home, however, and spoke to Preston about it, he said he had a vague recollection of such a meeting. Perhaps this was a parallel reality slipping through, and I would not even mention it save for what happened later.

During one of these dinners, I mentioned to David what his Romanian partner had said about black helicopters circling the Atlantykron festivities.

David clarified that several had once circled the island on the first day as the early arrivals set up camp. The next year, it was only three copters. This year, there was only one black helicopter. Perhaps the psychic airwaves were lightening up. He had no idea what they were doing. I also learned that David knew how to fly these helicopters himself but did not have an actual credential to do so. Perhaps this comes in handy for flying them in and out of parallel realties.

I also mentioned to David that I was particularly interested to meet one of the V.I.P. speakers who was going to be lecturing. This was a Romanian general from Romanian Intelligence who was going to lecture on UFOs.

David mentioned that this general had cancelled at the last minute, and he thought it had something to do with my presence at Atlantykron. It is very flattering that I could spook someone who is supposed to be a grand spook himself. It is not the first time that such people have run for the hills in my presence. It does, however, seem bizarre that a person so well-credentialed would even care about me. Although my presence was made known at Atlantykron by a grand introduction, the only stir that could have or might have happened was on the subtle planes of existence.

The first evening there were festivities with a rather large fireworks display, an introductory video and an opening ceremony. Tantra took footage of this, and I eventually plan to release a video with some of this. I would, however, like to first visit at least one other area in Romania in order to make it a more complete story.

After the opening ceremonies, David introduced Tantra, Joel, and myself to the audience as well as other speakers. Afterwards, I was very warmly greeted by certain professors and others who were very glad I was there.

That was about as big a stir as I created as far my lecturing on the Montauk Project or anything else. I did speak again for a short time on another evening, but every time I was scheduled for a seminar, I was never picked up in time. As the boat accommodations on the island were full, Tantra and I stayed in apartments at the nuclear campus which was about twenty minutes away. I suggested that my seminars be scheduled for later in the day, but this was never done. Almost every night, when there was the biggest gathering of the day, I was always invited to say something for ten minutes to the audience. Sometimes I would. All in all, however, my capabilities as a lecturer were hardly utilized at all. People were more worried about "would it be all right with me" if they scheduled me for such and such a time. I was very accommodating, but in the final analysis, I did very little as far as lecturing or anything else.

None of this, however, bothered me. I expected to lecture and what not, but I was far more interested in what David had to tell me personally and the circumstances surrounding Radu Cinamar and his remarkable story. During my travels in Romania, I met a few people who had heard of Radu's story but none who had read it. This was the same at Atlantykron save for one man who was also named Radu. We both laughed at the synchronicity when I told him that he was the only one I had met who had read the book and he has the same name. Although Radu's book has sold very well in Romania, most people seemed to be oblivious to the events and their ultimate meaning. That is okay. I am used to people being asleep.

Part of the problems I was experiencing were explained to me by David before they even occurred. He said that Atlantykron runs on its own schedule. Things happen as they happen. In other words, it has a rhythm of its own. He also said that as the conference develops, the subject of Astropaleontology becomes more and more prominent. In this case, Astropaleontology refers to the study of ancient artifacts or stone monuments as they refer to the stars. I will talk more about this later on.

As the conference rolled along, David had trouble with the project he was working on and no discussions were forthcoming. I did have time to remind him, however, of a mysterious postcard he had sent me a year or two earlier. It was a short note he had written from Bethlehem, but it included a mysterious message that was written in code. I did not understand the code, but it came to me just as I was about to publish one of my quarterly newsletters, The Montauk Pulse. In hopes of breaking the code, I included it that edition of the Pulse and asked if anyone in the reading audience could help. Hundreds of envelopes were placed in the mail, but only one person would answer me and did so within twenty-four hours. More remarkably, the response was from one of my readers at Montauk who had given the coded message to her boyfriend who broke the code and read it to me over the phone. The fact that it came from Montauk was ironic to say the least. The mysterious cryptogram read as follows:

“In this world and time nothing happens by accident. If it happens you can bet it was planned that way.”

When I had received the decoded message, I sent what I had found to David, but he replied with an even more cryptic reply. He said that the code that had been broken was a simple code but that there was an even deeper message encrypted within the text if I were to look further. Despite having some of the best cryptologists in the intelligence community try and decrypt it, they could not. David did say, however, that the encrypted text would “lead to information we would find remarkable and surprising, something I believe you have already anticipated, that will change many things we know and believe today. The information is already waiting at a designated point, but I cannot say more here other than the message will lead you and your readers there.” All of the above sounds an awful lot like the circumstances that Radu is faced with in disseminating his information.

When I spoke to David, I had originally planned to ask him about this when we had the opportunity to sit on the banks of the Danube and have that long discussion he had alluded to. There was an incident, however, that had occurred that prompted me to ask him earlier. During the first couple of nights, I had a dream about David and an accident. As soon as I arrived at the camp the next day, I sought him out and found him on a boat where he was working on his project. I merely told him about the dream and told him to be careful and not to climb any trees like he was doing the day before. He understood and said he would be careful. Later in the day, I saw him partially up a tree working with an electronic box. I went over and spotted him to make sure he did not fall.

As it turned out, my precaution was completely unnecessary, but it took me a few days to figure it out. My dream state was trying to remind me of David's postcard wherein he used the word "accident" in his coded message: "In this world and time nothing happens by accident."

In any event, this experience prompted me to ask David about the postcard right away. His reply was interesting but much more cryptic than interesting.

"When I wrote that," he said, "that message was from my higher self."

He had nothing more to say. It was as if he did not even remember the postcard! He obviously went to significant trouble to write it, send it from a foreign country and mark it so as to confound security, and then later made another cryptic comment on it. It did not seem like he was pretending but definitely blocked on the communication. I would take it up later. This, however, was the first clear signal that David might avoid any direct confrontation on the subjects that I believed I was there to discuss. I was also there to lecture and assist the program, but the scheduling was so confused that I was left idle. The next signal came soon after.

There was some sort of misunderstanding between David and my Bulgarian publishers about their accommodations. Although this was worked out, it led to more trouble when they unwittingly placed their tents next to a locale that would break out into an ad hoc disco after the midnight hour and a fight threatened to break out. To smooth things out, I suggested that David meet with the Bulgarians the next day and answer any questions they might have. They were eager to talk to him as they had read one of my newsletters about him.

While they interviewed him, I sat by and Tantra recorded the interview. David, however, made it very clear that he did not want to be on camera. The first thing they wanted to know if there was still a time travel research center in Romania (which they had read about in my publications).

“That is out of bounds,” said David.

The Bulgarians understood and then proceeded with softball questions.

Everything worked out and all became friends. David later agreed to visit them after Atlantykron about the possibility of opening up a chapter of the World Genesis Foundation in their country. He also pledged to help them with a book they are publishing. All in all, David was extremely courteous with my new friends. He did visit them shortly after they returned home.

At the end of the interview with the Bulgarians, it seemed obvious to me that David had no connection to Radu Cinamar. When I told him so, an uncharacteristic and highly noticeable smirk appeared on his face. It was unmistakable. I told him he could have put the whole matter to rest if he would have just simply agreed with me. His interaction with the Bulgarians and myself confirmed not only that a time travel research center still existed in Romania (which I already knew anyway) but that he had a connection to Radu as well.

As the days rolled by, it was obvious that David was not about to have any long or intimate discussions with me about such matters. Although this was not completely unexpected by myself, it seemed a lost opportunity. One of the reasons I have been able to get along with David so well is that I never press him or act obnoxious about security matters. I understand his plight.

I was keenly already aware that such a situation might arise.

In Dianetics and Scientology parlance, which most of you know I am quite familiar with, David’s response to our encounter was what is called “rabitting.” In other words, one hops away like a rabbit when forced to confront an issue that is bothering the mind or impeding it. He was clearly going to avoid the issues I was most interested in. This could have been for his protection, my protection, or even someone else’s. In any case, it was not a good response for my investigation of these matters.

One evening, as I stood at the amphitheater where we would gather every evening, I saw David on the other side. Somewhere, I knew inside of me that he was not going to utter a word about these matters. Access was denied. While none of this surprised me too much, my body began to react. I felt a sudden and deep sadness which may or may not have been emanating from him. As Tantra and I went home to our apartments late that evening, I discussed the situation with her. Tantra was very popular at Atlantykron with her aura readings and psychic readings. They were quite accurate. Before I went to bed that night, I asked her to work on the situation interdimensionally while I worked on it in my dream state.

For me, there was no dreaming. I broke out in a heated sweat the likes of which I have never experienced. My bed sheets and t-shirt were soaked.

Knocking on Tantra's door the next morning, I told her I was too sick to go in.

"You are under psychic attack," she said.

I told her that I had already figured that out. In any event, I told her to talk to David about what happened. This was the one day I was hoping to show up for a scheduled talk, but the boat was over an hour late and would have missed me even if I had been there.

My illness might have started with something I ate at the JFK airport.

David and a friend got food poisoned there and had a very rugged flight to Romania. I noticed something in my digestive tract at the airport in Poland, but it did not bother me until this moment.

When my Romanian sponsor heard the news, he sent over lunch with a driver and I was asked if I would like to see a doctor. It was not necessary to see a doctor, and I never did eat the lunch. I ate one health bar the whole day.

At about two o'clock, there was another knock on the door and it was Sorin Hurmuz, my Romanian publisher. He had said that he would come to Atlantykron and visit me on Thursday. When he arrived and I was not there, he made the drive to the nuclear campus and visited me.

Not only was Sorin delightful, I could relate to him better than anyone I met in Romania. This obviously has something to do with the fact that he is also a publisher, and we are publishing books of a similar nature. There are not too many of us in the world. Just as The Montauk Project started my publishing company so did the book you have just read start his.

Sorin stated that although he has never met Radu, he believes his story to be true. One such confirmation occurred when he was visiting a book distribution facility. While there, Sorin encountered a retired official from Romanian Intelligence. When the officer saw Radu's book and looked through it, he told Sorin that he personally knew much of the book to be true because he could verify some of the accounts.

Sorin then handed me the audio CD that Radu had promised to send me. All of a sudden, my morale began to return. I felt much better.

The next day, I was not quite one-hundred percent, but I was certainly well enough to return to Atlantykron. David had told Tantra that he would set aside some time for me and we ended up spending most of the afternoon together. David obviously felt bad that his silence did or might have contributed to my illness. David then came through with what information he could tell me, at least for the time being.

With regard to his trip to Bethlehem, David said he could not yet say what he was doing there when he wrote the original postcard. With regard to the encryption, he told me that his leaving the Time Travel Research Center was a strategic move on his part. He was attracting too much attention with his cutting edge research. To take the steam off, he turned it over to others but never ceased his research. There was also a master plan in the works, and there was a planned announcement in late September or early October. This concerned a new endeavor known as Anderson Multinational, a global corporation that is on the cutting edge of future technology. He could not elaborate on the mysterious cryptogram as that could compromise acquisitions and mergers designed to be a part of Anderson Multinational. Several handshake and verbal agreements had been made, and they could not be violated.

I originally found out about Anderson Multinational because the logo was displayed every evening on a video presentation shown at nightly events. David asked me not to mention it in lieu of the above but eventually said I could have an exclusive on it. When October eventually rolled around, there was no mention or announcement by him with regard to Anderson Multinational. He did, however, announce it in January of 2009 and there is an entire website on it. I must say, however, that the cutting edge technology is played down to an extreme degree.

All in all, there was not too much that David could tell me in lieu of his mergers, acquisitions and handshakes. He did say, however, that he would maintain communication with me in the future.

Further, he was very sorry that he had remained out of communication for so long.

There was, however, still the matter of the audio CD that Radu Cinamar had sent to me. I forgot all about it during my conversation with David. It was my idea originally that he, Tantra, myself, and a host of other Romanians would sit around and listen to the CD. This was not to be the case.

Before I could listen to it, I needed to dig up an audio player which a fellow New Yorker by the name of Norm provided. By the time I received it and figured out how to work it, I was sitting all alone at a table on the deck of a boat. No one else was around.

When I ran the audio, practically the first words that came out of Radu's mouth were a request that no one else listen to the CD. It was private and for my ears only. As intriguing as this might sound, the CD was mostly a discourse on the events you have just read about. It was Radu's personal views about the circumstances. More than that, it was a personal message to me that these things really did happen to him and there are many more bizarre experiences as well. There is no question in my mind that Radu is very sincere. He also apologized that he could not offer proof beyond the obvious correspondences already mentioned. Once again, if he stirs things up too much, he will lose his job and his freedom to publish.

At the end of the audio CD, Radu then made a rather interesting comment. He said that there was one person he wanted me to play the CD to and that was David Anderson. He said that he had a definite feeling that David was a good person and that he trusted him. He would also like to meet David some day.

Once I finished listening to the CD, I sought out David on the island. Before I could begin to look, our paths crossed immediately, and I spoke to him privately to inform him about what Radu had said. David then said something that was both cryptic and very revealing.

"You know," he said, "many people have told me that I know Radu."

This was very bizarre and it explained, to a degree, why he smirked when I had earlier suggested that he did not know Radu. There was some sort of connection between the two individuals. Radu, quite obviously, is not aware of the connection or he would not have stated that he would like to meet David. I told David that I would send him a copy of the CD when I returned home so that he could listen to it. David said that he would also be happy to fly down to New York if Radu should happen to visit me. When I eventually informed Radu of these events, he thought it was very interesting.

To me, the most significant aspect of all of this has to do with my original question put before the Sphinx. I had asked what the connection between David and Radu is. The answer, while not an utterly complete answer, is very revealing. There is a connection, but it is a mystical one. Both have been made aware of each other in what might be termed our “regular reality” but they seem to know each other from a parallel or hyper-reality.

When I returned to America, I sent David a copy of the audio CD but never heard back. I have had several back and forth emails with David since returning but whenever I mention Radu or the CD, I never get an answer.

Shortly before this book was finished, I had occasion to talk to one of David’s assistants. I simply asked her to ask David if he received the CD. I got an answer the next day. He had a backlog of mail he had not opened for six months. While this might well be true, he thanked me right away when I sent him a copy of my recent book The Montauk Book of the Living. It seems not all mail is delayed.

In any event, I have given the matter considerable thought which is based upon a significant amount of interaction with David. He is mysterious and has worked at the highest levels of governments across the globe. This includes intelligence agencies and the military. David is one of their greatest human assets in terms of intelligence, capability and technology.

With all of these connections, it is no wonder that he is like a walking security matrix with different access codes for different situations. Anyone who is forced to deal with so many different strata of life either has to be conditioned or condition himself on how to respond to various people in given situations.

I do believe that, on one level and to a certain degree, he has released himself from the security restrictions he grew up with in the military. This is a result of his research into the quantum realm of existence. There is a part of himself that came into this world to usher in new times. To a significant degree, he has woken up to his quantum self. This is why he has set me up to help unravel the story with Radu as well as his own mysterious story.

Early on at Atlantykron, I repeated what one of my psychic friends had said about David and myself and that was that “our higher selves are in alignment and working together.” Upon telling him that, he agreed by saying “that resonated with him.” I also asked what he thought about me writing about him. He said he was neutral on it.

David is an agent of change. Like the rest of us, he exists on many levels and in different dimensions. That is a quantum fact. Because of his profile with regard to being on the cutting edge of scientific knowledge and its implications with regard to how we perceive the universe, his life is more symbolic. Although he is a very humble person, the threads of his life echo across time and that means many time lines. It is no wonder that he would be the one to facilitate my eventual collaboration with Radu.

If we liken David to one of the colors on a Rubik’s Cube, we can like Radu to another color. It is apparently up to me to put this metaphorical Rubik’s Cube back together. It is not a task I sought out but one that was presented to me through the principle of synchronicity. When I took the trip to Romania, I was hoping that I would have that long discussion David alluded to and that it would be something like the discussions that Cezar had with Radu. That would not only have been much more fun and exciting, it would have laid out everything on a platter for me and the reading audience. It would be easy. Perhaps I could have visited the Projection Hall or David’s Time Travel Research Center. Indeed, maybe these things may happen in the future. David has invited me to return to Atlantykron on an annual basis. As I stated earlier, Radu hopes to visit me in America some day.

While we can all be disappointed that the revelations herein are limited, we can also consider the resistance as is represented in the character of Signore Massini and his minions. A millennia of lies does not yield to the truth overnight. What has been opened here is a gateway. It is therefore no wonder that a megalith known as Babele stands nearby the Romanian Sphinx. While babele is translated as “old woman” in Romanian, it clearly means a gate in other languages. In this book, we have all had a chance to peer through the gate and see a bit of what might be inside. There is also a bit more to the story as I have continued to correspond with Radu since my return.

Epilogue, Part II — by Peter Moon

Between my Romanian publisher, Radu, and David Anderson, I have forged an interesting although very abstract association with the events in this book. I have also had the opportunity to have many new friends that are Romanian. It is as if a seed has been planted and will grow over time. If I continue to cultivate it, there will eventually be a harvest.

As I have continued my correspondences with Radu, I have learned that he has written two other books which are sequels to the story you have just read. In his sequel to this book, Transylvanian Moonrise — A Secret Initiation in the Hidden Realm of the Gods, Radu addresses what I consider to be a key missing element in the story you have just read. I do not know about you, but when I finished this book, I wanted to more about the mysterious Dr. Xien, the doctor from Red China who showed up to examine Cezar from time to time during his youth.

When the original version of this book was published in Romania, the publisher was besieged with hundreds of phone calls and emails asking for details about Radu. Some were retired members of the secret service who had been highly placed and confirmed some of the events. Newspapers also published articles related to such. The details of these are covered in Radu's second book.

One of these communications was from a very persistent person who urged Sorin Hurmuz to contact Radu. Such a request would have been ignored save for one important fact. The persistent individual, who is named Elinor (a masculine name in Romania), mentioned a particular detail with regard to Tibet. This caught the eye of Sorin and consequently Radu.

Clandestine communications were set up between Radu and Sorin who have still never met each other face to face. Normally, they communicate by special courier of the secret service or though an email address that is continually modified by Radu. In special cases, Sorin uses a prepaid phone card to call Radu at a specific number. The aforementioned detail about Tibet was such a special case and it involved the mysterious Dr. Xien.

A meeting was set up between Elinor and Radu at a villa where the two got to know each other. Elinor had possession of a mysterious pyramid-shaped device whose origins and alchemy-based existence go back hundreds of years in time. Elinor's family saga is described in detail as well as the fact that whoever possesses the device can expect a life span of between 1,700 and 2,000 years. This is the result of perfect alchemy and the history of it is very well described.

Despite the amazing role of Elinor, he is really just an intermediary between Radu and a mysterious Tibetan by the name of Repa Sundhi who is actually Dr. Xien. Repa Sundhi actually shows up at the villa late at night and is accompanied by a terrifying creature known as a yidam in Tibetan whose protective and useful role proves to be very important.

It turns out that Dr. Xien is also a mediator. After a long conversation with Radu, he invites him to take a small trip with an undisclosed purpose. Fully trusting his new comrades, Radu accepts a trip to Transylvania to visit some very old and little explored mountains in the Occidental Carpathians in western Romania. There, an extraordinary event occurs whereby all three of the travelers are projected, at Repa Sundhi's will, to a rocky and deserted land in Tibet. After a short walk, they arrive in front of a vertical wall.

Radu proceeds through a narrow and tall opening and finds himself inside of a mysterious cave where he is confronted by the overwhelming presence of a goddess known as Machandi.

After a short conversation, Machandi presents Radu with a very old manuscript written and hidden in the cave by Yeshe Tsogyel, a disciple of Padmashambava, the great illuminated tantric who lived in Tibet in 600-700 A.D. The manuscript contains five initiatory techniques that Radu hopes to write about in detail in another book. The manuscript was translated by Dr. Xien.

The second part of this sequel takes place once again in western Romania, this time at a mountain peak named Gugu which is very hard to access. At Gugu, a group of mysterious adolescents arrive who are following the call of their dreams wherein Machandi appeared and told them of this meeting. Radu is already there with Repa Sundhi (Dr. Xien), Elinor, and the yidam. It is a fated meeting where Radu is initiated in a most remarkable way.

Although I have given you a synopsis of the sequel, it is important to point out that I have not read it as it has not yet been translated from Romanian into English. Based upon the interest in Transylvanian Sunrise, I hope to work out an arrangement with Sorin to publish the subsequent books in this series. Sorin has provided me with the synopsis you have just read.

All of this information is more than a little fantastic and places Radu into the sphere of something that could be likened to a comic book character.

While I do not mean that with any disrespect, it is important to codify these experiences with how an ordinary mind might interpret them. To people who are skeptical, I should point out that Radu is extremely coherent in his letters and various descriptions of events. He is often hesitant to say too much as he does not want to sound too incredible. Whether you believe him or not, it is obvious that he has had some incredible experiences. The dialog I have had with him invites credibility even though we are dealing with incredible things. This brings us to the third book in his series.

In this saga, entitled The Mystery of Egypt — First Tunnel, Elinor leaves Romania for his own security reasons and proceeds to an unknown destination. Radu is clued-in on Elinor's villa in Bucharest which has a secret alchemical lab in the basement. Radu becomes the caretaker of this property and is particularly interested in the impressive library there.

After taking possession of the villa, Radu is unexpectedly contacted by Cezar and taken to Alpha Base. Dr. Xien is wanted by the secret service for occult reasons that have to do with inside government connections, but he is nowhere to be found. It is hoped that Radu can reestablish this lost connection due to his relationship with Machandi. It is a lost cause, at least for the time being.

Radu then describes changes occurring inside the secret military base in the Bucegi mountains and the particulars of the tunnel in the Projection Room that leads to Egypt. He becomes part of a five man team that was assembled to explore this tunnel. A fascinating account of this expedition is given accompanied by simple sketches. Cezar, who is also a part of the five man team, supplies Radu with a considerable amount of esoteric information. This includes an amazing account from 10,000 B.C. which he learned about in the Projection Hall but was not allowed to reveal until now.

The five man party also includes a computer genius from the Pentagon, Romanian Lieutenant Nicoara of Department Zero, and a Special Service

Lieutenant who ends up being unveiled as a USAP (United States Antarctic Program) agent of the Secret Freemason World Government.

This party reaches the end of the tunnel without incident and an occult chamber is discovered. It is accurately described in minute detail and includes the following: an immense library full of tables which is the obvious product of extraterrestrial technology and contains a “history” of our own galaxy and the universe; an antigravity gliding device; and a virtual replica of the enormous machine found in the Projection Hall that is adapted for human use. Cezar describes the latter as a time travel machine that allows the consciousness of the subject to be projected in an ever existing time dimension and gives full details of the true nature of time and of the akashic records. He also speaks of his time travel experiences.

Towards the end of Volume III, the author describes his attempts to make use of the time machine. After two consecutive failures, he obtains a quick projection into a secret tunnel of the Great Pyramid of Cheops. Radu suddenly realizes that the scientific community does not have a clue about it when he is confronted with the vision of the real masters of the pyramids from long forgotten times.

While these summaries of the books come from the publisher, I have also been in correspondence with Radu who is releasing the fourth book in the series just as this first volume is being released in America. This fourth volume includes the manuscript Radu received from Machandi in Tibet. It contains five initiatory techniques that were translated by Dr. Xien. Radu himself has noticed the irony of both of these books being released at the same time. He is also keenly aware of my various books and the element of synchronicity that has appeared in my life. He has also been confronted with such aspects and has asked Cezar for further explanations with regard to what this means. These discussions are included in Volume III.

Radu understands exactly what I mean with regard to the “comic book sphere” which he terms as “transference from the mystical to the mundane.” This is a challenge to anyone who penetrates the loftier spheres of existence. Cezar is an obvious help to him in this regard, and he has emphasized to me that he has only included a very small part of the discussions he has had with Cezar as well as other people. We are talking about the tip of an iceberg. As Radu wrote to me, “Fate gave me the extraordinary chance to be integrated in a complexity of events and amazing discoveries, and this created an almost incredible resonance for the ordinary man.”

Besides the exploration of the tunnel to Egypt, he has also travelled through the second tunnel and towards the center of the Earth. He returned from this latest venture in October 2008 and said that it was an incontestable success. There were new discoveries which he said would be hard for me (or others) to imagine. This might be included in a possible fifth volume.

The incontestable success he referred to in this endeavor includes what he called a “diplomatic” connection with the beings from the center of the Earth. Cezar, he said, will be leaving Department Zero and going to this newly discovered locale to serve as an “ambassador.” This saddens Radu greatly as he will no longer have his mentor with him. There have also been significant changes in Department Zero.

This is the latest news from Radu. He has wished me success with the American release of his book as well as my own new title, The Montauk Book of the Living. I have sent Radu two copies, one for Radu and one for Cezar. I sent them by international priority mail in hopes that Cezar would get it before his departure.

I readily admit that all of this information is very far out, even for me. It is true, however, that if one is going to penetrate the more secretive aspects of existence, one is going to encounter phenomena that ordinary people will dismiss in their ignorant states. Once again, I will remind you that we are at the threshold of new realities, new science, and new technology. All of this stems from the ability to perceive reality (or dimensions) in a new way.

My investigation of the Montauk saga led me to the history of its ancient people who were Pharaohs in the tradition of both Egypt and Atlantis, two cultures which were based upon the proposition of an ancient Blue Race that maintained its continuity of consciousness through monatomic white gold which is sometimes associated with manna from heaven or mummy dust. The white gold mentioned in this book by Radu Cinamar is not only a recurring a theme in my work, he presents a new twist by suggesting a two-dimensional chemical bonding as opposed to three-dimensional bonding.

The theme of Atlantis is also suggested by the Romanian Sphinx and the nearby Projection Hall which is an ancient Hall of Records created by an advanced civilization of the past. This is in keeping with the theme of the Atlantykron Conference I attended, a main preoccupation of which is astropaleontology with particular regard to the ancients aligning stone “time clocks” to signal an awakening of ancient Atlantean culture in the future. We not only represent that future, but we are further titillated by the adventures of David Anderson who seems to have a connection to the future himself.

That these awakenings are occurring in the mountains in and around Transylvania is highly symbolic. A land which has been vilified and romanticized in popular culture as the home of Dracula, the king of the vampires, is now beckoning us to a higher calling and awareness. Dracula is only a very small part of Transylvania’s entire history, but such legends have resonated with man’s lowest common denominator. More importantly, they have taken attention off of the sacred past of a region which can now be identified as one of the most significant beacons with regard to man’s higher and more redeemable aspects. It signals the end of the vampire, a creature which recoiled and hid as the night receded and the sun rose. It is with respect to these factors that I have chosen the name Transylvanian Sunrise for the American edition.

Where all of this goes is anyone’s guess. I did, however, share a flash of intuition I had with Radu. I told him that if he or Cezar reach Shambala or some other such exotic realm and enter the secret temple, they are likely to meet one of my friends there. I am referring to my Chi Gong instructor who I have written about in my recent book, The Montauk Book of the Living. He is a Taoist priest whose name is Roosevelt Gainey and has announced that the time of secrets is over. He is now teaching martial arts and healing techniques that have been guarded for millennia.

Roosevelt was introduced to me by Artie “Red Medicine” Crippen, the Medicine Man of the Montauk Indians who is a part of the Pharaonic legacy earlier referred to. Artie is the keeper of the Montauks’ oral history and is well aware of the Atlantis theme. We are both two of Roosevelt’s most eager students, and I have given many details of these secrets in The Montauk Book of the Living. I mention this aspect of my work and life for a very specific reason with regard to the adventures spoken of in this work. If there are such realms as Radu and Cezar have apparently travelled to, the accumulation of chi (life energy, particularly that acquired through the breath) is a very important factor. The accumulation of chi is accomplished through the practice of Chi Gong (literally, breath work) which will enable anyone to more ably deal with any flotsam and jetsam that might come along with such exotic encounters that Radu has alluded to. When it comes to accumulation of chi, I do not know anyone who has more in his energetic field than Roosevelt Gainey. If I advance far and fast enough, Cezar and Radu might even meet me when they get to that enigmatic temple. While this might sound fanciful, it is not. Life is circular and operates in an infinite stream of consciousness. If one is making progress, one will periodically arrive at points of familiarity as well as referential points of infinity. So, while Cezar and Radu pursue the inner realms of infinity by one means, I am pursuing it by another through the practice of Chi Gong. It is exciting to consider we all might meet some day, and it is nice to have friends in exotic realms. It makes it a little easier to deal with when you finally get there.

I should also add a bit of advice to all of you who pursue the exotic realms of consciousness. When you find yourself in such a state or any type of paranormal state of mind, including awakening in your dreams, breathe deeply and do Chi Gong. This will not only stabilize you, it will make you self-aware and free from any harm. You can learn many simple Chi Gong techniques from a book at the library. The more secret aspects you can learn later.

In the meantime, I will continue to report on my Romanian adventures with Radu Cinamar and David Anderson. These will appear in my quarterly newsletter The Montauk Pulse. In the relatively near future, I also hope to publish the additional volumes by Radu Cinamar. As I am planning to revisit Romania this year and continue my association with David Anderson, I would also like to supplement these volumes with my further adventures and possible insights I might gain, just as I have done in this book. As David said to me, "something very interesting is going to come out of this." He was referring to my participation in these events, and I still hope to have that long talk with him. Maybe that will happen this summer or perhaps when Radu pays a visit to me in New York. Keep in mind, this is only the beginning of what is very much a live investigation and an exciting adventure.

Another Chi Gong principle that I will share with you is that the slower one goes, the more effective and powerful one becomes. Slow and steady wins the race. I fully expect to be deterred in my quest, but I also am not in too much of a rush to discover the deeper truths of these matters. All will come in its due time. It is already there...waiting...for all of us. Thank you all for being part of this grand adventure.

P. S. Now that you have completed this book, I sincerely invite you to read it again and again. There is much wisdom herein that you cannot help but gloss over with one or two readings. The subjects discussed are not only endless in their profundity, the events herein are becoming more and more the central theme in today's world politics.

Sky Books

Established in 1992, Sky Books became immediately recognized as the premier publisher in the world on the scientific pursuit of time travel and time control when it published The Montauk Project: Experiments in Time (see below), a book which shook the world due to its unprecedented insight into the mechanics of time. Always immersed in very controversial subject matter and traditionally boycotted by the mainstream media, Sky Books is a company built on grass roots popularity and its influence has been recognized worldwide with translations in Japan, China, Germany, Spain, Romania and Bulgaria. Sky Books has published over fifteen titles since releasing The Montauk Project and also issues a quarterly newsletter which has continuously remained in print since 1993. Continue reading for further information on these titles and also newsletters (including back issues) on the topic of the Montauk Project. Ordering instructions are at the very end.

Since The Montauk Project was published in 1992, there have been many interesting developments and several sequels chronicling the investigation to determine whether or not the Montauk Project did, in fact, exist.

Preeminent in this quest has been the Montauk Pulse, a quarterly newsletter that has been written by Peter Moon since 1993. It has never missed an issue, and there has never been a lack of interesting things to report upon, and these include Peter Moon's adventures with Dr. David Anderson (see www.andersoninstitute.com), a scientist who has excelled in understanding the actual mechanics of time and has made remarkable breakthroughs with time control technology. Dr. Anderson's work is all based upon hard science.

If you are interested in subscribing to the Montauk Pulse or receiving past back issues, you may visit the Sky Books website or follow the ordering instructions at the very end of this ebook. The Sky Books website also features all of our sequels to The Montauk Project and other titles which are all available in hard copy format. We are also currently working hard to get all Sky Books titles into ebook format as well, including the back issues of the Montauk Pulse which now features three separate volumes comprising six years worth of newsletters each. THE MONTAUK PROJECT: EXPERIMENTS IN TIME

The Montauk Project chronicles the most amazing and secretive research project in recorded history. Starting with the “Philadelphia Experiment” of 1943, invisibility experiments were conducted aboard the USS Eldridge that resulted in full scale teleportation of the ship and crew. Forty years of massive research ensued, culminating in bizarre experiments at Montauk Point that actually tapped the powers of creation and manipulated time itself. The Montauk Project bridges the modalities of Science with the most esoteric techniques ever imagined and finally catapults us to the threshold of the stars. We all know something is out there, but we’re not sure exactly what. This book, at long last begins to provide some solid clues.

THE SEQUELS

The stir and controversy produced by The Montauk Project was overwhelming to the society it was released into in 1992. The powers that be behind the military industrial complex had a lot to explain. As has been the pattern for decades, they called on one of their old allies, Hollywood, and a whole new genre of television shows were spawned in an attempt to absorb the fallout of questions and to do damage control on the trail of information thus exposed. The most successful of these shows was the X Files. In the meantime, Peter Moon set about trying to verify the general thesis put forward in The Montauk Project. The result was of equal interest to the first book and resulted in:

SERIES

Montauk Revisited: Adventures in Synchronicity

When Peter Moon researched the remnant trail of this mysterious time travel project, he encountered incredible and unprecedented experiences in synchronicity which ultimately unmasked many of the occult forces that were behind the technology used in the Montauk Project. Following the trail of these “coincidences,” Peter Moon reveals an enigmatic occult tapestry which leads from the mysterious associations of the Cameron Clan to the genesis of American rocketry and the magick of Aleister Crowley, Jack Parsons, and L. Ron Hubbard. The Montauk investigation carries forward as Preston Nichols tells the bizarre history of the electronic transistor as he opens the door to Peter Moon and unleashes a host of incredible characters and new information. A startling scenario is depicted that reaches far beyond the scope of the first book. Illustrations and photos are included.

256 pages, ISBN 0-9631889-1-7 $19.95

Immediately after Montauk Revisited was completed, and much to his surprise, Peter Moon discovered that the mysterious trail of synchronicities was getting even more fascinating when he discovered that the site of the Montauk Project experiments was sacred Native American ground that was once accompanied by ancient pyramids which could be clearly seen in old photographs of Montauk. The result of this brand new investigation was:

BOOK III
OF THE MONTAUK

Pyramids of Montauk: Explorations in Consciousness

An astonishing second sequel to the Montauk Project and Montauk Revisited awakens the consciousness of humanity to its ancient history and origins through the discovery of pyramids at Montauk. A full examination of the mysteries of the pyramids at Montauk Point reveals that the Montauk Tribe were the royal family of Long Island and that they used the name Pharaoh as a designation that connected their heritage to ancient Egypt and beyond. The discovery that these pyramids were placed on sacred native American ground opens the door to an unprecedented investigation of the mystery schools of earth and their connection to Egypt, Atlantis, Mars and the star Sirius. This book explains why Montauk was chosen as a select location for pyramids and time travel experimentation. A further examination of sacred geometry awakens the consciousness of humanity to its ancient history and origins. Preston Nichols also fascinates us with an update on covert operations that includes the discovery of a nuclear particle accelerator and the development of psychotronic weapons. The Pyramids of Montauk stirs the quest for the end of time as we know it. Includes photos and illustrations.

256 pages, ISBN 0-9631889-2-5, $19.95

The adventures had only just begun by this point. It was now 1995. After all of this information came out, Preston Nichols then revealed that he had mysterious UFO experiences as a young child and also as a teenager. This resulted in a new book which blends the history of physics and UFOlogy with Preston's personal experiences and gives unprecedented insight into the technology of flying saucers and their accompanying phenomena in:

ENCOUNTER IN THE PLEIADES: AN INSIDE LOOK AT UFOS

ENCOUNTER IN THE PLEIADES: AN INSIDE LOOK AT UFOs

Encounter in the Pleiades: An Inside Look at UFOs

No constellation in the night sky has rivaled the Pleiades for its impact upon the mind of man. Artists, poets, scientists, mythographers and prophets alike have not only cited the Pleiades as an inspiration to their work but as a key to understanding mankind and his/her relationship with the creative principles of existence. This book is the incredible story of a man who found himself taken to the Pleiades where he was examined and instructed by intelligent life forms who appeared human. The Pleiadians proceeded to give him an education and indoctrination that would enable him to regain his health and attain an unparalleled understanding of electromagnetic science and its role in UFO technology. A new look at Einstein gives insights into the history of physics and how the speed of light can be surpassed through the principles of reality engineering. New concepts in science are offered with technical but simple descriptions even the layman can understand. These include the creation of alternate realities through the use of twisters and spinners; mind control aspects of the Star Wars defense system; implants; alien abductions and much more. Never before has the complex subject of UFOs been put together in such a simple language that can be appreciated by the scientist and understood by the layman. Peter Moon adds further intrigue to the mix by divulging his part in a bizarre project which led him to Preston Nichols and the consequent release of this information. His account of the role of the Pleiades in ancient mythology sheds new light on the current predicament of Mankind and offers a path of hope for the future.

256 pages, ISBN 0-9631889-3-3, $19.95

By the time Encounter in the Pleiades was published, Peter Moon had also accumulated considerable information on intriguing connections between the Montauk Project and the Nazis which also extended to the latter's mysterious connections to Tibet via occult master-mind Karl Haushofer. Peter's collection of information on this subject culminated with a visit from world renown author, Jan van Helsing, who allowed him to publish (for the first time in America) his photos of the mysterious German flying craft built before and during World War II in connection with the Vril Society. There is much to read in:

BOOK IV
OF THE MONTAUK
SERIES

The Black Sun: Montauk's Nazi-Tibetan Connection

After World War II and the subsequent occupation of Germany, Allied military commanders were stunned to discover the penetrating depth of the Nazi regime's state secrets. The world's best intelligence organization was not the least of these revelations. Also discovered were massive and meticulous research files on secret societies, eugenics and other scientific pursuits that boggled the imagination of the Allied command. Even more spectacular was an entire web of underground rocket and flying saucer factories with accompanying technology that still defies ordinary beliefs. A missing U-boat fleet possessing the most advanced submarine technology in the world left many wondering if the Nazis had escaped with yet more secrets or even with Hitler himself. Behind all of these mysteries was an even deeper element: a secret order known to initiates as the Order of the Black Sun, an organization so feared that it is now illegal to even print their symbols and insignia in modern Germany. The Black Sun probes deeper into the secrets of the Third Reich and its Tibetan contacts than any other previous attempt. Author Peter Moon ties all of these strange associations to Montauk Point, where an American military facility was used by the Nazis to further their own strange experiments and continue the agenda of the Third Reich. Peter Moon unravels more Montauk mysteries which leads to the most insightful look ever into the Third Reich and their ultimate quest: the Ark of the Covenant and the Holy Grail. This quest penetrates the secret meaning behind the Egyptian and Tibetan "Books of the Dead". Includes photographs and illustrations.

When The Black Sun was completed, a very interesting man surfaced who was mentioned in Montauk Revisited by the pseudonym of Stan Campbell who had gone to prison for refusing to cut his ties to Preston Nichols. Preston's revelations concerning Montauk were very hot at the time and "Stan's" involvement in the Montauk Project was a very sensitive issue to the authorities. When he was eventually released from prison, he no longer had anything to lose and went public under his real name, Stewart Swerdlow, and wrote:

Montauk: The Alien Connection

As the new millenium unfolds, countless stories of alien abductions have begun to penetrate the mainstream consciousness of Mankind. While some new insights into the human condition have been obtained, too few of these accounts have brought such experiences to a level where they can be consumed and digested into a profitable understanding for the individual reader. Montauk: the Alien Connection unravels the remarkable story of Stewart Swerdlow, a gifted mentalist who has experienced extrasensory perception since birth. Stewart's rare abilities not only made him a magnet for government surveillance, but his unique genetic structure made him a clearing house for different alien agendas which sought him out for their own purposes. Everyone's sinister plans went haywire after Stewart began a deprogramming procedure with Preston Nichols which was designed to clear his memories and the controlling influences which had been installed. Stewart was subsequently threatened and eventually jailed after refusing to comply with orders to sever his ties with Nichols. Despite this, the truth began to work its way into his life. Estranged from his family, Stewart was sent to prison as a financially destitute and hopeless, tragic figure. Despite a severe human struggle, he was able to call on his own God-given abilities, reshuffle the deck, and reevaluate his life and the various agencies and entities which sought to utilize him. Weeding out the most negative influences, Stewart was able to recover key memories and discard those forces which sought to entrap him. The most intriguing aspect of his incredible story is that he has a valuable legacy to share.

The Healer's Handbook: A Journey Into Hyperspace

The miraculous and strange become common place as you journey out of this dimension with Stewart Swerdlow and discover the Language of Hyperspace, a simple system of geometric and archetypal glyphs enabling us to comprehend universal mysteries ranging from crop circles to the full panorama of occult science. Written for both individuals and practitioners alike, The Healer's Handbook embraces color healing, dream analysis, numeric values and symbols, auric fields, astral and hyperspace travel, and radionics as well as offering exercises designed to unlock DNA sequences programmed within you since the beginning of your existence. The ancients uniformly alluded to an arcane language, sometimes described as Vril or Babylonian, which was once common to all mankind, connected to the Mind of God and also served as an inter-species and interuniversal language. Now, for the first time ever, is an entire text dedicated to the explanation of these ancient concepts. This book penetrates the secrets of creation through DNA and includes a vast panorama of healing and meditation techniques. Fully illustrated with exercises, color chart, Dream Dictionary and Hyperspace Dictionary which includes the most complete rendering of the Hyperspace Language available.

Having known Preston Nichols for many years at this point, Peter Moon had heard many stories of Preston's intriguing involvement in the music industry where he worked as a sound engineer for many popular rock groups of the Sixties and Seventies. At the same time, Preston became involved in some very hot political water over the legal case concerning John Ford, the founder and president of the Long Island UFO Network. John was put targetted by government forces and was incarcerated ever since without ever having received a trial. Read about both of these intriguing aspects of Preston's life in:

The Music of Time

The Music of Time blends music with time travel as Preston Nichols reveals his hidden role in the music industry where he worked as an expert sound engineer and recorded hundreds of hit records during the Golden Era of Rock 'n Roll. Beginning with his work for Time Records, Preston chronicles his innovations in sound engineering and tells how he constructed the premier music studio in the world for Phil Spector at Bell Sound. Having created a Mecca for talented musicians, Preston found himself surrounded by and interfacing with the likes of the Beatles, Beach Boys, Rolling Stones, and many more such popular acts. For the first time, Preston reveals his employment at Brookhaven Labs and how his connections in the music industry were used for mind control and manipulation of the masses. Ultimately, Preston's real life adventures lead to time travel and the bone chilling efforts of his adversaries to put him permanently out of commission. These include his association with John Ford, the founder of the Long Island UFO Network, who was arrested on the ridiculous charge of conspiring to put radium in the toothpaste of the local County Executive. Ford was railroaded into jail without a trial and then placed in an institute for the criminally insane without ever having received any trial, let alone a fair one. The County Executive was later imprisoned himself but Ford remains locked up to this day. In a remarkable twist of fate, mysterious forces rescue Preston and lead him to a bizarre series of financial transactions which set him up to be involved in a new time travel project. The Music of Time unravels more layers of mystery in mankind's epic quest to understand the paradox of time and the imprisonment of consciousness.

With all the literature that had been produced thus far, the subject of the Montauk Project was very popular and intriguing to the public but its controversy raised many questions and attacks by those who were upset by the data and disillusioned by their own belief systems being shattered. Peter Moon sought out additional sources to verify aspects of the general story of the Montauk Project that were not connected to Montauk Project per se.

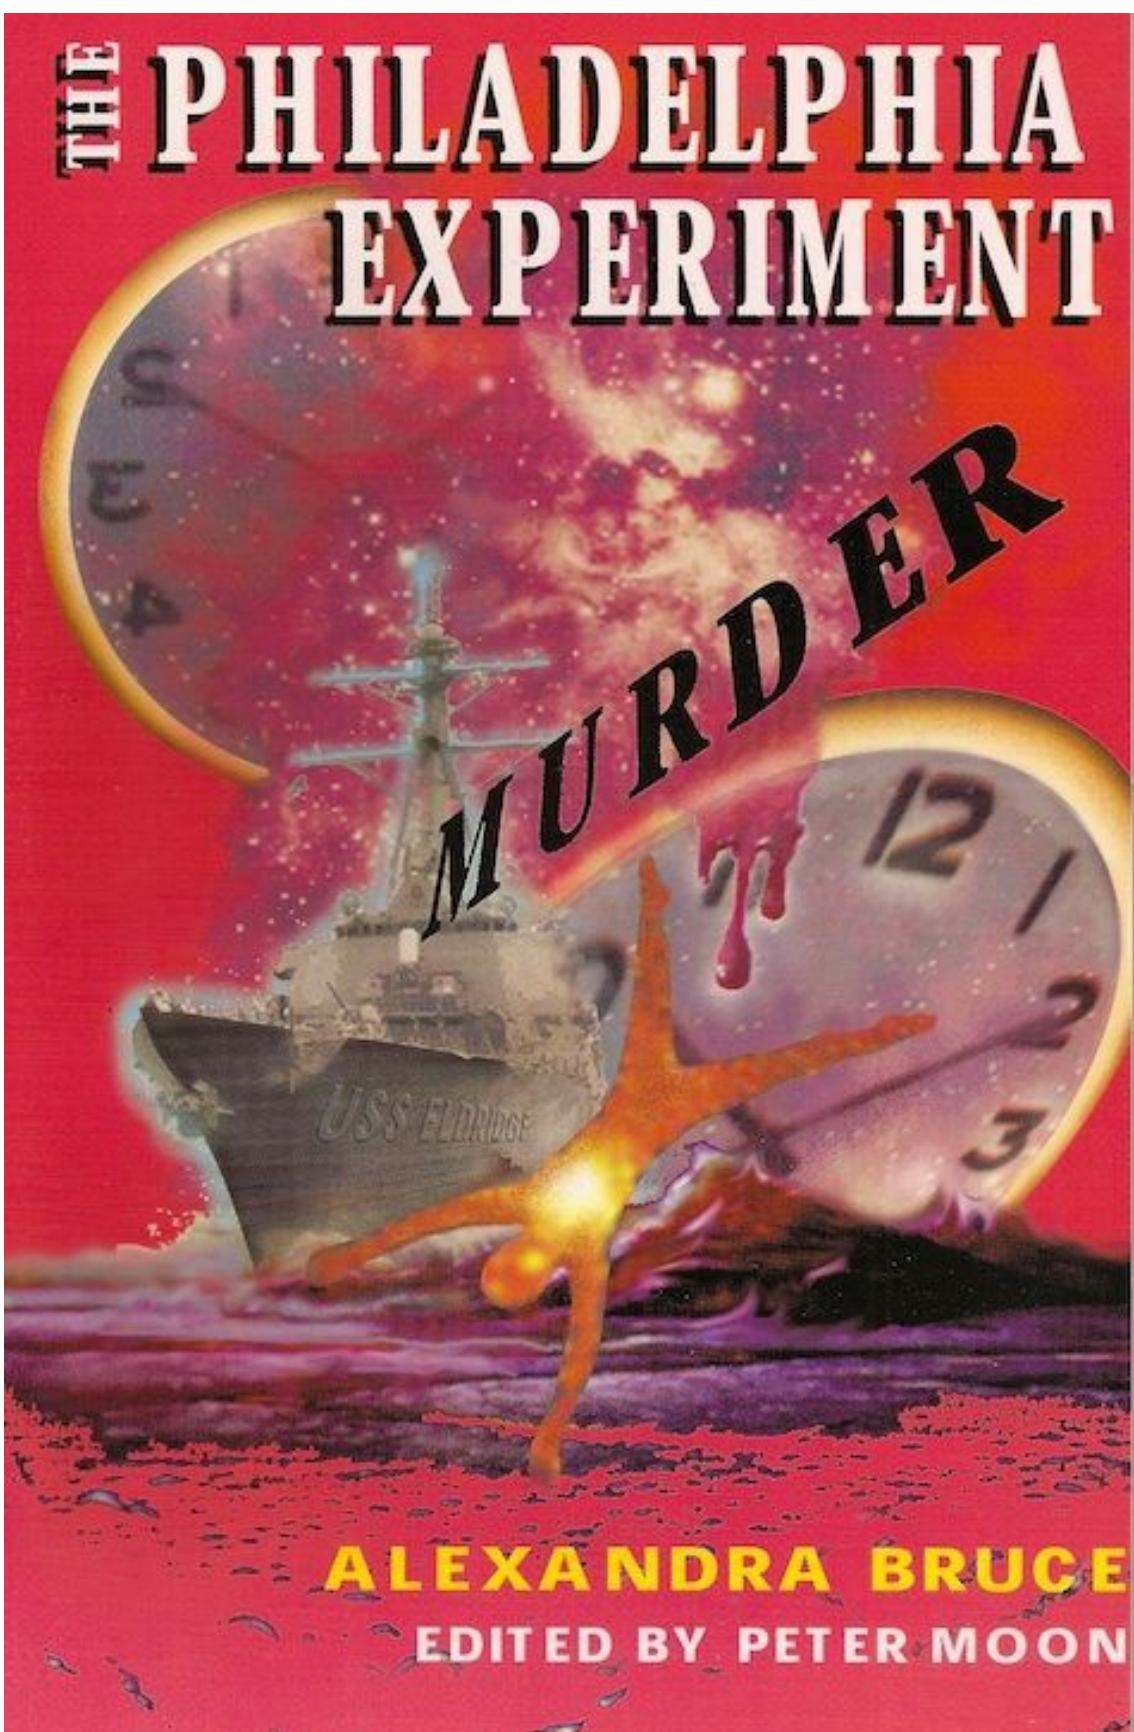

The first book of this nature from Sky Books was:

MURDER

The Philadelphia Experiment Murder: Parallel Universes and the Physics of Insanity

An added edition to the intriguing series by Sky Books which exposes the truth about the conspiracy to manipulate time itself. This book, edited and contributed to by Peter Moon and authored by Alexandra Bruce, begins with the tragic murder of conspiracy lecturer Phil Schneider. An investigation of this murder exposes a massive cover-up by authorities and reveals astonishing information, the trail of which leads back to the Philadelphia Experiment of 1943. Before his assassination, Schneider lectured across the country and released documents connecting his father to the U.S.S. Eldridge. Additionally, his father claimed to be a Nazi U-boat captain who, after being captured by the Allies, was recruited as a medical officer and served as a Senior Medical Officer to the crew of the Eldridge. More haunting was the discovery of gold bars in his father's possessions with Nazi insignia. The Philadelphia Experiment Murder investigates these circumstances and uncovers a host of new characters including Preston Nichols' actual boss from the Montauk Project. Startling truths are revealed which lead to an examination of parallel universes and the nature of insanity itself.

While The Philadelphia Experiment Murder was being written, a man surfaced who had grown up in and around the mysterious Brookhaven Laboratory on Long Island, the very location where the Montauk Project was hatched. His amazing story is:

THE BROOKHAVEN CONNECTION

The Brookhaven Connection

Since the advent of the atomic era, Long Island's Brookhaven National Laboratory has served as the premier and most top secret research lab in the world. Shrouded in mystery since its inception, no one has been able to crack the code of secrecy surrounding it. Wade Gordon, who grew up in and around the lab and amidst its top players, now tells his personal story of how he was groomed from a very young age to share the legacy of what happened there. Beginning with Brookhaven's formative years when the Philadelphia Experiment was researched, links are revealed which tie Brookhaven directly to the Roswell Crash, the National Security Act, the MJ-12 documents (which are included in this book) and the Montauk Project. This includes a description of a time chamber which was utilized to monitor the JFK assassination in order to secure funding for the continued existence of the researchers.

One of the most interesting research threads Peter Moon had ever encountered occurred right after completing Montauk Revisited, but it took years for him to meet the man who was responsible for circulating this mysterious legend of quantum research on the internet. his name is Joseph Matheny. Together, they collaborated to put this into a hard copy book:

ONG'S HAT: THE BEGINNING

Ong's Hat: The Beginning

Ong's Hat is a real but enigmatic location in south central New Jersey that has inspired a counterculture revolution in physics. Exotic pursuits in the Many-Worlds Interpretation of quantum mechanics by Princeton physicists paved the way for avant-garde experiments in quantum consciousness. Integrating meditation with biofeedback and brain machine techniques, synchronicity attractors were developed which sought out tangible states of existence beyond the bounds of Earth. Allegedly, the experimenters achieved success with the accessing of parallel universes. Up to now, the truth about the cult has been vague and indecisive, but the legends, technology and quantum theory surrounding it are more than tangible. Since Peter Moon's involvement in the Montauk investigation, he has encountered incredible synchronicities with regard to space-time projects and clans of mystery. None of these have been more riveting than his encounter with Joseph Matheny and the legends of Ong's Hat, a real but enigmatic location in south central New Jersey that was once used as a return address for dissident Princeton physicists who wrote anonymous papers that broke the scientific barriers of the day. This is the first book in hard copy format to explore Ong's Hat, the home of a mysterious ashram with both scientific and natural features that included a hodgepodge of Tantra, Sufism, Ismaili esotericism, alchemy, psychopharmacology, biofeedback and brain machine meditation techniques that was said to involve actual time travel by the participants. Compiled by Joseph Matheny, a multi-talented individual who was "chosen" as an intermediary by the time-travel cult, this work is based upon the popular ebook known as "The Incunabula Papers," but also contains new material revealed for the first time that includes interviews with actual survivors from the ashram and the revealing of an "egg" used for attracting synchronicity induced time travel. Up to now, the truth about the cult has been vague and indecisive, but the legends, technology and quantum theory surrounding the cult have been more than tangible.

Peter Moon's collaboration with Joseph Matheny was a big breakthrough because it gave further answers to many of the fascinating magical threads which had been uncovered in Montauk Revisited. By this point in time, Peter was also sitting on many more aspects of that story, with particular regard to the Babalon Working and the connection between Jack Parsons and L. Ron Hubbard, which had not been fully communicated in his previous work. These were written up and released in:

SYNCHRONICITY & THE SEVENTH SEAL
by Peter Moon

SYNCHRONICITY AND the SEVENTH SEAL

Synchronicity & the Seventh Seal

This is Peter Moon's consummate work on Synchronicity. Beginning with a brief scientific description (for the layman) of the quantum universe and how the quantum observer (the spirit) can or does experience the principle of synchronicity, we are taught that synchronicity is also an expression of the divine or infinite mind. Besides exploring the concept and influences of parallel universes, this book includes numerous personal experiences of the author which not only forges a pathway of how to experience and appreciate synchronicity, but it goes very deep into the magical exploits of intriguing characters who sought to tap the ultimate powers of creation and use them for better or for worse. This not only includes the most in depth analysis and accurate depiction of the Babalon Working in print but also various antics and breakthroughs of the various players and that which influenced them. These characters include the legacies and personas of Jack Parsons, Marjorie Cameron, L. Ron Hubbard and Aleister Crowley. Peter Moon adds exponential intrigue to the mix by telling us of his personal experiences with these people and their wake which leads to even deeper encounters which penetrates the mysterious legacy of John Dee. Eventually, this pursuit of synchronicities leads Peter Moon to a most intriguing and mysterious encounter with Joseph Matheny, an adept who has not only had similar experiences to Peter, but has his own version of a space-time project known as Ong's Hat. Matheny has not only had incredible synchronicities himself, he created one of the highest forms of artificial intelligence known to man, a computer known as the Metamachine which is designed to precipitate and generate synchronicities. These many synchronicities lead to the books climax, a revelation of the true Seventh Seal. The proof is delivered. No theologian nor anyone has even tried to counter the claim.

After Synchronicity and the Seventh Seal was finished, Peter Moon wanted to complete a trail of investigation that he had pursued for many years and this had to do with occult phenomena surrounding a "quantum relic" he had been mysteriously handed when writing about the Montauk Pharoahs in Pyramids of Montauk. This "quantum relic" was so interwoven into the fabric of his life that he realized that, in order to present a complete picture, he would have to write two books instead of one. The first book was autiobiographical and includes an in depth look at Peter Moon's personal association with L. Ron Hubbard. It was deemed necessary to write this book before he could address the topic of the “quantum relic.”

THE MONTAUK BOOK OF THE DEAD

PETER MOON

The Montauk Book of the Dead

A tale of the intrigue and power which hovers over the most sacred kernel of our existence: the secrets of life and death. Beginning with his early years, Peter Moon reveals fascinating details of exactly how he became involved with Scientology and serendipitously ended up working in the personal employ of L. Ron Hubbard aboard the latter's famous "mystery ship" which was called the Apollo. Included in this riveting account is the story of how L. Ron Hubbard, at the age of twenty-seven, clinically "died" only to discover that he could "remote view." From this state of consciousness, which would later be called "exterior," he was able to access what he termed the answers to all of the questions that had ever puzzled philosophers or the minds of men. Transcribing this information into a work entitled "Excalibur," which is still under lock and key to this day, he developed one of the most controversial movements in history: Dianetics and Scientology. The truth and import of the above can only be evaluated by the all out war which was waged by governmental forces and spy agencies to obtain the legally construed rights to the above mentioned work and all of the developments and techniques that ensued from it. This is the personal story of Peter Moon which not only pierces the mystery of death and reveals fascinating details of his years aboard L. Ron Hubbard's mystery ship but gives the most candid and inside look ever at one of the most controversial figures in recent history.

When The Montauk Book of the Dead was completed, Peter Moon would finally correlate information and experiences he had accumulated for twelve years, all of which surrounded a mysterious "quantum relic" which was, in fact, a 1909 playbill from the New Montauk Theatre that contained cryptic occult messages which are expounded upon in full in:

THE MONTAUK BOOK OF THE LIVING

The Montauk Book of the Living

PETER MOON

The Montauk Book of the Living

A stunning new book by Peter Moon that tells how his research into the Montauk Pyramids led to the discovery of a mysterious quantum relic. This relic not only led to the Matriarch of the Montauk Pharoahs but has opened the door to understanding the greatest mysteries of history. These include the occult biochemistry of an Amazonian Blue Race which founded the Egyptian culture and honored the feminine principle through the star Sirius. These truths lead to the unveiling of the biological truth behind the Virgin Birth and how this theme intertwines with the descendants of these Amazons who live today and are known as the Blue People of the Saha ra. Other occult surprises include new revelations concerning Aleister Crowley's The Book of the Law that demonstrably reveals that the ancients who built the pyramids of Cairo and Mars knew deeper secrets concerning DNA that our scientists of tod ay. The pursuit of these various threads leads to Peter Moon's encounter with Red Medicine, the Medicine Man of the Montauks who is destined to fulfill the Second Coming of the Pharoahs, a time prophesied by native elders which signals the return of ancient wisdom, universal brotherhood and healing . This is also the riveting personal story of Peter Moon which includes new streams of synchronicity that include the mystical background behind the events which led to the revelation of the Montauk Project. Old themes are revisited and more deeply explored, but there are more new twists and turns than ever. The legacy of the Montauk Pharoahs is explored as never before and leads to more truth than can be readily believe which is designed to launch a new era once prophesied by Native Elders as the Second Coming of the Pharaohs, said to signal the return of ancient wisdom, universal brotherhood and healing.

Although intriguing follow-ups had been done with the data uncovered in Montauk Revisited and Pyramids of Montauk, there was also an equally fascinating trail of data with regard to the Nazi-Tibetan connection researched in The Black Sun. This research is so controversial and so proprietary to the Government that it is virtually impossible to pursue beyond a certain point if one is going to use routine journalism. Taking solid threads that are based upon hard facts of journalism, Peter Moon opted to penetrate the unknown or occult aspects of the Nazi-Tibetan story through an intuitive stream of consciousness in:

SPANDAU MYSTERY

SPANDAU MYSTERY

PETER MOON

Spandau Mystery

A historical novel by Peter Moon which reveals how the mysterious deaths of General George Patton and Deputy Fuhrer Rudolph Hess were intertwined through the Nazi's secret flying saucer technology. Directed by Tibetan elders, the Germans sought to harness the Vril, an energy so powerful that it can change the very nature of the elements themselves. To succeed, however, a major change was required in the evolutionary development of the human species. A dramatic scenario of events unfolded, however, which not only ensured that this endeavor was sabotaged but included an undertaking designed to prevent humanity from ever discovering its ancient heritage and the secrets of the Vril. It was against this backdrop that two of the most colorful characters of World War II, Rudolph Hess and George S. Patton, became immersed in an age old battle involving the legions of light and darkness. The end of World War Two precipitated more intrigue and struggle for power than the war itself. Much of this centered around the secret projects sponsored by Rudolph Hess which included not only the Antarctic project but the construction of Vril flying saucers. Patton's job, as the war came to a close, was to recover the secret technology of the Germans and safeguard it for American use. After accomplishing his mission and compiling a German history of the war, General Patton was killed in a dubious accident, the mystery of which has never been solved and has been magnified by government refusal to declassify the file on the investigation of his death. Far more conspicuous and powerful than Patton was Rudolph Hess, the Deputy Fuhrer of Germany, who flew to England in 1941 as an envoy of peace and was imprisoned for life and suspiciously killed just before his imminent release. The current of intrigue and power which permeated these two individuals and led to their downfall was the same current which led to a repatriation of the U.S. Government and an undermining of a constitutional government that is run by and for the people. Besides technology, much of this intrigue centered around the banking files the Nazis confiscated from the Freemasons. The effort to keep this secret is still a factor in today's politics. It was thus that Patton and Hess wore different uniforms but shared common interests and held within their grasp a force so powerful that, if harnessed, it might raise the ancient civilization of Atlantis itself. It was for this power that both were killed and so begins our mystery. Spandau Mystery is an historical novel and murder mystery featuring 350 pages of fast and easy reading which penetrates one of the greatest intrigues surrounding the Nazis and their occult interests in Tibet: the ancient Dropa civilization, a group of “little people” who claim to descend from the stars and whose corroborating artifacts have been studied by scientists for over half a century. If you would like a new view of world history, order and read this book today.

As all of the aforementioned books were written and Peter Moon continued to report on various aspects of the Montauk phenomena, he met a very unusual and intriguing scientist, Dr. David Anderson, an engineer and physicist who had his own Time Travel Research Center on Long Island. This was a serious laboratory where time could be slowed down or speeded up in a self-contained field. Dr. Anderson also had a research center in Romania and eventually invited Peter to that country to lecture at a United Nations camp for youth. During this time, The Montauk Project was translated into the Romanian language and was ultimately responsible for creating a brand new publishing company in Romania, Daksha Publishing, which subsequently published what is arguably the most amazing story in the history of Mankind. It is intertwined with Peter Moon’s adventures with Dr. David Anderson in:

Transylvanian Sunrise

A mysterious scientist by the name of David Anderson made an eventful trip to Romania in 1999. Dr. Anderson, who is credited by the U.S. government as having developed advanced time-warp field technology, established diplomatic connections on this trip to Romania where he also set up an advanced research facility dedicated to studying the mathematics of time travel. Upon his return to the United States, Dr. Anderson visited Preston Nichols and Peter Moon, internationally known authors of "The Montauk Project: Experiments in Time," and introduced himself. At Dr. Anderson's suggestion, a collaboration with Peter Moon began which was brief, tenuous and eventually aborted due to security considerations as a result of a logistical attack on a similar time research center that had been set up on Long Island. Dr. Anderson's continued journeys to Romania eventually resulted in connecting Peter Moon with a Romanian publisher and Radu Cinamar, a member of the Romanian Intelligence Service's occult department. The purpose of this collaboration has to do with what is arguably the most significant archaeological discovery in the history of Mankind: a mysterious holographic hall of records that utilizes technology far beyond the concepts of modern science. Transylvanian Sunrise is the story of this mysterious discovery and the political intrigue surrounding it, all capably told by Radu Cinamar. After Peter Moon secured the publishing rights to this remarkable story, Dr. Anderson invited him to Romania where he has pursued these mysteries one step further. The story is inside this book and waiting to be read.

288 pages, $22.00, ISBN 978-0-9678162-5-8

The remarkable story told in Transylvania Sunrise is exceeded in its sequel as it concerns the mysterious factors and actual characters that precipitated the most amazing discovery in the history of Mankind. Peter Moon also contributes with reports on his continued adventures with Dr. David Anderson and a journey to the ruins of an ancient culture in the heart of Transylvania in:

Transylvanian Moonrise: A Secret Initiation in the Mysterious Land of the Gods

Radu Cinamar rose to prominence for his role in exposing the most remarkable archaeological discovery in the history of Mankind: a secret chamber beneath the Romanian Sphinx containing holographic records of Earth's history, bio-resonance imaging technology, and three mysterious tunnels leading to the deepest secrets of the Inner Earth. Despite the political intrigue, turmoil and restriction around this great discovery, the leader of the expedition enabled Radu Cinamar to visit and explore these artifacts. Ever since, Radu's life has been a labyrinthine adventure of strange events, clandestine liaisons and extraordinary people and circumstances. In Transylvanian Moonrise, Radu is sought out by the mysterious Tibetan lama who orchestrated this discovery while working under an alias as Dr. Xien, a secret agent for the Chinese government. The enigmatic lama introduces Radu to a creature known as a yidam, an energetic and physical being who is created by a sand mandala ritual and can literally warp the space-time continuum and takes Radu on a mystical journey from Transylvania to the mysterious Land of the Gods in Tibet where he receives a secret initiation from the blue goddess Machandi. This is not only a remarkable story, but it is an initiation of the highest order that will benefit anyone reading it. Transylvanian Moonrise: A Secret Initiation in the Mysterious Land of the Gods will take you far beyond your ordinary imagination in order to describe events that have molded the past and will influence the future in the decades ahead.

THE MONTAUK PULSE: A CHRONICLE OF TIME

Issued quarterly, every Winter, Spring, Summer and Fall
by Peter Moon

A newsletter by the name of the Montauk Pulse went into print in the winter of 1993 to chronicle the events and discoveries regarding the ongoing investigation of the Montauk Project by Preston Nichols and Peter Moon. It has remained in print and been issued quarterly ever since. With a minimum of six pages and a distinct identity of its own, The Pulse will often comment on details and history that do not necessarily find their way into books.

Through 1995, the Montauk Pulse has included exciting new breakthroughs on the Montauk story as well as similarly related phenomena like the Philadelphia Experiment and other space-time projects. Consequently, the scope of the Pulse was expanded to embrace any new phenomena concerning time travel or related events. It has been the leading publication when it comes to covering the work of Dr. David Anderson and his time travel research. The cost for a subscription to the Montauk Pulse is $20.00. Do not add a shipping/handling charge, however, unless you are outside the USA. In such a case, please add $12.00. Back issues are available in three volumes of 24 issues each (spanning six years). Each individual volume is $30.00 each. See order form.

TRANSYLVANIAN MOONRISE

WITH PETER MOON

In August of 2003, a mysterious and unprecedented collaboration of American and Romanian military troops conducted an expedition beneath the Romanian Sphinx in the Bucegi Mountains and uncovered the greatest archeological find of all time: a mysterious chamber some 50,000 years old with holographic technology that is beyond man's wildest dreams.

Despite the political intrigue, turmoil and restriction around this great discovery, the leader of the expedition enabled Radu Cinamar to visit and explore these artifacts. Ever since, Radu's life has been a labyrinthine adventure of strange events, clandestine liaisons and extraordinary people and circumstances.

Transylvanian Moonrise tells the story of Radu's meeting with a Tibetan lama which is arranged by a mysterious alchemist whose ancestors have lived for hundreds of years by pursuing a secret tradition of the Great Work which prolongs life indefinitely until one can evolve beyond the physical plane. When Radu's meeting takes place, the lama is accompanied by a yidam, a mysterious creature with supernatural powers that is created through a ritual using a Tibetan sand mandala. The lama reveals how he set the aforementioned events in motion in order to fix major imbalances in the Earth.

"Transylvanian Moonrise: A Secret Initiation in the Mysterious Land of the Gods" is not only a remarkable story, but it is an initiation of the highest order that will take you far beyond your ordinary imagination in order to describe events that have molded the past and will influence the future in the decades ahead.

Introduction — by Peter Moon

In 2009 we published Transylvanian Sunrise which told the story of a remarkable discovery beneath the Romanian Sphinx in the Bucegi Mountains of Romania. It all began when Radu Cinamar, the author, was invited to meet a very mysterious man who worked in the most secretive department of Romania's intelligence service. His name is Cezar Brad.

Cezar came to the attention of the Romanian secret service on the day he was born. The doctor was not able to cut his incredibly thick umbilical cord and duly reported this, as he would any other anomaly, to the communist authorities. Cezar's parents were then visited by state security and a financial arrangement was made whereby they would report any unusual behavior emanating from or associated with the child. As Cezar began to demonstrate extra sensitive or psychic behavior, he was brought under the tutelage of a mysterious Dr. Xien, on loan to Romania from Red China as part of a cultural exchange program between the two communist countries.

Cezar's tutoring came under the jurisdiction of Department Zero, the most secretive apparatus in Romania's intelligence service. It was also referred to as the Occult Department and literally became Cezar's home after the age of twelve. He would eventually grow up to become the head of this department and answered only to a mysterious General Obadea who answered directly to the Communist Dictator. With an uncanny amount of tact, both Cezar and General Obadea held their positions in Department Zero after the fall of the dictator Ceaușescu.

It was while running the "X Files" department of the Romanian government that Cezar was approached by a man who would change the destiny of Romania forever. This was Signore Massini, one of the highest ranking members of Italian Freemasonry who also claimed to be a high ranking member of the Bilderbergers. Massini explained that the satellite radar technology of the Pentagon revealed that there was a hidden chamber beneath the Romanian Sphinx. He offered Cezar, who had considerable autonomy when it came to conducting secret investigations, many false promises if he would cooperate in letting his people excavate in order to reach this chamber.

Although he did not trust Massini one bit, Cezar knew that if he resisted his request he would soon be replaced in Department Zero. As the Romanian President and the head of security were the only ones outside of Department Zero to know of its existence, Cezar realized that Massini must have very special connections indeed for him to even know who Cezar was. Accordingly, he felt the smartest thing to do was to play along.

Eventually, through its strange affiliation with Italian Freemasonry, the Pentagon sent in American troops to do the tunneling and excavation required to access the hidden chamber. It took high powered atomic laser technology to get the job done and there were many difficulties. After many trials and tribulations, success was achieved. The hidden chamber was unsealed and it revealed far more than one might ever imagine. This included technology whereby one could place their hand on a table and see their own DNA in microscopic form in three-dimensional holograms.

Other devices on the table enabled one to see the DNA of alien species from other planets with accompanying star renderings so that one could see where they actually came from. By placing two hands on different parts of the table, one could also “mix” the DNA of two species so as to see how they might look if hybridized. As the tables themselves were six feet high, it seemed the creatures who built them, perhaps 50,000 years ago, were gigantic compared to humans of today.

This remarkable chamber also included a “Projection Hall” whereby one could see a holographic rendition of the history of Earth that was tailored to the individuality of whoever might be viewing it. This history, however, abruptly cuts off in about the Fifth Century A.D., perhaps because it required some sort of software update. One of the more intriguing aspects of the Projection Hall is that it also contains three mysterious tunnels that lead into the bowels of the Earth and similar facilitates in Iraq, Mongolia, Tibet and also beneath the Giza Plateau in Egypt. One of the tunnels leads, quite enigmatically, into the Inner Earth itself.

Although this was the most remarkable discovery ever made in the history of archeology, the politics around the situation became highly strained with the Romanians, the Americans and the Italian Freemasonry all vying for control. Despite the extreme political tension, Cezar Brad arranged for Radu Cinamar to visit the hidden chamber and the projection hall itself. His account is given in Transylvanian Sunrise, the predecessor to this book.

Political tensions reach a climax which is triggered by American soldiers who are guarding a similar chamber with holographic technology that was previously discovered near Baghdad. As they watch over this other mysterious chamber, they witness a holographic projection showing them that a similar device in Romania has been discovered. Their report to their superiors through standard command channels results in a rather furious investigation which eventually reveals that the Pentagon has forces in Romania. Ultimately, the American president calls the Romanian president in an effort to find out what is going on. The Italian Freemason is forced to abandon the scene for his own self-preservation and what ensues in the end, after many heated negotiations, is unprecedented diplomatic relations between Romania and the United States. Romania becomes a part of NATO.

While the claims made my Radu Cinamar are extraordinary, so are the circumstances surrounding them. Many of these are verifiable and you will read about them in this book. As of this writing, I have visited Romania for three consecutive years (2008-2010) and have had occasion to see some very interesting parts of that country, including the sphinx. After meeting with many different Romanians and also receiving many communications from Radu, it is my privileged and learned opinion that the events he describes are genuine.

The story you are about to read is even more remarkable than what was presented in the first book. It also corrects the only major flaw in that original manuscript because it elucidates and develops the most intriguing character therein. I am referring to the mysterious and enigmatic Dr. Xien who oversaw the education and psychic development of Cezar Brad, all the time priming him to become the head of Department Zero. As the story developed, Dr. Xien disappeared and we never heard what happened to him nor did we find out who he really was. As you will soon read, Dr. Xien was part of the Chinese government's special "psychic team," but he was actually an incognito Tibetan lama with an agenda all his own.

Transylvanian Sunrise and Transylvanian Moonrise are books that will cause you to stretch your boundaries of what is possible. This is not a bad thing. Stretching your muscles makes them more pliable and flexible in dealing with the obstacles that life can throw at you. You are hereby invited to stretch your mind. A flexible mind will enable you to better cope with the challenges you might encounter in your own life.

In Part II of this book, I have reported on additional developments as well as my own adventures in Tranyslvania. This is an ongoing drama that is expected to continue for many years to come.

Editor's Note — by Sorin Hurmuz

(Note: The following Editor's Note is from Sorin Hurmuz, the editor and publisher of Radu Cinamar's original book which is entitled "Viitor cu cap de mort" in the Romanian language. This translates as "Death's Head Future" in English, however, the name of "Transylvanian Sunrise" has been chosen for the English language version. "Viitor cu cap de mort" and "Transylvanian Sunrise" are one and the same book.)

The publishing of "Viitor cu cap de mort" forced society to confront a disturbing reality. Indeed, we can say that the work of Radu Cinamar generated many question marks within people's consciousness. Some readers tried to find out the hidden meaning behind his incredible narrative. A central newspaper dedicated two pages to this subject, partially confirming various elements in the book. We want to thank all those who shared their discoveries with us as well as those who sent positive feedback.

During the time that has passed since publishing "Transylvanian Sunrise" , our editorial staff received numerous calls from readers expressing their opinion over the very exciting subject of the book. Most readers had a very favorable reaction and congratulated us for having the courage to publish such a book.

Besides the great discovery in the Bucegi Mountains, which is described in the last chapter of the book, it is also important to point out that Radu Cinamar offered us a true gold mine of esoteric information that can guide us in our everyday life. These very important elements are delivered by the author in such a direct and categorical way and had such an impact over the readers that we happily see the book becoming a best-seller in its category.

I have often been asked if I know the author personally and if what is written in the book is true. As I have already alluded to, there are numerous confirmations related to what is written in "Transylvanian Sunrise." One surprising proof was included in an article signed by Adina Mutar in the February 7, 2005 edition of Ziarul newspaper out of which I have selected a few fragments:

“Cabinet 1 set up a special unit to study paranormal phenomena and to train ‘para soldiers’ in the Buzau Mountains. Cabinet 2 was envious. This is how a unit of ‘paranormals’ was formed at the orders of Elena Ceaușescu, a unit that received diverse missions from her, including searching for treasures of legend. First of all, Elena’s men were there to spy on the ‘para soldiers’ led by General Ilie Ceaușescu. Then, after obtaining certain ‘abilities,’ Elena’s men were sent to look for ancient treasures hidden in mysterious caves in the Carpathians, particularly in Bucegi, where it was said that an immense gallery exists that is filled with gold.”

NATIONAL SECURITY’S DEPARTMENT ZERO

“At the end of last year, a strange book entitled “Transylvanian Sunrise” by Radu Cinamar was published. It mentions some sensational discoveries by Department Zero, a secret department of State Security with many zeros, which means it was very secret. It was founded in 1968 at the orders of Nicolae Ceaușescu to discover, educate and develop human subjects with unusual capacities based upon the models of the USA, USSR and China, countries who are very advanced in that field. As Ceaușescu was not on good terms with the Russians at that time and refused to support Moscow in what was called the Prague Spring, it seems, according to the author of the book, that a treaty was signed with China which specified that a certain Dr. Xien, a master of parapsychology, would organize and supervise the activity of this ultra secret department for fifteen years while Romania offered study grants to one hundred Chinese students during the same period. The author placed the location of two of Department Zero’s bases with one being ‘close to town B’ and another one in the Retezat Mountains. He also mentions a few significant missions named ‘K events’ such as the disappearance of people from the Buzau Mountains in 1981 that we covered as well in a past edition of Ziarul. We are also told about a detection system of ‘the specific frequency of vibration of every being, object or phenomena based on the principle of resonance.’ This is actually a machine invented by Carol Przyilla and under the absolute ‘protection’ of Elena Ceaușescu’s ‘security.’ ”

MEN IN BLACK IN BOZIORU

“Starting from an evidentiary data base that was revealed by others who were involved at that time in such activities, we discover that the ‘K events’ of the mysterious Department Zero merge with those of the paranormal army unit, based in the Bucegi Mountains, that were subordinate to General Ilie Ceaușescu. Researcher Vasile Rudan, a specialist in extrasensory perceptions, worked for this unit under a strict contract. He led extrasensory experiments on gifted children and all the reports, photos, negatives, and film strips were handed over to the respective unit. He was not allowed to keep anything. [...]”

CABINET 2 IS SPYING

“I contacted General Nicolae Plesita and asked him about Security’s Department Zero and its paranormal preoccupations.

‘I’ve never heard of such a thing,’ he said. ‘I heard about the Army ones but not the Security ones. But Elena Ceaușescu was dealing with such issues within the National Council of Technology and Science over which she presided. The first vice-president was Ion Ursu. Within the NCTS was a department that had in their responsibilities any research or experimentation of such phenomena. [...]’

‘After further “digging,” I have found out from a retired colonel who used to work in DNS (Department of National Security) that indeed there were people within the NCTS who had the job description “monitoring paranormal research,” their reports being under Code Zero and sent to Elena Ceaușescu. She distributed it to three subordinates. Two of these would be working for the DNS. One would get the reports about strategic deposits – uranium, petrol – that were discovered by extrasensory perceptions, while the other would get certain inventions, further on dealt with by the Institute of Advanced Technology. The third one was in charge of the issues of Elena Ceaușescu’s personal interest. In other words, Ceaușescu’s paranormals were doing all the work and those from Cabinet 2 were spying on them and stealing their reports. [...]’ ”

THE LEGENDS OF PELES

“Elena Ceaușescu found out about the treasures in Bucegi thanks to queen Elisabeta-Carmen Sylca who, in the book Stories of Peles gathered many stories from locals and shepherds about the fabulous treasures that were hidden deep in the mountains. It is written that in ‘the Hag’s Castle’ there is a subterranean fortress where an enormous amount of gold is deposited. It seems like it was not by chance that king Carol I picked this place to build Peles castle – inaugurated in 1883 – in Bucegi. Many foreign publications have observed the strange ensemble of megalithic sculptures on the Sphinx-Babele slope and the caves guarded by monasteries. The priests, keepers and guardians of secret treasures left by our ancestors from generation to generation, had built a true network of monasteries as a first line of defense and fortification. [...]"

THE SACRED CAVE IN BUCEGI

"First of all, the publications writing about caves or treasures were monitored. In the study named 'Hyperborean Dacia,' published in Paris in 1936 and then republished in France and Italy in the 1980s when it created a stir, Vasile Lovinescu wrote in these studies that 'Om Mountain (also known as Mount Omu) is traversed by an enormous cave, one of the largest in the world – and its end was never reached – only being explored for approximately 20 km. Who explored it and for what purpose was not mentioned. Between 1966 and 1968, the Peruvian architect Daniel Ruzo came to Romania to examine the sphinx (with whose name he did not agree) which he had seen on a postal card. He was accompanied by a team of Romanians who used this opportunity to film a documentary for the Alexandru Sahia Studios called 'Stone Mysteries.' Ruzo had noticed that the sphinx looked like the main face of an ensemble of statues sculpted on a slope of the Marcahuasi plateau in Peru and named 'The Monument of Mankind.' As a matter of fact, the sphinx is not just a face and is surrounded by other human faces of different races and even the head of a dog. Backing his conclusions on his vast experience, Ruzo says that the dog plays the role of a treasure guardian and that 'there must also be a treasure cave' near this magnificent Monument of Man."

ON THE BRINK OF IMMORTALITY

"Another researcher who made an ample study of the Bucegi summit – a study that reached the offices of Cabinet 2 – was Cristina Panculescu. According to her theory, explored at length in the book "UFO – Parallel Universes" by Colonel Emil Strainu, in Bucegi near Mount Omu there is an energetic-informational center of Terra, pointed to by all the traditions of ancient civilizations. Cristina Panculescu highlighted, through a series of rock sample analysis and electronography, some very special properties of this Sky Pillar – Tree of Life, identified as Ocolit Peak. Finally she proved that the center is a geometric place of cosmic connection, an exit gate out of the terrestrial universe with a measurable energetic activity, manifested in cycles. She observes that since 1986 the intensity of the center went above the latency threshold. The center was also known during the Dacic rule, being placed on the holy mountain Kogayon. ‘Called by the sphinx, Dacia’s people knew how to become immortal’ is the conclusion of the study, finished in 1988 and presented to the Central Committee of the Romanian Communist Party and from there, by mysterious ways, found its way to the desk of Elena Ceaușescu’s people. And maybe she too flirted with the idea of immortality as many other leaders throughout history have done with their cohorts of alchemists who sought the Philosophical Stone in order to obtain the elixir of life and turn any metal into gold. Elena Ceaușescu was a ‘collector’ of all sorts of rejuvenating and recovering practices, be it at home or abroad; but the events of December ’89 (meaning revolution) were close and there was no time for other underground exploration except the underground of power. In her time these theories were studied more assiduously although in great secrecy. Today they are made public but the authorities do not seem to care much. As for the fabulous treasure from the Bucegi Mountains, it has not been found simply because the Treasure Gate has not been found and this gate leads to the great gallery that is chock full of gold. It is said, however, in Transylvanian Sunrise that this great gallery has been found by NASA satellites and therein lies a priceless treasure with regard to the history of Mankind. But maybe the author rushed things a little bit. [...]”

THE TREASURE GATE

“Elena Ceaușescu’s people were well oriented. One of the most fervent researchers of Romania’s sacred geography, Dan Corneliu Braneanu, who published numerous articles about the sacerdotal (sacerdotal means priestly) center in Bucegi, confirms that in the depth of the mountain is a network of underground galleries that might connect to several caves that also connect with other sacred centers in the world. He also studied Daniel Ruzo’s book “La historia fantastica de un descubrimiento,” published by Diana publishing house in Mexico, about his travels through ‘the holy mountains’ of Romania that still hold memories of the civilization before the Flood.

Ruzo was fascinated by the numerous sacred representations on the cliffs that guard the way to Omu, ‘ancient sculptures, made before the Flood, eroded by age’ portraying priests and lions, keepers of the treasures. ‘I studied many proto historic sacred centers around the world, but here in the Carpathians, I found the Treasure Gate,’ wrote Daniel Ruzo. What treasure is he talking about? The answer comes from Dan Corneliu Bradeanu: ‘It is not just a material treasure but a mainly spiritual one that transmits information from one cycle to another of civilizations roaming Terra since time immemorial. Lobsang Rampa launched the idea of an underground initiatory deposit in the mountains of Tibet, von Danniken located one in the mountains of Ecuador and Daniel Ruzo felt that the sacred triad ends in Bucegi, if not actually starting here. As for the word OM, it has an important spiritual meaning and that is found in many toponyms only in our country.’”

AT THE THUNDERSTRUCK ROCK

“After much research which also included dowsing or radiesthesia (radionics in English), Corneliu Braneanu assumes that an entrance gate to the underground network beneath Omu could be in the Obarsia Ialomitei Valley in a place dominated by a cliff called ‘The Thunderstruck church’ or ‘The Thunderstruck Rock,’ a cliff that ends suddenly in a vertical stone wall that also acts as a supporting wall. At the base of this stone wall you can find shattered stones, probably as a result of an entrance tunnel dug into the subterranean tunnel network (that joins together several caves in Bucegi) excavated over 40.000 years ago (the dating was made by radiesthesia) and which is now covered. The stone figures noticed by Ruzo during his climb towards Omu could mark the vertical plane in which this gate is located, at an actual depth of 12 metres.’ ”

The excerpts you have just read are not the only corroborations of Radu Cinamar’s story. There are others. I am using this opportunity to inform all of our readers that I personally do not know Mister Radu Cinamar. I have no data, information or references about him and all of my attempts in this direction yielded no result. The content of the book was received by email and all other arrangements were made in the same way, all at the express request of the author. After a few hesitations on my part, mainly due to this unusual way of collaboration, I accepted to publish the material as I considered its exceptional valuable for the Romanian people. The same procedures were followed with this book you are about to read, a work which you will soon see is even more outrageous than the previous one. Mister Radu Cinamar is a very secretive man and I understand his reasons perfectly, reasons that stem directly from the elements he presents in his books. Nonetheless, I nurture a strong hope that I will get to meet him in a not too distant future, and I have no doubt that this is what the majority of his readers wish for as well.

“Transylvanian Moonrise: A Secret Initiation in the Mysterious Land of the Gods” manages to turn inside out almost all of our ideas about life and the universe we live in. Although clearly presented, the notions and events in the book can shock our mentality so much that I feel obliged to accept that maybe we all need a profound re-evaluation of the way we think and live.

BABELE

This rock formation is known as Babele which means “old women” in Romanian, but it also means “gateway” as in the word Babalon or Babylon. The rock is within a hundred yards of the Romanian Sphinx. The mystery chamber is midway beneath the two monuments but submerged deep within the mountain and far below the surface. If you seek out the military installation nearby, you will be chased away by soldiers before you even get to a fence. There are, however, plenty of hiking trails that are unrestricted and some of these, so it is said, will rejuvenate your energy so that you are not tired after walking for eight hours.

Foreword — by Radu Cinamar

If the amazing events I was involved in during the past two years had been limited to the extraordinary discovery from the Bucegi Mountains (which I presented in my previous book, “Transylvanian Sunrise”), maybe I would not have had any good reasons to write a new book. Not even the Great Expedition, led by Cezar through the enormous enigmatic underground tunnels starting from the Projection Room, would have had a strong enough impulse upon me to write about its main aspects. There are two reasons why. On the one hand, this is presently one of the greatest state secrets in Romania. Upon his return and just as I expected, Cezar kept his promise of sharing with me the most important events and discoveries of the expedition that he ventured into with an elite commando unit formed by fifteen top-trained army people. Their mission may be the most adventurous and fascinating exploration in the history of Humankind.

Although I do not know every detail of it, I can say that I have a pertinent general perspective of its amazing realities which I learned from Cezar when I met with him at the end of October (2004), a year after he started the expedition. The political climate was quite ‘hot’ then as we were in that critical time just before the elections. As far as I understood, Cezar’s report lasted for five days and he was audited by a special Romanian-American commission. It is even plausible that certain political factors were radically influenced by the new discoveries and evidence that was brought up. I have heard that the members of the auditing committee were so troubled by the data and evidence presented that they were unable to make any decision for several hours or to correctly transmit the information to the top echelon of the state. Their entire system of values was completely turned on its head and there were no other arguments left to support their old beliefs. Maybe that is why it was concluded that a radical transformation of the occult system and influences within the country was necessary.

It is amazing how the chain of events starting with the great discovery in the Bucegi mountains and continuing with the major expedition along the underground tunnels has changed almost for good the way of thinking as well as the destiny of certain people. I count myself among these as I had to rapidly adapt to significant changes in my own existence. These transformations mainly involved my inner being. The occult universe in which I have been gradually initiated by Cezar plus the fact that I am now convinced of certain astounding aspects of the physical and subtle processes of life has encouraged me to spend time studying books and papers on the subject with great interest, thus increasing my knowledge of these aspects which are most often completely ignored by the majority of people.

I have noticed, however, that it is incredibly difficult to depict in a credible way certain situations and events which are on the borderline of the absurd to an ordinary mentality. This is the other reason why I am not going to describe the Great Expedition. Besides the fact that Cezar does not agree with me writing about it, I also think that it is highly unlikely that the account of the unusual trip will have a real impact in the consciousness of most people. Of course, this might only be a transient situation as the way events play themselves out at a global level, especially now in this critical period of Mankind's history, are unpredictable and often shocking. This can cause a once played-down event to be reconsidered at its real value later on. With close analysis, we can see that all that happens in this world follows a guided path whose shining light is already seen by certain human beings who are capable of recognizing it among many other possibilities. We can then expect a rapid and astonishing transformation in people's consciousness; and only then will the elements of the Great Expedition which started in the Bucegi Mountains be appreciated and understood at their just value. This is the situation with regard to the great masses of people.

Cezar personally informed me that there are already a few groups aiming to build a sort of informational and even practical data base in order to ease the assimilation of the Great Expedition's revelations for the rest of humanity. At the same time, he informed me that there also are groups interested in taking control over any decisions made at the highest level of national security with regards to the Bucegi discovery. Cezar did not see Signore Massini again, but he found out that he and two other "brains" of the world's Masonic elite had more than once been in contact and led significant talks with certain political figures in Romania and, more importantly, in the United States.

In one of my chats with Cezar, after an absence of longer than a year, he told me that both he and General Obadea had felt pressured in regards to this. From this point of view, despite the positive effects of the great discovery and of the expedition, it seems like the “battle between good and evil” intensified even more. The plot is much more complex and contains ultra secret elements which, although I know about it from my conversation with Cezar, I am not allowed to reveal now. But I am sure that there will be a time of “great revelations,” and as some signs already show, this is not too far away.

Sometimes, in order to allow for a harmonious and coherent development of events, it is important that we do not “force” things, even if it is possible to do so and the intention is apparently profoundly beneficial. After all, the reality we all live in at a microcosmic level is only the reflection of the universal laws acting on a macrocosmic level. The variations and transformations that happen in our world need to be given a profound meaning and be used wisely in order to avoid any distortions or disturbances of the rhythm.

The present situation of the Romanian people and of the entirety of Mankind is like that of a cancer sufferer. The disease is serious but it can be cured. It is not a simple cold that can be treated immediately. For a cancer patient, avoiding metastasis requires precise and intelligent action. For example, if in his great desire of being cured, the sufferer finds out about a miraculous treatment and applies it immediately, without any discernment, then it is very likely that his body will not cope as it is not ready yet for the influx of healing energy. Hence, he first needs a few preliminary stages of purification and only then can he have the actual treatment that will cure him.

In the same way, the consciousness of the masses, riddled with the complex vices and hardships of modern society, is not always at the necessary level to assimilate correctly certain information and knowledge that could even cause a closing down of its receptivity or a recoil. This is exactly why it is better to wait for the right moment before revealing the shocking truths that Cezar shared with me, especially as they concern our own country as well as humanity as a whole. In other words, this is an issue with a global impact and ample force to penetrate the consciousness of the masses if they are ready to receive it.

On an individual level, the situation is much simpler. When the events we participate in take a spectacular turn, we instinctively feel that destiny is making us ready us for something. We find ourselves, almost uncontrollably, in such circumstances that we are practically forced to adapt as we go to the new path of things, having at the same time a lively interest and intense aspiration in knowing more and acting more efficiently. This is the exact situation I am in now. I only partly know the subtle forces involved and their hidden reasons, but I feel very strongly that they guide me step by step towards a very well defined moment in the future. What I can assert is the amazing intensity of the events I am going to describe in this book and also the fact that it fundamentally transformed my entire being. I am very tempted to believe that my meetings and talks with Cezar, the initiatory explanations he offered, even my being present at the place of the great discovery in the Bucegi Mountains, together with learning about the main aspects of the expedition led by him were only a sort of waiting-room, an absolutely necessary preparation for what I was about to experience afterwards. The facts are well correlated and I intuit that every action is integrated into a larger causal ensemble that is heading towards a certain aim with the precision of a timer.

What I have been faced with exceeds by far even the “illusion” we live during a dream. I must confess that through all of these events, happening in a period of approximately two weeks, a state of complete amazement was permanently present. I can even say that it was the “engine” behind a fundamental transformation of my being, the profoundly spiritual nature of which makes it even harder to describe in precise and eloquent terms. I am aware that what follows might raise a big question mark for some readers and maybe they will even consider it as a fantasy. What can I say in such a situation but that each of us feels and considers as is told by his heart and soul? As far as I am concerned, I feel free and purified of the “fog” of many aspects and realities that I not only never understood but did not even have a clue even existed. I feel and live intensely every moment of my life and I intuit a much more profound meaning to my existence.

Before any of you who are reading this book could doubt its authenticity, I myself have been faced with the impulse of doubt and amazement that often made me wonder if I am dreaming or it is all happening for real. Beyond these mental shocks that I am sure the reader will also experience, I was helped in discerning reality from fantasy and truth from illusion. Even more, I was guided in such a way that these revelations became profound beliefs within my consciousness and the basis of it all. What sustained this essential process was an ample energetic transformation that happened within my being.

I could liken this “miracle” to the situation of a man who fasted for several days, eating nothing and drinking only water. Metaphorically speaking, this is the normal state of ordinary humans who live their lives in an almost larvae-like condition without even suspecting the immense potential capacities that can be accessed instantly if so desired. Of course, at the end of his fast, the man is weak and feeble. Even so, keeping this analogy, he is not aware of the situation he is in, believing that to be his normal state. As soon as he starts eating, he can notice how strong fluxes of energy are flowing through his entire being, infusing him with life force, strength to act, inspiration, will power, happiness and many other feelings and perceptions he was not aware of before. The pointless life, often insipid and limited to prosaic and paltry goals, then vanishes. This is the “miracle” generated by the energetic depths of our being.

I am now capable of better understanding, although still only partially, the consciousness and subtle energetic condition of Cezar Brad as I too live at the present a different life, much richer and effervescent than the one I had before. Before drafting this book, I told Cezar about the amazing things I have been through. In his inimitable way, full of calm and understanding, he was genuinely happy for me and at the same time gave me some precious advice to help with my rapid evolution. I felt he is very satisfied seeing that his choices and efforts concerning me were not without result.

I do not think there is anyone who does not want to be happy and know the mysteries of the universe, but we then have the fundamental question: how do we achieve such a thing? As far as I know, there are many ways; but they all have in common one element: the fact that we are dealing with a process of becoming that takes time. Maybe this is why some people give up on the spiritual path of knowledge right before obtaining a true inner transformation within their being: they are frightened by the effort they need to put into it and the idea of perseverance. In my case, the transformation was extremely rapid and lasted only twelve days. It is likely that, if it lasted longer, my mind would have found some “subversive” ways of attenuating the shock caused by the astounding events I was witness to and then I would have gotten stuck at an inferior level of understanding. Who knows how long I would have had to stay there before my next jump?!

What happened during those sublime twelve days of my life is the subject of the book you are holding now. If I were to refer those days to my own subjective passing of time, I would say I actually lived a couple of years, but in a very condensed way and in a complex dimension of my being. In order to be able to understand that dimension, destiny facilitated my meeting with several beings, not always human, who precisely marked my journey up to my extraordinary meeting with Machandi. That was, without any shadow of doubt, the turning point of my existence. Nothing from then on was the same. Another world, another universe...

Only a few months has passed since then and the intensity of what I lived then and the characteristic vibration never left me for even one moment. That is why I decided to make it known, through this medium, to the readers whose interest might be awakened. There is a reason and a meaning to every aspect of our lives. Maybe in this immense ensemble, my sharing of what happened to me will be like a miraculous cog that will trigger a profound spiritual transformation within your being. During all such transformations it is fundamental to enter the subtle heart...

ANTENNA STATION

This is an antenna station you can see from the sphinx. It is not part of the secret installation per se, but it shows an official presence of the government in the area. It was a very cloudy day and hard to get a clear picture. Most of the time the antenna was covered in fog.

Chapter 1 — The Man That Time Forgot

A few weeks after “Transylvanian Sunrise” was published, I got a phone call from my editor. We had an understanding that telephone contact to me would only be used in absolutely urgent situations. Due to the nature of the elements presented in the first book, it was to be expected that I would be confronted with various reactions from my readers or certain state organizations. Accordingly, I asked my editor to take care of such correspondence and bring only the most important ones to my attention. I had no idea, however, that this particular phone call was going to turn my life around as fast and as incredibly as it did.

A bit embarrassed, the director of the publishing house explained that for several days in a row he had received regular phone calls on his mobile phone from a man who did not want anything else but to speak to me personally in regard to a very important matter. The editor explained that the man did not give him any more details and did not want to introduce himself either. As the man was very courteous and well mannered, he was politely refused several times under different pretexts. After dozens of such requests, the discussions were firmly ended. Nevertheless, these matters did not have a simple ending.

Just two or three days after their “final” phone conversation, my editor was called once more by the same man whose tone was much firmer but still polite. This time, the energetic impact of the conversation impressed the editor more than the others and he suddenly started to wonder if, after all, it would be opportune to arrange a meeting between me and that person. The decisive element that weighed on his decision was the special mention that the man added at the end of his call. He said that the actual one who so insistently wanted to meet me was a Tibetan lama. That surprised me and I started paying attention.

I asked the editor a few more questions about the identity of the one he spoke to, but his reply was that the man refused to leave his name or any other detail. He only mentioned that it was a very special situation. This is exactly why this respectful but very mysterious person asked for understanding, insisting once more that it was very important that he contact me. Finally, my editor agreed to inform me of the situation without promising that I would consent to any meeting. The man left a mobile phone number in case I decided to accept the offer.

I thanked my editor and assured him that he did the right thing by contacting me. I found the situation intriguing and was becoming a little curious. I had never met a Tibetan lama before; and besides, I was wondering why someone like him would be interested in me. Without waiting any longer and feeling like I was pushed by an unseen force accompanied with a strange inner emotion, I went to a public pay phone and called the number I had written down. After a few rings, a man with a pleasant voice and a slight Transylvanian accent answered my call. I introduced myself and said I was willing to talk if I was told beforehand the purpose of the discussion.

“What I can tell you right now,” said the man, “is that we will not have that conversation over the phone. I was myself asked to intermediate a meeting with you, and I want to insist on this meeting’s secret nature.”

“I have been told that it is a Tibetan lama that wants to speak to me,” I said, asking for more details.

“That is true and if you agree, I can give you the address right now,” he said, elegantly avoiding any other explanations.

We agreed that we would meet in two days time. I confess that during those two days of waiting I became more and more impatient and interested in the reason behind this meeting. The mysterious aura of the person I spoke with and who had avoided introducing himself was intriguing as was the special importance he gave to this meeting. There was also the prospect that I was going to talk to a Tibetan lama without even knowing the subject of the conversation. All of these things gave me a state of excitement similar to the one I had when I was supposed to meet Cezar for the first time. In a way, my curiosity and restlessness were well founded. Although I suspected it was all related to the great discovery in the Bucegi Mountains, I still could not imagine what the connection with the Tibetan lama was all about.

My confusion was deepened by the fact that Cezar never mentioned anything about a Tibetan knowing about the connecting underground tunnel towards the Tibetan plateau. In the first part of the Great Expedition, which concerned the advance through the Egyptian branch and then through the Tibetan branch, incredible things were discovered – incredible for the beliefs and values of the modern society (these are aspects which, as I have mentioned before, I am not yet allowed to make public); but no human beings were encountered. I found out from Cezar that in the Tibetan area, starting from the tunnel that was leading there, an offshoot was forming towards the surface but it was completely blocked. Topographical studies showed that this particular offshoot of the tunnel was dividing into two, one going towards Mountain Kailasa, where a very old lamasery exists, and the other one going towards Lhasa, the capital, probably having a secret connection with the royal palace. There was another major offshoot from the main tunnel which went in the direction of the Gobi plateau, but this direction had not been pursued in the first stage of the expedition.

Nevertheless, the surprise I was about to experience during this imminent meeting surpassed even my most fantastic expectations. I can certainly say that it was one of the crucial moments that deeply transformed my existence. The unfolding events of the next couple of days were something akin to the effects of shock therapy, ideologically as well as existentially.

ELINOR

During the afternoon of the second day after the phone call, I went to the given address. It was a secluded street in an exclusive neighbourhood of Bucharest. The smart houses were shaded by big leafy trees that were moving slowly in the quiet afternoon. I found the house very easily. It was a one story villa that had been recently renovated with a very modern and ingenious design. After ringing the intercom, I was let in almost immediately. A bit nervous, I entered a small courtyard full of greenery with two well cared for paved alleys. Quickly going up a few stairs, I found myself in front of a beautifully carved front door which then fully opened.

At last I was greeted by the mysterious man whose accent I immediately recognized; however, I was quite surprised to notice that he was very young. He did not look older than twenty-six or twenty-seven and was blond, of medium height and was wearing a green shirt and matching trousers. His calm and smiling face invited trust and honesty, but his eyes had hidden depths. Despite his youth, he left me with the impression of being very mature in his gestures and thinking.

Politely inviting me into the living-room, the man introduced himself; but as the meeting happened under confidential terms, I will not divulge his real name. As he knew I would write this book, he suggested I should use the pseudonym Elinor instead of his name.

“In my case though,” he said, “this name issue is relative. It is a family ‘heirloom’ that needs adapting from time to time.”

“How so?” I asked, expressing my confusion. “I don’t understand — you change your name?”

“I am forced to, so I don’t have any troubles,” he replied. “But why? I am honestly surprised,” I said, sitting in a leather armchair as I sipped oriental tea that Elinor had offered.

The ambience of the room was wonderful. There was an ingenious design of mixed antique and modern pieces that induced a comfortable feeling of relaxation and high spirits. The young man explained that the lama was going to arrive soon so we began a naturally flowing conversation which soon turned into a series of amazing revelations.

“I knew we would quickly arrive at this point in our discussion,” Elinor said. “Under the present circumstances, however, I’ve decided it is reasonable to share with you a terrible secret, one for whom some would be willing to kill. Besides, this is the main reason why I am so careful with this information, but I know that your integrity is indubitable and your good intentions are wonderful.”

I ensured Elinor of my absolute discretion and at the same time made him understand that I was very interested in what he wanted to tell me.

“Soon enough,” he went on, “I will have to change my name again as otherwise I would attract some unwanted attention. The reason for this is that my physical appearance does not correspond to my real age.”

I was still unable to grasp the essence of the issue.

“Well, I can’t see any discrepancy!” I said confidently. “After all, you look very good for a young man of not even thirty.”

Elinor was quiet for a while, looking at me very seriously.

“The problem is that I am actually sixty-two,” he said very calmly. “I already arouse suspicions in certain people, and I don’t want to feed it further. The only way to do this is to completely change my identity and address in Romania. I would probably need to leave the country for a longer period of time as well.”

I was left dumbfounded as I looked into the distance. My first thought was that I had let myself be fooled by a crazy man’s whim and wasted a few hours of my day. Still, I could not identify the reason why I had to believe that. After all, the man treated me with respect and had been graceful and polite; and even more, his house was an eloquent expression of design and architectural common sense. Except for thinking himself immortal, I had no other reasons to believe that he was crazy.

“I understand your emotional reaction,” he said in a detached tone. “After all, it is somehow normal to feel at least slightly skeptical towards what I’ve told you. If you think deeper though, you will see that it is not impossible for a human being to live more than the present average age limit. Actually, one could live for great periods of time in their physical body.”

“What should I draw from that? That you will not die?” I asked him, noticing that I had used the formal way of addressing him after finding out his real age.

“This is for me to discover, isn’t it? It will probably be some time before I’ll make a decision in this respect,” Elinor said in a slightly ironic tone. “My intuition and esoteric knowledge, however, lead me to believe that we cannot remain in the physical body for an indefinite period of time. Even so, physical life can be prolonged for several thousands of years. This can offer extraordinary possibilities of evolution.”

As I began to recover from the shocking surprises Elinor was telling me, I remembered the monatomic gold powder found by Cezar in the amphora-shaped vessel in the Projection Room.* At that point, I had not found out what that substance really was. All the explanations I got were just hypotheses and no one had checked if its assimilation would produce a spectacular rejuvenation of the body and at the same time maintain its functioning at optimum parameters for hundreds or even thousands of years. I had no idea if any further research had been done regarding this and did not even know where the precious powder had been eventually transported to.

* “Transylvanian Sunrise” referred to the discovery by Cezar of monatomic gold in the Projection Room. This monatomic gold had a very unique and previously unknown crystalline structure and has been shown to have regenerative effects on living tissues.

Not even Cezar himself had told me anything about the white gold when I last met him after his return from the Great Expedition. In turn, I avoided bringing up that subject as I was intuitively aware that it represents a sensitive spot and at the same time a terrible secret. It now seemed, however, that fate was in my favour as I was finding out about extraordinary things which, without previously rejecting, I would have classified as fantastic. If the person facing me was telling the truth, then I had the living proof that humans do not have to grow old and could even prolong their life in the physical body for a colossal amount of time. I therefore assumed that the secret of the monatomic gold powder was not the exclusive property of an unknown ancient civilization and that Elinor either had a very special connection or was part of the highest elite of global power. Although I doubted this last thought, I voiced my assumption to him

“I know that the respective powder was one of the hot-spots of the Bucegi Mountains discovery to which you too had access. Maybe you’ll be surprised, but I know quite a few details in regards to that and you will soon find out why. As far as I’m concerned, however, my exterior look and longevity are not due to ingesting the monatomic gold powder. What I want to say is that my looks, despite my real age, is not an effect of me using the monatomic gold powder, but it is due to a device which, in my opinion, makes it even more difficult to understand the interaction between men and the energy of time.”

I felt another heat wave overcome me as a way of expressing my embarrassment, disbelief and even a sort of panic which caused me to shift

restlessly in my seat. I did not want to be the victim of a tasteless farce, but at the same time, I did not have enough arguments to support this suspicion. Still uneasy, I asked for proof. Elinor then showed me his ID card and his passport. I never more closely and carefully examined anyone's identity papers in my entire life, but I could still not find any flaws. There was no doubt over the face in the picture. It was Elinor and the year of birth was very clearly written: 1942. Even so, I thought that the papers might be fake, but I realized that the effort to fabricate them would be too great and the reason behind such an action would be unclear. If he was indeed what he pretended to be, it would have been in his best interests to have papers that proved he was much younger than he is in reality as that would override any disparity with regard to his looks. Intuiting the thoughts I was having, Elinor showed me his original birth certificate and explained that he had already anticipated my reactions which he considered normal under such circumstances. This is exactly why he was all ready to show me his personal documents. It is still hard to explain the complex state of mind I was in just then, knowing that I was facing a man who was not growing old in the conventional sense of the word. The reality before my eyes contrasted with the preconceived and deeply infiltrated ideas from my own mind that kept reminding me that a human being cannot live for hundreds of years, let alone thousands. It created a state of confusion for me out of which I almost did not know how to escape.

After what I had already witnessed in the Projection Room, I thought there was nothing left that could cause me surprise or astonishment. And yet here I was again confronted, in the most simple and natural way, with an unsettling element that practically defied the modern scientific ideas and conceptual system in which we have been educated. I could have, of course, adopted the ostrich attitude like so many scientists unfortunately do when something exceeds their capacity to understand. I could have easily left that house, but my experience of similar situations and my profound intuition that the man in front of me was telling the truth encouraged me to accept the "challenge."

Elinor opened the sliding glass wall in the room and let the cool air of the late afternoon come in. His inspired move helped me calm down and order my thoughts.

“OK,” I said. “I understand that your situation is a disconcerting truth; but tell me, how did you achieve it? And please do not tell me you were born immortal or I will get up and leave immediately.”

Elinor laughed heartily and sat back down in his chair. I had managed to overcome my emotional and even conceptual handicap and this eased the tension in the room. This is also what probably modified our way of addressing each other as we reverted back to an informal atmosphere with common ground.

“I am glad I can reassure you at least in regards to this,” said Elinor. “I was born in Oradea* under as normal circumstances as possible. I lived there until I turned 28 when I moved to Bucharest. This was following a crucial event that happened in my life.”

* Oradea is a city of a quarter million people in northwestern Transylvania. Formerly a Hungarian city, Oradea rests on the border of Romania and was awarded to Romania after World War I.

I watched him questioningly, inviting him to go on. What I was about to find out shocked me completely.

“At that time, I was just about to start a family of my own. My fiancée was busy organizing the wedding which was going to happen two months later. During one of those days, I received a registered letter, but the name of its sender was unknown to me. The address of the sender was a post office box at one of the post offices here in Bucharest. Intrigued, I opened the envelope and found several finely written pages in a relatively clumsy formulation. I then found out with great amazement that the one writing to me was a forefather of my own family whom neither I nor my parents knew anything about. Yet, in a strange way, the author of the letter seemed to know me very well, mentioning some milestones of my life up to that date and also making some pertinent observations for every member of my family. I was, however, asked not to disclose the content of that letter to anyone as it exposes information that is precious to me.

“If these first elements from the beginning of the letter amazed me, the following ones perplexed me. It seemed that my ancestor was of my father’s lineage, but the real issue was that he claimed to have been born in 1424 in Germany in an area that nowadays would be around Cologne. He said that his father was a well-known merchant who travelled several times to Asia Minor for trade. Usually he would travel with his family, but the second time my ancestor accompanied his father, their caravan was attacked and robbed by a gang of thugs. His parents were killed and he, fourteen at the time, was sold as a slave to a king of lesser royalty who ruled over a territory in ancient Persia.

“Despite this misadventure, it seems that my ancestor’s destiny was still to hold many interesting surprises. A short time after those events, his master was visited by a maharajah from far off India and when this man left, the child was given to him as a slave along with other goods and precious objects. After a long trip in his new master’s company, the child arrived in India under the maharajah’s domain. It seems that the maharajah was an educated man and very interested in the occult.

“Two years after their return from Persia, a great magician said to possess a terrible power arrived at the court. While visiting the maharajah, the magician was served by the boy and pleased by his behavior and intelligence. Being a friend of the king, he asked for the boy to be given to him when he was ready to leave. In this way, my ancestor became the apprentice of one of the greatest magicians of those times who, as the letter was saying, was actually practicing alchemy, a very secret science whose profound mysteries were known only to the truly wise.

“My ancestor did not mention in the letter if that magician managed to obtain the Philosopher’s Stone, the successful culmination of the Alchemical Art, however, he did divulge an unsettling piece of information. He said that although he was in the magician’s service for over twenty years, he never noticed any change in his physical aspect or any sign of physical or mental deterioration. In the mean time, he became initiated in quite a few of the alchemical secrets and obtained remarkable progresses on this path. Although he wanted to know more about his master’s secret of youth, the latter always avoided the subject.

In the twenty-third year of the apprenticeship, the magician told my relative that they would not see each other again in the their physical form. He did not say why he was leaving or where he was going to. My ancestor was then almost forty and as a last and most precious gift, he received from his master a strange object made out of a special metal alloy. He had been told that as long as he remained around that object, he would never grow old and live for thousands of years. The magician also gave him some valuable advice about how he could obtain that special alloy himself and the needed directions in order to achieve the final shape of the object. That night his master disappeared and was never seen again.

“During the next hundred years, my ancient relative tried on and off to make the mysterious alloy by following his master’s instructions. Nevertheless, he confessed in his letter that his joy was so great over knowing that he was not growing old anymore and could live for an indefinite period of time that for many years he preferred to travel and learn many other things. Obtaining the secret alloy fell into second place.

“When he was almost 250 years old, he decided to get married and build a family. He was then in America, on today’s California coast. He had three children: two girls and a boy. Having decided to share his secrets with a male heir worthy of it, he discreetly but very carefully kept an eye on the development of his genealogical tree. Due to the extensive life experience already accumulated, he started devoting himself to thoroughly studying various oriental spiritual currents, gradually abandoning his travels and social life. For five generations worth of his family tree, he closely followed the life of the male heir that seemed the strongest. When necessary, he would mysteriously assist, in more or less occult ways, the continuity of his genealogical tree.

“He already possessed immense wealth and his scholarly documentation was housed in a grand library. Due to a very well thought out system, he managed not to raise any suspicions about his wealth, which was spread across countless places across the earth, or about the fact that he was not growing old. When he was among others, it was essential not to stand out in society and to change his identity and address as often as possible in order not to raise questions. Still, because of a complicated situation he was involved in around 1900, he came very close to being exposed and had to resort to extreme solutions. Living in Australia for almost fifteen years, he managed to cover his tracks. The unpleasant surprise was that once he was back in Europeaten by the First World War, my ancestor became aware that his family, including his last male heir, was missing. The head of the family and his direct male heir had been killed in war and the rest of the family, including two boys, were missing.”

Elinor then took a break to close the window. It was dark outside and cold. I was so fascinated by his account that I only noticed the cold when he stopped. Gladly accepting another cup of hot tea, I impatiently waited for him to take me back to the magic of the incredible story.

“My Tibetan friend will arrive any moment now,” Elinor said, eyeing his watch. “Now comes the part that will somehow clarify my situation. There are still a few more surprises for tonight,” he said smiling.

Although very interested in the rest of the story, I still asked Elinor for the reason why the Tibetan priest wanted to meet me.

“I’ve been asked not to divulge anything before his arrival,” he replied. “Soon all your questions will be answered.”

Happy with this outcome, I waited for him to continue his amazing story.

“My ancestor was almost 500 by then. Of course, as his master assured him, he not only did not grow old but even became younger than when he received the mysterious alloyed object. During the four centuries that passed, it is probable that his perspective and way of perceiving the world changed profoundly. His consciousness was greatly elevated, but his priorities became totally different. In simple yet very powerfully emotional words, he was telling me that he managed to achieve the ultimate desire of any genuine alchemist: he obtained the Philosopher’s Stone. He explained that it would not have been possible without him first profoundly understanding the essence of life and the universe themselves as well as other mysteries of knowledge that had been revealed to him during his existence. As far as I figured it out, his big breakthrough happened while living in Australia.

“Coming back to Europe, he renewed some contacts and connections he had in France. It seems there was already a small group of people that had been gradually initiated by him into very occult aspects of science and spirituality. It was known that he was an accomplished alchemist, but no one could say for sure where his true origins were. Parallel to his investigations of his heir’s family, he wrote two books about the mysteries of the alchemical symbols and a few other manuscripts about the esoterics of forms and coded languages. It seems these manuscripts were very secret, being destined to a small number of disciples. The books have been published in France by his main alchemy student who is also a fine scientist.

“The experience of his few centuries of living showed my ancestor that it is not at all easy to swiftly travel in time, especially in modern society. The more technological the world and the more complex the communications, the more difficult it became to justify his presence for very long in any given place. He confessed in the letter that the profound transformation that happened to him made him understand that he had a spiritual mission he could no longer ignore. This, however, was becoming increasingly difficult as he could no longer appear in public, had to often change his identity and home, and had to be very careful with anyone he chose to take his messages into the world.

“Paradoxically, the immortality – which for many people is extremely desirable and envied – could even seem oppressive in modern society. As far as I understand, this is just from a selfish perspective as, generally speaking, man wants to solely enjoy the various pleasures and opportunities that a very long life and unaltered youth could offer. But, I will ask you to remember an essential point and that is that the precious gift of fabulous longevity must not be wasted. That is why the fundamental element is that of responsibility and the necessity of harmonizing the opposites. This involves a profound understanding of life and of the main goal of human existence.

“My ancestor was saying that these aspects became clear for him while he was in Australia when he was contacted through occult channels by the representatives of a superior civilization and hierarchy concerning our planet. He could not mention anything else about this, but as far as I would be interested and if I were to follow his instructions, a time would come when I would learn all the details.

“Because his achievements in alchemy were total, it was fairly easy for him to obtain the very complicated alloy that the object ensuring his immortality was made of. He wrote that he even discovered a simpler way of producing it but mentioned that the special shape of the object had to remain unchanged. He suspected I was curious as to what determines the extension of physical life when a human being was around that object; and he explained that in order to understand, I first needed firm esoteric knowledge. In principle, he said he could call it a phenomenon of tuning the alloy's frequency of vibration to the specific frequency of vibration of the human body. In other words, a kind of subtle energetic mutual interaction was created between the metal object and the being in its vicinity.

"He specified, however, that the longevity effect was only valid for the one the object was destined to. That is to say, the object had to be made by a master alchemist, it being strictly personalized. Its effect was only for the respective person as it had the specific subtle imprint of the organism of that being. The secret alloy also had the particular and exceptional property of favoring the subtle energetic connection with the center of universal life, but it was also selecting the access to this formidable energy according to and just for the designated person. It seems that the secret of how to obtain this alloy comes from times immemorial, from predynastic Egypt, having been offered to the great priests of the time by the gods that came upon Earth.

"The true art of making the object, particularly the alloy — which is composed of several metals and substances — consists of tuning the energetic frequencies of vibration so as to personalize the object. This art was a complete secret which could not be known by anyone else but a master in alchemy. This is why, as far as I understood in reading the letter, that the secret was shared with just one person who was chosen to be the one who would continue the respective initiatory line. Besides, the method of obtaining the alloy requires certain exceptional knowledge and inner capabilities and it cannot work unless the being is truly prepared, from a spiritual point of view, to do it. Only then did I figure out why my ancestor could not obtain this alloy in his previous attempts — it was because he hadn't yet reached that level of elevation and profound knowledge of the mysteries of Creation.

"Still, he confessed that before obtaining the Philosopher's Stone, he had already obtained the life elixir, a stage that naturally precedes the accomplishment of the Great Alchemical Work. He revealed that the elixir of life is a ruby colored liquid which, when administered with precise science, allows an extension of life in the physical body of three to four times more than the effect of the mysterious alloy object. When given the object, his master told him that it will ensure him approximately 1700-2000 years of terrestrial life, time enough for him to make gradual progress in alchemy and thus discover the elixir of life.

“I gathered from this that the master first making and then giving the object to his favorite disciple was in a way a spiritual lineage, a special tradition with origins in a very distant past of humanity. Besides, considering the period of time in a physical body that this alloy makes possible, I assume that there were only fifteen to twenty individuals in the lineage of this very mysterious tradition that possessed the object. In my approximate calculations, I count on the fact that most of the owners advanced to the next superior stage long before the deadline, maybe after 500 to 700 years of terrestrial life. Of course, it is just a supposition, but these numbers may very well signify the average time that they possessed the object. Even so, this shows that the tradition is at least 7000-8000 years old which exceeds by far any other tradition of any other spiritual path known and practiced nowadays.”

I interrupted him here to voice an insistent thought.

“Tell me, shall I gather from this that you are the one carrying on the tradition?”

“As far as I know, there is only one person on this planet that has had the object for a period of time. I found out from my ancestor that every master must leave that special alloy object TO JUST ONE PERSON, his most trusted disciple. When the disciple considers that he has found the right person, he will, in turn, give it to him. This is a practice that involves great responsibility. My ancestor took a more unusual approach by following through time the evolution of the main branch of his family tree. After all, there was nothing keeping him from looking over the next thousand years for another being worthy of such a secret if none of the progeny of his family tree would rise to meet his demands. Destiny made it that I was the last male descendant of the main branch of my family which was of interest to my ancestor.”

“But, you said earlier that he lost track of the last family of this branch,” I remarked.

“It’s true, but after a few years of discrete investigations and thanks to some high connection that he had, he managed to identify the place where this family was. After the husband’s death on the battle field, the mother and four children took refuge in Germany with some relatives. Unfortunately, one of the girls died in an accident; and one year after that, the mother disappeared and was never heard of again. Around 1932, because of political tensions in Germany, the family of relatives that adopted the children emigrated to Romania in northern Transylvania and settled in Oradea two years later. Of the two boys, one was very weak, suffering from tuberculosis and dying of it a few years later. The other one was my father who got married and started his own family in Oradea. I was the only child they had.”

“Now I understand,” I said. “I wonder though what the masters of this tradition are doing after they hand over the object.”

“I don’t know for sure either,” answered Elinor. “It seems that it is a great secret and my ancestor didn’t say anything about it. What I know is that, using the elixir of life, they go on living in their physical body for millennia afterwards. Still, the reasons they do that are not yet clear to me. Most probably, they have spiritual missions to fulfill that require their physical presence. Logically, this means they keep on living more or less hidden among the other inhabitants of this planet but I suspect that it is a bit more complicated than that. It is also possible that only some of my predecessors took this line of action and some did not. You see, these are questions whose answers I will probably find out much later.”

We were both quiet for a while, mentally analyzing various possibilities. Eventually, I decided to ask him a question.

“This means that the object is here in the house?”

“Yes, of course,” Elinor replied. “Its radius of influence is a few meters. It is not absolutely necessary to always be around it, but if I want the effects to be constant, I have to keep it close most of the time. You can compare it with a special antenna that acts as a resonator. In the beginning, those who received the apparatus probably knew much more about its origins, specifics and way of functioning; but with the passing of millennia, we lost some of the information.”

“OK, but how did you get the object?” I asked curiously. “Did you meet your ancestor?”

“I didn’t meet him then although I truly wished it. My impression was that he avoided meeting me mostly because of the watchfulness of the Romanian secret services who all throughout the Seventies started to behave quite drastically. Personally, I’m convinced that my ancestor’s never been to Romania but that he contacted me through some very discreet intermediaries. It was clear then, and I have fully convinced myself since, that whomever finds themselves in my situation needs to be very careful if they want to perpetuate this occult tradition. The reason why is obvious. There are people and even secret societies who know about this lineage of alchemical masters and who greatly desire to find out the mysteries of obtaining the alloy. Fortunately, this is a very well kept secret, and even if known, the alloy cannot be obtained without the understanding of certain subtle keys that are essential in the respective alchemical process. For example, in one of the transmutation stages, you get a metal with very special properties that contemporary scientists are not even aware of. The temptation of extending the physical life is too great for some and they will try to achieve eternal life by all means and at all costs. It is therefore obvious that I need to be very cautious.”

“You mean your life is in danger,” I said.

“Yes. I have ensured myself of a very long life compared to the average human life, on the condition that my vital functions are not interrupted.

“But let me come back to the letter. I remember that while I was reading it, I was torn by two conflicting tendencies: on the one hand, I felt like tearing and throwing away the letter as I thought someone was mocking me; but on the other hand, I felt like what was written there was true. Besides, it was all too complicated to be just a farce. And then, what would be the reason for anyone to do this to me? I was just a normal man with a regular life and without any high expectations.

“At the end of the letter was mentioned the procedure I had to follow to the letter. Without letting anyone know, without packing anything, without leaving any suspicion that something out of the ordinary happened, I was to go to a certain address in Bucharest at a certain date and time, not sooner or later. The directions were to enter straight into the mentioned house.

“Initially, I was overcome by panic, and I even intended to hand the letter over to the police who at that time were called the militia. But that wouldn’t have solved anything as the letter only contained a story without any actual data that would lead to identifying the one who wrote it. Going to the police would have gotten me involved in a never-ending series of interrogations and harassment specific to the modus-operandi of the communist regime. I asked myself then, “What was there to lose if I followed the instructions?” Even if I would have chosen to go to the police and they busted into that address in Bucharest, I was pretty sure they wouldn’t have found anything there. The whole operation was too well planned to allow for such mistakes. Even more, I was confident that any move I made was being discreetly watched and this was to be read between the lines in the letter as well.

“I quickly decided to go to Bucharest, following the directions closely. I took that decision by myself although the old attachments and habits were still trying to draw me back. An obscure fear was pervading my heart, but the appeal of the extraordinary chance I was given was stronger than the incertitude. Strangely, although I knew I was offered a life of almost 2000 years, I had no actual thoughts about what I was going to do. I was thinking that I should come with various plans, ideas, and desires; but instead, it was as if my mind was paralyzed at the thought that I might live in this physical body for thousands of years.

“In short, I got to Bucharest and found the address quite quickly. It was a four storey block of flats in a quiet neighbourhood. As I read in the letter, the door was unlocked. I entered a one bedroom flat that was modestly furnished and it seemed like no one was there. On the living room table was, in a big envelope, a paper with directions, a key and an enormous amount of money for those times. I was told to leave that place immediately and go to another address in Bucharest which this time was a house. I should remain there for three days until contacted by a certain someone. The key was for the house and the money for expenses. Counting the money, I realized that it was enough for me to live comfortably for one year. I was advised though not to leave the house unless absolutely necessary. The fridge was also generously stocked with food. It seemed like it was all part of a movie script, but what I was asked to do was quite easy. I was engrossed in thoughts for a while and then re-read the directions. It looked like everything was already set up to offer me an unending existence.”

“Still, your life in this physical body was going to end after approximately 2000 years,” I said.

“Indeed. It seems that the effect of the alloy is weaker than the alchemical elixir, but as far as I know, no one lived the maximum period that the object offers. Therefore, a direct verification of this theory, probably coming from the beginning of the tradition, is missing. We can’t be sure that the message hasn’t altered with the passing of time.”

“But where was the object?” I asked impatiently. “Was it brought by a person you met?”

“Things were a bit more complicated. After I settled in the other house, which was also in a quiet neighbourhood but on the other side of town, I waited for the intermediary. The place was very comfortable, bordering on luxurious, but I noticed there was no phone. The cable was there but there was no handset. Maybe that was a security measure so I would not try to contact someone. Just as I had been told, the intermediary arrived after three days. While waiting for him, I spent my time reading and watching TV. In order to avoid creating any kind of troubles, I refrained from going out. At the end of that period, I was a little bored but the curiosity and interest for what was coming were still with me.

“The respective person who arrived was a mature gentleman who confirmed that he was sent by my ancient relative. Although I overwhelmed him with a torrent of questions, he remained inflexible. All that he told me was to just be patient and have trust. He then took out a camera from his bag and asked me to stand in front of an empty wall. After he took my picture, he noticed that I was confused. In order to avoid an unpleasant scene, he explained that the photos were necessary for my new identification documents. He then told me that he would be back in three days and that I needed to be ready to go by then.

“At this point, I contemplated going back to the ordinary life I seemed to be so easily giving up. The feeling of uncertainty I was experiencing, compounded by a lack of information, made me realize that the situation could be dangerous. Why would I need another set of identification documents? But particularly, what sort of documents were we talking about? After all, my ID card and driver’s licence were still valid and a passport was out of the question as Romanian citizens of those times were not allowed to possess such a document.

“Only then did it suddenly dawn on me that I was going to leave the country; but not by illegally crossing the border; but by actually passing through one of the border crossings with a legal and valid passport. My heart shrunk under the waves of emotion and fear that gripped my imagination. I could already see myself caught, locked up and beaten in the cellars of the feared National Security, subjected to unending, exhausting and often very violent interrogations. I was nervously pacing through the house, not knowing what to do. My logic was telling me that because Romanian citizens were not allowed to own a passport, it meant that I was going to have a fake ID under a different nationality. Sweating profusely, I threw myself on the bed. I was musing that I had just uselessly complicated my life just before building a decent future for myself with a family and maybe, as much as possible in a communist country, a career. And for what? After all, my life was good for as long as it would have lasted. I did not need one or two thousand years during which time I would most definitely become tired!

“Obviously, all of those thoughts were just my preservation instinct pushing me, as much as still possible, on the path of mediocrity and banality. After a while, I started to calm down and get another perspective on the issue at hand. For example, I had to admit that my ancestor always respected my free will. In no way or form had he forced me to take a certain decision. It had always been my choice just as it actually still was at this new moment. Even then, at least apparently, I was still free to abandon it all and resume my previous life without anyone losing out or suffering. I would have quickly found an explanation for my fiancée and family, and the impressive amount of money I would have brought back would have made everyone happy.

“On the other hand, my ancestor would have remained as inaccessible and unknown as he was to that day, and I’m pretty sure that all of the arrangements made by him through all of these mysterious intermediaries wouldn’t have provided any clues to the authorities. I was forced to admit that, due to the wisdom, experience and connections accumulated during his lengthy life, my ancestor was able to act from a distance in a very intelligent and practically flawless way. He must have predicted the eventuality of my abandonment, but he did so with an amazing delicacy as he was prepared to reward me for all of the ‘inconveniences’ I had experienced by giving me that huge amount of money.

“My final conclusion was that I had to make my own destiny. At the same time, I was starting to see that instead of always and selfishly asking for proof of what was written in the letter – and I’m referring here to the mysterious personalized object – it was first of all necessary that I show at least a minimal proof of deserving it. Instead of having an inquisitorial attitude and way of thinking, as if eternal life was my birth right without any effort, it was much wiser to realize that what I was going to be offered was actually of an inestimable richness for my destiny as well as an extraordinary opportunity for my evolution. Otherwise, I would have been in danger of not appreciating the true value of my ancestor’s present; and without any doubt, my ignorance could have caused enough mistakes to cost me my life.”

“I understand perfectly,” I said. “I know these aspects as they have also been presented to me as a result of other circumstances — by a very special person.”

Elinor smiled understandingly.

“I think you are talking about Mr. Cezar Brad, aren’t you? Indeed, it seems he is a being that has achieved a high degree of consciousness,” Elinor said thoughtfully. “You too are part of this complex mechanism involving remarkable beings. Shortly, you will realize that nothing in life is by chance and that events correlate and synchronize in ways that are often astonishing for the common human being. It is a great art to see these synchronicities and then understand their hidden meaning. At the same time, if you can do that, it is a clear sign that you have evolved.

“But, let me come back to what I was saying. Upon more reflection from my part over these aspects, I was gradually becoming firmly convinced that I was supposed to lead a certain life and one that was closely related to my ancestor. So, I decided to fully abandon myself to the plan that the great alchemist had prepared for me in every detail. There were some risks of course, but my decision was already unshakable. I still had a few slight hesitations at first due to the attachment I had towards my fiancé and my family, but I calmed down by telling myself that I would still have all the time in the world to go back to them. Inside of me, however, I knew perfectly well that it would never happen.

“After three days, the gray-haired man came back as sombre and as calm as the first time. As I suspected, there was a forged passport that I was going to use to cross the border. My expectations were exceeded, however, when I noticed that it was a diplomatic passport and that I was listed as a Belgian citizen. The gentleman explained that it was made so because of my knowledge of French which made it all the more credible for the border officials. He was going to accompany me to Brussels and we were flying there the next afternoon. To be a bit more concise, everything went well and the customs officers even wished us a ‘bon voyage!’ By night fall, I was already settled in a very luxurious villa in the capital of Belgium, somewhere in a residential area of the city. The man that accompanied me retreated discreetly after making sure that I had everything I needed. He also told me that I was going to be visited by someone special later that evening.

“I smiled lightly. This was probably going to be the moment of my long awaited meeting with my relative. I have to admit that sometimes life changes so quickly and spectacularly that you need a lot of discernment and self-control in order to cope as much as possible. A week earlier, I was planning a family together with my fiancé in Oradea, Romania. Now I was in Belgium with another identity and waiting to meet a relative a couple hundred years old. Quite shocking, isn’t it?”

Elinor laughed casually and got up to turn the light on. It was almost dark outside and the Tibetan lama had not arrived yet. With the magic of his story now interrupted for the time being, I noticed the time and was startled.

“It is quite late. Do you think there will still be a meeting tonight?” I asked skeptically.

“Without any doubt,” answered Elinor, “although I am a bit surprised by this delay myself. Let’s be patient. He will arrive shortly and you will then be faced with a great surprise.”

I could not understand any of these mysteries, but Elinor promised that there would not be too long of a wait.

“If so, please continue your story and tell me what happened that evening in Brussels,” I said, settling as comfortable as I could in my armchair and tasting one of the cookies I had been offered.

“I met the master alchemist, my ancestor. I was nervous, but he seemed to understand me very well and thanked me for trusting him and his letter. He looked approximately 32-33 years old and, please believe me, I was bewildered and trying to justify what was happening to me as being a farce, it being impossible that someone looking like the man facing me could have already lived for longer than 500 years. I immediately expressed my doubts. He looked at me, calmly and seriously, and asked what exactly I thought a 500 year old man should look like. That rendered me quiet and I realized the ridiculousness of the situation.

“He then went on to tell me that I would not be able to convince myself of the existence of the secret society and the extraordinary effect the mysterious object has on the lives of those it was made for until a few decades pass. My ancestor advised me to use this waiting time actively, educating myself and learning the mysteries of alchemy in order to be capable of ascending to the next higher stage of my evolution. He offered to show and provide me everything I needed in order to do that.

‘I can feel that you have a remarkable potential,’ my ancestor said, ‘but even so, you will see that those starting out on the path of this tradition differently integrate the time they have at their disposal, time that is much longer than the life of an ordinary man. That is why your progress in the alchemical sciences will be quite slow. It is possible to be hundreds of years old, maybe even thousands of years old, until you reach total fulfilment in your alchemical work. During this very long period of time, you might have to cope with major transformations, maybe even dramatic ones, but all of these will help you gather immense experience that will fully contribute to the complexity of your destiny.

‘You could ask me,’ he said, ‘how is it possible that some alchemist could manage to reach the highest achievements of their work in just one ordinary life time? This is indeed possible; but in such cases, they are already born with high merits on this path, having achieved them in previous lives. I’m almost sure that you are not familiar with aspects of metempsychosis or those referring to the esoteric laws of action and reaction within the universe. That’s why the explanations I’m going to give you now might seem hilarious and illogical, but you will then have plenty of time to understand and observe these aspects. It’s good for you to know though that the extraordinary longevity that is now yours can offer you the possibility of evolving spiritually much faster than following the cycles of birth and death that other people go through.’

“My ancestor stopped and watched me carefully to see what reactions his words generated,” continued Elinor. “I was incapable of uttering any words as I couldn’t understand the significance of what he told me. Now I know exactly what my ancestor meant. These are basic aspects he was explaining. At that time of my life, however, they were a completely unexplored subject to me.”

Elinor stopped his narration to ask me how familiar I was with these notions. I told him that I did not know much about it, but I would appreciate it if he could tell me more.

DESTINY AND REINCARNATION

“You know very well that the issue of reincarnation causes controversy even nowadays although there is countless evidence that proves this truth,” said Elinor. “The need to maintain as effective control as possible over people has caused some leaders in the shadows of political and economical forces to orient science and the education of the masses towards a very simple and concise conclusion: there is no soul; there is no spirit; and after the demise of the physical body, nothing happens as it all returns into nothingness. In other words, according to this modern ‘ideology,’ someone disappears completely when they die and without a trace.

“Although aberrant and even lacking logic, this idea caught on and a large majority embraced it, mainly because they feel it saves them from useless troubles and complicating their lives. Some even slip into a very wrong mentality that can throw them into the depths of desperation. In other words, they think that if ‘we only have one life’ and there is nothing else afterwards, it means they can commit all kinds of acts. This applies in particular to evil and even abominable acts, done for purely selfish reasons, as they will not have to pay for them after they die. You can see how this can be a real problem, and it is not by chance that the modern society is confronted with an unprecedented wave of vices and crime. The fight for justice is just on the surface as it can’t crush it in the bud. The ideology perpetrated upon us is corrupt and false but is kept so deliberately to cause chaos and to allow the elite to control everything they possibly can.”

“I am aware of these aspects, of course,” I said. “But your ancestor’s perspective on the possibility of a more rapid evolution is interesting.”

“Yes, the extension of life while in the physical body is extraordinary,” commented Elinor. “At a glance, it might look like it takes a very long time to get a certain result while others, living a normal life, obtain the same effects in just a few years or tens of years. In reality, they are only continuing what they started many lives before.

“Let’s imagine the following situation. I start to study the mysteries of alchemy. At the same time as me, another ordinary man living a normal life time is initiated on the same path. Let’s also assume that we both progress at about the same pace. After a few tens of years, he will inevitably die and his soul — carrying (among others things) the quintessence of all of the knowledge he has gathered up to that point — will translate into a superior level of Creation. For most human beings, this level is represented by the subtle astral universe which is much broader than the physical universe.”

Elinor took a short break to have a sip of tea. He then continued with his explanations.

“People do not die in the true sense of the word. I mean, they do not disappear into nothingness. They only abandon their physical ‘carcasses,’ their bodies of flesh and bones that rot. Only the physical body ‘dies.’ The subtle part of the being, the soul, translates into another space-time dimension of the Creation that is most favorable for its continued existence. That is why it is said that there’s no such thing as ‘death.’ The human being, as an individual entity, never disappears but translates from one level of Creation to another. This is the same as getting out of a car and getting on a train; then getting off the train and getting onto a ship. The analogy can go on and on. In each of these situations, you have a specific way of getting from one place to another and a certain degree of freedom.

“When comparing a physical body to a mode of transport, it is, we could say, what you can afford at that moment: what you saved to pay for the ticket, be it for the bus, train or ship. If you didn’t save enough; that is, if you don’t have too many merits, then you walk. If you are very ‘rich,’ you can then afford a ticket for even a spaceship! Analytically speaking, in this latter situation, you have access to a very elevated subtle world. If you only have a few merits because your mistakes were many or great, then the subtle dimension that your soul is projected into after the death of the body will be one full of anguish and suffering. These demarcations refer to the destiny of every human and are in full accordance to the actions, good or bad, that the respective being committed either in his terrestrial existence or in the subtle worlds. If none of this were so, there would be no difference between the worldly condition of a saint and a criminal nor a mentally retarded person and a genius. Common sense tells us that it is not by chance that a human being is born with a severe physical handicap while another is perfectly healthy and thriving; or that some suffer from childhood with all sort of anguishes, fears, and nightmares while others are happy, optimistic and very joyful. I think you understand very well what I’m saying. Still, people’s incredible superficiality and even stupidity prevents them from seeing these very simple and obvious circumstances. This is exacerbated by their almost sick dependency on automated belief systems and prejudices that have been imposed since childhood. All of this contributes to their physical and moral decay as well as to their incapability of understanding certain essential truths about the life they’re living.”

“Yes, I have often been faced with this opaque public opinion,” I observed bitterly. “But you know, I’ve noticed that it is not necessarily people’s enmity but the fact that they are confronted with the decision of replacing the materialistic ideas that they have been inoculated with since school with something that almost everyone ridicules and says does not exist. Of the two options, most choose to keep their old beliefs even if they feel that something is not OK. The idea of nothing quantitative to measure, compounded by lack of physical or mental effort, most often succeeds in defeating their spiritual throb. In such circumstances, that in my opinion accentuate selfishness and eat away effectivity, you can’t expect to obtain too many merits. Life ends relatively quickly and what follows is, so to speak, ‘the reaping.’”

Elinor immediately picked up my idea.

“That’s exactly what I was talking about,” he said. “What the man does during his terrestrial life forces him to somehow return to the physical level after his ‘stay’ in the astral level where the soul lives in a world attuned to its specific ‘wavelength.’ For example, due to his desire to succeed in the alchemical arts, the person in our earlier example will reincarnate in such circumstances so as to favor his access to this knowledge. Of course, setting the course of destiny for a soul just about to return to the physical level is very complex and requires extremely precise work on behalf of cosmic entities infinitely superior to the common and rational way of human thinking. Everything is considered out of the immense baggage of actions, experiences, emotions and intentions that every human being gathers during their countless existences in manifestation and those tendencies will essentially define the course of their destiny in the next incarnation. Such choices are based upon certain criteria; and the being is going to experience in his new physical life a sort of ‘response’ to the actions he did in other terrestrial lives.”

“Yes. I often wondered exactly how this process of ‘accounting’ for our actions happens, but I could never find the answer,” I said pensively.

Elinor was quiet for a minute after which he answered me very competently.

“Every action, be it done with the body or the mind, is mysteriously ‘recorded’ in what the occultist calls the ‘cosmic memory,’” Elinor explained. “The quintessence of these actions is then impregnated at the level of the individual soul, being either a ‘burden’ or a ‘delight’ for the one living out his destiny. Man’s fate is not at all by chance but in full accord with the nature of his actions, and this is exactly why people are born so differently. Each needs to live out his own destiny according to the nature of his actions. Good deeds will attract merits; and as a consequence, that being will enjoy wonderful circumstances, chances and situations in its incarnation at the physical level while bad deeds will attract nefarious consequences, much suffering and torment for the respective being. It is important to know that these ‘rewards’ are at the same time the perfect balance between action and recompense. No one is privileged and no one is disadvantaged. Each gets exactly what he deserves even if many say they’ve been aggrieved and choose to blame God for giving them so much suffering and troubles. Why do they have to toil on the edge of subsistence while others luxuriate in richness and wealth? These kinds of questions are frequent in those who live a hard life but do not understand the causes of their suffering. As I was saying, situations like the ones mentioned represent the faithful image of the compensatory law balancing out the actions that have been previously done. Those who are not sufficiently spiritually awakened, however, do not yet know or understand these matters.”

I was very interested in these topics as it allowed me to synthesise my initiatory knowledge. I then asked Elinor what it is exactly that determines a future reincarnation of the soul at a terrestrial level.

“During the time between two successive reincarnations,” he continued, “the individual soul lives in an astral world in accordance with the merits he obtained. When these are exhausted, the time comes for other actions done during his previous terrestrial existences to ‘ripen’ and receive their ‘reward,’ be it good or bad, in the physical world as a new reincarnation. This ‘condensation’ of destiny’s requirements attracts the soul irresistibly towards the physical level and into a ‘matrix’ or social integration pattern that is most appropriate for the specific nature of the actions that need to be compensated. The future human being that’s going to be born into that matrix is either going to consume the good fruits or merits of their beneficial actions of the past or else pay for their previous deeds and the suffering caused to others. Most often, there is a combination of the two and this explains why people are born with certain qualities but also with certain physical or psychic defects. Still, it's up to them as to how they 'organize' their destiny. In other words, they are the ones generating, through the actions done in their present life, the nature of their destiny in future reincarnations."

"Well...but in this case, there's practically no end to the cycle of reincarnations!" I exclaimed. "Whether we do good deeds or bad ones, we will be reborn into eternity in order to consume the fruits of our actions."

"This is only on the surface," Elinor answered. "The fundamental difference between good and bad actions is that the first bring you closer to God while the latter avert you from Him. The salvation or liberation talked about in genuine religions consists exactly of reabsorbing into a dimension that transcends even this apparently never-ending cycle of life and death which is like a chain of dependencies. Following the path of evolution, always synonymous with good and harmony, the man eventually reaches the end of the road and then something inconceivable for the ordinary consciousness happens. It's like a passing, a leap into the infinite that includes all worlds but at the same time is outside of them too.

"I wouldn't want to deviate too much now on this thread of our conversation as the initial idea we started from was different. In the comparative example I chose previously, I said that the one who was initiated into the mysteries of alchemy reaches a certain level of understanding in this existence. After that, he dies and his soul will project for a period of time into one of the subtle worlds of the astral level."

"Do we all translate into the astral level after we die at the physical one?" I asked, eager to clear this aspect that I did not understand.

"This occurs for most human beings by reason of the fact that the astral level is a level of emotions and psychic manifestations which, as you know, represent the fundamental aspects that define the life of a human being. Still, if some have already reached a very elevated level of consciousness, their soul will automatically be attracted, after their physical death, to even more subtle levels of manifestation such as the mental or even causal level. Here, the nature of reality is much more subtle and vast than the astral level.

For example, there is practically nothing in the causal level that we could associate with ordinary sight or thinking. The mind is completely transcended and knowledge is no longer a discursive action but a total and simultaneous one. There, the individual consciousness has access to the archetypes of Creation as well as the causes that determine the manifestation of things and phenomena within the inferior levels, including the physical world. This is why the one who exists in this extremely elevated level of manifestation can control anything within the manifested world as he is then capable of ‘doing and undoing,’ from its causal origin, any action, plan or intention. It goes both ways though. If, during their earthly existence, the being has made great mistakes such as blameworthy acts of despotism, physical and psychic oppression, crimes, or very violent acts; then their soul will be inexorably attracted after death towards the dark infernal dimensions of the inferior astral level where they will have to pay for their deeds. Don’t get me wrong, we are not talking about eternal damnation; but these kinds of actions have great influence on personal destiny; and this is why the period of time spent in the inferno – in order to compensate it seems — is very long in terrestrial years.

“A rather special situation is that of suicides as their suffering is extremely long and the evolutionary regress is considerable. In such dramatic cases, the soul hardly realizes that just this one reckless act of their earthly existence can cost thousands of years of suffering and involution. If one were capable of giving themselves back the life they also took, it would not be such a problem; but it does not happen like that, and this is why the torments a suicidal soul must endure are excruciating. A suicide is, in essence, self-denial taken to the extreme and is much more serious than the ignoring of the divine spark or divine spirit within us. An atheist still has the chance of evolving and changing his opinion during his lifetime while a suicide very selfishly puts an end, by his own volition, to the chance he has been given to evolve in this existence. Such a soul did not understand a fundamental aspect I have mentioned earlier: namely, that even when a being feels overwhelmed at some point in his life by his troubles, suffering or problems he faces, all of these are nothing else but the nature of the actions he did in the past. The ordeals and miserable life he endures now are, with very few exceptions, the exact image of the suffering he has caused to others. Consequently, his reckless act is a selfish attempt of cheating destiny; or better said, of avoiding it, thinking that this way he will not have to endure it anymore. This is why the gravity of suicide is enormous and constitutes a major obstacle on the evolutionary path, maybe the biggest of all.

“On the other hand, there are some souls that have been very attached to the material things of their terrestrial life or that have been very parsimonious and paltry in their relationships with others. At an ethereal level, they stay for quite a long period of time in the immediate vicinity of the places and things they are attached to. The ethereal level, as you know, is a frequency of vibration between the physical and the astral level. The state of these souls is aboulic as they do not realize what is happening with themselves, and the only thought that dominates is the desire of returning to the things, material possessions or even beings they have been much attached to during their physical life. Such beings spend most of their time engulfed in a sombre atmosphere, like a thick fog. They remain at this subtle level for a very long time, a subtle level found in the immediate vicinity of our planet. From time to time, due to their gross desires and earthly attachments, they haunt the respective places in an ectoplasmic form which imitates faithfully, more or less, the body shape they had in their last physical existence. This pathetic condition can sometimes last for hundreds of years; until their understanding gradually lights the twilight that surrounds them; and they are thus finally freed from the grip of their attachments. This is a typical example of consuming certain attachment-related karma. After all this, the respective soul will ascend to an astral level far superior to the deplorable condition they were in at the ethereal level. Of course, where they end up at the astral level will fully depend on other aspects corresponding to the individual destiny of that soul. After spending a while consuming their specific merits for that astral world, they will reincarnate into a physical body and the process will start all over again but on a superior level of individual experience.”

“OK,” I said. “Now it is clear, but does life at the subtle levels last as long as the life an ordinary man lives at the terrestrial level? Because...you said that, after the death of the body, every soul spends a certain period of time in one of the subtle levels of manifestation.”

“Time,” Elinor replied, “as universal subtle energy, is perceived differently on different levels of Creation. For example, at the astral level, time does not have the same meaning or same ‘flow’ as at the physical level. What you perceive here as a precise duration of time is much distorted there. The more elevated the level of manifestation, the more nuanced the perception of time. The fact that the respective level is multidimensional determines the complex phenomena of synchronicity and simultaneity of events. Time cannot be judged anymore by its ‘physical’ parameters.

“The average astral ‘stay’ of the individual soul between two successive incarnations ranges from 50 to 300 terrestrial years, according to their achieved merits. Of course, there are exceptions depending upon the decisions of some superior hierarchical forums of celestial entities; but generally speaking, this is the period of time most individual souls spend at the astral level after the death of their physical body.”

“So, in your example,” I said, “the one who was initiated into the mysteries of alchemy and then dies returns to the physical world when you are already 300-400 years old! I now understand the meaning of your path.”

Elinor approved, nodding slightly.

“Yes,” he replied, “but by then I’ve already progressed much more as I have used the time my soul spent at the astral level to continuously perfect myself. When, after the death of the body, the soul translates into the subtle worlds, it is subjected there to other kinds of laws and influences. Most often, he cannot do the same main activities he had done during his earthly life as the circumstances and priorities in the dimensions of the astral level are completely different from the ones of the physical level. Still, the progress and knowledge that was achieved on various subjects during terrestrial existences is synthesized within his consciousness and can determine the nature of his future reincarnation.

“The alchemist in my example will return in a new reincarnation and will go very quickly through the stages of knowledge he has already achieved in his previous existence. Then, his progress will slow down as he finds himself again in ‘unknown territory’ that needs exploring. He might need another one or two reincarnations, this assuming that his life goal will always be to obtain spiritual realization by fulfilling the Great Alchemical

Work. Destiny, however, has many other vectors of influence that can distract him from the path and delay his success. This is why sometimes even fifteen to twenty lives can pass without him achieving the ultimate aim.

“On the other hand, I benefit from having an extraordinarily long life in a perfectly healthy and balanced physical body and therefore do not have to resume again and again the process of learning and gaining knowledge of every stage of life, starting with childhood and ending with old age. Even more, my consciousness is not subject to the recurrent ‘forgetfulness’ between two successive reincarnations; and my progress in the alchemical art tends to follow a continuously ascending path. This is why I can obtain the Philosopher’s Stone in a few hundred years of study and experimentation while an ordinary man taking the common path of death and rebirth would need at least 3000–4000 years if we assume that he always enjoys optimum circumstances in life, a very favorable destiny, and is particularly inspired and intuitive in his alchemical experiments. These, however, are ideal terms and they rarely come true. Most often, a man needs several tens of thousands, hundreds of thousands or even millions of years to fully evolve spiritually.

“If he would always have, at every reincarnation, the awareness of the cosmic duration of his trip through manifestation, from one level to another, there is no doubt he would fall into a deep despair that would seem unbearable. But, the automated mechanism of forgetfulness that intervenes every time a soul returns to a new existence at the physical level protects him from this terrible anguish.

“Of course, this forgetfulness is necessary and at the same time correlated to the fact that if we were to remember all of our past actions – some of them atrocious – our psyche, still unstable and unprepared to profoundly understand the meaning of all this, would almost surely succumb and our evolution would be compromised for a very long period of time. Also, when we are finally capable of perceiving our previous lives, we are already at a high level of spiritual evolution and that allows us a much superior perspective of our meaning and condition within the Universe. Our vision is then unifying and causes are seen in their global aspect, not just partially.”

“Yes, it seems that the advantage of living for a very long time in the physical body is obvious,” I admitted. “In a way, the one who is reborn again and again at the physical level is forced to go through the same stages of life and can even be sidetracked from the path he followed a few lives before. This continuous movement of ‘up and down’ can become tiring, but it is part of our destiny. Even the fact that you have been chosen by your ancestor to carry forward the tradition and thus benefit of a life of approximately 2000 years is also part of your destiny.”

“I have often reflected over this myself and there is no doubt it is true. It is clear that some sort of merits I obtained in previous lives facilitated the situation I am in at the present. Still, by virtue of the same cosmic law of destiny, I am almost sure that I had certain ties with this path in my past existences. Usually, smaller or bigger groups of individual souls are almost irresistibly attracted to each other on the screen of life and time due to the fact they are connected by common feelings, experiences, facts or knowledge. That’s why a great percentage of the souls that reincarnate meet people during their new life with whom, in one way or another, they have been connected to in other lives. These reciprocal connections are required by virtue of the law of compensating the actions and ‘dues’ that some have for others. Hence, imagining a possible scenario, I might have been the disciple of an ancient priest that knew this terrible secret of longevity or helped in some way to maintain this special tradition. Still, my hypothesis is not necessarily true as I could have obtained certain spiritual merits leading to the present situation practicing other virtues or religious beliefs than the path I am on now. These aspects remain, for now, shrouded in mystery.”

“I know very well that some people have the extraordinary capacity of ‘seeing’ their previous lives,” I said. “I wonder if this signifies some sort of clairvoyance.”

“Of course it is clairvoyance,” said Elinor. “Such a person has access to a superior level of consciousness that includes a very high dimension of Creation. This dimension refers to the ‘recordings’ I was telling you about as nothing is ever destroyed without a trace and lost in nothingness.”

I wanted to better clarify this aspect.

“Cezar told me about the akashic imprints that are like some sort of huge recording tape, on a subtle level, for everything that happens in the universe,” I said. “Does the human consciousness need access to these imprints in order to remember previous existences?”

“The case of being able to visualize past lives is something more than that as it also involves a certain kind of mental control. Of course, this power has its own stages of mastery. If it only manifests sporadically and partially in the beginning, it becomes stable and can even be manifested at will as we progress spiritually. In its superior stages, it can allow us to know, if we wish, the previous lives and the probability of future lives of every human being we know. This is useful in order to understand certain causes from the past that generated some complicated situations in the present. Getting to the root of problems in this way, they can easily and successfully be resolved. I am telling you all this as I too, even if given a special existence, find myself facing many challenges, tendencies or impulses that can avert me from the path I was assigned.”

Elinor’s last observation conformed with my own conclusions and I added my part.

“I thought it might not be that easy,” I said. “After all, a very long life does not spare you at all the effects of your actions; but it gives you the possibility to adjust it ‘as you go’ without interruptions.”

“I use my very long life in order to evolve spiritually,” Elinor assented. “Based upon what my ancestor told me as well as what I have experienced myself up to now, I have realized that I practically have no choice. I could, of course, launch other types of activities such as pursuing enormous wealth, but this aspect is completely irrelevant, especially in my case, as I have been bequeathed a fabulous material and financial inheritance. Nevertheless, the majority of people prefer spending almost their entire lifetime – short enough as it is – trying to obtain wealth, luxury and richness. I don’t want to sound like a passé philosopher, but you know very well how illusory these material possessions are: what you have now can easily disappear the next moment. In the bitter fight for wealth, the senses go numb; the personality becomes corrupted; and the mind loses its clarity. All of these are traded for the illusory feeling of a thrilling business life or fleeting moments of exaggerated luxury that serve no purpose other than to weaken the spirit. The rich realize this within their inner core but refuse to admit it openly as they would not then know what else they could do with their life outside of their relations, businesses and competition that often destroys and does not stimulate. They would then feel completely exposed, useless to society and disoriented. You can see examples of this in businessmen that have gone bankrupt. They are incapable of relaxing or looking at life from a different perspective other than business, connections and intrigues, even when they are on holiday. I don't know if you've noticed, but this is exactly the reason why many businessmen refuse to take any days off and always justify it by having to sort out issues that cannot be postponed. Their disorientation and inability of understanding anything else in life, except the specific area of business, is the only effect the struggle for money has produced. The situation is truly dramatic for those who are very rich or for some politicians. They like to believe that they live the so called high-life, and once they have had a taste of this luring temptation, it is very hard to let go of it. Their correct perception of reality is then profoundly distorted and their aim in life becomes staying on top. They seek to impress through wealth, connections and financial means, all of which are characteristics that are obviously related to an impure and gross level of consciousness. The fact that they are hiding from themselves is then supported by the ideology of our modern system of culture and education itself which encourages man to believe that there's nothing else beyond these material goals that we all should have in this life. They believe there is no god, no divine spirit, no law of compensation after death, or no reincarnation to make possible this balancing of actions."

"Even more," I added, "these ideas are purposely propagated in order to achieve some vicious goals. This was very clearly presented to me by Cezar when he told me about his meetings with Signore Massini." *

* See Chapters 3 and 4 of Transylvania Sunrise by Radu Cinamar. Massini is a leading Italian Freemason who tried to corrupt Cezar Brad so that his group could gain access to the hidden chamber beneath the Romanian Sphinx.

Elinor nodded affirmatively and then continued on with the subject at hand.

"There is a very simple explanation of the materialistic and atheist indoctrination that is supported almost desperately by the structures of power. If people come to realize that the meaning of their existence is completely different than what they think it is, their priorities would change dramatically. For example, if they truly understand what the nature of their actions imply – sometimes during the same lifetime or a future one – they might come to realize that what they are experiencing or will experience is an exact ‘replica’ of an earlier life. Their mature thinking and the understanding of these aspects would cause them to be more responsible towards their own goals and would stimulate them to be freer in their thinking. This would inevitably lead to a significant change in the distribution of power on the planet as humans would not be so easy to manipulate anymore. The interest in the material level would diminish considerably; therefore, the consumption of goods would decrease and would adapt to the natural necessities as opposed to the excess you see nowadays. Of course, if people buy less and are more interested in the esoteric and spiritual aspects of their life, then payments decrease very rapidly and so do leaders’ and rich people’s power to control and manipulate via money. A practically new society would emerge based upon real and correct principles. At present, however, this is what is least desired by the occult organizations that lead the destiny of Humankind.

“In reference to this, there are people that claim, full of emphasis and importance, that all ideas regarding the great global conspiracy, the control of the masses and the manipulation of people are just inaccuracies, lacking substance and concrete proof. Unfortunately, these human beings are showing a psychology full of fear and selfishness. Thinking they speak for many others, they are in fact indirectly expressing the anguish and insecurity they sharply feel deep within their being. Still, for those with common sense and correct discernment, the signals received from outside and the way events are unfolding on the global scene are enough to convince them of the slippery slope that humanity is on now and will cause them to act, each according to their own possibilities, so as to give a new direction and new meaning to the destiny of us all. If you look carefully, you will see that this is actually a terrible fight between a few with the supreme power of spiritual knowledge against those who deviated from the path and now seek to attract Humankind towards chaos and ruin.”

I knew what he was saying only too well from all of the memorable talks I had with Cezar. I interrupted Elinor, trying to highlight a certain aspect.

“There are many people out there who know these things and lucidly see the state of it all. Still, the majority of them allow the feelings of sadness and depression related to these aspects to engulf them and this is a big mistake. After all, the world we perceive is in a state of continuous motion and transformation. Whatever we do, we cannot stop its fluctuation and instability; but we can direct it towards good and harmony. The restlessness of the world also causes the restlessness of our mind, and this is exactly the situation of those that enter a fight without even seeing it. As if they were blind, they too will suffer the same as the others; but they won’t know how to get out of there.

“In my opinion, in order to sort out this painful aspect, we need to change our attitude. Knowing the way the world is, we shouldn’t let ourselves be attracted or influenced by the version that it offers as this will cause our suffering. If we manage to look at the world from the outside while still being in it, it means we’ve solved the issues as far as we are concerned. The more of us who succeed in this, the better it will be for the whole of humanity as such an attitude is deeply spiritual and brings us closer to the truth. I have often talked with Cezar about this aspect. He told me that one of the most efficient methods of being inside and outside the world at the same time is to profoundly understand its governing laws. When you speak about destiny, I’ve told myself that the correct understanding of its characteristics can spare man of an almost never ending suffering.”

“Indeed,” responded Elinor. “Most often destiny is associated with suffering; and as you know, this is due to the bad actions committed in the past for which man needs to pay. This basic fact is still unacceptable for the majority of people, but I have explained to you the reasons hidden in their subconscious causing them to choose ‘I do what I want; I don’t have to account for anything.’ After all, it is a matter of consciousness that if they manage to ‘put their consciousness to sleep’ then they would be spared accounting for the bad things they do and which might make them feel embarrassed and cause discontent. The greater the ‘occulting’ of their consciousness, the greater their blindness for their actions. Thus, they reach a stage where they cannot discern between virtue and non-virtue anymore. They often claim not to understand what is wrong with lying, stealing, cheating, swindling, counterfeiting, or even resorting to violence as, according to their mentality, ‘this is how it is in business’ and ‘everybody knows it but no one admits it.' This pathetic and almost permanent fight for money, power or fame is senseless in essence; firstly, because all these things don't last; and secondly, because they generate renewed destiny ties that must be 'paid.' The Orient calls this karma. I have no doubts you know very well the meaning of this term which, roughly speaking, refers to the connection between cause and effect.

"Still, karma is a very complex notion. Think for a moment that there are sometimes more causes that determine the same effect. For example, the fact that you came to meet me involved a cumulus of multiple circumstances: you were healthy when it was possible for you to have fallen seriously ill just the day before; you arrived here safely by car or other mode of transport when you could have had a serious accident on the way; you had the necessary interest to speak to me; you found the right address as you could have gotten lost; and, of course, many other secondary causes that made this meeting possible.

"Even if others consider these aspects to be inconclusive so as to be taken for granted, it is not entirely so as every element has its reason and leads towards something coherent in life. That's why it is not at all by chance the way we act, be it physically with our body or mentally with our thoughts. Each and every one of these ways of manifesting that we have at our disposal automatically generate 'an answer' in our future destiny; namely, our karma. All of these 'answers' build a clear image of our future destiny; predominantly good or bad. Sometimes, when necessary, 'the answer' to a certain kind of action is so fast and obvious that it leaves no doubt in regards to the existence of the universal law of destiny. Nevertheless, many ignore even such clear signals."

"And this despite their suffering," I said. "Everybody wants to be happy and nobody wants to struggle. For this we need to observe the causes leading to happiness and compare them with the causes leading to suffering. It is easy in theory but even this effort proves too much for some."

I was interrupted by Elinor's ringing mobile. After a few replies in English over the phone, he finished the conversation and told me that his Tibetan friend apologized for the delay but had a few difficulties on the way here and had to sort it out. I was also told that he was going to arrive in approximately a half an hour. That made me happy as I thought the meeting was going to be rescheduled, but Elinor told me it concerns a very important circumstance and could not be postponed. He speculated that maybe that was why the lama had some problems that could have prevented him from coming.

“Sometimes there are forces that strongly oppose a certain positive event happening. In practical terms, a change in the causality rapport is what is desired,” he explained.

“It means your friend is a spiritual master who knows how to resolve such situations!” I exclaimed.

“Of course. His story is very special indeed,” Elinor answered mysteriously. “You will be surprised to find out that there are some connections between you two that, even though indirect, facilitated the present turn of events.”

“Very well,” I said. “After all, this is precisely the reason I came here; but before your Tibetan friend arrives, I would like you to tell me how the meeting in Brussels ended. I admit that I am amazed by your story and I still can’t completely digest the explanations you gave me. Actually, I think that such information would make others smile incredulously rather than accepting even a small part of what you told me.”

“This may be so,” said Elinor, “but beyond that they won’t be left with anything valuable. As far as my life is concerned, the truth is too troubling for those with an ordinary understanding. In your case, however, I thought that you have already passed some difficult tests and needed to know more about me.”

Having said that, Elinor rose from the armchair and left the living room. After a few seconds, he came back holding a strange object that at first glance resembled an ornamental sculpture. I immediately understood that this was the mysterious object that facilitated colossal longevity. I nervously picked it up and looked at it carefully. It was made out of a metallic cube, and its side of approximately fifteen centimeters looked like a net with a large rhomboid-shaped mesh. Inside this cube and inscribed within it was a sphere made of the same metal. Like the cube, its outer contour was a net but its mesh was smaller. Finally, within the sphere was inscribed a tetrahedron, a perfect representation of a miniature pyramid with the apex pointing upwards.

The tetrahedron was the main element, the central piece of the ensemble. Besides the fact that its surface was opaque, the small pyramid was made out of a different type of metal than the cube and the sphere. For the latter, the metal had reddish reflexes, that resembled copper. I was very surprised by the perfect finish; and even with the matte surface it still created strange lights and shadows between the nets constructing the cube and the sphere.

I asked Elinor what kind of technology had been used in obtaining the metal and to precisely assemble all of the components of the object, but he answered that this information is part of the secret of initiation and cannot be disclosed. Still, he mentioned that the ‘hot spot’ of the ensemble was the little pyramid, the secret ‘heart’ that ensures the mysterious influence over the life of the one the object has been built for.

Indeed, the pyramid had a fascinating color that is similar to turquoise that, with every little move, reflected light in the most unexpected ways. I assumed that it happened due to the perfect finish of its surface, but Elinor told me it was actually one of the properties of the mysterious alloy that the pyramid was made of. The combination of the reddish color of the net that made up the cube and the sphere, combined with that of the turquoise (sometimes going to dark blue) of the pyramid, all in the pale light of the room, was having a strange effect upon my psyche. I felt driven towards dreaming and reverie, but Elinor’s voice brought me back to the present.

“Even if it’s not tuned to your specific frequency of vibration, the object still creates a certain kind of subtle interaction, particularly with a receptive person. Imagine it as a type of relay or physical intermediary that is very finely tuned to translate certain cosmic energies that the scientists aren’t even aware of. That is why its subtle impregnation causes an almost instantaneous specific reaction in the one it is close to. If you, who are not tuned to the object’s ‘wavelength,’ very quickly felt its influence, imagine how I perceive its subtle characteristic action. It’s like a strong connection between me and this object that I feel as a very specific and very pleasant vibration in my entire body. It ‘nourishes’ me and supports me permanently; and what I predominantly feel is a state of perfect balance of all the organism’s functions and processes.”

I was listening to Elinor while holding the object and turning it on all sides. It was very light considering that all its components were metallic.

“Is the pyramid empty inside?” I asked out of curiosity, trying to find an explanation for the amazing lightness of the ensemble.

Elinor was quiet for a few moments, looking like he could not decide if it was all right to disclose the truth. Lifting my eyes towards him, I thought my question innocent; but I noticed that, without meaning to, I raised a sensitive issue.

“I will tell you,” he replied, “that this is the most important secret that needs to be kept; not necessarily in regards to the pyramid’s content but the method of obtaining what is inside it.”

He paused for a bit to turn the light on and then continued.

“The pyramid is not compact. Its walls are made of an alloy unknown to humans and inside it, right in the center, is embedded a very special violet crystal.

“The way of obtaining this crystal is the big advantage of the path I’m following as this crystal is the one that personalizes the object. It is what ‘attracts’ the specific radiation; and at the same time, it encodes the influence of a certain subtle energy of the Universe to the owner’s particular frequency of vibration. Without it, the ensemble wouldn’t be able to create the effect you now know it does. On the other hand, the crystal on its own can’t be of any efficiency without the special interaction it has with the alloy of the pyramid. The whole ensemble ‘vibrates’ in a very exact way, and the tuning of the frequency is continuously adjusted by the secret alloy. You can even say it possesses a sort of ‘intelligence’ as it reacts to the slightest energetic changes of the live organism for which both it and the crystal have been personalized through a very secret alchemical methodology. If you place the object on the table and leave it still, you will notice that the alloy keeps on ‘moving’ or at least creates the sensation of movement.”

I was observing this phenomenon in amazement, and I remembered the mysterious material that covered the Great Gallery in the secret location beneath the sphinx in the Bucegi Mountains. Its ‘behavior’ was similar to the alloy's with the same 'nuances,' the same type of 'intelligent' behavior, and the same kind of special influence over anyone near it. The noticeable difference was that the material in the Great Gallery had an organic component while the alloy that made the pyramid was made of pure metal.

"All the parts of the object are alchemically obtained after very precise recipes," said Elinor. "That includes the violet crystal found in the pyramid, too. That is the most difficult to obtain, but the process is not that long. What is essential is that the one who knows the secret is already a true master of alchemy.

"As a matter of fact, the tradition of the path is only continued through spiritual accomplishment. If the one who possesses the object doesn't achieve perfection in the Great Alchemical Work, he won't have any follower of his own as he won't be capable of making the object or will only be able to make some components of it. He won't be able to obtain the central crystal even if all of the theoretical knowledge of the 'recipe' is available. The reason for this is that he would be missing an essential subtle component that is fundamental for personalizing the object, a quality that is only obtained when accomplished spiritually. No matter his efforts in obtaining the violet crystal; no matter if he repeats the experiment for thousands and thousands of times, he won't be able to personalize the object and it won't have any effect.

"But, exactly because there is this condition, the disciple is given an extremely long life in the physical body so that the maturity and experience he will then achieve contributes to the realization of the Great Alchemical Work. As I've already told you, this is absolutely necessary in order to be fully successful in making the object. The end result is always certified by the superb violet color that the crystal then gets."

"Now I'm more aware of the importance of the path you're following," I said, convinced. "Until now, I couldn't understand the specific way it leads to spiritual realization. Although the master-disciple connection doesn't seem too strong within this tradition, I intuit that in your case it was slightly different. Tell me, have you been helped and supported quite a lot in your search by your ancestor who was also your master? I am asking you this because, as far as I understand, his master left him quite soon after revealing the path."

“That is true, but don’t forget that my ancestor spent more than twenty years by the Hindu magician’s side, all prior to his initiation. He already knew very many alchemical secrets; and moreover, as he said so himself, the magician left him a small fortune to get on in the world when beginning his ‘journey.’ It seems there is a tradition on this path whereby the master takes care of the chosen disciple at all levels, including the financial one. Considering that the masters of this spiritual lineage had a perfect knowledge of the alchemical art and were at any time capable of obtaining the Philosopher’s Stone, it was very easy for them to make any quantity of precious metals to give to the disciple. Don’t think, however, that it was done without any discernment. In such a case, the master’s intention would have been incompatible with the perfect and integrated way of acting that an accomplished alchemist manifests. I was significantly helped in this direction by my ancestor. Without exaggerating, I can say that he left me a real treasure. I am not referring to a chest with jewelry and gold coins but very substantial funds in banks plus several pieces of real estate in the main cities of the world.”

“Yes, I suspected that,” I said. “Still, it is irrelevant as when you are faced with a two-thousand-year-long life, even if you save little but consistently, you can gather a great fortune.”

“Logically, you are right; but in reality, things are not quite like that,” said Elinor as he smiled slightly. “In order to correctly understand the psychological ‘mechanism’ of a human being that knows he can live for thousands of years in the physical body, you must first start from different premises and goals that the respective being might have. There are profound transformations taking place, and these cannot and should not be ignored. Paradoxically, the focus is more on the occult aspects of life rather than the concrete, immediate, and material ones that most human are used to.

“The intentions of such a person converge more and more towards self-realization and grace to a specific subtle ‘imprint’ of this path created over the millennia. The chosen disciple understands fairly quick the purpose as well as the subtleties of his new way of living. Because his social integration starts to become difficult, he is then given the necessary financial resources to easily overcome the obstacles in this direction. These means are not at all offered for his pleasure or desire although you could say that he then has everything he wants. His situation is unusual and that's exactly why it needs to be treated differently."

"Besides the financial help, did your ancestor offer you any spiritual teachings?" I asked.

"It is traditional to this path for the master to retreat from his disciple's side immediately after offering him the final investiture. In my case, the master stayed with me in Brussels for another three weeks after my initiation. We both spent most of the time in his alchemical laboratory which was in the basement of the villa. I was thus initiated in a series of basic procedures and alchemical knowledge in order to help me start my own alchemical experiments. His decision to stay with me for a while longer after my initiation was justified even if it didn't respect the tradition as any path and any method must be adapted to the present social, political and cultural context.

"As far as I'm concerned, I think I was chosen by him mainly due to my stable structure and to the openness and sincerity that is characteristic in me. Maybe my ancestor also intuited other aspects within me.

"Anyway, the specifics of the contemporary world do not allow a long stage of initiation in the occult sciences, especially in regards to the path I am on. The divergent interests, malefic intentions, secret services and advanced technology modify totally the vision of engaging in and then continuing this tradition. Practically speaking, there is an earth to heaven's difference between the two ways we learned alchemy. The circumstances my ancestor lived in around 1500, when he received the initiation in the far-away Indies, and the ones from the end of the last century, around 1970, when I myself got initiated and tutored by him in the alchemical mysteries, are totally incomparable. Plus, I didn't have any previous esoteric knowledge and didn't study the subject at all. Of course, three weeks are too little time to grasp even the basis of the occult sciences; but even so, that period proved very useful in getting an idea about what I needed to know and then realize in my long life. Of great help was the immense library of my ancient ancestor, a collection that contained work and documents of an inestimable value. Not even now can I say that I've finished studying its main volumes. Meanwhile, I too have added to the books that existed then with very important works. Besides, I own another three great libraries in my houses abroad.

“The guiding ideas I had received from my ancestor in those few weeks he stayed by my side formed a sort of ‘matrix’ that oriented my ulterior activity. Even when his turn of phrase in Romanian was a bit strange, particularly the order of the words, I still managed to understand even the most secret aspect of the practice as where he didn’t know the specific terms, my ancestor would turn to French. He told me that he learned Romanian ever since my parents first came to Transylvania. He would do that every time: learn the language of the country his successors chose to live in, mainly to be able to better understand and more efficiently follow the evolution of the members of his genealogical lineage. He never intervened though and remained hidden and unknown to those before me on the main branch but carefully followed and analyzed their lives. He knew fourteen foreign languages and several dialects, a direct result of his world travels. At present, I only speak five foreign languages; but for now, that is enough.

“My ancient relative gave me some essential directions regarding the specific ways of acting in modern society in order to avoid the thorniest issues that could personally concern me. In the last couple of days, he introduced me to very trustworthy people who were former disciples of his. They played an important role that in the following years helped me greatly to take some delicate actions in direct connection to my ‘cover’ around the world.”

Elinor then told me about some very special contacts he had made in the last few years. Among these was the Tibetan lama that announced his arrival that night. He also told me about the emotional parting from his ancestor and revealed some aspects regarding future events happening worldwide. Elinor said that although there are many prophecies and previsions for the times to come, one of these deserves special attention as it is integrated into the ‘logic’ of cosmic becoming. But at the exact moment he was getting ready to reveal more information about the source of the prophecies and their impact over the consciousness of the people, we heard the door bell. I then had an instantaneous intuition that my meeting with the Tibetan lama was going to have a great importance for my future existence.

Even so, the surprise I had when he entered the room surpassed any of my expectations.

In the approximately three hours that I spent in Elinor's company, I found out information that without any doubt would shock any normal being and provoke an inner desire to strongly reject it. These apparently normal reactions would be the direct expression of a sudden break in the rhythm of the routine conceptions and activity of the contemporary man. I consider that I surpassed this major handicap long ago and was therefore open to any challenges in this direction. I already had an important stock of knowledge, explanations and shocking revelations that have mostly been supported by material proof that qualify as highest ranking state secrets.

Even so, the meeting with the Tibetan priest amazed me so much that I needed a few good seconds to get my voice back. My surprise was endless as that was, after all, the first time I was confronted with a reality completely different from the objective reality I knew.

Chapter Two — The Tibetan Connection

Enveloped by an unknown emotion, I got out of the armchair and waited to meet this mysterious character. I heard fragments of a conversation in English and then the sounds of the two men's steps as they approached the living room.

The first to enter the room was the Tibetan. He was relatively short, approximately 50 years old, and was wearing a dark blue suit made of a natural fibre, probably cotton. His suit looked a lot like a Chinese uniform but had a much more elegant cut and a modern twist.

I was amazed to notice that even though it was quite cold outside, especially at night, the lama was not wearing anything else over his suit. His eyes were very alive and his look was extremely piercing. Due to the unusual force that the Tibetan was manifesting through his eyes, without leaving the impression of sternness or toughness, I felt a little embarrassed and even inhibited. This aspect, however, proved to be insignificant in the light of what was to follow.

THE SECRET OF A YIDAM

After the lama took a few steps into the room, I expected to see Elinor behind him but it was not he who appeared. Instead, there was a being whose presence made me involuntarily shout in surprise. I stood frozen on the spot with my eyes fixed on him, incapable of making any move. Behind the Tibetan was a gigantic man whose head almost touched the ceiling. I think he was taller than two and a half meters. Due to the unusual nature of the creature I witnessed, I feel that it is my responsibility to give some explanations in regards to the "human" status of that being.

His somatic structure seemed to be one of a mature man save for the proportions I have already mentioned. Nevertheless, his aspect was truly "explosive." When I say that, I am referring to the very real meaning of the term that is, of course, meant to be interpreted figuratively. The simple presence of that gigantic being in the room seemed intent on “crushing” me or at least causing me a strong feeling of inner fear.

Trying to control my emotions and reaction, I did not ask any questions. Instead, I took a good look at the giant’s face. His hair was black and long below the shoulders, but it was tousled, resembling a terrible mane surrounding his head. His face was adorned with an enormous moustache that accentuated the terrific radiation he emitted. His black eyes seemed to dance in flames and his frowning eyebrows did not foretell anything good. As I was going to see soon, however, the look of that being was his naturally given aspect or his normal existential condition which, by the way, grossly contradicts the way others perceive and understand the presence of those around them.

The yidam was obviously of Asiatic origin with a dry complexion, a tanned face as if he were sunburned, oblique eyes, and a nose that was a little flattened, thus suggesting a possible Tibetan root. His clothes were another point of reference as they were completely unusual: very large trousers made of a very thick black material, a red blouse with large sleeves, a wide belt made of multicolored scarves, and a long yellow cape. Under the folds of the cape, I could see the tips of a pair of huge wooden clogs. This being could very well serve as a signaling beacon.

It was then that I noticed two aspects that confused me even more. The more carefully I looked at him, the more the air surrounding him started to dance, just as it does above the very hot sand in the desert. Trying to focus as much as I could on his outer contours, I had the strange feeling that his contours were dissipating in contact with the air around him. If I focused on the turbulent area, however, the disturbing effect stopped and the contours of the yidam’s body became very clear. I was greatly confused by this optical illusion as I could not understand if this was a real being or just an ephemeral apparition. Although I had not said a word up to that moment and had not requested any explanation, the Tibetan lama answered my exact question in perfect English.

“It all depends from what perspective you want to look at this body. If you think of it as the body of an ordinary human being, then you must know it is as real as they come. It has a physical consistency, movements and gestures common to any other human being; but if you try to detect the more subtle aspects of his existence, then your mind will automatically interact with a more profound subtle reality that is the existential foundation of the one before you. If so, your perception of his physical reality will be slightly ‘toned down’ and your brain will not know how to interpret the strange phenomenon of the vibrating air that surrounds him.”

“But...after all, who or what is he?” I dared to ask, timidly.

The Tibetan priest was still standing before me with his hands and forearms together. Although he was looking at me as from far away, I felt certain that he was looking deep into my being. Even so, I did not feel any opposition or discomfort as his ample subtle influence enveloped me. It was calming, relaxing, protective, and understanding.

“It is quite difficult to explain what he is, but I can tell you that in Tibet he is known as a yidam. For now, you can consider him as a reliable companion of the one who invokes him.”

“What do you mean by a companion?” I asked, confused. “A very valuable company, especially through the hardships of life,” the lama continued.

I still could not understand. There were too many unanswered questions swarming in my mind. Why do they look thismenacing? What can a yidam do? Does he behave like a normal human being? What is his purpose? I practically did not know which of these questions to ask first.

Meanwhile, the lama sat down in the armchair that Elinor had sat in earlier. Elinor remained standing and smiled, slightly leaning on the fireplace. Silently, the yidam moved immediately behind the Tibetan priest’s armchair and next to his left shoulder. As the initial surprise lessened and I was returning to an almost normal state of mind, I noticed another disturbing aspect attributable to the yidam’s presence. The room was filled with a characteristic smell that I have identified with ambergris; but at times I could also feel vague wafts of myrrh that gave the space we were in a certain sacredness. Initially, I thought Elinor was burning incense, but I realized there was no basis for my assumption as there was no smoke in the room and the smell was very delicate and pure. When the yidam moved behind the armchair that the lama sat in, I knew he was the source of the sublime smell that was radiating throughout the room. When the yidam passed very close to me, I felt how that smell was wafting from him. I confess that, for a second, I wondered if he had used some expensive brand of perfume. Embarrassed by such a ridiculous assumption, I immediately realized that no matter how delicate and valuable a commercial perfume might be, it could never equal the fragrant emanations of a sacred being; and I was starting to suspect that the yidam was exactly that.

“From a Western point of view, the presence of a yidam is not only disturbing, it is also completely incomprehensible,” the lama said. “I will give you some explanation though regarding this matter because I have considered it would be appropriate to do so the moment I decided you were able to see a yidam.”

I was just sitting down, but upon hearing the lama’s last words, I froze before finally speaking.

“I’m afraid I don’t understand. Actually, I don’t understand anything anymore. From what you’ve said I can conclude that seeing a yidam is a privilege; or better said, a gift, an act of grace.”

I was honestly surprised and slightly skeptical.

“It’s more of a personal choice that depends upon the person we are meeting and what we wish to realize. I am talking now about matters that are nowhere near the conceivable mental attitude of a normal human being. This is exactly why ordinary humans cannot see a yidam,” the lama added as he pointed to the giant being behind him. “This is not due to their incapacity, however, but to the yidam’s will; and he can remain completely invisible to other people.”

“And despite all this, I will still be able to see him?” I asked in amazement.

“Yes, you will see him as you see him now, but the others will not notice his presence. For them, he basically does not exist. I repeat, this is a direct result of the yidam’s will. Sometimes, as it is now, it is necessary for his body to be perceived by you too as Elinor and him are already old acquaintances,” he said smiling.

Only then did I realize that Elinor did not react in any way when the giant entered his house.

“OK, but why all this?” I wanted to know.

The lama tilted his head slightly forwards.

“This is not the purpose of the meeting I requested and I do not want to digress too much. Nonetheless, I will give you some details about the mysteries of a yidam as it is necessary that your understanding of these matters is as correct as possible. This will help us later in what we have to do.”

The lama stopped for a moment and closed his eyes. Immediately afterwards, he opened them. Fastening his eyes on me, he started to talk.

“In Tibet, there is a certain stage of spiritual practice when the disciple, under the close supervision of his master, starts the technique that allows the creation of a yidam.”

I was not even blinking anymore.

“Did you just say ‘to create a yidam’?” I asked.

The procedure is very complicated and difficult to carryout,” the lama continued without paying attention to my perplexity. “It requires special accuracy in building a colored sand mandala; and afterwards, the disciple must make consistent efforts to become successful in certain mental focusing and visualization techniques. All of these must be done in complete isolation and on a very severe diet. Add to this the low air temperature in the mountains, which often dips below zero, and you will understand why this spiritual stage of the aspirant’s life can sometimes last for two years or more. Besides, the ones who deserve to receive this initiation from their master and manage to fulfill such a spiritual practice are relatively few. Many give up along the way or are just not capable of understanding some fundamental subtle aspects that would ensure their complete success.

“Even after creating a yidam, who then becomes an entity with a physical aspect and form — the same as you and me — the issue is still suspended and the disciple needs to solve it. He needs to understand the real nature of the yidam and what characteristics he has. Out of those who succeeded in creating a yidam, some decide for him to accompany them their entire life, always guiding them in difficult situations and pointing them towards higher and higher levels of spiritual progress. Others, who are very few in number, are able to infer the nature of the yidam from the beginning. Even so, the nature of a yidam is still illusory; and thus they remain focused in a very profound meditation that transcends even this very sophisticated illusion.”

“And what is the nature of a yidam?” I asked impatiently.

I was watching the gigantic being behind the priest with fascination and respect but also a little fear. Although I was starting to get used to his presence, his frightening look still made me shiver.

“In essence, the nature of a yidam is purely mental,” the lama responded. “Irrespective of the complicated stages that the creation of a yidam involves, its essence is mental. The disciple then proves his abilities of mental focus and efficient control of the mind. I think it is already no mystery to you that, in reality, it is the mind which creates the entire phenomenal world that is perceived by man from moment to moment. The mind carries his daily activities. It is then up to the disciple as to whether he will finally realize the illusory nature of this formidable mental force that he possesses or whether he will get attached to it and remain chained in the illusion that surrounds him.

“In fewer words, a yidam is the quintessence of the mental energy of the one who evokes and creates it, coming from the profound particularities of his personality and subconscious. That is why yidams are not identical but express different behavioral attitudes. Some yidams belong to the terrible entities category while some belong to the gentle entities one. Some are spiritual guides, and there are many more categories as well. The one in this room is of the terrible category but do not let that fool you and make you believe he is associated with violence or destruction.”

“His looks contribute greatly to this impression,” I said.

“It is true,” said the lama as he smiled, “but think that every yidam, according to the category he belongs to, has a certain and precise meaning to fulfill next to the one who created him.”

I intervened in order to voice a spontaneous thought.

“The idea I have about him is to identify him more with some of the djinns or genies of the Arabian Nights tales who, after being released from a bottle or amphora, fulfill the wishes of their liberator,” I said, slightly amused.

“You did not understand the substratum lying behind the existence of a yidam,” the lama continued. “In Arabic magic and occultism, such djinns exist indeed. They are, in fact, astral entities that are not too elevated. Most commonly known as genies, they have some powers which allow them to fulfill some of the wishes of the human being who invokes them. Do not forget, however, that these acts are always based upon a mutual pact or understanding that is tacitly agreed with by both sides. A yidam is a physical creation that is touchable, and his relationship with the one he accompanies is of a total different nature than those magical pacts. It is true, however, that before being able to materialize or even speak, a yidam goes through some intermediary stages that start with sporadic apparitions that are almost immaterial until he finally takes his definite physical shape and consistency. He then apparently becomes a person like any other, but keep in mind that a yidam always has some of the characteristics of the one who created him.”

“So,” I said, “I understand that he is a purely mental creation. The Western mind finds it difficult to cope with the idea that the relatively abstract, subtle and intangible aspects of the mind can create a physical form. If I was not here and seeing what I’m seeing, I myself would probably not adhere to such an idea.”

“It is a pointless limitation that got imposed due to the habit of believing what you are told,” said the lama. “In reality, things are much more nuanced. A yidam ‘condenses’ out of the very subtle matter of the superior mental levels of the one who practices this complex technique. Hence, even if he finally has a physical body, the matter he’s made of has different characteristics from the typical physical body, it not being so rigid. This is why, depending on what is needed, a yidam can remain completely invisible for those he does not wish to show himself to and at the same time allow others to see him. Anyway, I think you realize what it would mean if he would allow everyone to see him walking around town.”

The lama smiled suggestively as he completed this last statement. Elinor, who until then had remained silent on one side of the room, now intervened.

“Because his structure is special, he can become invisible and remain penetrable to touch at the same time, like a live hologram. We are talking about a conscious directing of the vibrating matter that makes up his being. As this capacity is exclusively related to the exertion of mental control and because the yidam is a mental emanation of the one who created him, this adjustment of the frequency of vibration of matter is only obvious.”

Although I understood what was said, I was still confused by the seemingly unnatural circumstances at work.

“We are here and we talk about him,” I said as I pointed to the yidam, “like he is some sort of exhibit being analyzed under a microscope. This being hasn’t said a word up to now; didn’t voice any opinion. It almost looks like he is an accessory.”

“It is a profoundly mistaken impression,” the lama explained patiently. “The moment I told you that his nature is mental but still elevated, you should have realized that his purpose is much subtler than the one you imagine. In the beginning, I told you that he is a companion or attendant in order to have a starting point and not shock your power of understanding too much. I then made some important specifications among which was one that a yidam guides the one who created him towards superior stages of spiritual practice. Not only is he not just decorative, but he even becomes a sort of spiritual master for the disciple that he takes care of for the rest of his life.

“Here appears the following dilemma: if the yidam is created by a human being, how is it possible for him to become that being’s spiritual master? This apparent problem can be solved if you understand that the yidam represents a sort of interface between the superior mental structures and the physical plane in which the one who created him exists. The subtle aspect of this relationship, somehow symbiotic, is the attachment the disciple may have or develop for his yidam. Being a mental creation, even if belonging to a superior world, it is still ephemeral and can only lead the disciple up to a certain stage of spiritual progress.”

Here the lama took a short break. As soon as he did, the atmosphere in the room changed almost suddenly and became strongly ionized, smelling like a forest before a storm. The attitude of the yidam was even statelier and his eyes were shooting fire at me. After a short while and without making any gesture, the lama resumed his explanation.

“He (the yidam) just told me that at a certain level of your mental structure, there are certain tensions of which you are not aware of but that they will disappear soon. They are only the result of your trying to understand and assimilate a large amount of unusual information as soon as possible. Unfortunately, time does not allow us to postpone at all the purpose for which we all gathered here; but at the same time, I wouldn’t want you to be left with certain unclear aspects that might generate bigger problems later.”

I felt like I was being bombarded from all directions by unexplainable phenomena.

“I didn’t hear any word from him,” I said slightly irritated. “You couldn’t have anyway,” the lama responded. “A yidam only speaks to the one who created him or in his presence, but communication with words is not absolutely necessary. Most often it is done telepathically. Many disciples waive the last part of the technique where the yidam gets a voice as it requires an extra effort and is not absolutely necessary. However, it is correct and safe for the yidam to be also capable of speaking to the disciple as at certain times he cannot have the certainty of the telepathic communication between him and the yidam and thus can confuse his own ideas with the yidam’s. Have no doubts, the yidam you see here can speak; but if you heard him, you would have another shock for sure. The voice of a yidam, especially when he belongs to the formidable entities category, is almost paralyzing. This is not necessarily because of its volume but mainly due to its specific frequency being very strange to the human ear. Plus, as I already told you, he only speaks to the one who created him. If you wish, however, I can ask him to address you telepathically so that you have at least an approximate idea of how his voice sounds in reality.”

The lama was waiting for my approval which I offered without any reservation. Although excited at the thought of such a new experience for me, I confusedly felt that the physical world that we all usually consider stable and safe had now lost quite a bit of its consistency, but I could not pinpoint the cause of my feeling. Later, objectively analyzing those very special moments, I realized that although the beings and objects in the living room belonged to this world, they were equally transcending it as well. Elinor was practically “immortal” compared to the average life of an ordinary human, and the object facilitating this extraordinary condition was made out of substances that had no correspondence in this world. The Tibetan priest was also a very mysterious character and my intuition told me he possessed explosive secrets. The yidam was an overwhelming presence that best embodied the connection with other worlds. In these circumstances, I had to adapt to make full use of all my powers and capacities of understanding.

The important issue here is that because my brain was recording this bizarre information as coming to me externally, from the outside, coupled with the fact that the reality of these beings and objects were not overlapping with the common concept of daily life, a dream state was starting to generate in my mind. In fact, this was only an extreme solution of my brain in order to cope with the quandary it was in. In the beginning, I was tempted to distrust the yidam’s observation; but later, I was convinced that he was perfectly right and that his power of insight at a mental level was remarkable.

On the other hand, from an occult point of view, everything was completely explainable. It is known how notably influential a wave form can be when it is manifested through the use of certain objects in order to create a magical atmosphere. This is exactly why certain props as well as special diagrams and gestures are resorted to during rituals. All of these are used in order to facilitate a “breach” of the separation between levels which is nothing else but a “bridge” between them. The energy of the one doing the magic ritual and the supporting elements that facilitate the orientation of this energy in the desired direction are the basis of any occult action. The being, as well as all the objects used, become genuine relays of caption and manifestation of certain energies belonging to the subtle planes of Creation.

Although we were nowhere close to being involved in a magical proceeding, the principle of the relay of force and of the energy between levels was applying, even if only because of who and what was present. For example, the subtle energetic field of the strange object that prolonged life certainly played its part in the space-time distortion that was happening in the room. The auras of the other three beings were also a major influence in this direction and such that my own aura was then somehow infused with these unusual vibrations that powerfully reverberated in my consciousness.

The dream state I had entered was now suddenly invaded by a sort of voice that resembled a thunder rumble more than anything else. Although I could not actually understand the words, the idea that was transmitted was very clear. The yidam was telling me that in order to ease and relax my mental tension, he had modified the ambiance of the room, cooling it down and infusing it with vitality. My head resounded with the rumbling of his words which were reminiscent of but not really like thunder from a storm. I was trying to find an analogy, but in reality, the impression was much more complex.

Pretty dazed, I managed to thank the yidam telepathically. Suddenly, my mind and the living room became overwhelmingly quiet. There was not a sound nor movement, just a frozen silence. Peering with my eyes half ajar, the environment seemed somehow unreal. It was almost to the point where I could not feel the contours of my body. Contrary to my expectations, however, the wonderful state of relaxation that enveloped me did not make me lethargic or induce sleepiness. Instead, it made me more lucid and capable of understanding what was happening with and within myself during every moment that passed. In less than three minutes, I felt so good that I did not wish for anything else other than to remain in that very comfortable state. Intuitively, I realized that the Tibetan lama and the yidam were offering me this wonderful help so that I could overcome a certain mental blockage.

Just prior to this new state of mind, my defense mechanism of the “ego fortress” was very actively trying to generate a state of anguish and uncertainty in order to make me leave the room.

Now, however, I felt an intense joy and was full of warmth and affection for being around those special people as I faced this completely extraordinary situation.

After having retraced with clarity the sequence of events, discussions and inner emotions that I lived during those days, I now realize that only very few people will be willing to accept and sympathize with my experiences, even partially. In such an instance, the main issue seems to be that what I present greatly exceeds the common knowledge and conceptions about life and its hidden mysteries. I said to myself then that I can either reveal the realities I have lived during the days that followed or simply maintain silence. If I choose the latter, however, how could I possibly fulfill the recommendation I was given by the goddess I was soon to meet, Machandi, who advised me to make known to the world all the truths I have live through? How could I still contribute, even to a small extent, to the occult knowledge of Man, a knowledge that is a totally different kind from the superficial one that is experienced within the society?

If it were only one or another of the aforementioned propositions I was faced with then maybe I would not have bothered to describe what had happened. There was, however, an entire series of moving facts and revelations that placed me, in a complicated and at the same time exciting game of destiny, in key-situations that cannot bear comparison to normal circumstances of daily life. Surely, all these circumstances have a very precise meaning and are integrated into a much more complex ensemble than what was only partially revealed to me. On the other hand, I clearly felt that I was constantly supported and helped to successfully pass all the tests I was confronted with in this last period of my life.

I believe that each one of us has a very well determined place in the society we live in, but this does not necessarily refer to our integration into economic, political or cultural life. Nor does it refer to the idea of personal career, fame, wealth, riches, family or material gain. This role comprises a much deeper dimension of our existence; and without it, life looks dull and pointless even if it apparently has a certain attraction and exterior shine. Riches and fame are not only transient; they not durable. At most, they manage to perturb our correct understanding of the world we live in because they are tempting and illusory. Man needs something more than money, public recognition, success in business or ephemeral pleasures. If this were truly Man's meaning in this world, as soon as he would achieve all these things, they should never disappear. Or, the simple fact that they are as illusory as Fata Morgana shows that the material goals of our life are nothing else but a deceiving game that eventually exhausts a being.

The tumult of my later states of experience, the people I have met and the events I have participated in show me that I am on the good and luminous path of spiritual evolution. This generates a comforting feeling and an inner joy in me that accompany me always, being fully convinced that I am supported and helped to progress on the path of knowledge. I now know precisely where I need to look without being allured by false temptations.

I had the extraordinary chance of meeting remarkable beings who taught and initiated me in some esoteric aspects of life, thus opening a completely new horizon over my life's understanding and integration. When I have been confronted with certain conceptual difficulties or certain disturbing facts and realities, I have always been helped to successfully overcome them. In the Projection Room in the Bucegi Mountains, with Elinor's revelations and especially in the presence of the yidam, I have always received the needed help in order to successfully cope with those hiatus moments of my consciousness.

The events I am describing here, however, involved a harsher reality due to the frequency of the events. During the very pleasant state I was experiencing; and then due to the combined subtle action of both the Tibetan priest and the yidam, I was convinced that I had overcome these blockages and that I was ready to bear the eventual coming surprises much more easily.

At the same time, I was amazed by the powers the yidam had manifested towards me. I asked the Tibetan priest for further explanations in regards to this.

“What impressed you were actually simple acts that a yidam can easily realize. Yet, compared to the limited capacities of the human being, these accomplishments seem special. In fact, the powers of a yidam are much grander as he is capable of controlling certain specific energies of the Universe. A yidam must often look out for the physical and psychic integrity of a disciple. It is one of the undertaken responsibilities of a yidam to guide a disciple towards the final liberation in perfect safety. For the most part, a yidam’s paranormal interventions are done in order to protect a disciple from being attacked by certain demonic entities or from the malefic influences he is confronted with during his spiritual practice. Such situations mostly appear in the area of Tibet which is particularly known for such manifestations. The mountainous areas, the valleys or the great expanses of plateaus are the main territories of influence of diverse subtle entities that are not always propitious to those that invade their land. They are capable of terrible action in the physical plane that can even claim the life of a disciple. These are some of the situations when a yidam is of great help.

“Of course, one’s first intent is to obtain the benevolence of the subtle entity that governs the area where a disciple decides to settle down for a while in order to realize certain spiritual activities and practices. If not, the respective spirit could feel offended and insulted that he is not being given the required attention as the master of the place. Usually, this ‘softening’ of the spirits is achieved by means of simple rituals where the reasons and the durations of the stay are presented. In order to increase the probability of success, it is common to offer a gift such as food or certain objects that are traditionally consecrated for such actions. If they are pleasing to the respective entity and are accepted, their essential subtle energy is then taken by the spirit while the material offerings are either given to other people or buried in a clean soil. If the entity refuses to collaborate, which is usually manifested as visible and averse exterior phenomena such as terrible storms, threatening lighting, stone avalanches or even harm being brought to the applicant, then the yidam intervenes and starts a ‘fight’ with that entity. This confrontation can be very short if the difference in powers between the two is very big. On the other hand, if the powers of the yidam and the respective astral entity are close, the conflict can be long and tiring. During all of these, the disciple retreats from the scene of the fight; and if the situation become uncertain, he then tries to help the yidam through the means of certain spiritual practices he knows, most often invoking the additional help of other subtle entities.”

“The situations you are describing seem like they are taken out of fairy tales or legends,” I stated. “I wonder if there is truly such a reality of terrible confrontations between fantasy creatures. Are these kinds of fights happening in the physical plane?” I asked, curious to know.

“Know that they are much more real than you could ever imagine,” the lama answered. “If you can’t see it, it doesn’t mean it doesn’t exist. People nowadays are ‘blind’ towards these subtle realities as they are very conceited and indoctrinated by materialistic ideology. That is why, even when faced with indubitable evidence of the existence of other levels being manifested, they either refuse to admit it or have a most lamentable psychic breakdown.

“In the subtle planes, such as the astral plane for example, the shapes and colors have a very large spectre of manifestation. That’s why many of the entities belonging to this dimension of Creation correspond only vaguely to our representations of them in the physical plane but come very close to the so called fabulous beings described in fairy tales, myths and legends. And, in certain very special circumstances, they can even materialize in the physical plane. Besides, this is a choice for the yidam and the respective entity and occurs only when all other possibilities of fighting and attacking in the subtle planes of existence have been exhausted. In such a case, their manifestation in the physical plane is destructive and the disciple must make sure that he hides very well. Although there are very rare cases when a yidam loses such a battle, the fight usually ends before either of the two is killed, but there are also more dramatic cases.”

As I contemplated the giant and silent yidam that was in the same room with us, a question gradually crystallized in my mind.

“Is he the yidam you created all by yourself?” I finally dared to ask.

The lama did not answer me straight away. I was thinking that my question was inappropriate, and I was just getting ready to apologize when he spoke in a neutral tone of voice.

“No. As it stands, the situation is more complicated. It is good, however, that the discussion reached this point as it is connected to the purpose of our meeting. Actually, I myself am a sort of intermediary who needs to fulfill a certain mission as far as you’re concerned. Be at peace. It is all positive; however, I can’t reveal more than is absolutely necessary right now.”

I was wondering how limited “necessary” was as I had been there for almost four hours but still had no idea why I had come. I then realized that although we had been talking for quite a while, I did not even know the name of the Tibetan.

REPA SUNDHI

Somehow frustrated by this unusual situation, I expressed my perplexities which seemed justified to me. The lama apologized for not introducing himself as yet. He then told me that he had chosen to give me certain explanations related to the presence of the yidam first as this had consumed all of my attention.

I found out that the Tibetan priest was named Repa Sundhi; that he was born in Tibet but left it after the invasion of the Chinese in 1956 as, at that time, he played an important role in the royal palace of Lhasa. He travelled for a while through several countries on diplomatic missions but eventually settled down in the capital of China, at that time named Peking.

“Still, something is unclear,” I said. “I understood that you left Tibet because of the Chinese, and now you are telling me you settled in China.”

Repa Sundhi had asked me to give up the formalities and call him by his name. Besides, the age difference between us was not great, but this fact created another dilemma for me. According to his narration, he was active in the capital of Tibet in 1956 which implied him being at least 30-35 years old at that time. His present looks, however, were that of a 50-year-old man. There was a difference of approximately four decades that was not justified.

“We would have gotten here anyway, to this delicate point in our talks,” he said. “I am glad that Elinor spoke to you about his secret as this will make you more inclined to easily accept some of the revelations I’m about to make to you.”

The lama smiled slightly as he watched the strange object that was on the table.

“I have to tell you,” he continued, “that from the beginning I did not belong to the same traditional spiritual path that Elinor follows although I know it very well. In order to understand what I do in the world and what are the goals I pursue, you would need to know some occult aspects first; but we do not now have the time for me to reveal such information. What I can tell you, however, is that I most often fulfill the role of a messenger while at the same time contribute to the successful carrying out of the transmitted message.”

“What kind of emissary?” I asked, paying a lot of attention to the discussion. “And what sort of message is this about?”

“Don’t think of these messages as letters or something that can be verbally transmitted to someone,” the lama replied. Rather, the respective ‘messages’ can be integrated into certain kinds of spiritual missions in various areas of the world.

In relation to this, you must know that time doesn’t affect me almost at all. In certain people, their level of consciousness allows them to act in such a way that they attract to their aura a certain type of cosmic energy, an energy that brings youth. Additionally, there is also a secret concoction of very rare mountainous plants and herbs which contributes to this effect, but I’ll stop my explanations here.”

I almost did not know what to say anymore. This was going to be an unforgettable evening for sure! I then again asked Repa Sundhi who it is that sends him on such missions.

“The problem is complex,” he answered. “In order to correctly understand its subtleties, you would need a strong background of esoteric knowledge, both from an ideological and practical point of view. The one who is initiated in the mysteries of occultism knows very well that Humankind is not left to its own devices. If it were so, it is possible that the negative karma of the earth would have long ago tipped the scale towards destruction. There are though, hierarchically speaking, worlds and civilizations that are meant to maintain, as much as it is possible without interfering with the free will of people, a certain balance for the entire planet. These are very delicate, complex and difficult to understand aspects of reality. On the one hand, this is due to the fact that the direction of science and humanity’s conception of the universe is still too deeply materialistic. On the other hand, there are certain occult interests throughout this world which are very strong and are not at all oriented towards positive goals.”

“What kind of worlds and civilizations are you talking about? Extraterrestrial ones?” I asked, careful not to enter a slippery or unsafe subject.

The lama became serious and his voice stronger.

“What is the basis of your surprise and perplexity? Have you not already been faced with inexorable evidence in this direction? Have you not been granted access to places where few human beings are allowed at the present? Reality can be disturbing and unbelievable at first sight, but it doesn’t mean it doesn’t exist. The craze of ‘alien invasion’ and the mass manipulation that has been systematically going on for the last decades has largely succeeded to discredit this subject in the eyes and minds of many people; however, I hope you are not amongst them. It would be sad, too; especially that you now have knowledge of so much ultra secret information in this field.”

I humbly accepted his reproof. In fact, my intention has not been that of denying the existence of other civilizations in the Universe that are much more developed than the human civilization but of expressing my doubt that they could have a positive influence towards the welfare of humanity. In my opinion, to believe or not to believe there are super developed civilizations in this Universe is juvenile, and this is pretty much the level on which such controversies unfold. I am referring to the arguments between some scientists, world politicians and certain UFO supporters or those who present indubitable evidence on the subject. All politicians, and not just them, stubbornly deny the presence of these worlds and seek to prove that they do not in fact exist. This extremely conceited and limited idea that we are alone in the universe, however, is based upon well defined interests concerning total control over Humankind.

Most problems come from Christians as the influence of the church, and the Catholic one in particular, is still quite strong throughout the world. For example, if believers were told by the Pope that other beings also exist in the universe, some much more technologically advanced than humans — and were brought clear proof of this — this would almost certainly give rise to a profound conceptual crisis among the masses. Revealing evidence and contacts with other civilizations would irremediably lead to a dramatic decline of the influence and power of manipulation over humanity as humans would then have other options open to themselves that would be oriented towards different horizons from the one that had been imposed until then. The problem is much more complex, however, and is not limited to just these aspects.

I was already quite familiar with this subject. Even further, I had the opportunity to see in person the incredible technologies in the Projection Room and convince myself of the existence of other civilizations in our Galaxy by watching the synthesis of some holographic projections. Although I was convinced that the great ensemble in the Bucegi Mountains represented the work of an ancient extraterrestrial civilization, Cezar never confirmed it, not even after he revealed to me a great deal of the secret elements of the Great Expedition he participated in. Hence, from this point of view, the mystery was still hidden to me.

I reacted superficially to the information Repa Sundhi was offering me, probably from a primitive ideological reflex that it is very unlikely that Humankind is being watched over by more advanced civilizations. At the same time, I was aware that I had no solid support for this thought.

“On the other hand,” the lama continued to explain, “I didn’t say I am talking about a terrestrial civilization. I said there are very advanced beings that overlook the well being of humanity. Their powers and capacities are beyond anything you could think of right now.”

“Well, where are they?” I asked in genuine astonishment. “Where do they live? Are they among us?”

Repa Sundhi continued to explain, unperturbed.

“Their technological and spiritual progress is so great that it allows the members of that civilization to change, like flicking a switch, the frequency of vibration of matter, when they wish to do so. In a way, it is similar to how a yidam acts, but when necessary, they can change the vibration level of their entire civilization by switching from the physical plane to the astral one and back. However, in order to avoid unwanted contact with the present human civilization, which is impure and gross, they are now in a very special and secret area of which only rumors and hypotheses are known. For the most part, this situation lasted until the great discovery in the Bucegi Mountains was made a little over a year ago.”

I kept silent but mentally asked a question with intensity. Repa Sundhi answered immediately.

“Yes, Cezar Brad knows the truth about the respective civilization and the Bucegi location, but he has not been allowed yet to say anything about it after the commando team came back from the Great Expedition, not even to the Romanian or American authorities. At some point during the time spent in the main tunnel, something happened that only Cezar was witness to. The other members of the team did not have access to it. In fact, they do not even know what happened.” *

* See Chapter 5 of “Transylvanian Sunrise” by Radu Cinamar for further information.

“This means you know Cezar well,” I said enthusiastically. ”He also told me quite a bit about his grandiose adventure, but some things he didn’t share. He told me that he is not yet permitted to, but I think he referred exactly to what you spoke about. I cannot help but wonder though how you got to know Cezar so well that he talked to you about these very secret aspects. He never told me about you.”

The lama smiled enigmatically and then began to speak.

“Oh, but he did speak to you about me, but neither you nor he inferred the truth at that time. It was only after he made the great discovery in the Bucegi mountains, during a very special conjuncture that I created, that he was able to meet me again. I am a very old friend of his; and now, the favorable game of destiny has made it such that you are now able to find out certain information that is very secret.”

I was trying very hard to identify Repa Sundhi from the information that Cezar had given me, but I did not seem to get any results.

Looking at me kindly, the lama eventually spoke.

“I closely took care of the education and spiritual training of Cezar Brad who is a very evolved being. I cultivated his exceptional abilities and oriented him in a direction that can never fail.”

Here the Tibetan stopped for a moment, giving me a last chance to identify him. From the depth of my memories, an intuition was more and more coming to light. The lama then spoke with much modesty.

“I am Doctor Xien,” was all he said.

I was taken aback, not knowing what to believe anymore. Cezar had spoken very little about doctor Xien but always very considerately and affectionately. In a way, I could infer that the Tibetan lama was like a spiritual master during the communist period when he guided Cezar for several years in the secret base near B... Immediately after the 1989 Revolution, however, he suddenly disappeared without anyone knowing anything about it. Neither he nor his assistant left any trace or evidence of their disappearance. Cezar told me that when they contacted the Chinese authorities to inform them of the situation, the Chinese initially had a negative reaction and accused the Romanian secret services of the death of the two. A little while after, however, the whole affair was inexplicably forgotten without any explanations and without the mystery ever being solved. I thought that Cezar, due to his special capacities, knew at least part of the truth but did not want to reveal it to me.

“It is very true that he tried to find me through certain occult ways,” the lama said, “but by then he hadn’t developed these powers to the point where he was able to suppress certain subtle protection barriers that I manifest in such cases. This protection is justified by the necessity of acting as freely as possible in order to fulfill my spiritual mission while still roughly respecting the ‘norms’ of modern society.”

“Nevertheless, I don’t understand what the specifics of your actions throughout the world are,” I said to Repa Sundhi. “I gathered that you spent many years in Romania as a Chinese special attaché for paranormal matters. Was that your mission?”

“There are several directions or missions that I fulfill simultaneously, but they are all somehow correlated and this means that they have a common denominator. In order to solve it all efficiently, I have to make certain contacts with people who are involved in one way or another in those situations. This requiresthat I travel to different places on the globe. Thus, saying I always stay in the same place is an improper turn of phrase. In reality, I travel to many locations in the countries where I have already established contacts. This does not happen, however, in the classical way you are thinking about. I am revealing this secret to you so you can infer that there are many other possibilities that some beings have at their disposal that are beyond the ordinary means a common human being uses to run his daily activities. I am referring to abilities which, according to the standards of present day Humankind, are of a paranormal nature and are used in order to act efficiently.*

“You can understand my ‘disappearance’ from Romania fifteen years ago. An important stage had finished and my presence there was simply not necessary anymore. As events unfolded, it was proven that my assessment was true and Cezar lived up to my expectations. Everything that happened afterwards, including the great discovery in the Bucegi Mountains, is part of a very complex plan, a multidimensional one, of which there is no need to talk to you about at this time. However, with the passing of time, you will be able to understand more and more detailed fragments of this grandiose action that involves the whole planet and in which you play your own role. The accomplishment of this great project concerning the Earth is a combined effort of several very evolved beings, some of them belonging to other planes of manifestation, as you will soon see for yourself.”

I was amazed by what I was hearing, but at the same time, I intensely felt the desire to be of use and contribute, as much as I was able, to the realization of this plan. I then wanted to find out more information about the way Repa Sundhi acted in the world.

“The majority of connections I nurture and have access to are at a governmental level,” the lama continued. “Although there are many people in this world fighting against good, there are by all means also people with a pure consciousness who wish to be of use to the nation they belong to and even the entirety of humanity. The higher their roles and responsibility in the governments of the world’s powers, the more important is their influence. An example is my connection to certain members of the Chinese government. They have facilitated many of my beneficial interventions, and at the same time, they covered certain strange events that could not be explained. These connections are then transmitted and diversified from one generation to another, but these are not my only contacts.

“An important role is played by people who possess strong magnetic powers as well as exceptional abilities provided, of course, that they are beneficially oriented. During the times to come, these people are going to be capable of polarizing many others around them, pointing in the correct direction so that others can understand the critical situation of Humankind in a way that they can and must efficiently act to deeply transform it. It is good to know that Cezar Brad, due to his discreet but well integrated interventions, managed to greatly balance the forces in Romania.

“Everything always needs to be judged from a more subtle point of view than just the physical aspects. An influence is so much stronger when it is first initiated in a subtle causal plane. Only then will it materialize in the physical plane, but the complex manner of its combined effects will be understood by just a few people. Cezar already has the ability to act in this way, but you need to fully understand that in order to have such a capability, the intention of the respective being needs to be very pure.”

As Repa Sundhi told me all of these things, my feeling was one of profound gratitude for his wisdom and the kindness he was showing me. Although I only knew him for a little while, I could notice striking similarities in my discussion with explanations I got from Cezar during the last couple of years. It was not too hard to imagine that Repa Sundhi often spoke to Cezaras as a master would to his disciple, clarifying many aspects of life and patiently directing him on the path of goodness and righteousness.

I felt wonderful and any previous feeling of anguish or irritation disappeared like magic. I was willing to find out as many things as possible in regards to how I could complete my knowledge and refine my ways of acting. The lama then gave me an explanation that in the beginning seemed surprising.

“One of the very important aspects you need to be aware of regarding knowledge is that all that beings live and feel during their lives becomes experience for the other beings in the universe. The essential element is that it happens independently from space and time. When you achieve the ability to tune into this field of existence that transcends space and time, you practically have access to all ‘recordings’ and that includes all that has ever happened and will ever happen.”

“Amazing!” I said delighted. “Just tonight, Elinor spoke to me about the subtle ‘recordings’ of manifestation but in connection with previous lives. It’s true he didn’t tell me too many details, but I gather he was referring to the same aspect you are talking to me about now.”

At that moment, Elinor felt it necessary to intervene in order to further clarify things.

“I told him that the power to see previous lives, his or of any other being, is based upon the access by consciousness to a supra temporal plane of existence where accurate recordings exist of any type of action that has ever happened in the phenomenal world,” Elinor said, addressing Repa Sundhi. “It is like a ‘recording tape’ of the Universe.”

“Perfectly true,” the lama assented seriously. “The access to these precise traces left by any being during its passage through manifestation can help you, in a way, benefit from what we could call ‘the experience of the Universe.’ It is very important that this is very well understood. After all, any being within Creation is faced with two opposing fundamental existential states: the state of ignorance and the state of knowledge.

“When I refer to ignorance, I mean that the respective being does not know almost any of the essential laws of the universe it lives in. That’s why ignorance makes man live only partially, fragmented and isolated in a very limited realm of existence. Metaphorically speaking, he is living in a very small cage without even being aware of it.

“On the other hand, knowledge is power. And I’m not talking here about a theoretical scientific knowledge or what is generally labelled as worldly knowledge but rather what makes up universal knowledge. This is infinitely richer and more nuanced than the first, and at the same time, it is the only one that gives access to the higher dimensions of spirit.”

“Yes, but even if they are ignorant, people often live a life that seems good and even happy or abundant,” I said. “Well, at least what they consider to be happiness and fulfillment.”

“That is true,” responded the lama. “They live but in ignorance, and this is exactly why they suffer. Suffering and ignorance complete and fuel one another. However, there is a hidden meaning even in this as only when suffering and troubles reach an unbearable threshold, which sometimes happens after tens or hundreds of successive lives, does a man realize that he can no longer continue that way. That is an essential moment in his evolution starting from which he begins to be more and more aware of his integration within the universe. Of course, there might still be numerous falls and comebacks of his on this path, but it is important that he already has planted in his consciousness and his inner perception the necessity to change something fundamental within himself, and this thought will always act as an impulse to propel him higher and higher.”

Listening to what Repa Sundhi was saying, I was musing that ignorance is like night time for a man’s understanding, like a thick fog that darkens his thinking.

“As far as I can tell, the condition of the ignorant one is not too far from that of an unknowing animal,” I voiced my inner reflections.

“Even if it might seem exaggerated, know that it reflects the reality,” the lama said. “In principle, it all starts from the fundamental difference between man and animal which is self-consciousness. The issue is simple. While a man knows he exists, meaning that he is self aware and can act in a determined way, the animal acts only by instinct, without knowing it exists. The life of an animal is reduced to a few spontaneous inner impulses and a very limited range of emotions. Nevertheless, among animals, as well as among people, there are noticeable differences that endow some of them, when reaching a certain evolutionary stage, with a rudimentary consciousness that further aids their leap towards the status of a human being with self awareness. It is obvious, for example, that between a mole and a dolphin there are great differences in regards to the possibilities of understanding and having communication with a being having superior conscious structures, like a man.”

“You mean that the same evolutionary process from a form of inferior consciousness to one of superior consciousness remains valid anywhere else in the physical universe?” I intervened.

“Of course. Besides, you already know how diverse life is within our galaxy. In comparison with our galaxy, however, which is almost nothing, you would be much more surprised to discover an almost unimaginable grandeur in the diversity of life throughout the rest of the universe. A form will always adapt to the specific life conditions existent in the respective corner of the universe whether or not these correspond to the conditions of a human's life. Hence, intelligent forms in the universe are very different and only an immense ego and never ending stupidity can make people think they are alone in a truly gigantic universe whose real dimensions cannot be conceived or logically understood by the mind's assessment system.

"On the other hand, this physical universe is much smaller than the astral and mental universes which in turn are much smaller than the causal universe. Each of these has a practically infinite number of developmental possibilities regarding form and energy that is materialized into a specific type of matter and substance. For example, astral 'matter' is much more subtle than so called touchable physical matter which humans are used to. In turn, 'the substance' specific to the mental plane is more subtle than the astral 'substance' of emotions and the causal 'matter' is much more refined than the mental one.

"We are thus talking about a minimal intuition that man needs and a common sense issue for him to be able to realize that this colossal unfolding of forces and energies within the Creation is not just for his sake even if he thinks himself to be the only inhabitant of the infinite space surrounding him. What is common to all planes of existence, be it physical or subtle, is that they are structured with strict hierarchies depending upon one's degree of evolution and spiritual development. And, as the degree of evolution throughout the chain of transformations is directly proportional to the degree of knowledge, we reach the same problem we started with: namely, that the one who knows has power and this power gives him access to higher and higher dimensions of creation. Of course, I believe you already inferred that the power I'm referring to is not physical strength, financial power, or political power. All these are partial and very limited forms of the power the wise one achieves."

"So, everything is practically reduced to the evolution of consciousness," I concluded. "During this process, ignorance is gradually overcome by knowledge and this is how you explain why some people can do more and better than others."

“The degree of development of one’s consciousness attracts the development of the form, or in other worlds, of the material ‘carcass’ that allows the further evolution of that individual consciousness,” Repa Sundhi explained. “The mineral, vegetable, animal worlds and finally the human one derive from one another in this order. But, it would take too long and involve numerous explanations to right now get into details of the way this passing is realized and its specific conditions as well as the particularities of every world. That’s why I will limit myself to explaining just some aspects about man and animals as in their case the consciousness begins to take on more evolved forms. I was telling you that although there is a fundamental difference between the two worlds, men often behave like animals and can even reach a lower stage than that.”

Being of the same opinion myself, I could not help but notice that the astounding fall of Humankind is probably due to an acute form of ignorance.

“Nonetheless, how is it that man, who already possesses the spark of self-consciousness and knows he is an individual amongst others, manages to fall to a much inferior level?” I asked. “What kind of ignorance is that?”

Repa Sundhi seemed pleased that we had reached this point in our discussion.

“This truly is a more special issue,” he answered. “It is so because with the feeling of individuality that gives him a purpose in life, man at the same time also has by default the individual free will to act and his actions can, of course, be good or bad. Unlike him, an animal does not act out of free will. If there are moments when it seems like it does, these are just incipient aspects of individual will. All actions made by an animal are determined by instinct and habit, including his attitudes of attachment or devotion. Of course, with the passing of time, these ensure the animal’s evolution towards the status of human being, but it must be pointed out that it doesn’t have a will of its own because it doesn’t have a consciousness of its own and doesn’t know it exists as an individual. An animal can recognize many beings and objects around him and can even make certain simple connections or manifest emotions, but all these nonetheless come only out of instinct and habit. That is why we can’t talk of an individual consciousness within members of the animal kingdom. Unlike man, animals have a group consciousness out of which periodically, and as a result of a cumuli of experience, one of the members of that species makes a leap to a superior evolutionary level. This superior level can even mean a more evolved species of animals or the status of a human being. In such cases, that member of the animal species is a ‘fragment’ of the group consciousness; or better said, a quintessence of the evolutionary and experience level of that species at that precise time. Therefore, he is promoted in a superior stage of becoming. Gradually, it acquires the clearer and clearer awareness of its individuality until it reaches the stage of human being.

“Here, although the leap of consciousness to human status is huge compared to the previous existential conditions, the responsibility for the actions and doings committed belong solely to the individual. As I told you, the animal acts out of instinct and even if his actions are sometimes ferocious, they are either done in self-defense or in order to feed. These are not considered individual actions as an animal doesn’t have the awareness of the nature of his acts; its actions being integrated at the level of the group consciousness of the species it belongs to. In such a manner does the consciousness of the respective species gain experience.

“In the case of the human, it is completely different as all that he acts, speaks and thinks is according to his own will, assuming that he is physically, mentally and psychically healthy. This free will is what gives him the possibility to consciously choose one option or the other and can determine whether he will go either on the path of evolution and good or on the one of perdition and suffering.

“Being human does not spare him the oppression of ignorance. If he chooses to do bad deeds, be violent, tough, stony, despotic or even kill, all these will ‘count’ in his own destiny or karma and he will have to pay like for like in future lives. All the vices of humanity, starting with pettiness, hypocrisy, lies and progressing to destructive vanity, acerbic greed, chaining attachment, and poisonous jealousy are actions that darken a man’s soul like cinder and black smoke.

“Unlike him, an animal will act strictly by virtue of preservation, feeding and reproductive instinct. It is not capable of the unbelievable misery that some people are capable of inflicting nor their abominable actions or distasteful subterfuges used to serve their selfish purposes. This is why I was telling you that, unfortunately, man will sometimes fall lower than an animal because even though he is capable of noticing, judging and understanding the evil nature of these actions, he still commits them. This is actually the essence of sin and mistake. Man will always end up where the thread of past actions takes him, no matter if he is aware of it or not.”

“How is it possible for humanity to be in such ruin though?” I asked, slightly confused. “Is ignorance so dramatic?”

“If you correctly understand the way these aspects are connected in the universe, all will be very clear. Ignorance determines erroneous actions and these, in turn, determine a cumulus of negative karma; namely, a hard destiny. In turn, this enchains the respective human being with limitations imposed by the mistakes he’s committed and the process continues like an apparent vicious circle.

“Coming out of such a lamentable condition can only be done gradually and with a constant and intense effort from the part of the respective being in an effort to transform and orient the nature of his actions towards virtuosity. He can sometimes feel so desperate and hopeless when facing life’s problems and hardships that he can be tempted to take his own life thinking that maybe this way he’ll escape from it all. This is a huge mistake and constitutes a severe blockage on the evolutionary path.”

I then remembered Elinor’s remarks pertaining to this subject. Repa Sundhi completed what I already knew.

“Those who resort to such a reckless act are usually psychically and mentally unstable people or those who manifest demonic influences in their personality. These aspects may not be noticed by the people around the suicidal person and can even seem unreasonable compared to his life up to that time. People’s stupidity and ignorance, however, cannot be substituted for truth.”

I was amazed that the lama seemed to know very well what I had talked about with Elinor before his arrival. Nonetheless, I noticed that he was discretely pointing only to those aspects of the conversation he considered important and that he wanted me to deepen my understanding of. His power of telepathic knowledge was formidable.

“Generally speaking, man lives an almost continuous drama of manifestations,” he continued to speak.

“Without even suspecting the fact that there is a profound meaning of life in the universe and that there are certain fundamental and immutable laws that act in a perfect balance, the ignorant usually take the bad as good and the other way around. Left to his own devices, they are like a leaf carried by the wind or like a carriage without a driver to rein the scared horses. Often acting blindly, without thinking at all and under the impulse of his destiny, the ignorant man attracts many energies in his aura that will make him live his life in a larvae-like inferior state.

“Between this deplorable state and the one in which the human being is superior, there is a colossal difference which, paradoxically, is very rarely recognized by ordinary men. This is explained by the fact that the one who lives in a limited area of perception and knowledge does not have the capacity to easily understand what is superior to him as he has no comparison. Furthermore, he notices that many of his life principles are malefic and opposed to the universal harmony; and, together with his petty prejudices, are the complete opposite of the behavior and vision over life of a wise person. Confused, the ignorant then feels that, in order to transform, he needs to completely change his entire life vision which undoubtedly involves great effort, at least in the beginning. Often, he is not willing to undertake this effort. Moreover, he comes to consider that the principles and the profoundly spiritual way of life of the wise one are, in fact, mistaken and need to be stigmatised by society. The ignorant one, who then becomes malevolent, is supported in his intercession by the acceptance and opinion of the majority who are also blind. In fact, this kind of action expresses, in a subtle plane of existence, the raging fear of people. This applies in particular to the rich ones or those of the ruling elite who are afraid of losing their privileges, their influence and political power, and even their wealth. This way of action was and is aimed especially at great spiritual reformers of Humankind and at those who share with others their innovative ideas about the freedom of the spirit, purity of life, honor and divine love. Being considered social threats, they are rapidly oppressed and the public opinion is directed and manipulated by means of false information so that it becomes a common front against the accused.

“As you already know, truth always wins; but this doesn’t mean there’s no suffering. Suffering appears every time there is a breach of the cosmic laws of harmony and balance, be it by actions done in the present time or by the agency of destiny reflecting the bad acts of the past and previous lives. You must know, however, that even suffering has a special meaning within the Creation. Its main ‘purpose’ is not to punish but to correct man’s wrong attitudes regarding the life he is living. As much as he can see his mistake and learn from it, without repeating it later, the suffering disappears. If the man persists in his error and does not understand the hidden causes of his suffering, this will then amplify more and more and make his life a real nightmare.”

I was touched and felt cold shivers along my spine. Repa Sundhi’s explanation had stirred within me the exaltation of desire of not doing wrong but also the worry for the bad deeds I had done in other lives. I confessed my thoughts to him, but he laughed kindly, reassuring me.

“Lamentations for mistakes made in previous lives or the present one are pointless unless they allow you to lucidly observe their maleficent nature. To be honest, the term sufferance is only relative as the man receives only what he gave a long time ago.”

“I also spoke with Elinor about this aspect,” I said. “I was wondering though if things are really that rigorous.”

Repa Sundhi was very firm in his answer.

“The law of karma acts inexorably and it is extremely precise. Nevertheless, divine grace often acts in a way so as to make man’s many troubles and suffering throughout his life easier to cope with; especially when he sincerely regrets in his heart the mistakes he’s done and understands that is not the way he needs to act. If it were not for this divine support, which is often called Providence, it is probable that the human being would be wiped out by the burden of sufferance he needs to endure as a result of his bad deeds. But, as you also know, God does not want the destruction of the sinner, but his rehabilitation.

“This is exactly why I am telling you that the only way to return to and manifest a divinely integrated existence is by way of spiritual knowledge, supreme amongst the other kinds of knowledge. When a being knows on this level, he has at his disposal a way to tune in with all that is superior in the universe. Then, knowing its fundamental structures and laws, he can choose. Namely, he can use his free will in a positive direction. Unfortunately, as you very well know, there are many beings that choose the negative path and that is truly sad for their future karma. The one who is beneficially oriented can engage his own will more and more in order to attract elevated vibrations in his aura which will give him essential support in all the actions he carries on.”

Repa Sundhi stopped his explanations to ask me if I was tired. I told him that I rarely felt as good as I did then and thanked him for his care and attention. Although I aimed to deepen my spiritual knowledge during the last year, after Cezar left for the Great Expedition, I often felt the absence of a competent guide to explain the subtleties of some difficult aspects that I could not understand. My sporadic meditations did not always manage to pinpoint the hidden characteristics of some esoteric notions or concepts. This sometimes made me feel alone and helpless. Cezar had been so busy that I was only able to meet with him twice. That was when he shared some of the astounding mysteries of that event. So, I was extremely happy to find out as much information as possible regarding some subjects I had not managed to study thoroughly until that night.

On the other hand, I was intrigued by the real purpose of this meeting. What was the actual reason why Repa Sundhi wanted to speak to me?

“Yes, I think the time has also come to discuss this aspect,” he answered. “It is already very late and there are still many things to do before we go.”

“I do not know anything about any departure,” I said cautiously, raising my eyebrows in surprise. “It is very important that you trust us and what I am telling you now,” he responded. “It is not necessary to ask too many questions now. You will later be helped to understand everything from a perspective you are still far from even inferring.

“We will have to make a short journey, and we will leave three days from now. Elinor will take care of everything that is needed. In the meantime, I will have some things to sort out so I am not going to see you until then. I insistently ask though that during these days you do not talk to anyone about what you are going to do or the fact that you met me. Besides, it is very unlikely anyone would believe you.”

I felt completely taken by surprise. I did not know where I was going, what I needed to take with me, or what would be the duration of our travel; but especially, I did not know the reason why I was invited on this trip.

“There are plenty of unknown points,” I said. “Of course, it is not an issue for me to arrange my business in the time we have left, but at least tell me how long we will be gone for.”

“One day,” the Tibetan answered tersely. “Well, at least in the human system of temporal evaluation. Don’t worry. You don’t need to pack anything. Think that you are going for a walk in the park although I can assure you that the stakes are much higher,” he added in a joking manner.

“I don’t understand why you are not telling me where we’re going,” I insisted. “I think it’s only natural to tell me at least that, don’t you think? I like mystery. I am attracted by unknown situations, but in this case, I think I should know some elements as well.”

“There are mysteries and mysteries,” the lama answered. “Some aspects must be revealed at the right time. Otherwise, there is a possibility that the entire action could be endangered. This can be due to a lack of self control with regard to emotions and thought that can cause one to act chaotically. Although you know many initiatory aspects and have been faced with very shocking realities for a normal human, I feel that you are still not ready to know beforehand what is going to happen in a couple of days. This is exactly why I asked you to trust us completely. Your experience will be very intense. It is one thing to read in books or hear something but completely something else to be personally faced with that reality. Be at peace. We will also be with you. There’s nothing to be afraid of.”

Peace and calm were the last things on my mind after hearing Repa Sundhi’s pep talk.

“I think that uncertainty will generate more thoughts than knowing what to expect,” I said timidly.

“I could, of course, reveal to you the reason for this travel; but this case is very special and must be treated very carefully. There are several reasons why it is better to proceed this way. First of all, I suggested this way of action as the most appropriate one as there are also perturbing forces that will find out the purpose of our departure and will want to hinder it by any means. I need to sort these things out and protect the mission. Besides, this is why I am accompanied by the yidam who is an important stabilizing agent in such dangerous circumstances.”

“But, you said that the yidam is not your creation! How did he then end up in your company?” I asked.

“If I would give you a detailed answer to this question, I would have to reveal the reason of the trip we are taking. So, I will only give you a general view in order to appease your mental agitation a little bit. We will go to a certain area in the Apuseni Mountains where you will meet someone. This event, however, will happen under very special circumstances. You will see and understand everything at the right time. This yidam has great experience in regards to the terrestrial plane and was asked to accompany me in this mission. Know that it is not the first time he has helped me in what I have to do on Earth,” Repa Sundhi added, looking up at the yidam who remained motionless, staring with his eyes wide open at an imaginary point somewhere far away.

“If you are taking such precautionary measures, it means that there could be some real problems,” I reflected out loud.

“Yes, I already told you that,” he replied. “The meeting you will have is truly special and involves some space-time modifications that can become breaches for some adverse forces. If there is no solid protection, these can perturb the phenomena and hinder its development. I am telling you again, however, that you shouldn’t be afraid as you’ll be protected.”

I was wondering how much Repa Sundhi’s words were managing to calm me. My body was shaking imperceptibly as a result of a profound emotion but also from impatience to find out what was actually going on behind this mystery. Who was I going to meet? Why were all of these intermediary stages necessary? What strange phenomena was going to happen and who was going to create it? Instead of all these, I asked Repa Sundhi a completely different question.

“I am honestly telling you that I don’t understand why I in particular have to face all these challenges! I am only at the beginning of a spiritual path and my knowledge still has so many missing pieces. It’s true that I was a witness to some extraordinary events; but from what you are telling me and I infer is coming in the future, I’m not sure I’m the right person.”

The lama answered in a very serious voice.

“Your observation is egotistic and proves a hidden vanity of which you probably are not even aware right now. Why is it of interest that you don’t know too much of what is going to happen? If I were to tell you right now, ‘You are right. Maybe I didn’t correctly assess the situation and I now realize that in fact you can’t cope with it as you are not ready yet!’ Do you think you’ll be joyful? Do you think you will instantly accept it and go home, happy that you were relieved of a burden? I can assure you that this wouldn’t be your inner reaction. You would end up feeling frustrated and regret that you even considered this proposition. You see, that’s why it is very good to always say what you actually feel in the depths of your heart as only that has meaning, only that truly has power and impact over others. Leave the verbal and behavioral artifices to the ones who don’t know all these things. In time, they will too awaken to a more profound reality and will then teach others how to act correctly.

“Rest assured that if you were called to realize this action, it is not at all by chance. There are, of course, some hidden reasons related to your being that you obviously don’t know; but they justify all that’s been geared up to facilitate the present situation. So, be sincerely humble and not just for show as this way you will become pure and untouchable to negative influences.”

After this “cold shower” that I honestly did not expect, I have decided to pay more attention to what I feel, think and speak. Carefully analyzing myself, I noticed that the lama was perfectly right. Although I had been sincere with my words, I however had more profound intentions that did not totally correspond to what I said.

I realize that the true battle to reach perfection happens inside at the core and in the depths of the mind and soul. Even the apparently insignificant malignant aspects and tendencies, that for some are part of their normal daily attitude, must be identified and eliminated. No stain is admitted if you truly want to be perfect.

“Nonetheless, these are simple situations that – if there’s interest and willingness – can be solved very quickly,” the lama continued to explain. “The true problems appear when a man gets into major negative habits. Unpleasant experiences in life fuel negative and inferior feelings in many people with emotions like hate, malice, anger or revenge. For the ignorant one, the persistence of such states automatically attracts them towards the inferior worlds or planes of the universe. These negative feelings and emotions are like seeds that a man sows in his soul which, of course, will bear fruits to match. You know very well that if you sow wind you reap whirlwind. Or, so that you understand better, you can’t sow a field with weed seeds and expect a plentiful wheat harvest. It’s impossible for people to sow hate, quarrel, malice and then reap something good and harmonious. Let’s say you just washed your shirt which is now immaculately white and then went for a walk in town. You notice, however, that there is an ink stain remaining that is in contrast with the impeccable white of the material. Can you say that you are satisfied and have reached perfection in cleaning that shirt? Do you think that others won’t notice the black stain? On the contrary, it will stand out more on the immaculate white background of the shirt and unpleasantly affect them.

“The more a person evolves and comes closer to perfection, the more careful and responsible he must be, even of the most insignificant actions. At that point, any inappropriate remark, inadequate act or negative feature of his character will be immediately noticed by those around him because they will stand out from the good and relatively balanced background of that person. If that remark, deed, feature or character trait would have been of a normal human, no one would pay much attention as it would have been part of a common and at the same time inferior characteristic of that man. It wouldn’t have stood out at all. In the case of a wise man or a saint, however, a mistake – no matter how small – will soon reach monstrous proportions in the eyes of ordinary people. That is why I was telling you that spiritual evolution brings with it the need to be responsible in order to eliminate all the stains of gross inferior feelings and manifestations that are common to most people. Perfection is hard to reach; but once reached, the realization is total and the reward never-ending.”

Repa Sundhi stopped and looked at his watch.

“It is very late,” he said. “I think it’s time to part as there are still some things to sort out before departure.”

Elinor then suggested I stay overnight at his villa, but after a quick thought, I declined politely. I wanted to analyze in peace and quiet all of the aspects of this memorable day that had marked me so deeply. In addition to that, I felt the need to walk to my house. I had two days to reflect on what had happened and to arrange for my absence. It was established that on the third day, very early in the morning, we were going towards the goal of our journey of which I had only a vague idea. Out of the few clues I got from Repa Sundhi, I had understood two essential aspects: that unusual phenomena were going to occur that could be accompanied by manifestations against us; and that no matter what I believed of this action and its impact on me, the best solution was to totally accept it.

I really hoped to be worthy of Repa Sundhi’s expectation. Between you and me, what I lived during that expedition shook me so profoundly that there have been moments when my senses just stopped working and I did not know if I was still alive or dead. I was, however, helped to safely overcome the intense emotions I felt then and thus obtain a much ampler vision over the manifested reality, both physical and subtle.

I got out of the armchair to say goodbye to Repa Sundhi and bowed in front of the yidam who looked at me kindly. But while Elinor was showing us out in the hallway, I noticed how the yidam’s giant body became more and more transparent until it disappeared completely in just a few seconds. The lama then explained that the yidam had to complete a certain task that requires his presence somewhere else. After we set a few more details of the meeting that was to happen in three days time, we all said goodbye; but I stayed a little longer with Elinor who had asked me to wait for him. He soon came back and gave me a pocket watch that looked well-worn.

“It belonged to my ancestor and is almost three hundred years old. The inset is an etching of his face. It’s exactly as he looked when I met him in Brussels.”

I looked at the engraved image of a very distinguished young man with long hair and a bow tie. The very old and worn watch was a testament of long gone times and touching it made me feel the subtle shiver of mystery surrounding the person in the engraving. My entire being was then overwhelmed by the nostalgia of the long gone times and places which that man had witnessed.

I thanked Elinor for his gesture and said goodbye. I then went out to the long deserted street at the same time as raindrops began to fall. Although I was expecting to still see Repa Sundhi’s silhouette, I noticed he had vanished. Refusing to analyze this new enigma, I strolled on my way towards the magical future that awaited me.

Chapter 3 — Machandi

Contrary to my expectations, I was quite calm and focused on preparing for my departure during the following two days. Although I intensely remembered many of the puzzling elements of my meeting with Elinor and Repa Sundhi, I was not at all agitated but simply trying to analyze in depth what had been revealed to me.

Just as it had been established, I phoned Elinor the evening before we left to find out if the plans for our journey were still valid. After receiving his confirmation, I spent the few remaining hours prior to our meeting trying to sleep. I soon discovered this to be quite a difficult task. As soon as I closed my eyes, my mind was invaded by the image of an aesthetic mountain landscape where the cliffs and valleys were covered in ice and snow. Two peaks towered over the horizon, basking in the red-orange sunset. The overview was desolate and a cold wind blew strongly, ruffling the few lichens growing in a dried up riverbank.

I tossed and turned in my bed without understanding the significance or message of that vision. Every time I closed my eyes and tried to fall asleep, it came back to me very clearly and with an amazing realism. Plus, when I was seeing the landscape, I perceived it with all of my senses so that I actually became very cold and used several blankets to cover myself. Eventually, after remaining on the border between wakefulness and sleep for a long time, I fell asleep but without dreaming. My absorption into the sleep state was so deep that when the alarm went off it took me a few good seconds to realize what was actually happening. The sound of the alarm was reaching me as if from very far away, gradually getting closer and closer. I finally awoke and noticed with amazement and great joy that I also felt excellent and very well rested. In high spirits, I took a cab to Elinor's villa; but as a precautionary measure, I gave the driver an address a few streets away.

When I arrived, Elinor and Repa Sundhi were already there waiting for me. I thought I was late, but they reassured me and told me everything was ready for our journey.

“Isn’t the yidam accompanying us?” I asked in surprise, noticing that the deity was not in the house.

“Yes, but he will join us at some point on our way,” the lama answered without any other details.

We got into Elinor’s car, a very luxurious jeep that was parked in front of the house. In order to be able to talk easily during the journey, the lama proposed I stay with him in the back seats and I gladly accepted.

It was almost five in the morning when we left. The clear starry sky was forecasting a beautiful day. Besides that, the beginning of this particular November was proving to be very warm with only rare and short rains. I observed that if we needed to do any mountaineering that we would probably have very good weather for it. In response, Repa Sundhi explained that our efforts were not going to be great and that the weather would not be of much importance. His answer confused me a bit, but I did not ask for clarifications.

As Elinor drove fast, it took us only two hours to reach the foothills of the Southern Carpathians that we had to cross. I was enchanted as I admired the wonderful landscape that basked in the superb light of the sunrise. I noticed that to our right, not far away from the area we were passing through, was the secret location in the Bucegi Mountains that I had visited more than a year before.

“That very special place will play an important role in the near future of Romania,” the lama said unexpectedly. “The discovery was not at all by chance and the expedition led by Cezar was a first sign of the coming changes, not only regarding Romania but the entire planet. The causes that will lead to these transformations are so complex that they can’t be comprehended or understood by a normal human mind. That is why the few who are acting to pave the way, so to speak, are often supported by angelic entities belonging to different hierarchical categories of manifestation. In the oriental tradition, these are called deities. It is good to know that they are organized in a pyramidal hierarchy that pretty much follows the same principles and structure as a company or industrial enterprise in modern society.”

“Cezar spoke only vaguely about the help some angelic entities unconditionally offer to humanity,” I said. “I never understood though how this help is manifested or how it can be perceived here in the physical plane.”

“Subtle purification is an important aspect of what these beings belonging to superior astral worlds are doing at the level of one country or even at the level of the entire planet,” the lama said. “I hope that you are at least partly familiarized with this. In essence, it refers to some subtle realities that modern science rejects or at least ignores.

“Just as the human being has a bioenergetic aura so does the Earth. Due to the subtle bioenergetic field emanated by its biosphere, it has an ‘aura’ of its own. Of course, unlike the aura of a human, the aura of the planet is gigantic. The characteristics of the two auras, however, are just the same as the energetic processes happening within them are identical in principle. For example, a man’s aura can gradually become impure due to his unhealthy diet and the impure and gross environment he lives in, but it is at its most acute and profound following the actions a man does, especially mental acts or thoughts. In regards to the Earth’s aura, its condition depends on the nature of the physical, mental and verbal actions of the beings living on the planet’s surface.”

For me, it was starting to be easy to conceive and assimilate this information, but I was not too sure it could be “stomached” by regular people.

“Unfortunately, these things are exactly as you said for such people,” Repa Sundhi admitted. “A man that is not aware of or even informed of his own subtle aura cannot believe that the planet he’s living on is itself a ‘being’ with a gigantic aura. For an experienced clairvoyant, however, this is only too obvious. They have free and unlimited access to the astral plane and can, in certain circumstances, perceive the actual aura of the planet which is very ‘charged.’”

“I know that the aura of a being can give much information about their physical and psychic state, but is this also valid in regards to the destiny of that respective being?” I asked. “I mean, does our aura contain information about our karma?”

“The energetic structure of the aura is very complex,” he responded, “but an essential part of it is that within it is encoded practically any information about that man that is more or less hidden in specific ways. Hence, the correct ‘reading’ of the aura can foresee the nature of a future disease, its seriousness, or even the death of that respective being if certain particular signs are seen. Usually, these ‘symptoms’ are the result of some karmic mistakes made in previous lives that were transmitted into the present life and have even been unconsciously accentuated by that person. Such karmic influences of a subtle energetic nature appear in the aura as dark vortexes and are almost black in very serious cases. From the exterior to the interior, they look like a deep ‘funnel’ towards the body outline. In a way, they can be likened in form and structure with a boil. Their presence in the aura is most often a sign of destiny for that person’s life.

“It’s very similar for the Earth’s aura. The most harmful elements that contributed to it becoming impure are men’s vices and misdeeds to which you can add wrongly orientated technology. The situation is becoming acute because of the great number of human beings living on the surface of the planet who act wrongly and tip the balance to the negative side.”

After a short break, during which I intensely analyzed the information I had just heard, the lama felt the need to give me further explanations.

“The aura is, in fact, a subtle energetic cumulus and depends upon the predominant nature of the energies that comprise it. Things here are relatively simple: if you act only beneficially then you accumulate positive energies of a beneficial nature in your aura. Such an aura is bright, alive, active and radiant. But for those who fall prey to vices and persevere in perverse and negative thinking, their aura is gradually becoming more and more impure with maleficent energies. These make it dull, tarnished, and dominated by dark colors like muddy green, brown, dark red and even areas of dark grey and black.

“These particularities of the aura are intimately correlated with destiny’s traits. The interaction between human beings or between them and the things or phenomena surrounding them is firstly an energetic interaction at the subtle level of the aura. This is by virtue of the known principle that ‘birds of a feather flock together,’ and this principle is valid everywhere throughout the Creation. That is why a human being that is evil and even satanic in his behavior will never be capable of doing good deeds. For the same reason, you will almost never see a gang of villains going to church and enjoying the company of priests and saints in order to repent and transform their lives. Those unfortunate beings will continue to act by virtue of the predominantly negative energetic vibrations that they have in their aura and will associate with people of the same nature, outdoing one another in new misdoings. As I have already told you, they thus sow the seeds of a bitter destiny that they will have to live with the same intensity of loss and suffering that they caused others.”

“I’ve met people who mockingly say that they will have enough time afterwards to ‘pay’ for the mistakes done at the present,” I said. “Personally, I think this is a very detrimental vision of reality.”

“It is true that in their unawareness and ignorance, many people let themselves be tempted by their mind’s voice and not their heart’s,” responded the lama. “For example, some are tempted to take advantage of life’s ‘pleasures’ as much as possible; and in a selfish way, not make allowance for the bad seeds they then sow. These people think they are going to have enough time later in life to ‘consume’ these negative effects or, in other words, pay them off. I have to tell you though that this is the sign of great stupidity. It is similar to saying that you want to enter the despicable mud found in a pond just so you can then get out and wash it off. Of course, this is possible but it will involve more effort and you will need more time to clean the ‘mud’ you’re covered in. What then is the use of such action? The merits you accumulated with difficulty at some point in your life will be quickly annihilated by bad actions that bring a so-called satisfaction that is only partial and ephemeral.”

I was starting to realize that such a sombre perspective was similar to the toil of Sisyphus, and the only explanation I could find in such cases was the weakness of people when facing the ephemeral temptations of the material world. I understood that negative emotions generate quite rapidly in the human being as inferior and gross preoccupations which include the avid tendency to gain, opulent luxury, fame and the fight for power. All of these have a tendency to generate feelings of greed, insensitivity, meanness, envy, selfishness, fury or revenge. I then asked Repa Sundhi to what extent all of these negative emotions affect the human aura.

“These emotions are, in fact, subtle energies with a gross frequency of vibration. If they are not quickly removed or given up fast in order to be replaced with their exact opposite, they will set in at the level of the aura and various corresponding body organs which will cause psychic disturbances, serious diseases and illnesses. In a similar way, this process happens in the Earth’s aura which is deeply influenced by the aura of the human beings that live on it.

“Unfortunately, the present situation of the planet’s aura is quite critical. As it stands now, it can be likened to the aura of a gravely sick person. In such a situation, it is natural to follow a purification ‘treatment’ in order to cure the disease. Just as in a human being, the planet will be ‘convulsing’ or undergo other similar phenomena that people living on its surface will perceive as apocalyptic events. There’s nothing supernatural about this. It is just a counter-balancing effect of the negative ‘charge.’ In other words, the planet’s negative karma has reached a critical point and is thus influencing the destiny of Humankind.”

“I have also spoken with Elinor about some aspects that are related to destiny, and I think I understand its formative mechanism,” I then told Repa Sundhi.

“Yes,” he said. “In principle, the process is quite simple. Every human being is characterized by a specific energy that determines a certain general mental and soul state. This general state will then create channels through which some dominant mental tendencies will manifest in correlation with the feelings and energy of that human. Then, the dominating tendencies will generate an entire series of other habits and tendencies that structure most of that person’s future destiny.

“This is how you explain why some people with a gross energy manifest gross feelings and ideas. They are not satisfied with their opinions and start judging others after their own meanness, scepticism and perversity. All these happen because they cannot conceive that others could be different from themselves. In such circumstances, the evolutionary path of such beings will be long and difficult as they have not yet awakened the beneficial force of their subtle structure, and this is exactly why they do not have what it takes to support a balanced and harmonious life.

“You can thus understand why certain spiritual leaps do not happen overnight. In the case of beings who are only starting to awaken spiritually, the energetic cumuli one has is not great enough. That is to say, it is not predominant. In such circumstances, the feelings and states that being is faced with will be mixed, meaning some will be good but most of it will be bad. Due to several factors, both internal and external, this will generate a continuous fluctuation of the being between opposite poles. For example, if maleficent accumulations are present in the nature of that being when he comes into contact with a maleficent ambiance, he will be affected and will relive states that he abhors. A being who has accumulated beneficial energy par excellence will not have any maleficent reaction if in the same negative ambiance. The one who has even a little maleficent cumulus in his aura will feel, in a reduced way, that environment. In other words, he will still notice that the respective ambiance is bad. By the opposite, a totally beneficial being, even when coming into contact with that inferior environment, will not perceive it as such. He will, of course, be aware of its nature due to the reactions of those who are found there. Nevertheless, he will remain completely unaffected because there are no connections in his aura to those negative energetic manifestations. This is a very important aspect and this is why I want you to understand it well,” Repa Sundhi added in an emphatic voice.

After thinking for a little while, I said, “I very well realize that it is essential to accumulate as many beneficial and elevated energies as possible in my aura in order to generate a state of balance and harmony in my structure.”

“More than that, the accumulations that a being gets in his aura will be the ones triggering all the leaps to come in that being’s spiritual evolution,” Repa Sundhi completed. “You must know that by continuing to accumulate, the chance of evolutionary leaps can always appear. It’s good that you understand the necessity to accumulate exclusively positive energies at the level of the aura. Afterwards, as I told you before, these accumulations will add up and generate the premise for an evolutionary leap towards an accelerated evolution.

“The same is valid for spiritual regress or involution. But we are not talking anymore about a leap in this case. A leap is a synonym with going forwards, but a fall represents a downfall of the being into the abyss of evil. For as long as there's still evil in man, he will be vulnerable as what is already in the being will always attract something similar."

"But how will we then ever manage to accumulate merits and beneficial energies?" I asked, confused.

"There are enough possibilities to use one's individual will so as to annihilate the negative accumulations. For example, one way is to act the opposite to the maleficent tendency that is then felt within. If he is about to be overcome by a state of anger and fury then he will have to control himself and patiently induce a state of calm and love for the other being upon whom he wanted to project the malefic energies. All of these involve effort, but you must know that you can't succeed without effort."

"I feel confident and willing to make this effort!" I said, suddenly overcome by a very good mood. "Excellent! This means that you are optimistic and belong to those who already have a beneficial predominance in their aura. The pessimists are the ones with malefic, negative, and destructive predominance in the structure of their aura."

Glad that I understood these fundamental aspects of existence and evolution in manifestation, I then expressed my gratitude towards Repa Sundhi for the patience and kindness he demonstrated when explaining these essential truths to me that now seemed very simple.

"It is true that these things now look simple and obvious, but do not forget that you can't reach it unless you 'nourish' yourself with essences."

"I've assented," I said, shaking my head.

I was impressed by the special force of the lama's words and his profound knowledge. What he said brightened my understanding and seemed to forever pierce my consciousness. I then asked him about the ways the deities of the subtle planes of Creation help humanity and the entire planet to cross this critical stage of their existence.

"Even in this case, it is still a matter of humanity's choice," answered Repa Sundhi. The angelic entities, deities and all those helping the "spiritualization" of the planet act due to their own beliefs and altruistic impulses, but their help could be much more substantial if men would invoke it and ask for it in a sentient way. This would be a big step forward as it would mean that they are awakening out of their ‘numbness’ and realizing the decadence that humanity is in. Their prayers and good thoughts would immensely contribute to the purification of the Earth’s subtle aura. On the other hand, some subtle entities in the elevated planes of Creation impel certain human beings through teachings or revelations made in the dream state. These manifestations are so alive and powerful that they sometimes are ingrained in the consciousness of the one “living” it in the dream state even better than the events he’s going through during the time he spends awake in the physical world.”

I instantly remembered the image that had appeared obsessively in my mind before I fell asleep. I could not say it was a dream, but it was obvious that it was not physical reality either. I hesitated for a few moments preparing to tell Repa Sundhi about it, but I gave up when Elinor stopped in a parking place on the side of the road crossing the mountains. We stretched for a little while and admired the wonderful scenery surrounding us. I then ate something with Elinor who had brought all the necessary provisions. Repa Sundhi declined to eat and instead chose to walk higher up on the mountain’s side, deep in his thoughts.

After approximately twenty minutes, we got back on the road and soon after we crossed the mountains leading into Transylvania. As we went off the main road and took a route towards the southern side of the Apuseni Mountains, it seemed like both Elinor and Repa Sundhi knew the way we were supposed to go. All this time, I had not asked for any details regarding our final destination nor did the lama mention any new elements. As we came closer to the smooth and very large mountainous plateaus specific to those mountains, I noticed that Repa Sundhi was becoming more and more quiet and focused. That is why I did not want to disturb him with any questions and just abandoned myself to the flow of events that were unfolding.

The jeep had left the secondary road for a while now and was climbing a country road that wound itself through several villages spread on the tall hillsides. At very close range, I could see the first summits that were covered in vast forests. Leaving behind us a last settlement of only a few houses, we entered a forest road that was surprisingly well maintained. You could tell that there had not been anyone going that way for a long time as the vegetation had grown wild in the road and by its sides. You could even see the wheel tracks which are normally encountered in such areas. The road sloped through the forest for approximately one and a half kilometers until it was blocked. All three of us got out of the car, and I saw a very large clearing through the trees that had been created by wood cutters. Only the stumps of the trees were left, partially covered by vegetation.

“We will walk from here,” said Repa Sundhi. “There are no humans for miles around us, but you will be delighted by the scenery.”

I then confessed that I did not have the necessary training to cross the mountains, my last attempt to do so being over ten years ago; but the lama assured me that I would not have to make too much of an effort as the route was easy and the slope was not that steep.

All three of us broke into the clearing. Only then did I realize that we were in fact right on the crest of the hill we had driven up earlier. I think that it was actually a part of the mountain range we had been looking at as it was much smaller than other crests and connected to the mountain through a not too deep and relatively narrow valley.

We crossed the clearing and walked towards the mountain through the tall and yielding grass which curiously enough was still green. The weather was warm and the mild breeze brought the smell of fallen leaves and damp earth. I then felt the first wafts of an unmistakable perfume I knew only too well. It was the smell of ambergris and myrrh that always accompanied the yidam. I commented to the others about it.

“I know. He’s been with us for a little while,” answered Repa Sundhi. “He has already announced a situation to me telepathically and you will soon be able to see his physical form.”

Indeed, a few seconds later the yidam gradually materialized behind Repa Sundhi, next to his left shoulder. I noticed that this was not instantaneous materialization but rather a very fast process that went through two or three stages of compacting. First, the outline of his body manifested as a diffuse vapor in the atmosphere; then it intensified only in certain areas before making a complete appearance in its final phase. Even though I had already witnessed this process in a reverse fashion a couple of days ago in Elinor's house, my amazement was as great now as it was then, only now I refrained from expressing it.

The yidam's impressive stature gave me a feeling of profound safety and trust in the successful outcome of any problems. This feeling did not last long, however, as I gradually started to notice a paradoxical phenomenon that perturbed any logical analysis my brain could make which projected me into a state of total uncertainty.

THE TRANSLATION

All the fantasy stories and scientific theories of parallel dimensions hold almost no value compared to directly experiencing this truth. In my case, my astonishment was even greater as I had the possibility of seeing in detail the actual interweaving of two planes of reality without it perturbing my senses in any way.

As we were walking through that valley, I noticed how the edges of the horizon, both on the left and the right, were becoming darker and darker, "narrowing" my field of vision. But at the same time, as if balancing it out, the frontline of the horizon seemed to deepen even more so as to "pull" the landscape with it. The dimming of the light on the sides made it look more like twilight, blurring the details in those areas. Up to that moment, however, those details had been very clear in the daylight. This very strange manifestation gave me the feeling that we were in a giant vat. The dimensions of the landscape, which until then had been logically interpreted by the brain, had become disproportionate and even tended to reverse their optic projection. What was far away was big and what we could see nearby was very small. I noticed immediately that this created an obvious state of confusion in my brain which generated a feeling of fear within my being. The shocking transformation I perceived in the surrounding environment, however, did not happen suddenly but gradually which allowed a certain "maneuvering space" to my capacity to understand.

It is very strange to walk through a certain area and have the feeling that the reality surrounding you is starting to reconfigure itself like in a cartoon. I noticed that the first impression that is then generated by the mind is one of hesitation and uncertainty. The brain very quickly analyzes all of the possible interpretations but still cannot find anything like it in one's previous experiences. It then tries to build, all by itself, a new model of what it perceives, but this extrapolation is unsuccessful as the basic laws of logic and physics of tridimensional space are not respected and these are the very basis of the interpretation. Thus, in a very short time, the brain "gives up" as it has already exhausted all the possibilities.

This new state of perception is, however, unfavorable to the usual mental condition as the mind has to always be busy, continuously needing something to analyze. That is why, in the unusual situation that I was in, it generated an acute feeling of inner fear by default which was really nothing else but my ego reacting with panic to the new reality I perceived. This was largely due to the ancestral survival instinct that exists in any being which, at the same time, chains us to the manifestation of our normal reality, forcing us, in a way, to "cling" to life, to experience, and to the exterior world.

At the same time as all of this was going on, I was aware that I was capable of lucidly observing the feeling of fear that had gripped me and was even able to rapidly analyze its causes and origin. This caused a shock in my entire being, forcing the clarity of a situation I had not even been aware of until then. I asked myself the following question: if, on the one hand, I am the one who lives the fear and anguish I was facing, then who was the one who was observing that emotion and contraction of my whole being? I was forced to admit that it was not someone else separate from me. I lived that fear myself and could say for certain that it was still me who was the one detachedly observing it. While the first feeling was giving me an acute state of contraction and discomfort within my entire being, the second one was calming me and lifting me, offering a state of great trust and safety. While I was profoundly absorbed in these reflections, Repa Sundhi addressed me without any introduction as if we were just resuming a prior discussion.

"Your inner observations are correct, but the confusion has not completely disappeared yet. You are very close to making a significant leap of consciousness and understanding of the complex relations between what is real and what is false. Now is a very good moment to realize that the phenomenal world is structured so as absorb all of man's attention in a wrong interpretative direction. It is a magical act, an excellent example of cosmic illusion. Apparently, no one nor no thing could convince a human being that the reality he lives in is not exactly as he perceives it. But, as you have the opportunity to see for yourself right now, this belief is erroneous. All of man's beliefs and prejudices regarding matter and the laws of classical physics are proven to be false and inapplicable. The problem is, that during his countless existences, the human being gradually fortified these false beliefs and prejudices in a central focus which he thinks represents his individuality."

"I don't understand very well," I said. "I think I am what, in fact, I am not?"

"Exactly. But it's not just you who does that but also any other being within the Creation. There are, of course, different grades of intensity. The greater the ignorance, the more a man is caught up in the toil of this illusion which he finds very difficult to get rid of. Analyze carefully the inner perception you just had. It's a good start. Can you tell which of the two 'identities' you were closer to before now?"

It was not too difficult to realize what he was saying so I answered immediately.

"Naturally, of the one who made me feel fear. It seems much stronger, much closer to me."

"‘Me’ who?" the lama asked. "Define ‘me.’ "

Suddenly I realized that I had no clear idea of who or what I truly am. My first tendency was to identify with the body, but even I, only at the beginning on the path of understanding certain initiatory aspects, knew that such an idea is, in fact, an aberration. How could I be, in my essence, this body when I cannot even be aware of it at all times? Not earlier than a few days, when I noticed that I was perfectly lucid, I had no perception of my body whatsoever and did not wish to either. The profound state of relaxation and dilation that had then been induced in me by the lama and the yidam caused me to transcend the perceptions of my body which are very limited. Even so, I continued to know that I exist but under no circumstances as a consistency of material physical form.

"Look for the answer," Repa Sundhi spurred me. "This is where the essence of existence lies. Whenever contradictory situations appear, carefully analyze the causes that led there. There can't be two truths in one. That is why you must correctly understand what the falsehood consists of. The main advantage of this is that you will never be tricked again into believing the falseness and it won't affect your existence as it did before then. If, for example, you profoundly understood that your real identity is not this body but a much more subtle reality, then you can be sure that you will not be confronted anymore with a whole series of false, pointless attitudes and perceptions. First, the fear of death will gradually disappear; then you will not pay excessive attention to the outer form of the body. Certain conceited attitudes will greatly fade and even disappear and you will become less selfish. But, you need to be careful as this is only a stage on the path of becoming, and you must not just stop at this point in the analysis. Its depths are unsuspected."

While Repa Sundhi was saying the last few words, I noticed that over the landscape we were passing through was appearing another one which, in the beginning, was like a film projection overlapping the physical reality we were in. Although the projected image was diffused, I could still tell it was a mountainous landscape but much rockier. I could see that the ground I was stepping on was the grass and vegetation of the Apuseni Mountains. At the same time, however, a translucent image of an arid mountain path was superimposed over it. Strewn with rocks, the path snaked between two slopes.

I stopped and almost rubbed my eyes to clear off the mirage. The other three stopped as well, looking at me. No one was saying anything and time seemed to have stopped, too. I looked around me. The lateral twilight seemed to have accentuated, climbing higher towards the zenith. In front of me, the gigantic summit of a rocky mountain was taking shape clearer and clearer over the much lower slopes of the forested Apuseni mountains towards which we were going. The intertwining of the two realities was creating an ambiguous state and even a feeling of uncertainty regarding the ground I was walking on.

The image of the sky was also changing as the time was passing. Its blue color and the bright sun I could see up to that time were more and more overtaken by a thick blanket of dark bluish clouds; but the latter did not quite manage to completely cover the image of the sun of my reality. The perspective I had was truly astounding and magnificent at the same time: the sun rays of my world were sometimes piercing through the threatening blanket of clouds of the reality overlapping it and was diffused in wonderful conical shapes on the mountain slopes. The grandeur of that unique spectacle can hardly be put into words. I was overwhelmed, but even so, I still had my self control. Instead of making desperate efforts to understand what was actually happening, I decided to observe, as calmly and as interestedly as I could, that amazing transformation of the landscape or, better said, of the reality I was in at that time.

The “replacement” of the old landscape with the new spatial projection of the arid rocky valley was almost complete. I could only see very few influences of the sun and areas of green vegetation here and there. These were more and more faded, however, and making room for the new spatial frame which was much harsher and wilder. In the beginning, it was just an unclear sensation; but as the transition ended, I was shocked with amazement. The mountainous area we were in now was exactly the one that obsessively appeared in my mind before we started on this journey!

“This is an important moment in your existence that will help you understand that phenomena are relative within manifestation. At the same time, you will believe that by profoundly meditating over its ephemeral nature, you will manage to obtain the almost magical control of the reality you live in. Then you will be able to determine yourself, at will, modifications or parallel translations of other worlds of the Creation, if that will be necessary at some point.”

Ripa Sundhi was talking slowly in a grave voice and looking into my eyes.

“I saw this place last night. It appeared in my mind as soon as I closed my eyes,” I said, slightly disoriented. “I didn’t know what it meant. And I still don’t understand much even now.”

“You were supported in this way so that the present won’t shock you too much,” the lama explained. “It is an area situated at great height, in one of Tibet’s mountains.”

“We are in Tibet now?” I stammered.

“Yes, the translation is complete. But don’t worry. The whole process is reversible,” the lama assured me.

“But I still don’t understand. Why all of this? Why did we need to be projected here?”

“Because here we are very close to the goal of our journey and because this is how I’ve been advised to act.”

I looked around at the hard, rocky and arid landscape. I estimated we were at more than four thousand feet in altitude. Gusts of wind swept the valley and the air was very cold, almost nippy. You could not see any pathway and no trace of life except some lichen in what a long time ago could have been a river bed, now completely dried out and full of rugged gravel. From place to place, I could see blocks of ice; and on the slopes around us, the blizzard tousled snow in patches. The landscape looked like a saddle and ahead of us were two grand summits, their peaks covered in snow. It was impressive although slightly hazy.

Strangely, I then felt that my presence there was expected; and I was suddenly overcome by an inner force I could not understand. Intuitively, I connected that formidable state of determination and will I felt within me with the subtle austerity and force that were emanating from the place I was in. Even if the conditions were very hard and unwelcoming at first glance, I still noticed that the landscape had the quality of “cleaning” both the mind and heart; and this subtle purification made room for an intense inner feeling of masculinity, force and virility. This desolate mountainous area, which I initially considered as unwelcoming, was now attracting me like a magnet and generated a heartbreakingly nostalgic in me whose source I did not know.

“We must go.”

Repa Sundhi’s voice sounded strangely close and distinct, even in this very large valley. Startled, I unknowingly gathered my jumper around me. The air temperature, however, was much less colder than it should have been at that altitude and in weather like that. I asked the lama how this was possible.

“This is one of the yidam’s contributions. He personally would not need such a facility but thought that we would hold up better in this way.”

I looked at the yidam with gratitude. His giant body was perfectly integrated in that landscape, and it wasn’t hard at all to believe that a god can easily overcome even the harshest terrestrial conditions.

“Have we been translated in time as well?” I asked, slightly worried. I was wondering if I still had the chance of getting home alright after a spatial translation and that a time translation gone wrong could be fatal.

“No, it wasn’t necessary,” answered Repa Sundhi. “This doesn’t mean it is not possible,” he immediately added. “Although apparently distinct, the subtle energies of space and time are intertwined and determine the main characteristics of the surrounding reality. At a certain stage of your spiritual progress, it will be possible for you too to control, at will, these energies. This doesn’t happen by chance though but only in a complete agreement with the energetic harmony and balance of that respective area of the universe.”

“Still, as far as I know, modern science does not agree with these ideas, at least from a practical point of view,” I said.

“This is the drama of the contemporary man of science,” the lama said. “Even if he has made some theoretical progress, he tends to over appreciate his efforts and this is a dangerous trait as it limits the freedom of consciousness. Theoretical results and hypotheses can be an incentive but also frustrating. Here, as in many other cases, what is opposing is the vanity of the idea of supremacy. The man thinks he has reached all the way to the top when, in fact, he is only at the beginning of the road.”

I was walking carefully through the sharp stones, trying not to cut my shoes in them. We were walking through the valley towards the two peaks ahead of us.

“Is this an area often travelled by others?” I asked, wanting to know if we were going to meet anyone on our way.

Repa Sundhi shook his head for no.

“This mountain is protected subtly. Very few pilgrims have access here and only by the grace of some very high deities. Those two peaks cannot be climbed. The only way to the other side is through a secret passage that few people in the world know. You are on the border between two very different worlds.”

“And we are going towards that secret place?” I asked, full of hope and emotions.

“Yes, but you won’t cross to the other side — not now. Events need to happen in a given succession in order to ensure a being’s historical fluency and, extrapolating, for the entirety of humanity. There’s a time for everything, and you will probably also get to know the other land in a not too far away future.”

I was a bit disappointed but at the same time slightly confused. With a faint glimmer of hope, however, I asked some questions.

“What is beyond these two peaks? What kind of land is that and who inhabits it?”

Repa Sundhi did not answer me but continued to walk without looking at me. After a little while, I asked again.

“If we are not crossing to the other side, can you at least tell me where we are going now?”

My request was justified as we had already reached the base of the two majestic peaks. Their height was staggering but what was overwhelming was that the rock wall was practically vertical and almost completely smooth without any cracks. I then understood why Repa Sundhi said the peaks could not be climbed. And it was indeed so as they formed an insurmountable barrier.

The lama came to the front of the group and guided us to the right. We then started to obliquely climb the relatively easy incline leading to the base of the gigantic rock wall. Behind us you could almost not see the valley anymore, it being shadowed by a dense fog and twilight. Suddenly, behind a rock, an opening appeared in the mountain’s massive rock wall. I stopped as if electrocuted. An obscure but very intense fear overcame me without me being able to determine its real reason. I thought it was because of the mysterious opening in the mountain. The crevice was very narrow, only a little larger than shoulder-width and it seemed completely dark from the outside. Its height was remarkable though, over eight meters. It looked like a cut in the mountain's massive body and suggested the existence of unknown mysteries behind it. I stopped a few meters from the dark opening in the mountain and asked Repa Sundhi if that was the place of crossing to the other side. He was right next to the entrance and turned to face me before speaking.

"Yes, this is the secret crossing passage, but I have already told you that this will not be your experience for today. You must be patient and have discernment."

The yidam drew near the crevice and waited behind Repa Sundhi. Even he, with his imposing stature, seemed minuscule next to the greatness of that gigantic rock wall.

"Now, just the yidam and I will enter while you two will wait for us here," the lama said. "We won't be long."

With these words, he vanished through the opening, followed closely by the yidam. In order to be able to fit his broad shoulders, the yidam had to enter slightly sideways. All of a sudden, the landscape looked very bare and even threatening. It was very quiet and even the wind was not blowing anymore.

I looked at Elinor. He was calm and did not seem to worry at all, suggesting this was not the first time he had been faced with such a situation.

"Have you followed this trail before?" I asked, hoping to get some support.

"No, not here; but I have been with Repa Sundhi in other similar places: in the Himalayas and the Andes in Peru."

I was looking at him helplessly. I had the feeling that we had been abandoned there forever. In that unknown place, completely isolated from the civilized world, we didn't have too many chances of survival. Panic overcame my mind with the thought that we would freeze to death without shelter and food. Night fell rapidly over the snowed peaks as Elinor and I waited at the bottom of that incredibly tall mountain with no certainty that we would ever be saved. Even if we managed to somehow survive, we would have to reach a Tibetan village lost in the mountains that would lack any modern means of communication or transportation. At best, assuming that I would not be thrown into a Chinese prison, years would pass before getting back home to Romania.

I described my bleak perspective to Elinor but he started laughing heartily and told me that the rarefied air was probably playing tricks with my mind.

“Of course you don’t care,” I said. “You still have another two thousand years to live, but I would like to use the little time I have left as much as I can.”

Thinking lucidly, I realized that he was right. The very strong air, even if rarefied, exacerbated certain mental functions which blazed at the first alarm. This awareness of mine was enough to allow me to return to a normal state of understanding and appreciate the actual situation. I then said to Elinor that I will have to make more journeys of this kind in order to get used to the rigors of the mountains.

While we exchanged impressions on this subject, Repa Sundhi and the yidam came out of the dark opening in the mountain and signaled us to come closer. We got next to the gigantic crevice, but I could not see a thing in the dark. The walls at the entrance were slightly rugged and cut into the mountain rock in the simple shape of a rectangle with its height much bigger than its width. A strong emotional state overcame me as I came closer to the rock wall. I felt there was something enigmatic in there, something profoundly mysterious that I knew nothing about. Repa Sundhi looked at me very kindly and spoke.

“You will now enter this mountain and find all the answers to your questions about the purpose of this journey. This moment is important as it will initiate a series of positive actions in an avalanche by means of an essential trigger that also involves your being. Don’t be afraid. We will be with you for a while.”

Having said that, Repa Sundhi took my right hand in his left and signalled me to follow him. With my heart in stitches, I entered the unfathomable darkness inside the mountain.

THE SACRED CAVE

The yidam and Elinor were right behind us. As soon as I entered the niche in the mountain, I could not see anything anymore; but after a few seconds, I realized that the corridor was shaped approximately like an S. In the beginning, it turned to the right and then to the left. When we were on this last bend, I suddenly saw ahead of me, less than three meters away, a huge opening, which was lit. We entered a big cave whose ceiling was a bit taller than the crevice we came through. It was probably ten meters above the floor of that cave.

From the very beginning, I was struck by a special element. The cave was discreetly lit by a very pleasant pale blue light, but I could not see its source. Another aspect that caught my attention was the air temperature. It was almost warm compared to the temperature outside. I found this inviting and the magical sparkle of the stalactites and rock walls was creating a fairy tale background that was amplified by the discreet murmur of crystal pure water. Following the course of that spring, I noticed that it ran through the rock formations on the ground, disappearing under the wall to my right.

The cave advanced into the mountain for a fairly short distance, not more than 10-12 meters, after which it narrowed a bit and bent into a left turning corridor; but from where I was standing, I could not see any other details. That subterranean place was emanating great purity and a certain refinement that I cannot define any better than that. My entire being was enveloped in a delicate emotion, and I felt as if I had been lifted to a superior state of experiencing and understanding. It is fairly hard to describe the very special emotions I was then feeling within the depths of my being, but the most appropriate comparison seems to be to a continuous and very delicate vibration that I could perceive everywhere in my body.

Repa Sundhi advised me to take a few more steps forward while he, together with the yidam and Elinor, remained at the entrance. I walked up to one bigger rock formation which was covered in small quartz crystals that sparkled in myriads of colors. Excited and nervous, I didn't know what to expect. Those next moments seemed as long as hours as an incomprehensible impatience was growing within me. All of a sudden, my heartbeat accelerated and my whole body was enveloped in heat. My mind was pulled as if in a whirl and everything around me seemed to have come closer, spinning at great speed. Then everything suddenly calmed down, and I now felt as if I had just returned from a long journey although my agitation probably didn't last more than a few seconds. I was calm, enveloped in a profound inner peace.

It was then that I saw the goddess. She appeared unexpectedly, coming from the cave's corridor as she slowly advanced towards me. I am well aware that I will never be capable of faithfully describing in words what I felt in those unique moments. We are used to living in a very limited reality which does not give us the much richer and much more nuanced gamut of experiences and sensations of worlds that are superior to the physical plane. The mind of the ordinary man is so contracted to the dimension he lives in and the interests he has that when confronted with a reality exceeding his power of understanding, he has a tendency to block and even refuse what he perceives. Fortunately, as I had already been through such stages in previous situations, I had some experience in these matters. But here, the situation was different.

For the first time in my life, I was meeting a being that was obviously from another world and a world of which I did not have the faintest idea. Even so, I immediately knew that she is a very elevated deity. I cannot explain very well how I knew. It was probably from her unusual appearance correlated with the very intense emotion I felt when I saw her face; combined with the knowledge I had of the oriental pantheon of deities and their iconographic representations. In some way, my subconscious fused all the information to a definite and very clear conclusion. Or perhaps it was a very strong telepathic transmission that determined a profound belief within my being. No matter the reason, I knew I was facing a goddess.

Stunned, I watched as she came closer to me. The feeling I had then was that she was moving slowly, like walking on water, although I could see very well that her steps were on the ground. The closer she came, the more pressure I felt on my body so that it almost pushed me backwards. My heart was racing, and I could feel my blood rushing through my body. Everything around me seemed to be dilating as things became brighter and clearer.

The goddess was stirring. No one could have remained indifferent to her astonishing appearance or resisted her intense look. She was very tall for a woman. I think her body was almost two meters in height but perfectly harmonious. I had never seen something so delightful that illustrated such perfection of form. Even now, when I write all of this, the image of the goddess is so alive in my mind that, just by mentally projecting myself into those extraordinary moments I have lived, I can see everything in the finest detail and exactly as I perceived and lived it then.

Her imposing height was doubled by an extraordinary radiation that she emanated in an almost visible way. I had noticed something similar with the yidam when I saw the air vibrating around his body. Only now, this mysterious radiation was emanating from the body like rays of the goddess although these were not rays of light. It was more of a subtle and hidden vibration, but because of its profoundness, it became much more pervasive. This was probably why that phenomenal force and energy that she radiated was creating the sensation of “pressure” that “pushed” me back.

She was in front of me now, less than a meter and a half away. I was overwhelmed. I raised my eyes and looked at her face, but in that same instant I knew I could not do it. Her dazzling unearthly beauty took my breath away. Those unbelievable eyes pierced my soul and heart to the most hidden depths. I never believed that the beauty of form could have such an impact over a man’s consciousness; but I understood very well that it was a combination between the radiation of her aura and the shape of her body and face that embodied perfection. Even so, the impression that her incomparable beauty and purity had on me literally took my breath away. I involuntarily leaned by the rock wall to my left and could barely stop my body shaking. Barely able to breathe, I almost could not open my eyes. Even though there was no light to blind me when I looked at her face, my breath stopped and I felt as if I was fainting. That is why I half-closed my eyes and looked at her only from the waist down.

I know for sure that such a unique experience must be lived in order to fully understand it and to be able to perceive all of its nuances. All descriptions seem poor and insignificant compared to the formidable emotional imprint I lived at the time. The visual and subtle energetic impact of that unearthly being proved to be much stronger than my reasoning. I did not even ask myself whether I was dreaming or having a real experience or if what I was perceiving was verifiable by modern scientific knowledge. The presence of the goddess was so vivid and overwhelming that there was no room in my mind for other ramblings or secondary thoughts. My entire being was filled to the brim with that unmatched sensation of an indescribable beauty from another world.

I know my description cannot even surmise a part of the actual perceptions I had then and that my efforts in this direction will never be enough. I will try, however, to present a few general features that could give you at least an approximate idea of the astounding appearance of the goddess.

She did not look like any of the known human races. Her skin was blue with even some tinges of dark blue and was very smooth and shined sublimely in the reflection of the light and crystals in the cave. This was the main characteristic of her body that shocked the mind right from the beginning. Still, if the mystery emanating from her being would have stopped at that, I think I could have coped quite well in that meeting. But the completely unusual aspect of her skin was greatly amplified by the dazzling beautiful features of her face and, in particular, her divinely celestial eyes. These could be very well likened to two intense flames that subdue everything in their path. What in our eyes is the white part was bright yellow and almost glistening in the goddess. Her iris was dark green. This amazing combination of colors was creating a formidable hypnotic sensation. The brightness of her eyes was amplified by the blue tinge of her skin, but at the same time, the entire face of the goddess was lit by their mysterious incandescent radiation. The sensation given by her eyes was at first so shocking that the feeling was one of paralyzing fear over the entire body. Only then, while still having a gram of lucidity, was I able to realize the depth of compassion and kindness her look actually expressed.

For a few moments, my initial blindness did not allow me to judge things naturally and normally and I was attracted towards my self-limiting feelings of fear and self-preservation. I was, however, helped to surpass that difficult moment in order to have a correct perception of the situation. Incapable of making any move, I was almost suffocating because of the impact the beauty of the goddess was having upon me. I leaned on the massive stone next to me. She then came even closer. As if in a slow motion movie, I perceived details that strongly impinged upon my subconscious. All of my senses were acute and the passing of time seemed to have slowed down. It felt like I was living in a different world, but I was nevertheless very lucid.

I then felt her body heat enveloping me and giving me perhaps the most intense sensation of well-being I had ever experienced. It was like a delicate breeze that seemed to pervade me, neutralizing the psycho-mental contractions I was involuntarily manifesting. At the same time, I perceived the smell emanating from her body. If I had been very pleasantly surprised by the sacred smell irradiated in the yidam's presence, I was shocked by the incredible nuances of her perfume and its extraordinary purity. It was as if thousands of flowers had been gathered there; and still, it was even more than that. It was the smell of a sacred place, of mysteries that cannot be told, of a reality way beyond our world which cannot be described. In a way, it was an intuitive smell, but it did not stay the same for too long but was permanently changing, either as a sublime perfume that was well defined or a combination of olfactory nuances.

This perception completely turned inside out whatever was left untouched in my being. I couldn't explain why it happened like this, but I felt that in those moments that I had totally abandoned myself to the goddess in an impetuous impulse of unconditional love and frenetic adoration. The divine smell of her body, now very close to me, brought out an unexpected baggage of ancestral memories, fragments of undefined sensations, and strange images I could not identify in the course of my life. It was like an explosion of very profound feelings and perceptions were bringing me closer in a mysterious and intoxicating way to that divine being.

I raised my eyes again and looked at her face of rapturous beauty. In order to give you a corresponding analogy from our world, I could say that her features were a combination between those of the European race and the Asian race; but in addition to that, there was something I can hardly define which was not of this earth. The face of the goddess radiated an unequalled nobility and royal bearing; but not in the sense of arrogance and ego but of wisdom and firmness. The proportions of the nose and mouth were perfect and her red lips emanated an almost tangible sensuality. Her fine and delicate smile was revealing the whiteness of perfect teeth and emphasized her cheekbones. The superb eyes were big and slightly oblong, and her black eyebrows, slightly arched, defined even better their perfect shape. The long black long hair was falling straight to half-way down her back and was shimmering magically in the blue light of the cave. Her forehead was clear; and in the middle of it, I could see a vertical line of approximately five centimeters that was of a dark violet color and phosphorescent.

I noticed that the skin of her face was a lighter shade of blue while the perfect neck was almost navy blue. Maybe that was just my feeling as a result of the luminous and stirring radiation emanating from her eyes. The goddess was wearing a simple translucent dark green veil that matched the color of her skin and eyes in a remarkable way. This veil was pinned in a complicated way over her right shoulder and loosely gathered around her waist with a golden thread. The sheer material the veil was made of allowed a discreet glimpse of the superb shape of her breasts and the shiny dark blue skin of her thighs.

The goddess brought her hand closer to my neck and touched me lightly at the base of it. Immediately thereafter, she made the same gesture to the middle of my forehead and the crown of my head. I could see her delicate fingers very closely with their nails of dark red and her arm stretched in a natural gesture. The gorgeous gold bracelets adorned in rubies that she wore on her wrist were moving slightly and making a bright tinkling noise. On her unveiled upper arm she wore another bracelet of gold, wider and encrusted with sapphires. Her ankles were also adorned in thin gold bracelets, but these had no precious stones. Around her neck she had a necklace of a rare beauty made of emeralds and white pearls that shone brightly in contrast with her delicate blue skin.

The moment she touched me with her fingers, an inner lighting crossed my body along the spine. I thought I would faint but I did not. I was still standing in the same place, but I could not feel my body anymore. It was as if I had been overcome by general numbness although my mind was very lucid. The predominant feeling I was experiencing then was one of escape, of great freedom. I was small and at the same time very big.

After a few moments, when she touched my forehead, I felt a colossal inner vortex that irresistibly enveloped me and lifted me up higher and higher at a staggering speed. Louder and louder, I could then hear a very elevated vibration that immediately got all of my attention. I could feel that vibration in every atom of my being and had the certainty that it represented something fundamental, a gigantic platform of support. I wanted to leap without any second thought into that ocean of sound that I felt was filling everything, but it was then that the goddess touched the top of my head. A formidable thunder invaded my being at the same time with a white blinding explosion. I could not say if I was in the air or on the earth. I could only see a white light shining like a star above my head. From time to time that star would irradiate multicolored sparks like a rainbow that would face into a space I could not define. Gradually, the white light started to dim, allowing me to again see the details of the cave. In a few seconds, I was back to normal, but the light remained concentrated in a minuscule dot slightly above my head. I could not see it and yet I knew it was there as I could feel its presence as an extremely pleasant cooling sensation coming down to my neck.

I was very close to the goddess and was contemplating her, being aware that only through her will was I able to sustain myself without losing consciousness. That was the moment when she started to talk to me. I will never forget that voice and its extraordinary nuances. There was a great difference between the yidam's voice and what I was hearing now. How can I describe in a credible way a voice that sounds as if it were more than one voice with different tonalities which remains perfectly unitary at the same time? Although the goddess was facing me at less than a meter away and speaking slowly while looking into my eyes, I felt as if her voice was coming from far away and from all directions simultaneously.

Submitting this experience to a second analysis, what I heard was not a human voice. It reached my ears as if each utterance was doubled or tripled, but all these overlappings were delayed only so slightly and had different tonalities so that the overall effect was very strange and unusual. In the beginning, I had the tendency to look around me for the source of the voices I perceived as coming from many different directions, but I soon realized that it was in fact the voice of the goddess. She had a warm tone with many nuances, but I also noticed a slight shrill-like quality akin to a guitar string that is overworked.

Although the words she was saying were in a language unknown to me, I could still, curiously enough, perfectly understand their meaning. Without being too strong, her voice was pervading and instantaneously focused my attention upon her. I watched the movement of her lips in fascination and felt with all of my being the formidable radiation emanated by her body. Barely perceivable, I could see her chest moving rhythmically but very slowly, at one with her breath. At the same time, my mind faithfully registered all the words she was speaking. She told me that my coming there had a very well defined meaning and that it was correlated to everything in a very complex chain of causalities. She explained that in order to be capable of coping with her presence and hearing her voice, a kind of leap of my level of consciousness and energy was needed, a leap that she had induced by touching me with her hand.

“The experience you just lived through is a preparation for a special initiation you will receive soon. In a short while, we will meet again and you will then meet other special beings that have also been initiated; but unlike you, they had this experience while dreaming. Not all people face the same kind of experience as this depends on the inner structure of each one of you. This is why they received different types of initiation during their dreams. There is, however, a common ground that ties and brings you all together. There are several groups of people in your country that are guided and helped to evolve in this way. You must know that this method is also applied to human beings in other areas of the world.”

The body and face of the goddess had a fascinating attraction for me. I was almost in a trance as I looked at her perfect beauty and listened to her out-of-this-world words. In a low voice, I asked her a question with profound emotion.i

“What is in reality the purpose of these special preparations? Things seem complex to me and the efforts very sustained. What is happening here? What is secretly being planned?”

I then noticed that the vertical violet line in the middle of her forehead intensified its shine. The voice of the goddess then enveloped me from all directions.

“When the time comes, causes that have been long seeded will start to come to fruition. This, however, depends mainly upon people’s will. There is never just one possibility, but in the case of major events, we can talk about directions of probability. The true battle is to tip the balance of the most probable direction one way or the other.”

The goddess then looked at the trio standing behind me who were next to the gap in the mountain wall. She then exchanged a few phrases with Repa Sundhi in a language I did not understand but assumed was Tibetan. Immediately after that, all three of them left the cave, leaving me alone with that celestial being. It was as if my thoughts were numbed, and I only wanted to look at her and adore her divine beauty and majestic grace. I felt my heart brimming with an uproar that I could not control anymore. Tears filled my eyes and ran down my cheeks. I tried to remain standing although my feet were trembling and my hands were weak.

I then noticed how the eyes of the goddess became brighter. The air around her lit up, pulsing in golden rays like high intensity flashes. She moved further away from me, making a discreet sign to follow her. A few meters from the end of the cave, on the left of the corridor, I noticed an area that seemed cut into the rock. It looked like a giant step or a stage of approximately one meter and a half in height. Its depth was not more than a third of its height.

The goddess stopped next to that area and invited me to come closer. On the flat stone was a sculpted box made of a dark colored noble wood. At her request, I lifted the lid of the box and saw inside a yellow-brown rolled parchment. I took it out of the box and opened it slightly. It was covered in signs made in an ink whose color had become a sort of grey mixed with green. Its color had probably been black initially but with the passing of time, the contrast faded. I noticed that the roll was very old; and even though it looked as if it had been kept in very good condition, the text was hardly visible in some places due to the numerous cracks in the hide that the parchment was made of. The written characters looked like those of the Sanskrit language, but I was more inclined to believe it was a text in Tibetan. I looked inquiringly at the goddess and she spoke.

“It is one of the parchments that were hidden all around Tibet a long time ago. Each of them has its own importance and destiny. The one you are holding now has an essential value, not only due to the contents of the text but also due to the fact that it has been found. Even if this does not seem like much to you, know that it will generate a series of actions and events which will have a very profound impact upon humanity.”

I felt as if I had been transported into a fairy tale reality. Nonetheless, I could not deny what I had felt and seen. I asked her what the origins of the parchment were.

“This one and the other ones I told you about contain important initiatory texts and information revealed by the Divine Sovereign Sage of the Three Worlds, the great Guru Rimpoche.”

The goddess’s voice then took on an even more profound vibration that filled me with a heart rendering feeling of love.

“In his never ending compassion for all ignorant human beings, the divine master presented some fundamental teachings that were written by his most important disciples and then hidden in certain places in Tibet. The parchment you are looking at was written by one of Guru Rimpoche’s closest disciples herself. She had the main role of synthesizing the teachings of the great spiritual guide which she organized into chapters and wrote down in scrolls which she hid in secret places.”

“Why did she hide it? Why did she act in this way?” I asked, surprised.

The goddess’s divine eyes were fixing upon me like two eternal flames.

“Humankind often goes through certain phases of spiritual conditions,” she said to me. “The present period is the most bleak and decadent of it all. Those teachings had to be passed on in order to start a new spiritual knowledge of the human. The period in which they were revealed by the great spiritual teacher of Tibet was very troubled and they would not have managed to have a significant impact in a larger area. Their purpose was anticipated over a great leap of time, to the present situation where free and easy communication between people is possible.

“All of this has been predicted in detail; but in order for the action to be successful, the parchments had to be preserved and guarded under the best conditions so that they were not stolen or destroyed. Guru Rimpoche and his disciple gave this responsibility to certain subtle entities that did not allow anyone to come near those respective places except for those who were meant to discover them. The terrible yidam you have met had the task of guarding this secret and hardly accessible place which, furthermore, is a gate to another realm.”

In my mind, connections were being made at light speed, but my heart was quivering under the emotion that the goddess's words generated within me. In a very special way, these triggered states and images of those long ago passed times and even of the beings that had acted then. I could not actually see all of those events, but I still somehow perceived some of the scenes in my mind. After they were related to me by the goddess, I knew them and that filled me with unequalled amazement and joy. Without any doubt, I was convinced that this ability had been imprinted on me by her in order for me to be able to believe what I was hearing. This made me again feel a wave of deep gratitude and love which I offered her from all of my heart. Watching me being overwhelmed by new frenetic emotions, she smiled her dazzling smile and spoke to me once again.

"In times to come, you will be confronted with people's opaqueness and fear of knowing and starting out on the spiritual path, but these problems must not become obstacles or barriers in the way of your mission. The teachings in this text and the others, to which you will later have access, must be wisely spread to those willing to receive and apply it in their own life. Many are lazy, and their laziness is chronic. Laziness is actually a dangerous trap of the mind which then contracts and takes the human being away from the surrounding world. Lazy people are helpless, wanting to have everything but in fact have nothing. If they are asked to act, they get upset as they feel chained in their own laziness, like an animal in a cage. Their general feeling is that they are not capable of anything and thus are not interested in what exists outside of themselves. They are the prisoners of their own mind which dictates to them when there is any exterior intervention: 'I can't. I don't want to. I don't have time. I am not interested.'

"Always turn towards those who keep their spirit alive. It is possible that they too might have a thin crust of laziness and inertia in the beginning, but that will give way soon to the subtle heart which, in their case, is awakened."

"What about the others?" I asked. "Why are not the others capable of this comeback?"

"You have no idea yet of the extraordinary force developed by inertia and laziness. It is a type of descendant energy that not only ties the being on a physical level but especially on a psychic and mental one. Deep inside of himself, the lazy one is in fact really attached to the comfort offered by life, by his often phantasmagorical thoughts and the prejudices he does not want to give up. He does not have the capacity of realizing his condition and imagines his life as very good and running normally. Many find themselves in this deplorable condition. Their time comes when they make great efforts to come out of the torpor they live in.”

It was like I was embedded into the magical atmosphere of the cave. The presence of the goddess so close to me, the dazzling perfume that she emanated, and her everlasting look were all creating within me a state which was almost a suspension of body and mind.

“There are many ideas coming to my mind and many questions I don’t have answers for,” I said. “It is a mystery the way I met you. Your presence is overwhelming.”

My words choked me with emotion and I almost could not think coherently anymore. It was as if the area of my head was on fire and my chest was vibrating with energy.

“It is an enigma for you,” the goddess said. “For me though, your soul is like an open book. What use would it be for you to know now all the particularities of the situation? The karmic current brought you here without you even realizing it. The parchments containing the secret texts revealed by Guru Rimpoche will have a strong impact over the future destiny of Humankind. Many of them have already been discovered by human beings fulfilling certain karmic conditions. Compose yourself within your soul and understand the significance of your mission.”

Having said that, the goddess flashed, lighting the entire cave. Her eyes were shining like two powerful rays and the éclat she emanated was unimaginable. Gradually, the intense light dimmed, and I could see once again the way she looked at me, with great love and kindness.

“Guru Rimpoche himself came to this cave?” I asked, wanting to know in order to understand some of the perceptions I had a few moments before.

“He didn’t, but his wise disciple entered here to hide the parchment. That happened a very long time ago. With the divine powers she had, she modelled the stone wall in the shape you are seeing now and placed the wooden box there. This cave is very special because it leads to another world. That is why the text hidden here is also very important. At first, however, only very few people will understand its contents. In it is described the real nature of the attachments that chain man to the world and five very efficient meditation techniques are mentioned in order to help overcome this important obstacle. Finally, the one whose compassion is infinite made some prophecies related to the great transformation that humanity is going to go through. In part, these prophecies refer to your country, too. They can't be fulfilled, however, if an authentic awakening of people towards spirituality is not going to happen.

“The heavy chains that tie these people are, in fact, the attachments and selfishness that are generated by them. Hate, anger and misunderstanding of situations and reality add to the baggage of negative emotions. The ones who manifest it and even cultivate it will be permanently subjected to suffering and deception. For such a man there's a great distance to the clear and pure light of his divine essence, and he will torment himself within the fog of his gross thoughts, full of attachment towards what he wants to achieve without actually getting it. Such a being lives in extremes, being permanently torn between the intensity of pleasure and happiness and the desperation of a dire suffering. He can't have a friend or a lover without strongly attaching to him or her and also can't see an enemy without becoming very angry or even hating him. Never forget that you will only find the profound peace of the soul in the perfect balance between these extremes. No matter if it is ephemeral joy brought about by pleasant situations or the fierce anger unleashed by a hurt ego, these are all just illusory and even demonic influences that digress the human being from his meaning in life.

“When facing the illusions that are often orchestrated by the malefic forces of the Creation, a man is like a domestic animal. He feels good and safe in his master's yard if the master feeds and takes care of him. The domestic animal forgets, however, that it is only a matter of time until his master is going to kill and eat him. It is the same situation when man falls prey to fits of insensate fury and fierce hate that make him decay and reach a deplorable state.”

I listened, enraptured by the goddess's words. Their very special sonority created within me a wonderful state that was facilitating a profound understanding.

"What is the solution then?" I asked.

"Strive towards balance in everything you do," the goddess answered. "Always keep yourself in the center. This will allow you to be in the middle of the action and at the same time not to become attached to it. Be firm and balanced in your kindness towards others without wanting to get something in return. Emotional bartering is even worse than deceit. These are the premises of wisdom."

I now had the feeling that I had been there for days, perfecting my spiritual evolution. The never ending emotions, unrest, weakness and amazement that I had been overwhelmed by until then were now being gradually replaced with a feeling of wonderful force and energy that generated a continuous state of inner happiness within me. But just as I was realizing this with great delight, I intuitively perceived that my meeting with the goddess was coming to an end. Tending to become sad, there is no way I wanted to leave her in order to come back to our world. The goddess smiled her fascinating smile and spoke to me in a slightly rebuking tone.

"See how difficult it is to keep yourself unaffected by sadness and joy, no matter how intense they are? In the exact moment you think you have reached the apex, you immediately discover the ghost of dissatisfaction and suffering. The truly strong one learns to be beyond both manifestations. In a way, you are attached to my physical shape and my presence. Sometimes thousands of years are needed for these traces of attachment to disappear. To your delight, however, I am telling you that you will see me again soon — very soon."

My heart started beating hard.

"Will I come back to this cave?" I asked. "Will you call me again? If it is so soon, I would like not to leave at all. I would like to stay here and maybe Elinor and Repa Sundhi would also want to share this place with me."

After I finished speaking, I looked at the sublime goddess with pleading eyes. She looked back at me in a way that made me burst into tears. It was practically impossible to resist the energetic influx she generated within me. Her face of stirring beauty impressed me so much that my emotions would reach a paroxysm at some moments so that I was not capable of uttering another word. Her divinely harmonious body and the very delicate gestures she was making generated within me, especially when her eyes were on me, a strong tremor manifesting boundless love and compassion. I felt then as if all the waters of the universe were pouring their ancestral mysteries through the light of those divine eyes.

“You do not need to stay here,” the goddess said. “Your mind and imagination are too excited now for you to express yourself logically and coherently,” she added, smiling more broadly. “It’s nothing. As soon as you leave this cave, you will return to a normal state but a much more evolved one than you were used to before.”

“If I’m not going to meet you here, then where will I see you again?” I asked.

It was difficult to control the bitterness of the separation.

“It will be in your very own country. Repa Sundhi and the yidam will accompany you there. It is the place that the great sage Guru Rimpoche speaks about in his prophecies contained in the text you found here. He mentions that in these end times there will be a land in the west with a great amount of water next to a triangle of mountains. In those mountains great mysteries are hidden which will be discovered. Goratri is the mountain at whose peak a very important focus of energetic impulse exists.

“The divine master’s prophecy states that the no return path of the transformation on this planet will be marked by an extraordinary discovery that will be made in the mountains of your country. This you already know. From now on, all things are closely tied in together and are determined at a very profound causal level. The second important element, generated by the first, is the discovery of this written parchment and bringing it into the world where it will gradually be made known in several stages. You will have a significant contribution in this process which will then trigger a series of beneficial secondary causes.”

While she was saying these last few words, the goddess started to distance herself but was still facing me. I was in the same state of confusion as in the first moments when I had seen her. It was a feeling that she was floating rather than walking although it was just a strange optical illusion.

A powerful inner impulse made me jump. It was not possible for her to leave so soon. She could not leave me all alone so quickly! In a few seconds, she disappeared down the corridor at the back end of the cave.

Without paying attention to anything else, I dashed in that direction. The corridor was quite narrow and brightly lit. I walked through it decidedly, but after turning left, I stopped in amazement. After just two to three meters, the corridor ended in the mountain wall as if it had only been dug out to that point. I told myself that there must be a secret door or exit, and I started to look around me, feverishly touching the rock and hoping that I would find the secret opening mechanism of this door. But soon enough, I had to abandon that action as I could very well intuit that it was not going to be successful. I knew that the goddess did not need a secret door or hidden mechanisms in order to cross to different planes. Her quite sudden disappearance, however, almost like her emergence, turned my being inside out and filled my heart with the aching longing to see her again.

My entire energy was then concentrated in a live and intense desire of calling her to come back. I immediately realized that I was behaving childishly; but at the same time, I became aware that I did not know how to call her. Suddenly, my despair had reached a paroxysm. In that very moment, I heard her well known voice in my mind, saying just one name very clearly: Machandi. I froze. The next moment, I spoke her name myself, and I noticed with great joy that its effect was very relaxing and calming. Nonetheless, the impact of her abrupt departure was still very strong and was not going to fade so quickly. The only factor that I considered to be positive in those moments was that, as she promised, I was going to meet her again in a very short time period.

Impatient to find out from Repa Sundhi when that meeting would happen, I went towards the stone step in the mountain's wall and took the wooden box that contained the precious parchment. I looked once more at the cave where I had just lived through what was perhaps the most emotionally intense experience of my life. It then occurred to me that its sacred space and dreamlike blue light had been guarding the secret entrance to another world for thousands of years. I was not meant to know at that time, however, what mysteries that world was hiding or who its inhabitants were. I was almost sure, however, that between that mysterious land and the great discovery in the Bucegi mountains was a very strong connection, and I was hoping that I would have the opportunity to find out more details about this in the not too distant future. Besides, Repa Sundhi had said that I would gain access to these secrets but in a certain matter of time. This thought gave me a feeling of hope and trust in the future as I imagined that I would see Machandi again and be around her always. In those moments I was still not completely aware of the real significance of the event I had lived through in the cave. I brought the box closer to my chest, mentally thanking the goddess for her kindness and stepped into the dark space of the niche in the mountain's wall in order to return to the world I had left earlier.

Chapter 4 — The Secret Initiation

In front of the cave, Repa Sundhi, the yidam and Elinor were waiting for me. The cold wind swept me frontally, bringing me back to a much harsher and tangible reality. The shadows of the twilight were darkening the clouds even more than they were already and the rocky landscape was fully contributing to my feeling of sadness after having left Machandi.

As we walked back on the same path we came on, I was deep in thought and profoundly marked by my meeting with Machandi. Having consideration for my state of mind, the other three were also quiet and composed.

I soon realized, however, that I was not really acting correctly. The experience I had just lived through was supposed to be grounds for joy and exuberance and not for sadness and thoughtfulness. The separation from the goddess was predictable, and I had yet to return to the world where I had a meaning and a purpose to put into practice the teachings that had been revealed to me and to fulfill the secret mission that I had been assigned. I had the parchment as well as certain esoteric information and knowledge, but no plan had been mapped out and there was no precise direction of action to take.

Under such circumstances, I understood that this was not like a company where you outline ways and benchmarks in order to reach a performance goal. If it were like that, situations in life would run as if on automatic pilot which would eventually make the “game” predictable. I only had an idea of what I was supposed to do along with some helping “tools.” The rest of it I had to figure out for myself: to adapt and look for efficient ways in which truth and spirituality can reach out to those who want to receive them.

People are different. They behave and understand differently as both their personality and their level of consciousness are distinct. Making certain fundamental truths known to them that could radically change their life and capacities is a very dynamic process that does not rely on just one method. In order to be successful in sharing with others and to be as convincing as possible in conveying a new vision of life, I realized that I first had to profoundly understand these aforementioned aspects of people myself. Fortunately, destiny has facilitated me with the friendship of some exceptional beings who have guided me and continue to do so with much competence in the mysteries of spirituality. One of these is Repa Sundhi.

As I continued to walk from Machandi's cave with my companions, I noticed that Repa Sundhi was walking by my side without interfering with my thoughts. I did feel that his very presence, however, was acting as if it were a silent invitation to clarify what I still did not understand.

"You know, there are some unknown aspects related to Machandi that I would like to find out more about," I confessed to Repa Sundhi. "Her presence overwhelmed me, and I must tell you that my entire being is filled with her image and memory."

The lama smiled discreetly but did not say a word and continued to walk alongside me. I was trying to find the most appropriate words to express what I felt.

"At first," I said, "the shock disoriented me but then I composed myself somehow. I felt like she was helping me to do that, but I wonder if the effect of her appearance was due only to her divine form."

Repa Sundhi's voice roused me as if from a deep sleep.

"Of course this was what impressed you most first of all, but the energetic sensations you felt are due to the formidable auric influence she manifests. You will continue to feel these effects for a very long time henceforth."

"Nonetheless, who is she? When she was next to me, I could faithfully perceive everything that she was saying and admire her unimaginable splendor, but if I wanted to ask her something, I was almost unable to gather my thoughts and focus upon them."

The lama immediately cleared up my quandary.

"You were too shaken in those moments to be able to keep a coherent thinking process going. The difference between her level of consciousness and yours is still too big; and although she helped you to overcome some obstacles, the impact upon your mind and perceptions seems to have been stunning. Of course, Machandi could have caused a temporary spectacular leap of your consciousness to bring you closer to her level, but there would then have been a risk of ‘short circuits’ happening within your mind. That would have triggered unpleasant side effects and even physical problems as your organic structure is not yet fully prepared to sustain such a strong energetic manifestation. This is why Machandi brought you only to the upper limit that you can now sustain.”

“Is she a goddess?” I asked. “Who is she? Even now, after having been through such an unforgettable experience, I still find it hard to believe.”

“It is normal. Mental prejudices are still very strong, but you will think differently in a little while. Yes, she is a very powerful goddess, but know that she too has walked the ascendant path of evolution. In her case, a great transformation occurred a few hundred years ago. Before that, she was a celestial feminine entity, a dakini, who accompanied one of the important disciples of the wise Padmasambhava of Tibet.”

“I am not yet familiar with the history of Tibet, but I feel very drawn to the stories about the great masters of this place,” I said passionately. “Machandi spoke to me about the great Guru Rimpoche whose teachings are in this text that I am carrying.”

Repa Sundhi smiled understandingly.

“He is one and the same as Padmasambhava. This name is more known in the West, but there are many others in the traditional Tibetan texts that have been used to praise him for a long time. He was a spiritually accomplished being who completely reformed the religion of Tibet. This happened more than twelve hundred years ago. The parchment was hidden in the cave by one of his main disciples who was named Tsogyelma or Yeshe Tsogyel.”

I suddenly interrupted Repa Sundhi in order to ask him if she was the one who Machandi accompanied as this would explain her presence in the cave and the connection with the parchment that was hidden there.

“No, the goddess has been with another very important disciple of the great sage named Tashi Kyidren. Although she was a princess, she dedicated her entire life to spirituality. In fact, Tashi Kyidren was the embodiment of a dakini and Machandi accompanied her everywhere.

“The goddess you met is much older, from a time which historians still do not know too much about. She was the companion of Rama and his beautiful wife, Sita, after they retreated to the mountain forests. These are from times so old that people consider these stories as legends. There have been more than nine thousand years since, and it is only natural that major errors of interpretation of the reality of those times have occurred, errors that have been transmitted for millennia and through various civilizations up to the present time.

“The so called legend of Rama and Sita that Westerners know from the Hindu epic Ramayana is in fact very real. I can even tell you that certain events and facts that we have faced have a direct connection to those times. Machandi, who then lived at the terrestrial level in the very physical projection you witnessed, was a very young dakini who was devoted to that extraordinary divine couple. She could give you some very important details, but this depends upon you as it involves you progressing enough to become very close to the goddess. And, when you reach thislevel, there won’t be any need of her telling you anything as you will be capable of seeing and even ‘living’ those times yourself in the most real way imaginable.”

The thought that I could always remain by Machandi’s side was giving me wings.

“The main problem is that, through time, the impression was created that Rama and Sita left current day India and went west when, in fact, Rama actually ruled the present territory of your country,” the lama continued to explain. “Much more precise information I can give you is that his royal abode was in the area of Salaj County and that, for several years, he and Sita had a retreat in the mountain forests that was located exactly in the valley of the Apuseni Mountains that we passed through yesterday. There are not many differences from the landscape back then except that the vegetation was much taller. Those were times during which certain deities of the celestial planes were materializing in the physical plane and living for years amongst the people.”

Seeing the ever growing astonishment written all over my face, Repa Sundhi continued to tell me of the other extraordinary aspects of those long ago passed times.

“The level of consciousness of the population then living in the Carpathian area was very elevated. People were few and settled mostly in the valleys and on the mountain peaks. Their life was profoundly meditative; and back then, many events happened that today would be categorized as being amazing divine miracles. You must also know that the subtle impregnation of those times was so strong that it still has not completely vanished even today after more than nine thousand years. A fundamental energetic matrix was created then that will be actualized again in the near future as a result of certain laws of cycles.

“There is, of course, much more to say about that long gone era even if scientists affirm that it is just the result of a lavish fantasy. There are, however, some important proofs that some historians possess as well as some remarkable studies that certify the realities I am telling you about. Unfortunately, there are even more researchers who do not want the present idea and conception of how the world evolved to be modified. For them, this would be synonymous to a disaster, both financially as well as geopolitically. It is surprising though that, as far as I know, a very bitter battle against these realities has been fought by some of the historians and academics in your country. Nevertheless, everything will work in such a manner that the truth will soon be revealed.”

“Rama and Sita’s history is slightly more complicated than was described in the Ramayana although the essence of the message has remain unaltered. For example, the interventions and backstage fights of some of the advanced civilizations that existed then, as well as the unimaginable technology developed by them, have been described only sketchily and often in an allegorical manner. Even more, Machandi’s presence by Rama’s side, after the kidnapping of Sita by Ravana, was intentionally taken out of the story so that it did not create confusion regarding the chastity of the divine couple. Back then, Machandi had been a major contributor to Rama’s final victory, and she is also the one who saved Sita from a difficult situation during the last stage of the war which also involved three instances of atomic deflagration. This history, however, is nothing more than a series of stories in the eyes of modern science. We must not pay too much attention to their opinion on such matters as the ignorance and interests of modern researchers leads in other directions than the truth.

“In the area of the Apuseni Mountains where we were transported to Tibet, a space-time portal was created in those times that Rama often used to project himself to different places on the planet. All that was needed was for me to reactivate the energetic plane so that the effect appeared once more, and thus you met the goddess. Accumulating immense experience in manifestation, Machandi always evolved, and at present, she governs a big part of our galaxy and has a superior place in the hierarchy of celestial entities. I know this is almost incomprehensible for you right now, but after you become more familiarized with the particularities of the subtle worlds, you will understand this perspective much more easily.”

I was enraptured by the mysteries the lama was revealing and barely felt the coldness of the wind.

“But how is it possible for her to know all that happens in a gigantic volume of space and time?” I asked, overwhelmed by the thought of the amplitude of such a possibility.

Repa Sundhi explained patiently.

“You want to understand this aspect while still on the same level of logic and perception you have now. Consciousness, however, is multidimensional and it evolves over time. The ordinary human lives his life in segments: family, job, business, fun and many more. When he wants something and gets involved in that segment of life, he almost completely forgets about the other ones but they keep on existing. This approach is partial and very limited. The range of human emotions is supported by this very type of fragmented vision upon life that is at the basis of the false idea of who we really are. You erroneously identify with the specifics of one fragment of your life and then feel the need to attach yourself to it. This creates dependency which will turn into frustration. In turn, frustration will inevitably lead to suffering. It is a chain that man scrupulously ties himself to throughout his entire life.

“If you have a larger perspective, however, all aspects of your existence will be perceived as sequences correlated and linked at a causal level. Furthermore, from such a superior position, you will be able to understand all that surrounds you even if it does not involve you directly. This is the fundamental difference between an ordinary human and a sage. In the wise man’s case, the expansion of his consciousness can become gigantic whereby it then includes not only what exists within those limits but also makes him capable of directing at will any action or intervention within that space-time frame.

“I think you now understand quite well Machandi’s power of influence within the universe. In order to efficiently master and control a high level of manifestation, know that it is necessary that you are also on a superior level to the plane you want to control. A blind man will never be able to lead another blind man.”

I understood that condition very well, but I was not yet clear on the cause of the manifestation of our limited emotions that generate suffering. I also did not know the reason why man prefers to segment his life into different bands of interests and actions.

Repa Sundhi then clarified one of the most important aspects of our life.

“The main cause is the wrong idea that man gets about the diverse aspects of his life. Although everything changes and transforms around him every moment, he strongly believes that things and situations can remain the same: unchanged. But, if you analyze this concept profoundly, you will discover that it is completely unrealistic and even lacking logic. Nothing of what surrounds you or exists in Creation ever stays the same, but it always transforms in a continuous evolutionary movement. Can you honestly say that the relations you had stayed the same or that those you presently have will not change? Do you think that the wealth and material possessions that some people avidly gather represent something stable and eternal? By the opposite, in just one moment they can lose everything that they saved for their entire life. The psychological state is not any more stable. When criticized, man gets upset. When suffering any kind of loss, he gets angry. When he doesn’t have what he wants, he becomes jealous or envious. All these attitudes are nothing else but negative emotions that compel him to do certain actions. These get ‘imprinted’ in his personal karma and will generate big problems in his future lives.

“The wrong idea that things or situations are permanent and will never change is the very root of man’s suffering. As I was telling you, his vision upon this is completely unrealistic. The true drama is that, although confronted numerous times during his life with situations that refute this conception, he stubbornly persists with this idea. Imagining that nothing changes and what he gets in this life will last forever or will remain the same for him, at least while he’s alive, the more the man attaches himself to relationships, feelings, emotions, money, possessions or pleasures. Follow closely this psychological negative manifestation that is attachment. Through the very example given by your own life, you will understand very quickly that it creates expectations, claims and illusions within you. Most often, these are not fulfilled or satisfied and thus suffering appears which in turn generates certain negative thoughts. These will contribute to the negative karma of that respective person and so on, like in a vicious circle. Now you know the chain of man’s limitation within Creation. Break this chain and you will be free.”

I very well realized that this advice was the cornerstone of my spiritual evolution. It was not very clear to me though how I could eliminate the false idea of the permanence of things. I asked Repa Sundhi to enlighten me in regards to this, and he said the following.

“Everything that is around us and inside our being, no matter if we are talking about the physical organism or the mental and psychic processes, changes continuously but still appears as if it were constant and unchangeable. This is mainly due to our lack of attention on the one hand and to the mental denial of understanding this truth on the other. This is why people become sad or upset when their expectations are not met. Manifesting a will worthy of better things, they keep on persisting with the false idea that maybe things will stay the same, unchanged. In reality, their wild desire only expresses the strength of the attachment which makes them cling almost desperately onto what they imagine belongs to them and do not want to lose. It is clear that this is not possible as it was based on a completely false idea from the start. But, some people are so rooted in their attachments that, in order to keep them at any cost, they prefer to create certain types of ideals whose nature they do not really understand. These goals in life, whether they regard love, art or professional activity, are used only as a shield to hide – from themselves as well as others – their own attachments and possessiveness. However, this genuine psychological and mental “construction” is false and only serves to shadow even more the correct understanding that respective person should have of the nature of things within Creation.

“The only way of breaking this vicious cycle is to lucidly observe the real situation and understand its profound mechanisms. This careful analysis must be done during your daily activities when you are confronted with those very tendencies as well as in silence, when you are on your own, where you can meditate over your actions throughout the day which demonstrate the falsity of your conceptions. If you will perseveringly realize this, the roots of your attachments and inner convulsions will be gradually destroyed.

“Attachments that are kept for a long while transform into habits, meaning that they put down a solid foundation into a man’s psycho-mental structure. These are harder to remove in principle, but the method is the same. There are no miraculous pills or magic recipes to cure one of the serious disease that is attachment. You will need to make intensive efforts and support yourself with what you have in order to manage this. Everything a man has tied, he also has to untie.”

“OK,” I said. “Assuming I will behave in this manner, what will come out of it?”

Repa Sundhi smiled kindly.

“It is best for you to convince yourself. My explanations would be of no real use. It is important to understand, however, that once you get rid of the burden of attachments, the freedom of your spirit, mind and body will be incomparable with any other situation in life. This will then generate within you true happiness without object, meaning that it doesn’t depend upon something or someone in particular. You are simply happy because you exist, and everything around you exists simultaneously.

“A direct effect of this inner awareness will be the desire to altruistically help those who need support and to do only virtuous action. Of course, this does not guarantee that you won’t ever be faced with problems or states of suffering along the evolutionary and spiritual path that you are following. You must understand that these factors will keep on cropping up for a while due to the fact that the physical and psycho-mental structure is not yet purified; and certain karmic elements which are a consequence of the bad deeds of the past have yet to reach a stage where they must be balanced out. In such situations, your heart should not be gripped by despair and your spiritual practice should not be interrupted. More than ever, that is the time when you need to prove your willpower and perseverance because, as I already told you, everything is fleeting, even the karmic sufferings. Gradually, due to the positive transformations in your life and to the correct manner in which you think and act, these sufferings will diminish more and more and you will gain access to planes of consciousness much superior to the one you are on now.”

Having said that, Repa Sundhi stopped walking and signalled us too to do the same. I noticed that we were in the Tibetan rocky valley we had been translated to a while before. The lama then closed his eyes for a few moments while being very still. I was admiring his facial expression of profound focus and inner absorption. It was almost dark outside, but even so, the mountain peaks were mysteriously radiating a diffuse and phosphorescent purple color. All of a sudden, I felt overcome by a strange inner tremor that caused me a slight sensation of nausea. In great amazement, I then saw how the landscape seemed to have ‘curved’ at the extremities, like undulating waves. Then, we were suddenly inundated by strong sunlight in a clear sky. The translation had happened the other way around, and we were now back in the Apuseni Mountains, close to the great clearing at the top of the hill we had climbed. This time, however, Repa Sundi had achieved our projection directly and without resorting to the intermediary stages I had witnessed before. I noticed, however, that something didn’t seem quite right. I knew that the previous translation had happened in the afternoon and I expected that, after the four to five hours we had spent in Tibet, it would have been evening if not night time. Instead, I could see that it was a bright and warm November morning, and this confused me a bit. I remarked that it should be a totally different time of day.

“That’s what it would be if the time had passed according to your subjective impressions,” the lama answered. “Meeting Machandi, however, involved slight changes in the space-time continuum so what seemed like just a few hours to you, in reality, lasted much longer.”

“Seventeen and a half hours,” said Elinor, consulting his watch and calculating the time difference. “So, we have a twelve to thirteen hour discrepancy to objective time.”

I don’t know why, but I was delighted when I was confronted with the unusual phenomena involving the distortion of space and time. Nevertheless, I still asked Repa Sundhi if this had any secondary effect for the physical body. He explained that there are no dangers in this and that the ideas and assumptions of those in scientific circles are erroneous, mainly due to a lack of experience in the matter.

“The only effects that can manifest are psychic ones as the respective person can be perturbed by the total change in the reality he was used to and of the laws of physics he knew. But even this feeling is quickly dimmed by a very efficient self-adapting mechanism. Nonetheless, in the case of time travel, the issues are more complex.”

We soon arrived at the car where we had a light meal. Before starting out on our return journey, the yidam disappeared. Repa Sundhi, however, assured me that I would meet him again in a couple of days when we were to leave for another place in the mountains. As far as I understood, that was going to be an ampler action. The lama then gave me some more details, probably considering that I had by now achieved an important stage in the evolution of my capacity to understand.

“Goratri Mountain, which is mentioned in the prophecies of the great sage Padmasambhava, is in fact Godeanu Mountain, the present name being a natural transformation of the initial one through the past millennia. This mountain is very important in the local energetic balance and also keeps some secrets that will astound the world. Machandi picked that place for a reason.”

I was no longer surprised that the lama knew very well what I had talked about with the goddess; but I was very enthusiastic at the news that, in a short while, I would see her again in the mountains that she had spoken to me about. Repa Sundhi told me that we would travel there in a week's time. Until then, he had to dictate to me the translation of the text that was written on the parchment and sort out other aspects related to the trip. He told me that he first needed a few days to understand the text and the words written on the parchment which had been affected by the passing of time.

"It is an old Tibetan dialect which has not been spoken in centuries. I will have to consult certain secret sources of information," he explained.

We reached Bucharest that afternoon without any troubles, and we established that we would meet in four days time at Elinor's villa. I spent that time analyzing my recent experiences and trying at the same time to put into practice the teachings of Repa Sundhi and the goddess. In just a few days, I had seen, known and lived what can usually take years or even several successive lives. I have thus personally convinced myself of the validity of the saying that the year does not bring what the moment can. This was an extra clue for me that transformation will soon happen at all levels and everywhere around the world. Besides, that this is a generally known fact is also played down and trifled which diminishes the strength of the message and tends to shrink people's responsibilities in the matter. Things must be looked at objectively however. No one can deny the serious problems that humanity is currently faced with, but only few understand the hidden causes and their propagation mechanism. This is why people try to superficially solve the situation and forget the fact that their personal problems are the problems of Humankind and are reflected by it. Plus, there is the raging battle of certain occult organizations that are caught up in manipulating and controlling the population's ideas and tendencies which only complicates things even more.

I wanted to responsibly take upon myself a positive role in this fight where good and truth always triumph, and I was very happy that there are beings who can competently guide me in the right direction. That is why, when I met with Repa Sundhi in order to work on the translation of the Tibetan text, I was very resolute and decided to follow the path of spiritual accomplishment.

“It is very well to act like this,” said Repa Sundhi. “But do not forget that beforehand you must be firmly rooted in the knowledge of certain laws and fundamental principles of the Creation without which there cannot be any real progress or transformation of your being. There are many connoisseurs of the spiritual aspects, sacred texts and esoteric notions, but their knowledge is relatively dry as it is not doubled by a profound inner realization of what they know.”

I agreed with Repa Sundhi as I also knew that the power of words and the righteousness of actions come only from the practical realization of spiritual truths. Every step of spiritual progress is, in fact, a new superior level of understanding the universe and of being able to act efficiently at that specific level.

“The true spiritual teachings are gained with practice,” the lama continued to explain. “The process of learning is interactive and man perfects himself in the very moment he correctly applies all the knowledge he has gathered until then.”

Repa Sundhi then detailed some ways I could use to control my mental and emotional influxes and also offered me some advice regarding the principles of a healthy life and behavior. He insisted on the importance of applying this knowledge in daily activities as it is only then that they can truly contribute to our evolution as human beings.

“You must not analyze the spiritual books and texts only from an intellectual point of view,” he advised me. “It is much better to meditate a little every day upon the truths that are presented in them and then observe the reflections of those truths in your life. Some people get lost in ‘sophisticated’ analyses and sterile arguments that achieve nothing but the amplifying of their ego as so-called connoisseurs of the esoteric. In reality, they have reached a dead end; and in a way, get drunk on water thinking that they are valuable and even wise. They become arrogant and imagine that they are the only competent keepers of some occult secrets and knowledge, defying, more or less justified, any other opinion on the matter. Often, they even have wrong ideas or lack the understanding of important aspects of spirituality due to either a misinterpretation or the sources of information they consulted which are often incomplete or not genuine. Do not let yourself get caught in the net of such discussions that may seem savant as they will be to no avail. Those who claim to be ‘in the know’ or ‘men of letters’ often have more problems and character flaws than simple but honest people who have a pure heart. This is why — I repeat — it is very important to correctly apply the spiritual teachings in your daily life as only in this way will you progress and gradually eliminate your negative karma.”

In the three days left until our leaving, I translated the Tibetan text, deciphered by Repa Sundhi, from English. This was not an easy task as some technical terms had no equivalent in Romanian. They were already approximated in English but the lama particularly insisted that I convey in the translation, as much as possible, the spiritual nuances of those expressions. Painstakingly patient, the lama elucidated some profound significance to me by means of comparative examples and many other details so that I could understand exactly what the text refers to and reproduce it accordingly. Finally, I was satisfied with the end result and the fact that I had finalized an important first stage of my mission.

The seventh day after meeting Machandi, I left with Repa Sundhi and Elinor towards the Godeanu Mountain. This time, we started our journey in the afternoon as the lama said that it would be important to arrive there at night. I was starting to get used to such trips and was very happy that I was going to see Machandi again. The week that had just passed since my separation from her had basically been an extension of the emotions I had lived through in the Tibetan cave except that they were refined and much more profound.

I was aware that I had reached a certain stage of maturity and understanding with regard to the amazing experience I had been confronted with and the knowledge that had been shared with me. The last two weeks of my life had been like a tsunami with regard to my emotional knowledge and experience, but I felt like months had passed as I had assimilated a substantial baggage of spiritual information. The strange dilatation of time that I perceived was probably in connection with a subtle action of Repa Sundhi or maybe of the goddess, but I never raised the matter. It is also possible that my perception was due to an inner thoroughness and a penetration into the mysterious layers of self-consciousness that are beyond space and time. I will probably have knowledge of and an answer to this sometime in the future.

I felt well prepared and was anticipating with interest the events that were soon to follow. As usual, the lama did not offer too many details, simply saying that we would climb the peak of a very important mountain which is also a true energetic center of the country. He told me that the peak is called Gugu and that the goddess would manifest herself that night near that peak. Repa Sundhi also said that we would meet a group of people who would share the same destination as us.

“It will look like a mountain trip, but in reality, it will be a true initiation into the subtle worlds,” the lama said.

I did not say anything else, preferring to interiorize and thus prepare myself for that event.

When we eventually reached the foothills of the mountain, the night was falling. The weather was gorgeous, but the air was quite crisp. In the jeep, we climbed up a very uneven mountain road for quite a while. At a crossroads, Elinor parked the car and we started to walk up the slope in a perpendicular direction to the one we came from. As I felt myself getting close to the final goal of our journey (my meeting with Machandi), my mind was becoming more and more agitated and I became more and more impatient. I was trying to control myself but my exterior attitude did not fool Repa Sundhi.

“Your impatience can transform into disappointment. I am not saying this is how it is going to be but just raising a possibility. What will you do then? How will you solve the problem? Your mind will probably give you a series of explanations which will not convince you. You will then try to fill the emptiness in your soul with other thoughts or actions, but these will generate, in turn, new effects and more new effects beyond that. You will never see the end of it this way.”

I was walking slowly on a narrow path without making too much effort. As always, Repa Sundhi had perceived my inner state very well. I did not know what to say to him.

“You must cultivate your patience,” he then said. “It is a quality that very few people have as it involves great self-control and mental maturity. I think you realize, for example, that I am not talking about the patience needed to wait for your turn to pay at a cashier’s desk in a supermarket and also not the patience of waiting in line to buy tickets. I am referring to a much more profound attitude of a being which relates to the capacity of controlling certain negative tendencies and impulses. One of the main differences between an ordinary man and a sage is that while the first gives free rein, often without any discernment, to his chaotic and destructive inner tendencies that manifest noisily and even violently, the sage never behaves in this manner. With his balanced attitude, he often manages to calm down the terrible rages of those around him.”

“Well, the science of psychology says that you should let go of the inferior inner feelings as otherwise frustrations and tensions in the psycho-mental structure are going to appear,” I intervened before suddenly shutting up.

At a more profound level, I was starting to understand that something was not quite right with the conception I had just mentioned. I was thinking that if someone followed this method of “letting it all out,” there is no reason to believe that the person would ever reach the bottom. To the contrary, he will become accustomed to the states of fury and anger which by then would be considered natural and recommended and thus create dangerous karmic chains.

“Your reasoning is correct,” Repa Sundhi agreed, after I told him how I felt. “The manifestation of anger always attracts the manifestation of aggressiveness which can be more or less obvious. Modern psychology’s recipe is false as the ones who circulated it did not profoundly understand what happens at the subtle level of the mind when a man becomes angry or what the karmic consequences he attracts are every time he behaves like that.

“First of all, the lack of control makes him psychically vulnerable even if he then imagines that he crashes everything around him, thus showing strength, domination and power. This is an infantile and egotistical idea. In reality, the furious one unconsciously perceives his weakness, and this is exactly why he tries to make up that deficit with a false impetus. You know very well that such people forget themselves and everything surrounding them while living those moments of fury and become totally absorbed in the destructive state that's overcoming them. They then almost completely lose their lucidity and the logic of their thoughts, not wanting anything else but to impose their own point of view at any cost. This maleficent energy pushes a human being to commit evil deeds; and even if he manages to somehow control himself and not act in this way, unleashed fury can annihilate all the effort that has been made up to that point to control those chaotic states that trouble the mind and the organism. As you can see, it is all a matter of control."

"And to learn how to achieve this control needs a lot of patience and perseverance," I said. "For example, it is clear that if the fury is controlled then the speech and ways of acting will be controlled, too. But you have to know that I wasn't furious at all. I was becoming anxious and feverish in my desire to see Machandi again."

"I know this very well," the lama answered. "I was just suggesting a possible subject of meditation that can be applied in any situation. For example, you could understand from it that patience is closely related to a constant effort. Of course, I am referring to elevated aspects of effort, not necessarily to that of a physical nature. So, I mean the effort of being persevering, the effort of unselfishly helping others and so on. And no matter how strange it may seem, the greatest effort is the one of firmly rooting yourself in meditation."

I admitted to Repa Sundhi that he had hit the spot.

"Yes, there's a problem here," I said. "I tried to do this as well as I possibly could, but it is very difficult. Some people have even told me that they would get bored to death by staying still in the same place for more than a few minutes. I confess that this inhibited me somehow."

"Those who think like the people you mention have a weak and very agitated mind. Don't pay them too much attention as they do not know much of these mysteries. Do not let yourself be influenced by such as otherwise you will always fall into the temptation of taking the easy but descendant path of the ignorant ones. If you are firm in your decision, you will never fail to make progress. While others will struggle with all kinds of problems and sufferings, you will gradually become almost intangible to such difficulties as you will be putting your life in order and balancing your destiny through your positive actions.”

“What do you call a positive action?” I asked. “I mean, except for the virtues known to all, I am asking you so as to know if, for example, daily meditation is a positive action. If that is the case, please explain why.”

I was paying very close attention to what the lama was telling me.

“Many consider meditation to be a waste of time. Even more, in their never ending stupidity, some associate it with mental alienation or brain washing. In reality, meditation – the same as prayer – is an absolutely necessary aid in order to come away from the surrounding world’s agitation and to find yourself in an infinitely expanded state in which the universe you are in now is only a very small part. This is why, when correctly done, meditation practically becomes the most positive and efficient of all actions as it ‘adjusts’ the existential asperities and makes you profoundly understand life’s complicated aspects. Those who do not know this and do not bother to look at things from this perspective live chaotically and at the mercy of fate. After all, meditation allows you to control your destiny. The habit of daily meditation is the only one that the mind needs. All other habits must be eliminated as they create attachments.”

It was already night time and we were going up at a steady pace through small boulders and rocks. Paying attention to Repa Sundhi’s explanations, I looked down as I walked. When I raised my eyes, I had the pleasant surprise of noticing the yidam who had probably joined us a while ago. He was a few meters in front of us and was guiding us in the right direction. I could see his giant stature perfectly outlined in the moonlight, climbing tirelessly towards the stony peak of the mountain.

Looking a bit ahead and over the yidam’s shoulder, I thought I saw a few people gathered together and sitting on the ground. At first, I thought I was wrong; but after only a few meters of walking faster in order to check this out, I convinced myself that there was a group of people waiting in silence. I mentioned this to Repa Sundhi, and he said that he knew about those people, adding that they would accompany us on our way to the top.

We reached the group, and I was surprised to see that it was made up of only young boys and girls. In my estimation, they were all between twenty and twenty-five years old. Being close to them, I notice that all of them were beautiful, well built and harmonious. I immediately realized that they were special beings and much more mature than their age. As we got closer, they got up, looking at us inquisitively.

“Each of them has, in one way or another, subtle karmic connections to these places and have achieved special merits in their previous existences,” Repa Sundhi whispered to me while Elinor assured them that we were the ones they were expecting and asked them to also follow us. “Their minds and psyches are ready for the events to come, and they themselves will play an important role in the amazing transformations of this nation. Their presence here is due to successive initiations they have received from Machandi during dreams. She is the one who told them the time and place to come, but in order to convince them, she had to appear in their dreams several times. Such actions are rare but very important.”

I counted nineteen people. They were climbing after us in small groups and rarely talked amongst themselves, and when they did, it was monosyllabic. Something was not right, however, as the yidam’s presence did not provoke any reaction from them. I was then struck by the thought that while I could still see it, the yidam was invisible to those youths. Repa Sundhi had explained how this could work the very day I met him at Elinor’s. Whispering my thought to him, he confirmed it.

“It was not the time or place for them to have this experience with the yidam. It would have troubled them too much. For the initiation that is about to occur, they need to keep a certain state of calm and inner balance.”

I was pleasantly surprised by the state of unity manifested by that group, especially as its members did not know each other beforehand. I perceived them as very responsible in regards to their mission. They were serious and dedicated to succeeding although none of them knew what was to come. While I was thinking about this, I noticed a narrow column of diffuse white light through some trees that we were passing. This column of light went from the ground to the starry sky. I lit the area up with my flashlight as it was only six to seven meters away, but I could not see anything out of the ordinary. I left the group and quickly covered that distance in order to investigate the phenomena. It was very strange. The column of light, no bigger than five centimeters in diameter, was coming out of the ground and going towards the sky. As it was diffused and of weak intensity, it could pass unnoticed from far away. Straining my eyes, I then saw that there were many more other luminous columns that were higher up on the mountain towards our left.

I caught up with Repa Sundhi and told him about the strange manifestation. He said that peak Gugu hides many mysteries, thousands of years old, and that they will be partly discovered very soon. The lama confessed that there is a formidable source of energy in the underground of that mountain but did not want to give any other details. I instinctively looked towards the peak, and at that exact moment, a very cold and strong wind hit us from the front and made us wobble. We stopped for a moment; but Elinor, who knew the area, explained that such sudden “out of the blue” manifestations are a characteristic of this mountain. Nonetheless, I was a bit uncomfortable as the cold air current seemed to have brought something else as well, something threatening and unpleasant. Looking again into the darkness above the peak, I was dumbfounded to notice how rapidly it had been covered in black with threatening clouds now rolling in with a dull and distant rumble.

The next moments and the phenomena associated with them occurred in my consciousness progressively but at a slower rate of perception than what is considered normal. I then perceived everything from a state of “suspension” without being able to explain the sudden way everything appeared.

While I was rather worriedly watching the sky that was quickly being covered and foretold of a terrible storm, I was shocked by the extremely powerful lighting that came from the rolling clouds and hit the very top of the mountain’s peak. The noise was stunning, shaking our very being.

From that moment on, I saw everything unfold slowly and very precisely. Each sense was sharpened to the maximum and the sensations I felt were very intense. I saw the blinding brightness of the giant lighting spread all the way down the mountain; and even further away, a violet and purple flow that was creating a strange unearthly impression. In the same moment, I saw, a little to our right and higher up, a sheepfold with animals nervously moving around in their enclosure. But what really frightened me as I looked at that almost unreal landscape were three giant sheep dogs that were ferociously coming towards us in huge leaps. Those animals were unusually big and fierce, and their enormous fangs seemed to flash in a demonic grin. What made the deepest impression upon me were the extraordinary leaps they were taking. These leaps were impossible even for a gazelle. Even more, the height they reached while in the air was inconceivable for guard dogs no matter how well trained. I had no illusions regarding the intentions of those frightening apparitions, but the slow motion unfolding of their movements, as I perceived it within my consciousness, allowed me to pay attention to the other members of the group before being overtaken by sheer panic.

I watched Repa Sundhi who was still and facing towards the peak. He seemed to be completely extracted from that landscape and focused in a different direction. Elinor was slowly straightening himself and turning his head towards the advancing dogs. At that point, the yidam took a step sideways in the direction they were coming from and stretched his right hand with an open palm in a gesture of stopping the action. I saw how the air around him started to sparkle as it radiated a phosphorescent white light. Gigantic and terrible in his looks, he would have frightened anyone.

The dogs stopped rather suddenly, but they continued to bark wildly from a distance of some fifty meters from us. They were thrashing and squirming but could not go beyond that fifty meter limit. The brightness of the light was diminishing gradually now and creating strange shadows in the valley. When darkness surrounded us once more, I could not see anything. Even so, I could just about make out what could be the sheepfold higher up the mountain. A heavy silence had come down, interrupted only at times by the thunder rumbling from far away.

I then became aware that I had returned to the normal perception of the events around me. While we kept on going up the mountain, I came closer to Repa Sundhi and told him in short what I had witnessed just moments before. He answered that my perception had been mainly at a subtle level. The fierce dogs were in fact embodiments of astral demonic entities who wanted to attack us and provoke an intense state of fear in order to stop the normal unfolding of the initiation that was going to happen that night. In physical reality, however, the nineteen youngsters did not see or hear anything except the terrible lighting that fell upon the Gugu peak. The lama revealed that I was capable of having those perceptions through the grace of the goddess Machandi who was going to reveal herself very soon.

Meanwhile, our group reached an area where the slope became much more abrupt and rocky. The sky was now completely covered in thick clouds, often pierced by lightning that partially brightened the landscape. The atmosphere was very charged with electricity and the tension in the air was almost tangible. The sky looked like a pot ready to boil over. Two giant lightning bolts hit the mountain slope signalling the unleashing of a great storm. The rain started to fall in heavy waves while the wind raged wildly, spraying raindrops in all directions.

I was then witness to an extraordinary phenomenon. Our whole group was draped in a sort of light that covered and completely isolated us from the terrible atmospheric phenomena that we were surrounded by. The lightning intensified and hit the ground very close to us. I saw blasts of rain stopping at the limit of the diffused light that was enveloping us as in a protective shell.

At Repa Sundhi's direction, we all sat down. I then had an intuition that our protection was created by the yidam who was sheltering us from nature's wrath. I could see around me an almost unbelievable manifestation of atmospheric force and energy. Shrubs were flying through the air, water whirls were fiercely hitting the trees, and there was terrible lighting that was triggering apocalyptic thunders.

In the middle of all of this frightening chaos, I noticed in amazement how the stone of the mountain in front of us, which was at a distance of approximately twenty meters, was gradually becoming transparent, revealing a great cave inside the peak. Surrounded by a magnificently bright aura, Machandi advanced from inside of the cave to the stone wall and outside of it. My heart almost stopped with all the emotions I felt. The radiation of the goddess was now much stronger than when I perceived it in the sacred cave in Tibet's mountains. Her glorious brightness seemed to cancel the storm outside. The thunder was weaker, the lightning was less and the wind seemed to have vanished, all bowing to the phenomenal greatness that Machandi was manifesting. From her sublime body, rays of multicolored light were radiating like a rainbow, glittering brightly in all directions.

That divine vision shocked us all. None of us were capable of talking anymore, having been left ecstatic and breathless in front of that wonderful apparition of the goddess. Even I, who had some experience with this sort of thing, was really overwhelmed by the intensity of it all. Her beauty and divine grace created within my heart an intensity of happiness that I could barely stand. A few of the boys and girls in the group fell to the ground crying. I was still, blind, and deaf to everything around me, keeping my eyes only on Machandi. The only thing I wished for was to be closer to her and to accompany her in the world she was coming from.

I then noticed that the goddess was not advancing by stepping on the ground but by staying in the air with a majestic grace. Due to the difference in height between the cave and ground level, she was in a plane above our heads as she stopped at approximately ten meters away from our group. Had she come any closer, she would probably have blinded us with the brightness she emanated. As she lifted her hands at shoulder level with her palms facing upwards, I could see how the clouds above us were breaking to reveal a luminous circle that gradually grew in diameter until it took up almost a third of the sky. It was like a cut-out in the storm clouds which were threateningly tethered around it. A slightly pink-tinged white light was emanating from that area as it lit up the clouds and created grandiose effects of an overwhelming realism. Like in a sublime dream, I then saw a magical light coming down which covered us and the ground around us.

There were rays of light with dozens of astral entities rapidly approaching our group, entities whose diaphanous forms were the perfect embodiment of purity and beauty. The spectacle we were witnessing was even more extraordinary as all around us the forces of nature were unleashed and raging and created a very stark contrast. The entities seemed to ignore the storm. They too were emanating an intense light but of different colors and nuances than Machandi's.

Stunned, I was watching those entities with their human forms as they stopped in the air higher than Machandi and floated around us. Their smiling happy faces were radiating an unequalled happiness. I noticed that some of them had such bright faces that, instead of regular features, I could only see an oval of white light. Between their forms was a continuously perceivable play of multicolored lights that offered a special dynamism to the whole picture. Machandi, however, emanated the brightest light. Her magnificent brilliance radiated up to the open cave in the mountain and into much of the surroundings.

I heard her extra-special voice pierce my mind with great clarity. I looked at the goddess, but she was not moving her lips. It was a telepathic transmission, but it did not differ in any way from how I perceived her when I could hear her talking. In some respect, I could even say that the experience was now much stronger and more nuanced. I then intuitively knew that the goddess was simultaneously addressing the other nineteen people in the group in the same way and understood that each of us was receiving a message adapted to our own personality and specific individualities. Machandi offered us precious teachings about humanity and the way we need to act in order to be completely successful in our missions.

As far as I was concerned, her message was full of grace and delicacy, but I cannot reveal its content at this time which refers to some events I will be involved in during the near future. The effect of the éclat she was emanating was overwhelming and once more I felt I couldn't resist it due to the fact that my breathing was involuntarily stopping. I closed my eyes and abandoned myself completely. In that moment, the goddess looked beautiful beyond description as she came closer and closer to me. This time, I managed to cope with the brightness she irradiated, but I could not make any move.

Machandi came very close to me, just as she had in the sacred cave of Tibet. She placed her hand on the top of my head and kept it there. I felt shaken from the foundations of my being and slid into the void. I had no support or marks I could guide myself with. Everything around me seemed empty, save for the fact that emptiness was pulsating in an indefinite and mysterious way. The only thing I could do in that state was to contemplate the never-ending nothingness that surrounded me. Wherever I looked, I could see only an immense limitless void. That contemplation, in which I was completely immersed, was transcending any level of conceptual thinking. Even the intense thought of Machandi's presence had vanished, being integrated into the gigantic emptiness I was in. The words I am looking for now to describe that state seem insignificant. In the middle of that void emanating from me, I suddenly felt enveloped in an unequalled happiness that was continuously flowing, greater and greater, through my heart. Then, the horizon of my consciousness faded, but not before I felt like I had touched eternity.

When I came back and opened my eyes, I saw Elinor and Repa Sundhi not far away from me. They were whispering. I looked around, but there was no one else there. Machandi had vanished, the mountain wall was opaque once more, and the group of young people had left. On the horizon, I could see the dawn of a new day lighting a perfectly clear and pure sky. No trace of clouds, rain or wind was left. If the ground and stone were not wet, I could have sworn that there had been no storm a few hours before. Only the place that had been subtly protected by the yidam and where I had remained was dry and unaffected by the wrath I had witnessed not long ago. The air was cold but I could not feel it. I got up and approached Elinor and Repa Sundhi. I was walking slowly as if coming from another world.

“Machandi asked me not to disturb you from your meditative state,” the lama said, addressing me. “In the meantime, the others left. You were still and profoundly absorbed for more than seven hours, but this very special experience you have lived through will have a great importance in your spiritual evolution.”

I did not say anything. Everything seemed relatively remote and Repa Sundhi’s words were barely piercing my mind. We unhurriedly gathered the few possessions we had brought there and then started to go down the mountain.

On the horizon, the red disc of the sun was gradually appearing and lighting our path back to the world...

THE END

Epilogue — by Radu Cinamar

My American editor suggested I write a short epilogue to the second volume in the series which ended quite suddenly. Without doubt, the way I ended the book was due to my psychic, mental and spiritual state that I felt after meeting with the goddess Machandi and the initiation received on the mountain. Many weeks passed in which I felt like I was floating in a reality situated on the edge of a dream and wakefulness, desiring with intensity to meet again with the goddess, but it did not happen.

Elinor left the country, and I remained in his elegant villa amongst the memories of his and Repa Sundhi's presence. After I calmed myself, I began to methodically analyze the amazing events I had experienced and the precious information I had received in the last few weeks. I deeply thought about these things and gradually started to meditate while surrounded by the peace and quietness of the superb villa. No matter how hard I tried to focus on these aspects, however, the luminous image of the goddess Machandi always appeared in front of my eyes, flooding my mind and inner experience with a happiness an ordinary man cannot easily understand.

The living universe of most people is relatively minuscule compared to the vastness of the subtle planes of manifestation and the great presence of the entities that exist there. Modern man lives, generally speaking, on the principles of fear and desire which are expressed in a very narrow sense, usually with reference to his immediate physical needs. There is therefore a huge disparity between his concept about the world and reality as it truly is.

I cannot really understand the “mechanism” of my destiny nor can I intuit the hidden nature of the plan which determines events from the recent period of my life. What I do know with a great certainty, however, is that they overwhelmed me with their intensity and revelation of some genuine realities. Looking back on that period of time with much detachment and understanding, I now realize the anxiety and exaltation of the soul I felt in my entire being. These then became the premise of some unexpected changes of situation and changes which radically modified the way of life I had lived up to that point. Nothing from all that has happened in the years that followed however was without the fundamental support of spirituality. My specific activities in the present imply such a thing too as these matters are at the limits of knowledge of modern science. It is a territory on the boundary of the unknown.

Finally, after a long period of time, I met with Repa Sundhi again, but this time he was accompanied by Shin Li, his charming assistant. This meeting also brought to a close my mission which had been outlined by the goddess Machandi: the translation and final editing of the secret parchment.

Many readers feel like they are being blessed when they read my books because they intuitively perceive, through the unknown spring of their hearts and souls, that the things I have exposed are true and come from an authentic source. Others, however, are filled with doubt, superficial thoughts, and by an inexplicable malice of disbelief regarding what is written here. Personally, I do not care if people believe or not what I write in my books because I know very well that the message arrives exactly where it is meant to.

The teachings I have received from Cezar, Dr. Xien and Elinor were really like true spiritual jewels that radically transformed my existence. They dovetailed extraordinarily with certain facts and events from the physical plane which were often unbelievable in their description. Readers insistently request “proof,” either forgetting or not realizing that such an idea is quite comical in the present situation! First, they forget that my revelations do not at all represent a public “business” and that I am nothing other than a cog in an immense gear which through an extraordinary series of events has allowed me to publish these books. In volumes three and four, I have explained some of these aspects and circumstances. Even so, I see the need to reiterate that these books are only for those who have open hearts and minds.

Part Two — by Peter Moon

Chapter One — Recoil

If you are walking the earth and have just finished reading Radu's incredible tale, the chances are that you have been exposed to some startling new information which has challenged the way you think. Having said that, most of the information Radu relayed was not really new. It is quite ancient. What is new or novel, however, is his experience, particularly when you juxtapose it with modern humans. In other words, most modern humans are not privy to such information or exposed to similar experiences. Just as it was alluded to in the book, they are not particularly evolved nor are they inclined to be in sync with the information presented in this book. The whole idea of this book, however, is based upon the proposition that this will change.

Based upon the feedback I have received thus far, most readers have responded positively to Radu's book. There is also a minority who have issues. Some are not comfortable with the way Radu expresses himself. In "Transylvanian Sunrise," Radu stated very clearly why he wrote the book the way he did. It was to tell the story as succinctly as possible and get the information out. He has done a great job, and I personally have no trouble understanding him. As far as Romanians go, Radu speaks very good English. I believe, however, that the reason some are uncomfortable with his writing is that it takes them out of their comfort zone. It challenges you to look at things in a way that you might not otherwise consider. Besides that, it is written from someone who comes from a different culture.

Many Americans are ethnocentric to the point where they are not really conscious of the living and breathing nature of other cultures. Although Radu speaks English well, some people do not really grasp that he is Romanian and although Romanians have had much exposure to American culture through media, they think, feel, act, and have cultural habits that are distinctly Romanian. I have done my best to bridge the gap with regard to idioms and phrases. It is beneficial to anyone reading this book to extrovert themselves beyond their ordinary horizons and realize that you are getting perspective from someone who is from a different culture and someone that you are very lucky to be hearing from at all. Also keep in mind that he is getting his focus from a Tibetan who is getting his focus from a member of the Blue Race. There is a plethora of different cultures and esoteric threads at work.

For those who either like the book or can surpass their judgmental tendencies, there is also the factor of emotional response. All of the books I have written or published are inclined to trigger significant or deep emotional responses in people. That is simply because the subject matter is interesting and meaningful in a way that other literature too often is not. Emotions are defined both as a mental state and also as feelings. They have everything to do with your motor functions in the brain and how you behave, act or respond. Keep in mind that the word motion is a part of the word emotion. This book triggers emotions because it is putting forth the prospect that you might be able to feel a whole lot better than you ever thought about feeling and just maybe there is a bigger answer to all of the little answers.

There are, of course, those who respond with enmity. Radu said that while many feel blessed to read his books, there are others who are “filled with doubt, superficial thoughts, and by an inexplicable malice of disbelief regarding what is written here.”

It is one thing to dispute information, question it or doubt it. These are understandable responses. Malice or vindictiveness, however, is an entirely different matter. It is the intent to cause harm or injury. There is also a band of emotion which is not quite as harsh as malice and that is bitterness or resentment (expressed or unexpressed).

If anyone has questions or doubts about the material, that is routine and can be addressed. Those who have feelings of malice or bitterness towards Radu or his information, however, are not much different than the fanged sheep dogs he referred to in Chapter 4 that were trying to stop his meeting with Machandi. In other words, such people have something within their psyche that has become an agent of the forces which are opposed to the ideas presented in this book.

It is widely accepted that human beings are very limited in their comprehension of the universe and even the mysteries of how their own brain operates. When someone else comes from outside of their normal reference frame, however, and either presents the truth or even a model of the truth, it has a tendency to create a visceral reaction in homo sapiens. After all, Elinor presents ideas in his discourses that make the average man look like a clueless fool in the world scheme. What Repa Sundhi and Machandi reveal only add to this proposition. Although people know very well that they do not have the entire cosmos figured out, they can sure get upset when their systemized thinking about it is shown to have some gaping holes in it.

Radu's story suggests that we are at a point in world history where macrocosmic changes in consciousness will occur in the near future and critical thinking will be valued at a premium. In his book, he has presented ideas and discourse. There is no enforcement of the truth. It is only his story based upon his experiences and should be digested as such.

I will now address some of my impressions and experiences with regard to the circumstances surrounding this book, Radu, and my own personal adventures in Romania.

Chapter 2 — The Sacred Journey

As I have clearly alluded to already, there are strange reactions to Radu's work. Some are concerned that it is all a mind control operation or perhaps that I have become mind controlled in the process. This is almost very funny. What happens is that people read information that overwhelms their own thinking process, and they begin manifesting mind control behavior themselves. This is typical as most of the world has long been subject to mind influence if not outright mind control.

In actual fact, Radu's first manuscript sat in my office for some four years before I could complete reading it. Even though I enjoyed it, I was still suspicious with regard to whether it would be economically viable to publish it. Most people do not realize that the internet and other factors have reduced the publishing world to a fraction of what it used to be. In 1992, when I entered this business, there was a burgeoning industry with regard to metaphysical and occult books. Almost all of the companies from that time period are long gone. There is currently only one distributor left from that genre, and they are only a fraction of their former operation. I also have mainstream distribution channels but even they are reduced from the good old days. In any event, the main point here is that one has to be very careful when they publish anything. Even though Radu's book offers great entertainment value, there was no guarantee of instant cash or even that the book would generate significant interest. The merits of any given book do not always determine its success.

Once I got over the hurdle of actually publishing the book, I was eager to read the sequel. It actually took me years to acquire permission and a translation, so please understand that no one was forcing me or unduly influencing me. To be honest, getting the permission and translation was more akin to pulling teeth. I had written to my Romanian publisher to secure a deal but never heard back. Eventually, I received an email a year later telling me that my emails had ended up in the spam folder. It would take several months to work this out and it culminated with an in-person visit in Romania. While this meeting is not a part of the narrative you are about to read, it is significant to keep in mind that it happened in the context of other important events which embrace the cutting edge of technology on this planet.

Upon my initial reading of “Transylvanian Sunrise,” I began negotiating with the publisher to secure publishing rights in the English language. This took several months. As soon as we came to an agreement, I was contacted formally by Dr. David Anderson* of the former Time Travel Research Center for the first time in five years. He was inviting me to Romania. The timing of these two events was extraordinary and did not go unnoticed by me. As synchronicity is the hallmark of my writing career, I thought that the two events must be connected. I was particularly struck by the fact that when I had last met with David, he had said that he would not be able to work with me for another five years. It was now five years to the month and he had popped into my life again.

* Dr. David Anderson is a mysterious scientist who has studied and discovered time control technologies that have real world applications. I have written about the history of this elsewhere, including the book “Transylvanian Sunrise” and in several issues of the “Montauk Pulse” newsletter which is issued quarterly by Sky Books and has been in publication since 1993. Dr. Anderson once owned the Time Travel Research Center located in an industrial park on Long Island. In the last few years, he has launched Anderson Multinational and the Anderson Institute which has reacquired and extrapolated upon the time control technologies once extant on Long Island. Key aspects of his technology are discussed in Appendix A and Appendix B of this book.

When I finally got to speak with David again, it was on the phone and we talked for an hour, mostly about scheduling and logistics for what would be my first trip to Romania. When I took the opportunity to ask him if he knew Radu Cinamar, David demurred and said we would speak about that when I got to Romania. He did acknowledge that he knew who I was talking about. When I asked if I could have a meeting with Radu, David seemed to think that would be possible and said he would have his people contact him. After such an encouraging response, I assumed that I would be learning many more mysteries about the hidden knowledge beneath the Romanian Sphinx as well as David’s operations. There appeared to be some intriguing connections that would now be revealed. As those of you who have read “Transylvanian Sunrise” already know, this was not the case. I learned very little during my first visit to Romania.

Due to professional commitments with business associates, David had to remain silent for the time being. Other than telling me about what would be the future launching of Anderson Multinational, pretty much all he told me was that people had told him that he knows Radu. This tidbit of information was prompted by the fact that my Romanian publisher, Sorin Hurmuz, had visited me and delivered an audio CD from Radu that was specifically for me. At the end of the CD, however, Radu said to keep it silent but that I could share it with David Anderson who he would also like to meet. Apparently, Radu did not know David, but David seemed to think otherwise. This was a great mystery that would not solve for quite a while.

After “Transylvanian Sunrise” was finally published in the Spring of 2009, I returned to Romania in order to participate in the Atlantykron Conference which is sponsored by David’s charitable organization called the World Genesis Foundation. This time, David was lecturing on time control technologies in a way that he never had before. He had me participate in his lectures and we dedicated one block of time to me talking about nothing else other than the events in “Transylvanian Sunrise.” While that book has sold many copies in Romania and has enjoyed a significant degree of popularity, most Romanians that I encountered had never read the book. Some had heard about it or the circumstances surrounding the events in the book but only one person I met had actually read it. Ironically, his name was Radu, but he was not Radu Cinamar.

Most of what David lectured on is now available on his website www.andersoninstitute.com. The most important point of what he had to say was regarding a concept in math which is known as the invariance of the space-time interval. This is a mathematical formula in conventional mathematics, but its implications are not well understood in scientific circles. If properly understood, it demonstrates that time is convertible to distance. If you read most definitions of the word time, they will clearly state that time is not defined in terms of space or distance. This ends up confusing the subject of time because it steers the way scientists have been taught. David tries to teach the value of looking at other points of view and thinking in ways that are outside of the box.

This particular year, David had plenty of time to answer my questions and graciously spent over an hour personally tutoring me on the invariance of the space-time interval. He was disappointed that most of the students did not seem to be grasping it but was happy that I did. In fact, he said that there were only about four physicists in the world at that time who really understood it. With David's blessings, I wrote an article for the Fall 2009 edition of the "Montauk Pulse" which makes it even simpler to understand. I have added it to this book as Appendix A if you are interested and are not intimidated by the Pythagorean Theorem which is relatively easy to understand if you can grasp elementary geometry and algebra. The primary point is that once you can convert time to distance, all equations with regard to time can be converted into algebra. This is the entry point to understanding the mathematics behind time control technologies. This, in turn, leads to time travel itself.

At the end of the Atlantykron Conference, David told me that he would be making some big announcements towards the end of the year. He also said that he would visit me on Long Island in the next few months.

As soon as I finished at Atlantykron that same year, I was slated to go on another journey and this would be to the spiritual and cultural capital of ancient Transylvania: Sarmizegetusa. This is a carefully laid out assortment of stone and wood that goes back to the ancient Dacians who had bloody wars with the Romans around the First Century whereupon their culture was mostly wiped out. On my first trip to Atlantykron, I was advised by the professors and esoteric people that I should make it my business to visit the ancient capital.

I was very lucky to be accompanied by a lovely young girl, Nicole Vasilcovschi, who would act as my companion and tour guide. I had met Nicole the previous year shortly after I had arrived. She came up to me and gave me a big hug. This is not a typical Romanian greeting to a stranger, but Nicole told me that she recognized my spirit and saw that she would learn many things from me. As she was an important part of the journey, I will say a few things about her.

Nicole is a member of the Romanian Orthodox Church, and this affiliation has a lot to do with a dream she had when she was six years old. Jesus embraced her as light filled into her crown chakra as she spun around. After that experience, she could miraculously read the Bible. Not knowing exactly how to respond to Nicole's experience, her parents sent her to church where she has practiced the Orthodox faith ever since.

Nicole is an author who has written books on economics and has had several books of poetry published as well. As I write this, she is completing the last year of a PhD in International Business and Diplomacy. She speaks several languages and will probably become a career diplomat.

This year, before our trip to Transylvania, Nicole and I met with one of David's friends at Atlantykron who is psychic and very knowledgeable about esoteric matters. She prefers to remain nameless and does not speak English so Nicole translated for me. She told us that Romanian is a coded language and that it is the original language from which Latin was derived, not the other way around as is commonly thought by Westerners. This lady told us that we should expect to have profound experiences at Sarmizegetusa, but that it is best to spend three days there for a full experience. We were also told that it is the journey itself to Sarmizegetusa that is so important. It is literally a pilgrimage. Even so, I was no pilgrim in any conventional sense as I had no preconceived ideas or religious convictions.

The most exalted god of the ancient Dacians was Xalmoxis, a name which means "leaping god" because he is said to have transformed himself into a god from the human state. According to the Greek historian Herodotus, Xalmoxis was a disciple and servant of Pythagoras and transformed himself into a god after which he came back to his home country, the land which is now Transylvania, and created a spiritual tradition of which Sarmizegetusa was the capital. If you study a little deeper, you will discover that Xalmoxis, or at least another character of the same name, existed long before Pythagoras and that Sarmizegetusa is much older as well. Further, the moxis in Xalmoxis equates to the name Moses. It is also part of historical legend that Xalmoxis taught the Egyptians their ancient knowledge and literally spearheaded that ancient civilization. This vestigial remnant of history took on a little more meaning for me when I found out that the city of Sinaia, the first city I was taken to in Romania in 2008 and which is not too far from the Sphinx, means Sinai, the same locale where Moses experienced communion with his master. The more I have learned about the history, anthropology and archeology of Eastern Europe, the more apparent it is that key components of the Egyptian civilization originated from this area.

In any event, Nicole and I set out on our magical journey on the day we left Atlantykron. We were accompanied by Cristina Balin from Nicole's home town of Suceava which is in northern Romania. Like Nicole, Cristina is highly intelligent. She speaks even better English as she has spent significant time in the United States. She was studying to be a dentist at that time and should have her degree by now.

If the journey itself to Sarmizegetusa was the key component of the experience, we were confronted with this aspect right away. The first part of our journey required great patience. We had to wait some six hours for our initial train to depart. Once we did that, we had to change trains and seats on those trains frequently. Cristina and I got about two hours of sleep as we rode the train the entire night. Nicole stayed up the whole time.

At the outset of our trip, we attempted to offset the arduous journey by creating a film about it. Cristina was to be a spy from Department Zero who met us at the train station and asked if she could travel with us for safety reasons. This created some very interesting dynamics and story lines with Nicole acting stranger and stranger as we got to Transylvania. Most of the footage I took is unfortunately unusable as the sound of the train makes the audio challenging. In any event, it was fun.

It is important to stress the arduousness of the journey for any of you who might care to take it. I know there are people who follows the traces I leave in books and any adventurers should not take what I say lightly. In the wee hours of the morning, sometime after midnight, the train stopped in the middle of nowhere. There was a lot of chattering by the passengers in Romanian as to what we would do next. There was no conductor to tell you anything. Nicole heard from others that we would have to get off the train and catch another one down the railroad track.

I was standing near the edge of the exit and someone said to jump. There were no stairs but only a ladder that was not too encouraging as it did not extend very far down from the rail car which was over three feet from the ground. I jumped on to the rocks that surrounded the tracks below and wondered what in the hell was going on. The girls handed me all of our luggage and then I helped them down. Then everyone else got off of the train and down the precarious ladder. I am pretty tall so the jump was not too bad, but there were old ladies on that train. I had to be first for some reason. After we got off, everyone helped each other. That was the easy part. We then redistributed our luggage amongst ourselves so that we could each carry the proper weight for our size and ran over large rocky gravel to catch the next train. I, of course, had the most weight. It was a very long “run” as there was not time to walk leisurely. If the weight was too much to carry, the rocks underneath were equally uncomfortable.

After another train ride, we had to take a similar excursion and switch seats on the same train. On the last leg of our journey into Transylvania itself, we had to stand in the covered back of the car and outside of the main cabin as it was full. Finally, when we arrived in Transylvania, we arrived at an old and apparently deserted train station at about 4:00 a.m.. This was not encouraging. There were several other passengers and one of them said something. Nicole pointed to an empty and desolate looking train and said that it was our train. This was odd as there were no lights or sign of any other life. It was so much like the driverless carriage in the movie Dracula that I could not help but laugh. The seen was so odd and eerie that when I pointed this out to the girls, they laughed too.

We entered the dark train and waited in the mysterious quiet. Our exhaustion was tempered by the mystery of what we would experience next. A conductor came down the aisle and stood next to us. Nicole asked him a question, but he did not answer. He just stood like frozen robot. After a very non sequitur lag in his communication — at least fifteen seconds — he said we would leave soon. The emergency lights then came on as if he and the train had been activated by some mysterious force. The regular lights came on after that and we soon departed. None of this was actually mysterious force per se, but it is indicative of what one might experience on a quest to Sarmizegetusa. You are penetrating the unconscious aspects of your mental and spiritual network. The conductor played his part very well.

We arrived at our destination at sunrise at about 5:30 a.m. in the small village of Orastie and waited a little over a half hour for Father Antonius to pick us up. Father Antonius is a bishop of a monastery of the Old Orthodox Church. He was our host and was extremely thoughtful and courteous to our needs for our two night visit. He drove us to the monastery, showed us around and made sure we were fed.

Immediately taking us into his office, where he also slept, Father Antonius excitedly showed us pictures he had taken in Jerusalem. One was of a Madonna and baby Christ who were both black. I asked him why they were both black but got no answer. He then showed me a footprint on a rock from the Mount of Olives that is, according to legend, the last footprint of Jesus on Earth. I took a strong interest in this topic because Jesus is said to have ascended to heaven from the Mount of Olives. I have written a book, "The Montauk Book of the Living," that is all about synchronicities with regard to the subject of olives.

During the writing of that book, I discovered that the olive is wrapped up into the deepest mysteries of many religious and oracular traditions, only one of which is Christianity. Those are explained in the book, but my own personal interaction with the theme of the olive proved to be equally intriguing and mysterious. It was my fleeting association with Olive Pharoah, the Matriarch of the Montauk Indians, which propelled me to revisit and rediscover salient events in my own life which were intertwined with the theme of the olive. My first out-of-the-body experiences took place on Olive Drive in Davis, California and in a location that was nearby olive trees. Second, my parents were killed in a crash and buried on the land that once was Rancho Los Olivas, the historical memory of which has been preserved by Los Olivas Adobe near Ventura, California. The focal point of Adobe Los Olivas is a fountain beneath an olive tree.* Third, there was a legendary blue Amazon queen of Atlantis named Antinea who gave Mankind the olive. Her name was transliterated by the Greeks into Athena. Through name associations and genetic heritage links, I could trace the ancestors on both sides of my parental family trees to Antinea's descendants: the Berbers of North Africa. More important to this book, the theme of a blue Amazon queen ties to Radu's encounter with Machandi. I have also written quite a bit about the Blue Race itself in both "The Montauk Book of the Living" and "The Black Sun: Montauk's Nazi-Tibetan Connection.” None of this seemingly relates too specifically to my journey to Transylvania save for the fact that Jesus is supposed to have ascended to heaven from the Mount of Olives. With all of these synchronicities connected to what might be considered the greatest event in the history of the Western Civilization, I was more than a little interested in the alleged footprint of Jesus being on the Mount of Olives.

* Egypt was known as the Land of the Olives in ancient times and Isis was known as the Queen or Lady of the Olives. Egyptians also used olive leaves to bury their dead as the olive was a symbol of the pathway to and from this world.

The bishop told me that the actual footprint was one of a set of two original footprints, but that one was taken to Istanbul many years before. The footprint on the Mount of Olives resides within a mosque that is in the hands of the Muslim faith to this day. Nearby, there is another alleged spot on the Mount of Olives that also claims to be the spot where Jesus ascended from and was turned into a Russian Orthodox Church centuries ago. This church was used as a pretense by the British and French to start the Crimean War. They claimed they wanted the keys to the church which were in the hands of the Russians. In fact, it was just a humble clergyman who held the actual keys. This particular story is important to my quest, however, because the Crimean War actually created the country of Romania which did not exist as such before that war. If there had been no fight over the church on the Mount of Olives, there would be no country of Romania as such. The story of Cezar Brad, Radu Cinamar, and Doctor Xien would have played out entirely differently.

It is also very important to add that if it were not for my experiences that were highlighted by the mysterious theme of the olive, I would never have been in the circumstances I was in that would enable me to publish Radu’s work and take this mysterious journey to Sarmizegetusa. The common denominator in my adventures was the Mount of Olives which symbolizes the end times in the Bible.

Although the bishop was enthusiastically showing us his other photos of Jerusalem, my interest waned after the Mount of Olives, mostly because I was exhausted on only a couple hours of sleep. Cristina, who had no more sleep than myself, was nudging me to stay awake out of respect to the bishop. I soon fell completely asleep. When I eventually woke, I looked up and everyone was laughing. It was now recognized that it was time for us to go to bed. After resting for a few hours, we had lunch in the dining hall and it was time now for a much more animated discussion.

As we ate, Father Antonius talked at length to the girls who are both of the New Orthodox faith. He only speaks minimal English so they translated for me. The dialogue was quite interesting as he began explaining the “war in the heavens” between demons and angels and the cosmic struggle that occurs on Earth between the forces of good and evil. I do not mean to suggest that he is wrong, but he takes it quite seriously and speaks about it in a candid reference frame, somewhat akin to Bob Costas or Al Michaels of NBC talking about the NFL playoff forecast for the Super Bowl.

When he asked about myself and my vocation, I referenced the war between angels and demons and related that to the electronic manipulation that occurred in the Montauk Project. Much of the Montauk Project dealt with different domains. At the top you had heaven and at the bottom you had hell. Electronic frequencies were matched to each domain and equipment was created that either emulated those domains or influenced them. In other words, I told him that the demon realm used electronics to do their dirty work. I also gave him a very quick summary of my work with Dr. David Anderson and his breakthroughs with regard to time control technology.

I should also mention at this point that Father Antonius is not only the bishop or abbot of this monastery, but he is also an exorcist. He takes his mission quite seriously. The Old Orthodox Church is much smaller than the New Orthodox Church. The former believes in helping the poor and sick while the latter is far more inundated with modern commercialism and political controversy. The Old Orthodox Church strives to be pure and is generally considered to be beyond reproach.

I never thought about it until I got home, but the odds of someone going to Transylvania and being hosted by an exorcist are obviously quite rare. Further, if you are going to go on a sacred journey, having an exorcist in the mix makes for great drama. I certainly did not intend it that way. I would have preferred to stay in a hotel, but Nicole saw to all of the arrangements and she was trying to avoid me having to spend money which was not something I asked her to do. Father Antonius was evidently meant to be a part of our remarkable journey to Sarmizegetusa.

After lunch, Father Antonius drove us to two major cities of Transylvania, Hunedoara and Deva, and took us sight-seeing. During our meal, Father Antonius had said that at least eighty percent of the people are under the influence of the devil who gets to many of them through their habit of smoking. Maybe some sixteen percent are relatively free to exercise their free will. Later in the afternoon, as he drove us through the streets, I pointed to someone who was smoking and said, "The Devil!" He liked that and laughed. Not long afterwards, he asked me if there was anything he could do for me during my stay. I told him yes and asked him to pray that we would have a successful journey to Sarmizegetusa the next day.

Later that evening, I experienced a remarkable synchronicity that is mysteriously tied to the events I have earlier described with regard to the olive theme. As Nicole and I stood outside the monastery in the evening, we were speaking with one of the monks who mentioned that the first stone of the monastery was placed on August 11, 1999, the day of a full solar eclipse. Tomorrow would be August 11th and the tenth anniversary of that date. What was remarkable to me was that August 11, 1999 was the exact day I met Dr. David Anderson. He was the one responsible for me coming to Romania in the first place.

The period from August 10th to August 14th is significant because it is recognized as a major biorhythm of the Earth's energy grid. The August 12th date gets most of the credit because that date is believed to be when the actual Philadelphia Experiment of 1943 occurred as well as the climax of the Montauk Project in 1983. August 12th is also referred to as the birthday of the Egyptian goddess Isis (Queen of the Olives). It is a time when the star Sirius is at its closest point to the Earth and is sacred to the ancient Egyptians who recognized Sirius as the home of their ancestors as do the Dogon of Africa who learned this from and were culturally interconnected with the Amazigh Berbers of the Sahara. On August 14th, 2003, there was a major blackout in the northeastern United States, the epicenter of which was Preston Nichols' new home in Cairo, New York. All of these time associations are interesting because it was also August of 2003 when the amazing discoveries were made beneath the Romanian Sphinx that are discussed in “Transylvanian Sunrise”.

The most notable aspect of the above mentioned series of synchronicities had to do with the fact that we were taking our sacred journey to Sarmizegetusa the next day, August 11, 2009. At this time, Nicole also informed me that David Anderson had left a nice message on her cell phone saying that he wished he could be with us. He had been invited to make the trip but his business responsibilities prevented this.

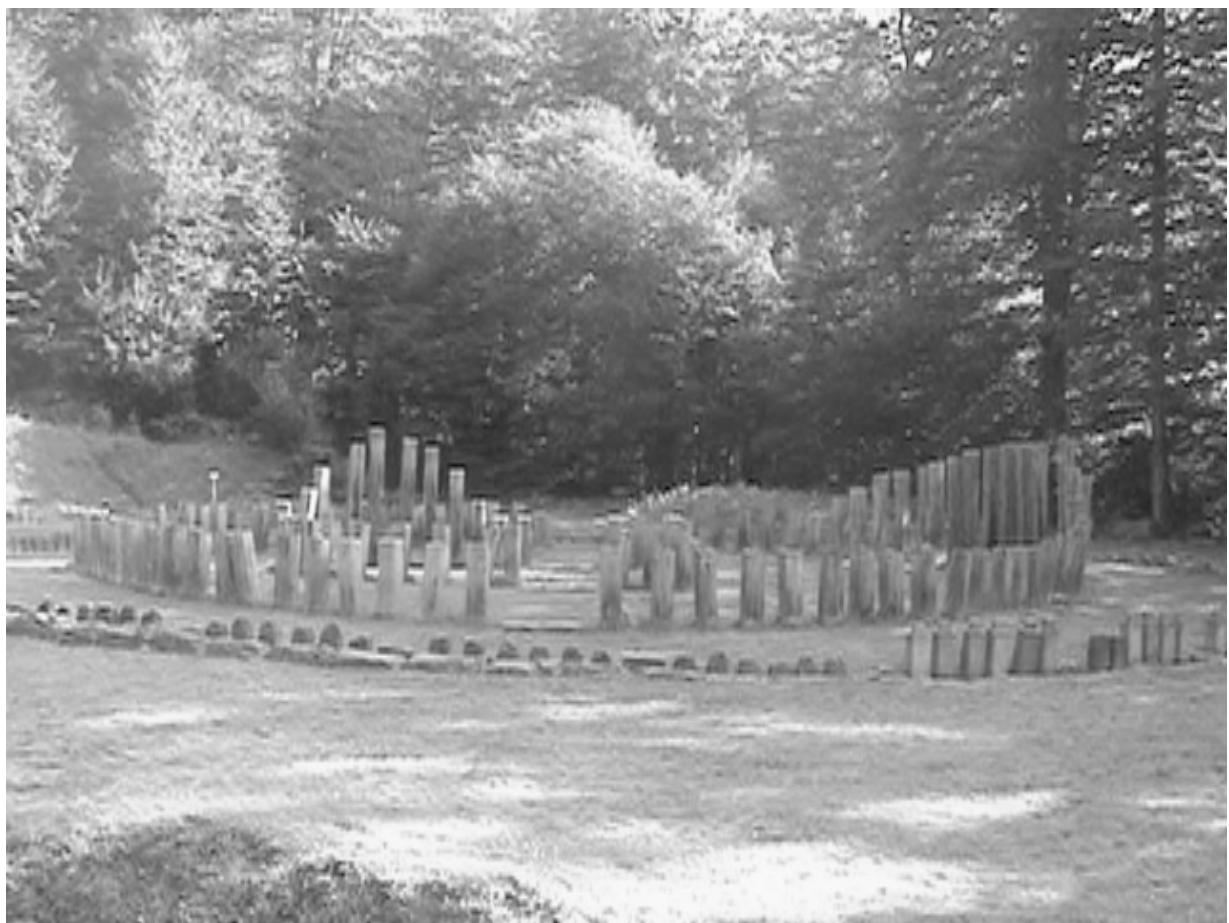

Father Antonius had us woken up at 5:30 a.m. the next morning and saw that we had breakfast. At 6:30 a.m., we got into a taxi that he had arranged to take us on the ride to Sarmizegetusa which would take a little less than an hour. The roads to this locale are not on the main highways and it was a very bumpy ride, the last part being a dirt road. As we climbed up the mountain at one point, the car stalled inexplicably. Whether it was or not, and I would say that it was, it seemed like a spiritual force making itself known. It was kind of obvious. Once this was recognized, the car regained power and we made the final ascent. We arrived about 7:30 a.m. and made our way down the short trail. There are signs warning you to be careful as there are poisonous vipers nearby. Until noon, we had the whole area completely to ourselves. We explored the various formations and did lots of filming. Ideally, one is supposed to spend three days in Sarmizegetusa whereby it will have a profound effect on you. This would require camping just outside the park in a tent. The park itself has a spigot of running water, but there are no bathrooms.

Unfortunately, we did not have time to explore Sarmizegetusa to the extent we would have liked. The focal point of most visitors is on the solar wheel and the surrounding temple ruins. There is also a square pit made of stones that is out of sight and behind the solar wheel that was probably once used as a water receptacle. There has also been speculation that it was used for human sacrifice at some point. There are stories of people being sacrificed to Xalmoxis, but I do not know if they are true. If so, they might be a degenerative form of the original teachings. For me, my journey to Sarmizegetusa was not even a superficial archeological study. I was going for the experience. We explored and also concentrated on the filming. I got several good shots and put these together in a video that included a summary of my first visits to Romania.

Perhaps the most interesting thing that happened at the park itself was after we had made our initial explorations. It was about noon, and we were eating the lunch we had brought with us. I then noticed two people standing still in the middle of the solar wheel. They looked like they were doing chi gong, an ancient oriental practice which means “breath work” and is something that I do every day. I went over by myself to investigate and saw a woman there alone. She spoke English very sparingly, but I was able to get across to her that I was publishing Radu Cinamar’s works in America. When I told her this, she had a strong emotional reaction and started crying. Her name is Lenutz. A man then arrived who was her husband and we all engaged in a very friendly but rather abstract conversation as there was a language barrier. I brought them over to Cristina and Nicole where we enjoyed rapid translation. The couple said they were doing energy work and that they visit different sacred sites in Romania from time to time. They eventually gave me a magazine that explains the very unique mathematical formula that the solar calendar is based upon. I cannot read the magazine at this point as it is in the Romanian language. If I were to be sarcastic, I would say that the math was based upon “base 1.5.” It was obtuse to me.

Lenutz and her husband took us on a mountain hike to see a sentinel post. They also explained that the entire region of Sarmizegetusa went for miles around, but people mostly just think of it only as the area around the solar wheel. When we finished our extensive hike, they drove us back to Orastie. We all agreed that we would return to Sarmizegetusa the next year and every year thereafter. I wanted to take everyone out to dinner to show my appreciation for the enlightening day and all of the information and courtesy everyone had extended to me. Besides, Nicole had taken every precaution on her own initiative to make sure I would spend almost no money. That was not my idea, but I wanted to say thank you. Lenutz and her husband had to go somewhere so they could not join us. Nicole said there were no restaurants but maybe we could find a pizza parlor or something.

As I heard the girls talking in Romanian, I could tell that we were headed back on a long walk to the monastery. We were not going to a restaurant or pizza parlor of any kind because there were none. This is Romania. It was disappointing to me and not just because I wanted to show my appreciation. I was hungry and had been eating at the monastery or Atlantykron for a week. My long journey was almost over. I felt like sitting down at a restaurant and relaxing a bit. As we were all hungry, Cristina pointed to a rock on the corner of two streets. We sat on the grass and used the rock as a table to eat a meal of hard-boiled eggs, white bread, and tomatoes. This was a bit of culture shock. The girls, who do not come from poor families, took this in stride as such an instance is not so uncommon in Romania. They have also negotiated their way through colleges of higher learning on scholarships but are very savvy when it comes to budgeting, scraping by and cutting corners. It was a distinctly Romanian experience. On the way back, we saw a tree with small yellow plums and those became our dessert.

It then struck me that I would be in for a long train ride the next day with virtually no food. In order to avoid the chaotic change of trains that we had experienced on our trip to Transylvania, Nicole was planning to get me on a train where I would not have to change seats once. This was a relief, but the trade-off was that there would be no stops to eat nor would I even have a chance to go to a real grocery store. With regard to groceries, the girls were both in the same boat as they would be travelling the next day in the opposite direction but only for six hours. I had to travel nine hours to Bucharest.

Walking down the last few blocks before we would arrive at the country road to take the long walk to the monastery, we saw a small sign that said “kiosk” that was really a lower harmonic vestige of a 7-11 store. Someone was selling potato chips and the like out of a garage. This was apparently my last chance to get something to eat for tomorrow’s trip, but there was absolutely nothing there that I would eat save for a bag of popcorn that Nicole insisted on paying for.

As we passed the very last house before the long road back to the monastery, a man came out of his house and pointed to the skies and said the Pleiades would be out tonight. He wanted to see them but the clouds were going to make it difficult. As he spoke only Romanian, Nicole translated. When I told him how lucky he was to live in such a beautiful environment, he became even more friendly and invited us to his home and organic garden. He started feeding us all sorts of vegetables and fruits and then started bringing out cakes and wine. By the time we were done, we had been fed up to our ears. Once again, an experience that was distinctly Romanian. He also provided us with bags of food for the train ride the next day. I had a bag of pears, apples and oranges which made the return trip much more pleasurable. Perhaps the prayers of the bishop had been answered. This man regularly provides food for the monastery. It capped off a very successful journey.

Although our physical journey was essentially done, the sacred aspect was not finished by a long shot. Both evenings I was at the monastery, I committed myself to a specific chi gong exercise every night for one hour. I eventually continued this exercise for thirteen months. If any professional boxer would do this particular exercise for a year, he would never be in danger of punching himself out. In fact, he could punch continuously for the entire fight provided he did not get himself knocked out. Besides that, it has tremendous health and spiritual benefits. Before I would go to bed each night, and even though I was very tired, I would go out on the balcony of the monastery and do this exercise for one hour into the Transylvanian night. In the far distance, I could see an explosion of light reaching up into the night sky. Nicole explained to me that the New Orthodox Cathedrals, which are very ornate, are built with open spaces at the top that are shaped like crosses and they light up the night sky. It was a poetic scene.

In the early hours of August 12th, there was a surprise continuation of my sacred journey that would occur in my sleep. I had a very magical dream where I knew I was completely outside of my body. There was a bright blue sky and I could look over the entirety of Romania. Suddenly, I saw obnoxious black helicopters approaching a tall edifice which represented the central government or a similarly related institution. There was a huge dark cloud over this building that clearly represented a very dark cloud over Romania. These were not my conclusions, but it is simply how the information was presented to me in the dream. It was extremely dramatic and spoke of the truth. At least that was the context I was given. While experiencing the great freedom of an out-of-body experience, I was suddenly confronted with the opposite: mind control operations and worse in the archetypal form of a black helicopter. In the same vein, a flash of truth went through my mind that told me I was not connected to this dark cloud in any way. In other words, there was no danger. The cloud, however, was still a part of the landscape.

This dream obviously represents the lid that has been held down on the operations Radu Cinamar has written about in his books. He has mentioned the negative forces quite clearly. The black helicopter theme has another odd association with me in Romania. Whenever I go to Atlantykron, the director of the camp always mentions the status of the black helicopters that buzz the camp annually. David mentions it as well. It is as if I am viewed either as an expert or a receptacle for knowledge of such things. In actual fact, the only thing I know about black helicopters is what Preston Nichols has told me. He said that most of them are just regular army helicopters. The only ones with extra-sensory psychology equipment on them are from New Haven, Connecticut. They are equipped with spectrum analyzers that can zone in on the electromagnetic signature of an individual and also feature equipment that can transmit certain frequencies. The implications of this are as broad as your imagination. This data is dated from the mid 1990s.

I can say, however, that during my own investigation of Montauk, black helicopters would appear at suspicious times. For example, I might be thinking a certain type of thought with regard to mind control or penetrating various levels of secrecy within the Government and a black helicopter would appear suddenly and inexplicably. Whether they were transmitting the thought that I was thinking or whether they were in response to it is an open question. The general feeling I got, however, was that they were letting me know they were there in some capacity.

This latter feeling was corroborated when Tantra Bensko told me of her somewhat similar experiences. When she would be teaching tantric yoga in her living room, a black helicopter would appear, even to the point where the pilot would fly close enough to the ground in order to make eye contact with her. One night I had a similar experience, but it was in a dream. I watched the helicopter from my living room and saw the face of the pilot. He was an older man and really quite lame in power. After that, the black helicopter phenomena disappeared from my life.

My most interesting black helicopter experience occurred with my daughter who was very young at the time. We saw a helicopter in the backyard, hovering very low. As it banked and changed direction, I got into my car to follow it, but it disappeared in a way that defied logic. As soon as it left my view, the very loud noise it made ceased and the craft could no longer be seen. It really made me wonder if they had perfected the invisibility technology from the Philadelphia Experiment. The fact that black helicopters were a theme in my dream suggests they are tied to the REM state of deep sleep. In my out of body experience, I was seeing astral phenomena that was interpreting itself through my brain as a black helicopter. No danger was indicated.

When I woke up for my last morning in Transylvania, I was doing my chi gong workout when I heard a knock at the door. It was Nicole. She had brought me a piece of Eucharist bread that had just been prepared in a ceremony that she had attended in the chapel below. It was not like a Catholic wafer but was a real piece of bread. Nicole wanted to know if I had eaten yet because it has to be taken on an empty stomach. As I had eaten a plum, she said I should wait until the next morning and take it then. She was very intent on me doing so.

Keep in mind that I am not a Christian and never have been. My friends from childhood even remember me being quite critical of this human institution and suggesting it was perhaps the most knuckle-headed thing invented by Mankind. It was not until I became an ordained minister for the Church of Scientology that I actually learned to respect and correlate all religious traditions. This was further enhanced by reading 777 and Other Qabalistic Writings of Aleister Crowley which demonstrates how all religions correlate with the Tree of Life.

Most people who believe in Christianity have not fully examined their own gray matter that propagates their feelings or intellectual capacity with regard to how they are interpreting the data they are receiving about the subject. By gray matter I am referring to their own mental mechanisms which would also extend to their emotional and spiritual mechanisms. On top of that, virtually all Christians are completely ignorant of the name of their founder and what it represents in terms of ancient magic from millennia ago. Their understanding is often embarrassingly simplistic as if suitable for a school play. Christians, nevertheless, are no less spiritual than anyone else. Just like anyone else, they have their own filter between the divine and the physical world.

In Nicole's case, she is a very pure spirit and Christianity just happens to be her interface with the divine. Just as I had respected Father Antonius and asked for his prayers (which seemed to work), I told her that I would take the Eucharist the next morning out of respect to her. I also adore her.

Nicole and Cristina accompanied me to the train station where Nicole made double sure I would be on the same train and in the same seat all the way to Bucharest where I would be met by her friend Ana. We said goodbye, and I took the long nine hour train ride to Bucharest. The carrots, pears and other fruit that had been given to me came in very handy. The highlight of the trip, however, was the popcorn that Nicole bought for me. It hit the spot at the right time.

The train arrived in Bucharest at 9:00 p.m. and Ana was waiting for me right on time. A very friendly girl, Ana took me to a youth hostel which was a short walk away. Again, I would have preferred to have stayed in a hotel but everything had been arranged already. To go against the flow would have been cumbersome to say the least. I would spend the night in a large coed dorm with college age people. It made me feel young.

I took the Eucharist the next morning on an empty stomach and prayed for a miracle. That was the whole idea. Ana picked me up and showed me around Bucharest a bit before taking me to the airport. It was on the plane that the miracle occurred. After taking my seat, I saw one black man get on the plane. I made an immediate decision or prayer that this man would sit down next to me. As I am interested in and have written about the Moors of ancient history, I wanted him to sit by me in order that I might ask him about any sort of black community in Bucharest as there are hardly any blacks in Romania. His seat was right next to me.

As it turned out, this man was a Christian minister who was accompanied by a white woman from another church. They had been in Moldova in order to address and correct the abuse of a young boy who had been stoned at the instigation of a priest of the New Orthodox Church. The young boy was an orphan who had been adopted by a Pentecostal missionary and his wife. The minister had purchased a tractor for the local community but was perceived as a threat by the priest. He was not only a different domination of Christianity, he was helping the locals and would therefore gain credibility and popularity. The priest stirred up his congregation against the family and the young orphan was stoned and hospitalized in what became an international incident. This man and woman had been there to ensure that the boy got proper treatment and that the situation was calmed down and addressed as much as possible by the local authorities.

For me, I had honored Nicole's request and accepted her version of the Holy Spirit. What happened, however, was a ricochet effect. The Holy Spirit moved right through me, so to speak, and relayed back to her the contradictions in her own church. Nicole is a member of the New Orthodox Church. As Father Antonius prepared the Eucharist, we can credit him. Once again, he is from the Old Orthodox Church and does not engage in such contradictory behavior. I wrote about the experience in the Montauk Pulse and sent it to Nicole. I thought she might be a little sensitive to what I had written, but she enthusiastically congratulated me on the article and told me to put her last name in the article as well.

This was the end of my trip to Sarmizegetusa and Romania. At the urging of my most knowledgeable and educated Romanian friends, I had taken the sacred journey and touched the heart of ancient Transylvania. Although the physical travel was over, the sacred journey would continue in a most mysterious way that I would never expect and was centered around my association with David Anderson who I was scheduled to meet with upon my return to America.

Chapter 3 — New York

The year prior to my visit to Sarmizegetusa in 2009, I had received a fair amount of correspondence from Radu. He had repeatedly mentioned that he would like to meet me in person at some point. Shortly after returning to my home in New York after a vacation in California, I received an email from Radu telling me that he had come very close to my house on Long Island. He did not visit me, however, as he decided that it might cause me many potential problems if he did. It was as if those astral sheep dogs mentioned in his tale were following him. In light of things that have happened since, it might be a good thing. There is a lot of attention devoted to keeping his story subdued. Radu also stated that he missed Cezar (who had left) very much and said that things were very busy in Department Zero and that he might not be able to communicate for a long time. I did not hear from him again for pretty much an entire year.

After Radu's last letter, however, David Anderson became relatively available again and was buzzing with all sorts of information. This began with his presentation of the invariance of the space-time interval which I have discussed. His lectures at Atlantykron were very rich and intriguing. He followed that up with a visit to me at my house in October of 2009.

David was very interested in seeing the video footage I had taken at Atlantykron the previous two years. I showed him the Sphinx, Sarmizegetusa and a lot of different footage of Romania and Atlantykron. As we watched with a couple of friends, I realized that it was time to finally play the CD for him that Radu had given to me over a year earlier. I had sent a copy to David, but the pile of mail it found its way to was never opened.

As we listened to the CD, David maintained a conversation with one of my friends. It made me think he was not too interested, and I asked him if I should turn it off. No, he said. He was listening to everything and was interested. It seems that David can multi-task somewhat akin to a computer.

After he finished listening to the CD, his primary comment was that he was impressed at how much Radu had trusted me in telling me what he did. I will reiterate, however, that most of what Radu said is a confirmation of what is in Transylvanian Sunrise. It concerns details surrounding the events in Transylvanian Sunrise with a sincere apology that he cannot provide further proof. This, he said, is forbidden by his superiors and would result in him being cut off from the current access he has to such matters. In his message, Radu stated that he hoped to meet me fairly soon in the United States and also that he would like to meet David Anderson.

My next step was to ask David about the people who told him that he had met Radu. Before I could ask the question, David explained without me having to ask. He said that when I initially inquired about seeing Radu on my first trip to Romania (I had also asked to visit the Projection Hall in this same request), he initiated correspondence to effect such a meeting. I knew David was using his own office, but I did not know what channels he had at his fingertips to accomplish such. The entire correspondence initiated by his office ended up being forwarded through my publisher, the only public contact for Radu. I soon received an email from Radu stating that he could not meet me in Romania but that he hoped to meet me in the United States.

As it turned out, David said he had also personally contacted some of his friends in the Romanian government on my behalf. One of these people informed David that he had actually shaken hands with Radu, but nothing could be done at this time about getting me a visit. The fact that David was told this was based upon a long history of trust, respect and cooperation between him and his friend in the government. It apparently started with my request to meet Radu the previous year.

While this seems to resolve one step of the mystery, it presents yet another riddle. Before I asked David if I could meet Radu, I had asked him if he knew Radu. At first, he was not sure who I was talking about. Then, after I explained the contents of the book quickly to him, he said "Oh, I know who you mean. I'd prefer not to talk about that on the phone." He then went into a fairly long comment on how phone conversations are not secure in America and that he would be much more comfortable talking about this in Romania. I found this ironic because Radu felt more comfortable talking in America.

All of this communication leads to obvious bafflement. If David has shaken hands with Radu then why did Radu state that he would like to meet David, that he trusted him and that he wanted him to listen to the CD? As David and Radu are both involved in very mysterious operations, it was hard for me to fathom that there might be no connection between them. If there was, neither seemed to be aware of it.

Before he left, David said that he would be releasing a paper on time reactors in a couple of months and that I could include that in my Montauk Pulse newsletter. Even though David did not have all of the answers I wanted, what he eventually released about time reactors is nothing short of remarkable. It is covered in Appendix B of this book.

David followed up his release of information on time reactors by appearing on OtherWorldRadio with me on December 30th, 2009. This was his first radio appearance in over five years. When I had the chance to ask him a question, I asked him what I thought was a very interesting question: "In all of your research, what is the most humorous thing you've encountered?"

This is an off-the-wall sort of question, and I asked it because it represents the human factor which is very important to any sort of endeavor of this nature. There was no doubt as to his answer and he gave it without hesitation or thinking. He replied that it had to do with people's reactions when they actually witnessed the time chamber for the first time. He said they would almost always burst into laughter, presumably as a reaction to seeing their view of reality being suspended. In other words, reality is not quite the way they thought it was.

While David revealed quite a bit in his initial return to radio, he gave a much more dramatic presentation a month later when he publicly announced for the first time that human beings have been subjected to the controlled time reactor fields (see Appendix B for more information on the technology). This is a startling announcement because in all of his previous research, pretty much only plants, clocks and other objects had been used. Incredible progress has been made in the third generation of this technology where they achieved stability of the boundary layer as well as a significant increase in the size of the time-warp field. It is now deemed safe enough for human experimentation. The time warp field or time chamber is created by means of stimulating a chemical reagent with high energy lasers and also utilizing a rotating electromagnetic field. As David describes it, the foundation of their patents is that they have actually created a path through hyperspace. The phenomena at work here is consistent with what is known in physics as a CTC or closed time-like curve. The key to understanding a closed time-like curve is that it is just time looping back on itself.*

* This was a key feature of the theories and adventures suggested by Preston in the Montauk scenario. If you want to get some idea of how this could play out in experience, I recommend a movie entitled Time Travelers from 1964. It is a campy but watchable story that demonstrates how a science project team jumps into a vortex they created and then go through all sorts of adventures only to end up at the same point where they jumped into the vortex. It was distributed as a video by Thorn EMI.

A closed time-like curve was first proposed in modern physics by scientist Kurt Godel in 1949 who said that pathways in time are possible by using CTCs. His theory shows how heavy gravity can curve space-time in a way that allows time to loop back on itself. Godel's work was the first to suggest that going back into time could be possible without violating the laws of math and physics. Dr. Anderson has added more to Kort Godel's original outlook because his device not only retards the flow of time but also accelerates it. This means that his loops connect to the future and not just the past.

David was careful to state that this is really time control and not time travel. People have been exposed to accelerated and retarded rates of time. Where the line is drawn between "time control" and "time travel" I cannot really say but it seems to be a fine one.

He also stated that humans exposed to the time chamber can actually walk outside of the field and then interact with the time they were now in. He also stated that the technology is not far away from sending someone 40 to 50 years into the past. In short, David revealed that humans have been sent into the past but quickly stated that the Anderson Institute is surely not the only one to do this. Many governments, in conjunction with private industry, have been experimenting with time control technology for years.

Most spectacular is the excitement or start up of the time warp field. Tremendous and amazing experiences have been reported by the people being exposed to these fields. Some have very spiritual experiences and some report seeing spectacular phenomena as they experience the transition period of acceleration/deceleration. With regard to this type of information, David said that the human mind behaves very unusually when exposed to something so foreign. It is not consistent from person to person and this field of endeavor is not the particular expertise of the Anderson Institute at this time although they are trying to become more competent in that area.

Perhaps more important is that the nature of our reality is now subject to an unnatural state of change. The web of interdependence is so complex that it is beyond our capacity to predict the impact that this new time control technology will have. It is so powerful that it has the potential to literally erase history.

The great questions of history can soon be answered and any historical event will soon be subject to study and review. David has stated that we are way past the “what if” stage and “How do we use this technology?” is the question now.

The implications for society are huge, but there is a device that has been developed by the Anderson Institute that has the potential to act as a safeguard for unwarranted use of this technology and it is known as a Time Tremor Detector or TTD. If someone is experimenting with time, these TTDs will pick it up and indicate where the experiments are taking place. It is through the use of such devices that the Anderson Institute has become part of a web of research groups across the planet which includes but is not limited to India, China, South Korea, Russia, and Japan.

India is by far the most advanced and active of these countries pursuing time control technology. Their Ministry of Science and Technology in New Delhi has a Department of Research and Development Organization (DRDO) which has set up a time research project with a massive facility that is ten times larger in scale than anything anyone else has done. It is located in the Dighi Hills which is in the Pune District of the state of Maharashtra. Pune is an industrial hub fifty-eight miles from Mumbai (formerly Bombay) and there is a six lane highway connecting the two cities.

Time research, David stated, is one of the most competitive technologies in the world today and governments are trying to utilize it for their own self interest. It is therefore important that it be regulated and transparent. The Time Tremor Detector serves this purpose.

The scientific community is split down the middle as to whether time control technology should be disclosed or not. David is the leading proponent for disclosure and was planning to release a series of videos, but this has not happened as of yet.

On March 2nd, 2010 I had an opportunity to ask David Anderson some follow up questions on Sovereign Mind Radio, hosted by Sonia Barrett. One of the first questions I asked was if we would get to see some video of this new time control technology in the upcoming videos he was planning to release. He reminded me that the Discovery Channel had taken an entire film crew into his old facility on Long Island but the footage was restricted from publication. Film crews have also visited his new center in New Mexico and while he is hopeful it will be included in the upcoming videos, that depends upon approval from his partners.

I also referred to the accounts of the Montauk Project whereby video cameras had been sent back in time so as to view events in the past and future. Have they attempted anything similar at his research center? Can we look into the past?

With regard to remote cameras, scientists understand that any movement through time (accelerating and decelerating matter or information backward or forward in time), has an impact upon the construct of reality. Some feel, however, and David does not agree, that you can limit the effect this will have on the time line by sending cameras into time instead of living organisms. Unfortunately, there is a complex web of interdependencies that make up the nature of our reality and by changing one small element, it might create more than just a small ripple.

India, he said, is sending camera-equipped drones into a time-warp field. There is, however, a problem with visible light being able to propagate through the boundary layers of the time warp field. The Anderson Institute is trying to work out a solution, but the best results thus far obtained are by sending a camera into the past and then getting it back out.

The whole idea of sending drones into the past is quite amusing because such a device would be looked at as a UFO if it was sent back to the Fifties or most any other decade. This makes one wonder what role time research from the future has played in the UFO phenomena of recent times. When we consider that it is India sending drones into the past, it is even more bizarre because the media in India has long reported on a sporadic phenomena known as the “Monkey Man,” a small creature either made with or amalgamated with metal that bites or ravages people with its metal claws and sounds like a bizarre science experiment. That it was witnessed in New Delhi is ironic because that is where the time experiments in India more or less originated.

Sonia asked David if he had ever looked into the Philadelphia Experiment and Montauk Project. With regard to the P.E., he said there is a trail of correspondence revealing major scientists were involved in this and certainly more than official sources will declare. As for Montauk, there are too many pieces that do not fit with regard to the official story. He said it is quite clear that the publicly stated use of that facility is not accurate. There are still many questions that need to be answered. I suggested that when the capabilities of the time chamber are up to it that these two incidents can be focused on, at least to try to figure out what happened. He thought that was an interesting idea.

The UFO factor, just alluded to in the aforementioned comment about India, comes into play here because, according to different sources, flying saucers came in by the bucket load when a rift of space-time was created during the Philadelphia Experiment. While this is the stuff of legend, it correlates with what David has told us about closed time-like curves. Maybe the story of saucers is really true and they were responding to a TTD.

This scenario with UFOs also correlates with what David has said about various governments being on the verge of time wars or controlling time to their own advantage, possibly at the expense of the population. Preston had always heard from secret government circles that World War II was a war of time and that the Nazis had originally won. In any case, this new technology from the Anderson Institute causes us to revisit these ideas with a fresh vigor. It gives us reasons to wonder about many things.

This idea of focusing the time chamber on key events is a fascinating one because one could also apply it to the censorship that time research and other sensitive matters have been subjected to. I mention this because David explained that censorship is a fundamental strategy of how corporations and governments succeed and prosper. Censorship of consciousness is key. The Anderson Institute is trying to get people to look beyond the unconscious censorship of their own human senses that their cultural and biological evolution has imposed upon their ability to see things. Individuals need to expand their capacity in this regard, but the whole idea of viewing the history of censorship itself is a fascinating one. He liked that idea, too.

All of this, however, tells you how powerful this technology is if it can do what he says, and there is every indication to believe him. It is clear this technology can potentially solve all the world's major problems. Implementing it is an entirely different matter and that is probably THE major problem. The resistance can already be anticipated, but the idea of turning the device on key problems makes it unstoppable. Just think about it. All of this is why David is so keen on establishing a public moral compass that serves everyone. Time control technology is powerful beyond anyone's imagination. If history proves to be an experiment in time, as he has suggested, perhaps we will soon be able to view it.

As interesting as all of these musings are, I am even more intrigued by the prospect of how David's research correlates with the adventures of Radu Cinamar and why I have been placed in the midst of these two remarkable scenarios. While David was coming out with all of this information, however, Radu had been silent for a very long time. It made me think that whenever one of them heats up, the other one will cool down. When I was getting lots of correspondence from Radu, David was mostly silent or non-responsive. Now it was the other way around.

Chapter 4 — Montauk

After the radio show with Sonia Barrett, I had a dream where I was waiting in a hotel for David Anderson. One person in the dream said he worked with David, and I will refer to him as Solomon. I then saw myself at a table in the hotel having breakfast with David and one other person.

When I consulted a dream dictionary, it indicated a table refers to a meaningful discussion with someone or something you can count on. I received an email from David right after this dream asking if we could have a face to face meeting soon. He did not say why he wanted to meet with me.

As I was helping to prepare a seminar at Montauk courtesy of Sacred Spirit Tours (which was to celebrate the return of the Montauk Medicine Man, Artie Crippen, to Montauk), I asked David if he would like to come and visit me there. He responded that he would like to come but also wanted to know if it would be all right if he did a presentation. I was delighted, particularly when he said that he wanted to show a video of his time chamber. David said the videos he wanted to do were held up as he had not been able to get clearance on showing the time chamber in the videos, but there was nothing forbidding him to show it to a small number of people. Although advertising that David would attend and do a presentation at the Montauk event would have increased the attendance considerably, I suggested that we keep it secret as it could have attracted a lot of attention we did not want. David liked this idea, too.

The seminar was held at Montauk from April 9-11. The impetus for all of this began at a Sweat Lodge on Super Bowl Sunday in 2009 which was instigated by my Chi Gong teacher, Roosevelt Gainey, who had said to Artie that he wanted to do a Native American sweat lodge. When I found out about this, I suggested my friend Vicky Lagoudis (www.teachingspirit.com) who has a sweat facility. Besides the aforementioned, it was attended by myself, Sandra Sabatini, Shaman Sharon Jackson (also known as Winona Red Bird, Queen of the Montauks) and a few other unnamed participants.

The sweat lodge included four rounds of intense heat focusing on cleansing, purification, healing, and the spirit world. Natives used the sweat lodge before a hunt, war, healing an illness, and virtually any important activity in their lives. It is a potent way to address and integrate all issues related to the body, mind and soul. In this sweat lodge, there was much focus on the Montauk Wellness Center and bringing it into being.

One of the results was that Sandra Sabatini created Sacred Spirit Tours to help facilitate this purpose. She was surprised, however, to see how vehemently she would be attacked for her participation, and it has been a very rugged journey for her which she has somehow pleasantly survived. It has thus occurred to me that some explanations are in order with regard to these matters.

Since “The Montauk Project: Experiments in Time” was released in 1992, it captured the imagination of thousands and there have been all sorts of people who have wanted to help or get involved in some way. Most of these people went by the wayside over a decade ago. There have been others who have tried to capitalize on the information and use it to their own advantage or for their own glorification. These efforts have, for the most part, been lame or insignificant. Others have been completely repelled by the very idea that there was a Montauk Project. The reason for this intense fascination and repulsion coupled with an ineptness to do anything about it has to do with the very mechanics or what is at play with regard to Montauk.

Montauk is a witness to or represents the very keystone by which the coherent system we call a universe is held together. The project described by Preston Nichols was monkeying with factors that not only changed the way people think but how this thinking ties into the fabric of how things are held together. Time was manipulated and chaos ensued. The power of this attracts people and understandably excites the imagination. Underlying all of this is the sacred energy of the very spot they used (Camp Hero) which was once under the guardianship of the Pharoahs of antiquity as represented by the Montauks and their ancient heritage. The Pharoah stood as the interlocutor and filter between the heavens and the Earth. You see a remnant of this stewardship in the legacy of the White House as a majority of U.S. presidents share the bloodline of the Montauks.

Putting the Montauk Pharoahs back on the map is like arranging a transfer of power from the leader of the Illuminati, the Bilderbergers or even the Vatican except for one thing. The office of the Pharaoh of Montauk and what it represents is more powerful than all of those groups put together. Just look at all of the scholars and authors who have tried to make their mark with regard to Egypt. As I have been learning, such scholars do not even know where the Egyptian language originated from. What is far worse, however, are the politicians and secret societies which try to squeeze every ounce of power they can from Egyptian symbolism as well as the region itself. Montauk, and I am not exaggerating, is far bigger in its implications.

It is through Montauk that certain Bulgarians contacted me to teach us a clearer view of the Pharaonic civilizations as well as history itself. It is also through my work with Montauk that I was brought into the fold, as reported in Transylvanian Sunrise, about the chambers beneath sphinx in both Romania and Egypt. This is another point that various would-be prophets have sought to discover for their own prestige and glorification. It is no accident that these discoveries have and will come to the attention of most of the world via the Montauk research and story line. It is therefore no accident that David was making his first public presentation of the time chamber at Montauk.

His lecture was a streamlined and more user-friendly version of what I witnessed in Romania the previous year. He deleted the mathematical complexities. Most of what he said can be found on his website at www.andersoninstitute.com if you have the time and patience to read it. The most special part, however, was that he showed a video of the time-warp chamber.

Inside the time-warp field, an amaryllis plant was placed that was revealed as a small, tightly-closed bud. Horticulturists projected a four-day window for it to bloom fully. During this video presentation, it bloomed in under three minutes. David also mentioned that they were able to “reverse” its stage of blooming – to regress it back almost into a bud again – however, the field became unstable at one late point in the regression and it was exposed to high-level gamma rays which destroyed the plant life. This was not shown at this presentation. They have long since remedied the unstable boundary field.

It should also be mentioned that there was a professional photographer in attendance whom I know, and he commented that what we saw could not possibly have been “time-lapse” photography due to the saturation of colors that was displayed in the video. Keep in mind that this particular video is several generations behind the more advanced work that has been going on in recent years. As David has said many times, the Government is always ten to fifteen years ahead of what it informs the public about.

This was obviously a breathtaking event. David also indulged the audience by taking all of their questions afterwards. This was a very rare opportunity for people to Q&A with David, and it all came courtesy of the Medicine Man’s return to Montauk and his dream for a wellness center. This last point should not be underestimated. The chances of the Medicine Man and David Anderson coming to Montauk by themselves were not good at all. That they should show up at the same time during a presentation of time control technology is all the more significant. That the incident occurred in sequence with both a sweat lodge and the REM state of dreams should also be noted.

David was set to leave the morning after his presentation, but we had breakfast and got a chance to talk privately. This was the breakfast meeting I had dreamed about although it was in a very different location. It is noteworthy to add here that I was absolutely right about the last name of the character in my dream who said he knew David. To my surprise, it turns out this man actually works at the Anderson Institute and is involved in the time experiments. David even told me I was right about the man’s nickname which had been divulged in the dream. This confirms what I said about my connection to David and his work through the REM realm of the sleep state. There have been other experiences as well.

Despite these amazing revelations, I was still very curious as to why David had requested a face to face meeting with me. It was actually quite simple. He wanted to talk about my participation at Atlantykron that summer and what I wanted to do or present. As we talked, I mentioned a fledgling and ad hoc film project I had participated in the previous year that was cut short due to unfortunate circumstances. I then suggested that we produce a film/video with the students and remove the obstacles that prevented last year's fiasco which was never formally organized. David loved the idea, and the result was some rather remarkable synchronicity that continued the sacred journey that I thought I had left behind in Transylvania.

Chapter 5 — Transylvania

As I mused over my ability to “pick up” on one of Dr. Anderson’s employees through the REM realm of the dream state, I recalled a dream I had experienced over twenty years earlier that was obviously working its way into the interesting scenario I was now involved in.

Years before I became a published author, I wrote a short story based upon a dream I had. In the dream, I was sneaking into Dracula’s castle based upon the Bela Lugosi movie. At the end, it is sunrise and I was reaching to Dracula so as to apprehend him as he tried to escape. I reached for his cape as the sun rose, and Dracula eluded my grip by turning into a white bat after which he changed back into human form but his clothing and cape were now white instead of the traditional black. In this “white” form, he said that he was the antithesis of his evil personification in the movies. I wrote this as a short story but it was long forgotten until Tantra Bensko, who accompanied me on my first trip to Romania, asked me if I had any fiction that she could include in an upcoming lucid fiction anthology. I told her about that story and read it to her over the phone. She liked it very much.

The theme in this rather detailed and unusual dream got some more life as soon as I returned from my Montauk adventure with David Anderson where he showed us the video of his time control chamber. Just four days prior to the Montauk seminar, I had received a copy of an email dialogue between Tantra and a friend of hers named Eve Logren, a well known therapist who wrote the book Love Bites about alien love bites. This email caught my attention because it was talking about a Transylvania Colony that was proposed as the 14th Colony of the Americas. I had never heard of it but was curious if it had anything to do with Transylvania in Europe. When I returned from Montauk, I did my own research and learned the following common history about the so called Transylvania Colony.

In 1775, a judge of dubious reputation by the name of Richard Henderson formed the Transylvania Company with the intention of making the Transylvania Purchase, a huge tract of land that made up what is mostly the modern state of Kentucky. American frontiersman, Daniel Boone, was hired to trailblaze the Cumberland Gap so as to access this land. Boone was also involved in the final negotiations to purchase this land from the Cherokees. The purchase was problematic because there were other Indians who claimed the land and Boone lost some family members over this. The purchase was eventually voided because the legislatures of both Virginia and North Carolina claimed parts of the land citing an edict by King George III which stated that colonists could not purchase land from Indians.

After reading these curious facts about the Transylvania Purchase, a couple of interesting thoughts occurred to me. First, King George III is well known for his insanity (see the book The Madness of King George by Alan Bennett) that revolved around his struggle with porphyria, a disease that is also known as “blue-blood’s disease,” one of the symptoms of which is purple urine, also referred to as “purple rain.” It is well known that the first historical case of this disease is from his ancestor, Mary Queen of Scots, whose lineage traces back to Transylvania. Porphyria is also associated with Rh negative blood. The second thing that occurred to me is that one of the most documented cases of Rh negative* “blue people” is in Kentucky. You can read about the Blue Fugates of Kentucky (on the internet) for further information.

* I have written extensively about Rh negative blue bloods in “The Black Sun” and “The Montauk Book of the Living.” This includes members of the blue race like Machandi.

I wondered if the area where these Blue Fugates were from was the same part of Kentucky that was part of the Transylvania Purchase. Sure enough, I found out that the Blue People of Kentucky were located right in the heart of what was once referred to as the Transylvania Purchase. I also learned on the internet that a native by the name of Blue Otter stated that, according to his people, there was an ancient race of Blue People who lived underground. It should be noted that Kentucky is studded with some of the most extensive and beautiful caves in the world. They were so special that Aleister Crowley himself made mention of these caves in his autobiography and went out of his way to visit them when he was in America.

While contemplating these facts, I learned there was another extreme element of synchronicity at play. I knew that Sandra Sabatini of Sacred Spirit Tours, who had been with us at Montauk where she got to meet David Anderson for the first time, was from Kentucky. When I called her to tell her about all of this, she informed me that she was moving back to Kentucky that week. When I questioned her about the above information, I learned that her father's land was right in the middle of this "Blue People Country" although she knew nothing about this until I informed her. She soon found that there were artifacts on her father's property of an ancient civilization and that some rogue archeologists had been removing them. I also contacted my friend Mary Sutherland who told me a mouthful.

Mary has a whole thread on the Blue People of Kentucky on her website and she has also visited the area. There is even a picture of her with a very large pre-Columbian statue of a Caucasian head who is referred to as the "Serpent Prince" and is recognized as either Sumerian or pre-Sumerian. She has said that there are a multitude of artifacts in plain sight but that only the locals know where they are and they are not that friendly with outsiders. She subsequently introduced me to Rick Osman by teleconference who is preparing an extensive video documentary on the pre-Columbian settlements of Prince Madoc. He has witnessed all of these settlements which were all erected on older fortifications which are plainly in sight and which in turn were erected on previous fortifications from even more ancient times. This is hidden history and will be coming forth soon.

All of this is fascinating in and of itself, but it still does not explain how the name Transylvania came into play in American history. Despite extensive searches, I have found no logical etymology and only a few admitted speculations. Transylvania is most often said to mean "across the woods" or "beyond the woods." The Hungarians, who originally occupied Transylvania, called it Erdély which was derived from Erdő-elv, meaning "beyond the forest"). Erdő means "mountain deep forest" with the elv suffix being a derivative of the older form elü (meaning beyond). What I would point out in all of this is how elv quite apparently transmogrified into the English word elf.

In any event, there is great magic in this equation and Sandy Sabatini's connection to this area was indicating that synchronicity was the guiding principle. I had taken a sacred journey to the heart of Transylvania in Europe and was now receiving a deeper meaning to the word itself but also discovering mysterious threads that tied mysteriously into ancient history which also concerns the Blue Race of which Machandi is a part. Just as my travel to Transylvania with Nicole had been overshadowed via synchronicity by my association with David Anderson, so had this thread of investigation been prompted by his appearance at Montauk where he showed us a video of his time control chamber.

Continuing to investigate the mysterious thread between Kentucky and Romania, I looked to see if there was any common denominator between Transylvania in Kentucky and that in Europe. This led to a rather astonishing discovery and that is St. Germain (Rákóczi is his real family name), the famous Prince of Transylvania who, according to Manly P. Hall's Secret Destiny of America, was present in America during the settlement of the Transylvania Colony and also instigated the Declaration of Independence as well as the revolution itself. Hall also asserts that St. Germain was a reincarnation of Francis Bacon, the author of The New Atlantis (as well as Shakespeare's plays) which positions America as the New Atlantis. Bacon and St. Germain were both Rosicrucians.

As Benjamin Franklin is also deeply tied to the Rosicrucians, I looked for a connection there and found out that he was a major investor in the Transylvania Company as were many politically influential colonists such as George Washington, Alexander Hamilton, and possibly Thomas Jefferson. Franklin and Jefferson both travelled to Paris where St. Germain also resided according to regular history. His presence in Paris is tied to the French Revolution. The common denominator in all of this is Rosicrucianism, a powerful secret society. Freemasonry and the Illuminati lurk in the background as well, and it is a well known fact that Jefferson commented on and corresponded with Adam Weishaupt, the founder of the Bavarian Illuminati. In such a scenario, it is anyone's guess what "illuminated" agendas were at work.

When we consider the realm of quantum synchronicity, which is obviously the principle at work, we are forced to consider that there is a quantum affinity (to use a term from quantum physics) or magical sympathy (to use a term from magick) at work here. The historical references and conclusions about St. Germain, to say nothing of the idealized New Age notions about him, state that he was tantamount to a time traveler. Not only did he appear in too many places at too many different times, he also cavorted with royalty and those in positions of political power. While I do not for a minute mean to suggest that David Anderson is St. Germain, there is a resonance here because David knows political leaders and also lives behind a veil of mystery. The legends of St. Germain, not the historical facts, also state that he had access to underground facilities and laboratories that are somewhat similar to those described in “Transylvanian Sunrise.”

When we consider the REM realm of sleep, it is important to note that David is the one who brought me to Romania in the first place and instigated these mysteries. The “magic” of synchronicity was demonstrated again with Nicole when we took our sacred journey to Sarmizegetusa on the very ten year anniversary of my initial meeting with David Anderson which had occurred on the same day the foundation stone was laid for the monastery we stayed in. I reiterate the REM realm factor of sleep because, well before I heard about the Montauk Project or became involved in writing the story, I had my dream about Dracula turning into a white bat. It was as if the dream state was pulling me to Transylvania long before my writing career would pull me there. Machandi also works through dreams as stated in Radu’s story.

A year before I took the sacred journey with Nicole, however, there was another remarkable REM experience that came from Sandy Sabatini. She shared a dream with me where she was in a chamber with David Anderson and myself. Her description of this chamber was such that it made me think she had read “Transylvanian Sunrise” which features such a chamber. This was surprising because the book had not even been released at that point in time and there was no way she could have read it. In some strange way, she was picking up on what was in the book.

In Sandy’s dream, the importance of the 24th chromosome was stressed, particularly as it relates to a coming planetary shift. Further, she recognized David Anderson in what was termed “The Great Mystery.” She insisted that I relay this message to David before I go to Romania, but I was not too keen on this as I knew he would not understand or likely respond. I did send it, but he did not respond. He eventually did respond to an email of Sandy’s, however, and indicated he would like to talk to her.

Sandy’s dream included that David has artifacts that somehow, when activated by a DNA/key that includes “a method sequence,” could protect the planet. In “Transylvanian Sunrise,” Cezar Brad originally accessed the chamber when his DNA was recognized at a security check point that was built millennia ago. This is how a force field was lifted that enabled final access. It is not known if it was Cezar’s individual DNA or hand print that was recognized or just his general type of DNA. I assume but do not know that it was his individual DNA as if he was appointed in time to open this remarkable door.

Sandy’s dream correspondence is amazing, and she had more to say without knowledge of the material in the book. She said that the three of us are being brought together for the coming planetary shift to stop something. When we consider the prospect of protecting the planet, it should be pointed out that the chamber beneath the Sphinx gave a holographic read out on how the entire geography and ecosystem of Romania was either protected or could be protected by the mechanism within the mountain. It was as if the technology for protecting that area of the earth was all figured out long ago. There is no reason that this protection mechanism does not also extend to Egypt, Tibet, Baghdad, Mongolia and the other underground areas that are mentioned in the book. Sandy said that there are seven locations in this regard that could protect the planet and one is in New Mexico. At that time, she did not know that David had a time control research center in New Mexico. While we cannot fully analyze the REM realm statements at this time, they were intuitive at the very least.

With regard to the “24th chromosome,” let us next consider the chamber mentioned in “Transylvanian Sunrise” which includes the ability to read out one’s DNA in holographic format down to the molecular and atomic constituents. It can also go beyond that, but Radu Cinamar did not have time to explore this in the first book. What is also not mentioned is the potential for the technology to read out the circumstances of the 23rd gene-pair. We do know that the technology can perform holographic read-outs of potential hybridization between alien life forms. The 23rd gene-pair, however, represents a different aspect than mere hybridization.

There are 23 gene-pairs in human DNA. Each gene-pair consists of two chromosomes that are linked together. Although there are 46 chromosomes in human DNA which make up 23 gene-pairs (of chromosomes), people find it easier and more expressive to simply refer to this 23rd gene-pair as the 23rd chromosome which is not only the sex chromosome but a “magical” chromosome. This part of the equation is not science fiction.

There is also much New Age hoopla generated about the prospects of the so-called 23rd chromosome which includes the “awakening” of the Galactic Center which will emit a cosmic ray which will change all of our DNA and transform the human race. This is part wishful thinking based upon some science, legends and creative thinking.

Above and beyond the New Age hype, there is biological evidence indicating that there was once a 23rd and 24th gene-pair that fused into what we now call the 23rd gene-pair. Two gene-pairs became one gene-pair. This was an a priori state to what we now recognize as an ordinary human being. Al Bielek has long said that this “23rd chromosome” was deliberately altered at some point in the history of the human race.

When I told a friend of mine about this, she knew exactly what I was talking about and said that Preston Nichols should find the frequency that will “uncollapse” these two gene-pairs. Bringing it up to Preston, he then informed me that he has been working on it, but it is an extremely complex series of frequencies. It is not a simple solution.

What I would like to point out is that when chromosomes combine with each other in ordinary biological functions, it results in disease. I am referring to the chromosomes of one gene combining with that of another. Most diseases, including hereditary disease, are the result of an admixture of chromosomes which is another way to express the idea of a “collapse.” It therefore becomes apparent that if the 23rd sex “chromosome” is really the result of two collapsed or fused gene-pairs, then this affliction is representative of a master disease in the human body that is shared by virtually all humans. It is also a disease which is “hard-wired” into the genetic structure of the body and is not expected to change or dissipate easily. Keep in mind that the word disease is a compound of dis and ease. Even if you are functioning normally in ordinary human terms, your lungs and brain are not operating anywhere near full capacity.

The implications of these facts are staggering if one chooses to extrapolate. It suggests that the shape-shifting abilities of shamans and other paranormal attributes might be functional if humans possessed a 23rd and 24th gene-pair that was not collapsed. This prospect places us into the realm of occult biology, at least as far as academic science on this planet is concerned.

With regard to Sandy's prophetic dream, it suggests that my work with David Anderson is centered around the transformation of the human race on a very profound level. The elements included are: David Anderson's time control technology, the chamber beneath the Sphinx and all the technology inside, the mysterious 23rd gene-pair, and Cezar Brad's adventures into the Inner Earth. We can now also add in Radu's adventures with Elinor, Repa Sundhi and Machandi which most certainly are concerned with transforming the human race.

Sandy's dream also included a blue pharaoh who had a language written on his face. The dream indicated that the pharaoh represents a bloodline that is part of the circle I am gathering around me to activate such. This special DNA suggests the Merovignian bloodline which is very often misunderstood by modern writers. Merovignian represents the Vine of the Moors which includes the Montauk Indians who are the Royal Pharoahs. The language on the face of the blue pharaoh is supposed to represent a key to activating artifacts that include a form of time travel. A person, through their DNA, has to know how to activate it. This is Sandy's dream talking, not me.

In such a manner, the REM realm of sleep and scientific theories are swirling around the prospects presented in the book "Transylvanian Sunrise" that are also synchronizing with the theme of time travel as well as the Montauk Pharoahs. The blue pharaoh in Sandy's dream is not only in keeping with Machandi's blue color but also the blue people I have written about in previous books such as "The Black Sun" and "The Montauk Book of the Living."

Sandy also had an odd occurrence in the early to mid 1990s when she received a mysterious letter from a Dr. David Anderson of the Time Travel Research Center. As far as anyone knows, David's time operations were not public at that time. Sandy only came to know him through her association with me. When we were at Montauk, she asked David about it and he only smiled as if to say that such strange phenomena is sometimes part of his work with time. He did not own up to remembering having sent the letter, but he did not deny it either.

If we consider the people I am gathering around me, it is important to note the following thread of facts that have developed throughout the last twenty years. They tell their own story.

In 1990, I came across the most unique and bizarre amalgamation of science, technology and occultism imaginable through the personage of Preston Nichols. It is all centered around the most elusive and mysterious phenomena in science: time. As I helped Preston write The Montauk Project, a lot of phenomena and strange experiences were generated which were based upon synchronicity, a manifestation of time.

Following the path of synchronicity led me to the discovery of the Pharoahs of Montauk and the actual historical legacy of an ancient Blue Race of people that settled in the Inner Earth and set up the ancient cultures of Atlantis, Egypt, Tibet and India. It should be noted that the name Krishna means “dark blue.”

One of the most bizarre synchronicities I encountered concerns the mysterious Anderson family of Montauk legend who were the guardians of time. Although this was not a key story line, it was one of the first things I learned about with regard to the legends of Montauk. The entrance of Dr. David Anderson and his time control technology into my life therefore took on extra significance. David also arranged for me to travel to Romania where my sacred journey to the ancient spiritual capital of Transylvania is inextricably tied to my association with him.

My connection to Radu occurred only after “The Montauk Project: Experiments in Time” was translated into the Romanian language and literally enabled Daksha Publishing to be created. Radu Cinamar saw the book and submitted his manuscript for “Transylvanian Sunrise” to the publisher. The manuscript was then translated into English, sent to Sky Books and eventually published. Radu and I thus became associated.

Another important aspect to this story line occurred when a descendant of the Montauk Pharoahs, Artie “Red Medicine” Crippen, came into my life. As a youth, he was approached by two Lakota medicine men who travelled across the country to see him because their tribe had been waiting 30,000 years for him to incarnate. He is the only one to properly complete their gruelling Sun Dance ritual. Artie, an adept practitioner of the martial arts, introduced me to his instructor, Roosevelt Gainey, the founder of the Taoist System of Living Arts.

I have written about Roosevelt Gainey at length in “The Montauk Book of the Living,” but he is by far the most advanced being I have met in a human body. Without recapitulating all that I have already written about him, he understands the functionality of the human body in ways that are beyond the comprehension of modern institutionalized science. This applies to both healing and martial arts. I have studied with him consistently for almost four years at this writing. When I told him about the yidam in this book, he knew exactly what I was talking about and began talking about how this applies to seven different levels of energy. This is something I am going to be learning more about, but it also shows there is a continuation of and more meat to the story line than anyone might have imagined.

How and why people gather together has a lot to do with the principle of quantum affinity: like attracts like. The chamber beneath the Romanian Sphinx presents many interesting aspects in this regard, particularly with regard to DNA and the holographic readouts. This comes into focus when we consider a somewhat obscure book entitled “The I Ching and The Genetic Code: The Hidden Key to Life” by Dr. Martin Schönberger which has also been expounded upon and diagrammed on the internet. It reveals that there is a correlation between the I Ching and the way our human biology is expressed through DNA.

DNA, it should be remembered, is the interface between life and matter. When spirit mobilizes matter and animates it, it does so through the mechanism of DNA and thereby combines into the plethora of life forms on this planet. The correlation with the I Ching is important because it is based upon yin and yang as expressed in a broken line and an unbroken line. This is the same thing as a binary digit in a computer code. Each molecule of DNA consists of codons which are information units which store all sorts of different data. Codons can be virtually represented either as binary digits or the broken and unbroken lines of the I Ching which then form into various patterns of combined lines or digits which symbolize all of the various permutations of dynamic functions that manifest in life experience, including biological manifestations.

As putting together the various patterns of yin-yang lines will demonstrate, polarized opposites attract and repel in such a manner as to produce a self-propagating unit which combines with other units to form various biological units which in turn propagate. Underlying this is the quantum principle of resonance or “like attracts like.” In other words, this principle of quantum mechanisms visibly demonstrates itself to be the underlying principle of our biological framework. Once again, each molecule of DNA consists of codons which are information units which store all sorts of different data. The biological building blocks all correlate with the principle of synchronicity. Like attracts like in order to form into organisms.

A very important point in the aforementioned book by Dr. Schönberger is that DNA is not just a stand-alone molecule. It also has a wave character (according to F.A. Popp) which implies that there is a universal system of communication between the cells of the body which operate at far higher speeds than the humoral or neural systems and at velocities ranging between the speed of sound and light. In such a manner, ultraviolet biosignals ride along the spirals and activate specific codons (information). This amounts to a synchronicity of information.

It also tells us that the paranormal abilities of a Chi Gong master are facilitated when the biosystem of his body is operating at a very high speed which includes a rather intense synchronicity of movement. There is a law in Taoist Chi Gong that applies here and it has to do with what is called “melting.” Taoist Chi Gong has many aspects to it, but there are nine laws which are an important foundation. They consist of how to move your physical body or respond to another. The ninth law is: “To put it all together, Melt.” This is the most elusive of the nine laws because you are putting together everything you have learned into one synchronized movement. You might say that when a professional athlete, sports team or a group of musicians “put it all together” in a startling performance, they are melting by calling on all of their pro experience. Melting, however, bridges into a new set of laws which are energetic and perceptual in nature as opposed to physical. To completely Melt, one would employ all of the energetic laws, too. Beyond the energetic laws, there are mental laws and beyond those are spiritual laws wherein one becomes familiar with the mysterious vapors.

This level of Chi Gong I have just mentioned is very advanced. I brought it up, however, because it ties in with the creation of the yidam who, as Repa Sundhi stated, is created from the mental plane of an advanced adept. It gives another reference frame by which to appreciate Radu's adventures. To tell you the truth, most of my Chi Gong practice concerns itself with the physical aspects. This is the level where one begins. I do, however, have my moments of advanced perceptions. The more I engage in it, the greater the adventure.

There is also a lucid dreaming aspect to Chi Gong that ties into these experiences. Machandi uses the dream state as do I. Between the two of us, we have both utilized the dream state to meet half-way through the very book you are reading. While she works from a loftier plane, I work from the earth plane.

There is much more to what I am saying here, but most human beings are not even up to learning and practicing the physical laws of Chi Gong which require exercise and hard work. Most people, if interested in improving themselves at all, are content to listen to the gurus on television who are not really clued in at all. They have some knowledge, but it is akin to an academic professor who knows how to read and write but misses the truths uttered in this book about space-time physics or archeology. The discipline I am talking about is not available in New Age road shows or even decent establishments that provide reasonably good services.

I have also mentioned the idea of Melting because it represents the macrocosmic aspect of what is going on in my work, particularly as it relates to Sandy's aforementioned dream with regard to the gathering of characters around me. It is as if the stage is being set for a Grand Melting of planetary proportions. While I cannot prove this to you, this is what my experiences are indicating. It is, quite obviously, an intuitive process with plenty of linear tangents. Linear tangents are very important if not the most important aspect in all of my work, and I always attempt to stress this aspect.

If you have read this far in the book, you probably have the idea that there is some truth behind what Radu has mentioned in his writings. I would like to corroborate this by adding an observation with regard to what happened to Radu. When he had his second encounter with Machandi, there is very little that occurs by way of a verbal description. It was very obvious to me, however, that Machandi took him into a state which I recognize from Taoist Chi Gong as the “Great Stillness.” This is a very profound state of spirituality. It became obvious to me that she is a Taoist master in her own right and would have to have a tremendous familiarity with the aforesaid laws of Taoist Chi Gong, particularly for her to reach Radu in the way that she did. It is a very rare experience for such an enlightened being to jump start someone’s consciousness in such a fashion.

Thus it is that an extremely interesting if not a very strong case has been made for Radu’s story being true. The holographic computers that read out the DNA of different life forms are a significant and delightful mystery. With those capabilities, there is no reason not to believe that they could not also solve the problem of the mysterious 24th gene-pair or at least give detailed explanations that would solve it. The chamber beneath the sphinx also contained a vessel with a special form of monatomic white gold. In my past work, this subject was expounded upon as was its role with regard to the Blue Race and the full awakening of consciousness in a human being. It would therefore be reasonable to assume that the computer facility in the Bucegi Mountains was either erected by the Blue Race or a life form closely associated with them. When we consider that the binary aspects of DNA fit hand-in-hand with computer technology, it stands to reason that the underlying principle of quantum mechanics in biology would resonate with the master technology available in the chamber. Like attracts like. In such a manner, it is not really so odd that the themes I have written on and explored are now manifesting before us in a tangible scenario that deeply touches the entire planet.

What I have presented above is the promise or hope of a remarkable solution that could potentially be available to all life forms on this planet. As exists in any good drama, however, there is opposition to such hopes and dreams. Since my last meeting with David Anderson, his life has been threatened and he has not been able to release his videos demonstrating the more spectacular aspects of his own time research. Although he oversaw my list trip to Atlantykron in Romania, he did not venture there himself. It was a security issue.

Radu has been warned by his superiors that he is not to write anything further for the time being. Suffice it to say there are forces that want to maintain their own political control to the detriment of humanity at large. This, of course, is not a new situation on planet Earth.

What is interesting is that both Radu's adventures in this book and my own were centered in and around sacred locations in Transylvania. The theme of the Blue Race via Machandi has also converged upon Transylvania.

When I researched and released "The Black Sun" in 1997, it created a rather profound reaction. Besides containing pictures of some of the first Nazi flying saucer craft to appear in an American book, it explored Nazi occultism in a manner that had not been done previously, going beyond The Morning of the Magicians which deserves significant credit as the first popular book to reveal the Nazi occult connection. "The Black Sun" created a lot of controversy, but an entire line of books has since come out on these subjects by many different authors. Even mainstream Nazi authors were forced to embrace the data. "The Black Sun," however, was not just about Nazis. It was also about Tibet, the Blue Race and monatomic gold. While the Tibetan issues have been mostly ignored, the monatomic gold theme had already been circulated in New Age circles but it was done so as to exploit gullible people who lacked proper discernment. Generally, most New Age and conspiracy readers are prone to hucksters.

"The Black Sun" did something unique in that it connected and correlated the white gold to the Blue Race and the Rh negative factor. The reaction to that data by Freemasonry was to have mind control victims seemingly spring up out of nowhere and spout all sorts of information about Rh negative being connected to shape-shifting reptilians. Different people picked up on this theme and exploited it, but it was all based upon information from people who had suffered traumatic mind control. It effectively muddied up the entire subject and polarized people against finding out the full circumstances and history with regard to the Blue Race. The term goddess is generally used in a pejorative sense by such mind control victims as are different esoteric and occult terms, the purpose being to discredit occultism in general. In other words, the subliminal message is to reject occult or hidden information.

The proposition put before us by Radu Cinamar and his accounts of Elinor, Repa Sundhi, and Machandi are designed to elevate humanity, a species which has demonstrated an inbred tendency to be suspicious of and resist any attempts to seriously increase its consciousness. This is why the planet suffers and the solutions that are implemented are only half-hearted. The core needs to be fixed, not just the obvious environmental issues that are mostly ignored. As Repa Sundhi has clearly stated, the planet is in a very critical state.

It is interesting that Repa Sundhi has also stated that he has high level connections in politics. Not only did he set up Department Zero for the Romanian government, he escaped Tibet as it was invaded and ended up working for the Chinese government. He has similar associations in many other countries, too. As I read Radu's book for the fourth time, these prospects caused me to rethink how David Anderson fits into these matters.

I have already written about the puzzling factors with regard to David thinking he had met Radu who has no recognition of such a meeting. As David also has associations at the highest levels of world leadership, it spurred the thought that Repa Sundhi might be a much more logical association for him. It also explains how he said he knew about Radu when I first asked him but not want to discuss it on the phone. I have asked David if he knows Repa Sundhi but have not received a response at this point. David often travels to the Far East, including China, but even if he does not know Repa Sundhi personally, I do know that he has mysterious partners that are tied to governments. It is highly likely that the more positive partners in time control technology might be allied to Repa Sundhi or put in place by him in the first place. Keep in mind that Repa Sundhi was able to activate a space-time portal. If the story is true, Repa Sundhi would likely be a senior consultant to David Anderson.

All of this makes for a delightful mystery. More importantly, it demonstrates that there is considerable effort being made on behalf of the planet by entities that are living outside of the normal or average human paradigm. If the planet is going to seriously and drastically improve on a wide basis, it is obvious that the human paradigm is going to have to change as well. Radu and I are both hoping that this book can serve as a catalyst.

With regard to David, his role in my life has always been rather mysterious. He was obviously attracted to my writing ability and he has stated such. From the very beginning of our association, however, he was also intent on bringing me to Romania which he believes has a crucial role to play in the future with regard to east-west relations. In this regard, it reminds me of the way Cezar approached Radu. He wanted him to write a book. As time developed, however, he had much more in store for Radu and so did Repa Sundhi and Machandi.

As things stand now, more mystery and adventures awaits. The next step is for me to receive, read, and publish the translation of Radu's third book which is entitled "Misterul din Egipt: Primul Tunel" which translates as "The Mystery of Egypt — The First Tunnel." If life moves as I would like it to, I hope to have it ready early in 2012.

In "The Mystery of Egypt — First Tunnel," Elinor leaves Romania for his own security reasons and proceeds to an unknown destination. Before that happens, Radu is clued-in on Elinor's villa in Bucharest which has a secret alchemical lab in the basement. Radu becomes the caretaker of this property and is particularly interested in the impressive library there.

After taking possession of the villa, Radu is unexpectedly contacted by Cezar and taken to Alpha Base. Dr. Xien is wanted by the secret service for occult reasons that have to do with inside government connections, but he is nowhere to be found. It is hoped that Radu can reestablish this lost connection due to his relationship with Machandi. It is a lost cause, however, at least for the time being.

Radu then describes changes occurring inside the secret military base in the Bucegi mountains and the particulars of the tunnel in the Projection Room that leads to Egypt. He becomes part of a five man team that was assembled to explore this tunnel. A fascinating account of this expedition is given accompanied by simple sketches. Cezar, who is also a part of the five man team, supplies Radu with a considerable amount of esoteric information. This includes an amazing account from 10,000 B.C. which he learned about in the Projection Hall but was not allowed to reveal until now.

The five man party also included a computer genius from the Pentagon, Romanian Lieutenant Nicoara of Department Zero, and a Special Service

Lieutenant who ends up being unveiled as a USAP* (Unacknowledged Special Access Project) agent of the Secret Freemason World Government.

* In Transylvania Sunrise, it was incorrectly stated that USAP referred to the United States Antarctic Program instead of Unacknowledged Special Access Project.

This party reaches the end of the tunnel without incident and an occult chamber is discovered. It is accurately described in minute detail and includes the following: an immense library full of tables which is the obvious product of extraterrestrial technology and contains a “history” of our own galaxy and the universe; an antigravity gliding device; and a virtual replica of the enormous machine found in the Projection Hall that is adapted for human use. Cezar describes the latter as a time travel machine that allows the consciousness of the subject to be projected in an ever existing time dimension and gives full details of the true nature of time and of the akashic records. He also speaks of his time travel experiences.

Towards the end of Volume III, Radu describes his attempts to make use of the time machine. After two consecutive failures, he obtains a quick projection into a secret tunnel of the Great Pyramid of Cheops. Radu suddenly realizes that the scientific community does not have a clue about it when he is confronted with the vision of the real masters of the pyramids from long forgotten times.

The fourth book in the series is “Pergamentul Secret:Cinci Tehnici Initiatice Tibetane” which translates into English as “Secret Parchment: Five Tibetan Initiation Techniques.” If things go according to plans, my translator will complete this shortly after finishing the third book. Secret Parchment is a translation of the manuscript Radu was given by Machandi. The book also contains information about the reorganization of Department Zero and their liaison with the United States Government. Radu visits a top secret installation in Maryland which includes interaction with the remote viewing community. Since Cezar left to become an ambassador to the Inner Earth, the political pressure to suppress Radu’s books had increased. As I write this, it has increased to an unprecedented extent. Riots have broken out in Egypt which are politically tied to access of the chambers discussed in “The Mystery of Egypt.”

It looks like both book three and book four will be released in 2012 with “The Secret Parchment” being released just as the Mayan calendar comes to an end. I personally have no beliefs or commitments attached to this date. Preston’s Montauk research was more concerned with 2013.

My intuition tells me that I will finally meet Radu when his first four books have been published in English. I think we will then write a fifth book, either together or separately.

In summary, my dream of over twenty years ago appears to have pulled me to the heart of Transylvania and paved the way for all of these remarkable adventures. The ancient history of Transylvania, however, goes far beyond whatever you, I or academe has ever considered. I learned more about this when I travelled to Bulgaria after my 2010 visit to Romania. In Bulgaria, I was greeted by my Bulgarian publisher who took me on a whirlwind tour of the ancient ruins of his country. It was a ten day trip which is too long to go into here. I took over ten hours of video footage and hope to release that at some point in the future. What I will share at this point is rather brief, but serious historians in Bulgaria (not necessarily the academics) know that ancient culture emanated from the proto-Thracian culture that was centered around Bulgaria but also embraced the area we now know as Romania. There are lots of stone chambers and even reports of more exotic high tech chambers as well.

What I want to stress here is what Radu said about the events in the “Ramayana” having occurred in Transylvania. The “Ramayana” is one of the two great classics of Vedic or Indian literature, the other being the “Bhagavad Gita.” The “Ramayana” is about the blue god Rama and his wife Sita. It is briefly discussed in Radu’s narrative, but I would encourage all readers to read outside sources for a better understanding, keeping in mind that it is only a surface history. The Bhagavad Gita is concerned with the blue god Krishna whose very name means dark blue. This obviously applies to the Blue Race and an ancient history that is long lost to historians.

I am bringing this up because it ties in to one of the biggest targets of oppression in Eastern Europe and also applies to the rest of Europe as well. I am referring to the Gypsies, who are known as the Roma. The names Roma and Rama are intimately tied to one another phonetically and etymologically. There is a scholarly etymology which demonstrates that the word Roma derived from Rama. Students of phonetics will realize that vowels are interchangeable anyway. This revelation becomes very important with regard to the Roma because their origins are obscure. Their namesake and culture are very much tied to Romania but their Hindi-like appearance and language have convinced many that they originated in India.

A thorough study of Bulgarian history will teach you that the Vedic, Egyptian, Persian and Chinese cultures emanated from Eastern Europe. There was also an ancient priest-king of the proto-Thracian Bulgarian culture who was known as Sham and this is where the word shaman originated. The third letter of the Bulgarian alphabet is vede and this is where the Vedic culture gets its name. Lao Tzu's ancestry was from Bulgaria as were the techniques he brought with him. The Egyptian cat goddess Bast was buried in her native country and has a tomb on the border of Bulgaria and Turkey which is recognized as her tomb in ancient Tibetan scrolls. More details of this are for a different day, but my point here is that this explains how the Roma and their Romani language could have derived from Rama in Transylvania, migrated to India and returned, if it ever fully left in the first place. There are many common or similar words that Roma and Romanian share. It should also be pointed out that scholars indicate that Romanian derived from Latin when soldiers from Rome retired in Romania. This has been demonstrated as faulty as the Romanian language is closer in structure to Classical Latin than it is to Vulgar Latin which was the vernacular at the time the Roman soldiers invaded and eventually lived in Romania. Why would the Romanians develop a language that is similar to a language that was no longer spoken? Misconceptions yield to obvious facts.

The word rama* means “dark” in Sanskrit so it is referring to either “dark blue” as in the word krishna or just “darkness.” Rama was identified as a blue god in literature. So it is that our journey becomes circular, feeding back on itself like a closed time-like curve. The more we study time, the more we learn about ancient history and vice versa.

I will look forward to Radu's next installment and hope that you too can read it soon.

* The phoneme ra can also be construed as “cat” when you consider that the Chief of the Erie Mound Builders has taught me that ir means cat as in Erie or Iroquois. Ra is the same as ira when the i is dropped. The ma in Rama can also be construed as cat when you consider that mau and mao both mean cat in Egyptian and Chinese. Not only is Rama construable as “two cats” but his wife, Sita, also has a name that means cat. My friend, Sid Catlett, has taught me this etymology which he learned through a very hard lesson. Both of his names mean cat. Sid derives from cit which became city which is based upon a fairy mound called a sidhe which is a portal to another world. Cities were often built around such a magical site. The word site comes from sidhe. If you consider that the word Moor also means cat, you have a deeper understanding of the foundations at work here. The Roma, like the Moors, have been suppressed for centuries because they represent the feminine. The secret name of Roma, Italy (Rome is Roma in Italian) is Amor (Roma reversed), a word which means “love” and also refers to Moor. Signor Massini, his people, and the Vatican all represent the antithesis of the Moors.

Appendix A — Space-Time Interval (by Peter Moon)

Most of our experiences in the physical universe conform to Newtonian laws and/or what is referred to as Galilean relativity. Galileo determined that there exists an absolute space in which Newton's laws are true and that there is a universal time and space. Among other things, Einstein's Special Theory of Relativity expands this theory but also takes different observers into account (like those experiencing time dilation while travelling near the speed of light) and states that the speed of light is the same for all inertial observers regardless of the state of motion of the source.

A very important corollary of Einstein's Special Theory of Relativity, and in particular with regard to the work and breakthroughs of Dr. David Anderson, is something known as the Invariance of the Space-Time Interval. The understanding of the Space-Time Interval is critical to creatively apply time-warped field theory that is the cornerstone of the reactor designs being operated today by Dr. Anderson. The term Space-Time Interval simply refers to the space or time separation between any two events in the universe. The interval or measurement between two events is really a very simple proposition and will yield to simple arithmetical or geometrical calculation without any difficulty unless we consider different observers observing from different vantage points. Of particular note in this could be an observer in a space ship travelling near the speed of light. As time will dilate for him, he might travel from point A to point B and be back in a shorter time (from his perspective as well as the measurement of the watch he had on his arm) than someone observing it from a space station between the two points.

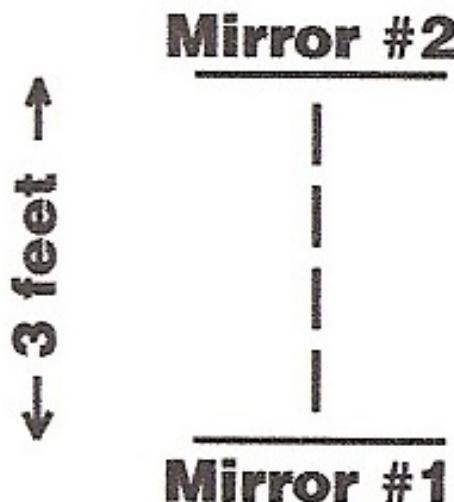

Einstein's Theory of Special Relativity, as well as other physicists who have made further proofs of this, tell us that no matter where the observer is or in what mode he is travelling, the Space-Time Interval between the two points will always be the same. This is known as the Invariance of the Space-Time Interval. If this sounds simple, it should. It is common sense, but scientists have also subjected this to excruciating proof to account for time dilation and other phenomena associated with near-speed-of-light phenomena. So, in summary, the Invariance of the Space-Time Interval refers to the fact that no matter the motion status of the observer, the time and distance between two points or two events in space will always be the same.

There is an equation, based upon the work and postulates of Einstein, that scientists use for figuring out the Space-Time Interval. It is based upon the Pythagorean Theorem which is $a^2 + b^2 = c^2$. (The sum of the square of two sides of a right triangle will equal the square of the hypotenuse). As the equation of the Space-Time Interval is a bit more complicated, I will first present the rationale with regard as to how it fits into the Pythagorean Theorem. This will give you a very important foundation to understanding time that is not clear from reading most ordinary or advanced physics books.

To demonstrate his theory, Einstein postulated a traveler (think of a rocket or spaceship moving near light speed) as having a clock that was based upon a beam of light flashing between two mirrors arbitrarily placed at three feet apart for easy computational purposes. The beam of light, moving at c (the speed of light which is virtually the same as the speed of one foot per nanosecond), is going to tick (digitally or otherwise) once every three nanoseconds.

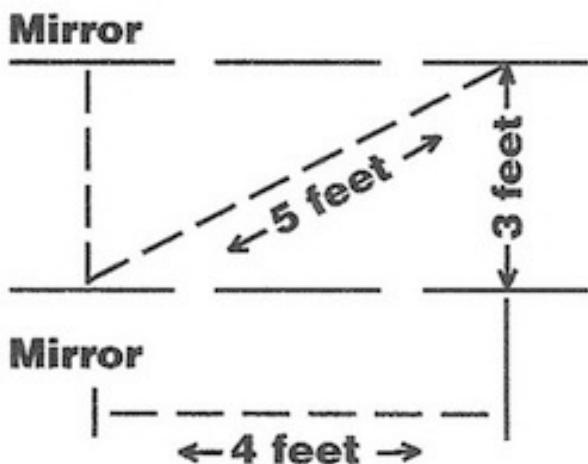

Now, both you and a rocket traveller have identical clocks, but you are at a stationary point such as a space station or at home base. As the rocket man moves at near the speed of light so will his mirror be moving at such a speed. As your clock emanates a beam from Mirror #1, it moves straight in the direction of your second mirror (Mirror #2 as per the previous example). His clock, however, (if you were to be able to see it — see example below) would be emanating a beam of light from his Mirror #1 that would hit a location different than the original location of where his second mirror (Mirror #2) once was. Four nanoseconds later, his Mirror #2 would be four feet to the right when the beams reaches it. The beam will then zigzag down and up, etc. as the rocket ship zooms through space.

One can therefore easily see that if the mirror had travelled four feet during this period, one has a right triangle situation where the Pythagorean Theorem applies and the hypotenuse is now deduced to be five feet. This example is included so you can appreciate how the Pythagorean Theorem is utilized in a scientific equation known as the Invariance of the Space-Time Interval which is as follows:

This equation is standard science recognized by physicists universally. You can see how it fits in with the Pythagorean Theorem when we extrapolate by saying that if A squared + B squared = C squared then it is also true that A squared = C squared - B squared. Note that as the astronaut in the rocket and his mirror clock move, he is experiencing time dilation. In other words, he will age slower than you or whoever is in the space station when he returns after travelling at near light speed.

What is new, and what Dr. David Anderson brings to the table, is that the measurement of the astronaut can be conveyed in terms of distance. The astronaut is moving through space but his mirror can be clocked in terms of distance by reason of the mirror example. The hypotenuse of the right triangle represents the velocity of a light beam with reference to the speed of light or a fraction of the speed of light, depending upon how fast the beam is moving. Further, the speed of light itself can be expressed in distance as light moves 3×10^8 feet per second. Time can be referenced to distance. This is a very important point. Why? It gives a common unit of measurement between time and space which is otherwise unknown to modern physics. Further, the application of this principle can be applied when looking under a high powered microscope, to lasers, or any other technology you can imagine. One can navigate their way through any coordinate system of any kind. Time is now less mysterious as a concept but also to technological applications as well.

Appendix B — Time Reactors (by Peter Moon)

As part of his time travel studies, Dr. David Anderson recognized that the earth, or any rotating body such as a planet, coexists with what is termed “twisted spacetime.” This is not a new concept to science. Einstein’s theory of general relativity predicted that rotating bodies drag space-time around themselves in a phenomenon known as frame-dragging. In what amounts to a rough metaphor, imagine the air swirling around a tornado that displaces dust and air that moves around it. So does the actual fabric of space-time move when a planet rotates, but it does so very slightly.

The rotational frame-dragging effect was first figured out from the theory of general relativity in 1918 by Austrian physicists Josef Lense and Hans Thirring who predicted that the rotation of an object would alter space and time, thus dragging a nearby object out of position in contrast to the prediction of Newtonian physics. This effect, however is infinitesimal and amounts to one part in a few trillion and requires a very sensitive instrument to measure it.

Although this twisting of spacetime is very small, a huge rotating body like the earth contains enormous levels of potential energy by reason of the tension in the fabric of spacetime that is caused by inertial frame-dragging. These observations have led Dr. Anderson to formulate a system which will harvest and apply the stored potential energy between points separated by regions of twisted or curved spacetime or hyperspace. It is called a time reactor and there is a patent pending on it.

The implications of these theories and their accompanying patent by Dr. Anderson are staggering because it completely changes the paradigm with regard to power generation. This system is clean and inexpensive compared to current systems in use and there are no dangerous by-products. A time reactor not only generates high levels of clean power but also containable and controllable time-warped fields and closed time-like curves and is able to utilize the stored potential energy across any region of curved spacetime or hyperspace. This includes any area of curved spacetime, whether naturally or artificially created. A time reactor is the only system of its kind that will generate such power and time-warped fields.

There is no limit to the size of a time reactor. It could be a micro device or a power station that harnesses the frame dragging aspects of the earth itself. There are infinite applications and ones that I have not touched upon yet, but we will first briefly address some technical aspects.

The system components of a time reactor include the following: 1) The Environment; 2) The Reactor Emitter; 3) The Reactor Power Collector; 4) The Energy Storage Device; 5) The Power Conduit; 6) The Reactor Control System and 7) The Reactor Field Chamber. A brief description of each follows.

- 1) The Environment is any region between and including two or more separated points in between which is a region of man-made or naturally-occurring curved spacetime or hyperspace.
- 2) The Reactor Emitter is an assembly located at any of a set of multiple points in space that are separated across a region of curved spacetime or hyperspace which produces an information and energy beam when activated. The form of the beam may include but is not limited to thermal, chemical, electrical, radiant, nuclear, magnetic, elastic, sound, mechanical, spacetime-generated or any other form of information and energy known in the art that has the ability to enable the coupling and discharge of the spacetime-motive force stored within regions of curved spacetime or hyperspace.
- 3) The Reactor Power Collector is an assembly located at any of a set of multiple points that are separated across a region of curved spacetime or hyperspace which captures the energy within the spacetime-motive force when it is coupled and discharged between the points.
- 4) The Energy Storage Device is an assembly that receives, stores, and releases energy created by the operation of the time reactor. The forms of the energy stored, processed and released by the energy storage device may include but are not limited to thermal, chemical, electrical, radiant, nuclear, magnetic, elastic, sound, mechanical and spacetime-generated energy. The energy storage device may consist of other types of energy storage devices known in the art, including but not limited to batteries and fuel cells.

5) The Power Conduit comprises an energy conducting pathway connecting a reactor power collector to the energy storage device. It may be of any material or structure known in the art with the ability to conduct forms of energy including but not limited to thermal, chemical, electrical, radiant, nuclear, magnetic, elastic, sound, mechanical and spacetime-generated energy.

6) The Reactor Control System comprises feedback, monitoring and control of all parts, components, and operation of the time reactor. This includes all devices and communications necessary to sense, manage, command, direct or regulate the behavior of all time reactor parts and components. Devices may include but are not limited to, sensors, controllers, actuators, computer systems, communications, software algorithms and the operator human-machine interfaces needed to successfully operate the time reactor.

7) The Reactor Field Chamber is an assembly with a volumetric area located near a reactor power collector and the energy storage device of the time reactor. The reactor field chamber is positioned near and within the effects of fields generated by the operation of the time reactor. The reactor field chamber creates an environment for monitoring, study, experimentation, and application of the fields generated by operation of the time reactor. This applies to many types of fields dependent on the type of energy being accessed, channeled or generated by operation of the reactor. This includes the fields generated by spacetime-motive forces within the reactor field chamber that includes but is not limited to time-warped fields, fields of closed time-like curves, and any fields producing variations of special spacetime geometries.

A basic time reactor may include just one emitter and collector or arrays of each. There is no limit to different configurations that might be employed. Further, the form of the energy captured is unlimited and may vary and the invention is not limited to power generation but can even be used for more exotic applications such as time acceleration and deceleration within the reactor field chamber. This is accomplished when the fields generated by the coupling of spacetime-motive force are concentrated and controlled in or near the reactor field chamber in order to produce time-warped fields.

Such fields include closed time-like curves which allow for the time acceleration and deceleration. Once again, there are multiple applications.

Other exotic applications of a time reactor include the creation of carrier waveforms in the structure of spacetime that may permit modulation and accelerated long distance communication through spacetime or hyperspace. It may also be possible to use the characteristics of the coupled spacetime motive force and the time reactor to create fields providing force-at-a-distance through spacetime. This is akin to force fields you have seen on Star Trek or in other science fiction stories. In addition, the invention creates conditions that may be valuable for multi-dimensional computing and many applications in research and development in the area of spacetime physics and high-energy systems.

Does all of this sound too incredible to be true? It should, but it is actually being patented in the United States Patent Office. This is not a theory but an application that has actually been subject to laboratory experiments.

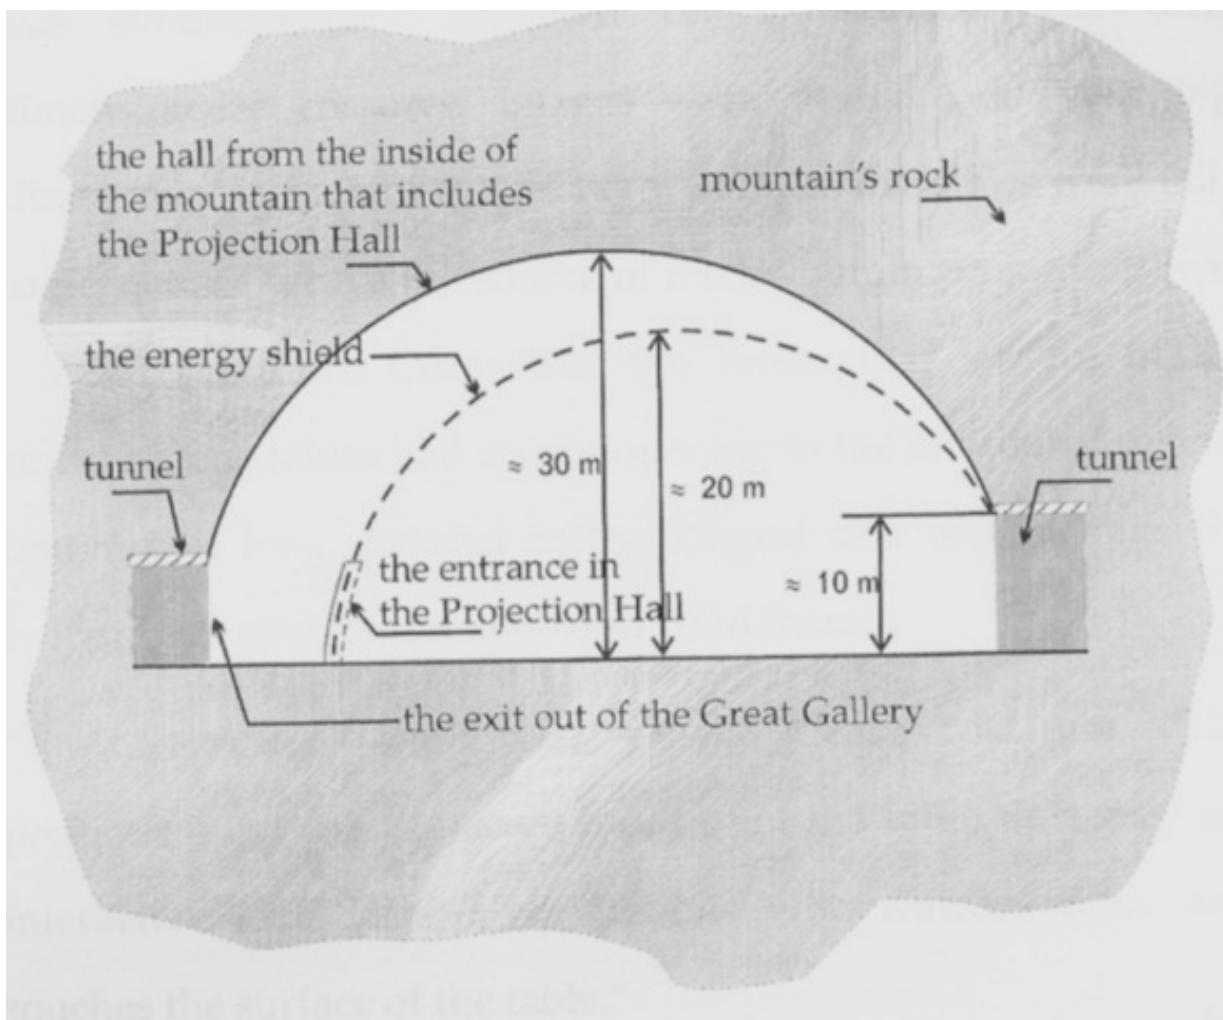

This not only solves the world's energy problems, it suggests there will be wide-sweeping changes that put us on the precipice of a space opera society. These wonderful technological breakthroughs mentioned here, however, are only as good as they can be implemented. You all know the stories of how Tesla's miraculous inventions were shelved by the power elite. We next have to consider the politics of change with regard to implementing this technology.

David has long said that all technology which is released to the public, whether it be laptops, cell phones or any other gadget, is in government hands at least 15 or 20 years before it is released to the public. This suggests that such time control has been familiar to them and that they are only now allowing him to release it.

Sky Books

Established in 1992, Sky Books became immediately recognized as the premier publisher in the world on the scientific pursuit of time travel and time control when it published “The Montauk Project: Experiments in Time” (see below), a book which shook the world due to its unprecedented insight into the mechanics of time. Always immersed in very controversial subject matter and traditionally boycotted by the mainstream media, Sky Books is a company built on grass roots popularity and its influence has been recognized worldwide with translations in Japan, China, Germany, Spain, Romania and Bulgaria. Sky Books has published over fifteen titles since releasing “The Montauk Project” and also issues a quarterly newsletter which has continuously remained in print since 1993. Continue reading for further information on these titles and also newsletters (including back issues) on the topic of the Montauk Project. Ordering instructions are at the very end.

Since “The Montauk Project” was published in 1992, there have been many interesting developments and several sequels chronicling the investigation to determine whether or not “The Montauk Project” did, in fact, exist.

Preeminent in this quest has been the “Montauk Pulse,” a quarterly newsletter that has been written by Peter Moon since 1993. It has never missed an issue, and there has never been a lack of interesting things to report upon, and these include Peter Moon’s adventures with Dr. David Anderson (see www.andersoninstitute.com), a scientist who has excelled in understanding the actual mechanics of time and has made remarkable breakthroughs with time control technology. Dr. Anderson’s work is all based upon hard science.

If you are interested in subscribing to the “Montauk Pulse” or receiving past back issues, you may visit the Sky Books website or follow the ordering instructions at the very end of this ebook. The Sky Books website also features all of our sequels to “The Montauk Project” and other titles which are all available in hard copy format. We are also currently working hard to get all Sky Books titles into ebook format as well, including the back issues of the “Montauk Pulse” which now features three separate volumes comprising six years worth of newsletters each. The Sky Books website is as follows:

THE MONTAUK PROJECT: EXPERIMENTS IN TIME

“The Montauk Project” chronicles the most amazing and secretive research project in recorded history. Starting with the “Philadelphia Experiment” of 1943, invisibility experiments were conducted aboard the USS Eldridge that resulted in full scale teleportation of the ship and crew. Forty years of massive research ensued, culminating in bizarre experiments at Montauk Point that actually tapped the powers of creation and manipulated time itself. “The Montauk Project” bridges the modalities of Science with the most esoteric techniques ever imagined and finally catapults us to the threshold of the stars. We all know something is out there, but we’re not sure exactly what. This book, at long last begins to provide some solid clues.

THE SEQUELS

The stir and controversy produced by “The Montauk Project” was overwhelming to the society it was released into in 1992. The powers that be behind the military industrial complex had a lot to explain. As has been the pattern for decades, they called on one of their old allies, Hollywood, and a whole new genre of television shows were spawned in an attempt to absorb the fallout of questions and to do damage control on the trail of information thus exposed. The most successful of these shows was the X Files. In the meantime, Peter Moon set about trying to verify the general thesis put forward in “The Montauk Project”. The result was of equal interest to the first book and resulted in:

SERIES

Montauk Revisited: Adventures in Synchronicity

When Peter Moon researched the remnant trail of this mysterious time travel project, he encountered incredible and unprecedented experiences in synchronicity which ultimately unmasked many of the occult forces that were behind the technology used in “The Montauk Project”. Following the trail of these “coincidences,” Peter Moon reveals an enigmatic occult tapestry which leads from the mysterious associations of the Cameron Clan to the genesis of American rocketry and the magick of Aleister Crowley, Jack Parsons, and L. Ron Hubbard. The Montauk investigation carries forward as Preston Nichols tells the bizarre history of the electronic transistor as he opens the door to Peter Moon and unleashes a host of incredible characters and new information. A startling scenario is depicted that reaches far beyond the scope of the first book. Illustrations and photos are included.

256 pages, ISBN 0-9631889-1-7 $19.95

Immediately after Montauk Revisited was completed, and much to his surprise, Peter Moon discovered that the mysterious trail of synchronicities was getting even more fascinating when he discovered that the site of “The Montauk Project” experiments was sacred Native American ground that was once accompanied by ancient pyramids which could be clearly seen in old photographs of Montauk. The result of this brand new investigation was:

BOOK III
OF THE MONTAUK

Pyramids of Montauk: Explorations in Consciousness

An astonishing second sequel to “The Montauk Project” and Montauk Revisited awakens the consciousness of humanity to its ancient history and origins through the discovery of pyramids at Montauk. A full examination of the mysteries of the pyramids at Montauk Point reveals that the Montauk Tribe were the royal family of Long Island and that they used the name Pharaoh as a designation that connected their heritage to ancient Egypt and beyond. The discovery that these pyramids were placed on sacred native American ground opens the door to an unprecedented investigation of the mystery schools of earth and their connection to Egypt, Atlantis, Mars and the star Sirius. This book explains why Montauk was chosen as a select location for pyramids and time travel experimentation. A further examination of sacred geometry awakens the consciousness of humanity to its ancient history and origins. Preston Nichols also fascinates us with an update on covert operations that includes the discovery of a nuclear particle accelerator and the development of psychotronic weapons. The Pyramids of Montauk stirs the quest for the end of time as we know it. Includes photos and illustrations.

256 pages, ISBN 0-9631889-2-5, $19.95

The adventures had only just begun by this point. It was now 1995. After all of this information came out, Preston Nichols then revealed that he had mysterious UFO experiences as a young child and also as a teenager. This resulted in a new book which blends the history of physics and UFOlogy with Preston’s personal experiences and gives unprecedented insight into the technology of flying saucers and their accompanying phenomena in:

ENCOUNTER IN THE PLEIADES: AN INSIDE LOOK AT UFOS

ENCOUNTER IN THE PLEIADES: AN INSIDE LOOK AT UFOs

Encounter in the Pleiades: An Inside Look at UFOs

No constellation in the night sky has rivaled the Pleiades for its impact upon the mind of man. Artists, poets, scientists, mythographers and prophets alike have not only cited the Pleiades as an inspiration to their work but as a key to understanding mankind and his/her relationship with the creative principles of existence. This book is the incredible story of a man who found himself taken to the Pleiades where he was examined and instructed by intelligent life forms who appeared human. The Pleiadians proceeded to give him an education and indoctrination that would enable him to regain his health and attain an unparalleled understanding of electromagnetic science and its role in UFO technology. A new look at Einstein gives insights into the history of physics and how the speed of light can be surpassed through the principles of reality engineering. New concepts in science are offered with technical but simple descriptions even the layman can understand. These include the creation of alternate realities through the use of twisters and spinners; mind control aspects of the Star Wars defense system; implants; alien abductions and much more. Never before has the complex subject of UFOs been put together in such a simple language that can be appreciated by the scientist and understood by the layman. Peter Moon adds further intrigue to the mix by divulging his part in a bizarre project which led him to Preston Nichols and the consequent release of this information. His account of the role of the Pleiades in ancient mythology sheds new light on the current predicament of Mankind and offers a path of hope for the future.

256 pages, ISBN 0-9631889-3-3, $19.95

By the time Encounter in the Pleiades was published, Peter Moon had also accumulated considerable information on intriguing connections between the Montauk Project and the Nazis which also extended to the latter's mysterious connections to Tibet via occult master-mind Karl Haushofer. Peter's collection of information on this subject culminated with a visit from world renown author, Jan van Helsing, who allowed him to publish (for the first time in America) his photos of the mysterious German flying craft built before and during World War II in connection with the Vril Society. There is much to read in:

The Black Sun: Montauk's Nazi-Tibetan Connection

After World War II and the subsequent occupation of Germany, Allied military commanders were stunned to discover the penetrating depth of the Nazi regime's state secrets. The world's best intelligence organization was not the least of these revelations. Also discovered were massive and meticulous research files on secret societies, eugenics and other scientific pursuits that boggled the imagination of the Allied command. Even more spectacular was an entire web of underground rocket and flying saucer factories with accompanying technology that still defies ordinary beliefs. A missing U-boat fleet possessing the most advanced submarine technology in the world left many wondering if the Nazis had escaped with yet more secrets or even with Hitler himself. Behind all of these mysteries was an even deeper element: a secret order known to initiates as the Order of the Black Sun, an organization so feared that it is now illegal to even print their symbols and insignia in modern Germany. The Black Sun probes deeper into the secrets of the Third Reich and its Tibetan contacts than any other previous attempt. Author Peter Moon ties all of these strange associations to Montauk Point, where an American military facility was used by the Nazis to further their own strange experiments and continue the agenda of the Third Reich. Peter Moon unravels more Montauk mysteries which leads to the most insightful look ever into the Third Reich and their ultimate quest: the Ark of the Covenant and the Holy Grail. This quest penetrates the secret meaning behind the Egyptian and Tibetan "Books of the Dead". Includes photographs and illustrations.

When The Black Sun was completed, a very interesting man surfaced who was mentioned in Montauk Revisited by the pseudonym of Stan Campbell who had gone to prison for refusing to cut his ties to Preston Nichols. Preston's revelations concerning Montauk were very hot at the time and "Stan's" involvement in the Montauk Project was a very sensitive issue to the authorities. When he was eventually released from prison, he no longer had anything to lose and went public under his real name, Stewart Swerdlow, and wrote:

Montauk: The Alien Connection

As the new millenium unfolds, countless stories of alien abductions have begun to penetrate the mainstream consciousness of Mankind. While some new insights into the human condition have been obtained, too few of these accounts have brought such experiences to a level where they can be consumed and digested into a profitable understanding for the individual reader. Montauk: the Alien Connection unravels the remarkable story of Stewart Swerdlow, a gifted mentalist who has experienced extrasensory perception since birth. Stewart's rare abilities not only made him a magnet for government surveillance, but his unique genetic structure made him a clearing house for different alien agendas which sought him out for their own purposes. Everyone's sinister plans went haywire after Stewart began a deprogramming procedure with Preston Nichols which was designed to clear his memories and the controlling influences which had been installed. Stewart was subsequently threatened and eventually jailed after refusing to comply with orders to sever his ties with Nichols. Despite this, the truth began to work its way into his life. Estranged from his family, Stewart was sent to prison as a financially destitute and hopeless, tragic figure. Despite a severe human struggle, he was able to call on his own God-given abilities, reshuffle the deck, and reevaluate his life and the various agencies and entities which sought to utilize him. Weeding out the most negative influences, Stewart was able to recover key memories and discard those forces which sought to entrap him. The most intriguing aspect of his incredible story is that he has a valuable legacy to share.

The miraculous and strange become common place as you journey out of this dimension with Stewart Swerdlow and discover the Language of Hyperspace, a simple system of geometric and archetypal glyphs enabling us to comprehend universal mysteries ranging from crop circles to the full panorama of occult science. Written for both individuals and practitioners alike, The Healer's Handbook embraces color healing, dream analysis, numeric values and symbols, auric fields, astral and hyperspace travel, and radionics as well as offering exercises designed to unlock DNA sequences programmed within you since the beginning of your existence. The ancients uniformly alluded to an arcane language, sometimes described as Vril or Babylonian, which was once common to all mankind, connected to the Mind of God and also served as an inter-species and interuniversal language. Now, for the first time ever, is an entire text dedicated to the explanation of these ancient concepts. This book penetrates the secrets of creation through DNA and includes a vast panorama of healing and meditation techniques. Fully illustrated with exercises, color chart, Dream Dictionary and Hyperspace Dictionary which includes the most complete rendering of the Hyperspace Language available.

Having known Preston Nichols for many years at this point, Peter Moon had heard many stories of Preston's intriguing involvement in the music industry where he worked as a sound engineer for many popular rock groups of the Sixties and Seventies. At the same time, Preston became involved in some very hot political water over the legal case concerning John Ford, the founder and president of the Long Island UFO Network. John was put targetted by government forces and was incarcerated ever since without ever having received a trial. Read about both of these intriguing aspects of Preston's life in:

The Music of Time

The Music of Time blends music with time travel as Preston Nichols reveals his hidden role in the music industry where he worked as an expert sound engineer and recorded hundreds of hit records during the Golden Era of Rock 'n Roll. Beginning with his work for Time Records, Preston chronicles his innovations in sound engineering and tells how he constructed the premier music studio in the world for Phil Spector at Bell Sound. Having created a Mecca for talented musicians, Preston found himself surrounded by and interfacing with the likes of the Beatles, Beach Boys, Rolling Stones, and many more such popular acts. For the first time, Preston reveals his employment at Brookhaven Labs and how his connections in the music industry were used for mind control and manipulation of the masses. Ultimately, Preston's real life adventures lead to time travel and the bone chilling efforts of his adversaries to put him permanently out of commission. These include his association with John Ford, the founder of the Long Island UFO Network, who was arrested on the ridiculous charge of conspiring to put radium in the toothpaste of the local County Executive. Ford was railroaded into jail without a trial and then placed in an institute for the criminally insane without ever having received any trial, let alone a fair one. The County Executive was later imprisoned himself but Ford remains locked up to this day. In a remarkable twist of fate, mysterious forces rescue Preston and lead him to a bizarre series of financial transactions which set him up to be involved in a new time travel project. The Music of Time unravels more layers of mystery in mankind's epic quest to understand the paradox of time and the imprisonment of consciousness.

With all the literature that had been produced thus far, the subject of the Montauk Project was very popular and intriguing to the public but its controversy raised many questions and attacks by those who were upset by the data and disillusioned by their own belief systems being shattered. Peter Moon sought out additional sources to verify aspects of the general story of the Montauk Project that were not connected to Montauk Project per se.

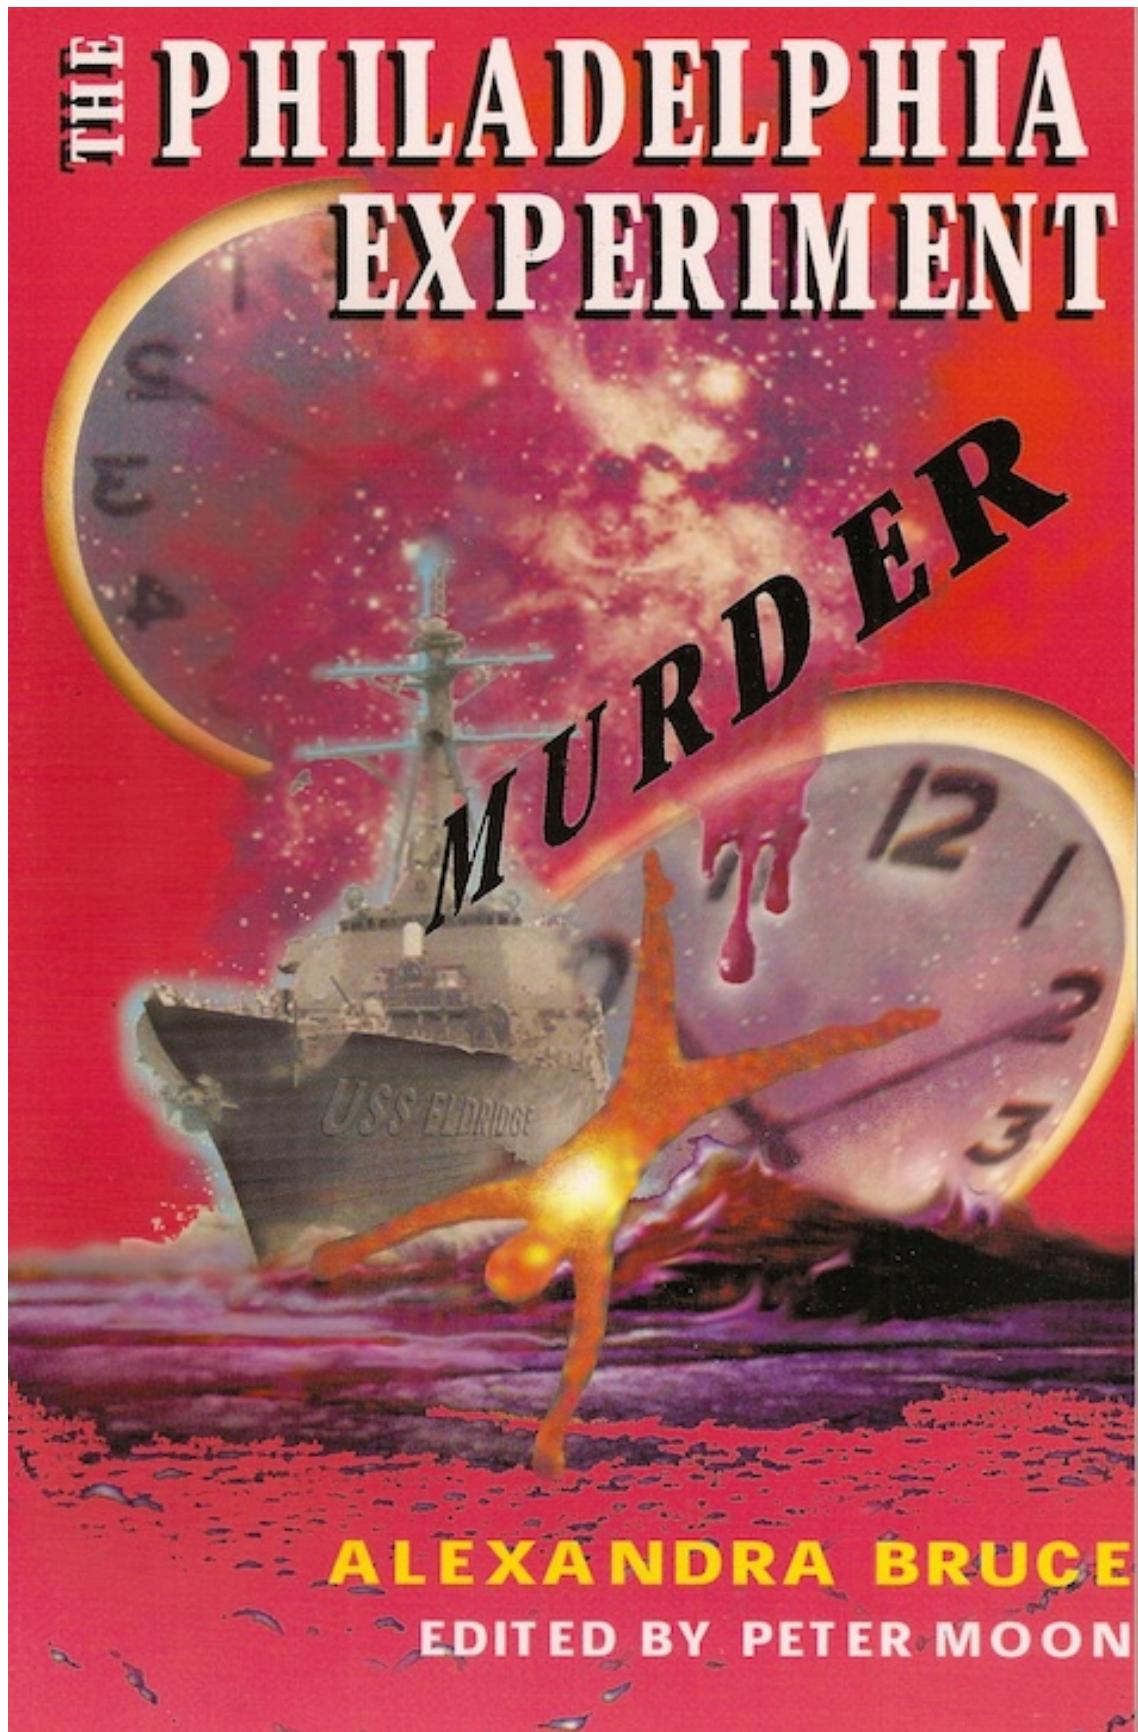

The first book of this nature from Sky Books was:

THE PHILADELPHIA EXPERIMENT

MURDER

The Philadelphia Experiment Murder: Parallel Universes and the Physics of Insanity

An added edition to the intriguing series by Sky Books which exposes the truth about the conspiracy to manipulate time itself. This book, edited and contributed to by Peter Moon and authored by Alexandra Bruce, begins with the tragic murder of conspiracy lecturer Phil Schneider. An investigation of this murder exposes a massive cover-up by authorities and reveals astonishing information, the trail of which leads back to the Philadelphia Experiment of 1943. Before his assassination, Schneider lectured across the country and released documents connecting his father to the U.S.S. Eldridge. Additionally, his father claimed to be a Nazi U-boat captain who, after being captured by the Allies, was recruited as a medical officer and served as a Senior Medical Officer to the crew of the Eldridge. More haunting was the discovery of gold bars in his father's possessions with Nazi insignia. The Philadelphia Experiment Murder investigates these circumstances and uncovers a host of new characters including Preston Nichols' actual boss from the Montauk Project. Startling truths are revealed which lead to an examination of parallel universes and the nature of insanity itself.

While The Philadelphia Experiment Murder was being written, a man surfaced who had grown up in and around the mysterious Brookhaven Laboratory on Long Island, the very location where the Montauk Project was hatched. His amazing story is:

The Brookhaven Connection

Since the advent of the atomic era, Long Island's Brookhaven National Laboratory has served as the premier and most top secret research lab in the world. Shrouded in mystery since its inception, no one has been able to crack the code of secrecy surrounding it. Wade Gordon, who grew up in and around the lab and amidst its top players, now tells his personal story of how he was groomed from a very young age to share the legacy of what happened there. Beginning with Brookhaven's formative years when the Philadelphia Experiment was researched, links are revealed which tie Brookhaven directly to the Roswell Crash, the National Security Act, the MJ-12 documents (which are included in this book) and the Montauk Project. This includes a description of a time chamber which was utilized to monitor the JFK assassination in order to secure funding for the continued existence of the researchers.

One of the most interesting research threads Peter Moon had ever encountered occurred right after completing Montauk Revisited, but it took years for him to meet the man who was responsible for circulating this mysterious legend of quantum research on the internet. his name is Joseph Matheny. Together, they collaborated to put this into a hard copy book:

ONG'S HAT: THE BEGINNING

Ong's Hat: The Beginning

Ong's Hat is a real but enigmatic location in south central New Jersey that has inspired a counterculture revolution in physics. Exotic pursuits in the Many-Worlds Interpretation of quantum mechanics by Princeton physicists paved the way for avant-garde experiments in quantum consciousness. Integrating meditation with biofeedback and brain machine techniques, synchronicity attractors were developed which sought out tangible states of existence beyond the bounds of Earth. Allegedly, the experimenters achieved success with the accessing of parallel universes. Up to now, the truth about the cult has been vague and indecisive, but the legends, technology and quantum theory surrounding it are more than tangible. Since Peter Moon's involvement in the Montauk investigation, he has encountered incredible synchronicities with regard to space-time projects and clans of mystery. None of these have been more riveting than his encounter with Joseph Matheny and the legends of Ong's Hat, a real but enigmatic location in south central New Jersey that was once used as a return address for dissident Princeton physicists who wrote anonymous papers that broke the scientific barriers of the day. This is the first book in hard copy format to explore Ong's Hat, the home of a mysterious ashram with both scientific and natural features that included a hodgepodge of Tantra, Sufism, Ismaili esotericism, alchemy, psychopharmacology, biofeedback and brain machine meditation techniques that was said to involve actual time travel by the participants. Compiled by Joseph Matheny, a multi-talented individual who was "chosen" as an intermediary by the time-travel cult, this work is based upon the popular ebook known as "The Incunabula Papers," but also contains new material revealed for the first time that includes interviews with actual survivors from the ashram and the revealing of an "egg" used for attracting synchronicity induced time travel. Up to now, the truth about the cult has been vague and indecisive, but the legends, technology and quantum theory surrounding the cult have been more than tangible.

192 pages, ISBN 0-9678162-2-X, $19.95

Peter Moon's collaboration with Joseph Matheny was a big breakthrough because it gave further answers to many of the fascinating magical threads which had been uncovered in Montauk Revisited. By this point in time, Peter was also sitting on many more aspects of that story, with particular regard to the Babalon Working and the connection between Jack Parsons and L. Ron Hubbard, which had not been fully communicated in his previous work. These were written up and released in:

SYNCHRONICITY & THE SEVENTH SEAL
by Peter Moon

SYNCHRONICITY AND the SEVENTH SEAL

Synchronicity & the Seventh Seal

This is Peter Moon's consummate work on Synchronicity. Beginning with a brief scientific description (for the layman) of the quantum universe and how the quantum observer (the spirit) can or does experience the principle of synchronicity, we are taught that synchronicity is also an expression of the divine or infinite mind. Besides exploring the concept and influences of parallel universes, this book includes numerous personal experiences of the author which not only forges a pathway of how to experience and appreciate synchronicity, but it goes very deep into the magical exploits of intriguing characters who sought to tap the ultimate powers of creation and use them for better or for worse. This not only includes the most in depth analysis and accurate depiction of the Babalon Working in print but also various antics and breakthroughs of the various players and that which influenced them. These characters include the legacies and personas of Jack Parsons, Marjorie Cameron, L. Ron Hubbard and Aleister Crowley. Peter Moon adds exponential intrigue to the mix by telling us of his personal experiences with these people and their wake which leads to even deeper encounters which penetrates the mysterious legacy of John Dee. Eventually, this pursuit of synchronicities leads Peter Moon to a most intriguing and mysterious encounter with Joseph Matheny, an adept who has not only had similar experiences to Peter, but has his own version of a space-time project known as Ong's Hat. Matheny has not only had incredible synchronicities himself, he created one of the highest forms of artificial intelligence known to man, a computer known as the Metamachine which is designed to precipitate and generate synchronicities. These many synchronicities lead to the books climax, a revelation of the true Seventh Seal. The proof is delivered. No theologian nor anyone has even tried to counter the claim.

After Synchronicity and the Seventh Seal was finished, Peter Moon wanted to complete a trail of investigation that he had pursued for many years and this had to do with occult phenomena surrounding a "quantum relic" he had been mysteriously handed when writing about the Montauk Pharoahs in Pyramids of Montauk. This "quantum relic" was so interwoven into the fabric of his life that he realized that, in order to present a complete picture, he would have to write two books instead of one. The first book was autiobiographical and includes an in depth look at Peter Moon's personal association with L. Ron Hubbard. It was deemed necessary to write this book before he could address the topic of the “quantum relic.”

THE MORTAUK BOOK OF THE DEAD

PETER MOON

The Montauk Book of the Dead

A tale of the intrigue and power which hovers over the most sacred kernel of our existence: the secrets of life and death. Beginning with his early years, Peter Moon reveals fascinating details of exactly how he became involved with Scientology and serendipitously ended up working in the personal employ of L. Ron Hubbard aboard the latter's famous "mystery ship" which was called the Apollo. Included in this riveting account is the story of how L. Ron Hubbard, at the age of twenty-seven, clinically "died" only to discover that he could "remote view." From this state of consciousness, which would later be called "exterior," he was able to access what he termed the answers to all of the questions that had ever puzzled philosophers or the minds of men. Transcribing this information into a work entitled "Excalibur," which is still under lock and key to this day, he developed one of the most controversial movements in history: Dianetics and Scientology. The truth and import of the above can only be evaluated by the all out war which was waged by governmental forces and spy agencies to obtain the legally construed rights to the above mentioned work and all of the developments and techniques that ensued from it. This is the personal story of Peter Moon which not only pierces the mystery of death and reveals fascinating details of his years aboard L. Ron Hubbard's mystery ship but gives the most candid and inside look ever at one of the most controversial figures in recent history.

451 pages, $29.95, ISBN 978-0-9678162-3-4

When The Montauk Book of the Dead was completed, Peter Moon would finally correlate information and experiences he had accumulated for twelve years, all of which surrounded a mysterious "quantum relic" which was, in fact, a 1909 playbill from the New Montauk Theatre that contained cryptic occult messages which are expounded upon in full in:

THE MONTAUK BOOK OF THE LIVING
by Peter Moon

The Montauk Book of the Living

PETER MOON

The Montauk Book of the Living

A stunning new book by Peter Moon that tells how his research into the Montauk Pyramids led to the discovery of a mysterious quantum relic. This relic not only led to the Matriarch of the Montauk Pharoahs but has opened the door to understanding the greatest mysteries of history. These include the occult biochemistry of an Amazonian Blue Race which founded the Egyptian culture and honored the feminine principle through the star Sirius. These truths lead to the unveiling of the biological truth behind the Virgin Birth and how this theme intertwines with the descendants of these Amazons who live today and are known as the Blue People of the Saha ra. Other occult surprises include new revelations concerning Aleister Crowley's The Book of the Law that demonstrably reveals that the ancients who built the pyramids of Cairo and Mars knew deeper secrets concerning DNA that our scientists of tod ay. The pursuit of these various threads leads to Peter Moon's encounter with Red Medicine, the Medicine Man of the Montauks who is destined to fulfill the Second Coming of the Pharoahs, a time prophesied by native elders which signals the return of ancient wisdom, universal brotherhood and healing . This is also the riveting personal story of Peter Moon which includes new streams of synchronicity that include the mystical background behind the events which led to the revelation of the Montauk Project. Old themes are revisited and more deeply explored, but there are more new twists and turns than ever. The legacy of the Montauk Pharoahs is explored as never before and leads to more truth than can be readily believe which is designed to launch a new era once prophesied by Native Elders as the Second Coming of the Pharaohs, said to signal the return of ancient wisdom, universal brotherhood and healing.

Although intriguing follow-ups had been done with the data uncovered in Montauk Revisited and Pyramids of Montauk, there was also an equally fascinating trail of data with regard to the Nazi-Tibetan connection researched in The Black Sun. This research is so controversial and so proprietary to the Government that it is virtually impossible to pursue beyond a certain point if one is going to use routine journalism. Taking solid threads that are based upon hard facts of journalism, Peter Moon opted to penetrate the unknown or occult aspects of the Nazi-Tibetan story through an intuitive stream of consciousness in:

SPANDAU MYSTERY

by Peter Moon

SPANDAU MYSTERY

PETER MOON

Spandau Mystery

A historical novel by Peter Moon which reveals how the mysterious deaths of General George Patton and Deputy Fuhrer Rudolph Hess were intertwined through the Nazi's secret flying saucer technology. Directed by Tibetan elders, the Germans sought to harness the Vril, an energy so powerful that it can change the very nature of the elements themselves. To succeed, however, a major change was required in the evolutionary development of the human species. A dramatic scenario of events unfolded, however, which not only ensured that this endeavor was sabotaged but included an undertaking designed to prevent humanity from ever discovering its ancient heritage and the secrets of the Vril. It was against this backdrop that two of the most colorful characters of World War II, Rudolph Hess and George S. Patton, became immersed in an age old battle involving the legions of light and darkness. The end of World War Two precipitated more intrigue and struggle for power than the war itself. Much of this centered around the secret projects sponsored by Rudolph Hess which included not only the Antarctic project but the construction of Vril flying saucers. Patton's job, as the war came to a close, was to recover the secret technology of the Germans and safeguard it for American use. After accomplishing his mission and compiling a German history of the war, General Patton was killed in a dubious accident, the mystery of which has never been solved and has been magnified by government refusal to declassify the file on the investigation of his death. Far more conspicuous and powerful than Patton was Rudolph Hess, the Deputy Fuhrer of Germany, who flew to England in 1941 as an envoy of peace and was imprisoned for life and suspiciously killed just before his imminent release. The current of intrigue and power which permeated these two individuals and led to their downfall was the same current which led to a repatriation of the U.S. Government and an undermining of a constitutional government that is run by and for the people. Besides technology, much of this intrigue centered around the banking files the Nazis confiscated from the Freemasons. The effort to keep this secret is still a factor in today's politics. It was thus that Patton and Hess wore different uniforms but shared common interests and held within their grasp a force so powerful that, if harnessed, it might raise the ancient civilization of Atlantis itself. It was for this power that both were killed and so begins our mystery. Spandau Mystery is an historical novel and murder mystery featuring 350 pages of fast and easy reading which penetrates one of the greatest intrigues surrounding the Nazis and their occult interests in Tibet: the ancient Dropa civilization, a group of “little people” who claim to descend from the stars and whose corroborating artifacts have been studied by scientists for over half a century. If you would like a new view of world history, order and read this book today.

As all of the aforementioned books were written and Peter Moon continued to report on various aspects of the Montauk phenomena, he met a very unusual and intriguing scientist, Dr. David Anderson, an engineer and physicist who had his own Time Travel Research Center on Long Island. This was a serious laboratory where time could be slowed down or speeded up in a self-contained field. Dr. Anderson also had a research center in Romania and eventually invited Peter to that country to lecture at a United Nations camp for youth. During this time, “The Montauk Project” was translated into the Romanian language and was ultimately responsible for creating a brand new publishing company in Romania, Daksha Publishing, which subsequently published what is arguably the most amazing story in the history of Mankind. It is intertwined with Peter Moon’s adventures with Dr. David Anderson in:

Transylvanian Sunrise

A mysterious scientist by the name of David Anderson made an eventful trip to Romania in 1999. Dr. Anderson, who is credited by the U.S. government as having developed advanced time-warp field technology, established diplomatic connections on this trip to Romania where he also set up an advanced research facility dedicated to studying the mathematics of time travel. Upon his return to the United States, Dr. Anderson visited Preston Nichols and Peter Moon, internationally known authors of "The Montauk Project: Experiments in Time," and introduced himself. At Dr. Anderson's suggestion, a collaboration with Peter Moon began which was brief, tenuous and eventually aborted due to security considerations as a result of a logistical attack on a similar time research center that had been set up on Long Island. Dr. Anderson's continued journeys to Romania eventually resulted in connecting Peter Moon with a Romanian publisher and Radu Cinamar, a member of the Romanian Intelligence Service's occult department. The purpose of this collaboration has to do with what is arguably the most significant archaeological discovery in the history of Mankind: a mysterious holographic hall of records that utilizes technology far beyond the concepts of modern science. Transylvanian Sunrise is the story of this mysterious discovery and the political intrigue surrounding it, all capably told by Radu Cinamar. After Peter Moon secured the publishing rights to this remarkable story, Dr. Anderson invited him to Romania where he has pursued these mysteries one step further. The story is inside this book and waiting to be read.

The remarkable story told in Transylvania Sunrise is exceeded in its sequel as it concerns the mysterious factors and actual characters that precipitated the most amazing discovery in the history of Mankind. Peter Moon also contributes with reports on his continued adventures with Dr. David Anderson and a journey to the ruins of an ancient culture in the heart of Transylvania in:

Transylvanian Moonrise: A Secret Initiation in the Mysterious Land of the Gods

Radu Cinamar rose to prominence for his role in exposing the most remarkable archaeological discovery in the history of Mankind: a secret chamber beneath the Romanian Sphinx containing holographic records of Earth's history, bio-resonance imaging technology, and three mysterious tunnels leading to the deepest secrets of the Inner Earth. Despite the political intrigue, turmoil and restriction around this great discovery, the leader of the expedition enabled Radu Cinamar to visit and explore these artifacts. Ever since, Radu's life has been a labyrinthine adventure of strange events, clandestine liaisons and extraordinary people and circumstances. In Transylvanian Moonrise, Radu is sought out by the mysterious Tibetan lama who orchestrated this discovery while working under an alias as Dr. Xien, a secret agent for the Chinese government. The enigmatic lama introduces Radu to a creature known as a yidam, an energetic and physical being who is created by a sand mandala ritual and can literally warp the space-time continuum and takes Radu on a mystical journey from Transylvania to the mysterious Land of the Gods in Tibet where he receives a secret initiation from the blue goddess Machandi. This is not only a remarkable story, but it is an initiation of the highest order that will benefit anyone reading it. Transylvanian Moonrise: A Secret Initiation in the Mysterious Land of the Gods will take you far beyond your ordinary imagination in order to describe events that have molded the past and will influence the future in the decades ahead.

THE MONTAUK PULSE: A CHRONICLE OF TIME

Issued quarterly, every Winter, Spring, Summer and Fall
by Peter Moon

A newsletter by the name of the "Montauk Pulse" went into print in the winter of 1993 to chronicle the events and discoveries regarding the ongoing investigation of "The Montauk Project" by Preston Nichols and Peter Moon. It has remained in print and been issued quarterly ever since. With a minimum of six pages and a distinct identity of its own, The Pulse will often comment on details and history that do not necessarily find their way into books. Through 1995, the “Montauk Pulse” has included exciting new breakthroughs on the Montauk story as well as similarly related phenomena like the Philadelphia Experiment and other space-time projects. Consequently, the scope of the Pulse was expanded to embrace any new phenomena concerning time travel or related events. It has been the leading publication when it comes to covering the work of Dr. David Anderson and his time travel research. The cost for a subscription to the “Montauk Pulse” is $20.00. Do not add a shipping/handling charge, however, unless you are outside the USA. In such a case, please add $12.00. Back issues are available in three volumes of 24 issues each (spanning six years). Each individual volume is $30.00 each. See order form.

MYSTERY OF EGYPT

THE FIRST TUNNEL

RADU CINAMAR WITH PETER MOON

Cover Art:

Artist's symbolic depiction of the connection between the Romanian Sphinx and the Egyptian Sphinx as discussed by Radu Cinamar.

Radu Cinamar stunned the world when he released his first book, “Transylvanian Sunrise”, which described the greatest archeological find of all time: a hidden chamber some 50,000 years old with holographic technology that is beyond man’s wildest dreams. After being allowed to explore some of these artifacts, Radu was befriended by an enigmatic alchemist named Elinor who introduced him to an equally mysterious Tibetan Lama. These adventures were chronicled in “Transylvanian Moonrise” wherein Radu was taken by Elinor and the lama to Tibet where he was given an ancient manuscript to be translated by the lama. He is then given an initiation of the highest order.

“Mystery of Egypt — The First Tunnel” begins with Radu becoming the guardian of Elinor’s exotic villa in Bucharest which contains a remarkable alchemical laboratory in the basement. Radu is soon thereafter recruited for Department Zero, Romania’s most secret intelligence unit, by his old friend, Cezar Brad, and becomes part of an expedition to explore a mysterious tunnel which leads from the chamber beneath the Romanian Sphinx to a different type of chamber beneath the Giza Plateau which contains a bioresonant device through which one can visit past and future events.

This amazing expedition includes an American from the Pentagon with a top secret laptop computer he is intuitively connected to that not only displays intricate holograms but is also linked to Hilbert (interdimensional) Space. Ancient archeology meets future science in this true life adventure that penetrates the secrets of Egypt in a way that has not been previously conceived of in our society.

Introduction — by Peter Moon

“Mystery of Egypt — The First Tunnel” is a fantastic story which cannot be properly understood unless it is put into the context of several different factors, most important of which is the remarkable discovery beneath the Romanian Sphinx in the Bucegi Mountains of Romania that took place in 2003. This story was published in English in 2009 under the title “Transylvanian Sunrise” and concerns a chamber containing futuristic holographic technology that was put together some 50,000 years ago.

In what could be termed a virtual Noah’s Ark that far exceeds the thinking and experiential capacity of those who lived in biblical times (or even in our own times for that matter), this chamber includes technology whereby one can place their hand on a table and see their own DNA rendered in three-dimensional holograms. Other devices on the table enable one to see the DNA of alien species from other planets with accompanying star renderings so that one can see where they actually originate from. By placing two hands on different parts of the table, one can also “mix” the DNA of two species so as to see how they might look if hybridized. As the tables themselves are six feet high, the creatures who built them were gigantic compared to humans of today.

This remarkable chamber also includes a “projection hall” whereby one can see a holographic rendition of the history of Earth that is particularly tailored to the individuality of whomever might be viewing it. This history, however, abruptly cuts off in about the Fifth Century A.D., perhaps because it requires some sort of software update. One of the more intriguing aspects of the Projection Hall is that it also contains three mysterious tunnels that lead into the bowels of the Earth and similar facilities in Iraq, Mongolia, Tibet and also beneath the Giza Plateau in Egypt. One of the tunnels leads into the Inner Earth itself. “Mystery of Egypt — The First Tunnel” is the story about an exploration into one of the most mysterious and enigmatic of those tunnels: the one that leads to an underground chamber beneath Giza.

This tunnel is more recently built than the other two and features space-time distortions.

We learn of this expedition from Radu Cinamar who is selected to participate after he is reunited with his friend, Cezar Brad, who proceeds to recruit him for Department Zero, the most secretive department of Romania's intelligence service. The prior collaboration of Radu and Cezar began when Cezar hand-picked Radu to write "Transylvanian Sunrise".

The exact story of how they came together is described in that book as well as the circumstances which allowed Radu to briefly visit and interface with the technology in the chamber beneath the Romanian Sphinx. The primary purpose of their initial collaboration was for Radu to write about these events with the purpose of informing the general public.

Although this was the most remarkable discovery ever made in the history of archeology, the politics around the situation were highly strained. The Romanians wanted to share this knowledge with the entire world. On the other hand, the Americans, who provided the technology which enabled access to the chamber, panicked over this prospect as it meant they could lose control of their global power apparatus. Italian Freemasonry, which set up the entire operation and provided the liaison between the Romanians and Americans, vied for control as well. Despite the extreme political tensions between all three groups, Cezar Brad arranged for Radu Cinamar to visit the hidden chamber and the projection hall itself. His account is given in "Transylvanian Sunrise", a predecessor to this book.

The main character in "Transylvanian Sunrise" is Cezar Brad and while he hand-picked Radu to reveal certain secrets, so was Cezar hand-picked to become the head of Department Zero and pave the way for this great discovery to actually occur. Cezar came to the attention of the Romanian secret service on the day he was born. When the doctor was not able to cut his incredibly thick and strong umbilical cord, he duly reported this, just as he would any other anomaly, to the government authorities. Cezar's parents were subsequently visited by state security and a financial arrangement was made whereby they would report any unusual behavior emanating from or associated with the child. As Cezar began to demonstrate extra sensitive or psychic behavior, he was brought under the tutelage of a mysterious man who, quite literally, set up Department Zero while on loan to Romania on behalf of the Chinese government as part of a cultural exchange program between the two communist countries. Known as Dr. Xien, he examined and trained Cezar in many disciplines, particularly psychic ones, before hand-picking him to eventually become the head of Department Zero and enable the great discovery in the Bucegi Mountains.

Dr. Xien is an intriguing and very mysterious character, but we find out very little about him in “Transylvanian Sunrise”. It is only in the sequel to that book, “Transylvanian Moonrise”, where we learn that he is not exactly what he appears to be. Although tremendously respected by the Chinese government as an expert in paranormal matters, he is really a Tibetan lama who fled Tibet before the Chinese invasion of Lhasa. A very evolved soul with high level connections in many countries, the Chinese utilized him for their own purposes, one of which was assigning him to set up the apparatus of Romania’s Department Zero.

In “Transylvanian Moonrise”, Radu has gone back to his normal life and is no longer working with Cezar. They are leading separate lives. Although “Transylvanian Sunrise” had been published, Radu sought a very low profile and his publisher deferred all but the most notable and sensitive of the numerous communications sent to him. It is during this period that Radu is contacted by an intermediary on behalf of Dr. Xien. Cezar, who had not seen Dr. Xien since communism fell in 1989, remains completely out of the picture. Dr. Xien’s intermediary turns out to be a mysterious alchemist who is arguably as intriguing as the mysterious doctor. He invites Radu to his elegant villa in Bucharest so that he can make acquaintance with this enigmatic lama who wants to meet him. As the evening passes, the lama reveals his real name, Repa Sundhi, and informs Radu that he is also Dr. Xien, Cezar’s original mentor.

The purpose of their meeting is to recruit and prepare Radu for a journey to Transylvania where he will take a mysterious trip to Tibet via a space-time translation, the description of which is well rendered in terms of its plausibility. Once in an area of Tibet that cannot be reached by ordinary transportation, he is led to a cave where he meets the blue goddess Machandi who has an ancient manuscript for him. It is his job to see to the publishing of the manuscript which first needs to be translated from an ancient Tibetan dialect. The lama volunteers for this and the completed work becomes book four in this series, “The Secret Parchment: Five Tibetan Initiation Techniques”, which also features Radu’s adventures with Department Zero.

This is a very fast-paced adventure with many complex factors that weaves deep esoteric wisdom with real life events and interesting personalities.

Many of these events can be corroborated and there are several Romanian newspaper articles in “Transylvanian Moonrise” which state the intriguing facts. After reading these books and four personal trips to Romania myself, I have met many people who also corroborate different aspects of these stories. Personally, I cannot tell you exactly what is true and what is not. In my position, I can only make a calculated guess. It is my conclusion, however, if the information is generally true, that this chamber in the Bucegi Mountains is an outpost of an Inner Earth civilization such as Shambalah. The way it has been presented, this civilization seems to represent the core of life itself, including its origins and the template of evolution, both spiritually as well biochemically. This template would also include all aspects of purely physical chemistry as well.

What I have just described is a very brief summary of the first two books, “Transylvanian Sunrise” and “Transylvanian Moonrise”, which sets the backdrop for the book you are about to read. “Mystery of Egypt — The First Tunnel” picks up with Radu, at the suggestion of the lama, becoming the curator of the alchemist’s elegant villa in Bucharest which contains an extensive esoteric and alchemical library with an even more mysterious and very modern alchemical lab in the basement. Radu does not have access to it although he was allowed to see it and participate in some of its wonders.

It is during this period that Cezar suddenly contacts Radu, seemingly out of the blue, in order to locate the highly esteemed architect of Department Zero, Dr. Xien, who is sought by the Romanian intelligence service. Much to Radu’s own surprise, Romanian intelligence wants to recruit him as he is the last person to have seen Dr. Xien.

Cezar and Radu meet soon thereafter and much conversation ensues with Radu being briefed on all sorts of new information. After being indoctrinated into Department Zero, Radu is selected for a special expedition to the “First Tunnel” which is the tunnel that leads from the Projection Hall to another chamber beneath the Giza Plateau.

If all of this sounds like science fiction, it should, if only because the events and circumstances experienced by Radu are not in the realm of what so-called “normal” human beings are familiar with. While the book you are about to read continues the great adventure and offers all sorts of plausible tangents and intrigues, you will also encounter information that is highly controversial and might also challenge the credibility you extend to the author of the book. Much of this has to do with Christianity.

It is important to remember, as I have experienced first hand, that Romania has a great cultural bias towards Christianity. Their attitude is very different than Americans. They tend to take it very seriously but do not necessarily vocalize it. It is also very important to note that Romanians did not live in a free society during communism and Christianity was, in many respects, their only beacon of hope and light during this difficult time period. Thus, it is appropriate to acknowledge these facts while you read the interpretations of events and experiences by both Cezar and Radu. In order that you get a better grasp of their views of these events, it is very important that I mention and expound upon a very important character who appears in the first book: Father Arsenie Boca, a priest from Transylvania who was revered throughout Romania for the countless miracles he facilitated, all of which took place during communist times. More important to our story, he was instrumental in facilitating certain machinations which enabled the Bucegi discovery to take place.

Cezar's administrative superior was General Obadea who passed away not too long ago. Obadea was a very wise man who orchestrated the preservation and continuation of Department Zero from the communist era into the capitalist era. This was a great achievement that required astute political and psychological skills. Obadea was aided in this endeavor by Arsenie Boca who counseled him extensively on how to maneuver through various situations. Highly clairvoyant, Boca could see the future to the point where he could even see the exact day you were going to die.

Almost two decades before the great discovery in Bucegi, Obadea took Cezar to see Arsenie Boca at the Monastery of Cernica, not too far from Bucharest. At the behest of Ceaușescu and in order to keep him from garnishing too big a following, Father Boca was continually transferred from one monastery to another. Even so, the monk would attract substantial crowds who sought out his spiritual help. Boca was often transferred to Cernica when Ceaușescu sought out his help which was always done under great secrecy.

At their monumental meeting, Boca told Obadea specific ways that he had to work with Cezar in order to be successful in their future pursuits which would bewilder the world in almost twenty years. He was clearly referring to the discovery in the Bucegi Mountains when he said that the world's attention would turn to their country, Romania, due to extraordinary changes that were to occur and specific signs that would go way beyond the power or understanding of materialist knowledge. Arsenie Boca also said that all would obey the will of God because everything was cyclical and had to go back where it all had begun.

While he did not speak about specific details of the future discovery to be made, he spoke fluidly and effortlessly about various details surrounding it, including the fact that the information would be published. He also repeated several times that there would be a fierce fight. As Radu stated in "Transylvanian Sunrise", this discovery practically shattered the political, scientific and religious fabric of today's greatest power, the United States of America. It soon became the world's great secret.

As a holy man like Arsenie Boca played such a pivotal role in Cezar's life, it is no wonder that Christianity would warrant a high degree of reverence from him. It is therefore relevant that I give you a bit of historical context with regard to Christianity in Romania and, in particular, to Arsenie Boca as well as a bit about his personal history.

According to tradition and many history books, the different apostles went in different geographical directions where they spread the gospel (a word which means "good news" — there was no written gospel in those days) to different cultural groups. Mark went to Egypt, Thomas went to India, etc. St. Andrew, who is credited with founding the Orthodox Church, went to the Black Sea and the country now known as Romania. This branch of Christianity is strictly separate from the Catholicism or Protestantism you are likely more familiar with. It is far closer to the practice of Christianity as it was practiced in the first few centuries.

Arsenie Boca was born on the 29th of September, 1910 in the village of Vața de Sus in the county of Hunedoara, Transylvania. Quite ironically, his birth name was Zian which is similar phonetically to Dr. Zien. After finishing high school, Arsenie Boca studied at the Theological Academy in Sibiu and graduated in 1933. He then received a scholarship from the archbishop of Transylvania to study at the Institute of Bellearte in Bucharest. He also attended the medical classes of professor Francisc Rainer and the Christian Mystics class of professor Nichifor Crainic. Arsenie Boca also had great talent as an artist and was commissioned to paint a great scene in the Romanian Athenaeum, a great concert hall which is a centerpiece of Bucharest.

The most interesting part of his formative years occurs when he is sent by his bishop, Metropolitan Balan, to Mount Athos in Greece. Nestled in mountains which are virtually inaccessible, Mount Athos houses a highly disciplined monastery which is not open to outsiders or even religious curiosity seekers. It is only for the most dedicated of monks who live lives of work and meditation with minimal time for sleep and meals.

At the age of 29, a miracle took place on Mount Athos for Arsenie Boca. In a deep forest, he prayed to Jesus for a spiritual Father to help him to go on the hard path of salvation. There was no response from Jesus. He then prayed to the Holy Mother of God who emerged from the clouds and took him to a mountain so high that you could not even look down. On the top of this mountain, the Holy Mother of God led him to learn from Saint Seraphim of Sarov, a saint who had lived over 200 years before. For 40 days he learned from Saint Seraphim of Sarov and fasted continuously with help from the Holy Mother of God. After a year, Arsenie Boca returned to Romania as a completely transformed man. His power was evident as he knew your name and all your thoughts and actions without even knowing you. You could not hide things from him. One of his routine traits was that he could talk to animals. When questioned why he was talking to wolves and bears, he answered, "They listen, you do not."

Cezar described Father Boca as one who was spiritually living in heaven while still living physically on the earth. It was a most moving experience for the young Cezar who was very psychically adept himself.

It was thus that Arsenie Boca foresaw his own death.

Not long before his own down fall, Ceaușescu was sensing the political volatility of his country and sought the help of the great miracle worker.

Boca told Ceaușescu that if he did not change his ways, particularly in regard to his harsh treatment of people, he would suffer a sudden and violent death. Ceaușescu was enraged and threatened him, leaving in a huff. Boca knew that Ceaușescu wanted him dead, and he was fully aware of the plot to poison him. We know this not only from his meeting with Cezar and General Obadea but from other admirers who warned him.

Not too long after their monumental meeting, in November of 1989, Father Arsenie Boca died. Ceaușescu was executed by his own people one month later, on Christmas Day. Even after his death, miracles are attributed to Arsenie Boca by those who visit his sepulcher. It attracts crowds and there are remarkable stories.

Just as he could see the exact moment of death for others, so could he see it for himself. Although he was asked to prolong his time on earth, he declined and said “I’m going, but where I’m going I can help you more.”

This is but a small sampling of the remarkable life and legend of Father Arsenie Boca. It should be kept in mind when you reach certain controversial passages described by Cezar and Radu. After all, this is not only a story of great adventure but one of miraculous situations and events.

In such circumstances, one should expect a high concentration of both good and evil.

It is now time to enjoy the adventure and see where it takes you.

Chapter One — A Formidable Chance

It is certain that the last two years of my life have brought profound transformations. This applies not only to my views and ideology of the world and the purpose of life but to my social integration and the access I had to some realities which would be very puzzling for the common person. I have to add that I have also had the chance to come into contact with a very elevated area of esoteric knowledge. Especially for this, but also for everything else, I am very grateful to Cezar Brad who has enlightened my power of understanding of some fundamental aspects of life in a very practical manner. For now, I can neither analyze nor fully understand the subtle causes which have led to my quite active participation in the complicated chain of events related to the activity of Department Zero, but it is certain that father Arsenie Boca's vision is fulfilling step by step.

In this very special period of my life, I've often and seriously asked myself if what I experienced and saw was a dream or the actual reality of daily life. I soon learned that, at least from the point of view of principles, the distinction between these two states of consciousness is quite relative. In some very intense moments, the border between dream and the so-called physical reality seems very blurred. My meeting with the goddess Machandi in a cave in Tibet, and especially my initiation on the Gugu peak of the Retezat Mountains (described in "Transylvanian Moonrise"), can be very easily included in this category. All of these events have opened new perspectives of daily life for me which I had never thought of before.

My objectives have greatly changed and my aspirations have turned with great power towards the further study of esotericism and spirituality. Thanks to the amazing information I had been told by Elinor (the alchemist featured in "Transylvanian Moonrise"), I secretly had a strong wish to be initiated into the secrets of authentic alchemy. I started to understand that almost nothing happens by accident in our life and that our relationships and our meetings with certain persons who leave us with profound mental and emotional impressions are actually the result of mysterious causes which only appear to be accidental but which, in fact, lead to a well-defined purpose.

During the short period of time that I spent with Elinor, this turned out to be entirely true because, shortly after we returned from our trip to the Retezat Mountains, he informed to me that he had to leave the country for an indefinite period of time. Elinor explained this to me during a phone conversation, and I remember noticing the suggestive pause he made after telling me about his departure. Elinor then told me that Doctor Xien had advised him to let me take care of his villa during his absence from the country. They probably discussed more on this subject, but Elinor only shared with me this totally unexpected offer. The discussion took place in February 2005 and I, being quite nervous and surprised, gladly accepted his proposal. Not only was Elinor's villa a very nice and modern place to live, but I was irresistibly attracted to the huge library which occupied two of the big rooms on the first floor which were especially designed for study purposes. During one of my visits to Elinor after our return from the Retezat Mountains, he showed me the entire house and its annexes and shared a lot of details with me, especially about his library. I looked with astonishment at the almost seven thousand books (some of which he told me were very rare) which were nicely and orderly arranged on special wooden shelves.

Now, as I look back, I am sure that there was a hidden meaning to his wish to show me the house. It was highly possible that he and Doctor Xien were only "helping me get acquainted" with the premises. Of course, I reacted with a barely withheld joy when I understood what my conversation with Elinor was about. After a short pause, during which I could feel his happiness that I had accepted his proposal, he spoke to me in a serious tone.

"There is something else that I want to talk to you about," he said, "but we have to meet for this purpose."

I guessed that it was something more serious and we decided to meet the following day. In the evening, I arrived on time and was anxious to find out the reason why Elinor had invited me to his place.

"First of all, I have to tell you that I will leave the country tomorrow." This was the first important piece of information which he shared with me. Although I was quite amazed that events were developing with such haste, I had already learned to adapt to such circumstances by controlling the flow of thoughts and natural questions that came into my mind and placing them in order according to their immediate relevance and necessity.

Elinor then provided me with some technical and administrative details about the maintenance of the house before asking me to follow him to the basement, a place I had never been before. I descended down an elegant flight of stairs made of white marble leading to a sort of round living room with a diameter of approximately five meters. The curved wall was painted in a gorgeous light blue color which had a calming effect, and the marble floor showed a mosaic displaying a symbol which surely had a deep esoteric meaning. It was a triangle with its base at the flight of the stairs we had descended and its peak at the only door of the basement. The triangle was ochre-colored and inside it several complicated signs were drawn. Among these, I recognized a well-known symbol: the caduceus of Mercury. These signs, however, were made of white and dark red marble.

When I descended the last step, I suddenly felt a chill from head to toe as followed Elinor to a door which was made of massive wood and metal. On the central part of the door was encrusted a symbol made of a copper alloy. It represented a big circle made up of a snake which was twisted in order to catch its own tale in its mouth.

At the door, I noticed that a digital alarm system had been installed which Elinor deactivated with a code. Immediately afterwards, I could hear a specific sound signaling that the security system had been deactivated. Elinor then pressed the door handle and we entered a very large room where I could see several pieces of equipment and installations, many of which were made of glass.

Invited to go inside, I walked into what seemed to be a sanctuary but soon realized that it was, in fact, a laboratory. In time, I had the chance to see a few pictures and pictograms which represented moments in the lives of Middle Age alchemists. The complexity I saw in the basement of Elinor's villa, however, greatly exceeded the frail representations of the old drawings of alchemists' laboratories from the Renaissance. His systems of test tubes were very complicated and some of them had arms that extended above our heads across the room, intersected and then descended to glass recipients. Some of these vials were bigger, some smaller and they featured various shapes such as cones and spheres. There was even a sand glass. I also noticed two modern centrifuges with several test tubes and a strange metal installation which was connected to what I considered to be the “oven.” I also noticed a computer.

On one of the room’s walls, there was a large cupboard with several shelves where different colored substances were stored inside of glass receptacles, each one of which was labeled. Moving closer to one of the shelves, I randomly read the label of a glass jar which had been perfectly sealed with a special lid. It read “sodium thiosulphate”.

Everything was in perfect order and it was obvious that everything was specially arranged for maximum efficiency. About one third of the cupboard had been arranged differently, and I could see several books and manuscripts which seemed to be very old. I am sure that they contain specific documentation concerning mysterious alchemical processes.

I turned to Elinor who was busy fine-tuning something on a metal device placed near the central marble table where retorts and glass receptacles had been placed. On the wall behind him, I saw two automatic and very large ventilation installations which are designed to set and maintain the atmospheric indexes of the room to preset values. There were four fire extinguishers on the ceiling and near the modern oven was a very narrow leather sofa meant for only two people. I went over and looked at that place because the oven had a special shape: it looked a bit like a house with a sharp roof.

“Unfortunately, I’ve reached the conclusion that no matter how high-performance and accurate this modern electric oven is, it cannot perform as well as a classic oven with a flame,” Elinor explained to me. “A certain subtle dimensional aspect of the process is missing, but I am still meditating on this matter.”

After a short pause, he smiled.

“I must tell you,” he added, “that since I had everything installed here, nobody else has entered this room; but I feel that you are different and this is why I wanted to show you this secret side of the house. Given your current level of knowledge, however, it is much too early to go into technical details and explain to you the alchemical processes that I am working on. Furthermore, these processes hide many enigmas and I am still studying them myself.”

I then asked a question which had been on my mind.

“You haven’t obtained the philosopher’s stone yet, have you?”
Elinor laughed and relaxed.

“My dear, this is the purpose of all alchemists,” he replied. “This is the fundamental aspect of their practice. If I had already obtained the philosopher’s stone, I would almost have had no reason to come here to this lab. I have, however, reached some intermediate results.”

After saying that, he turned to a section of the big cupboard and took from a shelf a little jar containing a yellowish copper-colored liquid. Elinor poured two drops of that liquid into an elegant silver teaspoon and then invited me to drink that liquid. A bit nervous and unsure, I took the teaspoon and quickly swallowed the liquid. Actually, due to the small quantity, I almost did not feel the liquid in my mouth. At first, I didn’t notice anything unusual, but after almost half a minute, I was staggering. An acute nausea seemed to block the breath in my throat which seemed to have swollen because I could no longer swallow. Suddenly, I began to feel sweaty. In a panic, I sat on the sofa in front of the oven.

Meanwhile, Elinor quietly read a book he had taken from a shelf.

I was still having reactions to the substance I had consumed. I felt a sudden heat in my feet which quickly rose to my head. My heart was beating crazily as I continued to sweat. When that intense feeling of heat reached my throat, I felt a strong energy release around me, like a sphere. It surrounded my head with what felt like thousands of needles. I think that I lost consciousness for a few moments, but I managed to resist that very intense sensation. Gradually, I felt the heat dissipate, leaving me with a very agreeable and very pure feeling. I actually felt a full cleanliness as if I had just been born. My soul was flooded with a great joy and my strength suddenly came back but amplified.

I jumped off the sofa where I had just been laying down in torment. Without considering how loud my voice was because of the joy and excitement I felt, I shouted to Elinor that I wanted to drink more of that liquid. He closed his book and looked at me in amusement.

“Of course,” he told me, “but only if you wish to leave this world. This elixir is so powerful that, given your current state and psycho-physiological condition, your body would surely give up. Do not forget that one of the essential rules of alchemy is to keep the proportions of harmony. In time, these will guide the human being to a more and more elevated physical, mental and spiritual condition. The human can then understand everything in a different manner, from a superior point of view.”

I could hardly refrain from contradicting him, but I did realize, however, that he was telling the truth. Afterwards, we both left the room. Elinor secured the entrance and led me to the living room on the ground floor where he informed me of several administrative details which I would take care of while he was gone. He told me he had confidence in me and that a time would come when he could better explain some specific operational aspects of alchemy to me. Elinor emphasized that I first and foremost needed to study hard in order to reach that level. I immediately caught the hint to utilize the huge library at my disposal and I sincerely thanked him for the faith he had in me.

The following day, Elinor left Romania; and even though he told me his destination as well as other specific details concerning his departure, he asked me not to tell these details to anyone. Because I know the general aspects of his life, I immediately understood his motivation. He got into his personal car where he was accompanied by a mature man who I did not know. I was struck by the fact that Elinor only carried a small travel bag which probably contained the enigmatic device he never parted with. He told me that he did not know precisely when we would see each other again but that it would again be possible in a not very distant future. He handed me all the keys to his house but did not tell me the code to his alchemy lab in the basement. He asked me to understand that his decision was an extra precautionary measure for both of us. I then felt a deep regret. Noticing my disappointment, Elinor told me it was only a temporary situation that I did not need to worry about.

“Soon you will understand that everything that happens has its own time. Everything happens in a certain order and is directed by a certain space-time necessity which we should only overrule in exceptional cases. This will become clearer to you as your knowledge deepens. Sometimes, to your amazement, the ‘leap’ can be unexpected.”

We said goodbye and parted, both of us hoping that that which had begun would continue somehow by virtue of evolutionary laws. I had no idea how right Elinor’s words were when he had told me about certain moments in life when chance gives us amazing opportunities.

The Re-encounter

I soon found out that Elinor’s library contained remarkable works and that many of them were of an inestimable value. Accordingly, I made a habit of going there as often as possible and sometimes stayed for hours reading and summing up the books which had been so carefully selected. Many times, I strongly wished Cezar was there to clear up certain aspects I could not fully grasp within those esoteric texts. I longed for his calm and kind voice which was never prone to sounding ironic or crazy due to my lack of knowledge in such matters. His simple presence and closeness made me feel safe, enabled me to think clearly and opened my soul.

After Elinor left, I was almost utterly alone, preferring to meditate as deeply as I could on the persons I had met and the events I had lived through during the past few years. I slowly began to understand that there is a profound meaning to the way our life develops and that everything that happens to us is, from a causal point of view, directly connected to other actions we have performed before. My firm conclusion in this regard, however, was based only upon intuition because I was not yet able to recognize the “roots” of my past actions which had led to the extraordinary circumstances I was now involved in. I had the feeling of a guiding line which I could intuitively feel in my heart and soul that guided me step by step from the unknown. Starting from this idea, I asked myself who or what was thus guiding me. A long time before, I had already decided to serve good, no matter the risks, in an altruistic manner in accordance with the possibilities of my own personal path. Furthermore, the main pathways by which I was guided to acknowledge this were suggested to me by people to whom I practically owe everything with regards to my own spiritual maturity. I am particularly referring to Cezar Brad, Dr. Xien, Elinor and especially the goddess Machandi.

I have learned that many readers of my two previous books were impatient or wondering why the third volume of this series was not published earlier.

With utter sincerity, I must admit that I saw no point in writing a book in which I had nothing to say save for my mental “alchemy” and my better understanding of some initiatory teachings. Furthermore, as Dr. Xien had told me, it was not yet time for me to reveal the spiritual techniques that had been translated from the text of the scroll which had been hidden in the Tibetan cave where I had met Machandi.

Although I had lived in a common way during this period, it was by far the most intense and lively stage of inner transformation that I had ever experienced. Due to the firm decision I had made to understand as much as possible of the mysteries of life and reality around me, I forced myself to stick to a rigorous schedule of study and meditation while at the same time assiduously practicing the five secret Tibetan techniques from the scroll which had been given to me in Tibet.

I had already felt for a long time that the inner transformation I had experienced was primarily based upon my meetings and conversations with Cezar as well as the very special state of consciousness in which I had been projected into and kept for a few hours by the bewildering goddess Machandi. All of this had acted as a catalyst for the decisions I later took, and this was confirmed by Elinor’s proposal which gave me the opportunity to study an ocean of books that have broadened my knowledge of esotericism.

I industriously studied the main works on Oriental philosophy and developed an understanding of the main principles of Hindu spirituality and a few of its fundamental practices. I also studied the essential ideas of practical occultism and esoteric symbolism and learned some of the main ideas that allow for an intelligent correlation between the main religions of humanity.

Despite all of this acquired understanding on my path to the depths of true knowledge, I still felt that I had only managed to break through the surface layer covering ignorance. For example, even though I discovered a lot of information in the works I had read, I still needed some nuanced explanations to clarify my understanding of different aspects of Creation. I knew Cezar was the only one who could provide me with those explanations, and I therefore often thought nostalgically of him, remembering the precious moments we had spent together which were true moments of spiritual initiation for me.

This period of intense spiritual practice and study lasted for several months after Elinor had left me to take care of his villa. As Cezar had advised me during our last meeting, in the winter of 2005 and shortly before Elinor had offered me his proposal to take care of the villa, it was only necessary for me to write about the truly essential aspects which target the important and complex information of Humankind. This information was supposed to refer to some extraordinary realities I was confronted with as well as some basic concepts which can positively mark human existence.

I was just beginning to get used to the relatively “quiet” life of gathering esoteric and spiritual information when an unexpected event once again shattered my normal flow of existence. The rapid succession of events that followed and their implications have led me to be in a state of effervescence and dynamism which has helped me to approach the situation both bravely and maturely. I had already experienced some amazing events which were very intense from an emotional point of view, and I already had an acceptable knowledge level to help me keep my physical and psychical balance. I must confess, however, that there were many moments when I had to make an effort to hold myself together and overcome some difficult situations I had lived through during the past year.

I am also aware that the opportunity extended to me meant a lot, and I dare believe that the subtle play which made everything possible implies dimensions of consciousness to which very few persons have access. I will therefore try to be as precise as possible when I tell you the events which took place and to explain to you as well as I can some important nuances of the advices and explanations given to me by Cezar. Furthermore, I am sure that without Cezar’s help I would have never had the amazing opportunity to take part in certain events and to learn the amazing details and importance of these events.

One day, in September 2005, I was at my place after having just come back to Bucharest from a short trip in the country. It was evening and I was carefully arranging some books in a bag in order to take them back to Elinor's library. When I did not spend the night there, I had a habit of taking one or two works I was interested in to study at home.

I was skimming once again a rare translation of the "Bhagavad-Gita" with comments made by the wise Janakar. Before deciding whether I wanted to keep it at my place for a while or return it with the other books, I gazed upon some special considerations on the importance of the spiritual master as profoundly expounded upon by the author of the comments. Suddenly, I felt so moved and impressed by what I had just read that I wanted with all my heart to see Cezar again so that he could answer a lot of my questions and that I could deeply enjoy his lovely presence. Staring at the emptiness, I was sadly meditating on the fact that I couldn't be with him for longer periods of time when my mobile phone suddenly rang.

In my ignorance, I often told myself that some of the most amazing events experienced were the result of pure accidents that were really just mere coincidence. Even when they practically defied any logic and exceeded by far any scientific interpretation, I still stubbornly thought, like many others, that I should ignore all the amazing elements and consider them "coincidences." Even though I knew much more at that time, at least in theory, about the subtle connections which greatly exceed normal human perception, I still hesitated to understand the profound meaning of the extraordinary phenomenon of overlapping or, as Jung defines it, the amazing synchronicity which takes place in our lives. Of course, these so-called "coincidences," which only appear to be accidental, are different from one person to the other and can practically include all our daily activity. But, what is truly important is not the synchronicity itself, which undoubtedly amazes us, but its profound subtle meaning because, no matter what people say, the first piece of evidence that these synchronicities are not accidents is that they have a hidden meaning which we can and should uncover. And, every time we get over these important "coincidences" in a shallow and passive manner, we actually miss one more opportunity to know ourselves and others better. In a way, they are like the wind: we can't see it, but we can feel its influence and notice its effects.

Such a coincidence, and apparently a most common one, happened to me in that moment. It did, however, cause incredible wonder and exuberant joy in me. Answering the phone, I was struck with wonder as I heard Cezar's voice say hello and ask if I was at home because he wanted to pay me a visit. In a hurry, I could hardly speak because of my joy. I answered that it was extraordinary because I had just been thinking about him and really wanted to see him when I heard the phone ring so as to make my wish magically come true. I asked him how this was possible and how it could be explained.

Cezar laughed heartily and answered that he would arrive in a few moments. He asked if I was free for the evening because he had important things to tell me and we needed time for this. I told him that I was the freest man in the world and that I was impatiently waiting for his arrival.

Indeed. In less than ten minutes, I heard the door bell ring. Opening the door immediately, I saw him there: tall, calm, smiling and in perfect balance, looking at me with great kindness. We hugged as good friends, but I already felt deeply in my heart that for me he had become a true Master who had initiated me in the secrets of the unknown. Through unknown threads, I felt that he possessed an extraordinary force and determination like I had never seen in anyone else before. His strength seemed so great that each time we met, and only a couple of seconds after I was with him, I felt a deep sensation of well-being as well as an inexplicable nostalgia for the unknown which is beyond this complicated world. My whole being was more relaxed and my mind was clearer. In my head, I felt a sort of "chill" that was so pleasant that it produced an emotion which made me want to cry, just like you feel when you see someone dear again after a long time.

Barely containing my exuberance, I asked Cezar to come inside. Starting from what had just happened to me, I was anxious to hear him explain the various circumstances of synchronicity. We both sat on an armchair and, after exchanging a few impressions about the long period of time during which we had not seen each other, I asked again what he thought about the incredible "match" of events that had taken place. I badly desired these golden moments when I would find out important aspects about the enigmas of life. For me, these meetings were like water for the thirsty in the burning desert. Cezar's words and explanations had a high impact; and anyone with a minimal sensibility could have noticed his modesty and also his competence. In my case, they had a further dimension which was deeply spiritual and represented true attributes of initiation, both for physical life and for subtle life.

A Subtle Demonstration

Smiling, Cezar said, "Indeed, 'the coincidence' seems incredible, but it did happen and it was real and concrete. In the context of 'coincidences' of this kind, it seems relatively minor but if you pay attention, you'll notice more odd matches or overlapping events which have a different nature but a common cause. The more vigilant you become, the more such 'coincidences' you will notice; and you will even note that they also happen to other people. However, what you will only be able to notice, and with great effort, is their meaning because such experiences are mainly subjective in nature. They relate to the person who experiences them and are intimately related to his or her destiny as well as their mental and physical characteristics."

"Okay, but what should I understand when I experience such an event?" I asked him. "I'm sure that it doesn't occur out of the blue and that it has a very important meaning. It is no simple coincidence — it has a meaning. This is actually the question to which I seek an answer: where does this meaning come from and who determines it?"

Cezar looked at me for a few moments, thinking.

"It would be correct to first ask yourself what the hidden meaning is that has been revealed to you by synchronicity. Then, you can start meditating on its cause or source. However, because you asked, I will briefly answer this question so that you'll have a starting point for your later analysis.

"From an esoteric point of view, what most people call coincidence or synchronicity of events actually reveals God's presence to the highest degree because, in His absence, all incredible simultaneous situations which occur in our lives could not happen. But, the fact that they do happen shows that there is someone capable of organizing them, matching them and making them happen in reality. It is very important for you to understand that this reality of synchronicity can allow us, even in the case of minor daily events, such as my calling you this evening, to pass immediately into what is beyond all this and thus persuade ourselves of the existence of a reality which is highly superior to the one you live here. By this, I mean that these “coincidences” are like a gate which is waiting to be opened so that we can escape to a reality we had never thought existed but which is essential for our happiness.”

I was a bit surprised. It was the first time that Cezar talked about the existence of God and explained to me that I could perceive His existence immediately if I was ready to understand the phenomena surrounding me. I must confess that I had been very preoccupied with this subject and I was seeking to clarify some of my questions. I succeeded mainly due to my careful study of the general principles underlying the most important philosophical systems and practices of the Orient, especially from India.

There is a huge leap, however, from theory to practice but I wanted to take it as fast as possible. At the same time, I knew this was a relatively delicate subject. Many people minimize its importance and many ignore it utterly. I have always felt in my heart, however, that something exists and that life is more than a mechanical development of events. Several times I wanted to talk about this with certain people I trusted and whose opinions I respected.

To my surprise and disappointment, however, I had to admit that the idea of God that most people have is either wrong or none at all. Unfortunately, I even noticed a kind of unconscious obstinacy in some people, and I have learned that others prefer to follow the dark path of evil. Given these circumstances, how can you argue to them that God exists when they reject any conversation on this subject from the beginning? Their dark force and sometimes diabolical intelligence unconsciously give them a false sensation of power and dominance which will eventually and surely lead them to a great fall.

A bit discouraged by this lack of success, I had often had the intention to ask Cezar for advice on this matter and this now seemed to be a good time to do so because he was the one who had brought the subject into our discussion. Moreover, I am sure that there are people who, deep in their hearts, sincerely believe in God even though some of them still pay tribute to the “rigors” of society and seek to persuade themselves that they are wrong or that God is a simple “supernatural force” that is undefinable and “something” that is not accessible to humans. This is why I decided to clarify this difficult subject and ask Cezar to explain it as clearly as possible so that I could in turn explain it to others so that those who are interested can overcome the barriers of uncertainty.

“If God ‘matches’ synchronicities and makes them possible, then He is always inside of us, just as the Oriental tradition argues,” I said, “because, if He were only outside of us, I cannot see how he could ‘arrange’ every synchronicity and the cobweb of facts and realities around us. This is in perfect accordance with the principles of Hindu philosophy which reveals the atman that is the essential spirit and the immortal Self in each of us.

But, there is a problem raised by many people here. I am referring to the fact that, as you know, based on its overwhelming authority, Christianity doesn’t acknowledge this but considers it a blasphemy. I can tell you that I’ve had the chance to meet many persons who felt puzzled by this fact.

Some of them reached the point where they experienced something close to an inner drama because the pure sensation they had in their hearts which gave them an intuition of the presence of the Self and thus of God in themselves was combated by Christian dogma which they adhered to.”

Cezar listened carefully and thought for a couple of moments.

“It’s true that Christian tradition denies that God is present in the “human being,” he answered.

“As you said, however, Oriental spiritual traditions and even spiritual common sense show us that God is present within us all the time, even when the human being is retarded and even when we are selfish or angry.

Therefore, it is very important for Mankind to know and understand that God is present in them every time and in every situation.”

“You’re referring to our essential Self,” I interrupted him in order to clarify any shadow of a doubt.

“Yes, I’m referring to atman from the Hindu spiritual tradition. You need to understand that if it were not so and if God had not ‘placed’ in each human being a spark of Himself, it would have been impossible for God to ask Mankind to know Him through every great initiate who was fully developed spiritually. In such a case, even if man would have wanted to know God, he wouldn't have what it is he wanted to know because God would have been absent from the human being.

“And then, men would have been right to ask: ‘Why do You tell me to know You, when You are only outside of me? You can see this is impossible because You are outside of me and I am alone. And because You are not inside of me, where should I know You? If it were so, You could disappear any time and I might never see You again. So, if You are only outside of me, this doesn’t mean I found you forever and this does not satisfy me!’

“This possible monologue should show you the inconsistency of the idea that God is not present in every one of us. Everybody tells us that God exists ‘outside’ but God’s true revelation is the one within us. Only then can we say we’ve become divine.”

Cezar’s words enlightened my understanding better. Even if, from my point of view, there was no separation between these contradictory aspects on the existence of God, Cezar’s pertinent demonstration inspired me with a deeper understanding of this reality. Therefore, I immediately underlined the idea.

“I believe this is why Jesus stated, ‘I am inside my Father and my Father is inside of me,’ but very few understood this statement and we can still see the results of that,” I said to Cezar.

“You’ve understood the essential,” Cezar replied, confirming what I had said. “However, I must note that what Christianity considered to apply only for Jesus is at the same time applicable for every one of us. This is a fundamental truth. Because of the deviations in the translations of the Bible, there were ideas which stated that God doesn’t exist in the human being and that we can only know God the Father by knowing Jesus and through Jesus’s grace. Clerics state that it is not possible to know God within ourselves.

“Even if we admitted that this idea was real, we still need to observe that there were persons who had the revelation of God before Jesus. Remember the holographic images in the Projection Chamber where you could see for yourself that there existed human beings who had missions similar to that of Jesus but tens of thousands of years before Jesus. There, you could also see the purely divine influence of their actions.”

I immediately approved. I remember that this was very puzzling for me at that time; but since a lot of images and information came one after the other, that strong impression somehow passed on to second place. Later, after a few months, when I created a detailed retrospective from my memory of what I had seen in the Projection Chamber in the Bucegi Mountains, I noticed that I wasn’t so surprised any longer and that the situation seemed natural. So, there were many other human beings who reached full communion with God the Father before Jesus and who had very important spiritual missions. In the images I saw, I watched the summary of the missions of three wise men, two of whom were great spiritual reformers.

“Even this simple fact shows that God is always present inside of us. If it had not been so from our origins, this would have meant that every human being who lived before Jesus would have been God’s ‘rejects’ who eventually could have questioned God, asking Him: ‘Why did you create us and laugh at us before sending your Son so that we are rejected forever?’

“Of course, such an idea is nonsense just as is the notion of sin and eternal torment. People should understand – and here I am referring especially to those fanatics of faith and dogma who lack the minimal opening of the soul which might help them easily grasp in their intuition the meaning of what I’m telling you now – that such an idea is simply absurd. If you consider that making a mistake, which is obviously limited to the time of a human life, it is impossible that one should be tormented forever.

“Now, I think you know well enough that men’s suffering or torment is directly related to their mistakes in life. I suppose you have heard about people who go through a crisis and even severe psychical disturbance during a time in their life; but, after a while, they recover and sometimes even evolve in comparison to their condition before the illness.”

I realized that I had never thought of this.

“Yes, you’re right,” I answered with amazement. “How can they recover?”

“Normally, the severe crisis and the illness should kill them,” Cezar answered without being bothered. “In their case, however, the evil was not so great and the period of torment is over by reason of reconciliation of their past mistakes. There has been compensation before their life ends. In other cases, the situation is different. Some never recover, others become paranoid or are born paranoid and leave the physical world in the same condition.”

In “The Ring”

I had correctly understood the mechanism of karma or destiny, but Cezar’s explanations clarified this even more.

“You should know that I have told others part of what you just said, but I was amazed at the virulence of many of them and at the way they gave another meaning to what I said.

Sometimes, I almost had no idea what to answer back because their remarks were so mocking and mean. I was troubled because I couldn’t understand why I had not managed to impart the point of view of good which, as you have said, always wins.”

Cezar laughed briefly and relaxed in the armchair.

“It is true that good always wins — don’t ever doubt it! In some cases, however, it isn’t enough to be good if we are weak from the point of view of inner strength and inspiration. In our confrontation with an evil being who is strong, we’ll be quickly defeated even if we are good but do not have enough inner strength. In such situations, which can even be quite dramatic, we will not have the possibility of imposing our will even if truth is on our side and even if we know the truth well and it is clear for us that the other one is a pervert who wants to confuse us or divide thousands of people. Our truth will no longer have any importance; and, even if we complain and tell everyone about that person’s actions, that the respective person is evil and that we know the monstrous truth about them, this will, quite paradoxically, have almost no importance at all.”

I was somewhat confused. In a certain way, in my subconscious, I imagined that the good and the truth should automatically and quickly win no matter the situation.

“Why?” I asked, slightly hesitating. “Why has goodness no power in that situation?”

Cezar spoke slowly, emphasizing the words as if to convince himself that I understood this very important aspect well.

“Because, when we have anemic reactions and answers, we won’t be able to fight efficiently and with almost equal forces against someone who is evil but strong, even if we have Good on our side as a weapon. To a being that is powerful and evil, it requires a good and powerful one to oppose them. If the good one is not equal, then the evil but more powerful will win. I think you know that there have been many such cases in history when a tyrant has managed to confuse millions of people through his determination to have them act aberrantly. If goodness is not doubled by inner strength so that it becomes efficient goodness, it is not like God’s goodness. I’d rather say it’s a deplorable state in which many could say about the respective person that they are ‘so good that they’re stupid.’”

“In such situations, the good person who has a weak aura and inner strength will feel somehow ‘squashed,’ small and almost insignificant in front of the overwhelming strength of their opponent who is, unfortunately, evil. You can recognize that weak person by the specific state he or she displays.

Usually, they shake their shoulders and, thinking they are fully justified, they state, ‘I am small, there’s nothing I can do, and I must obey.’ And they do obey, even if it is against their will. Such people cannot efficiently oppose the evil ones because their energetic aura is small and anemic. By saying this, I mean that they do not yet have enough good strength in order to successfully oppose the pressure exerted by the evil opponent.”

A pause followed during which neither one of us spoke. I was staring at a point on the floor, trying to understand my current condition from the point of view of such a confrontation between good and evil. It is true that some years had passed since those conversations I had with my “opponents,” but I was reluctant to draw a conclusion. I would have liked to have asked Cezar about this in order to get a pertinent “evaluation” but something seemed to stop me from asking him.

I found myself asking, “How can this force of good in the inner aura increase? For example, how can I become strong enough to successfully face the evil in others?”

I then felt that I had chosen the way of good. Cezar looked at me, content with my question. He looked straight into my eyes and answered me calmly.

“Many persons have evil tendencies or even intentions deep inside and they display them almost unconsciously. Most of the times they do not even figure this out. They even consider that it is the good way. Inferior evil levels fuel them with a very brutish specific energy that influences their minds and thoughts so that those beings even wish to hurt or enjoy hurting those around them. You know that the forces of evil do not tolerate the good. Spiritual or even moral superiority disturbs those who are evil, and they feel an exaggerated wish to hit, destroy, and profane that which is good and elevated.

“In our age, one can easily find villains who do such low deeds and then become a channel for the activity of evil forces. However, as long as they don’t fall very low and do not close their entire soul through their wrong thinking and evil actions, such people still have moments of awareness when they are tormented by doubt and regret. But, if they fall too low on the descending slope or if they have ‘sold themselves’ as they say, then it will be very difficult to bring them back to normal in their current existence.”

“Such an example would be Signore Massini, wouldn’t it?” I asked.

“Of course, but not only him. Generally speaking, almost all Masonic leaders of international importance are confronted with this aspect whether they are fully aware of it or not. It’s like a ‘mark’ in their aura which can’t ever deceive a sensitive person who is profoundly oriented towards the good.”

“Yes,” I said, “but regular people will say that these are all just inventions and aberrations and that these people are in fact respectable. You know the old and ridiculous conception of materialist science: there are no subtle energies, there are no subtle bodies, and there are no subtle worlds because we can’t see them.”

Cezar smiled faintly.

“My dear, this problem is specific to the age we live in. If, in their egotism and fear, some people prefer to think this way, this is only due to their ignorance. Subtle energies exist and they can be understood, but those who perceive them must be able to capture them. Just like we can’t print a photo on a piece of wood, so is it that subtle energies cannot be evidenced in every being if one is not aware nor able to perceive them. As the consciousness of such a person has a lower vibrating frequency, they can’t perceive the subtle manifestation of the energies that are around. These people are like country men who see an elephant but say that elephants don’t exist. But, beyond the ignorant opinion of such people, the subtle reality is quite clear for those who have trained and are able to see clearly.

They have a common world because they describe similar states and aspects. From the point of view of subtle perception, this world is much superior to that in which regular people feel and perceive things and beings around them. To draw a parallel, magnetic phenomena is not evident unless we have the necessary instruments of measurement, and some types of atomic radiation would not be noticed save for the reactions they produce. Even though we cannot see them with our own eyes, they are accepted.”

I agreed with his determination. After a short pause, Cezar continued with the previous idea.

“I was telling you that the evil ones can’t deceive a person who is profoundly oriented towards goodness and who at the same time has certain clear sight qualities. Unfortunately, however, they do manage to successfully deceive huge masses of people through diabolical systems of government and population control. You can’t even imagine the mess and decay which exists in their world, especially in the world of politics.”

“I do know something. I’ve had occasion to observe them for a while even though at that time I wasn’t aware of these aspects,” I said bitterly, referring to my old job.

“It is very good that destiny has shown you another direction. Moreover, this will help you considerably in making the right decision when I tell you the reason of my visit. Some of my recommendations as well as neutrality towards the political conglomerate have served as a strong advantage for certain decision makers to consider you. Don’t worry. It’s a decent proposal even though I realize it still hides a complicated game.”

My heart was pounding. This approach from Cezar was something totally different and it raised my curiosity, but I had no time to state my questions out loud because he spoke to me again.

“And it’s very good that our discussion got to these aspects related to the need to be strong and oriented towards good because they are related to what I’m going to tell you.”

I thought it was time for me to take a chance to get some of my questions answered so I asked Cezar something that had been on my mind. “You mean that, given the decision I must make, I need a strong aura and enough energy to support a confrontation with evil? But, am I really ready for this?”

Cezar smiled, elegantly avoiding a direct answer.

“If the power of good is developed in your aura enough, you’ll be able to efficiently fight against the powerful manifestations of evil and even persuade those you come into contact with the evil nature of their orientation. Most of the time, these persons are somewhat mimetic. They imitate what they see in others, but they imitate what is evil. It is only natural that they also gather evil influences in their aura. Such people are like puppets who act this way because the others around them act in the same way. Thus, a sort of general fooling of people intervenes and each person takes the other one as an example but rather than follow good habits and correct attitudes, they are prone to evil actions and tendencies because, as you already know, they are easier to follow. Eventually and unavoidably, these actions will have to be fully paid for and this will mean a lot of suffering for the respective person.”

I allowed myself to interfere by vocalizing my observation that collective “fooling” is particularly ideological in nature and that the “stock” or “worth” of a decadent offer is presently greater than that of just ideas and actions.

Cezar confirmed the truth of what I said.

“It’s completely true because there is already an almost quasi-total control of the mass media, ideas and programs by the Freemasons. It is easy to observe that they insist upon what is decadent, easy, childish and lacking any taste, content or spiritual value. Under these conditions, it is only natural that people should swallow what comes to them. At first, it might be more difficult to hook them, but it soon becomes a habit in time; and in their mind-set and aura, they gather energies and ideas like ‘this should happen’ and ‘this is normal.’ Thus, we reach the paradoxical situation when, if something truly valuable and spiritual intervenes, the presentation is ignored if not rejected. This is a sad and at the same time dangerous situation.

There are always solutions however.

“Do not forget that any habit can be changed if one acts with an opposite habit. If you’re oriented towards being good and strong, you can persuade those you come into contact with of the evil nature of their orientation and thus you can ‘deflate’ the evil tendencies they promote. Even after a short conversation with such people, if your aura is strong enough, you can help these persons choose a beneficial orientation which will save them.

Otherwise, it will be very difficult to persuade, for example, a hard rock fan that what he is doing is evil. You can do this provided that there is a real dialogue. If you succeed, that person will not afterwards be attracted anymore to what he or she previously considered fascinating and evil.”

Cezar sipped a bit from the orange juice I had served him and then continued as if he was suddenly inspired.

“Just think about the huge level of robotization and hypnosis in the life of modern men. If you pay attention to the way they live and think, you’ll immediately notice that they’ve practically forgotten about their divine soul and they are completely fascinated with inferior, degrading, vicious and perverted temptations of the Freemasonic society they are a part of. Since this society is almost exclusively governed by material wealth, you’ll rarely find traces of authentic spirituality. And when they do manifest themselves, they tend to be quickly oppressed, accused and degraded in the eyes of the masses which are then almost ‘hypnotized’ by the directed news in the media. It’s a sad reality which we must, however, face with great courage, perseverance and patience.”

“But the fact that there are many people who are aware of this should have a major influence in the fight against evil and Freemasonry,” I observed.

“There is a quantitative aspect, isn’t there? Unfortunately, there are many who have adopted an evil orientation out of ignorance or on purpose, but I believe that there are also many people who are oriented beneficially, positively and who want the good to win.”

“It’s true,” replied Cezar, “but do not forget that for the phenomena of beneficial and efficient mass action to occur, it is first necessary that there is a perfect state of unity between all members of a group or crowd and that they are acting in the same direction. You must understand why this state of unity of a group of human beings is necessary. Moreover, this can help you better understand how demonic and satanic forces act when they seek to divide by creating a state of suspicion and lack of unity in a group. If this state of unity is shattered, the energetic force disappears and this is what the Freemasons seek to accomplish at a global or worldwide level. It is clear that, as long as people are divided and feel wrath against each other, especially through wars, the state of unity, force, coherence and efficiency of actions can’t be accomplished. Understanding this law, because it’s really a universal law, can show you why it’s so important to maintain a state of harmony in a group, team or couple.”

Feeling something was unclear, I asked Cezar my next question.

“And this state of unity of a group is disturbed even if those who fail to integrate are fewer than the others?”

“What I’m about to tell you will amaze you, but only until you understand correctly the subtle mechanism involved,” replied Cezar. “To create a state of disharmony in a group, it is enough for just one person to appear in order to lead it into division and thus cancel the state of unity of the members by reason of unnecessary tension. This is precisely what the famous technique of diversion consists of and is so frequently used in politics and secret services. This is why it is so important for a group of beneficially oriented people to be harmonious and ‘in touch’ with the direction they’re acting in.

In the event that there are people who are tempted or inclined to spread evil and inferior influences so as to ruin the deep harmony of thought and action in a group, it is good to eliminate them as quickly as possible from the group as a preventative method. It is more difficult when such persons infiltrate groups but choose to hide their true purposes, thoughts and interests and initially pretend to have the same aspirations and conduct as the members of the respective group.

The Shock

After pausing and without any beating around the bush, Cezar made a sudden and rather startling statement which betrayed the real purpose of his unexpected visit.

“I was asked from high above to contact you with regard to a more delicate problem. You don’t have to worry because this can be a wonderful opportunity for you. A few days ago, I received a note at our base with a special heading through which I was asked for certain information on Dr. Xien. Our secret structures are very interested in relations with him and it seems that, at the highest level, things have been put in motion, especially now. Actually, the request was quite specific. I was asked to contact you because you were involved in the space translation performed by Dr. Xien last year.”

Completely astonished, I asked Cezar how it was possible for them to know that I had written on that subject.

He laughed heartily and answered me quickly.

“Don’t ever underestimate the power of the counter-information service. Did you imagine that you’d remain anonymous after all those revelations?” Cezar then became silent for a while, looking at the floor.

“Actually, our departments must work very closely. This is why I knew that you were targeted. Well, this game is more complicated than what I’m telling you now. It’s important that, as I was saying, in this segment of the state structure there are some officials who are beneficially oriented and, through some artifices so to say, it’s been decided not to stop you in your endeavors. The initial intention, according to a very quick standard procedure, was to remove you from the publishing circuit immediately. Of course, it would not have been at all easy for you. Some people in high offices, however, have somehow glimpsed at the importance of the information you’re providing and they have especially anticipated the possible effect in the mind and soul of common people. You know very well that there is a difficult battle going on between huge interests, both at a national and an international level.

“Here in our country there is a very important focal point which is decisive with regard to victory for one side or the other. I am referring to the degree of ‘awakening’ of the population and the special complex discovered in the Bucegi Mountains. There are, of course, other aspects as well, but I believe these are the most important. You therefore needed support; and believe me, there were plenty of internal tensions and discussions between our departments on this subject. We can even call them internal battles, arguments and counter arguments, but they eventually gave you a kind of ‘green light.’ This means they will leave you in peace.

“Of course, I expected such reactions which is why I have sort of prepared the groundwork with General Obadea and a few other trusted subordinates. A few days ago, I received the secret note I was telling you about and was summoned to a certain place. I cannot tell you who that person was and I believe you understand very well why, but I considered this situation very appropriate in helping you to get closer to and to better understand certain ‘hot’ points. I hope you agree with me.”

Even though I could not understand what he meant, I bowed my head quickly in approval. I was a bit dazzled by what I had just learned. I had the illusion that I had managed to keep perfect secrecy around my identity and the fact that I had written these books. Of course, the revelation of this secret would create big “waves” and could lead to unpredictable results.

But, the purpose of information and counter-information services is not to reveal what they find out if interests impose such. In my case, I found out once again how important it is to have someone in life support you in the most important moments.

“The person who summoned me had a special information warrant and had been assigned very precise tasks,” Cezar continued. “I was asked if it was possible to contact Dr. Xien as soon as possible. Then, I saw a very interesting opportunity and I pointed to you. This way, you would be able to enjoy a certain extra immunity. Briefly, I was asked to propose to you a position in Department Zero because I told them that, due to the special experience you’ve lived through with Dr. Xien, it is possible that you might have a better chance to contact him. They already knew that we are friends, and I was asked some information about you but it was rather general. It was very important that you have no social obligations, and my guarantee was enough to obtain the necessary approval.”

I could not believe that this was happening to me.

“You mean I’m part of Department Zero now?” I asked.

“Aren’t you glad? I knew you wanted very much to find out more details concerning the discovery in Bucegi,” Cezar teased me with a slight smile.

He then explained that my status was that of an expert consultant because, in this way, they could integrate me into the work chart of the service. The real reason I had been accepted, however, was that higher decisional factors had been informed that I was the last known person to have seen Dr. Xien.

Cezar did not mention anything about Elinor and this somehow lifted a stone off my chest because I didn’t want any complications related to a possible search of his villa. Suddenly, the situation had become clear. I was being called to be part of Department Zero and would thus enjoy a certain protection. I still had the freedom to write about certain topics but, as Cezar specified, not about everything. I did not understand, however, how I could contribute to accomplishing the plans of the higher organisms that had requested a meeting with Dr. Xien. I did not see how I could help accomplish this by being part of Department Zero.

“The situation, as always, has its ups and downs,” Cezar explained. “There’s a confrontation between certain state interests over the fact that you’re a civilian revealing important information. Eventually, as you can see, state interests prevailed. All of this was able to take place because reports showed that there was a certain niche perception, to speak in technical terms, which means that this information is only assimilated by a certain category of people who, however, seem to become more and more diversified over time. We’ve stressed the fact that your works are considered science-fiction and therefore are no risk. This strategy was successful and thus you have obtained access to other extraordinary information.”

Cezar then paused for a moment, looked straight into my eyes, and spoke to me with the joy of one who knows he is giving one a wonderful surprise.

“We’re going back to the Projection Chamber. In a few days, a team of which you will also be a part of will leave through the tunnel to Egypt.

Officially, some special measurements need to be performed there and we also have to bring back some objects we discovered there previously.”

I thought that this was the best day of my life. Not even in my wildest dreams had I seen any possibility of being part of such an expedition and now I was only a few days away from fulfilling my aspirations in this direction. In my mind, I could already see with high intensity the impressions and images of my previous visit to the huge underground chamber. But, more than that, I had become almost restless thinking of what I was about to see in the future expedition. After expressing my joy quite loudly, I insisted that Cezar tell me what he had found in the location in Egypt; but he, definitely amused by my childish attitude, resisted all my requests.

“You’ll be so amazed by what you’ll see there that there’s no point in ruining that emotion for you. Of course, I will tell you along the way about some elements because we’ll have plenty of time for this. The expedition will last for several days, but even now, let this remain as an intriguing aspect,” he added thoughtfully.

“Why does it last so long?” I asked, somewhat puzzled.

“That’s just the point. We have to drive special vehicles, but I do not see why the builders, who left us this amazing technical accomplishment inside the mountain, left us with no clue about the movement through the tunnels because there are thousands of kilometers to go and, as you’ll see for yourself, the tunnels are absolutely empty. They are an impeccable technical accomplishment and look as if they were opened for use yesterday. They are, however, empty without any objects or trace of anything. This is not too big a concern, however, because the U.S. Navy solved it right away. But I won’t tell you anything else now because you will soon have the chance to see for yourself. You need to pack a bag with the minimum required luggage and then we’ll leave for the base,” Cezar said, looking at his watch with haste.

I panicked. I was expecting to have a transition period, a time for becoming more familiar with everything; but, with a couple of words, Cezar had told me that we couldn't be late one single instant.

"It's part of the protocol," Cezar justified himself. "After being given some information, the subject must not be exposed at all. Besides, you also need to get used to certain elements before our departure. Did you have anything special planned?"

I tried to utter something.

"Great!" Cezar stopped me. "It's perfect then. Your departure won't cause any trouble. You'll have a few days for a summary preparation during which time you will get used to living in the base, and I'll give you a few details on our objectives. We'll spend the last hours in the Projection Chamber. It has been concluded that it has a beneficial psychic influence which will be all the more necessary since we are preparing for the journey.

I repeat, you don't have to pack anything more than what is strictly necessary."

In a state of fever, I had already started to gather some things I thought I needed. I had filled two travel bags, but Cezar pointed to a simple backpack.

"You practically don't need anything. You'll find everything there."

Eventually, I crammed some strictly necessary things into the backpack and we got out of the house in the night which was partially lit by moonlight.

Once again, I was virtually "driven" by events without having time to relax and without analyzing the situation with a clearer mind, but the quiet night and the chilly air gave me a state of sudden confidence. If I still had some secondary fears, they were now shattered like steam in the wind.

My soul was suddenly conquered by a great gratitude to Cezar for everything he was doing for me. I sincerely thanked him for this, telling him that I considered him a true spiritual master who guides me on my steps to my destiny. He didn't say anything as he looked thoughtfully ahead, but I could see a faint smile in the corner of his lips and a look of acceptance on his face. A few meters away from my house, a dark-colored jeep was waiting for us. We both got in the back seat and the driver left immediately.

Life had now opened up a huge perspective for me to which very few people have access, and I was very determined to live up to the expectations. There was a very persistent thought, however, which kept appearing in the background of my mind and gave me a slight tremor all over my body. I would very soon step once more into the gigantic Projection Chamber. I was going to look again at all those exceptional technical accomplishments and be surrounded by the enigmatic silence of times immemorial...

Chapter Two — The Tunnel

My emotions did not diminish on the way to the secret Alpha Base nor during the entire four days that I spent there. On the contrary, they became stronger as the time approached to leave through the secret tunnel to Egypt.

It is easy to understand that I cannot disclose any information concerning the secret base of Department Zero. I will only say that an elegant room was already prepared for me in the same wing where Cezar lived. Generally speaking, I was forbidden to disclose any details on the location, construction or administration of this secret facility. After all, I do not consider this to be important. The events that followed were more important than this.

Occult Reasons

The days I spent at the Alpha Base also involved a moderate sports training, getting used to special operations equipment and learning simple schemes of action in extreme cases. During the evening, Cezar came to my room and explained to me certain technical details that I was not accustomed to.

He had taken care that everything I would need was at my disposal and also took a personal interest in the way the training I was taking was advancing. I really appreciated this because I knew that he was very busy during the day with studying files, speaking on the phone and even leaving quickly in the helicopter to a destination unknown to me.

During the evening of the fourth day, General Obadea arrived. Two years had passed since I had last seen him, but he seemed to be just as full of energy and optimism as ever. The expression of his rough face and steel glance did not manage to hide his sensible soul or the feeling of honesty and correctness his presence inspired. The General first had a confidential conversation with Cezar which lasted for about half an hour. After that, they both came to me and we analyzed together some details about the upcoming expedition. Later, General Obadea made a pause and spoke to me in an equal voice.

“Hierarchically, I’ve been asked to deliver an important message to you. But, I am talking to you like I talk to a good friend, and I assure you that I’ll fully support your integration into Department Zero. Not long ago, Dr. Xien contacted our government through certain connections concerning a very important problem of which I am not allowed to tell you. At that time, the government gave him a certain answer, but some major changes have occurred in the meantime and the state authority wishes to change this option.

Unfortunately, the connection with Dr. Xien is no longer valid and things are quite critical. There is an idea that you might intermediate this contact with Dr. Xien and, actually, this is why you’re here. I know a bit about the special experience you lived a year ago with Dr. Xien. Cezar has told me several details. It is hard to believe, but at the top political level, there are also people capable of understanding what you went through during that time. It seems like an unusual action which concerns you, but because of your relationship with Cezar, it’s been much easier to get the approval of your presence here.

I was embarrassed because I did not know any more than they did as to how I could contact Dr. Xien. I expressed these fears in front of General Obadea, but he comforted me immediately.

“We have experts who pointed out that choosing you would probably be an advantage in accomplishing this. They explained it in terms of a “matching of situations” and “affinity of conjunctures.” We are therefore trying to establish a proper framework to contact Dr. Xien. I know that his actions and influence are not limited to the physical world. He is so occult that he exceeds our possibilities, even the ones we have here in Department Zero. Not even Cezar can contact him at times like these.”

I looked at Cezar with surprise, and I saw him shake his head approvingly and seriously.

“It’s true,” Cezar agreed. “An explanation would be that Dr. Xien is part of something very special right now. It’s like when you don’t want to be disturbed and you unplug the phone.

"There would also be the special possibility that, in principle, you have access to Machandi and could contact her first and thus take an indirect attempt to reach Dr. Xien. I believe you now have an understanding of what we're dealing with."

I became thoughtful. The memory of the goddess suddenly swept through my entire being. My mind was filled with intermittent flashes of live images and my soul was uneasy. After the initiation I had experienced on Gugu Peak in the Retezat Mountains, I felt that I had been given the ability to strongly relate to Machandi. Invoking her made me feel awake during my dreams almost every time and in a way that I could see her and talk to her. This aspect of my life, however, is one of the most intimate and troubling subjects I have had to deal with. I will not insist too much on it except to clarify the events I describe right here.

After the special initiation I experienced, there are certain impressions and intuitions which are difficult to describe in words but have remained like a fingerprint inside me and cannot be deleted. They have several components which are not common to our reality and are connected to another world which is impossible to describe. I will not insist upon asserting these realities but I will tell you that, in my subconscious, I had the certain idea that my contact with the goddess was open and allowed. The energetic transformations that were necessary in my inner structure in order to accomplish this took place in the few hours that I spent on the mountain when I was almost in a state of catharsis. At the same time, even if I did not summon Machandi, I could still be certain of her presence which I felt around me even though I could not see her with my physical eyes. In the beginning, this made me sad somehow, but afterwards, I saw her in a dream exactly as she appeared to me in reality. At such times, I suddenly became aware that I was dreaming and this made me feel very happy and very free.

I had two such troubling encounters with Machandi in the past year and, from what General Obadea had said, I judged that I was practically being asked to reiterate this for a third time. I could not understand, however, how they had guessed my subtle relation with the goddess which, in my opinion, has marked my existence more than anything until now.

I agreed with Cezar and General Obadea to try to contact Dr. Xien in this indirect way, but I felt that I would fail at this time. Indeed it was so.

Regardless of my attempts to invoke Machandi, she did not appear in my dreams. At first, I told myself that this was due to my agitation and emotions before departure so I applied a technique which Dr. Xien had recommended to me in order to reach the deepest relaxation possible of my body and mind. The technique was quite easy. Approximately two hours after my last meal and without practicing any violent physical exercises in the meantime, I sat on a blanket face up, taking care to create a nice environment of peace and safety. With my eyes closed, I would imagine that each segment of my body, starting from my toes to my head, became very heavy until, shortly afterwards, I could no longer feel its weight. My experience has shown me that this makes my mind mostly free of the contact with my body and I therefore become much "lighter." I avoided applying this technique while lying on my bed because I had concluded that I could fall asleep quite easily, even before sending a strong thought to Machandi.

When I thought I had reached a certain state of relaxation and peace of body and mind, which I usually felt as a sensation of great dilation without a physical support, I evoked in my memory the impressive moment when I had seen Machandi very close to me in that cave in the mountains of Tibet.

Then, a somewhat strange phenomenon would occur: I felt a chill in my body, accompanied by a flash of light in my eyes. Immediately afterwards, I was in front of the goddess who was not far from me, her shine blinding me as she looked at me with love. After that flash, I first lost continuity of consciousness and fell asleep. When I awoke, I did not remember what I had dreamt nor that I had even dreamt anything at all. I kept a special nostalgia in my heart, however, and an urge for something hidden and wrapped in mystery.

As I continued this process step by step, I started to remain more and more awake up to the point when that important "milestone" approached, just before I saw the goddess. I was even able to overcome it. In those moments, I felt a joy I cannot describe as I looked at how gorgeous Machandi was and this state became even more amplified when she spoke to me. I knew very well that I would fall asleep during those times while staying perfectly aware. This means that I entered the dream world with its totally different laws, but I was still aware of it. I observed that, after seeing the goddess, my awareness diminished greatly and I would fall into a normal sleep before waking up rested and in a wonderful physical and mental state. I still, however, wasn't capable of consciously directing the succession of all the actions in my dream. I understood that the goddess helped me in the beginning and this was essential for me to remain aware in her presence, but I then had to make a constant effort to make progress and reach the same dexterity of maintaining my consciousness during my dream state.

It was unusual, but the attempts I made after that conversation with General Obadea had no results. This was even more discouraging than when I had first begun practicing this technique. I could not understand why this was happening and I told Cezar about my failures. He explained that all I could do in such cases was not to lose my courage and go on. It seemed that nobody understood this sudden occultation and that, at least temporarily, any method to establish contact seemed doomed to fail. Cezar, however, was very pleased of the past experiences I shared with him and encouraged me to make further progress in this direction.

"Our age is obviously deeply decadent and this is why special conditions are created for some human beings to awaken to a superior form of intelligence which we could name 'intelligence of the heart.' It combines mental intelligence with the love one feels in one's heart in an intelligent manner. The great advantage here is that this 'awakening' will lead to the development of a society with a higher degree of common sense. There are few who realize that this important quality, which should be the base of every form of life, is nowadays lacking in many human beings. For those who follow a right and harmonious path, however, and not according to their own perceptions but according to cosmic and spiritual laws, certain revelations become possible which make them realize that everything is at the same time material and immaterial, concrete and abstract, objective and subjective."

I then realized that, in a certain way, I was also a part of this category because I have lived at the edge between two worlds, one which seemed tangible and physical and where I was aware of my body; and one which, even though I could perceive it, was governed by other laws of expression. This relative intertwining puzzled me at first, and I have wondered more than a few times whether or not I should disclose this information in my books. Naturally, I was wondering what the reader could understand from this when I, who has been confronted with these circumstances, did not understand them too well myself.

The Subtle Worlds

Cezar's explanation came at the right time and made me feel the essence of the problem intuitively. I wanted to understand all of this as clearly as possible so I asked him to give me more details on the subject.

"For the majority of men, the main obstacle is that they're only convinced of the existence of the physical world," he started telling me. "If they don't even understand the laws of this world very well, how could they conceive the existence of subtle worlds? And yet, fortunately, there are persons who are perfectly aware of these realities and, even more than that, they take part in them to a certain degree. Let's take you as example. The intense experiences you lived through, especially in the past year, have made you understand that what we call matter in our world is really only a certain state of it. We are therefore talking about matter generally and physical matter is only a state of universal matter which exists in a context that is defined by specific laws. To a certain extent, science has proven that these laws have their own internal coherence and that they support each other. But, you could realize that, at the same time with these physical laws, there are also other coherent systems of laws that govern mysterious worlds of manifestation which are invisible for the normal person and this is why they are called subtle. In these subtle worlds, there are several types of subtle matter which have different qualities and particularities and, as you could already convince yourself, these realms are populated by beings with characteristics that are specific to the respective world. On the other hand, subtle worlds are also strictly hierarchical and the essential principle is the frequency of vibration of matter. The higher it is, the more elevated the respective subtle world is. Machandi, for example, is part of the world of superior gods and you can be sure that you've been given an important grace through her appearances to you.

"On the other hand, the different vibrational frequencies of the matter which make up each world, either physical or subtle, make its inhabitants perceive only the world they live in. This applies especially to the physical world in which we live. Think of a radio which only works on medium wave.

Another radio, which is more sophisticated, works on medium wave but also on shortwave which has a superior vibrational frequency in comparison with medium wavelengths. The radio which only works on medium wave can't work on shortwave and doesn't even know of the existence of such wavelengths. But the radio which works on shortwave knows that there's also a medium wavelength. If it's tuned accordingly, it can easily render them. You understand, don't you?"

It was very clear and I felt a great internal satisfaction that I had already experienced other realities than the physical world we live in.

"I feel that Machandi helps me a lot and she inspires me in almost everything I do," I told Cezar, suddenly feeling emotion as I remembered the image of the goddess in my mind. "When I am allowed and helped to get into this world, everything changes and I feel a flow of beauty and harmony."

"Practically speaking, you've been helped to gain access to a paradise world and this has somehow awakened the breath of life which generates a state of happiness. You're certainly ravished by her beauty and this helps you see beauty everywhere around you and look at Nature with delight. I realize that your condition has changed and that your understanding and appreciation is superior to the phase in which you were two years ago.

Beauty attracts you in its essence and this represents an urge in you for ascension that is driving your life."

Once again, I was overwhelmed with the accuracy and correctness of Cezar's observations. Feeling suddenly inspired, I spoke without taking my breath.

"What I truly think is important about this is that I've realized that beauty is, first of all, harmony. Looking at Machandi and often contemplating her, I've discovered that her amazing beauty is enigmatically transmitted to me and it makes me discover my own internal harmony that I need in order to be happy. At the same time, it is like a sublime organization of the different levels of my life. I have noticed, however, that I can only maintain this wonderful state of mind for a limited period of time."

I became silent, wondering about how I had expressed so concisely what I had wanted to tell Cezar for so long.

“In order to understand correctly why this happens, you need to keep in mind that the universe, which also includes the physical world and the subtle world, functions according to a mysterious geometry composed of a lot of levels. You can imagine them as ‘bands’ of manifestation. You’re right when you say that beauty is harmony, and I can add that it also reveals a certain kind of balance within the human being. If you touch harmony and balance in one of the layers of the universe, one type of universal beauty will take shape. There are still the other layers, however, in which you still have not managed to obtain balance. This is the origin of the different states you were talking about. You are happy there, but relatively unhappy here. When harmony and balance are touched on several layers, however, you’ll perceive the amazing beauty revealed to you in everything around you. This is why several higher entities are willing to help during these hostile times. Those who are on the path of spiritual evolution often step in to help even when they are not asked for their help. Many such spiritual contacts take place in the astral world when people are asleep, just as in your case.”

I told Cezar that, unfortunately, many people can’t even conceive this, preferring to remain subject to the gregarious and often petty ideas and thoughts that they have about life or evolution.

“You’re right,” Cezar agreed, “but there are not too many people who take an important leap in their spiritual evolution or existence and those that do understand to a certain extent that they are actually the reflection of their own thoughts. It’s only up to them to realize that everything in their lives is the fruit of their major convictions. In principle, it’s easy to understand the process, but it’s often very hard to change it for the good and harmonious.

People often reach the conclusion that their lives are the product of their imagination which, due to the habits which intervene with time, then expresses itself with greater power. Some of them envisage the fact that they can actually change their lives by changing the nature of their thoughts. If they reach this level of intuitive thinking, the premises are created for a kind of superior opening of the mind and heart to the true Source, namely God the Father. Those who don’t care about these aspects will somehow have to find an explanation for the fact that they face so many difficulties and contrary events in life and especially for the fact that they're unhappy. They will probably understand, eventually, that these events actually help them become better structured and mature, but this is not compulsory. It also depends on many other elements. There are few people who have a profound understanding that all joys and sorrows of this world are actually 'moving shadows' that we ourselves are projecting continuously."

The Problem of Suffering

Two years ago, I had a group of friends with whom I used to talk about these aspects, trying to better understand the mysteries of occultism. The subject that Cezar explained is one that we often analyzed during our meetings, but we failed to reach a plausible conclusion. The hardest problem was that suffering, especially suffering due to failure in relationships, was perceived as leaving deep traces and as being very real. I must confess that I didn't understand this matter very well and I therefore took advantage of this opportunity to ask Cezar to explain to me these delicate nuances of life. It was already late at night and we had to leave at dawn to the subterranean complex in the Bucegi Mountains. As Cezar believed this was an important matter, he started explaining some of its mysteries.

"Everyone wants more happiness and joy but no suffering," he said. "When people suffer, they know very well that they would do anything to get rid of this feeling. Suffering therefore makes us seek a way out. This means that we must reevaluate many aspects of our lives, including those that used to make us happy before. A first observation would be that we need to act when faced with suffering. It makes us move and from this point of view, it has a structuring role because, when we want to overcome trouble, we strive to find solutions."

"Okay, but what is the mechanism of suffering? Why does it appear?" I interrupted Cezar." "I think it is essential for me to know the causes in order to reach the solution."

"You're right, but right now your understanding is only intellectual and doesn't come from the heart, from deep introspection. The most known causes of suffering, as we understand them in the current society, are the absence of what we want or the presence of what we don't want. You can, for example, suffer because of the absence of someone you love or because of the presence of someone who makes you feel uncomfortable. You can also suffer because you work is too hard, because you want more free time, but also because you have no job. Suffering has many faces and degrees of intensity, but it surely makes us get closer to the essence of life in order to understand it and always relate to it.”

I felt a short circuit in my brain.

“How is this possible?” I asked. “It seems masochistic.”

“Here you're wrong because you confuse things a bit,” Cezar said calmly.

“Suffering exists, but pain can't make us feel joy as in the case of masochists. Even though nobody wants to suffer, suffering can play a very positive role in our lives. And here you must understand that, whatever the form or origin of suffering, the solution we find to remove it will always be determined by our attitude towards that suffering. Unfortunately, some people don't think it has any meaning and thus even commit suicide.

Suffering, however, can be our savior if we consider it a springboard for the transformation of our lives. The solution we find to replace suffering must be viable, powerful, beneficial and constructive. Otherwise, suffering will go on or may appear later in the same direction. Proof of the fact that suffering can have a positive role, if we look upon it maturely, is that it can create within us a feeling of compassion for those who suffer and from here the unselfish help that we can also offer them.”

I had read something about Buddhism on this subject, but I was only at the beginning.

“I know from some of the books I've read that Buddha sought the origin of suffering and, after he reached a certain understanding of its mechanism, he felt compassion for those who suffered.”

“It's normal,” Cezar added, “because compassion is a natural consequence of these searches. The more someone displays true compassion, the more we can say that the respective person has discovered some essential elements about suffering. Buddha reached the conclusion that ignorance is always involved in this process.”

“In other words, if I suffer, it’s because of my ignorance. But where does ignorance come from?” I asked, paying attention to Cezar’s explanations.

“Suffering and ignorance appear when our understanding differs from reality. Unfortunately, reality can’t be perceived as being separated from the mind because this acts like a channel of our perceptions of everything around us. Of course, we can only see through our own channel and this is why they say that ‘beauty lies in the eyes of the beholder’ or that ‘we all see the world in our own way.’ And this leads me to an important conclusion I wanted to share with you. In order to solve the problem of suffering, we shouldn’t emphasize the symptoms but rather the ability to perceive correctly everything around us. In a way, we can call it judgment.”

I noted that judgment is an attribute of the mind and that, if the mind is not clear, judgment is also altered.

“This really is a problem,” Cezar agreed. “If the mind is clear, the human being can be more aware of what is going on, can accept reality better and thus suffering will be greatly reduced. But, I want you to know that nobody can offer us this clarity of the mind because we already have it within us.

We just need to let ourselves be guided by a new way of seeing things and situations. Actually, when the mind becomes clearer, the causes of suffering are diminished as well.

“If you want, you can imagine the relation between mind and ignorance as follows. In the mind, ignorance is like a malfunction which, through other aspects that generate it, blocks our correct understanding and thus triggers suffering.”

“And, what are the aspects that ignorance generates in our minds?” I asked curiously.

“First of all, there’s confusion which is about the same with the foggy mind you were speaking about earlier. I could also mention devotion, rejection and especially fear.

“All these generate suffering which, as you know very well, appears and disappears and then appears again and thus can go on forever if it’s not maturely understood.”

I was thinking about the most mature way of understanding suffering, but instead of this, I asked, “What is the first thought that should come to our minds when suffering appears?”

After a short pause, Cezar answered, “Our suffering forces us to admit the existence of a void in our being which continuously pushes us to try to fill it,” he said before standing up in preparation to leave.

“For example, a bad relationship with one of the parents during childhood can alter our feelings and thoughts towards that parent. These negative impressions will be perpetuated over the years and thus each of our thoughts of that parent will be impregnated with that resentment. It’s almost a natural phenomenon. Nevertheless, a better option would be to consider the positive aspect of that relationship as well. We can’t change the painful experiences of our childhood, but if we become capable of looking at the relationship from another point of view, namely from a superior and positive one, then suffering will be greatly reduced.”

Although I could see that Cezar wanted to leave, I was burning with desire to find out other interesting aspects on this delicate matter. He explained to me that he actually wanted to give me time to rest before our departure the following day. I also looked at the time and saw that it was past midnight. I was so caught up in the discussion that I had almost forgotten that a crucial moment in my life was near. I asked Cezar to answer one more question and he accepted with a smile.

“But, if we know all these things or we have the slightest clue of them, why do we suffer so often?” I asked. “Sometimes this happens because of things that have no real importance.”

Supporting his hands on the back of the chair, Cezar answered in a very inspired way.

“Most of the times, suffering comes from the fact that we identify a small fragment of our lives with the whole. Too often do we identify ourselves with external aspects, especially with isolated troubles. Too often do we choose to occupy our minds with unpleasant memories which we tend to remember for a long time to the disadvantage of situations when we felt happy. This is not about ignoring suffering, but about trying to consider it in a larger context. It's like when a shoe feels uncomfortable. Of course, you seek to find out the reason for this; but at the same time, we have to consider the good aspects as well. For example, you mustn't necessarily throw away the shoe immediately."

"What if our suffering is very profound? I've met people who were almost on the brink of desperation and lack of faith," I insisted.

"When our suffering is so profound, we won't seek its origin, think of details or interpret the subtleties of the signs that appear. We have to act almost immediately to alleviate the pain and strong emotions it determines. If someone is delirious from a high temperature, will you ask them to draw a list of the different feverish states they feel before you act to help them? It's clear that you have to do something to decrease the temperature. It's the same when a person suffers greatly. First, we have to alleviate their suffering and encourage them. Such alleviation is a process through which we must act so that emotions cease to overwhelm us. During this stage, we must be receptive to any method which is efficient but alleviation should be the first step."

"Okay, but what happens afterwards?" I asked.

"Afterwards, we'll try to solve the problem because we can't alleviate suffering forever. If we don't do anything to solve the problem after we alleviated suffering, difficulties will definitely appear again. After we control the intense negative emotions and obtain a state of relative calmness, we have to start looking for the origin of that emotion, of the suffering itself. The solution can appear, for example, when we contemplate a detailed retrospective of that situation."

"Does this mean that suffering simply disappears once we find out its causes?"

"No, it's not enough to know only the causes of suffering in order to eliminate it," Cezar said in a serious voice. "But it can be reduced if we understand the process that caused it. Unfortunately, the different circumstances of life can reactivate an older problem, even if we understood it perfectly. We really eliminate suffering only if the problem doesn't occur for a long period of time. This method uses the deepest aspects of our being and, as I said, it's based upon a clear mind and judgment. Every method which can alleviate suffering is precious, but its effects are only temporary. This is why I insist that you understand that the techniques that help develop the quality of our minds are especially important as they contribute to the elimination of ignorance. Nevertheless, the essential problem is to know if suffering can be completely eliminated.

Success in this direction will only be obtained through a deep transformation of the respective person who, no matter the particular events that cause suffering, will break the original bond with suffering forever. I was telling you that, in order to accomplish this, you must first identify the causes of suffering and then find a remedy based upon a certain mental clarity."

"This means that if we achieve mental clarity, we break the original connection with suffering and it no longer occurs," I said, following the logical reasoning.

"No, that's not true," Cezar corrected me. "Clarity isn't enough to eliminate the origin of suffering. There are no techniques that completely eliminate it because understanding the primary cause that generated suffering isn't everything. Something else is also necessary. In order for you to understand this better, remember that suffering, no matter how intense it is, can never fully overwhelm us. It's true that it can profoundly affect us, but there is still a hidden 'space' where it can never reach, no matter how profound it is or seems to be. Even when a person suffers greatly and is being tortured by the intense pain generated by suffering, part of them still doesn't suffer but actually knows both the cause and the solution to the problem. This is a fundamental aspect in understanding the essence of evolution because successfully overcoming a great suffering means making an important step on the ladder of personal evolution. The closer we get to this hidden place in our hearts, the less we'll feel suffering because we'll no longer identify ourselves with it. Suffering doesn't disappear, but the peace and quiet specific to this place, which is the origin of life, will fundamentally comfort us. If we seek to connect to this peace and if we profoundly identify ourselves with it, we'll suddenly feel relaxed and quiet, even if pain persists.”

“In this respect, I still feel something is unclear,” I said. “If suffering diminishes, isn’t it normal for the pain to diminish as well?” Cezar shook his head.

“Pain and suffering are indeed connected but not in the way you think they are. For some people, a small pain is accompanied by great suffering while others suffer less in spite of a great pain. The explanation is that while some people intuitively find the hidden focal place that I told you exists in every one of us and can’t be touched by suffering, others are still far from it and continue to go yet further away. As they are not aware of the existence of this real and very subtle place within themselves, the suffering they feel is amplified. It is like a voice that always tells us to seek the lost conscience that we once had. This voice can be assimilated to what people generally call ‘the voice of the heart.’ And you’ve realized that I’m actually talking about the divine Self that exists in each of us. This is actually the sacred place where suffering can’t reach us.”

Cezar finished speaking and looked at the clock again before telling me that we needed to rest before departure. I thanked him with all my heart for his valuable explanations and advice and we agreed that I was to be ready for departure at six o’clock in the morning. Thinking that I had clarified many aspects that I had not been able to understand previously, I went to sleep happy and at peace. It was like a psychological setting given the fact that in the next period of my life I would be confronted with, as I was led to understand, special surprises and events. I understood very well that Alpha Base was a very important knot for the secret operations and plans of the state; but, even if I did not know any of them, I felt very well-integrated and protected because I knew that the goals were purely beneficial. I fell asleep quickly, thinking of Machandi...

The Departure

When I came down to the training room in the morning, I was told to go to the heliport outside where I saw a large helicopter. Next to it there were three young men talking. Next to them, there were a few special army boxes and other bags, objects and equipment which I could not identify.

I understood that I was looking at the equipment prepared for our expedition. After an exchange of polite and kind greetings, I realized that two of the men were American and the third one was Romanian. A simple calculation showed me that, if no changes came up, our expedition would be a party of five that included myself and Cezar, the leader of the expedition. One of the two foreigners was an officer in the U.S. Navy, a lieutenant to be more precise. The other one was a civilian who introduced himself as Aiden and, to be honest, I felt a bit puzzled by his presence. He was of medium height, his hair was light brown with blond nuances, and he looked disorderly with a restless look. What struck me most about him was that he was quite thin and always agitated. I did not understand his role in the expedition, but I suspected Cezar would explain it to me later. The third person was Lieutenant Nicoară, an officer working for Department Zero who, as I later understood, was one of the most important members of that secret service. The other American introduced himself as Trujo. Just like Lieutenant Nicoară, he was part of the commando team from the first expedition sent through the tunnel two years ago. He was of Mexican origin and, because I speak Spanish very well, I talked to him a bit in his native language. This was a nice surprise for him and the atmosphere immediately became very friendly.

In the meantime, the pilot of the helicopter had come from the same direction where Cezar was, carrying sheets of paper which he was carefully reading as he also wrote something down. He got into the helicopter and we soon heard the first movements of the rotor which signaled that we were about to take off. I saw four soldiers arriving. They loaded the equipment in the large helicopter and we got into place behind the pilot in order to avoid the strong air current that was already starting to amplify. The noise had become quite loud and we could only hear each other if we screamed. This is why we preferred to wait for Cezar's return in silence.

After almost two minutes, we saw him quickly exiting the building where his office was as he headed towards the helicopter. Tall and well built, he inspired an extraordinary feeling of safety and self-countenance. I felt a wave of affection flooding my soul which I directed towards him with gratitude. I was aware that destiny had connected me with secret threads to this man and I was determined to follow him anywhere he would suggest. My last couple years of experience have shown me that he was one of the wisest men and his integrity, honesty and good intentions made everyone trust in him. All these qualities were doubled by an extraordinary subtle force which one could immediately feel when he was around.

I have often asked myself how it was possible for him to achieve by himself that level of spiritual evolution and understanding of the fine aspects of society. As far as I knew, I could guess that this was mainly due to special merits he had in other lives and this is why now it was quite easy for him to evolve rapidly. As he once confessed to me, however, the key to his success was the special perseverance in the practices he imposed upon himself where he refused to let himself be discouraged by his lack of success.

When he did feel such thoughts appearing, he told me that he would never surrender to them and that he would fight harder to strengthen his will, his concentration and his aspiration to succeed. The most important aspect he underlined was that he has always focused all of his inner force towards God and has never ceased to relate to what was pure, fine and evolved in his being. His words have remained in my memory as if imprinted in letters of fire that are very important: “Don’t ever forget that every one of us hides the height and mysterious depth of eternity which will be revealed to you as soon as you have a correct vision of everything around you. This idea has always guided me with success and without fear of error. And I can tell you more than that: this is the only thing that can truly make you happy.”

I remember that, in my ignorance, I asked Cezar if that was not just a quality of chosen special beings. With patience, Cezar explained to me that I was wrong and that this idea limited man’s access to the eternal happiness we all long for.

“Every person exists, among other things, to perform a specific function. Most of the times, this function isn’t understood and men lose themselves in society, forgetting the main reason they are alive. We can only know God, who is unique, if we are also from a single unique reality. For this, we all have to become one with ourselves, to melt in our hearts with our selves. Everything else that happens in this world is secondary.”

I must confess that, at the time, I didn’t understand the meaning of his words very well; but I could guess that there was a deep truth behind them which one could not reach by using common ways of perception or analysis. But now, my spiritual horizon was considerably larger and I was able to realize, at least in theory, that this was the only correct direction Mankind should follow in order to achieve balanced lives and true happiness, all of which comes from within.

As I deeply concentrated on these memories and personal reflections, I realized that Cezar had come next to the helicopter and signaled the pilot to take off. He sat next to me and handed me a pair of special sound-proof headphones which he told me to put on. He also put on a pair of headphones and I could immediately hear his voice which was very clear of the background noise caused by the helicopter. The headphones were made especially for this purpose and included an internal radio-amplifier with a small antenna. Cezar explained to me that this was part of the equipment brought by the Americans based on the partnership started two years ago with the Romanian government. Now, I could simply speak into the small microphone which was tied to my neck and I could use the flight time to find out from Cezar some details about our expedition.

According to the strict protocol, I had not been told anything so far. I first found out that Aiden was an expert genius with computers and especially with regard to decrypting. He was a permanent employee of the Pentagon and his life would progress only between the walls of different secret bases around the world where required by the military and economic interests of the USA. I was astonished that this person could resist such rhythms and conditions of life, but looking at him closer, I realized that he seemed to live in a different universe which only he knew.

“The Pentagon sent him on this mission because we need some special measurements and very complicated computer analysis,” Cezar explained to us. “We were told he was the best to accomplish this. The other two are here to ensure that we travel in the best conditions and to help with unforeseen situations.”

“What is my purpose here?” I asked with a certain legitimacy and, at the same time, a definite amount of amazement.

“Officially, the expedition chart states that you are a consultant on esoteric matters and this is not far from the truth given your role in contacting Dr. Xien. In reality, I took advantage of the situation which was especially created in order to request your presence on this team. I know this will greatly help you with your writing; and trust me, you'll be greatly impressed. After a couple of 'governmental' hesitations, I finally got the approval from my superiors. As I've already told you, things are more complicated, but I won't go into detail now.

Precious Memories

For a while, we flew without speaking. Travelling fast and at a relatively low altitude, I was looking at the landscape which featured hills and mountains. We did not pass over any city and that made me happy because I felt that we were closer to nature and to our destination. I could see houses scattered over the hills, large agricultural areas and forests that were already starting to be part of the landscape. I wondered what these places looked like thousands of years ago and who lived there so long ago. What were these people preoccupied with and how did they live their lives? In the fragments of holographic projections I had seen in the huge chamber inside of the mountain, I had the chance to find out that our mountains were the main location where the ancient population of this territory lived. It was practically the space where they organized their activity. The fields were almost uninhabited. As far as I could tell, what I had seen was the presentation of a reality of almost 8-9,000 years ago.

In those unique moments I lived through in the Projection Chamber and had the opportunity to look at the amazing succession of holographic images, I was shocked by many aspects and truths that have up to now been willingly hidden by scientists throughout history without letting the masses know them. I was not allowed to reveal most of these aspects. The final part of the presentation included more details on the territory of our country from the past 10,000 years, according to an approximate estimation. Because I was allowed to write about some of those images, I want to do so now before I go on with the events that followed and which were completely puzzling.

What surprised me about the holographic images was the small number of inhabitants. Practically speaking, there were no collective living areas and no towns or citadels. People lived almost exclusively on the mountains and, as far as I could tell, the only natural products they enjoyed were obtained from sheep and bees. Sheep were larger than the ones we know now, but people were taller as well. I estimated their average height at about two meters in the case of men and a bit less in the case of women.

Apart from agriculture and sheep herding, nothing they did was similar to our current lives. They were silent almost all of the time and lonely, preferring to remain with their eyes closed in a profound meditation. In one of the images, I saw a man stopping while he got water from the river with a bucket. He remained on his knees with his eyes closed, and even though the bucket had been taken to the water and brought a few meters down the river towards the shore, the man did not move from his position.

Contemplation, especially an inner one, seemed to be their only interest. Women prepared the sheep milk brought to them. They did not cook because they ate only dairy and apiculture products. Sometimes I saw that they did something that nowadays could be seen as a correspondent of sawing.

Actually, women used a very simple wooden device to weave some sort of a long white shirt made of sheep wool but very soft and not very thick.

They all wore the same garments. The shirt was a bit over the knees and open at the chest. At the waist, they wore a girdle which was also made of wool.

As far as I could tell, their houses were made of one room with a very tall roof-like a pyramid. The only material they used was wood. The entrance to the house was done directly from outside and through a tall opening shaped as a semi-circle. There were no doors or windows. I did not see any dogs, pets or wild animals. Their lives were extremely simple and peaceful; austere, I would say, but I could nevertheless see that they were well above our current condition. Their movements were very noble, their actions very precise and never in a rush. They gestured rarely, even during their daily work, but they were very efficient. They were never in a hurry, leaving the impression that they had all the time in the world and I must admit that I also had this sensation because, in spite of their apparent slow motion, they still managed to do everything they set out to do. I noticed that they always, with no exceptions, finished what they started.

Time seemed to pass more slowly and days seemed longer, even for the summary projection I was looking at. Often, during the day and in the middle of the activities they performed, men would suddenly sit on the ground and close their eyes, remaining in a state of deep contemplation for hours. Afterwards, they would immediately continue their activity from exactly where they had stopped. I did not notice any special habits or rituals; but in the evening, women would climb the top of the mountain and, facing the setting sun, they would raise their hands obliquely next to their ears in a gesture of giving that was at the same time acceptance of what life was offering them. This was the only manifestation of gestures that I could equate in any way to a prayer, an invocation or an unconditional abandonment to Divinity. I am saying so because I did not notice any representation of a deity, an altar, or any symbol of religious practice. It seems that they related to the universal source directly and simply with no intermediation. Their lives were entirely spiritual and dedicated to continuous meditation whether they were working or relaxing.

In the evening, the couple reunited because, during the day, the man was away in the mountains with the sheep. With concentration, he walked slowly before the herd which followed him without straying away. When he reached a proper place, the man would remain standing for a while with his eyes closed, slowly rotating at certain intervals of time in the direction of the four cardinal points. I estimated that this could last, in our current view of time, between one and two hours. He would then sit on the grass and remain there without moving for hours, his eyes remaining closed. Nothing could disturb him, not even the sun, the wind or the rain.

At a certain moment, I saw a close image of a shepherd meditating, but his eyes were not closed. I had "come" so close to him that I could almost reach out my hand and touch his face. I could not explain why, but that image has impressed me to tears. First of all, I could say that I did not understand some of his physical features. His skin was fairer than that of our race and had a certain glow that could be perceived through subtle senses. All men wore a beard and the beard, as well as their hair, was blond to the point where it was almost white. I was mostly impressed, however, by that man's face or rather what it expressed. His nose was quite straight and relatively wide while his mouth had admirably well-proportioned lips with a strong chin that expressed a complex personality. The cheeks rose slightly towards the outside and his forehead was high with no wrinkles. His hair was straight and long to the shoulders, covering part of the woolen shirt he was wearing. Blue like the sky, his eyes seemed to be deep in eternity although he was looking at the mountains before him. While his eyes seemed completely torn from the physical reality they were looking at, his entire subtle being seemed to have remained in an ancestral reality far beyond our understanding. That look on his face radiated such detachment and sovereign peace that I suddenly burst into tears.

The holographic images then continued by presenting the activity of one day. The shepherd would usually conclude his meditation in the evening whereupon he would stand up and go home slowly. The sheep immediately followed him in order and without him having to worry about them. When they saw each other again, the man and the woman would hug and stay this way for a while without moving. They would then eat, always outside, and go inside the house when the night set in.

Starting from here, I saw what I believe to be the main reason that I was forbidden to describe these elements until now. This has also shattered my entire being and has shown me that, unfortunately, Mankind has undergone an involution up to this day and not an evolution as modern science claims.

Immediately after the couple went inside the house, the entire room was lit as if by charm and apparently without any material source of light. The light seemed unearthly. It was yellowish-white in color but did not hurt the eyes. Its exceptional quality was that it made everything inside seem very clear. By this, I mean that it was amazingly pure and at the same time seemed to be part of the couple's lives. The holographic image then came closer and up to the opening in the wooden wall before stopping at the threshold. From there, I could perfectly see inside the room which I believe was about three meters wide and four meters long. In the room, there was only a sort of improvised bed that rose approximately half a meter above the floor. The floor was made of round wood trunks placed next to each other, but they were peeled.

I could not believe my eyes when I saw that, after the man and the woman went to bed and faced upwards, the intensity of the light decreased up to semi-darkness and to a wonderful blue color. There was no doubt that this phenomenon was caused by the subtle will of the two, naturally and effortlessly. If they were able to determine such effects by means of their sheer will, I was wondering what other amazing things they could do if they wanted to. And yet, as far as I could tell, they lived in the utmost simplicity and humility towards Nature and what it offered them without resorting to the undoubtedly huge powers they had. This assumption is based upon the last set of holographic projections concerning those times and the territory of our country. In my opinion, it is highly probable that the events I saw had taken place somewhere in the Western Carpathians (Apuseni Mountains).

The image suddenly changed in order to show me what I believe was a spiritual reunion of a community that lived in the region. When I say “community” of those times, I mean that it was scattered over at least 3-4 mountain valleys. The houses were very rare and the inhabitants very few.

Practically speaking, there were no villages, not to mention towns. It was odd, but I did not see any children or old men. The average age was between 35 and 45 for both men and for women. The place shown by the holographic image was on a wide mountain top which allowed the view of a landscape, on both sides of the mountain, of an almost unreal beauty.

I counted nine persons: five men and four women who were sitting in a perfect circle. They were all in a deep state of meditation and I could not see any other object or ritual artifice. At a certain moment, with no prior warning, they all stood up at the same time and clasped each other by the hands. A few seconds afterwards, I could not believe my eyes. In the middle of the circle they formed, a column of white light suddenly appeared and it shone so brightly that I instinctively placed my hand over my eyes to be able to see what was happening. The column reached high into the sky, but in the mountain area where the nine men and women stood, it gave an intense feeling of sacredness that even I was able to feel through a kind of empathy and spontaneous transmission of the subtle energy load that manifested itself back then in times lost long ago.

I do not know the purpose of that meeting and manifestation, but it is certain that it lasted for quite a long time because, at a certain moment, I saw the same circle of persons sitting without moving later that evening.

The gathering was truly unique and had a transcendental beauty. The entire mountain was grandiosely lit by that column of light and it shone even farther onto the valleys and tops of the other mountains nearby. I cannot really describe the grandeur of the image as it completely overwhelmed me. Then, the intensity of the column of light started to decrease until it faded. Before that happened, the mountain top on which the nine persons were sitting was lit in about the same way in which the light had appeared in the house after that couple had entered the room. The nine let go of their hands and remained in the same position for a while before starting to move or talk to each other. This lasted only for a maximum of two minutes and then something happened that shocked me. One by one, the nine persons suddenly disappeared from sight at an interval of only a few seconds. After the last one dematerialized, the mountain remained in darkness.

This part of the “film” I saw in the Projection Chamber deeply impressed me, and I think the strong emotion I felt was especially due to the fact that I could easily consider those beings as our ancient ancestors. The holographic projection was very precise. It first defined the area through a view of the general Carpathians-Danube space and then slowly focused on the area at the Southern end of the Apuseni Mountains with images of other areas of the country. I wanted to describe all of these images first because I was allowed to and secondly because they refer exclusively to the territory of our country from long ago. Of course, the final aspects I described seem amazingly unnatural, but they do represent a reality I saw and even empathically felt with high intensity. I am convinced that those who will have the chance to access information concerning those times from Mankind’s past other than through technology can certify what I have said.

A New “Visit”

After less than one hour of flight, I recognized from far away the first mountains which reminded me of the secret location in the Bucegi Mountains. We landed safely, approximately fifty meters away from the entrance to the mountain. I could already see radical changes compared to the situation I witnessed two years ago. Getting out of the helicopter, I carefully looked around. First of all, the double line of protection of armed soldiers was gone. All that was left was the road that allowed supplies to be brought to the military base. Secondly, instead of the storage space outside, a heliport was set up and that was where we landed. The semi-spherical modular constructions were also gone and the entrance to the great hangar next to the gallery had been finished and sealed air-tight.

Cezar explained to me that the hangar was used as storage space and that the lab inside of it had been removed. Now, all evidence which required further study is sent to a specialized institute in Bucharest which operates under cover and has the last-generation equipment that is paid for by the U.S. Army. After a first analysis, the most important pieces of evidence and results are transferred to the U.S. for detailed research.

Generally speaking, the secret location in the Bucegi Mountains had been “simplified,” meaning that it was contoured so that it tended to blend in with the surrounding vegetation. Cezar informed me that this was only in appearance. In reality, many redundant and very sophisticated alarm and protection systems had been set up. I did not ask for further explanations nor did Cezar offer to provide me with any.

We were met by an American officer who greeted Cezar. I realized that he was leading the operations on site and was the most important military representative of our American allies. Except for Cezar, we were all checked by four team members in accordance with a data sheet that the American colonel had brought. A patrol of three Romanian soldiers and three American soldiers surrounded us and led us to the hangar on the left while the Colonel and Cezar stayed outside to talk. Seeing that place again, the memory of the couple of hours I spent there two years ago made my heart beat quickly.

We got close to the huge hangar door which was intelligently camouflaged behind the mountain wall. Since I visited that place, giant walls had been installed both at the hangar entrance and at the mountain tunnel entrance.

They were air-tight and I realized that they move by sliding when necessary. We all entered through a secondary entrance on the right that was the size of a regular door. The hangar was huge and well lit.

On the left side, gigantic boxes and military logistics were stored; and on the right side, I saw two TABs (armored personnel carriers) parked and facing the exit. On the right side, several electric vehicles were aligned for quicker movement through the Grand Gallery and the Projection Chamber.

Beyond them, I saw a huge tarpaulin which I believe also covered vehicles, but these seemed much larger than the electric ones. A few meters away from the entrance on the right side, there were the same three long constructions I saw two years ago in which the research labs had been improvised. I was given the explanation that they had been adapted to be rest and recreational facilities for the personnel that stayed on the premises for longer periods of time. These were mainly Americans. The Romanian guards were exchanged daily by means of a military truck that only came up to a certain distance from the base.

Through a top level military agreement, Cezar had been appointed to be in charge of the operations related to the Projection Chamber and the underground tunnels. The head of security and administration of the complex was the American colonel whom I saw upon our arrival and whose name I do not know.

The four of us entered the first construction which had compartments like a train car with five rooms on the right side and a long hallway with lockers.

We were shown the first four lockers and I was amazed to see that each of them had a label with a name on it. My locker was the third one. I found special equipment inside of it, made entirely in the USA, which I was supposed to wear for the expedition. I also found a special bag that looked like a backpack, but it was held on the back with a wide belt that was placed diagonally over the chest. It was ergonomically designed and made from a material that looked like vinyl which folded according to the position of the back and the spine. Inside of the bag were many products which had been very well arranged in different compartments. These included concentrated food and a complex first-aid kit. The costume looked like that of a diver but was more modern and made of a material which looked like neoprene but was thinner and less worn.

The shoes given to us were truly revolutionary. They looked like moccasins with thick soles that were also high to the ankles with protuberances on the outsides of the sole. The sides of the footwear had a special and complex construction which allowed for the continuous analysis of some essential physiological parameters. I was given the explanation that this evaluation was performed by two powerful chips installed inside of the sole of each foot and the information was transmitted through special sensors.

Depending upon the results of the analysis, the parameters were continuously set in a feedback loop through the automatic action of some fine protuberances in the sole which then created the right pressure in certain areas of the foot. Thus, the physical and psychical resistance of the human body to high requirements was greatly increased.

Shyly, I put on the shoes meant for me and was stunned to see that the moccasins simply took the shape of my feet. They did not feel uncomfortable at all. Lieutenant Nicoară explained to me that the material used to make those shoes was “intelligent.” During the last expedition he was a part of, the shoes didn’t have this characteristic; but in the meantime, he found out that the Americans had designed this new type of revolutionary boot which he was now also trying on at the same time as me.

When we were ready with the equipment, we all went outside. There was nobody left next to the heliport; but after a while, I saw Cezar coming out of the tunnel towards us. He said that everything was arranged and we would leave in a couple of minutes. Then, he went inside of the hangar but to the second part of the inner structure. Soon, he also came out equipped. In full formation, we went to the entrance to the great tunnel. The gigantic door had slid about a meter and a half to the right so as to leave enough space for us to get in. Cezar went in first and received a set of papers from an American officer, probably the Colonel’s assistant, which he started signing.

In the meantime, we waited by the entrance and I had some time to observe in detail the changes that had taken place in the two years that had passed since my last visit there. Apart from closing the tunnel with a camouflaged sliding door, the inside was equipped with a much better lighting system which allowed observation of every detail. Thus, what immediately drew my attention was the fact that the first part, comprising approximately ten meters which took a left turn and was practically drilled into the mountain stone, was perfectly covered in a special absorbent material doubled by a very thin foil of silver metal. I later found out that it was titanium and that the isolation of the walls had been done with a modern American technology which they also use for space vehicles.

The entire ensemble looked clean, lit and welcoming. The thick rubber carpet had been extended to the entire floor of the tunnel. On the walls, a system of red signaling buoys was installed which I was told would consecutively light when a serious problem or a violation of the security system occurred or when an expedition was sent through one of the three tunnels from the Projection Chamber. At the tunnel entrance and placed straight on the black rubber carpet after the metal door, there were four American electric vehicles, each with two seats. They were the same model I saw two years ago and were used for fast movement through the gallery.

After signing those papers, Cezar was greeted by the American officer who withdrew into the small kiosk on the right of the entrance where another Romanian soldier stood. We then headed towards the electrical vehicles and got into three of them. The two Americans were together in one, Cezar and myself were in another and Lieutenant Nicoară was alone in the third vehicle. I was impressed by the modern design of those very practical vehicles. They had no hood and had an elliptical shape. The front half was the “cab” with two seats and the rear could be used to load different materials. While we were dressing in the hangar and discussing our departure, Cezar told me that a team of soldiers had already carried the logistical items from the helicopter to the Projection Chamber and placed them in the vehicles.

When we got directly inside of this doorless vehicle, the dashboard was immediately lit by a wonderful blue light. All controls were reset and the indicators showed different starting measures. These cars were ideal for efficient use in such locations. The high performance simultaneous four-wheel turning system was such that these cars could practically turn without changing their position. This is why they could squeeze into very small or economic spaces. Once he got on the wheel, Cezar only pushed one button on the dashboard and we then started slowly and were immediately followed by the two other vehicles. I noticed that these cars were very silent even though they ran almost twenty miles an hour.

We took a left turn and went straight to the entrance to the Grand Gallery. The huge stone gate was slid open on the left; but before it, there was the complicated laser security system. Cezar stopped the vehicle, got out and fulfilled the same formalities of signing papers. We were once again carefully verified according to certain data on a sheet by the American officer serving there who was also accompanied by a Romanian officer.

The security system was the same. I saw Cezar standing in front of the retinal scanner where he deactivated the alarm system after he reset it to half a minute in order to give us time to pass through the gate. He then returned to the vehicle and we all went through the Grand Gallery.

Aware that I experienced my return to this special place with great emotion, Cezar drove at a low speed in order to give me time to get used to everything. Indeed, I deeply felt that unmistakable tremor of unknown mystery which had fascinated me two years ago. I was looking at the high ceiling of the gallery and its perfect walls which shone into those superb nuances which I couldn't define. The perfect silence was disturbed only by the discreet noise made by the vehicles we rode in. Nobody spoke. I turned for a second to the vehicle behind us and saw Aiden looking astonished at the immense gallery. Now that I was going on the same road and not on foot, I noticed that the effect was different. The vehicle's speed was higher than that of walking and this was enough to create a hypnotic sensation due to the game of water-like nuances of the texture which the walls were covered in. It was a very pleasant and comforting sensation which made me dreamy and I am sure that it could have made me fall asleep eventually.

Actually, I think this is why Cezar chose to drive slowly. His experience had probably shown him that the hypnotic effect was thus diminished.

"There was a case when an American officer who was driving quite fast fell asleep almost immediately while driving," Cezar explained to me with a faint smile. "Luckily, I was on his right and I could immediately take over and turn the wheel of the vehicle, but that was an important experience which explained another mystery to us of the advanced technology that the builders of this underground complex had at their disposal. Of course, we've only understood the effect, not the cause," he laughed in a good mood.

We arrived in front of the energy shield of the Projection Chamber which made a wonderful blue light. Cezar stopped the vehicle in front of it to leave room for the other vehicles and to be able to unload the equipment. I remained for a few moments in a state of deep emotion and thought. I cannot describe in words the sensation of greatness and, at the same time, mystery that impregnated the whole place. Because I had been there before and I knew what was inside of the chamber, I experienced that special emotion with an even greater intensity. A kind of subtle link hand been created with the members of the ancient civilization that built this underground complex and I mysteriously felt closer to them. It was like an unconscious flow that carried me almost unwillingly to those ancestral times and to questions without answers. Who were they and what did they look like? What was the purpose of this construction? How did they build everything from a technological point of view and what hidden message did they want to leave us?

I was certain that a specific psychic print existed in that place, a kind of crossover to another understanding of reality. The grandeur and subtlety of that extraordinary construction inside the mountain almost unwillingly directed me to keep quiet, walk slowly and reflect upon special dimensions of the soul. I knew these sensations from my previous visit, but now I felt them with greater intensity and inner strength. I still, however, had to come down to earth because we all had now entered through the energy wall into the gigantic Projection Chamber. When I got inside of the Chamber, a delicate joy flooded my soul and I had the feeling that I had come back home. At the same time, I felt a deep gratitude which almost felt like piousness. In the perfect quiet of that place lost in time, I felt I was in a huge cathedral. I almost didn't hear my steps on the ground because their sound faded in the absorbent material.

I looked at the T tables, the podium with the transparent cylinder in the middle of the room and I saw in the distance the huge openings of the three tunnels, all lit by a pale green light. I felt a certain emotion thinking that I was about to enter one of those tunnels and go into the unknown; but I recovered my courage fast, thinking that Cezar had already gone through the tunnel with the previous expedition so we already had some basic information.

Everything was exactly as I knew it from two years ago. The only change was that signaling buoys were installed by the team of American engineers and an additional security system, based upon lasers, was installed at the entrance of each tunnel. It was surprising that there was a certain agitation in the room. There was no noise but movement. I counted approximately eight soldiers moving quickly and precisely in front of the three tunnels and especially in front of the tunnel on the left. They seemed to know very well what they were supposed to do. As soon as they returned, the process continued with the others. One of the soldiers was standing next to the command console of the first tunnel. In front of him, a not too large hologram was projected. It changed its contents from time to time, but I could not see what it showed because of the distance.

I sat on one of the steps of the podium in the middle of the Projection Chamber and Cezar headed for the tunnel accompanied by the two lieutenants. After a few moments, Aiden sat next to me. He took out his computer from a special box and looked around at the huge room as if he was lost. I told him that even though I had visited this place once before, I was at least as impressed as he was. Then I asked him what kind of laptop he had. He explained to me that he never parted with his computer which was actually unique and had been designed according to his precise instructions. The special design of the computer was entrusted by the Pentagon to a famous American research company and was based upon a technology which was at least twenty years more advanced than anything we currently know.

I looked at Aiden more carefully. I do not think that he was more than thirty years old, but it seems that he is one of the most brilliant geniuses on the planet. He removed the device from a box which had been adapted to its shape. I had never seen anything similar before. The lid did not open in the manner of a normal laptop but slid in front through a simple push whereupon its surface was discreetly lit in many colors. What I found really amazing was the 3D projection of the menu as well as all of the operations it performed. I saw that Aiden “touched” the holographic projections at certain points with his fingers and the result appeared almost immediately. His dexterity was amazing. More than once I saw him simply moving his hand in the direction of an area in 3D relief and the effect had already appeared. I was very amazed and asked him how that was possible.

“I’m not really sure. I haven’t done anything else in my life so far,” he confessed while continuing to work on that fabulous computer. “This is my world, the only one in which I feel somehow safe. I have a special connection with it and even feel the processes in the circuits to the point where I ‘communicate’ with the flows of electrons by telepathy. And they eventually follow me as if they know my intentions. I ‘see’ connections, obstacles, and encryptions. I see everything at once, and I know where to act and how to solve any problem, but sometimes even these functions have ‘problems’ which are similar to ‘moods.’ That’s how I see and feel them.”

I was looking at him as if he were from another world. I thought I had seen many things, but I certainly was surprised. He explained to me that the technology offered a huge data storage capacity based upon a crystal connection. The calculation ability was also huge, but what was most important was the fact that the computer had a strange access to a superior dimension of reality beyond the physical one. I must confess that I did not understand it very well; but as far as Aiden said, the scientific principle that made this possible was a complex combination between a new type of mathematical tensors and Hilbert spaces to which an aspect of constructive conception was added which he could not share with me because it was top secret. Due to these amazing characteristics, that computer could successfully be used to solve the most difficult situations and it actually even made 3D predictions.

“This is the compact version which is used for such situations, but there is also the desktop version which is much more powerful. It is at the Pentagon headquarters and one of the secret bases,” Aiden whispered to me.

He had just started to explain to me one of his new ideas concerning an important technological progress based to a higher extent on crystals when lieutenant Nicoară asked us to come to the tunnel entrance. The time had come when I would enter for the first time into an area that had been forbidden to me until then. I then headed with Aiden to the entrance of the tunnel on the left. As I came closer to the big golden square on which stood the dome with the holographic projections of images from Mankind’s past, I felt more and more nervous. I tried to compose myself and encouraged myself at the thought that I would be accompanied by Cezar throughout the expedition, and I knew that he had the necessary experience to solve even the most difficult situations. Even so, looking at the huge tunnel entrance which was discreetly lit inside by a pale green light, I felt my strength fading and my legs weakening. The person standing at the command console next to the tunnel was communicating some technical data to Cezar which had no real meaning for me. Cezar was standing at the entrance to the great underground cave and supervising the transportation of the last baggage. I soon realized that the American officer was speaking about the intensity of a space-time distortion field and this really made me think.

I then advanced to the tunnel entrance. It was the first time that I had access to come so far. The impression made by the huge tunnel in the mountain wall was extraordinary. I felt dizzy as if an enormous force was secretly coming from the tunnel. In order to reduce this first shock a bit, I looked back to the gigantic room but my attention was caught by a change in the holographic image in front of the console where the American officer stood. It showed an image inside the gallery and I immediately realized it was the tunnel through which we were about to travel. Inside the gallery, I saw a kind of semitransparent “curtain” which vibrated more and more quickly as it took the shape of a funnel with the top parallel to the direction of the tunnel. The “funnel” eventually stabilized, but its general aspect suggested a quick pulsation. Suddenly, the distortion disappeared and the prolongation of the tunnel appeared behind it.

“This was a big surprise even for us,” Cezar confirmed my astonishment. “Just imagine how amazed we were upon entering the tunnel for the first time when we saw that it suddenly got dark after fifteen meters. Even when it was well lit, the black ‘area’ gave us no information whatsoever. It was a sort of ‘code’ to go further in. We could not reach it however because of an energy barrier which was in front of us, not too far away. But we got the solution quickly by activating the commands on the console. The images showed us how to set the access parameters. The team of scientists then quickly understood that they were looking at a space-time distortion which was artificially generated. Of course, we all asked ourselves why this was necessary.

“Only after a while did we realize that those who built this complex inside the mountain were using a technique to travel through tunnels. It is still a mystery to us. Behind the distortion there is a geometric system of very pure quartz crystals that are embedded in the isolation of the tunnel. Come, I’ll show you!”

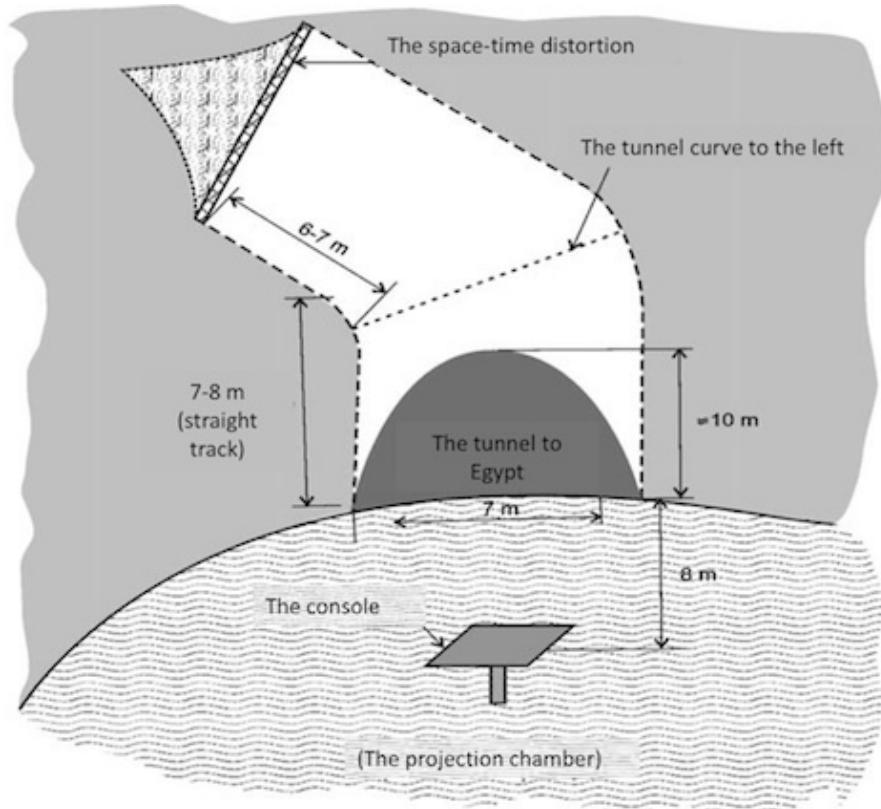

After he said so, Cezar started through the tunnel before me. I took a deep breath and also went inside. I looked carefully at the highly arched walls which were perfectly finished. I think the tunnel was about seven meters wide and about ten meters high. The material that covered the walls looked like the one from the Grand Gallery, but I noticed that it was shinier and it had a phosphorescent green color. If I looked at the material directly, I almost did not notice its details. It had a special shine and made the glance “slip” somehow. I hesitated but followed Cezar closely. The tunnel was straight for about seven or eight meters before taking a tight curve to the left. I then saw that it remained straight with no further deviations. The feeling I had was very troubling. The huge tunnel changed its color after about eight or nine meters from the curve and it became a phosphorescent violet. Then, farther in front, maybe a few hundred meters away, it took a slow curve downwards, going down underground until the curve range became too big and I could not follow the path any more. It all created such a sensation of unearthly mystery that nobody felt like talking any more.

The last of our baggage had been brought and arranged by a few soldiers in three vehicles that had a special shape which immediately drew my attention, but in that moment, Cezar started explaining as he showed me the sides of the tunnel.

“The space distortion intervenes in this place,” he said and showed me an imaginary line where I could see some rhombic geometric shapes that looked like ditches dug into the special material.

Those ditches contained special slots where several large crystals were embedded that were very pure but of different colors. I noticed that their arrangement on the sides of the tunnel and the geometric shapes they were embedded in were in a perfect symmetry. I think this arrangement was about five meters long and it was placed right at the transition area where the tunnel changed colors from pale green to phosphorescent violet. I went closer to the crystals and looked at them carefully. They were equal in size and were about half a meter high and only about ten centimeters wide. At the top, they had a tetrahedral shape and they were so pure that I could almost see through the ones which had a pale yellow color. I counted twelve crystals on each side and noticed that above them, at the half of each side wall of the tunnel, there was a ditch which was about five or six centimeters wide which was as long as the model formed by the crystals.

THE STRUCTURE OF THE ENTRANCE TO THE TUNNEL TO EGYPT

"There was definitely something here, maybe another device, but we have no proof of this and no information about it," Cezar continued his explanation. "It's obvious that it's a critical area and it was probably used for propulsion through the tunnel by those beings who built the complex."

Aiden, who had come near to us in the meantime, spoke.

"The configuration of the crystals suggests to me a special kind of atomic connection. I believe they used another kind of method of transportation than the classical one we're about to engage."

Cezar agreed.

"It's true. This is also the indirect result of the holographic projections we saw, but no image shows it clearly. I also can't understand why they choose to hide everything so much. Anyway, the space distortion was very important in this process, but they created the physical tunnel for us.”

“Yes, it’s a colossal technology,” Aiden argued while carefully studying the crystals. “I’m almost sure that they used some kind of beaming or at least parallel travelling. They might have thought this would be too difficult to explain through holographic projections or maybe our psycho-physiological structure is simply not yet adapted and fit for such methods of travelling.”

“And this is why they left us the physical projection of the tunnel,” I concluded.

Aiden was a bit skeptical.

“If it were so, then what is the purpose of the space distortion? It’s obvious that they have an extraordinary source of energy that is maybe here, underground. I think that when the distortion stabilizes, the physical dimension of the tunnel appears somehow ‘altered.’ We continue through the tunnel, but yet we are, in a way ‘aside matter.’ Normally, at the other end of the tunnel, there should be a ‘converter’ like this one,” he added in a lower voice.

“It’s true,” Cezar confirmed, smiling. “The team of scientists has already confirmed how strange the violet tunnel is, meaning that it has a physical form yet it doesn’t really pass through the ground. It is rather a ‘virtual’ replica which is perfectly fit to travel through. We don’t understand how this is possible even if we use the tunnel. There are still many enigmas that we can’t solve. For example, this situation only applies for this tunnel which leads to the Giza plateau near Cairo. The other two tunnels are actually dug into the ground all the way to their destinations.”

The Crystal Area from the Tunnel to Egypt

A Romanian officer then came to us and told Cezar that everything had been loaded into the vehicles. Cezar told us to get ready for departure while he would go back to the Projection Chamber to give the final orders.

Curious, I went near the three vehicles. They were larger than the electric ones we had travelled through the Grand Gallery in and they had another shape which was very aerodynamic. In comparison with the first ones, the latter were covered and baggage was placed at the back. They also functioned based on electric engines, but they had high performance engines. Aiden, who knew the technology based on which they were built, assured us of that. The three vehicles were parked in a row before the crystal area and they looked like race cars. The front was sharp and very low while the back side was lifted to carry baggage. I got the explanation that the shape of the vehicle was designed by the Americans immediately after the discovery of the underground complex in the Bucegi Mountains for the purpose of a perfect adjustment to travel conditions through the tunnel.

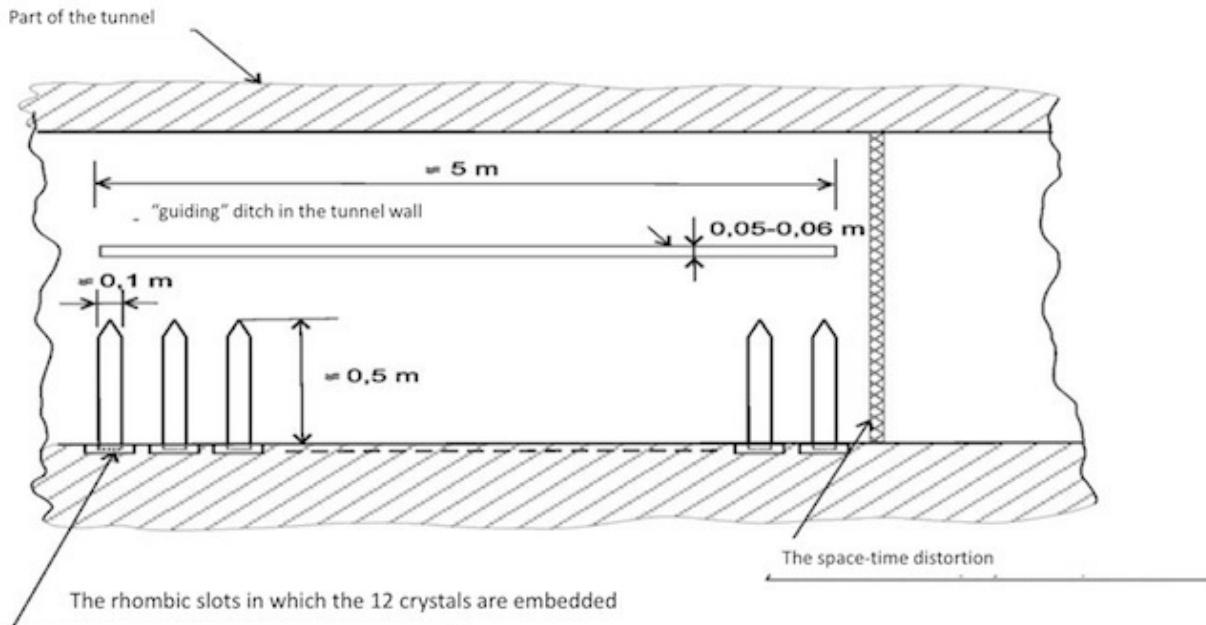

The electric vehicle was at the time a secret premiere of American military technology and was used for another purpose, but with certain adjustments made to it, it was considered to be the best means for silent and quick transportation through the underground tunnels starting from the underground location in the Bucegi Mountains. The body was made of carbon fiber, and on the front side, there was a wide slip with a box behind it which was integrated into the body.

“It’s the laser guidance system,” Lieutenant Trujo explained because he guessed my amazement. “Because the surface is very smooth and without protuberances, movement can be automatic to a high extent, allowing you to rest. The car is equipped with an autopilot and a very powerful onboard computer which makes calculations based upon the input it receives.”

On the upper side at the middle, two light projectors were installed. Even though the tunnel had its own light and the vehicle mainly ran on auto pilot, I was told that the experience of the expedition two years ago imposed the necessity to install those white light projectors.

In the meantime, Cezar had returned to us and understanding the subject of the discussion, he gave me some explanations.

“This is a very special tunnel. The violet light creates, in time, a state of mental doubling, something similar to the passing from awareness to sleep. The psychic relaxation is too high and one’s attention tends to be especially receptive to essential aspects of existence. I think you understand that we can’t afford the team to lose vigilance. I must admit there were some minor accidents, but it was clear that we had to change something.”

THE CRYSTALS AREA FROM THE TUNNEL TO EGYPT
(cross-sectional view)

After he said that, Cezar signaled our departure. The distribution of our team in the vehicles was the same. Cezar and I were in front, then Trujo and Aiden and finally Lieutenant Nicoără. We parted with the people in the Projection Chamber and the signal for our departure was sent to the mountain entrance of the gallery. Nervously, I got into the vehicle with Cezar. Inside, it looked almost like a modern airplane. There were many buttons, a few small displays and a central platform with a big screen which was complex through the structure of the data and charts it showed. There was no steering wheel. It was replaced by a control column, the same as that of airplanes but this one had some command buttons on it. The atmosphere inside was very pleasant. The displays had an orange-reddish color; and in some places, the messages were yellow. Actually, the inside looked more like a cockpit because the access to the vehicle was done by a lateral rising of the modular casing.

I sat comfortably in the ergonomic chair and was surprised by the generous space I had inside. From the outside, it looked much smaller. Looking ahead through the airtight window, I could see the mysterious tunnel opening and felt a cold chill. It was a unique moment in my life which would be the starting point of amazing events. I took a deep breath and nodded my head. Almost suddenly, the light inside became violet and the space in front got dark...

Chapter Three — U.S.A.P.

I felt a shiver down my spine and a relative fear. After all, it was natural for me to react this way because I was leaving for an unknown target which I expected to be full of surprises. After all, Cezar had already experienced such an expedition which I was told developed under difficult conditions.

Two years had passed since then and nobody knew what might have come up in the meantime. This long break was necessary in order to implement some important technological changes in the travel logistics, measurement equipment and controls. All of these changes were conceived according to the specific results of the first expedition.

Cezar did not describe that expedition in detail nor did he tell me what I was about to see at the other end of the tunnel and this was not comforting at all for me. I soon realized, however, that in such expeditions the element which can't be foreseen is a very important one and, from the point of view of probability, we could expect extraordinary events and discoveries.

Before our departure from the secret Alpha Base, I had signed a confidentiality agreement and an agreement whereby I undertook all risks.

I am not so sure if I would have signed them if I had not known Cezar.

One year ago, after returning from his expeditions through the three tunnels, he told me the main aspects concerning the discoveries they made, but he could not tell me some things because they were highly classified.

Even then, when I had been granted access through the protocol on highly classified secrets which I had signed, Cezar explained to me that he could not give certain details about the expeditions through the other two tunnels because I was not an officer in the Department and those were top military secrets. Moreover, an appendix to the contract I signed specified that my access was restricted to a certain category of secrets and only for the current mission. Cezar told me, however, it was very probable that I would also be part of the following expeditions because there were interests from high above in this respect.

Exceptional Technology

During those moments, I was more preoccupied with what I had felt and seen so far on this journey. Through a kind of strange reflection, the atmosphere in the spacious cabin we were in seemed “filled” with a violet color. It most surely was an effect generated by the light of the tunnel which had a calming and relaxing effect on the human mind.

“If you feel that this light bothers you, we can compensate it with the opacity limitators with which the vehicle is equipped,” said Cezar.

He had set the course on autopilot and was relaxing, lying back in the comfortable chair. I looked to the side in order to better appreciate our speed and realized we were driving quite fast. I looked at the indicator on the computer which showed both miles and kilometers per hour and saw that the speed was set to 125 km/h. I thought we were driving so fast that I felt a slight panic, but Cezar immediately reassured me.

“After our return from the expedition two years ago, there were a few months of intense feedback to and from the research and design labs working for the Pentagon. We gave them the data we recorded and told them what hadn’t gone well or had gone wrong and they came up with several solutions. We arrived at our final option quickly and this adjusted the faults and unpleasant effects we were confronted with during the first expedition. Among other things, this vehicle was redesigned and greatly improved from a technological point of view. They studied several options of movement under the conditions we described and reached the conclusion that, for the size of this tunnel, the optimum cruising speed is 125 km/h.

The car can reach a speed of more than 200 km/h. It’s designed so that the cruising speed should remain constant and this also applies if you are on the smooth ascending or descending slopes in the tunnel. Practically speaking, the vehicle is fully automatic.”

I had to admit that this was a technical jewel for which knowledge and materials used in the space industry had been thoroughly applied. I didn’t know much about these aspects, but I could surely say that regular people will not see such vehicles on the streets too soon. Cezar explained to me that nothing had been neglected and this included the following: the aerodynamic flow of air on the body, redundant laser guidance systems, control systems for the outer atmospheric parameters, cabin pressurization with oxygen reserves and even a sophisticated system that could artificially support life for a certain period of time in case of serious accidents. On this occasion, I found out that the safety systems in case of a crash were also very well designed. What was new was that, apart from the air bags inside, the sides of the car featured a set of ultra resistant “bags” that open automatically when the imminent impact sensors are activated. When I found out all this, I felt more confident and began to think that I might spend this period with Cezar in a relaxed frame of mind. I even thought I could use the time we would spend together in the electric vehicle for constructive purposes and this meant finding out answers to some questions and problems that were not very clear for me. Cezar immediately agreed.

“The trip will last almost two days and that includes the sleeping and eating breaks,” he said. “We have plenty of time.”

I was very happy and a very good mood flooded my heart and body. I was just getting ready to start the first topic of our discussion when the computer announced to us that we were about to reach “Stationary Point 1” in five minutes. I looked at Cezar inquiringly.

“There were more participants on the first expedition and the means of transportation were not so evolved,” he started explaining. “Furthermore, the autonomy of the vehicles lasted a maximum four hundred kilometers. Of course, they were special and very well equipped military vehicles, but they were charged with special rechargeable batteries. This is why we had to select a certain part of them which would only carry spare batteries. We set up some intermediary stations along the way where, upon our return, we left the spare batteries as well as food supplies. When we left the Projection Chamber, we made up a caravan of 17 vehicles out of which eight served only this purpose. They were behind us and made up the recharge stations and returned one by one to the Projection Chamber afterwards. In the end, only the main nine vehicles of the expedition remained.”

“Okay,” I said with amazement., “but are the stations charged now? Are there enough batteries there?”

“We no longer need them. This new type of vehicle is fueled with an atomic battery. Can you believe it?”

Cezar was smiling and waiting for my reaction. I was truly surprised. If the Americans had hidden such technology, what other surprises was I to expect?! In the meantime, I was thinking how misinformed and kept in the dark the rest of the population was, being led to believe that oil is still the main fuel solution. Cezar's voice then interrupted my thoughts.

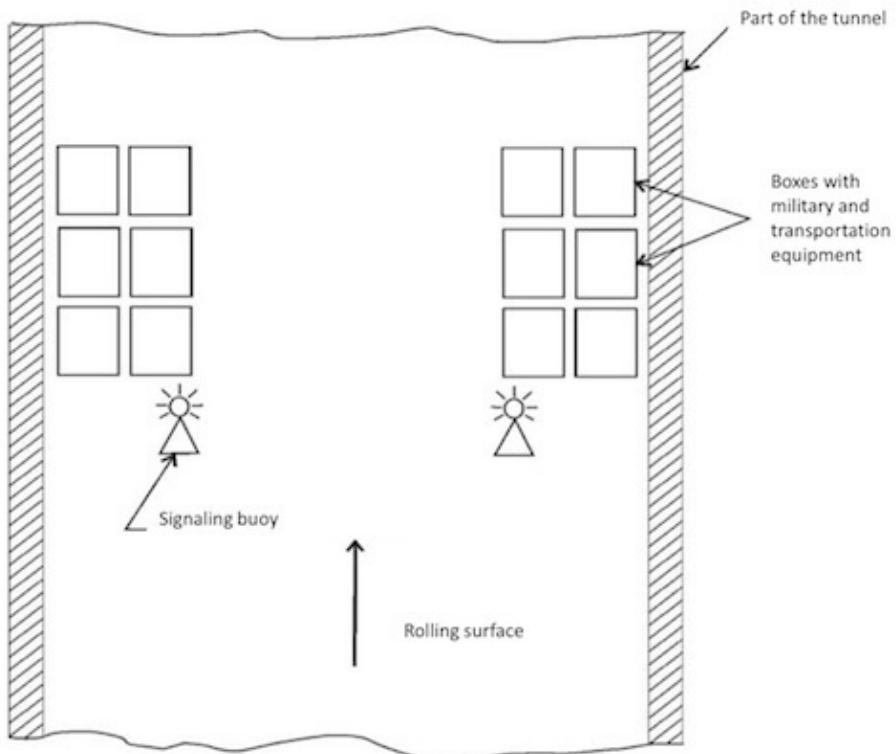

"And the process they use is that of cold atomic fusion!"

I was struck with amazement. I felt as if I was visiting another planet!

"I know," he continued. "It's sad to find out that the world is willingly kept in the dark. Many of those who are aware of Mankind's aggressive manipulation consider it a curse upon the planet, but they are mistaken. By thinking this way, they not only seriously limit themselves, but they can even cause the chain reaction of a negative idea which would only make us lose. It's like an ending or surrender. The destiny of this planet, however, is a different one and the transformations that will soon occur will clarify many things."

Cezar stopped explaining in order to switch to manual command. He explained to me that this was necessary for better safety in case of sudden maneuvers that might occur whenever we reached a "stationary point" for recharging. The boxes with food and other strictly necessary things had been deposited on both sides of the tunnel thus narrowing the access path a little. Even if the cruising speed was reduced at those points, extra caution was still necessary. I noticed that the boxes were symmetrically placed on both sides of the tunnel and that they were carefully arranged. Near them, I noticed two signaling buoys which signaled at intervals in an orange color.

I then remembered the space distortion and the fact that we were apparently traveling on a "virtual" path. I couldn't explain how it was possible for it to be recreated with the changes brought to it, namely the stationary points and the signaling buoys. As usual, Cezar immediately understood my thoughts.

"STATIONARY POINT" ALONG THE TUNNEL

"This is not the main issue. Naturally, if this physical tunnel we are passing through appears now and then disappears, it means that it has an inner "memory" and therefore "remembers" all the changes brought to it. I've already told you that we don't yet know which processes take place that make this strange manifestation of the tunnel possible, but researchers assume that it is connected in a particular way to the special material which covers it. A kind of subtle interaction surely takes place, but we don't understand it. It's an enigmatic phenomenon which is triggered by means of a very advanced technology. There are many things that we do not know here."

Mankind's Destiny

We passed the first stationary point and now the tunnel stretched again, completely free before us and radiating that mysterious indigo light. Cezar had turned on the automatic pilot again and it was back at cruising speed.

After he performed an audio and video check against the two vehicles behind us — which were one kilometer away from each other — Cezar once again laid back into a comfortable position in the ergonomic chair. I took advantage of this opportunity to clarify the subject we had already begun discussing.

“Were you talking about the catastrophic events mentioned in the Apocalypse?”

I deliberately directed the discussion towards those aspects that had been bothering me for a while. After returning from the first expedition, one year earlier, Cezar told me some things about the future of Mankind which I found utterly stunning. I still felt there was more to this, but he avoided telling me. Moreover, I was asked not to write or talk about what I had been told. I was therefore interested to find out more on this subject at the present time.

“At a worldwide level,” said Cezar, “it is possible that some catastrophes, even cataclysms, will take place which will generate a necessary transformation in Mankind’s perception and mentality. We can expect such realities and I believe you can guess that they are not going to favor those who are evil and perverted, especially since time itself seems to be contracting.”

“Of course, I’ve understood this and I’ve even read some observations on this subject,” I responded. “I understand that the phenomenon is tightly connected to the subjective nature of time. Apparently, I now have less time to perform the same activities under the same conditions as compared to a couple of years ago, but I couldn’t really explain why.”

Cezar nodded his head in approval.

“There are several causes which contribute to this very important phenomenon which shouldn’t be neglected. Amongst others, time acceleration is also related to this special period of the 2000s which has been considered to be an apocalyptic moment related to the end of an age by hundreds of million people for tens and even hundreds of years. But from a spiritual point of view, an apocalyptic manifestation should be regarded as a moment of profound transformation of human nature such as a passage from evil to good so that the planet becomes mainly beneficially oriented. Because now, as you can easily see for yourself, the major tendency is towards regression, amplification of evil and perversity. And if this situation has been perpetuated until now, the time of ‘drawing the line’ will also come and the huge negative accumulation in karma can lead to ‘compensations’ measuring up to the people who led to these accumulations. From this point of view, I can tell you that this can be confusing and even scary for many people. However, as you well know, this would only be a reinstatement of the initial balance, a purification which is absolutely necessary in the economy of the area of the universe that we’re located in.”

I felt a chill. Nobody likes to know they’re not safe as well as the fact that we all want to live as long as possible and enjoy a wonderful life. At times like these, however, everything seems to become unstable, uncertain, and go through transition, much of which results in failure. I already knew from Cezar that the best attitude to take in such situations is to be exactly the opposite of the black thoughts and feelings I felt. In other words, to be optimistic, active, think positive and act with energy. Now that he was with me, I felt that I could find enough resources to accomplish all this; but what will I do afterwards? I then reprimanded myself, realizing that I had once again taken the wrong attitude by being pessimistic. I was feeling more and more a clear need to find refuge in my thoughts to God, in trusting Him and abandoning myself to Him completely. Even if I did not yet fully grasp this apparently unsearchable secret of Creation, I was starting to understand with my inner intuition, according to Cezar’s explanations, that there is something beyond everything that exists, something I could completely rely on and that seemed to be the solution to all problems and doubts. It was just a distant breeze, but I felt such joy thinking about it! It was the only certainty which I knew would never be shattered.

With these invigorating thoughts in mind, I asked Cezar when he thought all this would start happening and if these events would be related to the return of Jesus. His answer made me smile because it was a sort of confirmation of my own thoughts.

“This is a problem that troubles most of the people. Of course, only God the Father knows about this moment in accordance with the sacred texts, more precisely the Bible. Based upon this, we can state that when God believes it is the right time, Jesus will come again, in glory.”

Actually, I knew from certain hints he had made a year ago that he knew very well how the events in the near future would develop. Probably out of a great modesty or because he was cautious not to confuse my mind, he preferred not to mention anything else about this.

Cezar paused and I felt that he was thinking about something in particular, carefully choosing his words.

“I’ll soon tell you about some extraordinary events which are directly connected to what we discovered at the other end of the tunnel. You’ll find them surprising, but also pleasing. You’ll want to experience them as well, but this will depend upon you to the highest degree. You just need to have a little patience.”

I was all ears. I asked my question quickly in order not to lose the connection with the previous subject and thus hoping to get more information.

“What do you mean by ‘coming in glory’ and how will we see Jesus then?” I asked.

“What you need to know is that the second coming of Jesus will be done through materialization in the physical world and therefore no birth will be necessary as was the case two thousand years ago. This time it will truly be a return in glory via materialization. And this coming will be done by means of a spiritual manifestation at the level of the entire planet, in divine glory. It will be the opposite of Jesus’s departure from this world.

“If the Holy Texts talk about the Ascension, the second coming of Jesus will be a new apparition in the sky, in glory and then His descent, after which he will stay for a while on our planet. Be certain that, no matter how unreal the unfaithful think this is, it will be an epochal moment for the entire planet. But the time of the second coming is a mystery and not even Jesus knows it and only God the Father will decide this. In a way, it’s like when we prepare to receive in our homes an extraordinary person whose presence we already know will create a strong emotion within us. This is why we need to be ready and purified with open souls and a sober mind so that we are capable of receiving the spiritual messages that the respective person will then transmit to us.”

“I also asked myself many times what would be the best way to meet the second coming of Jesus,” I said. “Apart from the fact that — if we’re still alive then — it will certainly be the greatest event of our existence, I think the real problem is how ready we will be for His return.”

“Indeed. This is the most important issue because it targets man’s capacity to accomplish a great spiritual leap in evolution. If Mankind continues to remain closed in their selfishness and if they are waiting to receive everything from God without making any effort and imagine that Jesus’s return will automatically trigger their salvation and turn them into gods, they are deeply wrong. Many think this way, but they have to realize that, as the proverb says, God helps those who help themselves.”

At this point, I interrupted with an observation.

“From what I have seen, most people complain that they can hardly face their daily problems and troubles. How can they understand the need to make a spiritual effort in such conditions?”

Cezar explained to me that people actually incorrectly identify their priorities in life and their efforts and energy are therefore also oriented in a wrong direction.

Life Problems and Mature Solutions

“In the case of some people, their evolution in life would stop if they had no problems to resolve. You have to understand that for those who don’t want to follow a spiritual path, problems or an existential crisis make them ask questions, mobilize, get out of the state of lethargy they are in and thus evolve. Either they want to evolve or they do not.”

“Okay, but this means that they always need to have unsolved problems in order to evolve?” I asked, puzzled.

Cezar smiled.

“No, of course not. Most of the times they think that the difficult situation they are confronted with is hopeless, but the state of despair or lack of hope is their greatest enemy. This is why you should always avoid surrendering to negative moods. Haven't you ever noticed that the attitude or state of mind you choose can even bring about the help you needed? If one has a confident, strong and even optimistic attitude, despite the apparent trouble falling upon oneself, help can be 'called upon' and the problem is solved.

Unfortunately, many don't find the necessary strength for this and they abandon the fight even before it begins."

I remained silent for a while, thinking about what he said.

"This might be difficult," I said. "How can I maintain this inner attitude?"

"Through the thoughts and moods you generate every moment. It's not that hard, provided that you are careful and persevering in this practice. You should never despair. It seems that all those who think that the problem they're confronted with has no solution do not really know a fundamental truth, namely that what they think is what they will experience in their lives.

When they believe they have no hope, they are the ones who remove any possibility to receive, through different means, the help they could receive if they had different thoughts. It seems almost unbelievable, but you should know that a proper attitude attracts the right energies which can then radically alter a difficult situation in life. If people have negative thoughts, however, they will not find the solution to their problems because they are the ones who block it."

"But maybe destiny creates a difficult situation in a person's life," I said.

"If he or she must endure through that problem, I think it would be very hard to change this."

"Before destiny or other aspects which oppose a harmonious life, it is people themselves who, most of the time, generate a negative state through their attitudes so that situations becomes serious. Of course, they could say that, apart from the fact that they have a problem, they also have to generate a constructive attitude. But, if you really want to receive help and rely on the help of divine forces, then you'll have to generate this adequate attitude.

This will attract the possibility that, most of the time, you'll receive unexpected help."

“In theory, you’re right,” I said, “but don’t forget that those who are in great trouble are already confused. Most of the time, they can no longer appreciate or assess a situation correctly.”

“This occurs because they simply can’t let go of the idea that they have a big problem,” Cezar explained. “The difficult situation someone is confronted with in life generates a certain tension in that person’s mind. In different situations, this tension can become creative and trigger, apparently by accident, an answer or an entire series of solutions that can offer the final solution to the respective problem or existential crisis.”

I asked Cezar what should be done in order to identify such moments.

“It’s essential to pay attention and interpret the signs correctly. For instance, the words someone utters can have a special meaning even if the person who utters them doesn’t clearly know what they mean. Those words complete or give a certain meaning to the problem that the respective person is confronted with. The person who utters those words can trigger the spark of intuitive understanding of the way in which that problem can be solved. It can sometimes even happen through reading a certain text or looking at an inspired work of art. All this, however, is outside the person who is confronted with the difficult situation. But that person can suddenly feel a deep emotion because of these signs and everything is arranged as if it were a rebus and thus offering what it takes to solve the difficult problem.”

As I understood those aspects very well, I added my own comment.

“Furthermore, I believe that this indirectly shows us proof that God exists and He is omnipresent and omnipotent. An initiate who knows this no longer feels amazement when confronted with such phenomena of synchronicity.”

Cezar approved by nodding his head.

“I’m glad you’ve understood these important issues,” he said, “because the phenomena of synchronicity in our existence, which many regard as simple coincidences or accidents, clearly proves that God is almighty. Synchronicity, if we look at it from an initiatory point of view, is proof that God can do anything and the phenomenon of synchronicity is the expression of that omnipotence. If people indeed paid attention, they would most often be amazed and feel overwhelmed with the way in which the answers they badly need appear in an almost miraculous way.”

“Maybe if such situations were more frequent, people would become more aware of them,” I said thoughtfully.

“Here, you’re wrong,” Cezar answered. “This kind of help is much more frequent than you believe, especially when the problem is very difficult and seems to have no solution at a certain stage. Most of the times you can even witness such ‘answers’ which are actually addressed to those who are confronted with problems near you.”

“Yes, but they can miss the opportunity because they focus on the mind-body whole that it represents. And then, the range of solutions they have at their disposal is narrowed.”

“The problem is a bit more delicate,” Cezar answered. “The human being is not just a whole made up of body and mind. There are also other very important aspects which define our existence and which we should not ignore. For example, breath; then the senses; our relations and the way we live. All these function as a unit. If something changes in one of these parts, you can be sure that the changes will quickly appear in the other parts as well. There’s one more indispensable element, however, and in order for you to understand it more clearly, I’ll illustrate it with a story that I learned from Dr. Xien many years ago during my practice at the base near B...”

Anxious to hear Cezar’s story, I took a more comfortable position in the ergonomic chair. I was looking through the windscreens glass at the strange indigo colored lighting effects reflected by the tunnel. For a few moments, I thought about the situation I was in which was unconceivable two or three years ago. I was travelling through one of the secret underground tunnels to a hidden and mysterious target from another continent. I was also a part of the most occult section of the Romanian secret services and was talking to Cezar about different initiatory and spiritual aspects in a vehicle that meets the standards of the most advanced technology currently available. I felt very good and safe near Cezar whom I considered a true spiritual master and to whom I owed everything in terms of the amazing events that happened in my life during the past years. After all, I even owed him the path of spiritual transformation and evolution which I had entered with doubtful steps. While I was thinking about all of this, I was fully relaxed and feeling very good as Cezar began his story.

“A long time ago, there lived a king whose life was threatened and who didn’t know what to do in order to protect himself from danger. He spoke to all his counselors, but none of them could give him a satisfactory solution. After hearing people talking about the existence of a wise man who was secluded in a mountain monastery, the king decided to go to him and ask for advice. The trip was long and unpleasant for the king whose mind was troubled by the imminent danger which threatened his life. When he finally reached the monastery, he found the wise old man working in the garden. He introduced himself, told the old man the purpose of his visit and ordered him bluntly to find a solution. Nevertheless, the old man continued to work silently without even raising his eyes. The king was at first furious, but then he started to observe the calm and regular movements of the wise old man. Eventually, he asked if he could lend a hand. Nodding with his head, the wise old man indicated for him to grab one of the tools nearby and imitate his movement. Silently and together, they worked like this for a long time. In time, the king started to like what he was doing as well as the silent company of the old man. The king’s mind thus became calm and untroubled and his heart was easy. Suddenly, an armed man jumped over the garden fence, but since he was careless, he fell and cut his hand badly. The king immediately took off his shirt, tore it and made a tourniquet out of it. The man threw himself at the king’s feet, thanking him and begging for forgiveness.

“Amazed, the king asked, ‘Why do you ask for my forgiveness? You haven’t done me any wrong.’

“The man then answered, ‘Forgive me, for I had come to kill you.’

“The king turned with great amazement to the wise old man who smiled and told him, ‘As you can see, it seems that you’ve already found the solution to the serious problem that was troubling you.’”

This is why I’m telling you that you should never abandon the path to a viable solution no matter how difficult the situation you’re in may be. But, as you could see, it’s necessary to go through an inner transformation and have a superior understanding of the problem for the savior solution to come. Without this superior understanding, the mind will keep on going around the same selfish wishes and impulses and the solution cannot come in such conditions.”

The example Cezar gave me seemed very conclusive to me since it synthesized the notions he had told me before in a very practical manner. I thanked him with gratitude and then asked him to give me some more details about aspects related to the mind, senses and breath which he had mentioned earlier. Confessing to him that I had already read some things on this subject, things were still not very clear in my mind at this point. I needed a synthesis, a connection, and a unitary concept to connect all of these notions together. Cezar heartily agreed to develop this idea since he also believes that this aspect is very important for the human being’s spiritual evolution, especially during the first stages.

“First of all, you need to understand the mechanism. Breath, senses and mind all influence each other. If certain troubles affect an area, the effect will also act upon all of the others. Out of these three aspects, it seems that the mind holds supremacy. Nevertheless, the mind can be easily influenced by changes of breath.”

“You mean breathing,” I said, in order to be sure. “I read about the extraordinary results that can be obtained by yoga practices of rhythmic breathing. It seems to be a real science.”

“Yes, breath maintains life and is at the same time very mysterious. This is not only about air. A corpse is also surrounded by air, but it can’t use it. I could tell you a wonderful story about breath, senses and mind from the Hindu sacred texts. Have you read the Upanishads?”

“No, I’ve only read a few summaries of them which I found in Elinor’s library,” I answered.

“This story is very conclusive. In a metaphorical approach, the text says that a quarrel started between the mind, senses and breath because they all wanted to know which of them was the most important. Then they asked for advice from a spiritual master and he told them that the most important part was the one without which the whole could not survive. This is why, for a short period of time, they agreed to take turns and get out of the body in order to see the effects. The first to leave the body were the senses but life went on without them. Then the mind left and, even if monotonous, life went on. But when breath wanted to leave the body, the mind and the senses also felt that they were forced to leave. Therefore, they bowed to the proof and admitted the prevalence of breath.”

I smiled as I thought how simply and conclusively things could be presented by being wise. Cezar continued his explanation, going back to the issue of breath.

“It is therefore very clear that life is connected to breath and this influences all of our activities. But, in order to perform certain activities, we need energy and this is mainly given by our breath. You now see clearly that by means of an adequate control of breathing, we actually seek to obtain an effect on the flow of energy between the subtle parts and the most tangible parts of the human being.”

“I started practicing the five Tibetan techniques from the secret parchment from Tibet,” I said.

“They are but shy attempts; but even so, I’ve realized what huge force can be triggered by means of controlled breathing.”

“Here, it is very important to have a certain continuity and to be persevering,” Cezar continued. “If done correctly and constantly, simple and conscious breathing can determine very interesting changes in the structure of the human being. We don’t have to do ‘who knows what’ complicated breathing exercises. Just remember that the essential element is to involve thinking in this process. In a mysterious way in such circumstances, the simple fact that you are conscious of your breathing creates a kind of bridge which connects you to higher areas of consciousness and perception.”

I remained thoughtful for a while. I didn’t understand what could trigger this change in the state of consciousness, but Cezar immediately explained.

“This mysterious reaction depends a lot on the way we focus on our breath. We can’t say that the balance between oxygen and CO₂ is not important, but we can expect more from our breath than a simple chemical exchange done at the level of our lungs. People are only interested in the so-called chemistry of breath, but it would be desirable for them to observe as well the experiences that occur when breathing is controlled and which can give them a dimension which is not accessible to oxygen.”

Cezar stopped explaining at the intervention of Lieutenant Trujo who was requesting some technical details. I was looking ahead at the sinuous shape of the huge tunnel through which it seemed that we were advancing with great speed. The strange indigo light, which was slightly phosphorescent, seemed to have a magical influence over me, making me somehow “disconnect” from my normal awareness and float in a parallel dimension. I didn’t see anything in particular, but at the same time I felt a state of deep relief, freedom and inner peace. At the same time I continued to be aware in a vague way of the reality surrounding me, of the vehicle I was in, and of the mysterious tunnel I was travelling through. This reality, however, seemed more and more vague, leaving room for that superior experience in which I wanted to plunge as quickly as possible. The last thing I remember is that Cezar no longer spoke but fell into a deep state of mediation because I noticed the vertical position of his back on the chair. I then fell into a deep sleep and don’t remember anything.

The Stop

I opened my eyes when Cezar was parking the vehicle next to one of the stationary points.

“We’ll stay here to eat and rest,” he said.

It seemed to me that I had slept for only a very short while, but I soon found out that, in fact, almost twelve hours had passed since our departure from the Projection Chamber. I did not remember anything that could have been a dream. It seems that I was completely torn from the physical reality I was in as well as the subtle reality of dreams.

When I stepped out of the vehicle, I touched the ground and felt as if I were staggering, as if I was not sure that I could support myself. The entire surface of the tunnel was covered in a material which had a special texture.

At the same time, on its surface, there seemed to be a layer of phosphorescent “air” which was indigo-colored. I think the strange sensation I felt was especially due to this strange characteristic of the tunnel which created the perception of a relative instability.

The other two vehicles also stopped behind us. Lieutenant Nicoară and the two Americans were unloading the baggage we needed for camping. I noticed what could be termed as magnetic mattresses which were relatively narrow, for one person only, but pretty thick. I also saw two devices, one of which seemed to be an oscilloscope and the other a tripod upon which Aiden mounted a cylinder from which some sort of antennas emerged. On this device, digital displays were placed at a certain distance. The young man then turned on his computer and started working on it, remaining very concentrated and looking from time to time at the information displayed on the cylinder screens.

My task was to distribute food for everyone. The mission was simple because all the necessary food was contained in a metal box with precise and well arranged compartments in which the "space food" was placed.

Lieutenant Nicoară used to speak of it this way, referring directly to the fact that we were practically eating the type of special food that astronauts ate during their space missions. I had received prior training concerning each type of "food," its contents, the necessary quantity for one person and the order in which the products had to be eaten. In fact, they were like bars, containing concentrated food, minerals and vitamins which were not very tasty but very nourishing. I for one liked the bar that contained concentrated green barley. As for liquids, we had enough still mineral water and a kind of tea made of citrus fruits and other vitamins which had a very pleasant taste.

After having prepared the portions, I started eating my bars, at the same time inspecting the place where we stopped. The arrangement was very simple. On both sides of the tunnel there were three or four medium-sized boxes mainly containing other supplies, some measurement devices and rechargeable batteries left from the previous expedition. I asked Cezar if it was difficult to maintain these intermediary stations and the corresponding logistics.

"In a paradoxical way, there are no problems here. There's something very strange about this tunnel. It seems to exist. We travel through it and it's part of our physical reality, but we can also say that it does not exist. When the command for the space distortion is cancelled from the Projection Chamber, it completely disappears. We noticed, however, that after it's reactivated, the tunnel comes back with the last information it contained. By that, I mean that any changes brought about inside of it reappear exactly as they were when the tunnel is reactivated. Soon, we realized that time is thus exceeded. The space-time continuum is "recreated" from a kind of enigmatic memory, exactly in the shape and condition of the last information it contained. It's like the ideal "conservation." Even if we're far from understanding this mystery, the situation is very convenient for us. Practically, the stationary points are almost impossible to alter."

I couldn't understand how this was possible either, but it surely was real because I living that reality right then.

"But, what's so special about this tunnel?" I asked, even though we had already spoken about this subject a little. "What made the builders choose this alternative?"

"Nobody knows why. At a certain moment, we believed, from the three tunnels that start from the Projection Chamber, that this might have been the last tunnel that was built and was therefore constructed with a superior technology a long time after the other two. But, of course, this is only a supposition."

Taking a better look at the tunnel, I started feeling dizzy again. I felt as if something was "pulling" me out of my body. The slightly phosphorescent indigo light, the nuances moving slowly on the walls and the complete silence had a very powerful effect on the human mind. At the Alpha Base, I had successfully passed all psychological tests, some of which were very difficult; but even so, the complex effect of the tunnel was amazingly strong and required the full use of all my self-control resources.

Walking in the direction in which we had just travelled , I stopped about ten meters away from the stationary point. In that area, the tunnel was perfectly straight and looked huge with its opening and the subtle play of indigo light which made it seem unreal most of the time. Suddenly, I felt isolated with a subtle feeling of panic starting to take shape in my mind. I had the feeling that I was suspended and outside of tangible reality even though the others were only a few meters behind me. That feeling of loneliness and mystery was overwhelming so I quickly returned to “camp.”

With a holographic projection, Aiden was just explaining the place where we were from the point of view of the geometry of the planet. I was fascinated to see the sinuous road through the underground tunnel that we had gone through and I noticed that we were already under the Mediterranean Sea which I saw represented as a big cavity in the segment of the continental platform displayed in that projection. The young American explained that the determination of our positioning was possible by means of complex interpolations that used a kind of common “language” between his computer and that cylinder-shaped device placed on the tripod, but he was not allowed to give us further information about it.

As we already felt satiated after having eaten three courses, we each laid down on our mattresses for a restful sleep at Cezar’s suggestion. Even if I had already slept for a couple of hours in the vehicle, I still felt the need to lie down, close my eyes, and fall into dreaming. Those were very special conditions, and I realized that they had a special effect over me. I was sure that the longer I remained in that tunnel that both my inner and outer perceptions were obviously changed. First of all, there was an overwhelming sensation that I was dilating, becoming larger and larger.

Even if I had a correct perception of my body, I had a feeling that I was outside of it at the same time. My thoughts were more fluid. I felt as if I could understand things about which I knew nothing before and everything was happening with the background of a feeling of inner freedom which was very beneficial and which filled my entire being with an unexplained happiness. Laying on the mattress face upwards, I fell asleep in a couple of seconds as I looked at the grandiose tunnel ceiling which seemed immaterial in the indigo light which discretely covered it.

Meandering of the Mind

After a couple of hours, we woke up, packed our small baggage and continued our journey through the tunnel. I could tell that, at a certain level, my mind tried to get used to this action which seemed a bit “off” the physical world but at the same time was a part of it. There was much contradictory information combining in an unforeseen way in my subconscious and almost all of this information referred to the tunnel we were travelling through. First off, its origins were strange. It was practically a reality “created” from a space-time distortion which could then “preserve” itself almost perfectly. The tunnel itself gave me the feeling that it was at the border between two different areas of creation.

During our stop, Aiden made some approximate calculations and hypothesized that we might be at the intersection between two de-phased realities, but he still couldn’t understand how it was possible to obtain the tunnel stability under such conditions. I was a bit more practical and was happy that this stability existed as it created no trouble for us and our physical integrity. I was also fascinated by the special psychical state that was gradually taking over me as I spent more time in the tunnel. I imagined that this state of mind was definitely connected to the special energetic condition of the tunnel and to the “material” it was made of. Its geometry was imposing although very simple as were a series of other special conditions that contributed to the strange ensemble. For example, the temperature inside was always 26 degrees Celsius. Everything was perfectly clean and I didn’t notice any dust during our entire journey.

Finally, there was complete silence which was only disturbed by the slight buzzing of the electric vehicles we were travelling in. To me, the strongest influence seemed to be the indigo light which, in a way that I did not understand, created a feeling of acute nostalgia in my soul, almost making me lose contact with the surrounding reality so that I could dive into myself towards something enlightening which I felt was drawing me like a powerful magnet.

Cezar explained to me that those conditions were ideal for introspection and for the deepest meditation, but that was not appropriate for the current situation as we needed to stay vigilant and active from a psycho-somatic point of view. This is why he adjusted the visibility of the windscreen so that the perception of the movement through the tunnel and of the indigo light no longer had such a powerful influence over me. I soon felt the effects of this measure because I again became curious and wanted to find out new things. I even allowed myself to make an analytical observation, noticing that maybe those sensations were in fact mental reflections and that, through a firm control of the mind, they could completely be controlled.

With a discreet smile, Cezar developed the subject.

“Generally speaking,” he said, “the mind is like a master of time and this is why, for it not to dispose of time as it wishes, it needs continuous attention. Most people “function” according to its characteristics and this is due to the fact that the development of the mind begins a long time before people are aware of their ego. They have all suffered many genetic and cultural influences as well as many personal experiences which have shaped the way they think, react and feel with regard to what goes on around them. By this, I mean that the mind is shaped through these factors in a way which is specific to every person and this determines how they see the world around them and what it’s made of.”

“In this case,” I added quickly, feeling inspired, “considering the fact that the mind is directly influenced by the aspects to which it is exposed, this means that we have to expose it to positive aspects in order to enrich it.”

“Of course there’s a high chance that we have this possibility,” Cezar agreed.

“Actually, this is what the entire theory of positive thinking, promoted by occidental practical psychology, is based upon. Unfortunately, few persons are willing to reflect on the mysteries it involves and analyze them carefully. I think you’ve many times seen people who have good intentions and even wish to transform themselves and think positively, but they are ‘carried by the flow’ and feel lost and with no strength.”

“Yes, I have!” I said, thinking that I was a good example. “But why does this happen?”

“The reason is the main characteristic of the mind; namely, fluctuation,” he explained. “If you have the patience and curiosity to observe yourself even for a few couple of seconds, you’ll see that the mind goes through a continuous transformation. No state seems to be permanent and you should start by accepting this reality. Actually, if we make a summary, we can distinguish three main states of the mind through which every human being has gone at least once: a powerful state of agitation or, on the contrary, of extreme lethargy; a state of instability, which oscillates between attention and lack of attention; and a state beyond attention, when the mind is quiet and absorbed. Have you ever noticed that here in the tunnel you have an almost natural tendency to have this third state of the mind?”

I agreed by nodding my head and asked Cezar to give me some more details on aspects concerning these states of the mind because they seemed very important to me. I was thinking that, after all, this is what every single day and moment gives us our feelings of satisfaction or lack thereof. Good moods and happiness have to be somehow strongly connected to the states of the mind. When the mind is nervous and agitated, it is not possible to be happy or particularly kind.

“It’s all about the ability to observe your mind consciously,” Cezar continued, “but there are also some simple methods through which bad states of the mind can be converted into positive states. When the mind is agitated, the strong emotions we feel tend to overwhelm us. Afterwards, we tend to fall into depression most of the time. In such cases, an efficient method is the simple aware breathing that I told you about. A few breaths with the accent on breathing are usually enough to calm the mind to a great extent. When the mind is unstable, breathing techniques have an effect no matter how distracted the mind is. Their purpose is to change the state of the mind so that attention prevails and lasts a longer period of time.

“Generally speaking, people quickly jump from a clear and concentrated state of mind to a state in which lack of attention and confusion prevail. This is why I repeat that attention is essential on the path of transformation due to the fact that attention always improves the ability of observation. It’s like cooking. If you fry onions for years in the same frying pan without washing it from time to time, any other food you prepare in that pan will taste like onion. But if you consciously wash it after every use, you’ll notice the true taste of every meal you prepare. I wanted to make this analogy with the mind that if you ‘clean’ your mind regularly, you’ll see things, situations and beings as they are and without being affected by what you’ve seen before.”

I congratulated myself once again in my own mind for having started to practice the techniques taught in the Tibetan parchment which includes breathing exercises. They also refer directly to the mind and I now noticed that Cezar practically said the same thing.

“Breathing techniques are among the best ‘cleaning products’ for humans who always have them at their disposal, but they need to want this and make at least a minimal effort in this direction.”

“What happens when the mind is quiet and perfectly calm?” I asked, curious to see what the psychical and mental condition of human beings was in such cases.

“In such cases, we can say that the mind somehow goes beyond attention, being completely quiet and perfectly integrated with the object of observation. This privileged state comes with great serenity.”

A Special Relationship

Cezar was silent and none of us spoke for a while. I wanted to put in order all of the information I had recently found out. I realized that had I not received the explanations Cezar gave me, I probably would have, over time, spent many years groping in the darkness for lack of knowledge. Alone, we are often helpless, even if our intentions are wonderful and even if we have a strong desire to find out more in order to evolve. This is why we need a competent guide, and I felt once again that my heart was full of gratitude to Cezar who guided me step by step through the complicated threads of spiritual knowledge.

I then thought that, even if Mankind’s technological advancement is obvious and science has made many steps ahead, all this knowledge and power doesn’t prevent us from being confused and discouraged most of the time with regard to the understanding of simple things. For example, do we really understand why certain events in life have such an impact on us or what the meaning is of our feelings? We are often powerless in spite of technological progress. Why does an apparently insignificant event completely destabilize some people who until then seemed strong and influential? Why are humans so anxious and at the same time seem to be in control of their minds?

The truth is that we can overcome these limited conditions and create a different relation with the world around us and with the events that occur in life. The difficulty of this new finding is precisely its simplicity. We have to track and get rid of everything that stands in our way, but we rather have the opposite tendency. I would say that we have to be like a mirror which receives what we offer to it without judgment or prejudice.

In my opinion, this is a fundamental aspect which allows us to go beyond cultural barriers. The more we think we know, the less we tend to listen.

Most of the time, we imagine that we already know or know better and then we stop being open and therefore often pass reality by. In such cases, we can say that we can't see the forest for the trees. We tend to perceive that which we're used to, what's in our memory, what we think should exist and doesn't really exist. From Cezar, I learned that this new ability is acquired slowly during a process which is based on two elements: a mirror and a face that seeks to see itself. In one of his rare references to this subject, he told me that a spiritual master is a mirror that should faithfully reflect the disciple at the moment of their meeting. On the other hand, a true disciple is one who wishes to learn and is always surrounded by true masters.

I have reprimanded myself many times because I have thought that my questions to Cezar as well as my curiosity to find out new things and make progress in thought might have disturbed or irritated him because of their simplicity and my insistence. His answer, however, was full of kindness and love and filled my heart with a delicate joy.

"Two persons are sitting at a table and each has an empty cup in front of them. One is satisfied with the situation while the other one wonders, 'What's the purpose of this cup? What should it have contained?' That person has one of the essential qualities of a good disciple: the wish to evolve and to understand correctly the significance of things and of mysteries. That disciple will ask pertinent questions and will have the best master. The latter can't do this, however, for the one who is content with sitting in front of the empty cup will not be ready to have a proper reaction to the problems of life. The difficulties we are confronted with force us to reconsider our actions and ask ourselves: 'What meaning should I attribute to my suffering? What is its profound meaning that I should understand?'

The disciple must practice and thus get to know himself through the spiritual teaching he receives, but this involves a long process which includes all the aspects of the human being."

I then felt a slight sadness and even discouragement in my soul. I was thinking that I wouldn't be able to reach the progress and spiritual evolution that I wanted so much. I told Cezar about my fears.

"You don't have to worry about this," he comforted me. "Patience is absolutely necessary. Having patience means following your path no matter if, for the time being, something happens or not. Evoking the relationship between us and our master will give us the energy and patience to persevere. In the Orient, they say that patience is, most of the time, the only criterion used by the master to evaluate a true disciple. Many times, the disciple, thinking he is ready, wants to achieve his purpose immediately.

Then, the master must help him gradually understand his abilities and his faults. But you should know that patience is also fundamental for a master, not only for a disciple. He should know how to respect his disciples and how to wait. In many of the cases, things evolve slowly. The disciple's respect and faith in his master are essential because they help him find his center. This is the mystery of the just relationship between master and disciple. Gradually, the divine quality of the master will reveal the divine quality of the disciple. When the time is right, between their hearts, an ineffable and unexplainable alchemy takes place between the two and this alchemy doesn't depend on their personalities but on the correct relationship established between them. Establishing the right relationship is made possible through respect and faith. And seeing the Divine in the master is actually proof that we have, at the same time, discovered the Divine within ourselves."

The Secret Government

That discussion remained imprinted in my memory because I felt that all of my being was involved in it. I felt a great happiness thinking that I felt exactly as Cezar said and a beneficial peace flooded my heart when I thought that I was being guided on the path of spiritual knowledge by such a master. Near him, I felt perfectly safe and ready for the challenges of life.

With these wonderful thoughts in my mind, I let myself fall once again into that ineffable state of relaxation and inner peace and went into a deep and resting sleep. I probably slept like this for several hours because I woke up when the vehicle reached another stationary point. This time, the entire party stayed for about one hour and ate.

Aiden was more and more preoccupied with his computer calculations. I noticed that, during that break, Cezar handed him a kind of special hard disk which I learned stored ultra secret data concerning our destination in Egypt. The young American genius then concentrated deeply on his calculations and became so focused that he seemed completely torn from the reality around him. Even when I came near him to give him his food ration, he seemed not to be aware of my presence there. I had never seen anything like this. Astonished, I was looking at him work with an amazing dexterity. His mental absorption was amazing, and it looked like his mind was actually connected to that very advanced calculation device. I looked at his face and saw that his eyes were half closed as if he was in a state of trance. He looked straight at the small holographic projection above the computer interface while his fingers were moving quickly as they touched one or another hologram point. I saw flashes and images which changed continuously. There were fragments of buildings and corridors, all arranged on two vertical columns on which different data was displayed.

At a certain moment, I noticed the apparition of the three pyramids near Cairo and then the image focused on the Great Pyramid. The image descended into the ground and under the base of the pyramid where it became dark and indigo-colored like the light of the tunnel we were travelling through. Then I saw Aiden suddenly stop. He remained without moving and stared at the hologram which practically didn't show him anything. He remained paralyzed, but my intuition told me that the moment was very delicate and that he was "collaborating" with the computer. I couldn't help asking myself what kind of mind such a person had and how it was structured. How did he perceive the outside world and what did he feel in moments like this when he practically created a subtle link with his computer? I saw the ring and the middle fingers of his right hand moving very slowly on the physical interface of the computer. This had practically no connection with the keyboard of a normal laptop except for a central circular-shaped area inside of which there was a second circle with the same center as the first one, the rest of its surface being covered with some sort of differently sized and colored rectangles, both vertically and horizontally. On those rectangles, some signs were engraved which I had never seen in normal writing before. Apart from the numbers accompanying those signs, I did not understand the meaning of any of the representations. When he touched them, the rectangles were discreetly lit, but the edges were more intensely lit.

I realized that Aiden was concentrating on something very important and directly connected to the location towards which we were heading and were soon about to reach. I knew nothing about it, but I suspected that amazing things had been discovered there. I felt that the secret was very well kept and it wasn't hard to tell why. As usual, there was probably a very tense fight inside the secret services, especially the American ones, in order to obtain that information. But I was sure that some high representatives of world Freemasonry were about to do everything possible in order to control these discoveries. I already knew that the disagreement at the Pentagon in this respect had reached a critical level. The main reason was the high pressure made by a small sector of the civilian population which holds a great power both in politics and in the army. I dared to tell Cezar what I thought and asked him if all this was related to the discoveries from the location at the end of this tunnel.

"You can be sure of this," he answered in a low voice. "The way things are in a decadent society like ours doesn't reflect the truth. There are many forces fighting for the same prerogative: supreme power. However, this 'supreme power' is differently understood by the representatives of each party, either civilian or military. The majority of them are limited to a certain area of expansion of their influence and control. Consider, for example, that a country or continent would be enough to satisfy their purpose. There limitations on power, however, occur not because they don't want more but because they, in their strict hierarchy, are also dominated by a terrible power which is at the top of the scheme."

I was astonished. I knew quite a bit about Freemasonry and the horrors they do. The case of Signore Massini was revealing.* Cezar had mentioned a few things about the organizational structure of Freemasonry at worldwide level, but he never insisted on the subject, and I've never found any books or texts to clarify this. In the previous two years, I was rather preoccupied with studying esotericism and with my purely spiritual formation; but now I realized better than ever that the problem of Freemasonry and its implications for human society are very important.

[* See “Transylvanian Sunrise” for further information about Signore Massini and Freemasonry.]

“With lucid thinking and if you add up the information I gave you some time ago, you can understand that Freemasonry has ‘built’ a complicated network of interests which is especially based on bank loans, blackmail and manipulation of Mankind through mass-media; and their main purpose is to have maximum control of the population. Being under control means that you’re no longer free to act or think. This happens both in our country and in the rest of the world, especially in the fully industrialized countries.

However, what I want you to understand is that all of these actions and interests are subordinated to a kind of supreme ‘body’ of worldwide Freemasonry. I’m referring, even if you’ll find it very surprising, to a so-called group that remains in the shadow, almost like a secret government, which practically is above every civilian, political and military means we know. They have their own air and navy fight forces, their own financial mechanisms of draining fabulous funds as well as the ability to pursue with perseverance their design for a so-called national interest that is beyond any control or obstacles of any outside authority. From this point of view, this worldwide group or government that always acts from the shadow and is hidden is outside of any laws and can’t be affected by laws. Their fiefdom is currently in the USA where they exert a great pressure. But, I want you to keep clearly in mind that for the members of this group, nothing important is happening in the rest of the world. I’m now referring especially to conflicts or important tendencies induced upon society through different means which are more or less obvious. This is not a secret for them because all of these events actually originate in the plans conceived by these diabolical minds.

“The rapid succession of a complex of military and industrial circumstances has favored the formation of this occult world government that is made up only of members of Freemasonry. Things are even more complicated than this because they refer to more than only realities pertaining to our world and this makes the ‘resistance’ even more difficult.

“The ‘weapon’ they fear most is that the masses, the population of the world, would find out about them and become active in order to eliminate their negative influence. They would then be quickly eliminated because they are few in number. Their power actually resides in the indirect manipulation and control mechanisms they use. They always rely on others to accomplish their purposes, but when a critical point is reached, when enough people find out about this, everything can turn against them.”

We both sat with our backs against one of the boxes left in that intermediary station in the tunnel, discussing quietly and eating at the same time. Aiden was still very absorbed in his work on the computer and the other two lieutenants were also involved in discussion near one of the vehicles.

“This means that everything you’ve discovered so far, in Bucegi and Egypt, is a top priority on their agenda,” I spoke out because, for some unknown reason, I felt very well and very confident in my own strength.

“There are other points on their agenda which are almost as important as the ones I told you, but you’ll find out about them later. Yes, the discoveries represent a technology which is far beyond our current possibilities. Recently, I had an important discussion with an official from the Pentagon who is a good friend of mine. He told me that, in fact, the toughest war is not the one in the Middle East or anywhere else, but right there inside of their institution. He confessed to me that he didn’t know how long he would resist at that pace because many orders contradicted each other and he had a huge responsibility and all this was based upon a special sensibility with regard to public opinion. Through his position, this person has access to the most classified documents and information. He knows that, presently, the antigravity technology and the technology of ‘free energy’ are very well developed. These are technologies that would solve almost immediately the major problems that Mankind is faced with. He even saw the prototypes because they are many and diverse and he persuaded himself of their amazing efficiency. To be honest, I’m surprised that he managed to obtain such high office without being corrupted.”

I was so astonished that I stopped eating.

“Okay, but how is it possible to keep Mankind at this sort of primitive level of energy resources? Why don’t they spread the new technologies throughout the entire world?”

Cezar took a bite from his bar and looked ahead with concentration.

“Because, if they did this, the worldwide social, economic and political order would change almost completely. Maybe this would be the greatest change ever recorded in the history of Mankind. Paradoxically speaking, this subject is not the greatest secret of Mankind because it would seem crazy or a fantasy invention but because the possible implications are enormous and it would deeply influence Mankind at all levels. It’s obvious that those who control all of these projects don’t like change. And in this case, it would be a fundamental economic, technological, social and political change, the likes of which has never been recorded in the history of Mankind. This is why they seek to maintain the society in this deplorable state of faults and suffering, even if this proves that they’re unconscious.”

“Do state presidents have access to such information and projects?” I asked with curiosity.

“No, they don’t. This is why projects like these are called black projects, because no institution or official knows about them or their application except for a very small number of persons who financed and supported these projects. I’m talking about the world government from the shadow that is made up of the highest representatives of Freemasonry. Since they have no supervision from the social hierarchy in their supreme level of management, world stability can be directly threatened. If you’ve been paying attention, you have seen that these threats were more and more present in the past few years.”

“Then, who has access to these projects, who implements them, who does the research, and who creates the database?” I asked, sort of puzzled. “I guess the top of the Freemasonry elite only finance and supervise them. What about the personnel? Who has access to the information?”

Faced with my avalanche of questions, Cezar smiled in amusement.

“Here, we’re especially talking about projects designed and developed in the USA. There, we can also say are the highest interests which influence worldwide life as well as the most important official bodies which includes the current ‘headquarters’ of the Masonic oligarchy. They are above any system of structure of the civilian or military society. Not even the highest representatives of the CIA, the American Congress, the Presidential Administration, the United Nations or the Secret Services know these secret aspects concerning the future of Mankind. If they were to find out about this, they would be so indignant at the ‘stupidity’ of this idea that they would terminate any discussion immediately. And, of course, the respective person would immediately be suspected of insanity. Only a few officials from the Pentagon and the NSA, very few in numbers, know the truth. The rest, as I told you, live in complete ignorance. The worst is that they are convinced that their ignorance is the reality. But let’s not forget that these high officials are changed every two to four years. They handle many national or international programs and consider monetary and territorial policies but have no access to the files which are truly important for Mankind. After all, these projects are not officially recognized and this is why it can be stated that they practically don’t exist. However, they are known as USAP* projects. A USAP is an operation which is ultra secret and completely hidden to official recognition which needs a very special access, even for those who usually have access to the most classified information. This implies that those who have access to USAP, even if their superiors or even the presidents of countries ask them, will answer that they know nothing of the existence of such ultra secret operations. They will do all they can to hide that project and misinform the population or the officials who might be interested in that aspect. These are the best kept secrets in the world.”

[* USAP is an abbreviation for Unacknowledged Special Access Program.]

“You mean that these are more important than the secret of the thermonuclear bomb?” I asked.

“Yes,” Cezar answered with a determined voice. “Anyway, some information concerning the hydrogen bomb has leaked, but about USAP, even if there’s a global knowledge of what it refers to, there is no official statement.”

I was quite confused. What could possibly be more important than the secret of the H bomb?

“The irony is that the most important secret of Mankind is already so minimized and mocked through an able manipulation by the world Masonic government, the international mass media and implicitly by the population that its importance has somehow become ridiculous. It's about the existence of alien life and its presence on our planet. This includes, of course, alien ships and not only. The problem has become so big and tangled that people can no longer competently distinguish between truth and lies. This is why they tend to consider that it is all a fantasy, a trick, and a lie. This is probably because they act based on the conservation instinct: they prefer to deny in order to maintain a relative security instead of taking a new and brave attitude which they believe would complicate their lives.”

Cezar noticed that I was looking at Lieutenant Trujo.

“Your assumption is correct. Trujo has USAP access. It’s obvious because he couldn’t have been here otherwise. The military rank of lieutenant is just generic and it’s only a cover.”

After he said that, he signaled the others for departure. In a few minutes, we were already moving further through the tunnel towards our underground destination in Egypt. As Lieutenant Nicoară told me, we only had two hours and a half to drive until our destination. Anxious to find out other details about the extremely interesting subject we discussed before being interrupted, I asked Cezar to give me more information immediately after we started driving again.

“This subject is somehow connected to our discovery and also to our mission. But in this case, things even exceed the knowledge of the Masonic government in the shadow and this is actually the main reason why they’re so agitated. I think what disturbs them the most is that our discoveries are not only much more advanced from the point of view of technology in comparison with the realities that they had access to but especially that they are entirely beneficial and involve a high level of spirituality which can lead to an accelerated evolution of Mankind. In time, you’ll see what I’m talking about. The spiritual evolution of the population means a higher degree of freedom; and more freedom and harmony in thought and conceptions means the end of the age of control and manipulation. Practically, it means the end of Freemasonry and its diabolical plans.

“Now you can explain their determination to hold complete control of the actions of Department Zero concerning the location in Bucegi. What is there and starts from there exceeds any of their secrets and endangers their reason for existence and action on this planet. I could even say that their intervention has been quite brutal at a political level through the Freemasons in our society who hold high offices in the political structure of the country. Even now, they are still attempting; but things are quite clear.

The big opportunity was that, in our country, not everyone has a corrupt soul and some persons even have high powers of decision. However, the pressure is felt and believe me, it's huge. It takes great skills, attention and patience to manage to avoid them."

"As far as I understand, the fight between conflicting interests is becoming more serious," I observed.

"Right now, we can talk about a relative stability concerning the discovery in Bucegi. The secret protocol signed three years ago between Romania and the USA can't be easily changed even if this is what they seek. The occult world government has placed the Projection Chamber and everything in it at the top of the USAP list. There are eight persons in the world, except for the Romanians, who have access to this location. The rest, even if they provide different services related to this facility, are completely misinformed. But even so, there's plenty of trouble."

I asked him something that was bothering me for some time.

"I think that there was a beginning for every critical situation that Mankind has gone through. Even for Freemasons, the contact with other civilizations in the universe was probably a surprise. Maybe it was only afterwards that they decided to intervene and made their treacherous plans."

"Indeed, things were not like this from the beginning. During the Truman and Eisenhower administrations, the subject was secret but the general perception is that the measure was rather based on good intentions. In a way, it was only an issue of postponing. They considered this necessary because quite a lot of civil servants from the two presidential administrations already knew about the subject and were even involved in its development. The NSA probably couldn't allow this. But then, the situation started to change and those who had access to this secret information were gradually eliminated and their access was forbidden.

“I found out from my friend at the Pentagon that Eisenhower was very annoyed that he was no longer kept up to date with this subject. He had already seen the aliens and their ships, but he gradually felt left over. Kennedy was probably the last of the American presidents who knew part of this great secret. In a conversation between him and a high official of the American army in 1963, he admitted knowing about the reality of the alien ships and civilizations interacting with our planet, but he stated that he had no control over the whole file and didn’t know why. It’s highly possible that he might have discovered the true reason later that year, before his assassination, and he wanted to make that terrible secret public. Imagine what would have been if the whole world had found out that the governments of great powers had already established relations with certain extraterrestrial civilizations and that certain collaboration agreements had been concluded but that everything had been kept highly classified by an occult world government made up solely of Freemasons who wish to hold complete control of the operation and thus control the whole world. From what I know, Kennedy was the only American president who was not a Freemason. Thus, his assassination appears in a different light than the one told to the public.”

“But, if the American government has no control over the matter, how can you explain that the secret is so well kept?”

“You’d be surprised, but these secrets are better kept by civilians, off the record, involving companies, organizations and researchers rather than diplomats who are officially accredited. The majority of these projects are not developed by the government through state institutions but for the government by private institutions. They keep secrets much better and are better prepared to study them.”

I interfered with bitter irony.

“I’m thinking about the formula for Coca Cola. Even now, after more than one hundred years, nobody knows it except for a few persons from the top management of the corporation. And, when you think what a catastrophe this formula is for the health of human beings!”

“At the same time, it’s also a result of the ignorance of consumers who are shallow and, in a way, even unconscious,” Cezar added. “Containing good sense is not one of the strengths of the modern man and this leads to many problems. What I want to say is that the formula for this harmful soft drink is so secret that not even the President of the United States, should he wish to learn it, would have access to it.”

Then, after a pause, he went back to the main idea.

“The system of top-level classification of ‘black projects’ is based on a double action: the private property of those secrets and the connections to USAP. Generally speaking, this combination is almost invincible. If you want to have access to such a project, through an intermediary in the private sector, it will have the private property privilege; and if you wish to access it through a mediator from the public sector, more precisely through government action, it will be strictly guarded by the USAP level which exceeds government powers. In conclusion, all ways are blocked.”

I felt shattered within as if I no longer had any points of support.

“Okay, but how is this possible? What is this group of beings who manage to overcome any influence? What safety is left for us normal people?”

Cezar answered in a serious tone which was so quiet that I could barely hear him, but given the special atmosphere in the cabin, his words created a deep impression upon me and remained very clear in my memory.

“It’s a group, a kind of occult entity or organization which transcends the U.S. government and any other government in the world. It’s directly connected to USAP, is quasi-private and operates on an international level.

Most of the projects are subcontracted to private companies and involve understanding and applying very advanced extraterrestrial technology.

There are some units which are also connected to USAP, the purpose of which is to misinform and manipulate the population and to direct their attention to peripheral aspects, the reality of which is delayed forever such as UFO sightings, kidnappings by aliens, examples of cattle mutilation and so on. These ‘gates’ through which the wrong information is channeled are supported by the mass media and by means of the embarrassing involvement of the scientific community or even by involving certain responsible politicians.

“Mainly, the group consists of active USAP agents who are part of companies that study a very advanced technology. It also consists of the international community of political analysts, certain religious groups, the scientific community and the mass media. The identity of most of these agents is unknown, but I have to tell you that almost half of those who have decision powers in international government institutions favor the disclosure of this subject to the public. This can somehow be explained because they are very young and were very little involved in past events.”

“Still, I don’t understand how it’s possible for those who actually work on these projects not to know what they are about,” I said. “I don’t think that the secret could still be kept in such conditions. After all, there could be thousands of workers, researchers, scientists or public servants who could have access to this data. There must be reports and conclusions which need to be drafted. Who prepares them? What kind of people are they? How can the secret still be kept in such conditions?”

I really was amazed and confused about these aspects and wanted to clarify them. Cezar’s explanations were so clear and straight to the point that all of my questions were answered.

“Most of these ultra secret operations which are part of the so-called black projects are conceived and structured in such a way that those who work for them can’t realize that they are related to alien technology. A clear example is the initiative for strategic defense which the press called ‘Star Wars’ which actually has the main purpose of detecting and, if necessary, destroying any alien ship coming close to Earth. The information I have from the Pentagon confirms that, until now, at least three extraterrestrial ships have been destroyed by means of an experimental weapon installed in space. However, you should know that most American officials and other top politicians from the entire world rarely receive information concerning this subject. This includes the White House staff, military personnel from the Pentagon, members of the U.S. Congress and the United Nations. If they request such information, they obtain no data concerning the respective operations and, furthermore, they don’t even get a confirmation that those operations really exist. One of the functions of USAP agents is to act in such a way that these politicians don’t even know whom to talk to in order to obtain such information. Thus, the confusion is practically total. There’s an international cooperation, but this is also based on the USAP action level. However, it seems that one of the great powers tends to develop independent programs in this respect.”

“What country are you referring to?” I asked with curiosity.

Cezar answered immediately.

“I’m talking about China. They collaborate, but at the same time, they follow their own path which I could say is even accelerated. This relative independence of the Chinese concerning ‘black projects’ was begun after the discovery of some giant pyramids masked under the surface of hills in one of the rural provinces of the country which has few inhabitants. They did some research and entered the structures, but nobody knows what they discovered there. They’re so closed about this information that not even the USAP services managed to infiltrate and find out what it was all about. For the moment, no fuss has been made about this because these matters are not officially recognized. Actually, at an international level, this was the main idea of the occult government: in order to make denial as plausible as possible, political leaders and leaders of the masses had to know nothing about the inside of this business. Thus, ‘black projects’ could be developed without problems and top politicians were comforted to hold supreme control which made them less vigilant.”

“It’s clear,” I said. “This is also the reason why they preferred to involve civilian industry in such projects.”

“Yes, most of the scientific and technical operations related to those very advanced technologies are performed by private research companies. In these cases, project security is also ensured by specialized companies. Most of the times, if contractual conditions referring to confidentiality are breached, the agents of these companies resort to hiring killers. But, at the same time, contractual clauses stipulate rewards of more than hundreds of thousands dollars for every person involved in the development of such projects in order to guarantee their full and discreet cooperation.”

“I’m telling you this because I also received a copy of such a contract that was proposed to me by the Americans. This is how I got to find out more details about these operations, talking to my colleague. He was the USAP agent who mediated the collaboration. I can't give you details about this subject, but I can tell you that I declined the offer. But think about this: during the past decades, thousands of persons were involved in black projects and received these amounts of money. Thus, you can have a better idea of the huge funds used at this level of information and action, not to mention the amounts necessary for the study and research of the respective technology."

We were both silent for a couple of minutes. I was trying to evaluate the monstrosity of those actions and especially the huge effort made by a small group of beings who are members of the "occult world government" who actually control the planet and whose purpose is to control the world population and keep them in the dark. After all, these were vital problems, very important for our future and for our aspirations in life. From what Cezar told me, I already had an overview of those very secret aspects, but I still couldn't grasp the meaning of keeping this a secret from the entire world. There was a big question: why is this terrible secret still kept and so well guarded that society doesn't learn anything about it?

"The implications of the answer to this question are huge," Cezar answered.

"At first glance, the aspects concerning extraterrestrial civilizations, extraterrestrial cosmic ships and the connections between some world governments with the representatives of these civilizations from space seem to be secret and even a 'sacred mystery' of the age we live in. In reality, things are more complicated. Mass psychology is very well known and used by worldwide Freemasonry and this extraordinary aspect is used as a powerful weapon in order to create and manipulate a certain state of mind of society.

We have to consider that such a secret, which is supposed to be absolute, is always the source of a social illness because it creates the general premise for fear, insecurity and lack of trust in people. These are chaotic states of the mind which allow quite easily the taking of full control and can lead to complete obedience. This total control can only occur if the population is convinced that the management holds military supremacy and that nothing can threaten their future. In such conditions, how can you explain to people that the most powerful and complex air forces of our world are still not capable of replying to unknown ships coming from outer space? How can you explain that Christian religious dogma is wrong and that, apart from humans, there are other beings who are more intelligent and more evolved spiritually than humans? What would happen then with economic order, political balance, and the current technology we rely on in our daily lives?

Undoubtedly, due to the relatively low level of correct and lucid perception of reality, and especially due to religious indoctrination, the majority of the world population would start to panic. From this point of view, maintaining the secret is predictable and even justified. However, the situation applies rather to the period when the official contact with alien civilizations began.

This means the end of the '40s and beginning of the '50s, just when World War II had come to an end. But, after a few decades passed; and especially after the end of the Cold War, fear can no longer be the only explanation for the need to maintain this terrible secret. You know very well that, during the past fifty years, society has gone through many transformations and had remarkable accomplishments. I would even say that it became more mature if we look at things from a certain point of view."

"Then what is the justification for keeping the secret?" I asked.

"If, in the beginning, avoidance of general panic and chaos in all areas was the main reason for maintaining the collaboration with alien civilizations a secret, now it has taken another shape and structure. Now, the main reasons are greed and the need to maintain control over the population and to generalize this control.

"The occult government already holds the 'technological key' of the future.

My colleague from the Pentagon confessed to me that non-linear technology and the technology of 'zero point energy' or free energy which can apparently also be obtained from a vacuum can be introduced on the market at any time. This very advanced technology, which comes directly from the alien civilizations we came in contact with, would exceed by far the combined importance of the internal combustion engine, electricity and the microprocessor. The economic impact would be tremendous, but the owners of this very advanced technology feel that the environment isn't stable yet. In a way, they feel that spreading this technology to the whole world might create positive side effects which wouldn't benefit their morbid plans at all. This is why they prefer to wait and follow the old directions imposed by current technology. This one is still productive and ensures that they have a huge income.”

Here, Cezar stopped for a few moments to think. Then I saw him smiling slightly as he began to explain to me another aspect of this situation.

“For some persons, the power of the secret creates a special attraction and it can even turn into an obsession. The fact that they know they are aware of a huge secret makes them feel very important and worth a lot. They practically become addicted to that secret. On the other hand, we can still talk about fear among human beings, especially if this refers to something alien and unknown to them. There are many individuals who feel a great anxiety and might ask themselves in an embarrassing way: who are these humanoid beings and what is the purpose of their arrival on our planet?

How did they enter our air space without an authorization? It’s almost a fear that man is born with and that makes humans reject the unknown, attack and detach themselves from what they don’t know and understand.”

“I’ve also noticed this. They are trying to ridicule the subject deliberately and this leads to mass misinformation. The masses are led to believe that there’s no real reason for them to worry.”

“Exactly. Most intellectuals, respectable people, and mass media all prefer to follow the opinion of ‘authorized’ persons who reject or minimize the delicate subject of extraterrestrial ships and civilizations when evidence is in fact so close. Even you, in very little time, will again have the chance to be confronted with such extraordinary evidence. Unfortunately, however, the blocking of information I was telling you about doesn’t allow us to present this evidence to the world yet. Some things have to be done in stages because the power of correct assimilation of such information by the population is still relatively low, and in this case, it would be harmful rather than beneficial.”

I remained thoughtful. I had learnt things of great importance for the future of humanity and even for every individual. Because, even if Cezar explained the issue at a global level, I still couldn’t deny that it equally influences the lives of every person on the planet with regard to their conceptions, perception of surrounding reality, manner of acting, wishes and aspirations in life. In a way, this information was in the same line with the information about Freemasonry, Signore Massini and the Bilderberg group that I learned about from Cezar some time ago; but now it was straight to the point, more concrete and was targeting a taboo subject. On the other hand, I was astonished by the colossal opportunity I had of knowing most of these secrets and actually being confronted with them during an amazing succession of events. Obviously, there was a sum of very favorable factors which were correlated and “arranged” that created these wonderful opportunities for learning things of utmost importance for Mankind. My presence in the Projection Chamber, the fact that I was part of this ultra secret expedition and the amazing things I was about to discover at the end of the tunnel made me think that there surely was a very precise meaning to all this. I for one understand that everything was adding up so that I might have the chance to tell about these very important issues to people who are interested and lucid enough. Actually, I sincerely believe that this was my true purpose in these events and, with that thought in mind, I felt once again a deep joy and inner peace.

Chapter Four — The Occult Chamber

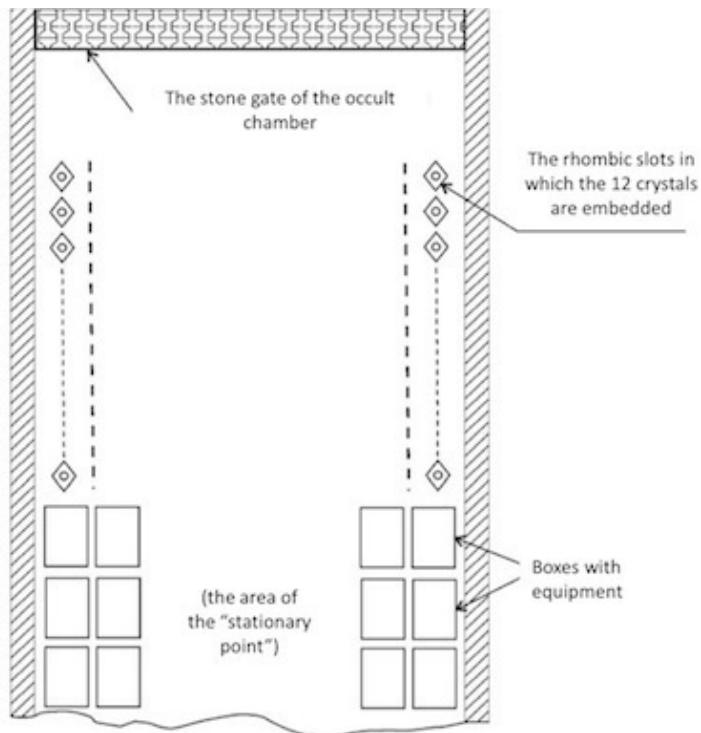

While I was concentrating on my thoughts, I heard the electronic voice of the computer announcing the last stationary point of our trip.

“Get ready, because this point coincides with our final destination,” Cezar said.

“Here, we left more complex devices and also supplies. We’ll be there in a couple of minutes.”

Indeed. In less than two minutes, I started to notice that the light of the tunnel was gradually changing color from indigo to several shades and then to phosphorescent green, the same color I had seen at the other end of the tunnel in the Projection Chamber. The tunnel was perfectly straight and far away I could see a brighter light. I felt a strong emotion thinking that in very little time I was about to find out a huge mystery, thousands of years old, related to the enigmatic life of the old Egyptian pharaohs and the famous pyramids. I shared my thoughts with Cezar, but he immediately corrected me.

“What you’re about to see has no connection with the old Egyptian civilization nor with the pyramids or the Sphinx. It may be the greatest mystery we’ve ever been confronted with so far because we don’t understand why this space at the end of the tunnel, where we will soon arrive, was created. It’s extremely old, more than thirty thousand years older than the Egyptian civilization, but it’s constructed later than the Projection Chamber. Why it was constructed here and why in those times, we don’t know.”

THE END OF THE TUNNEL TO EGYPT
THE LAST "STATIONARY POINT" AND THE STONE GATE OF THE OCCULT CHAMBER

Here Cezar stopped explaining. He seemed to think about whether he should give me more details or not. He switched to manual control of the vehicle and reduced speed. The color of the tunnel walls was now phosphorescent light green and the light was much brighter. The computer announced that we had eight hundred meters left until our final destination. Cezar slowed down even more. I could see at approximately 200 meters in front of us a kind of giant wall that completely blocked the tunnel. It seemed to be made of stone. I also saw many boxes placed over each other and military equipment on both sides of the access path. Eventually, the vehicle stopped and we got off. The others stopped a bit behind us and started to unload the new equipment they had brought.

Hesitating, I headed with small steps to the huge stone wall blocking the tunnel which was the final point. I saw the slots for the twelve crystals on both sides which were identical to the ones at the other end of the tunnel. I supposed that the space-time distortion had to be symmetrical in order for it to remain stable.

Surprises and Mysteries

In the green light surrounding us, the brightness of the crystals was strange and made me feel that I was in another world. In a way, it was true. I was quite deep underground, on another continent near Cairo and in a tunnel created through an unknown space-time “artifice.” But what I found most troubling was that I was a few meters away from a hidden artifact kept unknown from almost the entire world, the meaning of which nobody knew.

I went closer to the imposing stone wall which, in that strange light, had a color of a darker shade of sand. On the left side, I recognized the same square sculpted in stone, perfectly carved, in which a triangle was engraved, just like the one at the entrance to the Great Gallery in the Bucegi Mountains.

“Indeed. It’s identical to the one on the other side,” I heard Cezar talking behind me.

I turned to him and asked what was behind that huge stone gate.

“A very strange space,” he answered. “We called it the Occult Chamber.

It’s simply a chamber ‘planted’ underground with no connection to the surface. The only access is through the tunnel where we are which, as you know, is actually a space-time distortion. Maybe this is the reason why the strange phenomenon related to this chamber, which I mentioned before, occurs. Come with me!”

After he said that, Cezar turned to Aiden who was already working on his holographic computer. I came behind him and noticed the space projection of the tunnel we were in, the stone gate and the space behind it which was actually a simple square chamber inside of which I could see some objects which looked like opaque rectangles.

“You’re about to have a very big surprise when we enter this chamber,” Cezar said, smiling.

We then headed for the gigantic stone gate except for Aiden who remained deeply absorbed in his work on the computer which he now had connected to special sensors installed during the previous expedition. We reached the gate and Cezar touched the triangle. Right away, the gate started to slide towards the left, almost without making any noise.

I was speechless. In front of me there was a room about twice as big as the one I had seen in the holographic computer projection! I did not understand how this was possible and looked at Cezar in astonishment, asking him with a glance to give me an explanation.

“Unfortunately, nobody has an answer to this enigma. The outside sensors show a room which is not very big with a side of approximately five meters and a height of three meters; but when the door opens, the space is more than double. The team of American researchers has reached the conclusion that this is due to a strange intertwining between two different realities: the physical one that is specific to us and a subtle one which is almost certainly of astral origin. The initial measurements and calculations have shown that there is a powerful link between this strange phenomenon and the ambiguous nature of the tunnel. This is actually the main reason why Aiden is part of our team. He can give us scientific explanations of the enigmas we are facing here.”

While I received this explanation, we all entered the underground chamber which looked almost like a hall due to its size. I assessed the geometry of the surface as a square with the side of ten meters, maybe more, and a height of almost seven meters. I noticed that the walls, floor and ceiling were made only of enormous stone slabs which were perfectly carved and intertwined. I could see no crack, opening, passage or empty space in those walls. Apart from the fact that I was astonished by the way that the underground chamber was built — because it seemed “planted” underground — two aspects immediately intrigued me. First of all, I noticed that the room was lit by itself without having a visible light source.

The light was very pleasant, warm, and covered us while revealing the smallest details of the room. If I knew that the light in the Bucegi ensemble somehow originated in the semiorganic material that covered the walls, I didn’t notice the presence of that material here because the walls were carved in rock. The second intriguing aspect was the air in the room.

Normally, given the fact that the place is almost forty thousand years old and has no connection with the surface, no air hatch, and no means of ventilation, I expected that, in the best case scenario, we would barely be able to breathe when the gate opened. But my surprise was huge because the air was very clean and even slightly ionized. The only observation I could make was that the air seemed a little dry.

Cezar soon answered all of my questions when he explained to me that these were the first elements that had been analyzed when they first came to this place during the previous expedition. They wore protective masks at first and took air samples as well as samples from the stone walls and analyzed them with complex equipment, entirely computerized, which they had brought with them. Upon their departure, they left the equipment in the tunnel, just outside the gate at the final stationary point. Assuming such an operation was necessary, they came prepared with an installation which analyzed biological samples as well as some amorphic material sources used by the U.S. Navy in certain special missions. The results of the analysis of the air in the room was positive so they immediately took off their masks.

Concerning the source of the light, Cezar asked me to accompany him to one of the room's walls. We went to the right wall while lieutenants Trujo and Nicoară immediately headed for the left wall where I saw some sort of shelves upon which many identically sized tablets were arranged. At least that was my first impression, but I wanted to take things in methodically and study them one by one. I almost did not raise my eyes from the floor in order that I could enjoy even more the intense emotion and pleasant chill I felt after entering that ancient room so full of mysteries. I was amazed, however, that Lieutenant Trujo seemed to move very naturally in that space, knowing exactly what to do and where to look.

“You shouldn’t be surprised. Since he’s an important USAP agent, he had full access to the file of our expedition, including hundreds of photos, graphics, descriptions and evidence about this room. He learned them so well that now he’s acting as if he were walking through his home. But, I’ll explain to you personally what is in this room, even if we still don’t know the meaning of some objects and we don’t really understand what the purpose was of this chamber.”

We were near the right wall of the Occult Chamber.

“Come closer,” said Cezar. “Now you can see the thin film covering the stone. It’s very special and it’s of organic nature, but it’s a life form totally unknown to us. Slightly radioactive, but within reasonable limits, it’s based on yttrium. The other four components are not found on our planet and this is why we can’t understand the atomic relations between them.”

I went closer to the wall and touched the stone slightly with my fingers. Upon touching it, I felt slight pins and needles in my skin which felt very pleasant. When I put my entire hand on the wall, I felt that the pins and needles acted differently on its surface as if they were acting in waves. I could almost say this was a live communion. It was a sort of organic link that was created spontaneously and without difficulty.

“The thin film is somehow inserted into the shallow layer of the rock, but it’s amazing that it exists this way and it still manifests itself after an enormous period of time has passed since the construction of the Occult Chamber. Their technology is truly amazing!”

Cezar was then called by Lieutenant Nicoară who wanted to consult him concerning a problem. As for myself, I had somehow managed to clarify the aspects that intrigued me from the very beginning so I directed my attention towards the whole chamber. I needed a lot of self-countenance and control because the surprises were huge. Even if it was not as great and imposing as the Projection Chamber — there were less objects as reference points — the Occult Chamber still radiated a special mystery, an enigma which was almost impossible to understand. I couldn’t state clearly what gave me that feeling. Maybe it was the fact that it was smaller and, in comparison with the Projection Chamber which “breathed” in its greatness, this one was more “condensed.” Maybe it was due to the specific field radiated by the objects in the chamber; or maybe it was because of the nearness to the Great Pyramid and the Sphinx and because, according to the holographic projection of Aiden’s computer, it was approximately the same distance from both of them.

Even if I was already sort of accustomed with mysteries revealed and huge surprises which contradict all that is known by our society and even by the logic of modern science, I felt “pressed” by something in the Occult Chamber that is indefinable and this enigmatic pressure gave me a feeling of deep nostalgia which I could not understand. This state was similar to the one I felt during our journey through the tunnel. From this, I drew the conclusion that there probably was an energy link, a similar subtle print, between the tunnel and the Occult Chamber.

I was looking thoughtfully at the entire chamber. Even if there were not many objects inside, the chamber still seemed somehow “full.” In the middle, I noticed a perfect scale copy of the cylinder on the pedestal from the Projection Chamber. There were the same kind of steps, the same construction of the cylinder in half, and approximately the same inner installation with a metal band upon which I saw something that looked like special sensors which were most probably made of crystals. That was as far as I could tell from the distance. I climbed the five steps of the pedestal and looked carefully inside the demi-cylinder. It had a base support of about seventy centimeters which was obviously meant to sit on. The whole device was conceived for easy use by a human being of average height, but its use was still unknown to me.

I then got off the pedestal and stopped in front of something that shocked me from the very moment I entered the room but which I avoided going to immediately in order to have time to get accustomed to everything.

Approximately two meters away from the cylinder in the center of the Occult Chamber, a bit to its right and floating in the air, there was a platform made of a yellow metal which I supposed was gold. The platform was not too big, and I estimated that its surface was about two square meters. It was more long than wide and looked very much like a surfboard. It was not thick, and I don't think it was any thicker than three centimeters. It was so well polished that it shined brightly from certain angles. On the upper side, a rectangular surface was engraved which left a space of about ten centimeters to the sides and about fifty centimeters to what I interpreted as the "front" of the platform. At the "back" side, the rectangle also left a distance of approximately ten centimeters. The only accessory of the platform was a dark blue crystal in the shape of a pyramid which was encrusted symmetrically from the sides of the platform in the free area which had a surface of about half a meter from the rectangular surface to the front limit.

I touched that amazing object which I suppose had been levitating for thousands of years in the same position. It tilted a bit, obviously opposing resistance to my pressure. Encouraged by the result, I sat on the object which looked like a high chair because the platform levitated at approximately one meter from the stone floor. Even with all my weight, it remained exactly in the same position, but I immediately felt a dull and extremely fine vibration coming from inside it. I was so delighted with my new discovery that I started pressing my weight harder against the platform, sitting both on my back and bending in front in order to see how it reacted.

I noticed that, when I pressed all my weight against it, the metal plate seemed to tilt slightly. Eventually, I stood up on the platform, looking triumphantly at the chamber. Cezar had just finished the discussion with the two lieutenants and was heading towards me, laughing.

“Let’s see, do you know what it’s made for?” he asked.

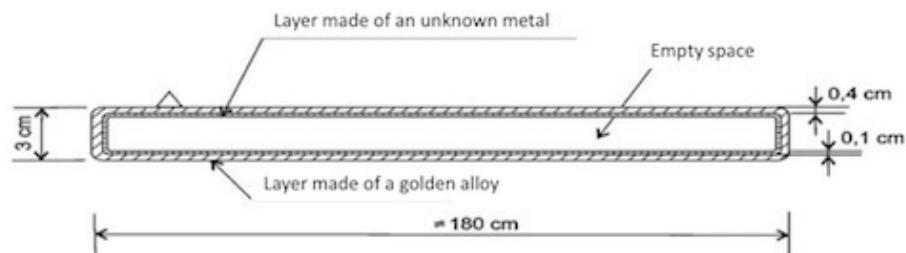

“I think it’s a means of travelling,” I answered. “I see no other purpose.”

“Exactly. It’s a simple antigravity vehicle. Instead of moving by bike or on foot, you use this golden platform. Actually, our analysis showed that only a portion, which is about four millimeters thick, is made of a special golden alloy. There’s another layer, made of a metal we don’t know, which is about one millimeter thick. The rest seems to be empty inside. And, of course, there’s this crystal which represents the main piece of the ensemble.”

In principle, I could see that things were not so complicated.

A. VIEW FROM ABOVE OF THE ANTIGRAVITY PLATFORM

SHOWING THE METAL LAYERS

(according to the description provided by Cezar Brad)

“Okay, and how does it work?” I asked, with impatience.

Amused, Cezar explained that, even though the piece was relatively simple from the point of view of its construction for modern men, it was quite complicated to use it.

“This was a matter which we worked hard on for many hours during the last expedition. At first, we thought that something was missing and that there had to be an auxiliary element. After a while, I asked myself if there was a more subtle link between the person who uses the platform and its vibrational frequency, modulated by the crystal. I remembered that the remarkable builders who created all this used to include in their amazing technology the purely human element, the consciousness of the being, which in this world is mostly expressed by the condition and activity of the mind. This is why I sought to tune in to it, to connect to the specific vibration of the crystal. I only had to focus my mind a little on the crystal and the platform reacted with promptitude. It then started to vibrate in a special way. The movement was then directed with no effort by the power of my mind which had to remain focused.”

“But what happens otherwise?” I asked, hesitating. “Does the platform crash on the ground?”

“No, it doesn’t crash, but it slows down and then stops in the air. It’s the best signal that you have to direct your thoughts in order to continue the movement. This is also the means to obtain the speed you want. It seems that this crystal was reconfigured and set from an energetic point of view on certain frequencies so that it may ease the process of interaction with the human mind and the movement is thereby facilitated. Anyway, it doesn’t come from this planet.”

I swallowed hard. Nervous, I finally asked the question that had been on my mind for a long time but which I lacked the courage to ask, even if I had enough proof to give myself an answer.

“Tell me, those who have built all this...did they come from somewhere else, from outer space?”

For a few moments, we both were silent. Everything seemed frozen in time. Cezar then answered clearly, looking straight into my eyes.

“I can tell you almost for sure that they are a very advanced extraterrestrial civilization who wanted to help Mankind very much. Anyway, during those immemorial times, the populations of our planet were very different from the ones of our days and the geological structure of the planet was also different. It’s almost impossible to make a comparison with modern times. Back then, the problem was addressed in a completely different manner.”

“Did they come from an unknown solar system? Are they the ones who collaborate with the occult world government?” I asked with innocence.

“No, not even by far. The difference between them and the extraterrestrial civilizations with which the Americans have concluded a kind of agreement is about the same as the difference between homo sapiens and homo erectus. What’s even more troubling is that they’re not from our galaxy but from a galaxy which is very far away. It surely is listed in the astronomers’ catalogue, but I haven’t managed to identify it with certainty yet.”

“Wait a minute,” I said, in a hurry. “How do you know all this? I knew that they left no proof of their origin or aspect.”

“It’s true; but meanwhile, we’ve discovered this device,” said Cezar, showing me the pedestal on which the semi-transparent cylinder was placed.

I was astonished and couldn’t understand anything.

“Okay but...I know it’s a replica of the great cylinder in the Projection Chamber. You didn’t know the purpose of that cylinder either; you only assumed it might be a mental amplifier.”

“It’s true. Two years ago, we didn’t know the purpose of the huge cylinder in the Projection Chamber. But this one is built for our height.”

I couldn’t wait to find out the purpose of that complicated equipment.

“Let’s call it a time travel machine.”

“His words made me shiver. From the bottom of my whole being, I already imagined with an extraordinary rapidity the countless possibilities to find out the essential historical truths and, why not, even the future ahead of us. I became so excited that I couldn’t stop asking questions and I wanted an immediate answer for each question. Compared to this new revelation, every other object in the Occult Chamber had suddenly faded in importance. Amused by my childish behavior, Cezar hardly managed to make me relax.

"I'll tell you about some of the time projections I accomplished with the help of this device which is based on a very advanced technology. But first, I have to complete the tasks of our mission and assist Aiden. Meanwhile, you can research what remains to be seen and then help us with our work," he said, showing me the two lieutenants.

Extremely happy at the thought that I would soon find out for sure about some very important aspects, I quickly headed for the left wall of the Occult Chamber where Trujo and Nicoară were working hard. Actually, that part of the room was imposing even from the very beginning because it had a massive superposed ensemble, like a library with many shelves, which stretched out on the left and on the back walls of the room. When I went nearer, I noticed that, in fact, those shelves were carved directly into the stone wall and they were very well polished. The height of each shelf did not exceed fifteen centimeters, but each shelf stretched out on the entire wall and had five compartments, each separated by a wider stone column. But what attracted me straight away was the content of those shelves. I saw there thousands, maybe tens of thousands, of metal tablets arranged in perfect order at a distance of no more than one centimeter between them.

The first impression was that of a huge library. But I immediately noticed that, in fact, the tablets contained no inscriptions and they were so even that they almost reflected an image, like a mirror.

Trujo and Lieutenant Nicoară were loading these tablets in special boxes that they had brought in the vehicles in which we travelled through the tunnel. I went near the first set of stone shelves and looked carefully. The tablets were perfectly aligned and in perfect order and they all looked identical. Just as was the case of the Bucegi ensemble, I did not notice any dust or impurities here either. Everything seemed to be aseptic, perfectly clean and very well arranged. This amazed me from the very beginning, but I soon realized that the semiorganic film impregnated into the stone walls did not allow the accumulation of dust or the proliferation of other micro or macro organisms. The incredible age of the construction and this aspect were the best proof of this.

I tried to take a tablet from a shelf which was in front of me, but it wouldn't move. Amazed, I tried again without success. I then looked at Trujo who was doing the same thing except that he was able to take the tablets and give them to Lieutenant Nicoară who arranged them in special superposed slots in respective boxes. I saw that, unlike me, the American officer was pulling the metal tablet straight to the outside and thus making it slide easily. I did the same and the tablet immediately came off from the shelf.

Looking more carefully, I saw that each had a marking in the stone shelf containing a darker colored surface which I suspected had been specially treated or had magnetic properties which stopped the tablet from being removed in any other direction than the perpendicular one.

"The gradient of the force applied has to be in the same direction as the sign for removing the tablet," Trujo explained, a little academically. "Otherwise, almost nothing can move them. Until now, we had not managed to figure out how they accomplished this."

I was switching the metal tablet on all sides without understanding anything. It looked a lot like a shiny silver cigarette holder with a side of about twelve centimeters and a thickness of about seven to eight millimeters. On the lower side, which slid out from the slot where it was placed, it had two thin parallel slits, but that was the only distinctive sign on the tablets. Lost, I looked at the huge number of tablets on the stone shelves. What was their purpose? They seemed to make up a gigantic library, but how could the information be read? I asked Lieutenant Nicoară to give me some explanations about this.

"After the last expedition, we brought back a few dozen tablets in order to study them. They're made of platinum but also contain zirconium and lanthanum. Apart from this, there's an element which can be essential as a storage medium but which is not in the table of elements on Earth. Pragmatically speaking, they are very valuable information depositories containing information from different times of the history of our planet as well as the universe itself. It's an absolutely classified secret and we'll transport most of them back with us under a strict inventory. However, even if you wanted to change their place on a shelf, it would be impossible because each tablet recognizes its initial position perfectly.”

I was curious so I tried to put the tablet in a free slot on a shelf, but it acted as if two magnets with the same pole were brought together. The slot rejected the tablet. Then, I wanted to place it in several other slots, but it was impossible until I tried it again with the slot from which I removed the tablet. It fitted and stabilized immediately.

“Okay, but how can you read the information they contain?” I asked Lieutenant Nicoară.

“We didn’t understand how it was possible either. Logically, there should have been a device that ‘reads’ the encrypted information, but we didn’t discover anything until, by mistake, one of the members of the expedition pressed vertically on one of the metal tablets. Then, at the level of the ground in front of the tablet, a hologram was suddenly projected. The hologram was quite high and displayed a corner of space. It was dynamic and showed a temporal process of rotation of a star cloud. I don’t know how they accomplished this. It was as if they filmed for a very long time through a very slow process and then played back the image at high speed.

You get an overall understanding of the entire action. Then, we all stayed and watched it for about two hours, but the hologram didn’t seem to be close to the end. The Americans needed more than one year to improvise an acceptable interface to release the holographic information from a single tablet. I noticed that it lasts almost two days without interruption. It’s phenomenal! In order to finish seeing everything, we could spend hundreds or maybe even thousands of years watching, without any pauses, all the holograms displayed by the tablets in this chamber. As far as I understood, they’re now searching for a method of ‘fast forward.’ If this isn’t possible, then the only chance we have is to see them randomly.”

I was looking thoughtfully at the huge data archive in that chamber. Personally, I preferred the tables in the Projection Chamber which were more easily accessed and contained interactive information. My intuition told me that the Occult Chamber had been built and equipped for a totally different purpose. It was like an “annex”, but it was still very important. Apart from being a “universal archive,” what was its true purpose? What determined that extraterrestrial civilization to build this underground construction, a true information and technology depository more than thirty thousand years ago?

I was thinking that the purpose of the Occult Chamber was to preserve a huge amount of universal information; and I could add to this idea the fact that the tunnel leading to this chamber had a strange nature that was half-way between the physical and the subtle worlds. Maybe this option was chosen in order to better protect the archive in the Occult Chamber against the rigors of time. I asked the two lieutenants what their opinion was in this respect, but they told me that nobody has a certain answer yet and that the expectations from the information on the metal tablets are very high.

Pressing on one of the tablets randomly, I felt something trigger. The metal tablet became slightly phosphorescent and behind me, a holographic image immediately appeared. The image was taller than me and projected onto an area of almost three square meters. It was the troubling image of a galaxy viewed from a higher point of reference so that the galaxy appeared somehow lower and towards the left side of the holographic image. It wasn't a spiral galaxy but an irregular one. The absolute black of the cosmic void around it gave me the creeps and a feeling of emptiness in my stomach. It was like an almighty terrible presence which seemed to swallow everything. I felt, even though not clearly, that there were great tensions in that galaxy. From time to time, I saw massive explosions which appeared as powerful luminescences in different points of the galaxy. They surely were supernovas, but the number seemed too high to me, even at the scale of cosmic time at which I supposed that cosmic image was "played."

I was sure that something was wrong in that image. There was too much light that had the same intensity in almost the entire galaxy. Trujo and Nicoară had also stopped working and were looking at the projection, astonished. Cezar was talking to Aiden in the tunnel at the entrance to the Occult Chamber.

It was becoming clearer to me that the holographic images somehow "brought along with them" a sort of subtle emotional charge corresponding to the images they displayed. For example, that image gave me a feeling of panic, suffering, and inner struggle. Something chaotic was happening in that galaxy as if things were out of control, but I imagined that there had to be a very well defined meaning for encrypting that colossal event in the life of the universe. I guessed that I somehow witnessed the “death” of a galaxy, but this was obviously a very violent end. I might have found out the terrible cause which triggered that colossal chain of events, which undoubtedly lasted for millions or tens of millions of years, but I preferred to stop the “transmission” by pressing the tablet once again. I needed to put my mind at ease.

Energy, Intention, Consequences

Cezar then came back inside the chamber and headed towards me. With a single look, he understood what I was thinking about.

“In time, you’ll learn to protect yourself from outside influences, either good or evil,” he said to me, kindly. “This protection must be viable and very efficient. It won’t be enough for you to simply believe that you are protected by applying a certain technique. You must have a clear and well defined sensation of a certain invisible energy ‘wall’ which rejects any ‘aggression’ from the outside. This is necessary, especially at the beginning. After the vibrational frequency of your energy structure has become high enough, this protection comes naturally as a consequence of selection and separation of elevated vibrations from gross ones. But, in order to accomplish this, you have to ‘clean’ your inner being very well. All ‘slag’ must disappear.”

“I have thought about this many times when I was more relaxed,” I said. “From what I read so far, I’ve reached the conclusion that a kind of ‘immunization’ occurs when the lunar and solar energies in the human being are at balance. Doctor Xien used to tell me about yin and yang, but he added that certain fundamental rules of the universe, both moral and ethical, had to be respected.”

“It’s true. A spiritually elevated person who has reached an energetic balance can’t be touched by any negative influence, sorcery, charms or black magic. Furthermore, such a person can help those who find themselves in such situations and counteract such evil action against them. Therefore, the matter is simple. If you’re pure, if your aura has an elevated frequency, if your orientation is beneficial, if your entire nature is balanced and there’s harmony between the yin and yang energies, then no magician or evil power can have any effect over you, not to mention any inferior outside influence which can occur depending on the context.”

“But why does this happen? After all, who can guarantee that those elements reject the evil directed against us?” I asked, curious to find out the explanation.

“In the conditions I mentioned earlier, it’s completely impossible for an evil being to exercise the slightest influence against you. The reason is simple.

Let’s say the energy frequency of your aura corresponds, metaphorically speaking, to the medium wave frequency. If your aggressor, through an act of black magic, transmits this energy through long wave frequency, which is inferior to medium waves, it will be impossible for him to affect you because the two frequencies can’t be in agreement. It’s like you tried to weld wood on metal. These negative forces, when directed towards a superior human being, due to the elevated frequency of that person’s aura, will immediately rebound and return to the author of that action. This is called ‘rebound shock’ by black magicians. Of course, they’ll try to avoid this terrible shock as far as possible by using certain methods when negative energies ‘rebound.’ It’s something similar to a redirected phone call, if you know what I mean. But, eventually, they’ll be inexorably confronted with this rebound effect which will be even stronger. When a black magician uses his diabolical knowledge against an elevated being, the evil energy he had subtly accumulated, like a sphere of evil force, will reach that beneficially oriented person but rebound just like a ball that hits a wall returns to its point of origin which is, in our case, the black magician or sorcerer.”

“Even so, I think they can get away quite easily,” I said. “The evil they wanted to cause is the one that returns to them and thus it’s compensated.”

Cezar smiled with indulgence.

“If it were that easy, black magicians would sleep more relaxed. But it’s not true. The rebound shock is one of the greatest dangers that black magicians or sorcerers are confronted with, no matter if they’re experts. The energy emission is instantaneous, but when it rebounds, it attracts similar energies which it takes over while returning to the source. If you want a more concrete example, it is just like an avalanche. If you take a snowball and throw it in the valley, it accumulates more and more snow and until it rolls down and becomes tens or hundreds of times bigger than its initial size.

The same phenomenon will occur in the case of rebound shocks. The energy returning to the black magician will be maybe ten times greater than the initial one he emitted and this is why, after the ‘impact,’ they can even die immediately. In our database and in the archives of the Department, we have some files with cases like this which we tracked closely but were not able to give them a viable solution for the mentality of our society. Some of the cases are closed. But, in reality, things are just as I described them. It’s a terrible death which the wizard brings upon himself. This is why many magicians who ‘attack’ spiritually elevated beings die due to their own negative actions.”

“As far as I understand, this principle can also apply to other evil actions which are not so radical,” I said.

“Of course. There are certain persons, especially in the countryside who, generally speaking, are feared by normal people. They call these persons wizards. These wizards accomplish a whole series of evil actions unconsciously without knowing the laws of rebound shock. When they send an evil energy towards a pure and elevated being, that energy returns amplified and, in their foolishness, they can really think that the respective person whom they cast a spell upon or cursed with their evil energy has answered in the same way and ‘attacked’ them. They imagine that the rebound shock is the answer of the attacked person. It’s highly possible that the respective elevated person isn’t even aware that he or she was attacked by an evil energy. But, the energy that returns is the same energy sent by the wizard plus the energies of the same kind that are taken over by magnetism when the evil thought rebounds. This ‘burden’ can even kill the magician.”

I felt my entire being shiver.

“Okay,” I asked, “but there are not many human beings who are so elevated and balanced that they can reject such evil attacks. Most people have at least a few ‘breaches’ which evil can penetrate. And then, for example, how do I know that I’m being ‘attacked’ by a black magician? There have to be some symptoms, don’t there?”

“Generally speaking, everything strange and repeated at certain time intervals can make you believe that something isn’t natural. For example, you fall and break a leg. Three weeks later, you break your hand as well; and two weeks later, someone hits you very hard in the head, either on purpose or accidentally, thus sending you to the hospital where you get a few stitches. And, everything happens within a period of two or three months. You should then seriously assume that you’re being attacked by black magic. Of course, human ignorance is so big that people are not willing to recognize such signs, even if everything happened in one week. But, this is a reality and it must be faced and explained.”

I became thoughtful as I knew of many similar examples. During my discussions with my friends, we tried to realize if such “coincidences” should be taken into consideration. But now, I was receiving a confirmation and a competent explanation from Cezar and things were much clearer in my mind. I wondered how people who are oriented towards evil and who want to practice black magic could be oriented towards the way of good. I asked Cezar his opinion about this.

“Unfortunately, most of these persons don’t know what they’re doing. They don’t understand the real dimension of their evil actions. This is why their destiny becomes, so to say, ‘encumbered’ and they have to ‘pay.’ This means a lot of suffering but also the return to the ways of good, if doubled by sustained spiritual effort and virtuous actions. Only in this way can they shorten the suffering that awaits them.”

“We could tell them where they are wrong; we could explain to them the rebound shock you mentioned; and we could show them better ways,” I said, eager to find possibilities for those who can’t understand the deplorable condition they get to by doing such evil actions.

“You didn’t understand the basic principle,” answered Cezar. “It’s impossible to unite the evil and the good. It’s a universal law. This is why they say “evil runs from good people.” What is evil will also run from what is good and so you can’t unite them. A transformation of evil persons must first come from an inner impulse they have, a personal wish to find a new orientation. Only then can you plant the seeds of good. But until then, nothing can be done because the division is maintained by these who dwell in their error. And, you can find such cases not only with black magicians and wizards but also with many normal persons or intellectuals. Tell me who your friends are and I'll tell you who you are. For example, if two wise men meet, they understand and recognize each other but other ordinary men can't understand them and can't see how wise they are. If such an elevated and wise person hears about another person who is about to become as wise, he or she will call the other person and an affinity will be established between them which will help the second person become wise. But, if the person who lives in error hears about another who is on the path of good, they automatically feel the need to criticize and even think that the person who follows the path of truth is lying. Such evil persons actually believe that they are telling the truth. For those who don't have the necessary training to make their own opinion based on direct experience, it is very easy to mislead them and thus the division I was telling you about occurs."

"Then they acquired the wrong knowledge?" I asked, puzzled.

"There are several factors that contribute to this: misinformation, lack of authenticity of aspects considered very important, pride and lack of maturity in thinking. Real knowledge must, in a way, make you feel 'more alive.' Only in this way can you become an active factor that contributes to spiritual growth and mobilization. For example, many know that it's good to be altruistic, but very few actually experience altruism and feel the happiness brought by a purely uninterested action for the benefit or help of another person. There are people who know remarkable things, but they really lack practice."

A New Discovery

I wanted to ask Cezar about ways to put into practice some of the knowledge I had acquired, but Aiden walked into the chamber and headed for the back wall. He asked Cezar to follow him. I accompanied him as well until we were at a distance of almost four meters from the stone wall.

Then, something troubling happened which stunned me. When Cezar got to a distance of approximately three meters from the back wall of the chamber in front of us, some kind of semitransparent and slightly lit film activated before suddenly vanishing, just as it had appeared, revealing a huge crystal of almost two meters. Perfectly carved, its sharp tip was the tip of a polygon with several sides which looked like a pyramid with several faces.

I was especially astonished by its purple color, like a ruby, which seemed to tempt me to plunge into abyssal waters. The huge crystal was so pure that I could almost see through it to the stone blocks of the wall behind it. I counted the sides and saw that it was actually a dodecahedron. Mighty, lonely, and much more complicated than an obelisk, it had been guarding that chamber for tens of thousands of years, probably creating a mysterious energy link.

After I recovered from my astonishment a bit, I looked with questioning eyes at Cezar who was looking at me and smiled.

“I left this discovery for the end on purpose, in order for you to assimilate the other ones correctly. You should know, however, that in the beginning, I didn’t know about this crystal either. It was only after I connected to this ‘time machine’ that this unique space-time distortion also activated. The chamber suddenly seemed larger, including the projection of this crystal. It’s a physical projection of the crystal,” he added, guessing the question I was about to ask.

I went closer to that fascinating object and, as the distance between us was smaller, I felt a strange current through my whole body, like a thrill. I touched it slightly with my fingers. It was cold, but the energy force I felt from it troubled me. The pronounced sensation was that of numbness so I moved approximately one meter away from it. The configuration of the chamber had suddenly changed as if a program started. I noticed that only the distortion that made the apparition of the crystal possible had changed.

“According to Aiden’s previous calculations, it’s a de-phasing from our reality. In practical terms, the crystal is here all the time but we can only see it if certain conditions are met. The explanation for this is still a mystery for us. Maybe the ancient builders wanted a minimum protection of the crystal, just in case. But, I know almost for sure that its main function is to support the effect of time travel by means of that device.”

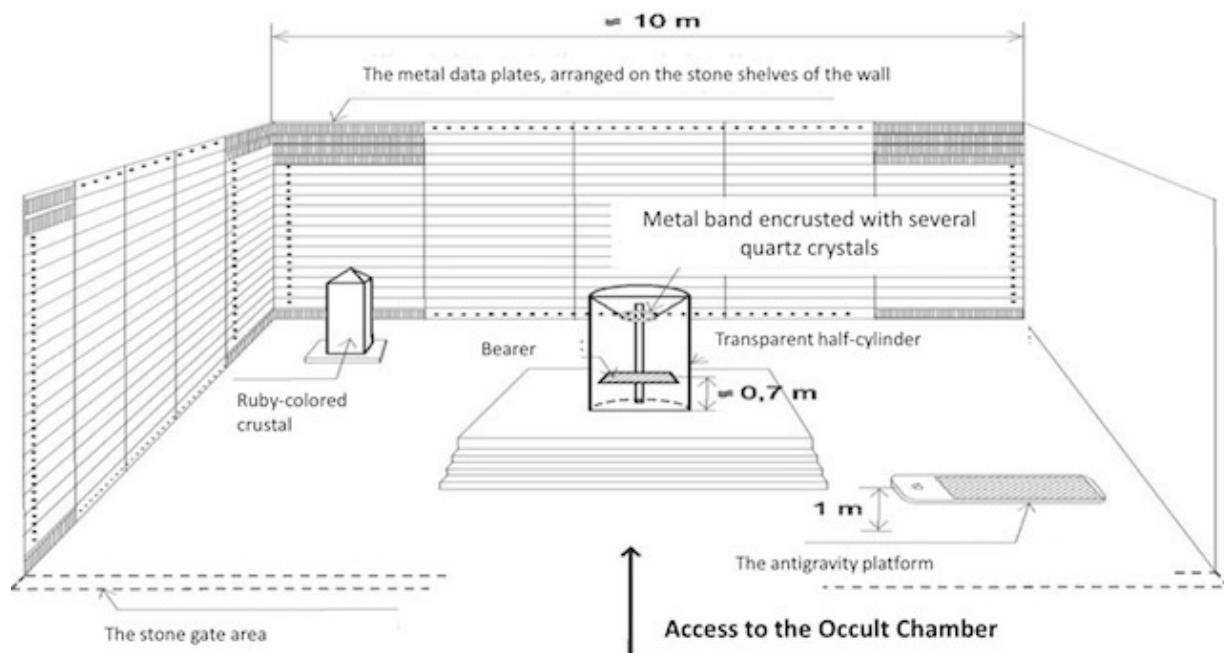

I was looking at Cezar seriously. Even if I had already learned a little time before that this was a kind of “time travel machine,” I still felt overwhelmed by emotion. It seemed that my mind refused to believe this was possible.

“You mean...you’ve actually travelled in time?” I asked in a dull voice.
“This is the meaning of this installation?”

I was overwhelmed and my entire being was thrilled at the anticipation of time travel which maybe I would also be allowed to try.

“Yes. As I said, it’s a device that can project you in time, into the future or into the past. It wasn’t easy for us to understand how it works. Besides, there are some subtle ‘barriers,’ imposed by the very advanced technology.

However, I think you still don’t understand something clearly. This really is time travel but at the level of the consciousness. It’s not a movement in time with the physical body. The body stays here, but the consciousness experiences a time fragment as if you were there with your body. The advantage is that, in this case, you’re an observer from the outside. You can see and feel everything exactly as it happened without being conditioned by the limitations of the body. The disadvantage, if we can even talk about this, is that you can’t act — you can’t personally integrate with that period of time.”

OVERVIEW OF THE OCCULT CHAMBER

I felt as if I were in another world. In a few moments, I was talking about a subject which, until then, I thought was a product of science-fiction books.

Even if I had lived through a troubling experience with Dr. Xien, that experience referred to the activation of a discontinuity in space. And even if the wise old man had explained to me that the same phenomenon can also be accessed for time, my prejudice was stronger and influenced me to ignore that possibility. But now, I was standing less than two meters away from a “time machine” which I just learned worked and could project the human consciousness into time.

Troubled, I asked Cezar another question.

“You’ve travelled in time? Have you figured out how this device works?”

“Yes, I have. There are some conditions that are, in a way, related to one’s personal ‘equipment,’ just like the energy wall at the entrance to the Grand Gallery but at a human scale. This means that they’ve built this mysterious underground chamber and the tunnel leading to it with the clear purpose for it to be eventually discovered by humans and for them to use the information here. But why they chose these coordinates and why there are no derivations or connections, we still don’t know. Maybe it was a bigger project which they later abandoned for who knows what reasons. Here, things are truly unclear.”

A ray of hope came to my mind.

“Yes, but you could find out all this by travelling to that time with the machine,” I said in a hurry.

Cezar smiled kindly.

“This was, of course, one of the first things we tried. But, as I was saying, the beings that have created and left us all this seem to want to remain hidden. Because they have mastered the mystery of time, they also have the possibility to intervene in the frame of time that the machine can access and this is why some information is ‘encoded’ so that they simply can’t be accessed with this device. When trying, the perception of the consciousness is confronted with a sort of ‘blank’ and any efforts to break through it were unsuccessful. We believe that the key to the encoded moments in time lies in a hidden energy dimension of the huge crystal. But, not only is the information about this enigmatic civilization from outer space blocked but so is other information from the history of our planet. As far as I could tell, this means almost everything related to the intervention or action of the representatives of the respective civilization along the time line. I don't really know how to interpret this. After all, it can simply be 'cosmic modesty.'

"I did manage, however, to find a single reference in a time cliché from long ago. This was when another extraterrestrial civilization who stopped for a few hundred years on Earth, in Australia, left a reference to this time travel device and an approximate graph of the device and mentioned that the beings who constructed it were from another galaxy. They mentioned the galaxy briefly, but astronomers haven't managed to identify it because of the difficulty in understanding the graph carved in stone which was partially destroyed. It's very likely that this is the same civilization who built the ensemble in Bucegi and the Occult Chamber. We can see the effects of these actions but not the ones who have done them or any other elements about them. What remains, however, is so immense and amazing that the encoded information fades in importance."

"Have you also travelled to the future?" I asked, a bit unsure.

"I was waiting for this question," said Cezar, laughing. "Yes, I have also accessed some areas of the future, but here things are more complicated. Events seem to be unsure and sometimes they just dissipate. I'll explain all about the 'time machine' in detail; but that will be later because now I have to consult with Aiden about a bizarre aspect. His computer showed him a tunnel to this room that was dug at the base of the Pyramid of Cheops."

Lieutenant Trujo and the Secret Tunnel

We all went to Aiden who had mounted his computer a small distance from the stone wall.

"Look, the projection is clear and shows an unfinished tunnel dug from the Great Pyramid exactly in our direction," he explained, showing us the holographic image displayed by the computer. "However, I can see that, at a certain point, the tunnel changed direction to a wrong one. It wouldn't have reached the Occult Chamber."

I was looking at the graph displayed by the computer. The gallery started from under the Pyramid of Cheops and went in the direction to the Occult Chamber for a pretty long distance. Then, after two thirds of the way, it suddenly turned downwards and deeper underground but not for long. I think that the new course of the tunnel did not exceed twenty or thirty meters before the whole work seemed to have been suddenly abandoned.

While Aiden concentrated on his ethereal “keyboard,” we were waiting for some explanations because none of us understood the purpose of that tunnel. After a few quiet minutes, while the three-dimensional image changed several times and displayed different angles, Aiden told us his first conclusions.

“First of all, it’s obvious that the tunnel was dug with the clear intention of getting here. This means that, one way or another, they found out about the Occult Chamber and forced their way to it. The question is: how could they know about the existence of this place? What means did they use? I, for example, with the technology I currently have access to, can’t discover this underground cavity if I’m at ground level. After all, we are almost two hundred sixty meters underground, but let’s say this is not the main issue.

We can’t discover this construction because it is protected by a special energy field. It’s the first thing my computer showed me, but it was only possible because we created the link to this chamber through the tunnel by which we came. Under these conditions, how did the ones who dug the new tunnel know that there is an underground chamber buried so deep in this place? Or maybe they had an older source of information,” he added thoughtfully.

Cezar intervened.

“Even in this case, the trajectory of the tunnel is very precise in the first part. It looks like those who dug were very sure where they were heading.

This means that they had measurements and permanent controls as they went to the correct direction in the beginning. It’s interesting to find out what could have caused the change of the correct trajectory of the tunnel.”

After a few moments pause, Lieutenant Trujo said in a dull voice, “Maybe a kind of redundant protection system was activated at a certain point. Maybe a sort of jamming.”

“I’ve also thought about this,” said Aiden. “And I think it’s the only explanation for what the computer shows us. I believe, however, things were more complicated.”

After speaking, Aiden focused once again on the ethereal keyboard and the strange information displayed as holograms by his portable computer. We all silently followed the quick movements of his fingers as well as the three-dimensional images that rapidly succeeded.

“Yes. As I suspected, there were probably conflicts of interests between those who built the pyramid or had access to it,” said Aiden. “In the first part of the tunnel, which I see is more negligently built, there seems to be some relics. There are recordings of some kind of the remains of objects, but I can’t say for sure what they were. I think there were misunderstandings and conflicts between them.”

Silence fell. We all followed the schematic structure of the tunnel going from the Pyramid of Cheops to the Occult Chamber. We saw the strange shapes of some objects inside the second part of the tunnel, just before its end. In that silence, we heard the serious voice of Lieutenant Trujo again, carefully choosing his words.

“Actually, I’ve been in that tunnel. It’s a more complicated story about which I don’t have approval to talk. The decision factors from whom I received these orders mustn’t be mentioned, but they are at the highest level. To give you an idea, all governmental institutions, including the army and the secret services, are indirectly subordinate to those whom I represent, even the Pentagon.”

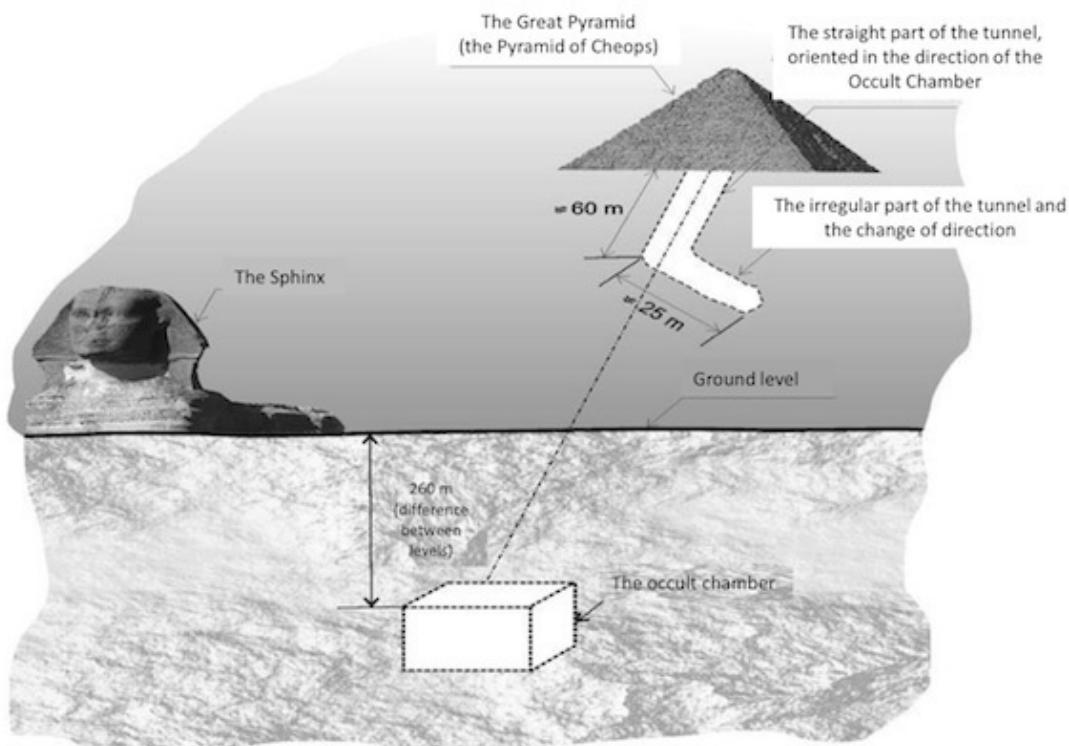

I was astonished. I would have liked to understand the reason for Lieutenant Trujo’s confession, but I couldn’t grasp it. This relatively young and very well built man was, in a way, a surprise for me. Cezar had already told me that he was a USAP agent. In other words, he was not paid by any national institution but by the occult government. His duties were not clear for me, but he was obviously working with highly classified information. This is how I explained how he was imposed on the Pentagon and who sent him on this expedition as a representative of the Americans. In a very insidious way, world Freemasonry had managed to send a safe person who gave them information. It’s true that Lieutenant Trujo was an agent and not an active Freemason, but his degree of training and indoctrination placed him in the influence and action scope of the great occult Masonic organization. Maybe, through a relationship of complete subordination, he had to give them all information he obtained and his comments. Only later did I realize that Lieutenant Trujo himself was amazed that Aiden had discovered the tunnel and that now we could all realize the true target its constructors were heading for. Because he was an upright man and maybe because he felt a certain professional consideration for Cezar, Trujo started to talk about the actions taken in the other tunnel. I soon realized, however, that he only revealed some elements; and even so, he omitted a lot, leaving aside the truly important aspects in which we were actually most interested.

Moreover, it was obvious that the Americans had not been completely transparent in accordance with the contract signed with our country about the great discovery in the Bucegi Mountains. Even if they knew that the secret tunnel in the Giza Plateau near Cairo was relatively close to the Occult Chamber, it had not been included in the common presentation by the Americans. There could have been an information error here, but I for one doubt it.

“The tunnel was discovered in 2001 by a team of American and British researchers,” Lieutenant Trujo continued his story. “I’ll skip other details and get to the part when I was directly involved. They soon realized that the tunnel wasn’t part of the ‘tourist framework’ and that it was very special. I received the order to join the small team that was supposed to research and create an inventory of the tunnel. The information security level was maximal. I entered the tunnel and I can say that the first part, where the trajectory is straight, is entirely covered in a rough material, a special alloy which we later analyzed in our labs. Actually, it turned out to be a fine film with a strange color which varied between yellow and silver.

Just as the hologram shows, I was amazed by the shape of the tunnel: triangular with the top upwards.”

THE SECRET TUNNEL, FROM THE PYRAMID OF CHEOPS TO THE OCCULT CHAMBER

“Did you find anything inside?” I asked impatiently in Spanish.

“Yes, there were several objects,” Lieutenant Trujo answered quite evasively. “Towards the end of the straight part, we found a kind of information tablet that was like a portable computer. It was actually a surprisingly light ‘metal sheet,’ a maximum of three millimeters thick; and in the lower side, it had certain areas which were slightly in relief due to different colors and geometrical shapes. It was something we might assimilate as a keyboard.”

Lieutenant Trujo now made a pause and looked seriously at the ground.

“There were many unknown signs on that tablet, like writing. It wasn’t from Earth. On the upper half, the tablet was like a mirror and I realized that it might be a small screen.”

“But what exactly was the starting point of the tunnel from the Great Pyramid?” Cezar asked.

“How did you get there? Did you follow the main gallery?”

“This is one point of view, but there are also others,” I interferred. “For example, what else did you find in the tunnel? What were the final conclusions you reached? And how did you get the approval of the Egyptian government?”

Lieutenant Trujo had an impenetrable look, postponing his answer. After a few seconds, slightly embarrassed, he answered.

“I can’t reveal certain aspects to you. I don’t even know if it was okay that I talked about this. After all, it was also a surprise for me to find out that Aiden discovered the tunnel and to understand what its real target was.

Now, things seem clearer; but back then, nobody understood the real meaning of the tunnel which changed direction because we had no further information.”

Noticing that Trujo tended to avoid the questions we asked, Cezar asked him once again to give us explanations.

“There was an agreement with the Egyptian government, but that agreement was not bilateral,” Trujo explained. “It was sort of a private intervention which determined the collaboration of Egyptian officials. Everything took place in such secrecy that not even the custodian of the Cairo Museum who supervises the whole Giza architectural complex was given access to enter the tunnel. I’m sorry, but I can’t give you any more details. What I can say is that we know for sure that the ones who constructed the tunnel under the Great Pyramid were a different civilization than the ones who constructed the Occult Chamber or the Projection Chamber. We have solid evidence to support this.”

We all then looked at Trujo with questioning eyes.

After a brief hesitation, he said in a dull voice, “Yes, they’re different; both from us and from this mysterious civilization whose representatives seemed to be giants. Those who had access to the pyramid and dug the tunnel are of reptilian type. We found the skeleton of one of them in the tunnel.”

There was an overwhelming silence in the room.

"The implications are much more complex," Trujo continued. "There was obviously, for some reason, a battle in the tunnel at a certain moment. One of the beings involved was killed and left there. The tunnel was sealed, and its entrance is hidden in a very complicated way in the structure of the pyramid. The lab dating shows, with a relatively small margin of error, the period between 8500–9000 B.C."

Even Aiden was listening with astonishment to what Lieutenant Trujo was saying. I tried to find out some more information, but I received only a polite refusal. After all, the man respected to a certain extent what his superiors had ordered. The later details and explanations surely had to be part of a series of heated discussions between the Romanian and American partners. However, things seemed to be more serious for the Americans because, paradoxically, American secret services had not taken part in such an important discovery in Egypt and the President had not been informed.

In such situations, the natural question would be: who was authorized to take action and who gave them that authorization? It would certainly be a very delicate moment for U.S. diplomacy.

After this unexpected surprise, we all focused on inventorying and loading the rest of the tablets in the special boxes which we had brought with us.

But even so, I noticed that what we managed to take was, at most, one-fifth of the total tablets in the chamber. We were pleased, however, that we accomplished our task and we all felt the need for a well-deserved rest.

This is why Cezar announced to us that we would have an eight hour break for eating and sleeping before we would go back through the tunnel to the Projection Chamber in Bucegi. Even if I felt somewhat tired, I was very happy and in a very good mood. I had grown accustomed to that mysterious place which, in a strange way, gave me a great feeling of trust and safety. But what truly made me impatient was not the moment of our return home but Cezar's long-awaited confession to me about the "time machine" from the Occult Chamber which he had access to. He had promised that he would tell me about some of his experiences and believed that the break period would be the right time. We shared the rations quickly and, to make sure we would not be disturbed, I prepared for our camping in the tunnel a few meters away from the entrance to the Occult Chamber. We ate quickly, and I was looking for reasons to hurry the two lieutenants to do the same so that they would go to sleep afterwards. Seeing my rush and interest, Cezar smiled in amusement and even made a little fun of me, asking me with a serious tone whether it might be better to rest and leave the story for later when we were back at the Alpha Base. I swallowed hard, troubled, but he started to laugh heartily, ensuring me that he was only joking and that he would tell me about some extraordinary events right away. Indeed, I have to confess that his amazing story caught me like a spell, giving me the feeling that I was living in another time and reality... ers. Chapter Five — The Secret Revealed

After we ate, Cezar and I discreetly withdrew to the Occult Chamber and sat on the pedestal of the great cylinder which included the time travel device. We chose to remain at the back of the chamber in order to keep utmost discretion. I felt that the huge ruby crystal, which was right in front of us at a small distance, was wrapping me in its subtle and enigmatic energy that came from the deepest corners of the universe.

Aiden withdrew near the storage boxes at the stationary point outside the chamber and Lieutenants Nicoară and Trujo lay in the place which was especially set up for sleep. All conditions seemed met in order for me to listen to Cezar's most amazing story, maybe the most important one he has shared with me so far. I felt, however, that my mind was stilled blocked in materialist prejudice. I was wondering how time travel was possible. I realized how weak my thoughts were, especially since I was there with the obvious proof right under my eyes as I touched it with my hands.

Energy Blocks

As if he guessed my hesitation, Cezar started talking in a very understanding way.

“Do you think that time travel is just sci-fi? Well, you’re wrong because I’ve experienced such travels with the help of this device. Or maybe you think that I’m lying to you?”

He looked at me with inquiring eyes as I blushed, but I still felt the amazing resistance of deformed rational comprehension caused by the modern education system. On the one hand, I believed; on the other hand, I doubted. And yet the aspiration to the unknown was so great that I strongly wanted to convince myself that time travel was really possible. Cezar then applied a “finishing stroke” with a massive surprise.

“Okay. You’ll soon have the chance to accomplish such time travel yourself; right here, using this installation. Of course, certain conditions must be met, but if you meet them, there will be no problems.”

I was astonished. The strong emotion I felt made me fall silent for a few moments.

“And what are these conditions?” I asked, with difficulty.

“First of all, they’re related to a certain energy state of the being and to the degree of purification of the organism. You must understand that time travel requires the activation of powerful energies even if they’re very subtle. You know very well that time itself is a special and mysterious energy which can be triggered with a certain knowledge.”

“And this ‘machine’ helps trigger time energy? One can’t accomplish this alone?”

“In some situations, an outside help can be priceless for the facilitation of the access to a clear vision, especially when so-called akashic clichés are involved. They are some kind of subtle recording of everything that has happened or will happen in the universe. Of course, aspects concerning the future have several nuances; but the past is always clear because it involves a choice which has already been made. Time travel can be accomplished by means of one’s own forces; but for this, the energy structure has to be very pure and activated at a certain level.”

I had read and researched about the subtle physiology of human beings. In Elinor’s vast library, I found many esoteric works about the theory and practice of the yoga system and other Oriental spiritual systems which described in detail the seven main subtle centers of force of the human being, the secondary centers of force, the subtle energy trajectories on which energy moves and their reciprocal interactions. For example, I understood that there is a precise correspondence between a subtle center of force, which is called a chakra in Hindu terminology, and one or several human organs. I knew that this precise correspondence is very complex and it extends equally to the psychological level, daily activity, the human mind and the soul. At the same time, I was surprised and happy that Cezar had mentioned these less known aspects which define our existence up to the smallest of details.

I remembered that, a long time ago, he explained to me that any physical action or result is in reality a materialization of an action at a subtle, superior level. Therefore, I could easily draw the conclusion that our capacities are a direct reflection of the force centers in our subtle structure.

I quickly realized that, in order to perform certain actions efficiently, my energy aura had to be powerful and purified. Cezar explained to me that everything was essentially reduced to the purification and activation of the subtle force centers of my being.

“The role of knowledge and techniques is none other than to eliminate what’s stopping the free circulation of beneficial energy in our being. A chakra which is strongly activated and purified gives you great inner strength which can be externally translated through a very powerful specific influence and superhuman powers. Of course, these powers are different from one chakra to another, but the principle on which these powers are obtained is the same: purification and very powerful activation of the subtle force centers. If this process is done with patience, competence and perseverance, it translates into the spiritual evolution of the human being whose knowledge and understanding are thereby greatly expanded.”

“That’s exactly what Dr. Xien told me,” I added. “The five Tibetan techniques from the secret parchment can lead the steady practitioner to great spiritual accomplishments which even include paranormal powers.

But, he also told me that the five techniques should only be revealed two years after I was given the parchment; and since this period has already passed, I’m thinking about publishing them. I’ve also started practicing them for some time, but I have kept it a secret as I wanted it to be a pleasant surprise for you.”

“Indeed. It is,” Cezar answered, smiling, “but you should know that I’ve already noticed some obvious energy changes in your aura. Nothing is accidental. Your destiny, your efforts of spiritual practice, your good intentions and your actions are correlated and they’re caused by a gradual energy evolution in your subtle structure, in the subtle bodies of your being.”

I was as happy as a child who was praised at school. The fact that Cezar was content made me feel happy and very confident in my actions. I was perfectly aware, however, that I was only at the beginning of my path and that there was a lot to do until I would reach a very elevated energy level of my consciousness.

During the last period of time, I was especially preoccupied with purifying my being and I was therefore very interested in Cezar's explanations. I believed that the main agent in such a process could be only the subtle energy I was supposed to channel and consciously trigger in my own subtle structure through very fine energy channels which are called nadi in special terminology. I asked Cezar to give me some more details about this and at the same time help me to understand the connection with the subtle energetic aspects that determine the paranormal power of traveling in time. Apart from science-fiction, which only treats this issue from a literary point of view, as well as the few books I knew which present time travel from a scientific point of view, the issue was not accessible to me. I wanted to know the hidden perspective, the cause that determines this extraordinary paranormal capacity. I obviously thought it was intimately linked to a certain vibrational frequency of the energy that implies the activity of one or maybe several centers of force.

"You can reach relatively quickly the stage when you feel the energy flowing through your body, just like electricity circulates through a house with electric wires," said Cezar.

"But, when the current no longer goes through the wires, we must intervene. In the analogy I made with man's subtle energy structure, this intervention can, for example, consist of the conscious direction of breath, with the mind, into certain areas of the physical body for the purpose of removing energy blocks. Even if you can sometimes ignore the cause of these blocks, the application of preventive and appropriate techniques will ensure the purification process. In order to direct energy correctly, we should all be aware of energy imbalances that we go through. It's important for you to understand that such imbalance, which is actually energy impurity, is not only manifested at the level of the physical body but also at more subtle levels like the emotional and intellectual level. After all, just like the body is fed with certain energies, the mind is also fed with specific energies. Your experiences, feelings, intentions, thoughts, and ideas all represent subtle energy which is modulated on different vibrational frequencies. The energy blocks I'm talking about are subtle impurities which also signify an energy vibration which is more rough. Then, the energy channels seem to be blocked and pure energy stops flowing freely.

If there is a clot blocking a blood vessel, blood circulation is blocked and this causes negative side effects. It's the same with the subtle impurities which I am now explaining to you. Don't forget that everything you feel, think or act is a direct consequence of a more or less pure energetic condition of your body. When they become obvious, the subtle energy imbalances are manifested at the level of the physical body as pain."

I was amazed at the complexity of these interactions but also by the ignorance which blocks our correct understanding of things and our daily perceptions. I asked Cezar whether the latter can also be influenced by energetic imbalance.

"Of course. The influence of these blockages include the entire range of our activities as human beings," he answered. "They can be related to the senses or can affect the quality of our relationships with others or with the environment. For example, some people are disturbed by low temperatures, others by high temperatures. Some can't express their feelings, others are aggressive, some are egocentric, others can't stand spices, some have rigid articulations, and others don't hear well. I think you realize that the examples are infinite. All of these types of energy imbalances reflect impurities in a certain area of the body. They're directly related to the activity of the subtle energy centers of the human being and influence it negatively. Under such conditions, how do you think a man can handle the powerful energy inputs which trigger the manifestation of paranormal powers? The impurities which accumulate in our bodies and minds determine very unpleasant effects which can be seen in us and in others: illnesses, failures, negative emotions, troubled minds, body tensions, and irregular breathing. What I'm trying to say is that, no matter the way in which these imbalances are manifested, it's the result of our past decisions.

Certain facts, actions and thoughts expressed long ago have naturally attracted certain types of energies. If those actions were evil, the corresponding energies are more rough and impure thus causing more or less serious blockages. Everything then becomes complicated and most people who find themselves in such situations are not always capable of evaluating the problem clearly. There are many ways of getting out of an uncomfortable situation and it is inevitably based upon energy blocking. It all depends on what is going on inside us, around us and on how clearly we perceive the situation.”

“Does this include spiritual techniques and exercises?” I asked, with curiosity.

“Of course. I’m not referring only to meditation. Outside help can be priceless for the facilitation of our access to a clear vision and to make us start eliminating blockages which impede the free circulation of energy in our being. This includes, of course, different spiritual methods or techniques which a person has access to because they bring vital and purifying energies, with a higher vibrational frequency, into our aura.

Beneficial energy always gives us a natural healing power. Usually, the human body mysteriously gets rid of impurities when supplied with the proper energy and without our having consciously contributed to this. This occurs, for example, during sleep. But this applies to simple cases where the impurities are not major. Sometimes obstacles block our energy and then impurities accumulate. It’s as if the sweepers went on strike and there was nobody left to remove the garbage from the streets. This is why, in order to remove the obstacles or impurities which block the natural purification process, we need to perform certain actions consciously, to find the critical points and identify the toxins. In other words, with the help of different techniques or practical exercises, we can trigger beneficial energy in order to purify our bodies. I’m talking about the universal subtle energy which is called prana.”

“I know. I understand this,” I said quickly, “but I can also see that the mind is very important in this spiritual practice. Actually, I read that there’s a strong connection between the mind and prana. I’m thinking that, if prana is endless energy and the mind can control it, we can practically obtain any effect we want and any paranormal power, including time travel.”

Cezar nodded his head in approval.

“Our state of mind is one of the essential factors which influence the intensity and manner of expression of energy which is prana. The more relaxed the mind is, the closer the physical body is to the energy body and thus less energy losses occur. Ideally, energy should be centered in the spine, but it is often dispersed due to energy blockages in our bodies.”

“Yes, and this leads to a whole series of problems: agitation, anxiety, depression or lethargy,” I added. “Fortunately, as you already know, I have at my disposal a set of five Tibetan practical exercises which seem very efficient to me. I must confess that I don’t understand their essence yet. In principle, each exercise implies a different aspect and yet I feel that there is a fundamental subtle connection between them.”

“The techniques and exercises which are especially applied in Oriental spirituality are based on simple elements such as subtle breath, subtle sound and the subtle inner fire.”

“I noticed in my reading that Tibetans especially underlined the movement of subtle inner fire.”

“Not just the Tibetans. Hindu Yoga practice also has very precise techniques in this direction. The main area of expression of the subtle inner fire is the abdominal area. From times immemorial, man has noticed that the good functioning of this part of the body leads to indestructible health and great paranormal powers. But all these are related to the powerful activation of the inner fire. For this, many ways have been conceived, some of which are secret, such as the third technique of the five written down in the Tibetan parchment that you told me about. Separately, the inner fire digests useful elements from food, eliminates the useless ones and maintains our body at a constant temperature. Impurities in our being, however, can only be eliminated by using more powerful means. It’s as if we wanted to remove the lime scale accumulated inside the pipes of our homes by using tap water. We must add to this water a chemical product which acts upon the lime scale and dissolves it. Thus, in order to purify our body, we must use a force which is capable of eliminating impurities and this force is, first and foremost, inner fire. It should, however, be combined with subtle breath so that its force and efficiency become extraordinary.

This idea is very old and it’s based upon the observation of the existence of a natural connection between inner fire and subtle breath. Even more, it has been noticed that utilizing the process of thought gives even more power to this association. For example, you can accompany your breath with a mental view of the air flow moving in a certain part of the body. Then, in the pause which follows breathing, you can greatly amplify the inner fire and its connection to the subtle breath. There are also certain specific body postures which can dynamize the inner fire even more and they can also be oriented in a certain direction.”

“Do you mean that if I sit in one of those positions, I can lead the subtle fire where I wish?” I asked with amazement.

Smiling, Cezar explained.

“No, that would be too easy and handy. Placing your body in a certain position is not enough to make the energy of the subtle inner fire reach the area you point out just as the simple placement of some sticks or matches doesn’t automatically light a fire. Here, thinking must intervene and attention must be directed in such a way so as to determine the wanted transformations.

“You can now see how important the purification of the physical and subtle structure is. In the particular case of time travel, it’s even more necessary.

First of all, it gives you the ability to move great energies through your body; and secondly, it helps you perceive with great clarity the akashic clichés. Actually, ‘time travel’ is the access to universal akashic clichés at the level of the conscious mind.”

Akashic Clichés

“I must tell you that the aspects related to this kind of ‘travel’ with the consciousness are not very clear to me,” I told Cezar. “Do you mean that I should accumulate a certain quantity of energy in my body in order to travel in time?”

“It’s rather necessary for you to tune in to a certain energetic vibrational frequency of the force center which is located at the base of the neck. A certain energetic impulse, however, is also necessary. This subtle force center must be very well and harmoniously activated.”

Cezar stopped his explanations for a while because Aiden had gotten up and come to the entrance of the chamber. At first, I thought that the young man wanted to tell us something but then I saw him carefully shut down his computer and lay down to sleep near our other two colleagues. I took advantage of this short pause to take a better seat on the pedestal. Even though I felt a bit tired, my interest was awakened and I wanted to find out the mystery of Cezar's time travels.

"This subtle force center is very special," he explained. "If it's activated well enough, it allows you to immediately access information from the collective subconscious which you normally have no knowledge of. This is why the subtle force center at the level of the neck is associated with intuition which is a special kind of knowledge that is way beyond the usual rational method. Intuitive knowledge is very important and needs to be learned. It is direct and multidimensional. It comes from the area above the mind and doesn't need successive stages of assimilation of what is learned."

"I'm afraid I don't really understand this," I said shyly.

"I'll give you a very clear example. Few people know that each book which is written and then published has a subtle projection in the invisible levels. This is why it's not necessary to read a book but simply to have telepathic access to its subtle representation and thus accumulate the information in that book almost instantaneously."

"Okay, but I think this is a special paranormal ability," I said.

"It's true. You no longer have to read a book from cover to cover. You can access the information in that book directly, telepathically and intuitively in the subtle levels of creation. However, we can also talk about other levels of activation of this subtle force center that are a bit lower level. For example, those gifted in this respect can sometimes open a book directly to the page which contains the most important information. This is not an accident. It is related to certain systems of inner synchronization which connect their consciousness to the information in that book. Each subtle center of force also reveals mysteries which can get the human being in touch with colossal energies of the universe."

I suddenly remembered Octavian, Cezar's colleague from the time when he was training at the secret base in B... That boy had the strange ability to foresee the future to an extent of more than twenty hours.

"It's true. Octavian is a good example to illustrate the powerful activation of the force center at the level of the neck. This shows that he already had the ability to travel in time with his conscious mind. Of course, the boy didn't master that ability well because he didn't have the same ability to travel into the past. Furthermore, the extent of his time travel was relatively narrow, but he is a good example for our conversation."

"Do you know anything about him?" I asked, with curiosity. "I imagine that such a person might be used for unorthodox purposes."

"Unfortunately, he died more than ten years ago. After I became in charge of Department Zero, I read his file from the archive. They tried everything to save him, but tuberculosis eventually killed him."

We were silent for a few moments. I then asked Cezar a question.

"Okay, then why can't I see the future or travel in time when I wish? After all, we can all access universal prana."

"It's true, but don't forget that energy must first of all be accumulated in an appropriate way before being tuned in to certain elevated vibrational frequencies; and only then can it be used to perform specific actions, including paranormal ones. For example, if I want to expand at a subtle level in the astral world, I must then have that specific energy at the level of my astral body. This energy is accumulated through a specific force center.

If that chakra is not activated well enough to allow me to expand immediately, I will then try in vain because I will not succeed. I will not even dilate that chakra to ten centimeters. The same applies for the mental level. This is why I'm telling you that, for normal persons, such actions are impossible. It's because their subtle force centers are not sufficiently energized and they believe that they are as they are: pathetic, dramatic and weak, like everybody else. The reality, however, is completely different and only will, perseverance in knowledge, and spiritual evolution can change that state."

I felt a kind of weight upon my shoulders. I was thinking that I still had a long way to go until I would have an active, pure and efficient subtle structure. The activation of the seven force centers appeared complex and intertwined to me. I was starting to understand that the technology which facilitated time travel actually gave me the necessary specific energy which was modulated on the elevated frequency of time clichés, the so-called akashic clichés. But, even in this case, certain conditions had to be met without which the process couldn't take place. I intuitively understood that there had to be a certain interaction between the person who started that time travel process and the subtle energy to which he or she connected to by means of that installation. Cezar explained that this interaction could be understood as a certain kind of selection.

"It's like a tuning between the energy and conscious level of the person who wants to travel in time and this installation. It is actually esoteric to the highest degree," he said. "It's not just a highly advanced technology — it's at the same time an access to the invisible universe of cosmic forces which are huge. This showed us that the respective civilization also has a high level of spiritual knowledge and understanding because they managed to combine technology and the capacities of the individual consciousness in such a fortunate manner. This is very difficult to accomplish."

I was still hoping to get a chance to check for myself the efficiency of the "time travel machine."

"Do you think that problems might occur for those who are not yet ready and still connect to this machine?" I asked, doubtfully.

"Such problems might occur if the energy is not proportionally split, but now I know how to use this extraordinary device because I've done tens, maybe even hundreds, of travels in time with its help. If the energy tuning is accomplished, the process begins; but it is not obligatory to accomplish a leap in time as well. What I mean is that it depends a lot on the ability of the person who attempts to travel in time to focus his or her mind and it depends on how that person is able to project his or her consciousness where he/she wishes at the level of time clichés. Nothing is done automatically. It is a continuous correlation between the human consciousness and this machine. For example, if the mind is confused and can't firmly isolate the period of time when the person wishes to travel, then the leap in time is not accomplished and it is even possible that the respective person has unpleasant sensations such as migraines or eye pain.

In some cases, that person feels an acute sensation of nausea or heart palpitation. The science team has done many experiments and has studied this process on several subjects using the interface which was created and connected to the giant device in the Projection Chamber. I want you to therefore understand that you need a certain harmony of being as well as an inner balance and certain energy characteristics in order to support this process.”

“As far as I can tell, I believe the energy source is this crystal,” I said, pointing at the huge and perfectly carved quartz.

Cezar answered affirmatively, mentioning that the connections were probably located under the stone slabs of the floor, especially since the crystal was encrusted into the floor.

“We don’t know yet what fuels the device in the Projection Chamber with energy. It’s very probable that there’s another level under the one where we got to, but for the time being, it was impossible for us to find out how to enter that level. Probably one or more huge crystals are located there or maybe there is another source of energy that is unknown to us. Actually, from a technological point of view, this device only creates an energetic bridge between the person who activates it and the crystal. But, it is precisely this step which is extremely difficult to accomplish because it’s a kind of biotechnology, a complex combination of amorphous and living.

We are so far from understanding those connections that the group of scientists who have studied this aspect have directed their interests to other aspects and have abandoned this area. They said that the difference between what we know and understand and what the ancient builders accomplished is so great that, for the time being, there is no viable starting point for research. They simply can’t understand the nature of this ‘time travel machine,’ especially since none of the elements used in the construction of the main parts are from Earth, except for thallium and strontium which were identified in small quantities.”

“But the ‘machine’ gives the real possibility to travel in time, doesn’t it?”

“Of course. Do you have any doubt?” Cezar answered, laughing. “Just like in a file archive, you have access based upon an index to any file you want and can find it easily. It’s the same with time travel with the help of this device. Of course, only if you manage to accomplish the state of harmony I was telling you about.”

I breathed deeply. Now I understood most of the subject clearly, but I was very curious to find out what the actual transfer in time felt like, what the sensations were, and what could he do during those moments. From other conversations I had with Cezar, I knew that time travel simultaneously involved a faithful rendition of perceptions of the five senses as if you had lived, moved and acted during that period of time.

“These aspects are important and should be understood correctly,” Cezar started to explain, “because there’s a notable difference between time travel with the physical body and time travel with the consciousness. In the first case, the energy which must be triggered in order to accomplish the transfer is considerably higher and, in order to accomplish this — apart from the subtle center of force at the level of the neck — a second center of force is used which lies in the umbilical area. But even then, a certain type of energy from our being must be triggered which is extremely powerful and perfectly correlated with the degree of awakening of our consciousness.

Science is way too far from understanding these occult aspects and even more from seizing or receiving them. The manifestation of this gigantic energy, the essence of which is in the base area of our body, can at most be observed indirectly through certain exterior signs. As I said, however, its action in our own being is perceived infinitely more at the level of the consciousness which is still an uncertain and very special object of work for researchers.

“This gigantic cosmic force actually represents a fundamental element of our own spiritual evolution. Moreover, most paranormal powers are manifested as a consequence of its more or less pronounced awakening in our body. The action of this colossal energy is so complex that it contains all areas of manifestation of the human being, starting from the physical one and going up to cosmic consciousness and God the Father. But, you must understand that it acts just like a sleeping man. In the beginning, he dreams and is not even conscious of his physical body or of his existence in the physical world. When he wakes up, he opens his eyes but sees unclearly and his perception is confused. Slowly, he starts to get used to the environment and his conscious mind becomes more active. He stretches his arms and legs while the objects around become more and more clear.

Finally, he stands up and is perfectly awake and ready for action. I gave you this example so that you could at least approximately understand the way in which this colossal energy, which exists in all of us, tends to manifest. Now, assuming you accomplished the time projection with your physical body, the limitations which are inherent here in your present condition would also be found in the future or past space-time reality where you travel. From certain points of view, I could say that it's even more difficult. There are certain actions in which you mustn't interfere because the continuity of the past reality would be disturbed and things would get complicated. You must remain incognito and also be able to return to your own time. Usually, time projections of this kind which involve the physical body are only done for precise missions and by spiritually evolved beings. However, the physical access to the past or future is also possible from a technological point of view for other persons, but then other kinds of barriers occur and I will not insist upon them now. Anyway, 'competent' scientific speculations that time travel is not possible only seem to have a theoretical basis as they are completely exceeded by reality. The so-called 'paradoxes' and 'impossibilities' are not major impediments in the case of time projections done with the physical body. However, it's truly about the so called 'spiritual common sense' which involves respecting certain universal laws. Their greatness of subtlety exceeds by far the laws of the physical world and this is why contemporary scientists can't understand them correctly. Time is an energy that can be 'conquered' with great difficulty, but it can be correctly understood and assimilated so that we have unlimited access to its mysteries."

"Then this means that the projection of the consciousness in time is a bit easier and safer," I estimated.

"Of course, and I can even say it's richer in perception than the first option."

"How is this possible?" I said doubtfully. "I thought that physical presence gives greater precision and better anchoring in the investigated period of time."

"You're wrong," Cezar contradicted me. "The projection of the consciousness into a certain period of history allows you to have a more nuanced idea of the state of things in that time reality. Due to the precise focus of the thought in consonance with the specific energy of the force center at the level of the neck, the mind is 'transported' into a sequence of future or past time which it 'feels' and integrates exactly as if you lived there and then and were part of that reality."

“And all this happens instantaneously?” I asked, amazed.

“Sometimes there are certain periods of transition or clocking; but if the mind is prepared, then time travel is practically instantaneous. You already know that the energy of thoughts, which has extraordinary power, can travel infinite distances in the blink of an eye. For man’s physical structure, these distances seem impossible to travel, but for the mental body they can be easily overcome. For example, you can visit the farthest galaxies of the cosmos in a few fractions of a second; but this involves having full confidence in yourself and in your mental abilities in order to know how to act and then to apply this knowledge. This way, you can go wherever you want.”

“Why did you say that I must have so much confidence in myself,” I asked, confused.

“Because, generally speaking, this is an essential aspect of life which should become a habit for every moment. In particular, man can travel instantaneously with the mental body; but in order to do so, he must have full confidence in the quality of the mind of being able to travel in the blink of an eye to anywhere where thoughts direct it. If confidence is complete, the projection is then instantaneous. But some people are more ‘sophisticated’ and argue, based on confidence and imagining, that it’s an auxiliary object. Actually, confidence is part of the process of mental projection and, in reality, of any process of creation. For example, once the thought is powerfully focused on a period of time in history where one wishes to project, the energy is modulated to give access to precisely the akashic clichés which are the object of interest.”

“And then I feel everything as if I lived during that period of time,” I said, repeating what I had learned in order to understand it better.

Actually, I wanted Cezar to give me more details about this aspect and especially to tell me about some of the time travels he had done.

“Of course. In essence, akashic clichés are subtle ‘recordings’ on a sensitive ‘support’ which is called akasha in Oriental spirituality. This would be translated as ‘ether’ in the sense of a subtle endless space. In it, everything which is related to the five levels of universal manifestation is ‘recorded.’ For the human being, these levels represent perception through the five human senses: smell, taste, sight, touch and hearing. Logically speaking, you understand that if all aspects are ‘recorded’ in this subtle dimension called akasha, they can later be invoked through the force center at the level of the neck. If you want to see, feel or taste a certain aspect from hundreds, thousands, or even tens of thousands of years, from this planet or from a planet from another constellation, then you can, by activating this chakra, gain immediate access to the respective subtle recordings and realize what happened then. In the beginning, the time projection can be incomplete. This is why it is possible that you access only one or two of the five sensory aspects from the akashic recording, but eventually you can gain perfect control of the five ‘tapes’ of perceptive information of the akashic clichés.

While I was listening to these explanations, I connected them to several situations of my life when I clearly felt the sensory manifestation of perceptions about the historical sites I had visited. I like these places very much: the ruins, archeological sites and everything which is related to history. I used to visit such places when I had the chance and most of the times I felt a sort of energy wrapping me from all sides and giving me a special feeling. I shared those impressions with Cezar and he confirmed that they were related to an incipient access of those akashic clichés.

“The special experiences you had are related precisely to the akashic experiences of that place when it was ‘active.’ Depending on the degree of energizing of the subtle force center at the level of the neck, you can more or less precisely re-live those times. If this chakra is strongly activated, you can even see those places again, exactly as they were hundreds or thousands of years ago, animated with people, streets, situations, and ways of thinking. In this case, you will have accomplished a true time translation.”

“And this installation helps to accomplish a perfect projection in time?” I asked, looking at the cylinder behind me and already feeling the thrill of impatience to try it for myself.

“No, it is only consciousness that can be projected with the help of this installation, but it almost immediately accesses any period of time you want to and it also allows you to ‘switch’ between time zones until you find or find out what you really want. Then, you are like a moving presence in a time zone and the perceptions are extremely complex and intuitive. There is much information which you can gain immediate access to and which comes simultaneously, in a multidimensional manner, if you understand what I mean.”

I didn’t really understand, but I was hoping with all my heart to understand soon through personal experience. My feelings, however, were mixed. I was troubled at the thought that I would not be able to concentrate enough to trigger the process of translation; and I couldn’t be sure that my physical and subtle structure would handle the energy input from the installation. But, for that moment, I wanted to find out the answer to a question which I couldn’t stop thinking of.

“In my opinion,” I said, “the volume of akashic ‘recordings’ tends to be infinite because the number of possible events is also practically infinite. This means that these ‘recordings’ can only fit into a universe which must also be infinite. I don’t want to look like a philosopher, but now seems the right time for me to understand this intriguing aspect.”

Cezar nodded his head in approval and spoke.

“From this point of view, things are not too complicated. Just think that God is infinite and, if His creation was also infinite, then paradoxes and conception inconveniences would occur. This is why the correct answer is that the universes created by God are finite. The physical universe is finite; the astral universe is finite, even though it is huge in comparison with the physical one; and the causal universe is also finite, even though it is immense in comparison with the astral universe. For example, if you were a drop of water in the Atlantic Ocean, you could say that the whole ocean is billions of times greater in comparison with you. It is virtually infinite, but we know very well, however, that it is actually limited. Based on this analogy, we can say that the three universes of creation are finite even if, for our possibilities of mind perception, they appear to be infinite. The three fundamental universes, however, are included in the total sphere, namely God the Father, and only this sphere is truly infinite, absolute and unlimited.”

“In this case,” I added, “our universe seems to be the smallest. It’s almost unbelievable that, if you think of this ‘smallness’ referred to by scientists, it stretches beyond fifteen billion light years.”

“Yes, it’s immense,” Cezar admitted, “and yet, in spite of its size, which seems gigantic to us, Oriental spirituality somehow comprehends the physical universe as a residue within a bigger sphere. It seems so small and insignificant in comparison with God’s consciousness that it can be compared to a bit of dust thrown somewhere in the atmosphere. This atmosphere would correspond to the astral universe and the causal universe would be the space surrounding this planet. All these universes are contained in the divine universe which is infinite.”

I felt my entire being thrilled at the idea of this endless greatness. I then spoke with emotion.

“I am thinking that, in the case of the infinite divine consciousness, we can no longer talk about time travel.”

Before answering, Cezar made a short pause, changing his inner state. When he answered, his voice was low and he spoke at a slow pace.

“In this case, you can experience the revelation of eternity which doesn’t involve time. Then you exceed normal time integration in which we experience time as present, relate to the past and head for the future. In such a special experience, a state of ‘stillness’ occurs and time seems to stand still. Actually, in such moments, you experience the revelation of the truly divine dimension of what is called eternity. And because it is beyond time, those who have experienced such a divine state have understood, beyond words, that God is eternal and that eternity is God’s essence. I could tell you that this experience is sublime and the divine experience you go through is truly exceptional. I can hardly find words to describe this state. The dilation of the consciousness is then unimaginable and you are only surrounded by divine light.”

The Revelation

Some moments of silence followed. Cezar’s force of evoking that reality was so impressive that I felt a sensation of sacredness and purity which moved me deeply. This special and highly spiritual dimension of his experiences were rarely present in his stories. This was undoubtedly due to his extraordinary modesty. Eventually, I dared to go back to our initial discussion and spoke to him shyly.

“Which time projection has impressed you the most?”

I saw him remain still, slightly supporting himself against the pedestal on which I sat and with a look that showed a sublime inner experience.

“It was my first attempt to use the ‘time travel machine’ in the last days I spent here during the first expedition. Three us remained behind because we were split into working groups and the others had gone back through the tunnel on consecutive days. This method was the result of observations made during the journey we made to get here. We reached the conclusion that the most efficient way to travel was in teams of three or four people.”

I knew these details from what Cezar had told me about some elements of his expeditions more than a year before, but he barely mentioned his time travel experiences or anything about the immediate future of Mankind.

“Most human beings are so torn from the complex reality of the universe that they fail to get used to a sensitive subject like time travel. They imagine, due to the false scientific education they received, that time projection is impossible or, in the best case, very difficult to accomplish. If we analyze the situation better, we understand that this strange attitude towards the subject of real time travel is not just the result of ignorance or a lack of open minds but also a reflex action of protection against what might be discovered by finding out the historical truth. And here, I must tell you that great problems might occur. These problems would be so important and would practically cover all of man’s areas of activity that they might ravage the entirety of life on this planet. There are many unbelievable lies which have concealed essential truths throughout history. Some of them are very serious.”

“I saw some aspects of this kind in the holographic projections in Bucegi,” I said as I also knew a bit about this.

“Some events that took place and which I had the chance to observe and feel in detail are so touching that they later created a deep feeling of sadness because they were mystified or misinterpreted for a long time in order to serve completely different interests. For each of my time travels, there is a written report which can only be seen by the President (of Romania), General Obadea, an upper representative of the clergy, and a special commission of four scientists under very strict control. The Americans, who have built the interface for adapting and connecting to the huge installation in the Projection Chamber, also have unlimited access to this information and train their own subjects to perform time travels.”

“I suppose the schedule is quite full,” I said, quite amazed. “If the time correspondence with our reality is kept, I don’t think there is enough time to follow many events, especially if they develop during a longer period of time.”

“I realize that your idea about time projections is somewhat mechanical. I repeat that, in such cases, perceptions are simultaneous and knowing the specific aspects of that period is intuitive. It gives an overview. Besides, I’ve already told you that there is the possibility to ‘swing’ between akashic clichés. Here, the help of this installation is essential because it was conceived so that it can easily accomplish this ‘swing’ provided that the mind stays focused on that period in time. The necessary subtle energy is modulated by thought through the great crystal. It’s enough to wish to go forwards or backwards in that time segment, and this is done automatically if the mind stays focused. If I were to express myself freely, the process looks like a kind of ‘fast forward or backward’ through the akashic clichés during a chosen period of time; but, of course, things only seem to be like this. In reality, it’s even easier.”

“But, what has impressed you so much about that first projection in time with the help of this installation,” I asked, with curiosity.

Cezar signaled me to come near the cylinder.

“Before I connected to the crystal sensors, I wasn’t sure what the purpose of this device was. I decided to try the installation myself and I therefore connected to it like this.”

After he said so, Cezar showed me the upper side of the cylinder which contained a wide metal band with a few crystals encrusted here and there. From that band another thin metal band descended vertically. It was made of the same material but was thicker than the one corresponding to the forehead. It entered the stone floor and small colored crystals were encrusted into it at regular intervals. Cezar explained that, in order to accomplish the projection in time, the back and the spine had to be stuck to that metal band.

“It’s very flexible but at the same time firm when pressed. The installation looks very simple, but the true technology is the structure of the metal which the band is made of and in the specific vibrational frequencies of the crystals. But, I’m absolutely certain that there are other fine aspects which we can’t understand or observe yet. The installation in the Projection Chamber is more complicated, but now I know that it has the same purpose.”

At Cezar’s sign, I sat on the small platform inside the cylinder until my head was under the wide band encrusted with crystals. I saw that it could be inclined with the arm which fixed it in the semi-transparent material of the cylinder. That metal undoubtedly had extraordinary properties because it could be very flexible and also very rigid. As Cezar told me, it all depended on the force with which the hand pressed it.

“It’s an ‘intelligent’ metal and we are still far from uncovering all of its mysteries,” he said. “The interaction with the human aura is amazing.”

Indeed, even if the metal band with crystals didn’t touch my forehead and my back was not placed against the other metal band, I still felt a clear, inexplicable and continuous thrill in my body from head to toe. I contained my emotions as much as I could and asked Cezar to keep telling me about it.

“I understood quite fast the logic of the positions of the crystals and that the way the ‘machine’ worked was not at all complicated once you were connected to it. I realized that the important aspect was the force of localization of the mind. After I sat in the position you have now and intuitively connected to the installation, I remained for some time in a state of complete relaxation in order to understand the nature of the inner energy activation. I then realized that the installation targeted the chakra at the level of the neck and started to feel the first strange impulses of change in the surrounding reality. It was as if I had the tendency to ‘slip’ and then come back to being aware of my position and physical integration in this underground chamber. I started to see random images from my childhood when I was at the base in B.... I was somewhat amazed, but I quickly understood that these were reflex pulses of my subconscious amplified by the deep state of physical and mental relaxation I was in. What gave me the answer regarding the purpose of the installation was the fact that I was there again during those times of my life and could see myself and act as if I was present there with my body and soul up to the smallest detail. It was as if I had suddenly entered a room where that part of my life was put into a stage completely different from what I lived in the present. When I manifested my will, I came back to the present and was perfectly aware of my body in this room. Of course, I was perfectly aware of my identity and my purpose during the time projection as well. I knew very well where I belonged in space and time; but at the same time, I felt everything around me and felt that period in the past as if I was living it right then.”

I was fascinated by what he said.

“This is when you realized that this is the true purpose of the ‘machine,’ isn’t it?”

“Yes, I realized this device can easily project me in time. I immediately knew that I could access a huge amount of true knowledge of the history. Of course, I immediately realized the formidable potential that might come with observing the future. But this side of knowledge is very sensitive and can cause much trouble if utmost secrecy is not kept.”

I knew that aspect was probably the most sensitive as Cezar had told me after his return from the first expedition. Then, like now, he asked me not to reveal anything about what he saw in the future. He confirmed that he had made many projections into this dimension, from those relatively close to those very far away, and that the destiny of Mankind, especially in the next couple of years, will truly be troubling. In particular, he told me about some of the most important aspects that will mark the development of future events, but he very much insisted that I was not to reveal anything about this. I can, however, note that the dramatic events will combine in an amazing way with events of such a surprising nature that many people will not be able to face them properly. Cezar specified that the interdiction to publish these aspects is mainly based on psychological reasons although many tend to ridicule this problem. He told me that, at the level of the subconscious, the human being is profoundly determined by certain information, especially if it is puzzling in nature, and this might influence their free will. The choices of human beings must occur naturally, from their own relation and understanding of things and without so-called ‘prophetic’ influences which, in some cases, can even lead to mass psychosis. Furthermore, the perception is very different from one person to another. What impresses one person can be a mockery for another. Cezar specified that, unfortunately, most of Mankind’s immediate destiny is determined by our lack of unity and by an incredible opaqueness in the perception of what is good, positive and worthy.

“Most of the time, this attitude degenerates into an endless stupidity,” he explained. “The ones who are in error, dogmatic and aberrant in their opinions, who mock many aspects of common sense or of a profoundly spiritual nature which could transform many things into good, don’t even open dialogue. In a way, they imagine that they are alone and the only ones who can do anything. In reality, they can’t do anything from a practical point of view, but they still pretend to be the only ones who know the truth.”

Puzzled by this ungrateful situation, I asked Cezar, “Okay, but why don’t all forces unite to change the balance from evil to good?”

“Don’t forget that evil can never be united with good. It’s always been this way. The evil will run from the good and this is why the unity you were talking about cannot be accomplished. You can only accomplish the union between good and good because people who are beneficially oriented ‘speak the same language.’ The union can only truly be accomplished between those persons who have affinities such that they are mentally, emotionally and spiritually close to each other. For example, you can’t have a friend who is very evil if you are very good because that friendship can’t last. Where there’s no affinity, there can be no unity, brotherhood or sympathy.”

I thought bitterly about the profoundly mistaken way in which many persons in our country act, wishing for division instead of unity. I shared my feelings with Cezar.

“Division is an essential element when separation is wanted. The principle ‘divide and conquer’ is unfortunately still in fashion in our country. This system of division, treachery and fooling is often practiced. Almost none of the factors of responsibility still have integrity and this is why a climate of insecurity was created in which people, instead of thinking of good, think how to do evil. Acting this way, they cannot be united with the others because unity implies a certain sympathy and openness in the desire to do good together. This is why I’m telling you that people must understand for themselves, on a profound and spiritual basis, the extraordinary force of unity and positive action. Then, the balance of destiny can be inclined towards the good. Otherwise, it will involve a deep suffering.”

After these clarifications, I realized that I understood why things must be said at the right time and some things mustn’t be said at all. People are very sensitive to certain thought forms, especially with the current decadent orientation. These might be interpreted in an unfortunate manner and then greatly amplified, thus generating more harm than good.

The First Projection

“Unlike the future, the past is very clear and, with few exceptions, cannot be changed,” Cezar continued.

“So, after I understood the nature of the device and guessed its principle of functioning, I suddenly felt a live urge to project into the past, two thousand years ago, in order to witness the life of Jesus. It was a very powerful inner impulse, probably dictated to a great extent by the Christian influence of the collective subconscious to which the troubling images I saw many times in the Projection Chamber contributed. I am talking about the images of His crucifixion.”

I trembled at the thought that somebody had actually seen Jesus’s life or moments of His life, not only in holographic images but actually as part of the environment of events from long ago.

“It wasn’t really easy,” Cezar continued while his attitude turned serious and even a bit sad. “That time zone is very special. I returned to that period several times during two years, but the first projection was the most special. Once I focused my mind on that period, I felt a very powerful energy input in my spine and understood that the action of the crystal had been triggered. The passing was very sudden and I noticed it first of all due to the live colors and sounds I perceived in the landscape surrounding me.

"I was on a hill, near a path which was obviously not frequently used. Actually, there were many such paths crossing, but they could hardly be distinguished because of the poor and sun-burnt vegetation. The soil was clay-like and reddish with a lot of gravel. There were no trees, only clusters of bushes here and there. It's interesting that in such projections, everything is perceived somehow from above, as if you stood on a podium which is several meters high. Sometimes the perception comes closer to the ground and several times I was between men, seeing and hearing them talk and observing their behavior. But, in general, you are like an invisible and mysterious presence which 'witnesses' the events from a height of three or maybe four meters. The travel is done instantaneously by simply manifesting your will. A bit farther on my left, after a hillock, I saw a few people sitting on a large cloth and involved, very preoccupied. I wanted to be there and I was immediately above them.

"In other circumstances, I saw that I could move even slower as if I flew over the landscape. It all depended on my thoughts and on my power to focus them. If the participation was not intense, there was the tendency to slip out of that akashic cliché. The atmosphere seemed to become dark and lost a lot of the brightness as the environment became somewhat diffused until it completely disappeared. My consciousness came back to the present time, but this return felt more like a 'tearing' from the time zone which was accessed. In general, when returning to the present, you feel that you're closer to yourself, but I am especially referring to the objects around you and the personal memories of your existence.

"I am telling you this because, when I came near that group of people, I clearly 'lived' that sensation of losing focus. You'll have the chance to see that sensations are somehow different than those of daily life. Perceptions are wider and simultaneous. For example, even from the first moments of the projection, I felt the 'atmosphere' of the place. I knew very well where I was and in what period of time; and especially, I emphatically knew who some of the people I saw were. Time projections aren't random, and they always lead you to the place in space and time which is nearest to the intention of your thought. This observation refers both to people and places. When you follow the events, it's like a process of knowledge which looks like being present in those times or places and taking part in those actions or events. The sensations are live and clear, but at the same time you feel that you are not involved in what you perceive. In order to give you a better image of these things, I'll tell you that they happen in about the same way as if you were in a cinema and saw a movie you like very much. However, the time projection is much more than that. You feel more than a simple spectator no matter how attracted that spectator is to the movie. You can perceive the nuances of people's souls, you can see the results of their intrigues, and all of this is, I repeat, a kind of global perception you live every second. Of course, this knowledge can sometimes be partial or even vague. You might not see the clichés or hear all of the sounds. It's possible that you won't understand the source of certain events or are simply confronted with time blockages when you can't access certain akashic clichés. However, this 'time travel machine' helps a lot with the almost perfect perception of the akashic clichés."

"Have you ever been confronted with such situations?" I asked.

"Of course, many times. The first time when I understood what a time blockage was occurred during the projection I'm telling you about. First, there's that sensation of a darkening of the time cliché; then everything disappears suddenly and only a perfectly black background remains. Then, the consciousness comes back to the present. Anytime you try to access that time zone, you'll hit the same barrier which seems impossible to overcome."

"It's similar to the situation of the data you wanted to obtain concerning the builders of this tunnel," I said.

"Exactly. Their knowledge is so advanced that they could block, in a mysterious way, the access to that information of the akashic clichés. The greater problem is: why did they bother to do this? It's an important aspect which has unfortunately remained a mystery so far."

I felt warmer and warmer sitting on the platform of the installation. Even if I wasn't connected to it, I seemed surrounded by an unseen penetrating force. I had the feeling that my neck was swallowing and felt a strange weakness in my feet. Getting up from that place and sitting on the pedestal,

I asked Cezar to go on telling me about his amazing experience during that time travel.

The Time Lesson

“It was a group of about fifteen people who were talking about a very important subject; however, one of them seemed to have an unquestionable authority because he spoke more often than all of the others and they listened to him with great concentration. Through a kind of intuitive empathy, I knew that was Jesus. This knowledge occurs spontaneously, as if it were natural. But, what is more amazing is that I could understand what they said and the idea of the phrases they uttered — as if it were a telepathic transmission — but not necessarily the words. When I realized this, I was very happy because I had direct access to Jesus’s words and to His real teachings for his followers. Many of these teachings were hidden for a long time or changed according to certain interests which had nothing to do with spirituality.”

“I’ve also done some research about this because I was curious to know more about some unorthodox opinions about those times,” I said. “In Elinor’s library, I found some pertinent works which are strictly based on some scrolls containing Christian texts which are considered apocryphal by the Church. I have to tell you that, in spite of my initial reservations, I had to notice the correctness of the analysis and scientific observations made. I’ve reached the conclusion that some facts and pieces of evidence from that period of time should by no means be ignored.”

“And I can assure you that you’re right because I followed several of the events that took place during those times as a subtle witness,” said Cezar.

“It’s completely different than reading the texts that describe those times and the canonical Gospels only cover a small part of what happened. The feeling I had was overwhelming and often dramatic. I’m telling you with complete honesty that I’ve never felt such an emotional load. Everything vibrated in the air and was full of a feeling of a happiness which is completely different from that of the physical worlds. People seemed to experience a new dimension of their existence. They were in a kind of ‘drunken’ state of mind. Many of Christ’s followers, I can tell you now in anticipation, were so transfigured and interiorized that I often saw them cry without reason; but at the same time, smiling in happiness. It was utterly amazing. That state was also transmitted to me and was greatly amplified in Jesus's presence. The crowds that followed him were not large because the population was also reduced; but when they listened to Him, those persons were completely transposed to a state of emotion and love that I've rarely met. I also had the impression that, in those times, the area seemed utterly purified and somehow 'raised' from a subtle point of view. It's very difficult to express in words, but the general idea is that something truly divine was happening there. And those people, even if they were of a modest social condition, experienced truly sublime moments. I noticed several times that they were also amazed by the frenzy of their inner state and were wondering if others felt the same way. I also saw persons with higher social ranks whose material wealth could be seen by the clothes they were wearing and by the servants accompanying them. Usually, these persons stayed a bit more withdrawn, but they also experienced a deep piousness; and in those moments, gave up pride or disdain. Silent and interiorized, they listened to Jesus with a look full of nostalgia and even an inner regret. An inner spiritual transformation probably took place in some of those persons so that their lives changed."

"But how did Jesus talk to the people?" I asked emotionally as a result of what I heard. "How did He behave? Was He in the middle of the crowd?"

"I saw Him speaking in the crowd, but He usually preferred to stay in front of the people and to see everybody, especially when there were many persons present. The impression was overwhelming. I've never seen anything similar. What the Bible relates is only a pale image of the way He manifested. As far as I know, His attitude was never described nor was the phenomenal radiation He spread over people. Of course, these are subtle aspects of nuances, and it's clear that the accent was placed on the succession of facts which was also synthesized; but I can tell you that those moments were truly impressive.

"As a person, Jesus wasn't tall. I don't think He was higher than 1.70 meters and this is why, many times, He wasn't visible in the crowd. You've also had the chance to convince yourself about this when you saw the holographic recordings in the Projection Chamber. Like all other modest people, He wore a very long shirt down to His ankles, made of a rather rough cloth. It was open up to the chest and sometimes it was tied around the waist with a girdle made of the same material. The sleeves were very large and a bit above the wrists. Underneath, He sometimes wore another shirt which was thinner and white, but He often gave it up. I saw His bare chest and His dark brown hair falling over His shoulders and skin. I was amazed to see that He wore a beard, but almost all men wore beards during those times. From some time projections I made during the same period of time, however, I noticed that His beard had different sizes and I understood that, from time to time, He shaved."

"Yes, I've also noticed that He didn't really look like the representations of Christ from our churches," I said, indirectly referring to the holographic projections I saw two years before.

"There's practically no similarity of physiognomy between the statues or icons of Christ and the reality. I couldn't identify any similarity except that His body wasn't very vigorous but rather thin. If I had taken as a sole point of reference the icons of Christ I have seen, I wouldn't have been able to identify Him between the other people because His characteristics were different than the ones displayed in icons. For example, His nose was wider towards the nostrils. You could immediately notice the high forehead and the well shaped eyebrows. But, most impressive were His eyes. I can say that they were the extraordinary magnet of His being for everyone who came closer to talk to Him. He had such a deep look and such a lively expression in His eyes that, almost with no exceptions, those who got in front of Him to talk to Him were so emotionally moved that they often started to cry with no apparent reason. In such cases, however, I noticed that He didn't make them stand up from where they lowered themselves to cry but waited patiently and seriously for them to recover. And when they got up, He radiated such goodness that very few said anything else. Most of them left with a look of happiness and contentment that exceeded by far any other problems.

"He spoke rarely but in a very condensed fashion that was full of substance. I perceived the meaning of His words intuitively as if I were among the others who knew the language, and I truly heard some of the parables in the Gospels. But, they were not told with the same continuity which is presented in the texts because He was often asked questions while He spoke and there was a general bustle around Him. Many people came and went.

There were many small children and domestic animals around because many of those who accompanied Him for longer periods of time also took their goats or sheep with them. In the beginning, there was a certain to and fro movement around, but I noticed that, as time passed, those around Him who were close to Him started to organize better. It's true that they did this in a somewhat rudimentary manner, but there was more order.

"Between others, I witnessed the parable of the sower. Actually, Jesus spoke more about it and even in two stages. Do you want me to tell you by what circumstances He was inspired to tell this parable?"

I nodded my head quickly and was all ears.

"A woman, who I suppose was noble, had come to Him. She complained that one of her sons, taking advantage of his status at the royal court, did many evil deeds and the poor woman suffered because of this almost all the time. Only her daughter helped her and stayed beside her, but she wasn't a believer. The woman couldn't understand where she did wrong because she regularly visited the temple, brought sacrifices and prayed for her sons, but they led very disordered lives. I saw Jesus look at that woman silently for a long time. Then He asked her if she had come with any of her sons or at least with her daughter. The woman had come alone without telling anyone. Then, Jesus started to give her advice, telling her that her prayers were more valuable than the violent fights she had almost daily in her family and that it was better to stop them. The woman looked at Him troubled because she hadn't mentioned anything about this and then started to cry, understanding that the person in front of her was much more than she had imagined. Afterwards, she made a sign and a servant came and brought a sack of flour and one with food, as a gift from her. I believe that was the moment of divine inspiration which triggered in Jesus the impulse to tell the parable of the sower. First, I saw Him looking at the sack of flour and then, judging by the way He looked and got ready to talk, I understood that He already knew the course of the story. He started telling the parable, but soon a group of Roman soldiers on horseback came. I realized that Jesus knew their leader. They withdrew from the crowd to talk and I saw that the Roman showed Him some papers with a seal. Because it was already dusk, the people started to spread and didn't wait for Jesus to return and continue the parable. Only long afterwards, I think two or three weeks later and in a completely different place, when only those close to Him and a few other persons were present, was He reminded of that parable which He had begun and was asked to continue. Jesus said that He knew very well what He wanted to say, and it was not for the many but for the few. He added that the fact that people scattered without waiting for Him to return and continue the story had deprived them of its hidden but precious content. In a way, He underlined that what happened then was just like what He was about to say in His parable. Nobody spoke in those moments and His presence, standing like that, was so majestic and dignified that I saw that everyone present had bowed their heads, looking at the ground. I noticed this extraordinary effect several times when Jesus spoke to the people and especially during His memorable preaching on the stairs of the huge temple after his so-called entrance into Jerusalem. Actually, things were more complicated back then. His entrance to the town took place in four days because many events which are not described in the Bible took place. I will not, however, insist upon this. Some of these aspects are delicate. What I'm trying to tell you is that, at a certain time, favorable circumstances were created and a group of people asked Him to talk about what happens after death. In those moments, Jesus was descending the steps of the temple. He was accompanied by two young women and four of his main disciples. I saw Him stop and turn a bit to the right where several persons stood. Then, a few bizarre things happened."

After he said this, Cezar stopped, thinking and surely rewinding the film of those epochal events in his mind. I was extremely impatient as I dared to ask him what happened and how things evolved.

"This section of the events is not described nor remembered in any text," he said. "It seems that a strange 'forgetting' of time has covered those who were present there and then. I couldn't find out too much either and for a very strange reason which I'm going to tell you. As I saw the scene, a bit from above, I was somewhat on Jesus's left. I saw Him suddenly look to the right towards a small group of people while He was very attentive and concentrating. Out of that group, a strange person cam out. It was a man who seemed to have blond hair and had a very negligent aspect. He looked very emotional and unsure of himself. He sat a bit inclined on his back and with his right hand under his long shirt which covered his legs. I remember that this was the first detail that drew my attention because all others were wearing shirts down to their ankles. I noticed that the man was agitated and always looked to his sides. Jesus made a few steps towards him and told him a few words which also left me astonished. He told the man that ‘he hadn’t chosen the right time to do what he wanted to do’ and that ‘those who sent him would understand.’ He then added something amazing by telling him he had to return immediately where he came from because there was a malfunction and he was in great danger. The man looked Him in the eyes for a few moments; then suddenly seemed to soften and had convulsions. In a low voice, they exchanged a few words which I couldn’t hear.

“Immediately afterwards, He withdrew among the people and then two things happened simultaneously which I still can’t explain. A short, threatening and very powerful roar was heard over all the settlement; and almost immediately, many people started gathering in front of the temple at the base of the stairs, asking insistently for Jesus to talk to them. I moved instantaneously as I was very curious to see who that man was who was so different from the others and who had behaved so strangely and to whom Jesus had given so much attention.

“Although localizing any point in space or any person was normally done immediately upon the manifestation of my will, I didn’t manage to move at all. I remained in my place as if there was nowhere for me to project. I ‘rewinded’ the akashic cliché a bit, but I couldn’t identify that person. Nothing like that had never happened to me before. It was as if that man disappeared.”

“Do you have any idea what this could mean?” I asked with curiosity.

“There are some assumptions, but I would rather not share them yet. They belong to an area which can be understood by men only with great difficulty.”

I insisted, however, and Cezar eventually told me what it was about but asked me not to write about it. He had made some connections and had done some research in this direction and while he was almost sure of his conclusion it was so shattering that I was stunned and didn’t know what to say. Eventually, I got back to his initial story.

“You didn’t tell me what the first ‘impact’ was when you accomplished your first projection. You know, on that hill slope where Jesus spoke to some of His disciples.”

“You’re right, but I wanted to give you an overview of the situation first as well as some concrete facts. There is too much to tell you and this is why I’ll only specify some aspects. Even in the reports I made, I made a synthetic presentation because it’s practically impossible to underline every element, nuance and experience occurring in these time projections which have a very complex content.

“Shortly after I discovered the use of this installation and after the American scientists started to ‘get used to it’ at a diplomatic level, it had been decided that the Vatican should be contacted and should see the reports but only the ones concerning the life of Jesus. I considered this an able and at the same time surprising move, especially since it came at the proposal and even insistence of the Americans. But I soon realized it wasn’t a decision made as an act of ethics and Christian morality but was done to apply a sort of faint diplomatic pressure on the Papacy through some big surprises mentioned in these reports. I will also share some of them with you, but it’s better to keep others a secret.

“Of course, we also assumed that the Vatican might fully ignore that information because there was practically no concrete evidence but only some written reports. But, the Americans mentioned that it might be decided to admit two or three cardinals as witnesses to the device and the underground ensemble in Bucegi which the Pope had already been informed about. As far as I know, there were some questions and delicate arguments based upon the true interests lying under this insistence to present the unknown aspects of Christianity to the papacy, but this is already a part of the diplomatic and political subtleties which I don’t want to go into right now. Our surprise was that the Vatican answered quickly through a special courier that they had known about these aspects for many years. I later found out that some of the American secret services were also familiar with the source of those revelations, but the subject has continued to remain a relative mystery throughout time even though there have been some echoes in the press as well. The Vatican’s honesty has given a slightly ironic response to the attitude of the Americans because they even offered to present a summary recording of Jesus' life as a means of verification of my reports. Some representatives of the Vatican were sent for discussions.

From our side, General Obadea was appointed together with one of the scientists who is a part of the special research commission concerning the Bucegi underground ensemble. Upon their return, the General confessed to me that he actually saw the recording of the most important aspects of the life of Jesus and his spiritual mission and that these were identical, in the common points, with my reports. Of course, neither those recordings nor I could present all the life of Christ. For example, I was especially concentrating on the last part that concerned His actual spiritual mission which lasted slightly over three years as the Christian texts mention. In reality, this period lasted three years and a half, almost four years. But, the Vatican had records of the life of Christ from His childhood, adolescence and youth, exactly those years about which we don't seem to know anything about His life. These are related aspects, however, which I don't want to talk about right now; but it is certain that the Vatican also holds a true mine of esoteric information which, for obvious reasons, they don't wish to publish."

Cezar stopped for a few moments to bring two tonic drinks from our food supplies. I remained silent and thought about the many implications that knowledge of this information would have on the modern world. I was also stunned at what Cezar told me and I realized that, in reality, I had been living in a cobweb of misinformation and alteration of the truth.

"But, this is only a small part of the total information I gathered during my projections into the history of this planet. You'd be truly stunned to find out the truth about the transformations which have taken place in time."

"But, I saw some of them in the Projection Chamber two years ago," I said, puzzled.

"Well, you still might have great surprises. I'm talking about a particularization of the akashic clichés. The holographic images from the Projection Chamber show us, as is only natural, an overview of the evolution of the history of Earth and man. For example, you've seen the geological transformations that have taken place on this planet and especially where we, as intelligent human beings, came from. But I am now referring to precise moments in history, dramatic moments in the evolution of Mankind, successions of dynasties, and enigmas that have laid a veil of mystery over many historical realities. Practically speaking, this area is almost inexhaustible. But, let's go back to what I was telling you because we don't have much time left and we'll have to get going soon."

I nodded in approval, hoping that I would get the chance to have, at a certain point in my life, that mysterious knowledge of the past and future of humanity. I was thus hoping to have the chance and ability to accomplish time projections with the help of that amazing machine.

"When I accomplished my first time projection and saw that group of people talking, I went to them. I told you I knew exactly who Jesus was, but what I didn't get to tell you was that there were also three women among the men who sat there. One of them sat right next to Christ; and I can tell you that, in that moment, I knew exactly who she was. I know that this is a very controversial subject and I'm sure that the records at the Vatican, together with this time travel device we used, would cause a massive earthquake in the Christian world. Things were presented in a wrong way, consciously, from the very beginning and most of the written evidence has been destroyed even though some of the small remainder has been discovered recently. The historical truth is completely different, at least from this point of view. Unfortunately, this is a fundamental direction which, once changed, couldn't be changed again without causing great damage to the Christian church. I was curious to see for myself when things were decided in this respect. I'm referring to a certain essential truth of the life of Jesus which few know and fewer can prove with hard evidence. That event happened shortly after the crucifixion of Christ which you also saw in the holographic projections."

I remembered those shattering moments with a thrill. The almost unbelievable images were awfully realistic; and I must admit that they are almost the only ones, as far as I know, which were presented almost fully and correctly in the authentic Christian texts. It's true that their description is a bit sensationalized or polished, but all in all, they present the historical truth. I've also noticed discrepancies as well as omissions, but I believe these are relatively meaningless compared with the main element, namely the crucifixion of Christ. For example, He was not helped by anyone to carry the wooden log on His back up to the hill where many people were crucified. There was an attempt to do so. A woman and a man tried to help Christ, at the base of the slope, but they were brutally sent away.

Furthermore, in the beginning, there weren't many people on the way to His crucifixion. It's true that they tried to kill Christ and here the intervention of the Roman soldiers was commendable. The madness of the crowd, however, truly started only after one of the soldiers was almost killed by a rock that struck him in the head. The movement forward was then blocked and the crowd started to make a fuss. The situation suddenly became tense and, as Cezar told me when he described the moments from the temple in Jerusalem, I saw people gathering quickly on both sides of the road.

In a few minutes, there was an indescribable helter-skelter. There was a lot of dust and the images then showed Christ falling on His knees with His head down, brought down by the weight of the wooden log He was carrying on His shoulders. At the same time, several soldiers on horseback arrived and reestablished order to a certain degree. The crowd was covered with an unexplainable wave of anger. Those who stood on both sides of the road were throwing stones and many other objects, both at Jesus and at the soldiers. Many men were then beaten and wounded.

Only after the actual crucifixion, which I didn't see in the holographic images, did things start to settle down slightly. The holographic projection was a synthesis and showed only the body of Christ, already crucified, and then emphasized the half hour period after the crucifixion, maybe even longer, because I noticed it was already night. But, this is a very occulted aspect from that period because, as far as I know, there is no account, not even an approximate one, about the events that followed. In general, texts have only described facts and characters — many of whom do not coincide exactly with the ones mentioned in the Gospels — but not other very important phenomena that took place in that short time interval. I later reached the only viable conclusion: namely, that they have been removed from the collective memory and from written accounts because there was no correspondence with anything familiar and they puzzled people so much that they preferred to forget those amazing events. But, I saw clearly everything that happened in amazingly realistic holographic images. And I must admit that the phenomena that happened in those moments were truly frightening and would have shaken the conceptions and knowledge of our current society.

At first, after seeing those images, I was forbidden to write about them. While I was watching the projection, Cezar explained to me, for each point, what I was allowed to write in the book and what I shouldn't write. There were delicate aspects for that time that were political as well as ideological or religious in nature. Conditions were not favorable for certain revelations because the general situation proved unstable at the level of diplomatic relations between the United States and Romania. Now, however, there are new premises which make possible certain revelations of this so-called "secret background."

Even if many people might consider them absurd and unreal, I had the chance to see those amazing holographic images for myself and I was astonished. The images had a special emotional load and at the same time were very clear which contributed to the drama of the situation and increased my capacity to empathize with the situation. The projections showed the dusk shortly after Jesus was removed from the cross. Then, something almost magical happened. I saw very dark clouds gather quickly in the sky and concentrate above the hill, descending very low and only a few dozen meters above the heads of the people still present there. I also saw threatening lightning coming from those violent clouds and it created apocalyptic images as I saw the terrified faces of the people who screamed with fear but who couldn't leave the hill top even though they were desperately trying to do so. They seemed to spin in circles amongst each other without being able to understand what was going on. In the other areas of the sky, I also saw lightning and threatening storm clouds that were higher than the others.

I then saw the signs of a terrible earthquake and I understood why those human beings were running with no apparent purpose, being caught by panic. Some crosses collapsed on the ground together with the crucified men; and on the opposite side, a massive landslide occurred which practically tore the small hill from a third of its base, making it look like a straight wall.

I've also witnessed sequences which have left me breathless. In the darkness caused by the earthquake, slowly coming out of the violet clouds, two giant disks appeared in the sky. Their edges were marked by some sort of intermittent signalling lights which were orange and blue in color. Those lights seemed to go round those giant disks. A few seconds afterwards, over the hill and above the nearby town, huge cones of intense light were projected at certain intervals and lit everything underneath them up to the smallest detail. One of the disks remained above the hill while the other headed slowly for the town. At first, I saw how the men remained paralyzed, looking up to the two apparitions. They then started screaming; and judging by the looks on their faces and the fact that they were covering their ears with their hands, I assumed that the two disks were probably emitting terrible sounds that coincided with the projection of the giant cones of light.

Those images truly seemed taken out of a nightmare and have stayed very clear in my memory. Countless speculations might result from this, but I think they're useless. I saw things exactly as they happened and they can't be ignored. Later, while talking to Cezar about this subject after our return from the expedition, he revealed to me that he had many chances to persuade himself during his time projections that such apparitions in the sky occurred quite often, especially in ancient times. It's just a question of mentality and maturity of thinking that is required to understand the structure of life in the universe in order to correctly assimilate such historical events.

I recovered quickly from the memories which had flooded my mind and asked Cezar, very interested, to tell me what was that ultra secret element in Jesus's life that wasn't presented by the Christian church.

"I've witnessed the official meeting of what could, at that time, mean the management of the emerging Christian church. Out of everything that happened at that council, which lasted for several days, it's only worth telling you that the competition between those who voted for the restrictive view of women and even for blaming them and those who wanted to keep traditions was quite tight. As usual, it was a process of manipulation. I saw almost in detail the important years of Jesus's spiritual mission, and I can tell you that he never preached about women in the manner that the Christian church does today — on the contrary."

I noticed that Cezar was very serious and at the same time very determined.

“When I first saw Jesus among His disciples on that hill, one of the three women was near Him. She had a special personality and glow. She was the youngest and most beautiful of them. I intuitively knew that she was the one called Mary Magdalene in the Gospels. And at the same time, I’ve realized that among the subtle threads of causal links, there was a very powerful connection between her and Christ. I’ve also perceived the fact that some of the disciples were not completely in agreement with that relationship because they somehow felt left aside. Only two of them didn’t share that opinion which undoubtedly came from a vain perception of reality. From other projections or akashic ‘rewinds,’ I’ve had the chance to find out that Jesus and Mary Magdalene were together almost all the time. Only when Christ spoke to the crowds or to people in private were they not together. But, in the evening, I often saw them withdraw alone, just the two of them. Usually, she was the first to receive the initiation from Him and I was amazed to see that both the disciples and many of His followers practiced certain methods of purification and preservation of body health, especially on river shores where they had water at their disposal. I often saw Mary Magdalene guiding the people in these simple methods and many came to her to ask for her help when Jesus was busy with others. I know these are radical aspects which seriously contradict what the Christian church maintains, but nevertheless, they must be supported bravely because they represent the pure historical truth.”

Even if I was astonished with what Cezar told me, I was at the same time happy that the truth had not led to rejection in my mind. On the contrary, I felt a sort of a release and inner freedom at the thought that man’s soul is thus made whole again. On the other hand, I was aware that, nowadays, this truth has only a slight chance to be accepted and understood accordingly. The ditches of threats, punishments and damnation have been dug too deeply in people’s minds during this current period of time.

Nevertheless, the personal choice is essential, and therefore it is fundamental for the truth to be known entirely. Correct judgement, spiritual common sense and pure faith are, in my opinion, virtues that can help modern man a lot in making pertinent choices so as not to be stopped by the difficult obstacles of fanaticism or conceptual thick-headedness.

“When I was projected near that group, Jesus slowly raised His eyes towards me, looking up,” Cezar continued. “Of course, it was just my consciousness, but He felt my subtle presence and reacted accordingly.

Even though He continued to speak to the others, I heard His voice in my mind at the same time clearly telling me it was very good that I was there and that my future investigations would create a complex chain of successive causalities that would greatly help those who would have the power to understand. Even for me, that was an extraordinary experience.

The only moment I couldn't grasp in my time projections during that period was that of the 'Transfiguration.' It was the same kind of time blocking which I have spoken about before but couldn't overcome."

Cezar suddenly fell silent. I felt that, even though there was still much to be told, he preferred not to tell me any more at this time. I knew that a certain step by step approach was always necessary in order to make possible the correct assimilation of the elements of the story. Besides, the moment of our departure was close and we had not slept. We were tired, but I still wanted very much to try for myself the sensation of time travel and connect to the mysterious installation.

I saw Cezar smiling slightly.

"I told you I was going to propose this very special experience to you. In your current condition, however, it's possible that you won't accomplish it.

Let's see — it's only up to you," he added, pointing me to sit down on the platform of the cylinder.

The Leap in Time

I got up nervously and headed for the cylinder. Strangely, now that I knew what I was about to do, my movements were slower and my heart was pounding quickly. I couldn't even speak. My teeth clenched and an overwhelming cloud of energy seemed to float over my head. I sat with difficulty on the narrow platform and Cezar came near me to adjust the metal band with encrusted crystals on my forehead. He realized very well that I was very nervous and even a bit frightened, but he didn't say anything. I was trying to control and adjust my breath, concentrating on the inspired and expired air and imagining how it came in and out of the body, through the spine and out the top of my head.

In the room, there was the silence of a tomb and I could only hear my breath which, in the beginning, became relatively agitated and then more and more relaxed. I congratulated myself in my mind for having begun to practice the Tibetan techniques from the parchment given to me by the goddess Machandi. They proved to be very useful during those moments.

Understanding that I was more relaxed, Cezar slowly approached the metal band on my forehead and adjusted it to the height of my head. I only had the chance to think that it was like a tiara when I suddenly and clearly felt that my whole body was wrapped in a wave of very pleasant but intense energy. I had the certain sensation that the intensity of the surrounding light decreased and the shape of things became somewhat foggy. The middle of my forehead started to get hotter while my neck was swallowing and preventing me from breathing. I suddenly became sweaty and started to tremble because of the effort I was making to resist. Cezar then removed the metal band from my head.

“The energy influx might be too strong for you,” he justified himself. “You need to relax.”

I didn’t say anything, but right before removing the ‘tiara’ from my head, I felt a sort of relief, a more normal energy flow. This was the reason why I asked Cezar, when I fully recovered after a couple of minutes, to try the experience again. He once again placed the crystal band on my forehead, and I felt that specific wave of pleasant energy invading my body again. It was followed by the strange perception of less intense light in the chamber, but this time I could breathe. Although breathing was a bit difficult, I could nevertheless breathe. The area on the middle of my forehead, however, was where one of the crystals touched my skin and was almost burning me.

Even so, I was determined to stand that pain in order to continue the experience.

I couldn’t think of anything because of the sensation of discomfort from my neck and the heat I felt on my forehead. Apart from this, I started to feel a bit worried when a sensation of nausea became more and more prominent and I couldn’t handle it. For a moment, I was struck with panic; but thinking that Cezar was near me and could intervene whenever necessary, I managed to control myself. As I was thinking about this, he removed the band from my head again. He was looking at me somewhat amused and didn't say anything. I described the symptoms and he estimated that they were within the normal limits even if they were unpleasant.

"The only disadvantage is that you might not be able to experience the time projection now," he said.

I had to admit he was right. Although I suspected it wouldn't be that way, I did not decide to quit either. This time, we waited a bit longer for me to relax. After almost fifteen minutes, I decided to try again. I went through the same steps and sensations, but now I could breathe more freely and the sensation of nausea was just vague instead of alarming. I could not concentrate, however, and was more preoccupied with maintaining a relative state of inner balance and hoped that those unpleasant sensations would disappear. After a few minutes of agitation, I was strongly determined to abandon myself to the energy input from the huge crystal no matter the risks. I realized that, if I went on resisting like that, it was most probable that I wouldn't have obtained any result. I therefore closed my eyes and concentrated all of my attention to the top of my head.

A strange phenomenon then occurred. Suddenly, the environment turned black but yet lit. I do not know very well how to describe that state, but the clear sensation was that the utter darkness I was in was at the same time full of light. I could say it was a sort of clear darkness. Then, I immediately had the feeling that I was falling through a chute but upwards, not downwards. Although I was aware of all these states, I still knew that my thoughts were different, more complex, and heading for many directions at the same time. While I was preoccupied with those observations and sensations, I heard more and more clearly, coming from far away, a strange feminine voice which sounded very familiar. My heart started beating quickly as the darkness slowly faded and let me see the inside of the cave in Tibet where I had been a year before. I saw myself when Machandi was touching my neck and forehead and felt even more strongly the emotion and ineffable state I was in during those moments. My forehead, however, seemed to be on fire so my attention diminished and was oriented to the place where I felt pain. I then observed a fluctuation of the image, like a sort of jamming, which was followed by its total disappearance. I opened my eyes somewhat confused.

I was still there in the Occult Chamber as Cezar looked at me with curiosity in the light surrounding us which was very faint. I tried to get a grip of myself and give a certain coherence to my first time travel experience. I was sure that the device had taken and modulated in time the strongest impression from my subconscious, projecting me to a year ago in that location in Tibet. It was all so alive and clear and even richer in experiences and perceptions than in the actual physical experience!

I closed my eyes again, this time trying to project to a time of my own choice. I was desperately seeking out such a marker in my mind and trying to find out what would interest me most of all. I then noticed that the back space in front of my eyes was “trembling” or, better said, made waves; and in certain regions, I saw small glimpses of images which later disappeared in fractions of a second. I felt my forehead become hotter and hotter and, out of desperation, I chose, out of millions of possibilities, to project to the time when the secret tunnel leading from the Great Pyramid to the Occult Chamber was built. The time projection was immediate but very rough, like a clash. I saw blinding lights in a triangular space, just like the tunnel we saw in the holographic images displayed by Aiden’s computer. There was a complicated device emitting a laser ray or a different kind of ray which was blue-colored and was cutting the “rock” and the ground layers with high precision. Around it, there were three beings who immediately made me feel a deep repulsion. They appeared to be human, but they were very different from us. I was so surprised by their characteristics and especially by the profoundly harmful empathic sensation I felt around them that my repulsion projected me back to the present reality. I opened my eyes right away and removed the band from my head with a spasmodic gesture. I could no longer resist the pressure on my forehead which was extended to my eyes as well. I came down into the room and took a few steps to calm down.

Seeing me so agitated, Cezar respected my silence. After all, we had plenty of time on our way back for me to tell him my experience in detail. I realized, however, how important it is for the mind to be relaxed, stable and firmly oriented. Otherwise, travelling with the “time machine” would always be a useless agitation and experience with no end.

I packed the last things together with Cezar and put them in the vehicles. I looked again at the mysterious place I had visited and where I had experienced so many amazing events in less than twenty-four hours. We then woke up the other three colleagues because we had to stick to the schedule of the expedition. After a few verifications, Cezar sealed the Occult Chamber by closing the enormous stone door. I got into the vehicle in silence and thought that I would have liked to be more focused and determined when I was connected to the time travel machine. I could only hope that, given this new course of my life, as an employee of Department Zero, I would later have the chance to improve myself and accomplish much more efficient time projections.

Cezar checked the video and audio link between the three vehicles. Then, as usual, he looked at me, asking me with a glance if everything was okay. I nodded my head in approval. The vehicle started to speed up through the nebulous space of the tunnel, flooded in indigo light. As we journey homeward, I thought about the mysterious ruby crystal from the Occult Chamber. I felt that I would see it again in the near future...

Epilogue — by Peter Moon

I am keenly aware that different people in the reading audience will have profoundly different responses to the incredible story you have just read.

Before you make too many final conclusions, I would like you to consider one part of the philosophy of Chang Tzu, a Taoist philosopher considered to be one of the greatest and most respected wise men of ancient times. Chang Tzu taught that one should not esteem too highly the knowledge or wisdom of any one particular person. It is far better to seek out infinite knowledge or wisdom which consists of the collective knowledge or wisdom of all Mankind. As there are numerous people in the collective, one should be accepting of all human viewpoints and the relative keys they possess. It is therefore wise not to quibble with knowledge, wisdom or information of any kind that is offered. The information is there for your enlightenment or your use. Disagreeing or agreeing is not so important. How intelligently you file, use or discard it is up to you and your personal path.

Personally, I was rather moved by Cezar Brad's statement about how the truth to one person might appear like a mockery to another. When one moves from a typical human consciousness to the higher realms of consciousness, one has to navigate through many illusions which the Hindus call maya. Astrologers refer to this as the realm of Neptune which not only rules illusion and deception but also the higher realms of spirituality. The real challenge in negotiating the countless illusions generated by the collective minds and phenomena that the universe can generate is not so much in judging what is right and wrong but in figuring out what the game is and how things work. Rightness and wrongness have a tendency to change depending on the platform or culture of the situation you are in.

Having said the above, I am keenly aware that my own readership will seek out my own endorsement or condemnation of Radu's data, particularly in regard to what has been said in the book about Christ. While I am really not in a position to do either, I am more than happy to share with you my views and experiences on what has been written. I can also say that it has triggered some interesting thoughts and potentialities.

I am well aware that Cezar's statements about Christ will be more than a little controversial. Are they true? I certainly cannot vouch for them as they are not my experiences. They are Cezar's as reported by Radu.

Personally, I am more interested in what Cezar and Radu did not say as opposed to what they did say. If the report of a UFO on the scene is accurate, it opens the door to a variety of speculations that are centered around the prospect of manipulation of the time line or time lines.

As a general read, I found this book very interesting and extremely thought provoking. I liked it very much but was a bit taken aback by Cezar's comment about Jesus appearing in the sky. After all, rumors have been circulated since at least the early 1990s that the secret government's Project Blue Beam (see Appendix on page 220 for further information) was seeking to transmit holograms of Christ in order to convince the world of Christianity. Accordingly, I did not find Cezar's revelation to be a prudent thing to state to an American audience who is rather savvy when it comes to different conspiracy theories. Besides that, the comment is apt to alienate a secular audience or those who are suspicious of technologically aided or induced visions.

I knew I would have to address these points with Radu, particularly the part about Project Blue Beam. After sharing my misgivings with Radu, he responded that he was very well aware of plans to pull off what Project Blue Beam was trying to do. In fact, he said that he even saw documents that proved it. He was emphatic, however, that Cezar's statements and renditions were accurate. To his credit, Radu did apologize that he could not say more at this time. He said that if he could tell me everything, it would explain matters and everything would make sense. Radu even kindly promised that he would show me certain things as soon as he was allowed to, and he even reiterated this in a second letter. Once again, I am more intrigued by what Cezar and Radu did not say.

As a publisher and editor, it is not my prerogative to pass judgment on what Radu or any other author is saying in their book. It is their story, not mine.

As long as I believe the story has value, it is my job to get it into print and circulate it so that the information does whatever it is supposed to do in the world. With regard to Radu's adventures, I have travelled to Romania four times and have found that there is corroborative evidence of a highly secretive project going on in the Bucegi Mountains. I have also spoken to people who claim to have inside knowledge of what is going on there.

Right now, Radu is the only one who has anything to say publicly about Department Zero and the Bucegi discovery. We are, at the very least, indebted to him that there is even a forum on the subject.

With further reference to the history of Christ, I would also like to point out that this information has been extremely controversial ever since it first appeared in the culture of this planet. It resulted in extreme political upheaval accompanied by all of the unfortunate trappings of the human condition. Most of you have some idea of this history already. There are, however, great problems with this history as it appears in our culture.

If you were to convene a court of law or official hearing with standard rules of evidence in order to prove the existence of Jesus Christ, you would end up with no conclusive evidence. The reason for this is that all historical data about Jesus is either scriptural, nonsecular or hidden. It is based upon belief or faith and not on independent and objective sources. While certain data could be true, it would not be objective evidence because the source would be viewed as prejudicial. If Cezar and Radu were to testify, it would only be hearsay evidence. In the event that the court had the power to subpoena the Giza device, one would still need to interrogate the censors or the builders of the device and seriously examine them and their technology.

While this possibility is intriguing and invites humorous scenarios, it is also preposterous in that it is not going to happen.

There is also apocryphal scripture with alternative versions of Christ. Apocryphal, however, means "of doubtful authenticity" so it would not further the court case either. Besides that, there is also an occult history of Jesus which seeks to explain what happened during his missing years. While this information can be interesting, it does not prove the point either.

What we do have, however, is evidence that a MASSIVE amount of literature was generated around the idea of a remarkable creature having been born at the beginning of the Age of Pisces. This is firm and unalterable evidence of an idea being proliferated in different variations but not of the existence of the creature itself. What we also know from this is that it is the most manipulated piece of history in the world. If Jesus did exist as stated in the New Testament, we know that the information about Him has been manipulated as well as deliberately omitted. If Christ is a complete fiction, it is also a manipulation. Either way, we have grandiose manipulation and a lot of alternative theories.

The same could be said for the Montauk Project in relation to a legal hearing with rules of evidence. There is plenty of evidence of a secret project taking place but one does not have the core evidence to examine it as one is dealing with censorship issues. We do know, however, that there is manipulation and plenty of theories.

Christians, however, do not really care about the objective side because it is a matter of faith. On the other hand, non-believers do not really care because there is no objective proof. Oddly enough, there is a resolution to such a dichotomy but that exists only in discovering the core occult aspects of Christianity which neither side are too likely to look at. I will address this momentarily, but it is important to acknowledge that my own involvement with Radu is a matter of rather deep synchronicity. If it hasn't already been obvious to you, we were destined to work together.

I will first remind you of what was said in Chapter One about synchronicity. Cezar encourages Radu to look for the hidden meaning that is revealed by synchronicity and to then meditate on its cause or source. He also states that what most people call coincidence or a synchronicity of events actually reveals to us the highest degree God's presence because, in His absence, all incredible simultaneous situations which occur in our lives could not happen; and further, the fact that such events do happen shows that there is someone capable of organizing them, matching them and making them happen in reality. Cezar tells Radu that it is very important to understand that this reality of synchronicity can allow us, even in the case of minor daily events, to pass immediately to what is beyond all this and thus to persuade ourselves of the existence of a reality which is highly superior to the one we live here. "Coincidences" are described like a gate which is waiting to be opened so that we can "escape" into a reality we had never thought existed but which is essential for our happiness.

Cezar's comments are quite relevant to my own experiences in synchronicity.* When I first began to research the Montauk Project, I encountered remarkable synchronicities which were originally centered around the Antichrist in the personage of Aleister Crowley. While these are now the stuff of legend, my adventures in Romania seem to have turned up the opposite. In other words, synchronicity or circumstances are swirling around the Christ. These two opposite polarities go hand-in-hand. Even so, the Christ factor has also appeared in my own Montauk research. Preston Nichols always told me that the Montauk Project researchers were fascinated with the interpolation between the Christ and Antichrist. After all, this universe is based upon duality. In the case of these two principles, archetypes or energies, we are dealing with two highly concentrated charges of energy. My personal experiences in synchronicity have demonstrated this time and again. More importantly, the examination of their meaning has revealed further information. While it is too cumbersome to recapitulate all of my synchronicities in this regard, I will recount a few incidents of how synchronicity has conjured up both the Christ and Antichrist in such a way that reveals a higher truth.

[* These synchronicities were originally reported upon in "Montauk Revisited: Adventures in Synchronicity". To my amazement, further synchronicities on this subject kept occurring and led to remarkable experiences and revelations. These are covered in various books including "Pyramids of Montauk", "The Black Sun", "Synchronicity and the Seventh Seal", "The Montauk Book of the Dead", and "The Montauk Book of the Living".]

One summer day on August 12, I met with a woman who was not previously familiar with my research. When she heard about my synchronicities with Aleister Crowley, she told me that her former boyfriend had purchased Crowley's old walking stick from Jimmy Page's estate. She said it caused her horrible dreams of a lewd man pursuing her. I did not think much of it except that it was typical of Crowley. As I drove home from my visit with her, I accidentally, serendipitously, or subconsciously missed the turnoff to my house. This misdirection led me in the direction of the post office so I decided to check my mail. It was a Saturday, a day on which I usually did not visit the post office. When I arrived at my post office box, I was struck by a remarkable instance of what appeared to be either "blind" or "dumb" synchronicity. There was only one letter in the box and it was quite oddly sandwiched between two comic book style pamphlets that were of a promotional nature and were about three inches high and six inches wide. They had been mailed by a local Jehovah's Witness and were not addressed to me personally but to the "occupant" of the post office box. The letter itself was addressed to me and it was from Amado Crowley, the bastard son of Aleister. Why were there two Jesus pamphlets and why did they surround the "Antichrist"? That this happened on August 12 was ironic because that is the date of the biorhythm on which both the Philadelphia Experiment and Montauk Project were said to have reached their peak power.

While the previous synchronicity was obviously a harmonic degrade in terms of the Christ being represented by Jehovah's Witness pamphlets, my next encounter was a little more penetrating. As described in detail in The Montauk Book of the Living, I received what I termed a "quantum relic" under very mysterious circumstances. It was a framed 1910 playbill from The New Montauk Theatre. Although I investigated the playbill for all sorts of possible synchronous clues, I came up mostly empty handed. A year later, I gave the playbill to Duncan Cameron so that he could give me a psychic read on it. Keep in mind that Duncan was literally groomed to be the Antichrist during the Montauk Project. In the very act of handing this mysterious playbill to him, the cardboard backing in the frame became undone and two pictures of Jesus on the Mount of Olives were revealed that had previously remained hidden inside of the framed structure. This took me on a quest which is detailed in that book. Why two?

Many years later, the glass that this enigmatic playbill was framed in was inadvertently broken when I showed it to a psychic. After a while, the playbill itself became detached from the cardboard it was pasted to.

Eventually, the playbill disappeared entirely and I bemoaned this as I wanted to scan it for the book I knew that I would eventually write. I was a little distraught over this. The broken frame sat on my coffee table like this for a very long time which was probably one year, more or less.

One day, a psychic friend named Yonda was coming to visit me. As I cleaned up the living room in anticipation of her arrival, I noticed that the playbill had suddenly and rather miraculously reappeared. I was overjoyed because I knew that I could now scan it for the book. This practical factor seemed to impress me more than the fact that the playbill had quite apparently vanished into the cosmic ether and then reappeared.

Nevertheless, this bizarre return of the playbill caused me to inspect it a little closer. For the first time, I took full notice of the fact that it featured Eva Tanguay as the star of the performance. Although I had scrutinized the entire playbill for quantum clues many times before, I had never paid attention to Eva Tanguay until this particular point in time. As the internet was now readily available, I did a search and soon found out that she was the highest paid actress in vaudeville. More bizarre was that the first article I read about her was from the Encyclopedia Britannica and just happened to be written by Aleister Crowley! Further research revealed that she was his priestess who practiced sexual magick with him. This was indicated in his diaries of 1923.

In both of the above cases, we had a ratio of two Christs to one “Antichrist.” There was also a resonance between the August 12th date of the Montauk Project and the fact that a goddess was involved at a theater with the name Montauk. August 12th also represents the High Holy Days of ancient Egypt and is considered to be the birthday of Isis according to tradition because Sirius is then at its closest point to the Earth for the year. Traditionally, Isis is also known as the Queen or Lady of the Olives.

My own personal synchronicities with regard to olives run very deep and they are the entire theme of “The Montauk Book of the Living”. It is too cumbersome to do a comprehensive summary in this work, but I can tell you that they culminated with a bizarre revelation that the entire country of Romania was actually formed and named as a result of the Crimean War which happened over a fight concerning a church on the Mount of Olives.

What do all of these synchronicities mean and why were they centered around the relationship of the Christ and Antichrist? Besides the fact that Christian scripture states that the Mount of Olives represents the end of time, it is an excellent and provocative question. Before I address that, I will add some more of the synchronicity that occurred with regard to my own experiences in Romania.

The next event on this thread of experiences occurred on my first trip to Romania when I was immediately befriended by Nicole Vasilcovschi who “recognized” me in some strange way. She is a practicing Orthodox Christian who recognizes Jesus as her spirit guide as a result of a mystical experience with Him at the age of six whereupon she could suddenly read the Bible. On my second trip to Romania, she volunteered to take me to Sarmizegetusa, the ancient capital and holy place of ancient Transylvania.

We stayed with a bishop, who is also an exorcist, at a monastery. We arrived in Transylvania on August 10th (the aforementioned biorhythm itself occurs anywhere from August 10-14) and took our trip to Sarmizegetusa on August 11th. In the wee hours of the morning on August 12th, I had an out-of-body dream revealing a black cloud over Romania with black helicopters. In the dream, I was told that I was safe and not connected to this darkness. Nicole rose and was in the chapel by about 6:00 A.M. and prayed for hours with the bishop and the monks as they prepared Holy Bread for me. To please Nicole, I took it on an empty stomach the next morning and prayed for a miracle which occurred a few hours later, but it is too long to go into here. The experience revealed the stoning of an a four-year-old orphan that was instigated by a priest of the New Orthodox Church in Moldava. The bishop, however, does not belong to that church but is a member of the Old Orthodox Church which maximizes the teachings of Christ. I had never really taken Holy Bread before, and I only mention it because it did coincide with synchronicity. When the bishop initially picked us up at the train station on the morning of August 10th, I learned that he had just visited the grave of Arsenie Boca.* Unfortunately, there was no time to visit Boca's grave on that particular trip. The bishop was truly a wonderful man and a very gracious host. When he asked me if there was anything he could do for us, I asked him to pray that we would have a successful journey to Sarmizegetusa.

[* Nicole and I were accompanied to Sarmisejatusa by Cristina Balan.

When researching Arsenie Boca, I learned that his mentor was Metropolitan Balan, the man who sent him to Mount Athos where he had a transformative spiritual experience after praying to the Mother of God.

Balan is a common Romanian name, but I suspect that Cristina might be a relative.]

I should tell you that any spiritual Romanian who is worth their salt will tell you that a journey to Sarmizegetusa is a very profound experience that will change your life; and further, it is the journey there that is the most important part. This was certainly the case for myself. As the bishop made preparations for us to travel to Sarmizegetusa, one of the monks told us that the construction of the monastery itself began on the day of a solar eclipse, August 11, 1999. I immediately recognized that this was an amazing synchronicity. Not only is this representative of the High Holy Days of ancient Egypt and the annual “Montauk” biorhythm of the earth, August 11, 1999 was also the very same day on which Dr. David Anderson walked into my life. David was not only responsible for my travelling to Romania in the first place, he had just phoned Nicole and regretted that he could not accompany us on our journey. He really wanted to go. I then realized that Nicole and I would travel to Sarmizegetusa on the tenth anniversary of this day which was August 11, 2009. This realization caused me to stop everything and go to the fields outside of the monastery where Nicole and I had a deep discussion. It was a remarkable moment with a remarkable human being that I will never forget. I knew there was a very deep message with three synchronicities centered around August 11, 1999, and this experience caused me to look at the numerology of the day we were travelling to Sarmizegetusa: 8-11-11.

Only as I review this manuscript do I realize the incredible nexus that this experience on 8-11-11 signifies. In the previous year, I had published a book (“The Montauk Book of the Living”) which included very esoteric information about the number 11 and had also been invited to the Atlantykron conference in Romania by Dr. David Anderson as a guest of the World Genesis Foundation. When I stand back and consider the elements of that particular synchronicity, I had an Old Orthodox Monastery in Transylvania at one end and Dr. David Anderson at the other who I had met at Lorry Salluzzi’s home that was called the 111 Healing Center. These both occurred during the earth’s major biorhythm, but it was the August 11 date that was highlighted as opposed to August 12 which had received most of the attention prior to that point. I very much realized that if it were not for Dr. David Anderson, I would never have met Nicole let alone had this opportunity to visit the monastery as well as Sarmizegetusa, the capital of ancient Transylvania.

Sarmizegetusa is considered to be the home of the legendary Zalmoxis, a man who transformed into a god who also taught the Egyptians their wisdom. The moxis in Zalmoxis corresponds to Moses and is where the Yiddish term moxy obviously derives from although no one really recognizes that. It is recognized, however, that the Yiddish language did evolve through Romania and was influenced by that language to some extent. Zalmoxis has many different attributes and stories surrounding him, but one of them was that he taught immortality. This directly ties into the theme of monatomic white gold that has been presented in Transylvanian Sunrise as well as my earlier books. It also ties into the mysterious character featured in Transylvanian Moonrise who is known as Elinor who practices alchemical techniques that prolong the life of a human by thousands of years in order to evolve into a completely transcended state where one no longer needs to incarnate into a physical existence as we would know it.

My trip to Sarmizegetusa was actually my second trip to Romania. I was travelling there as a result of what I had learned the previous year from some of the key people at the Atlantykron conference. Certain learned Romanians had patiently transcended language barriers and explained the esoteric importance of Sarmizegetusa which features an ancient calendar but, more importantly, is the real spiritual heart of Romania. They said that I must visit there. The real purpose of Atlantykron, I was told, concerns the synchronization of the ancient megalithic calendars with the stars. Atlantykron means “time of Atlantis” and symbolizes the rising of Atlantis and this ostensibly includes ancient technology referred to in Radu’s works. By returning to Romania and following the cue of the new friends I had met, I was not only honoring their spirit but the heart of a very ancient land and all of the esoteric connections that those represent.

I feel it is also important to point out that Nicole only came into the picture later. Keep in mind, it is the actual journey to Sarmizegetusa that is said to be so important. On my first trip to Romania, there was a lot of miscommunication and discord on that trip. Our travel plans suffered as did all of my speaking engagements. Some aspects of the trip were so disappointing that when I told one of David’s friends the next year that I was returning at my own expense, she was shocked. After all I had gone through, she could not believe I was going back. I suppose that I was taking a big leap that the ordinary person might not take, but I did not think about it. The next challenge, however, was even larger. I had no travelling companions as I had the year before and was looking at travelling to Sarmizegetusa on my own. That is not advisable for many different reasons. Still, I did not think about the obstacles. David put me in touch with the Minister of Tourism, but it was like pulling teeth to get any information. Finally, I had the idea to email Nicole and she volunteered.

As a matter of fact, Nicole was not planning on returning to Atlantykron that year until she heard from me. The act of taking the journey actually gated Nicole into my life and cemented what has become an eternal friendship that swirls around my research and the events in this book.

All of these factors of synchronicity were swirling around me as I contemplated the magical significance of 8-11-11. This number is not only symmetrical, it is incredibly representative of my own adventures in synchronicity with regard to the Christ and Antichrist. As it is no surprise to most readers that the number 8 represents infinity, I will not elaborate on that. The number 11:11, however, deserves comment. While 11:11 is one of the code symbols of the New Age movement, the true significance of this number is not really understood at all by those who promulgate its mysterious significance. The true understanding came to me through my experiences of synchronicity that started with the Antichrist.

I should first tell you that Aleister Crowley makes special mention of the number 11 in his book “Magick in Theory and Practice”. He states that it is a very significant number because there are eleven letters in the magical incantation of abrahadabra and that the letter k is the eleventh letter of the alphabet and that is why he added a k to the word magic and called his system Magick. Although Crowley recognized that the number 11 was important, I am convinced that he did not understand the full significance.

My original synchronicities in investigating the Montauk Project surrounded Crowley, his family and their association with the Wilson and Cameron clans. These led me to learn that Crowley and his wife, Rose Kelly, were married on August 12 and subsequently had sex in the King’s Chamber of the Great Pyramid during their honeymoon. With Rose acting as a medium, Crowley was told by a discarnate spirit to find the god Horus.

When they went to the Boulak Museum in Cairo, Crowley asked where Horus was and Rose led him to the Stele of Monthu. Crowley was very impressed because the exhibit number for this stele was number 666.

Prodded by the spirit through his wife, Crowley eventually penned a book that would become the focal point of his entire life: “The Book of the Law”.

This book, in part, focused on the word abrahadabra which, once again, features 11 letters.

Although it was the focal point of his life, Crowley admittedly never fully or properly understood “The Book of the Law”. The book itself stated that someone would come after him who would. While it was no secret that the book was written in a code, no one could ever figure out the code. It puzzled occultists for over a century and no one was more puzzled than Crowley himself. Crowley was a virtual switchboard for different entities that interacted through him. You might say that lights were going on and off around him all the time, but he was overshadowed by a much greater force than he could not understand. The secret to The Book of the Law hinged around what was called “The Key of It All.”

Before I explain this key, it is important to consider the context of what we are dealing with from the perspective of my own path of research.

Originally, I was dealing with the Montauk Project and time travel. This led me to the discovery of ancient pyramids at Montauk and the revelation that the royal family of the Montauk Natives were known as the Pharoahs.

In “Mystery of Egypt”, we are dealing with a Sphinx in Romania underneath which is a tunnel leading to Giza where there is another Sphinx and the Great Pyramid itself. Over a hundred years ago, as you will soon learn, Crowley was channeling an entity that was literally speaking through the Great Pyramid.

I stumbled upon this information regarding this Key of It All through synchronicity. While there are various stages of discovery of this synchronous key, the final pieces were put into place for me by my friend, Daemon Magus (aka T. Buddha). He is an occultist who once belonged to the Ordo Templi Orientis. While one might question the veracity of whether he or myself are the “one who came after” because we are not worshiped or adulated beyond belief by Crowley’s disciples, there is a very good reason for it. Most Crowleyites as well as other members of secret societies are literally possessed in varying degrees. They are not only slow to recognize progressive truth, they are psychologically predisposed to fight against it. When Buddha revealed what he knew to the OTO, he was ostracized from the order for his ability to see the truth, expelled from the group and considered a threat to vested interests. Occult warfare against him ensued and he suffered greatly save for the fact that he is now out of the organization.

I have explained The Key to It All with graphics and more details in the “The Montauk Book of the Living” so I will only give a brief summary here, but it should suffice. When it is properly decoded, “The Book of the Law” reveals that The Key to It All is centered around the eleven lettered Abrahadabra which refers to the magical manifestation of life in the “Shape of a Beast.” Taken a step further, the decoding explicitly reveals that eleven specifically refers to 5+6 which symbolizes the 5:6 magical or mystical ratio of the building blocks of life. This is a very important ratio and you will soon understand why it is considered magical or mystical. In biochemistry, inorganic compounds are six-sided or hexagonal while organic compounds are five-sided or pentagonal. While this is an observable laboratory fact of life, there is a much more esoteric aspect to 5+6 and this has to do with the pentagram and hexagram. When you place a pentagram upside down and beneath a hexagram (Star of David), you then have the basic template for the Cabalistic Tree of Life. When this template is twisted, it then represents a Möbius strip which is the pattern of a strand of DNA. 11-11 therefore represents two strands of DNA. Just as importantly, 11-11 also represents 22 or the Major Arcana of the Tree of Life. It is equally important to state here, if it is not already obvious to you, that the Tree of Life is actually an analogous map of DNA.

Keep in mind that when Crowley transmitted this information, it was 1903 and the academic world had no clue as to what DNA even was. Mystery Schools and Cabalists had templates for the Tree of Life, but its connection to DNA was known only by a select few if at all. This, however, is not where the mystery of the key ends. Of further importance is that the Great Pyramid itself is also constructed with specific reference to the 5:6 ratio.

The capstone is 1/56th the size of the Great Pyramid which is 1/56th the size of the Giza Plateau which is 1/56th the size of Africa which is 1/56th the size of the earth. Whoever built the Great Pyramid built it in a manner and in a location that reflects the building blocks of life as expressed in DNA.

It is one thing to have a channeled entity revealing coded scientific and cabalistic information through a bizarre magician. The fact that the Great Pyramid itself is built with reference to these truths is evidence of a divine wisdom overseeing these events. If synchronicity is the work of the Creator, we also see that there is a law of attraction or quantum affinity between my path of synchronicity and Radu's. In the case of the Projection Hall in the Bucegi Mountains, we have a virtual Noah's Ark of DNA that is far more extensive than any of the authors of the Bible ever conceived of.

Although I have explained the 5:6 ratio, it is important to understand that the full significance of this ratio was previously unknown. It represents the magical processes of life. It is not just a coincidence that all of these synchronous events are linked to the Great Pyramid and its builder who, traditionally, was Tahuti or Thoth. When we speak of The Key of It All, we also cannot ignore the obsession that metaphysical archeologists (in contrast to your hard core occultists) have had about discovering the Hall of Records beneath the Sphinx that Edgar Cayce prophesized about. There has been a lot of gamesmanship to be "the one" who would discover this. Radu's first book told us that the Hall of Records was really beneath the Romanian Sphinx and that it was holographic in nature. In "Mystery of Egypt", we are now told of an Egyptian chamber. The technology described is far beyond the dreams of any previous scholars.

What we have in all of this is a virtual Super Bowl of ancient archeology and religion meeting future technology and occult metaphysics through the secret process of DNA. In essence, it is LIFE. It is life becoming aware of all of its other parts and unifying. At the apex of future technology, we have time travel. Do not forget that the one who brought me to Romania in the first place was Dr. David Anderson who has mastered time control technology to a remarkable degree. While his role in this scenario is still mysterious, we have reached the "final frontier" of where science fiction meets reality.

The wave of synchronicity that led me to The Key of It All has also led me to all of these remarkable adventures which, right now, are centered on the mysterious work of Radu Cinamar and his colleagues. "The Book of the Law" tells us that the key to the secret of life is in the DNA. The secrets of DNA are revealed in the Bucegi Mountain complex which has the means by which to evaluate all permutations of DNA, on and off this planet. The synchronicities of my life with regard to Crowley and "The Book of the Law” should therefore not be too much of a surprise if we look through a rear view mirror. As remarkable as these secrets all are, however, there are still some missing components. The missing ingredients apply not only to the many different variations of the Cabalistic Tree of Life but also to DNA itself.

As I stood with Nicole in Transylvania and marvelled at the synchronicities revolving around us and August 11, 2009, it was a wonderful climax to nearly two decades of research, but it was also only the end of an act. There was much more to the journey, and we both knew this. Two years later, we would visit the Cave of Zalmoxis together which is about a mile west of the Bucegi Sphinx. It is where, according to legend, Zalmoxis retired for four years and then emerged as a god. You can travel safely into the cave for about a quarter of a mile before you need equipment and your own lights.

The cave does not end and goes into what people call the Inner Earth. On this trip, I also learned from someone in the Romanian government that the Carpathian Mountains are studded with these type of caves that go deep into the earth. These mountains run along the southern border of Transylvania and are also known as the Transylvanian Alps. What I also learned from this person was that there are large numbers of UFOs that go in and out of this region and that this fact is one of the greatest state secrets of Romania. Radu has alluded to this only vaguely in some of his letters to me, but it is obviously something he cannot openly comment about. These UFOs represent both dark forces and light forces and the struggle for domination. This struggle between dark and light is deeply rooted in the Romanian psyche and culture and goes back thousands and thousands of years. It is being played out in its current form through the events described in this book.

My own adventures in synchronicity have not been without their own moments of darkness. On my route to investigating and learning about the aforementioned Key of It All, I experienced some serious occult fallout. As one discovers truth, there is always a struggle with and balancing of the forces of darkness and light.

When I initially opened up this door in the book “Pyramids of Montauk”, I suffered a bizarre car accident that had all sorts of occult synchronicities attached to it. Certain occult forces or interests did not like it. Seven or eight years after this incident, my work had achieved so much notoriety that I became a target for numerous maladjusted cretins, many of them with magical backgrounds, who were out-distanced by what I had presented. By reason of what I had written and published, I had all sorts of occult interests or demonic forces roosting in my own astral universe. It is sort of like going out to your backyard and seeing buzzards roosting on the fence, carping at you and waiting for your demise. In truth, I was somewhat comfortable with this circumstance because I knew why the buzzards were there. I had accumulated a lot of information and experiences that I had not been able to write about up to that point. It needed to be published and released. Even so, I realized that if these occult forces roosting in my backyard wanted information from me, it was only to find out what I knew so they could try to neutralize it.

When I sized everything up and was able to address the situation after overcoming various distractions, my solution was to write a book which would not only include the missing information I had accumulated up to that point but to purposely design it as a virtual EXORCISM to get rid of all those negative entities that were surrounding myself and my work. The book was based upon and synchronistically aligned with an ancient esoteric Muslim legend which probably originated from the Sufis and/or Moors. The legend is that there is only one way to exorcise all the demons from hell. It is so powerful that not one demon can stand up to it and that is through the name Jesus Christ or however the Muslims pronounced it. For those of you who have read that particular book, which is entitled "Synchronicity and the Seventh Seal", you will understand that this Muslim legend is a rather obtuse over-simplification. The book cover, prelude and introduction are filled with all sorts of occult warnings to the wary reader. Those warnings are really not for the casual reader or typical fan of mine. They are there to weed out negative elements from my readership and beyond.

If the book was designed as an exorcism, I can tell you that it most certainly worked. I was at complete peace with regard to the aforementioned factors and was also able to resume my writing career which had been virtually stopped for a variety of reasons.

While the ancient Muslim legend suggested that the name Jesus Christ was worthy of the power of exorcism, this was a veiled reference to a fundamental principle upon which the secret architecture of both ancient and modern Freemasonry are based. This principle is also echoed in the New Testament: Philippians 2:10-11 where the following is said:

“That at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth; And that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father.”

There are other references in the New Testament to the name of Jesus having power, and I will address that momentarily. First, I would like to clarify a very common misunderstanding that most bibliophiles suffer from and that has to do with the word Father. When the New Testament was first committed to the written word, it was in Greek. The language of Jesus, however, was Aramaic. If you look at the etymology of the Greek word for father, you will see that it is abba which derives from the Aramaic. In Aramaic, however, abba does not exactly mean father. Aramaic is a very nuanced language and it has been properly interpreted to mean Creator.

When most people read the Bible, they are generally reading it through a lens of mistranslation. This is only one word, but it distorts the original meaning. If you substitute Creator every time you read Father, you will have a completely different impression. The name of Jesus has suffered a similar fate.

Although biblical quotations invest much power in the literal usage of the name, they do not tell you that the word ‘Jesus’ is a mistranslation or shadow of the true word that the authors of the Bible are alluding to.

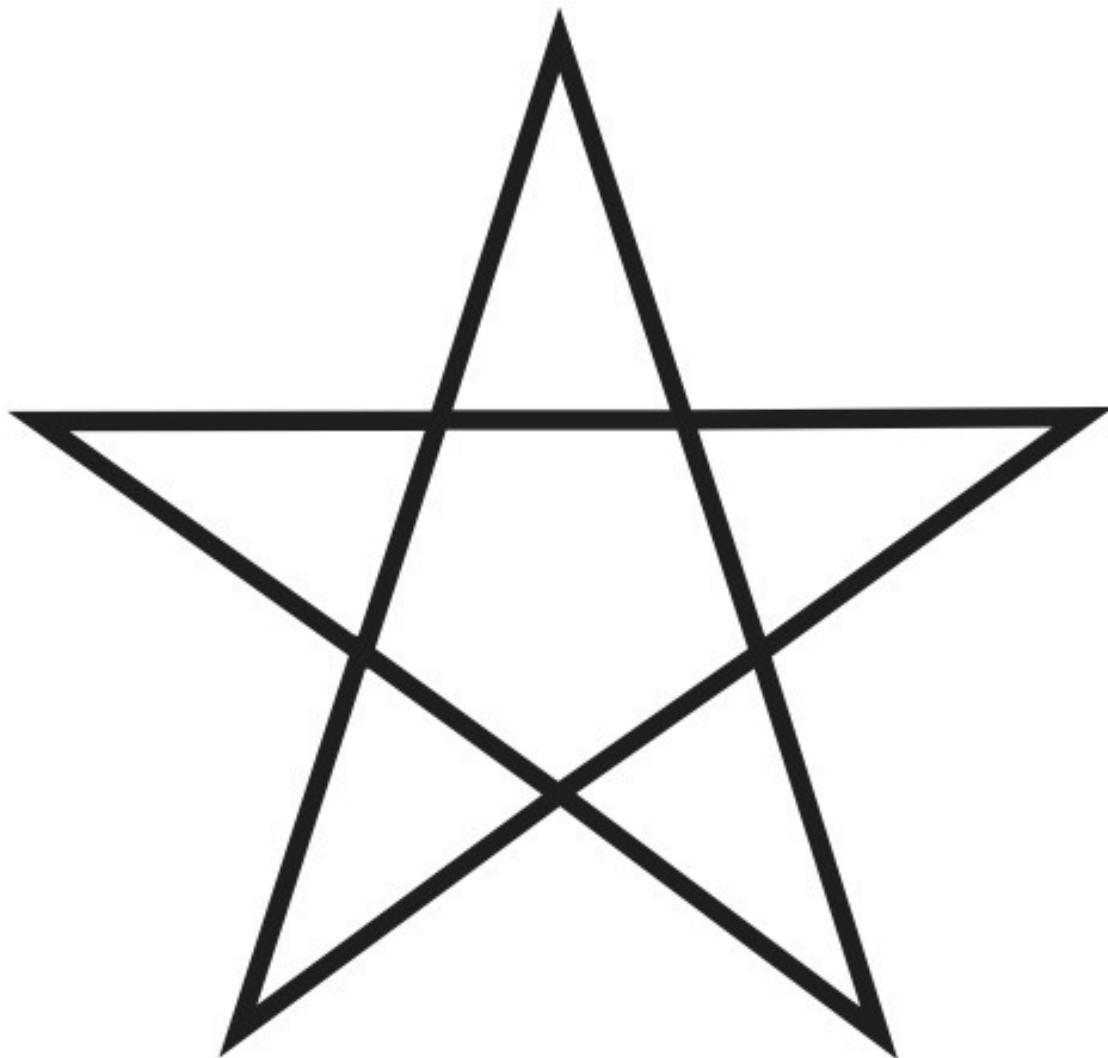

According to biblical tradition, the real name of God was always hidden from the people. The great secret that has been held on to for millennia is that the so-called ineffable name of God is not YHVH, the elemental formula known as Tetragrammaton. The secret name includes the insertion of another letter into YHVH, and it is the twenty-first letter of the Hebrew alphabet which is called shin and it is depicted below. When shin is inserted into YHVH it becomes YHSVH or Yod He Shin Vau He which is five letters and is therefore known as Pentagrammaton. The word Pentagrammaton literally means “five letters.”

The character commonly known as Jesus Christ in the Bible was deliberately and mysteriously named after the five Hebrew letters which you have just read. Now, can you imagine someone walking around Palestine and being called ‘Yod He Shin Vau He?’ This is not much different from walking around today and calling someone by the letters Y, H, S, V, H. Around the year zero, two of the primary languages being spoken at that time were Aramaic and Latin, the latter by reason of Roman occupation. The name of Yeshua was derived from these letters, but Yeshua was really a slang word based upon a slang vernacular of the two aforementioned languages. The name Joshua, which means “deliverer,” is the same name with a different pronunciation.

Although the above should either resolve or stir up considerable confusion for most people, there is considerably more to the equation.

Pentagrammaton also extends to the geometric shape known as the pentagram which also means ‘five letters’ and is configured esoterically as is illustrated below. In this sacred glyph, which the name of Jesus (properly translated as Yod He Shin Vau He) is meant to signify, lies the greatest mystery of the Freemasons and every other Western secret society: the Hebrew letter shin. Represented at the top of the pentagram star below, shin is really considered to be the ultimate secret within the secret.

The pentagram symbol is commonly misconstrued by the ignorant to mean devil worship and that is just the way the secret societies want it because they do not want you to know the truth. Christians who believe that the pentagram is evil have fallen for the bait and have literally identified the principle of their savior with that which they consider to be evil. This is a complete reversal of polarity from what the word and concept mean and were originally meant to convey. When the pentagram is reversed, however, then it could easily, and not necessarily incorrectly, be construed as evil. In this respect, shin is part of the equation either way. One has spirit over matter or under matter. This explains why the synchronicities I have experienced revolve around both the Christ and the Antichrist. Shin, however, is the bridge between the two and is a part of both.

In Hebrew, the mundane definition for shin is “tooth.” Rabbis, however, recognize that it also has esoteric meanings which are either “spirit” or “change.” The reason shin means “tooth” is that the ancestors of the Hebrews considered the wild boar or pig to be sacred. It was their totem and the boar’s tooth was shaped like a crescent moon. These ancestors identified the crescent tooth with shin because it meant “moon” in ancient Babylon. Their capital was Shinar which was named after the Goddess of the Moon. The moon represents not only the feminine spirit but also the changing cycles of the feminine spirit. Change also equates to time. In this respect, shin represents the secrets of time itself. This is why Jesus figures in the End Times. There is an actual logical formula to all the dramatic bric-a-brac that you hear or read about. It is, however, a rather elusive formula.

Long before it ever became a Hebrew letter, shin evolved out of the three-pronged trident which is identified with Poseiden or Neptune. This is an important correspondence because, in astrology, Neptune is considered to be the higher octave of Venus but also the ruler of all spirituality. That is the positive side of Neptune while the negative side of Neptune is deception, trickery, and fantasy disconnected from reality. This helps explain why the trident evolved into the devil’s pitch fork. Spirituality can be either negative or positive. Keep in mind that the real secret of alchemy or the Philosopher’s stone is to transmute the lower or base elements to the higher. This transmutation process applies directly to the qualitative states of both organic and inorganic life: Fire, Water, Air, and Earth. In Christian Cabala, these four elements represent Yod-He-Vau-He or tetragrammaton which also represents the tetrahedron, the basic building block of life or DNA which is literally composed of a series of tetrahedrons.

Pentagrammaton represents the pentagram and the ability of shin, as SPIRIT, to change the elements of Fire, Water, Air and Earth as well as the way they interact with each other. This places spirit in a causative position over the physical elements which is what life is always trying to do anyway: overcome its physical environment or limitations. Shin is the evolutionary principle of transmuting the elements or matter. It also represents the general principle by which DNA would or could change.

In the case of the “New Testament”, Christ is utilizing this principle to rearrange physical matter and thereby create miracles. More appropriately, Christ was not so much utilizing this principle but was causing results because He literally was or is the principle. Christ is also sometimes identified by Christians as the Shekinah Glory which refers to the glory of the feminine energy which is the secret energy of the Mercy Seat that rests above the Ark of the Covenant in the Holy of Holies.

Most of your popular scholars and conspiracy authors do not realize that the entire structure of ancient and modern Freemasonry is built upon the fundamental principle upon which the aforesaid ancient Muslim legend is based: the concept of shin. It is presented to some Freemasons as the greatest secret of their fraternity and one upon which the entire structure of the universe is based. Some, but not all, Freemasons receive this secret as part of the 33rd Degree. At the lower levels, most Masons are told the secret word is mahobone, (which means “what — the builder?”) but that is only the outer word for the uninitiated. The “builder” in mahobone refers to Hiram Abiff who built the temple based upon the principles of shin and you can sometimes find this in Masonic illustrations but not too often.

According to Masonic tradition, three ruffians killed Hiram Abiff, the builder of Solomon’s Temple, because he would not reveal the secret word. The original temple, of course, housed the shin in the form of the Shekinah Glory which manifested, usually once a year per tradition, over the Mercy Seat between two cherubs.

It is highly ironic, if not very telling, that in the New Testament, Jesus emphatically refers to Solomon’s Temple as “My Father’s House” when both biblical and historical sources know very well that “the Creator’s house” he is referring to contained neither the Ark of the Covenant nor the Shekinah Glory. It is well known that the Holy of Holies of the Second Temple was a watered down version of the original and was missing the ruach hakodesh which means “holy breath.” If you compare kodesh, however, with the Nubian word kadis and the Berber word kadiska, which both mean “cat,” you could translate ruach hakodesh as “breath of the cat.”

Jesus was also known as the Lion of Judeah and Yeshua Ben Pandera, the latter of which refers to the “son of the panther.”

The authors of the Bible knew very well that this Second Temple was missing the key ingredients which identified it with the Creator. In other words, it was an abomination compared to the first and had lost complete touch with the Creator. When Freemasonry refers to the aforesaid “builder,” they are also alluding if not directly referring to the authors of the Mystery Schools which created and/or influenced the entire scriptural doctrines of all Western religions. These mysterious builders are not much different from those who actually constructed the complexes beneath the Bucegi Mountains and the Giza Plateau. They leave subtle clues in a game which echoes the labyrinthine nature of the human brain.

Besides referring to Jesus as the Lion and Panther, he is also referred to as the Rejected Stone which is a direct reference to the capstone of the Great Pyramid. According to occult tradition, Jesus was initiated in the Great Pyramid during his missing years. The word pyramid literally means “fire in the middle” and this refers to the fact that the true Shekinah resides in the middle of a pyramid. There is an application of this principle which has been a very guarded secret in the martial arts and it can harness and release tremendous martial and healing power in an individual. This pyramid is in your groin area and is called the kwa. When we look at the bigger picture, however, the fire in the middle refers to the capstone itself. Keep in mind that the pyramid itself is the actual building block of life. This is why mystery writers placed Jesus in the role of the capstone. All of this refers to the fact that the dimensions for the Holy of Holies fit snuggly into the capstone of the Great Pyramid. These rather obvious observations give us far more than a new spin on the tired, lame and worn out interpretations that most people recognize as biblical truth.

The biblical divorce of Israel from Egypt portrays the Moses of the Hebrews as a hero, but an unbiased look at this human and theological drama tells you something else entirely. If you look at the empirical data of history, it tells you that the biblical exodus of Moses refers to a sequestration, dilution and splintering off of the original Egyptian priesthood and religion. The condensed wisdom that he took with him had a certain amount of power, but they had lost the energy of the pyramid itself. This coincides with a disease called leprosy which is not the leprosy of today but a discoloration of pigment that made it white and sickly. It was known as tzaraath. While the Moses of the Old Testament was named after Zalmoxis, he is most often identified historically as Tutmosis IV. As monotheism appears at this same time in history, the deformed and alienesque Pharaoh Ahkenaten is often thought to be the son or very close relative of the biblical Moses. It is, once again, this point in time where DNA manipulation or just rampant disease is believed to have occurred that altered the genetics of the population. This was a degeneration of the Blue Race. These details are covered in far more detail in “The Montauk Book of the Living”.

With the advent of the Israelites, the Holy of Holies is bereft of any pyramid energy and does not find a home until Solomon builds his temple. Only then does the shin, which manifests over the Mercy Seat of the Ark, SEEM to have found a home. Solomon is known for his wisdom but also known for making a black magic pact to control the jinn. He harnessed tremendous power but it was short-lived. If one believes the stories, he literally enslaved the population of many nations to build his temple. What is more important than the veracity of these events is that Solomon’s Temple becomes the entire analogy and basis upon which Freemasonry is built, the underlying principle being shin. This is an inarguable fact. In this manner, you can also see that Freemasonry’s intriguing dogma that is based upon the building of Solomon’s Temple is a misdirection and obfuscation of the true shin which actually belongs in the capstone of the Great Pyramid.

In this respect, the Freemasons have tried to take the essence of what was the greatest aspect of the Great Pyramid (the shin in the capstone) and have sequestered and twisted it into a convoluted form that becomes the degrees of Freemasonry. Freemasonry can therefore be construed as a corruption from the very beginning.

In Radu’s works, Freemasonry has been exposed and positioned as the major stumbling block to man’s spiritual evolution. If one understands the esoteric history of Christianity as I have laid out, it is hard to argue with him. This esoteric history, however, predates Christianity by a long shot.

Once upon a time, all of this information was available in a simpler and untwisted format, but it was expressed through the concept of the sacred feminine. If Jesus did not exist, the Mystery Schools would have invented him pretty much as he has been portrayed in order to serve their astrological and patriarchal interpretations of the Age of Pisces. In essence, their agenda was to de-feminize the Creator as much as possible or as was necessary to achieve their ends. None of this is meant to suggest that the Jesus that some of you have come to know and love did or did not exist. It is an observable fact, however, that the literature about Him coincided splendidly with the circumstances of that Aeon. It was not an accident that he was named after the Hebrew letters yod he shin vau he.

Thus it was that I wrote a book, “Synchronicity and the Seventh Seal”,* in order to rid myself of the unwanted debris that had accumulated around the various discoveries I had made. As I have already said, it worked wonders for me and I hope that what I have written here has helped you, particularly in regards to understanding the phenomena and circumstances in this book.

Throughout history, there has been so much confusion and war surrounding the term Jesus Christ that it is clear to me that virtually no one really knew what they are talking about when they uttered the term. With this in mind, I would also like to share with you the etymology of the word Christ.

[* What was included here about shin is examined in more detail in the book “Synchronicity and the Seventh Seal” which also delves into deeper historical issues.]

The word christ comes from the Greek christos which has multiple etymologies tracing back to Sanskrit. According to Greek texts, the terms Christ and Christians were originally spelled as Chrest and Chrestians and were directly borrowed from the temple vocabulary of pagans. Chrestos referred to a disciple on probation who was seeking the status of hierophant.

When this was attained through long trials of initiation, he was rubbed or “anointed” with olive oil which, in later Catholic days, became known as the chrism. The rubbing of oil was also associated with the names Moshe or Moses which meant messiah. While the word chrio meant “to rub, to anoint” (and evolved into Christos), it developed from the earlier Ionic form of it which was chreo.

These etymologies are very interesting because they demonstrate how modern day Christianity, the original doctrines of which were written in Greek, evolved with terms that were co-opted and altered from earlier traditions tracing back to India. The Greek chreo is a virtual phonetic duplicate of the Sanskrit kriya which is a tantric term which refers to a spontaneous physical or energetic manifestation that clears out energy in relation to rising kundalini. In Greek, chreo referred to communion with a god or oracle. This is a different form of tantric bliss that is open to being a little watered down.

The phonetics of kriya and krishna should also be noted. Kri is very similar to cre as in create or creator but krishna means “dark blue” in Sanskrit and this brings us back to the mysterious blue race which Krishna is identified with.

Kundalini is very much aligned with creating or creative energy. The etymology of create comes from crescent as in the moon (shin = moon in ancient Babylonian) which means “to grow or begat.” Hence, when we apply this to the modern concept of Christ, we see that ancient knowledge was adulterated for the masses and concentrated into a narrowly focused story meant to serve as an epic that was used to describe the hidden meaning of the Age of Pisces as it would be played out in this particular part of the Kali-Yuga. In such a scenario, the Christ (in this new age of Aquarius) represents the growth and expansion of the life force and with particular regard to it occurring on a massive scale in the form of a quantum leap.

When you take the mystery school factor into account, you can also understand that a phrase such as “the Word made flesh” is commonly misunderstood and reduced to the lowest common denominator. While the Word (or Logos) is the Godhead or creative live energy, the “made flesh” aspect refers to DNA which is the principle by which spirit activates matter.

The Christian Christ, as the redeemer of Mankind, is that which would redeem or heal DNA, instantaneously or otherwise. Change in the DNA is a requisite for the Christ Consciousness and this subject has been highly idealized ad nauseam in New Age literature with hyperbola and little real understanding.

According to Blavatsky, matter is the most remote region or manifestation of the creator. It is like a desert for the spirit. To “come home” requires a catalyst that would redeem or correlate all the junk DNA and make a fully activated consciousness of life. The implications are staggering.

To give a deeper context on the role that DNA plays in this scenario, let us revisit what was said earlier about a DNA strand existing in the shape of what is called a Mobius strip which, when unfolded into a two-dimensional plane, becomes the glyph for the Tree of Life where there are certain isolated “points” which equate to spheres or sepiroth, each of which represents a major archetype of human or creature experience. When one sits in front of a Tarot card spread as a querent, one is confronting the archetypes of one's personal life experience. What is generally missed, however, is that inside of the DNA itself there are corresponding or parallel points of reference which would mimic, duplicate, or be in sympathy with the archetypal struggles or issues of the querent. If one's issues are about money and relationships, there will also be a corresponding energy expression or block in the actual mechanics of the DNA.

The reference to the Tree of Life glyph is very important because it is one and the same with the DNA, one being a symbol of the other, but it also refers to the aforesaid Key of it All. It is the secret. As spirit activates matter through DNA, DNA is the mystery by which we interface with life.

This includes all the strange anomalies and challenges that life can present including those in the Bucegi Mountains of Romania.

In the regular Tree of Life schematic, the “Christ Center” is generally referred to as Tipareth from Hebrew. Tipareth also corresponds to Apollo (a word which derives from apo + leo, meaning the “uncovering of the cat”) who is the healer of the Greek pantheon as well as the son of God (Zeus). It is therefore obvious that there is a corresponding part of human physiology in the DNA to Tipareth.

Tipareth is the realm of beauty, harmony and equilibrium and represents the reconciliation of the inward with the outward. It is not, in Cabalistic tradition, something that exists within the physical plane although it manifests in such. If you were to fold a Tree of Life glyph into a Mobius strip, you would find that the point representing Tipareth fits exactly in the center of a DNA strand. Viewed from a certain angle, this would appear to be exactly in the center of a Vesica Pisces. This not only is in alignment with the astrological Christ, it suggests that Tipareth is part and parcel of interfacing with another dimension. That exact point is the shin where DNA can change or heal.

The Vesica Pisces was the heart of the mystery school interpretation of occult Christianity. Even though it does not appear as such in the New Testament, we know from history that the early Christians used it as a rallying symbol. The Vesica Pisces is only alluded to in a couple of places and one is the 153 fish that are caught to feed the multitudes. There are different interpretations of the 153, but the Vesica Pisces is the seed for all the different permutations of sacred geometry. If you stack 153 spheres or ping pong balls, they just happen to form a perfect equilateral triangle.

Inside of the triangle, which is the two-dimensional rendition of the pyramid, you have your fire, Shekinah or shin.

The fact that almost all Christian sects, and particularly the historical ones, embrace the mystery tradition of the Vesica Pisces is screaming evidence that Christianity was manipulated by Mystery Schools from the beginning.

Pythagoras is commonly and incorrectly recognized as the source of sacred geometry in the West, but he learned everything in Egypt where the Great Pyramid was the most prominent object of veneration. More ancient history or legend tells us that Egypt was taught its religion by Zalmoxis from present day Romania. The zal in Zalmoxis means leaping or transcending while the moxis means “god” but also equates to moses or messiah. Whatever the relative truth of these circumstances actually is, the significance of the Great Pyramid cannot be overlooked. One can also trace the history of these Egyptian Mystery Schools, as well as the Greek ones, to the ancient Thracian culture which existed in Romania and Bulgaria.

Zalmoxis emerged out of this culture. If we compare those ancient Mystery Schools to the builders of the Bucegi and Giza complexes, we have a lens which explains a lot. To get a better view, however, one wants to use as many lenses as possible.

I began this dialogue with the humorous idea of a court case that was attempting to prove the historical physical Jesus. Aside from the fact that the name itself is only a shadow of the truth, the facts and ideas I have presented make the court case a rather ridiculous proposition. A creature in a human body can only activate or demonstrate so much truth and can only do so for a very finite period of time. To condense all of this truth and focus it on a humanly divine body and whether or not it existed is equally ridiculous. The truth behind the circumstances and analogies is a universal truth that swirls in and around the cosmos. This is why Lao Tzu said “The Tao that can be named is not the true Tao.”

The court room analogy does, however, serve a couple of other important points with regard to the overall circumstances presented in this book. In the case where the faithful believe in Jesus without reference to one shred of empirical logic, they are primarily exercising their right brain or creative center to the exclusion of their left brain. The atheist or logician who does not accept anything creative or intuitive is not only working with the left brain, he is moving in the direction where his universe will or might eventually only accept data or experience based upon a steadfast materialism which will, by definition, lead to his demise as a spirit. The answer is with neither. The best analogy for this answer is in the unpublished work Exegesis by science fiction author Phil Dick who had his own remarkable experiences which taught him this lesson in a profound and rather inarguable way. He compared the shin to the corpus callosum of the brain which he said (quite correctly) integrates the left side of the brain with the right side of the brain. While this is an analogy of how this fundamental esoteric principle applies to human consciousness, it also makes perfect sense. One has to recognize the right brain which represents creative and non-linear phenomena and at the same time also recognize purely linear or logical phenomena. Life does not consist of logic or faith alone. These two polarities of life have to be integrated and, in this analogy, shin is the integrating principle. In the Christian paradigm, Jesus Christ represents the integration of the physical plane (with particular regard to the lost souls in it) with the heavenly realm of the Creator. It is the Vesica Pisces in action where two spheres interlock with each other: heaven and earth. In ancient Egypt, the interlocutor of these two spheres was the Pharaoh. This integration process of the two sides of the brain solves the problem of the court room analogy because it breaks down fundamentally to Life discovering Life. In other words, “Jesus” is not definable by purely left brained or purely right brained methods. As Shin, He is the life principle which integrates the two dichotomies. As an individual, you are faced with the challenge of integrating your left brain with your right brain. You do that through your own corpus callosum which is, in essence, the shin in you.

There is yet more irony with the court room analogy when we consider that shin represents the Last Judgement in the Tarot. In Crowley’s Thoth Deck, it is called the New Aeon and the Hebrew letter shin is displayed at the top of the card. In the Thoth Deck, each card is ruled by a Hebrew letter which exposit a certain principle. In this case, it is shin. If you consider that the fulcrum of the name Yeshua or Yod-He-Shin-Vau-He is shin, it is ironic that by calling Him into the court room, one is literally asking the “judge” or the ruler of the Last Judgment to actually judge Himself. While this invites another humorous analogy, it also prompts the question from the Godhead to the querent, “Who do you think you are to call Me into the court room?”

The obvious answer is that such a question causes you to wake up your own corpus callosum and to become self-aware of the shin inside of you. When you put the “integrator” (of the two sides of the brain) on trial, you are in essence putting yourself on trial. How this was acted out in history or will be in the future is really beside the point. You want to recognize, cultivate and refine the divinity within your own being. Judging whether someone else is divine or not takes you away from your own center.

In my experience, religion of any sort, particularly the Christian religion, is filled with too much shock and awe. This is also a method of psychological warfare. If you understand the principles behind religious dogma, it is like working behind the scenes at a carnival or circus. You know all the tricks of the trade. Throughout history, the circus hands or roustabouts as they are called were the Mystery Schools. In the Bucegi ensemble, they have created an absolutely marvelous carnival that creates plenty of shock and awe. If you think about what Radu said with regard to seeing documents about Project Blue Beam, it makes you wonder if there is an executive war behind the scenes over what “amusement park attraction” will be constructed next. It is sort of like a political or factional dispute at the executive offices of Disney over a ride that will be featured in Tomorrow Land.

When we consider the censorship issues that Radu speaks about, the censors are an altogether different part of my concocted court room scenario than Jesus Himself. If the scenarios depicted by Cezar are even remotely accurate, Jesus was emitting energy all over Palestine when He exuded the enormous vibration of love and peace that overwhelmed His audiences. This is the manifestation of a fully awakened kundalini at the very least. There is a problem, however. This energy created incredible chaos with local politicians and/or other censors and He was neutralized.

We also know, historically speaking, that many of His disciples were martyred after similarly emitting such energy. How well they duplicated His energy is debatable, but it is certain that many were martyred for at least spreading His word. It is obvious in such an analogy that Jesus Himself was subject to censors with a major Censor who is positioned as God the Father. At the same time, He and the Censor are one and the same. It is a part of Himself.

If we subpoena the Censor or the censors into the court room, we begin once again with the etymology of the word itself. The word censor comes from the Latin censure which means “to appraise, value, or judge.” In this regard, the censor itself is identified with the Godhead who would, could, or might judge us. If we are a part of this Godhead, we are indeed a part of this judgment process. Once again, these censors are a lost part of ourselves. In Rome, a censor was a census taker, but he was also an assessor of public morals. It is as if the censors of the Giza device are acting in the name of some moral code. Whether it is in our best interest, none of us know. We only know that they have a superior position from which to act or deny information in this regard.

The irony continues when we consider that the Giza device is dependent upon sensory perception of the individual as stimulated by the “sensors” that were concoctions of crystals and metal. The etymology of sensor is from sense from the Latin sensus which means “perception, feeling, undertaking, meaning” which is from sentire “to perceive, feel, know,” probably a figurative use of a literal meaning “to find one’s way,” probably from the pre-Indo-European base sent which means “to go” (comparable to Old High German sinnan “to go, travel, strive after, have in mind, or perceive” and the German Sinn which means “sense or mind”). Once again, we are brought back to shin. The cen in censor and the sen in sensor are also comparable to sinn or shin.

In any event, I hope that this dissertation helps your understanding of the esoteric forces and power that are at play in the experiences relayed to us by Radu. Whether one agrees with Radu’s experiences or any of my iterations, one cannot deny the synchronicity of these etymologies. In this respect the shin is both the sensor and censor of the Giza device and it is focusing the perception of the subject (in this case Cezar Brad) on the character of Jesus who represents the shin in esoteric Christianity. As Cezar himself said, what appears to be a truth to one person with this device can be a mockery to another. This suggests to me that the device itself is something of a mirror.

Much of what I have presented in this epilogue is metaphorical in order that you will better understand the underlying archetypal principles that are at work in Radu's journeys as well as my own. In an odd way, the abstract truths provided here might prove more true than the docu-facts of the actual history that occurred. The reason for this is that all the history of the Great Pyramid, or anything else for that matter, is an exoteric experience that is outside of the self. The esoteric or inner experience is far more important as that is what is inside of you. What is on the outside passes by save for a trace memory. It is the inner experience that stays with you.

The Mystery Schools of yesteryear were designed to give your an exoteric experience so as to awaken the esoteric experience of the mysteries inside of you. This is like waking up your DNA. The Mystery Schools are well known to historians, but they are largely a mystery to them. It is known that much of the procedure from the Greek Mystery Schools was based upon ergot fungus which is LSD. While LSD is not an advisable thing to play around with, it does bring things to the consciousness that would otherwise be completely foreign to a normal human. Who was actually behind the Mystery Schools is an excellent question.

The concepts, circumstances and incredible characters presented in Radu's books are suggestive of a Mystery School complex at work. Not only that, such a complex would have to be far older than any of the time periods suggested by Radu's books because those are only the approximate times of when the edifices were actually built. Whether you like or hate them, Mystery Schools are really only iterations of the Tree of Life that you live in. The brain, the body, the mind, and the spirit have never been fully understood by Mankind. Life is a mystery. The Tree of Life is a template of common denominators of experience which reflect this mystery. So is our DNA which is a living and more precise example of a Tree of Life glyph. All of the characters you have ever met or read about in your life, real or not, are represented in this template of the Tree of Life. People who are involved in falsity are also living out their own fake world through their own DNA. When you walk through a labyrinth, you are exercising a journey through the mysteries of the Tree of Life. Radu's books not only ignite this mystery and take us on a personal journey of wonderment and vicarious experience through our own Tree of Life, they are based upon real events and circumstances. What exactly those events and circumstances are have not been fully determined at this point. They are still a mystery, and this takes us to the present.

In my own journey, these exoteric or outside experiences with regard to the Romanian Sphinx, the Great Pyramid and the Key of it All found their way into my life through the principle of synchronicity; but it is only my inner experience that enables me to recognize the importance of them and make sense out of them. Originally, when I learned about the Montauk Project, I had no idea that the time experiments were done on the sacred ground of those who called themselves Pharoahs or that they were considered the royal native tribe of Long Island. Their shaman explained to me that their lineage was from Egypt. I would eventually meet Artie Crippen, the Montauk Medicine Man who is known as Red Medicine. He explained to me that the Pharoahs of Montauk descended from a Pharaoh of Egypt who was forced to leave Egypt. None of this was an accident, but the series of synchronicities have played themselves out over a very long period of time.

The best part of all these synchronicities was when Artie introduced me to his teacher, Grand Master Roosevelt Gainey, who I have been studying with for five years now. Grand Master Gainey founded the Taoist System of Living Arts (www.bodyenergetics.tv) and he teaches Taoist Chi Gong. Chi means “breath” in Chinese and it is the key to life. It is, quite literally, the underlying Key of It All. You can learn more about this in “The Montauk Book of the Living”. I mention this because what I am learning from Grand Master Gainey is synchronistically tied to the breathing exercises and theories that Cezar presents in this book. I am not going to elaborate on them as it gets too involved. What is important is that Cezar stresses the need to prime one’s breathing in order to travel in time. If this is true, I can tell you quite frankly that I’ve been being prepared for the last five years with some of the most sophisticated techniques you can imagine. I have not been doing it for time travel reasons, however, but by reason of the fact that it is the optimum way to health and spiritual development. What I am learning is not taught anywhere else in the world. I could share some elaborate stories and what not but now is not the time or place. In any event, this development in my life appears to fit into a pattern of divine synchronicity.

Although he does not talk about it too much, Grand Master Gainey knows more about pyramids than anyone in the world. I know this because he has taught me secrets that have been closely guarded for centuries if not millennia. You see only a smattering of this knowledge in what I have offered to you in this epilogue. He is a far cry from the typical teacher of sacred geometry because he actually applies the sacred geometry in terms of human motion. His demonstrations are breathtaking. People can be dropped from across a room without being touched, and this is really the tip of the iceberg. In the past, however, many people, particularly accomplished martial artists, go into abject denial when they see these demonstrations because they are so out-distanced by what he can do.

Chi Gong was actually taught in ancient Egypt which was called Khemet. The phonetics of Chi, Kee, and Khe in Khemet are not accidental, but I am not going to elaborate on that here. It runs very deep. Many of the concepts I have learned complement or are parallel to the geometrical secrets revealed in “The Book of the Law”, but that is almost beside the point. The more important aspect is that the synchronicities I have experienced have not led me to the Great Pyramid but rather the energy of the Great Pyramid. One of the reasons that Grand Master Gainey’s martial skill is so awesome is that he has learned how to contour and shape the human vehicle into compact and powerful geometric energies which is really reduced to pure physics. It looks like magic, but it is really Newtonian physics in action which also bridges into quantum physics. There are different levels of understanding and application.

I have long since become accustomed to stories or personal experiences of my own where people go into abject denial of Roosevelt Gainey’s abilities, even if they are demonstrated before their very eyes. It is therefore no surprise that many people will scoff at the contents of Radu’s stories without even considering the possibility that they might be possible. While they are not my stories and I am not in a personal position to vouch for them, I can tell you that such people who are not really capable of considering them as being possible are lame. It is perfectly fine not to believe them. After all, I cannot believe them because they are only data to me. I do not, however, deny them or project my own prejudices on the data that is being offered. A clear mind will accept data as data and not react to it.

When I told Roosevelt Gainey about the yidam described by Radu in “Transylvanian Moonrise”, he not only did not deny it, but he knew the exact type of phenomena I was talking about and referred to it as the Seventh Level. He said a few things about it and later gave an entire class on the Seventh Level, and I had to wonder if it was for my specific benefit. I have sometimes seen him design a particular class for one student and the others go along for the ride. He has done it for me before as well.

I should also tell you that my experiences in Chi Gong have placed me in a different world, and it is a pleasant world. Physical health and a happier life are the best testaments. There are also many enlightening esoteric components, but these are over most people’s heads. What is most curious, however, is that the lower levels are over most people’s heads as well.

People who do not experience Chi Gong will deny it or the fact that it will make them better. Getting over one’s denial is one of the biggest challenges.

I mention this because it also applies to the levels of initiation mentioned by Radu in his books. People on the outskirts will consider it to be science fiction or will dismiss it. Perhaps that is as it should be.

My own experiences and interactions with Romania, Radu, and Dr. David Anderson have woven an intriguing pattern into my own personal Tree of Life. I am not just reading a book but am actively involved in the energies they speak of although it is often enigmatic and ephemeral. One of the most strategic advantages I have working for me, however, is that these synchronicities, which involve many different people, have taken place over a long period of time. In Chi Gong, we are taught that slower is better. The totem of the Montauk Natives is the turtle. Slow and steady wins the race.

As we move into and beyond the year 2012, there have been some very interesting indications that some of these enigmatic factors will become more and more real. Earlier, I told you that Radu had promised me twice that he would deliver proof to me of some sort with regard to his claims. In December, I received a third communication reiterating this promise. He was wishing me a Merry Christmas and his message was more optimistic than any I had heard in some time. In the past, he often sounded concerned if not stressed about security or censorship matters. Now, for the first time in years, things had lightened up. Radu had listened to a broadcast I had done on Red Ice Radio out of Sweden and was very happy with the way I had presented his information but was particularly pleased that I had mentioned his promise to deliver me some kind of proof. He not only reiterated his promise to me for the third time, he gave me a little hint of what it would entail.

Radu reported that recently, outside of Romania, he had met with Elinor who had performed some amazing demonstrations for him. Furthermore, he told me that I could expect a surprise meeting with Elinor at a known location but not at a definite time. Some sort of proof will be delivered, but I have no idea what it will be. This opens the door to all sorts of possibilities and really made me wonder if the breathing exercises I am learning and practicing every day are indeed preparing me for some sort of time travel experience. I can tell you that if the stories about what Cezar said are true, I am certainly becoming qualified to interact with the phenomena of time in a manner that is outside of normal human experience. A meeting with Elinor, however, is an approach from a different angle than I had expected. It is certainly a pleasant and intriguing prospect.

When I first read about Elinor in “Transylvanian Moonrise: A Secret Initiation in the Mysterious Land of the Gods”, I felt that I was undergoing a profound initiation. Elinor talks about the mysterious alchemical tradition he is a part of which is known to elongate a human life up to thousands of years. While this would seem quite fanciful to the typical person, I was already initiated into living somewhere to at least 150-200 with proper Chi Gong practices. I have already written about this in The Montauk Book of the Living so I will not expound upon it here. After reading about Elinor, my horizon for living a long life was being extended to hundreds of years beyond 150-200. What Elinor was actually saying in his discourses with Radu was different and more experiential than any alchemical texts I had ever heard of. Like Roosevelt Gainey and David Anderson, Elinor actually applies principles. He is not a theoretician. As I read “Transylvanian Moonrise: for the first time, I was reading a translated copy that needed a lot of editing. I had paid a considerable sum for the translation knowing that it would eventually be paid for by sales of the future book. Even so, I felt the information was so valuable that I would have gladly paid the same amount just to know what was written. It was truly an initiation, but I did not think at that time that I would actually meet Elinor. Then again, if you study my personal history as is depicted in “The Montauk Book of the Dead”, you will learn that when I initially studied Scientology, I never had any idea or even any intention to meet L. Ron Hubbard, let alone work in his personal office or be a very trusted confidante. The same could be said for Marjorie Cameron. There is obviously a pattern in my life where my study of certain subjects leads to the players involved.

As I read the initial manuscript of “Transylvanian Moonrise”, I realized that most of you would be buying the book for a relatively small amount of money; and this made me wonder if you would have the same feeling of undergoing an initiation like I did. Could we all be receiving an initiation?

Well, if what has been projected in this dissertation is even fifty-percent accurate, I would venture to say yes. This is why I have taken care to discuss the Tree of Life as much as I have.

All of these stories, dramas and analogies you have read are far more important than just stories. They are a profound process of initiation and also an opportunity for personal evolution. If you read the words of Elinor and Repa Sundhi (a.k.a. Dr. Xien) in “Transylvanian Moonrise: A Secret Initiation in the Mysterious Land of the Gods”, much of what they have to say is about the evolution and soul development of individuals. The idea is presented, and it is certainly not a new idea but most definitely an undervalued one, that an individual soul has the opportunity to evolve from one level of consciousness to another. He/she can go downwards or upwards; and further, this process can take eons to accomplish. I suppose that if you evolve to the point where you can access time manipulation that you might be able to speed up this process. If David Anderson has taught us anything, it is that time can be slowed down and sped up. The censors, however, play a very critical role. He has stated time and again that censorship is the key to military strategies in our current global scheme.

I hope that what I have offered here has given you a better opportunity to understand the initiation process. It is not my intention for you to accept anything on blind faith. I know one of Radu’s friends who has reason to believe, through his own esoteric connections in Romania, that much of what Radu says in his books is true. He does not, however, believe that the character of Elinor is a real person. Accordingly, he is not likely to meet him. I, on the other hand, have an open mind. My viewpoint is not based upon belief but rather upon recognizing the consciousness behind a particular thread. Without committing to any fixed ideas or beliefs, I have left myself open to an opportunity for personal evolution. I can guarantee that there is much more to come and some very exciting times ahead. The exact outcome, however, is unpredictable.

Recently, I reached an agreement to have Radu's fourth book, "The Secret Parchment: Five Tibetan Initiation Techniques", translated into English. I have not had a look at it yet, but I know from what Radu has said that these techniques are designed to help you with your own personal evolution and perhaps you can even utilize them for your own journeys into time.

It has been my stated intuition for some time that once I completed the translation and editing of Radu's fourth book that I would eventually have the opportunity to meet with him. This will result in a fifth book, but I am not sure whether it will be written by him or myself. It is also possible that we could each write a "fifth" book.

I will leave you for now save for one more anecdote. In August of the coming year, which is 2012, I have been invited to return to Romania courtesy of Jonette Crowley (www.jonettecrowley.com) for what will be my fifth trip to that mysterious and beautiful country. We plan to visit the Sphinx, Sarmizegetusa, and several other areas. I mention this here, however, because of her last name. She does not know if she is related to Aleister Crowley, but she is Scottish as was he. While Jonette is not a dark or sinister character at all, it is ironic that I would return to Romania with someone of her namesake in light of all my previous synchronicities with the name Crowley and how it is related to the Christ and Antichrist. More drama will unfold and it should prove more than a little interesting. The synchronicity continues!

Appendix — Project Blue Beam

Project Blue Beam is a conspiracy theory that the secret government has been experimenting with a technologically simulated “second coming” that is accompanied and fueled by the reemergence of space-time projects such as were done at Montauk in order to manipulate the masses by inducing a biblical “rapture” so as to create a New World Order religion that will reinforce a central controlling authority and breed oneness with “God.”

Holographic projections of “Christ” have already been tested as well as images of alien craft, aliens, monsters, angels, and anything else you might imagine. These include images seen at Medjugorje that are accompanied by telepathic messages and other divine inspirations. This phenomena is computer generated and is coordinated with satellites and sophisticated transmitters.

Project Blue Beam operates on the premise that Man shall somehow become God in human form and control other Men and dictate all actions and thoughts. The calculated resistance to the new religion, the New World Order and the new “Messiah” will entail human loss on a massive scale in the ensuing “holy wars.” Blue Beam will pretend to be the universal fulfillment of the prophecies of old which includes the “second coming.” It will make use of the sky as a holographic projection screen for space-based laser-generating satellites. These projectors will project simultaneous images to the four corners of the planet, in every language by region. It deals with the religious aspect of the New World Order.

Blue Beam is implemented in four stages. The first step are earthquakes that result in archeological findings proving past religions are wrong. The second is the gigantic laser space show with holographic projections. Third is “Alternative Talk” where people receive telepathic communication in their brains through low frequencies, very low frequencies and extremely low frequencies. They will think they are talking to God. The fourth stage is a massive space show with a false alien invasion aimed at creating nuclear disarmament by all nations under the umbrella of the United Nations (which by the way was originally headquartered in Lake Success at Sperry Corporation, the main contractor for the Montauk Transmitter Tower). This will be followed by massive electronic apparitions of spectres, angels, demons, ghosts, and poltergeists and directed towards a “second coming” which will justify massive killing and chaos.

Is it true? You can read up more about it on the internet. All I would tell you is that the word divine is phonetically and etymologically attached to “divide” as in “distinguish.” The Godhead or Tao divides into dark and light or yin and yang and you need to cultivate your own ability to discern.

Sky Books

Established in 1992, Sky Books became immediately recognized as the premier publisher in the world on the scientific pursuit of time travel and time control when it published “The Montauk Project: Experiments in Time”, a book which shook the world due to its unprecedented insight into the mechanics of time. Always immersed in very controversial subject matter and traditionally boycotted by the mainstream media, Sky Books is a company built on grass roots popularity and its influence has been recognized worldwide with translations in Japan, China, Germany, Spain, Romania and Bulgaria. Sky Books has published over fifteen titles since releasing “The Montauk Project” and also issues a quarterly newsletter which has continuously remained in print since 1993. Continue reading for further information on these titles and also newsletters (including back issues) on the topic of the Montauk Project. Ordering instructions are at the very end.

Since “The Montauk Project” was published in 1992, there have been many interesting developments and several sequels chronicling the investigation to determine whether or not the Montauk Project did, in fact, exist. Preeminent in this quest has been the Montauk Pulse, a quarterly newsletter that has been written by Peter Moon since 1993. It has never missed an issue, and there has never been a lack of interesting things to report upon, and these include Peter Moon’s adventures with Dr. David Anderson (www.andersoninstitute.com), a scientist who has excelled in understanding the actual mechanics of time and has made remarkable breakthroughs with time control technology. Dr. Anderson’s work is all based upon hard science.

If you are interested in subscribing to the Montauk Pulse or receiving past back issues, you may visit the Sky Books website or follow the ordering instructions at the very end of this ebook. The Sky Books website also features all of our sequels to “The Montauk Project” and other titles which are all available in hard copy format. We are also currently working hard to get all Sky Books titles into ebook format as well, including the back issues of the Montauk Pulse which now features three separate volumes comprising six years worth of newsletters each. The Sky Books website is as follows:

THE MONTAUK PROJECT: EXPERIMENTS IN TIME

“The Montauk Project” chronicles the most amazing and secretive research project in recorded history. Starting with the “Philadelphia Experiment” of 1943, invisibility experiments were conducted aboard the USS Eldridge that resulted in full scale teleportation of the ship and crew. Forty years of massive research ensued, culminating in bizarre experiments at Montauk Point that actually tapped the powers of creation and manipulated time itself. “The Montauk Project” bridges the modalities of Science with the most esoteric techniques ever imagined and finally catapults us to the threshold of the stars. We all know something is out there, but we’re not sure exactly what. This book, at long last begins to provide some solid clues.

THE SEQUELS

The stir and controversy produced by “The Montauk Project” was overwhelming to the society it was released into in 1992. The powers that be behind the military industrial complex had a lot to explain. As has been the pattern for decades, they called on one of their old allies, Hollywood, and a whole new genre of television shows were spawned in an attempt to absorb the fallout of questions and to do damage control on the trail of information thus exposed. The most successful of these shows was the X Files. In the meantime, Peter Moon set about trying to verify the general thesis put forward in “The Montauk Project”. The result was of equal interest to the first book and resulted in:

SERIES

Montauk Revisited: Adventures in Synchronicity

When Peter Moon researched the remnant trail of this mysterious time travel project, he encountered incredible and unprecedented experiences in synchronicity which ultimately unmasked many of the occult forces that were behind the technology used in the Montauk Project. Following the trail of these “coincidences,” Peter Moon reveals an enigmatic occult tapestry which leads from the mysterious associations of the Cameron Clan to the genesis of American rocketry and the magick of Aleister Crowley, Jack Parsons, and L. Ron Hubbard. The Montauk investigation carries forward as Preston Nichols tells the bizarre history of the electronic transistor as he opens the door to Peter Moon and unleashes a host of incredible characters and new information. A startling scenario is depicted that reaches far beyond the scope of the first book. Illustrations and photos are included.

256 pages, ISBN 0-9631889-1-7 $19.95

Immediately after “Montauk Revisited” was completed, and much to his surprise, Peter Moon discovered that the mysterious trail of synchronicities was getting even more fascinating when he discovered that the site of the Montauk Project experiments was sacred Native American ground that was once accompanied by ancient pyramids which could be clearly seen in old photographs of Montauk. The result of this brand new investigation was:

BOOK III
OF THE MONTAUK
SERIES

Pyramids of Montauk: Explorations in Consciousness

An astonishing second sequel to “The Montauk Project” and “Montauk Revisited” awakens the consciousness of humanity to its ancient history and origins through the discovery of pyramids at Montauk. A full examination of the mysteries of the pyramids at Montauk Point reveals that the Montauk Tribe were the royal family of Long Island and that they used the name Pharaoh as a designation that connected their heritage to ancient Egypt and beyond. The discovery that these pyramids were placed on sacred native American ground opens the door to an unprecedented investigation of the mystery schools of earth and their connection to Egypt, Atlantis, Mars and the star Sirius. This book explains why Montauk was chosen as a select location for pyramids and time travel experimentation. A further examination of sacred geometry awakens the consciousness of humanity to its ancient history and origins. Preston Nichols also fascinates us with an update on covert operations that includes the discovery of a nuclear particle accelerator and the development of psychotronic weapons. The “Pyramids of Montauk” stirs the quest for the end of time as we know it. Includes photos and illustrations.

256 pages, ISBN 0-9631889-2-5, $19.95

The adventures had only just begun by this point. It was now 1995. After all of this information came out, Preston Nichols then revealed that he had mysterious UFO experiences as a young child and also as a teenager. This resulted in a new book which blends the history of physics and UFOlogy with Preston’s personal experiences and gives unprecedented insight into the technology of flying saucers and their accompanying phenomena in:

ENCOUNTER IN THE PLEIADES: AN INSIDE LOOK AT UFOs

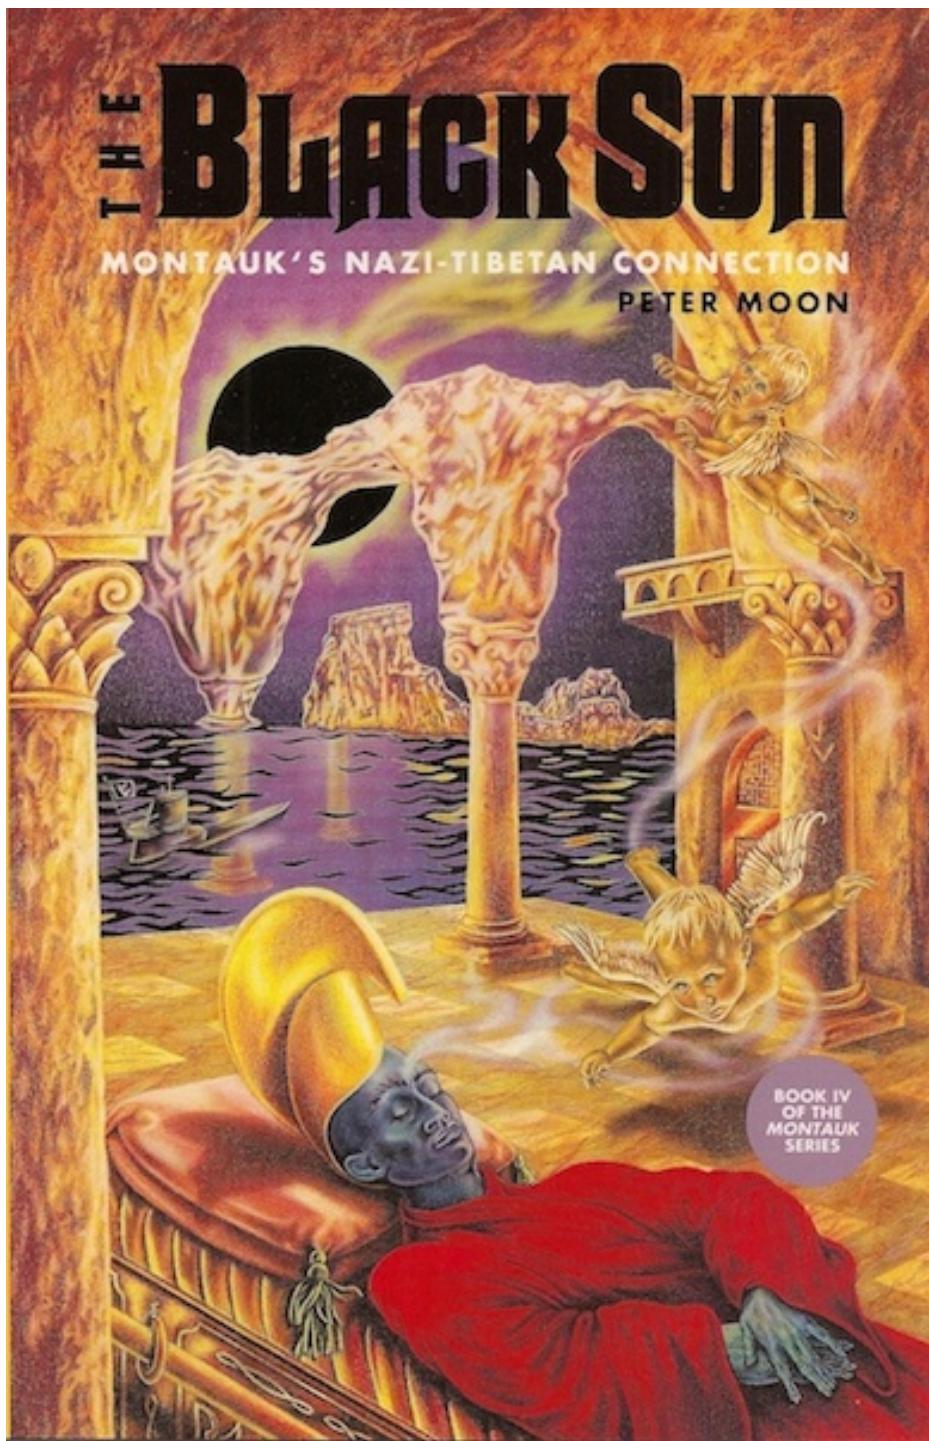

Encounter in the Pleiades: An Inside Look at UFOs

No constellation in the night sky has rivaled the Pleiades for its impact upon the mind of man. Artists, poets, scientists, mythographers and prophets alike have not only cited the Pleiades as an inspiration to their work but as a key to understanding mankind and his/her relationship with the creative principles of existence. This book is the incredible story of a man who found himself taken to the Pleiades where he was examined and instructed by intelligent life forms who appeared human. The Pleiadians proceeded to give him an education and indoctrination that would enable him to regain his health and attain an unparalleled understanding of electromagnetic science and its role in UFO technology. A new look at Einstein gives insights into the history of physics and how the speed of light can be surpassed through the principles of reality engineering. New concepts in science are offered with technical but simple descriptions even the layman can understand. These include the creation of alternate realities through the use of twisters and spinners; mind control aspects of the Star Wars defense system; implants; alien abductions and much more. Never before has the complex subject of UFOs been put together in such a simple language that can be appreciated by the scientist and understood by the layman. Peter Moon adds further intrigue to the mix by divulging his part in a bizarre project which led him to Preston Nichols and the consequent release of this information. His account of the role of the Pleiades in ancient mythology sheds new light on the current predicament of Mankind and offers a path of hope for the future.

256 pages, ISBN 0-9631889-3-3, $19.95

By the time “Encounter in the Pleiades” was published, Peter Moon had also accumulated considerable information on intriguing connections between the Montauk Project and the Nazis which also extended to the latter’s mysterious connections to Tibet via occult master-mind Karl Haushofer. Peter’s collection of information on this subject culminated with a visit from world renown author, Jan van Helsing, who allowed him to publish (for the first time in America) his photos of the mysterious German flying craft built before and during World War II in connection with the Vril Society. There is much to read in:

THE BLACK SUN: MONTAUK’S NAZI-TIBETAN CONNECTION
by Peter Moon

The Black Sun: Montauk's Nazi-Tibetan Connection

After World War II and the subsequent occupation of Germany, Allied military commanders were stunned to discover the penetrating depth of the Nazi regime's state secrets. The world's best intelligence organization was not the least of these revelations. Also discovered were massive and meticulous research files on secret societies, eugenics and other scientific pursuits that boggled the imagination of the Allied command. Even more spectacular was an entire web of underground rocket and flying saucer factories with accompanying technology that still defies ordinary beliefs. A missing U-boat fleet possessing the most advanced submarine technology in the world left many wondering if the Nazis had escaped with yet more secrets or even with Hitler himself. Behind all of these mysteries was an even deeper element: a secret order known to initiates as the Order of the Black Sun, an organization so feared that it is now illegal to even print their symbols and insignia in modern Germany. “The Black Sun” probes deeper into the secrets of the Third Reich and its Tibetan contacts than any other previous attempt. Author Peter Moon ties all of these strange associations to Montauk Point, where an American military facility was used by the Nazis to further their own strange experiments and continue the agenda of the Third Reich. Peter Moon unravels more Montauk mysteries which leads to the most insightful look ever into the Third Reich and their ultimate quest: the Ark of the Covenant and the Holy Grail. This quest penetrates the secret meaning behind the Egyptian and Tibetan “Books of the Dead”. Includes photographs and illustrations.

When “The Black Sun” was completed, a very interesting man surfaced who was mentioned in “Montauk Revisited” by the pseudonym of Stan Campbell who had gone to prison for refusing to cut his ties to Preston Nichols. Preston’s revelations concerning Montauk were very hot at the time and “Stan’s” involvement in the Montauk Project was a very sensitive issue to the authorities. When he was eventually released from prison, he no longer had anything to lose and went public under his real name, Stewart Swerdlow, and wrote:

Montauk: The Alien Connection

As the new millenium unfolds, countless stories of alien abductions have begun to penetrate the mainstream consciousness of Mankind. While some new insights into the human condition have been obtained, too few of these accounts have brought such experiences to a level where they can be consumed and digested into a profitable understanding for the individual reader. “Montauk: The Alien Connection” unravels the remarkable story of Stewart Swerdlow, a gifted mentalist who has experienced extrasensory perception since birth. Stewart’s rare abilities not only made him a magnet for government surveillance, but his unique genetic structure made him a clearing house for different alien agendas which sought him out for their own purposes. Everyone’s sinister plans went haywire after Stewart began a deprogramming procedure with Preston Nichols which was designed to clear his memories and the controlling influences which had been installed. Stewart was subsequently threatened and eventually jailed after refusing to comply with orders to sever his ties with Nichols. Despite this, the truth began to work its way into his life. Estranged from his family, Stewart was sent to prison as a financially destitute and hopeless, tragic figure. Despite a severe human struggle, he was able to call on his own God-given abilities, reshuffle the deck, and reevaluate his life and the various agencies and entities which sought to utilize him. Weeding out the most negative influences, Stewart was able to recover key memories and discard those forces which sought to entrap him. The most intriguing aspect of his incredible story is that he has a valuable legacy to share.

The miraculous and strange become common place as you journey out of this dimension with Stewart Swerdlow and discover the Language of Hyperspace, a simple system of geometric and archetypal glyphs enabling us to comprehend universal mysteries ranging from crop circles to the full panorama of occult science. Written for both individuals and practitioners alike, The Healer's Handbook embraces color healing, dream analysis, numeric values and symbols, auric fields, astral and hyperspace travel, and radionics as well as offering exercises designed to unlock DNA sequences programmed within you since the beginning of your existence. The ancients uniformly alluded to an arcane language, sometimes described as Vril or Babylonian, which was once common to all mankind, connected to the Mind of God and also served as an inter-species and interuniversal language. Now, for the first time ever, is an entire text dedicated to the explanation of these ancient concepts. This book penetrates the secrets of creation through DNA and includes a vast panorama of healing and meditation techniques. Fully illustrated with exercises, color chart, Dream Dictionary and Hyperspace Dictionary which includes the most complete rendering of the Hyperspace Language available.

Having known Preston Nichols for many years at this point, Peter Moon had heard many stories of Preston's intriguing involvement in the music industry where he worked as a sound engineer for many popular rock groups of the Sixties and Seventies. At the same time, Preston became involved in some very hot political water over the legal case concerning John Ford, the founder and president of the Long Island UFO Network. John was put targetted by government forces and was incarcerated ever since without ever having received a trial. Read about both of these intriguing aspects of Preston's life in:

The Music of Time

The “Music of Time” blends music with time travel as Preston Nichols reveals his hidden role in the music industry where he worked as an expert sound engineer and recorded hundreds of hit records during the Golden Era of Rock ’n Roll. Beginning with his work for Time Records, Preston chronicles his innovations in sound engineering and tells how he constructed the premier music studio in the world for Phil Spector at Bell Sound. Having created a Mecca for talented musicians, Preston found himself surrounded by and interfacing with the likes of the Beatles, Beach Boys, Rolling Stones, and many more such popular acts. For the first time, Preston reveals his employment at Brookhaven Labs and how his connections in the music industry were used for mind control and manipulation of the masses. Ultimately, Preston’s real life adventures lead to time travel and the bone chilling efforts of his adversaries to put him permanently out of commission. These include his association with John Ford, the founder of the Long Island UFO Network, who was arrested on the ridiculous charge of conspiring to put radium in the toothpaste of the local County Executive. Ford was railroaded into jail without a trial and then placed in an institute for the criminally insane without ever having received any trial, let alone a fair one. The County Executive was later imprisoned himself but Ford remains locked up to this day. In a remarkable twist of fate, mysterious forces rescue Preston and lead him to a bizarre series of financial transactions which set him up to be involved in a new time travel project. The “Music of Time” unravels more layers of mystery in mankind’s epic quest to understand the paradox of time and the imprisonment of consciousness.

With all the literature that had been produced thus far, the subject of the Montauk Project was very popular and intriguing to the public but its controversy raised many questions and attacks by those who were upset by the data and disillusioned by their own belief systems being shattered. Peter Moon sought out additional sources to verify aspects of the general story of the Montauk Project that were not connected to Montauk Project per se. The first book of this nature from Sky Books was:

The Philadelphia Experiment Murder: Parallel Universes and the Physics of Insanity

An added edition to the intriguing series by Sky Books which exposes the truth about the conspiracy to manipulate time itself. This book, edited and contributed to by Peter Moon and authored by Alexandra Bruce, begins with the tragic murder of conspiracy lecturer Phil Schneider. An investigation of this murder exposes a massive cover-up by authorities and reveals astonishing information, the trail of which leads back to the Philadelphia Experiment of 1943. Before his assassination, Schneider lectured across the country and released documents connecting his father to the U.S.S. Eldridge. Additionally, his father claimed to be a Nazi U-boat captain who, after being captured by the Allies, was recruited as a medical officer and served as a Senior Medical Officer to the crew of the Eldridge. More haunting was the discovery of gold bars in his father's possessions with Nazi insignia. "The Philadelphia Experiment Murder" investigates these circumstances and uncovers a host of new characters including Preston Nichols' actual boss from the Montauk Project. Startling truths are revealed which lead to an examination of parallel universes and the nature of insanity itself.

The Brookhaven Connection

Since the advent of the atomic era, Long Island's Brookhaven National Laboratory has served as the premier and most top secret research lab in the world. Shrouded in mystery since its inception, no one has been able to crack the code of secrecy surrounding it. Wade Gordon, who grew up in and around the lab and amidst its top players, now tells his personal story of how he was groomed from a very young age to share the legacy of what happened there. Beginning with Brookhaven's formative years when the Philadelphia Experiment was researched, links are revealed which tie Brookhaven directly to the Roswell Crash, the National Security Act, the MJ-12 documents (which are included in this book) and the Montauk Project. This includes a description of a time chamber which was utilized to monitor the JFK assassination in order to secure funding for the continued existence of the researchers.

One of the most interesting research threads Peter Moon had ever encountered occurred right after completing "Montauk Revisited", but it took years for him to meet the man who was responsible for circulating this mysterious legend of quantum research on the internet. his name is Joseph Matheny. Ong's Hat: The Beginning

Ong's Hat is a real but enigmatic location in south central New Jersey that has inspired a counterculture revolution in physics. Exotic pursuits in the Many-Worlds Interpretation of quantum mechanics by Princeton physicists paved the way for avant-garde experiments in quantum consciousness. Integrating meditation with biofeedback and brain machine techniques, synchronicity attractors were developed which sought out tangible states of existence beyond the bounds of Earth. Allegedly, the experimenters achieved success with the accessing of parallel universes. Up to now, the truth about the cult has been vague and indecisive, but the legends, technology and quantum theory surrounding it are more than tangible. Since Peter Moon's involvement in the Montauk investigation, he has encountered incredible synchronicities with regard to space-time projects and clans of mystery. None of these have been more riveting than his encounter with Joseph Matheny and the legends of Ong's Hat, a real but enigmatic location in south central New Jersey that was once used as a return address for dissident Princeton physicists who wrote anonymous papers that broke the scientific barriers of the day. This is the first book in hard copy format to explore Ong's Hat, the home of a mysterious ashram with both scientific and natural features that included a hodgepodge of Tantra, Sufism, Ismaili esotericism, alchemy, psychopharmacology, biofeedback and brain machine meditation techniques that was said to involve actual time travel by the participants. Compiled by Joseph Matheny, a multi-talented individual who was "chosen" as an intermediary by the time-travel cult, this work is based upon the popular ebook known as "The Incunabula Papers," but also contains new material revealed for the first time that includes interviews with actual survivors from the ashram and the revealing of an "egg" used for attracting synchronicity induced time travel.

Up to now, the truth about the cult has been vague and indecisive, but the legends, technology and quantum theory surrounding the cult have been more than tangible.

Peter Moon's collaboration with Joseph Matheny was a big breakthrough because it gave further answers to many of the fascinating magical threads which had been uncovered in "Montauk Revisited". By this point in time, Peter was also sitting on many more aspects of that story, with particular regard to the Babalon Working and the connection between Jack Parsons and L. Ron Hubbard, which had not been fully communicated in his previous work. These were written up and released in:

SYNCHRONICITY & THE SEVENTH SEAL
by Peter Moon

SYNCHRONICITY AND the SEVENTH SEAL

Synchronicity & the Seventh Seal

This is Peter Moon's consummate work on Synchronicity. Beginning with a brief scientific description (for the layman) of the quantum universe and how the quantum observer (the spirit) can or does experience the principle of synchronicity, we are taught that synchronicity is also an expression of the divine or infinite mind. Besides exploring the concept and influences of parallel universes, this book includes numerous personal experiences of the author which not only forges a pathway of how to experience and appreciate synchronicity, but it goes very deep into the magical exploits of intriguing characters who sought to tap the ultimate powers of creation and use them for better or for worse. This not only includes the most in depth analysis and accurate depiction of the Babalon Working in print but also various antics and breakthroughs of the various players and that which influenced them. These characters include the legacies and personas of Jack Parsons, Marjorie Cameron, L. Ron Hubbard and Aleister Crowley. Peter Moon adds exponential intrigue to the mix by telling us of his personal experiences with these people and their wake which leads to even deeper encounters which penetrates the mysterious legacy of John Dee. Eventually, this pursuit of synchronicities leads Peter Moon to a most intriguing and mysterious encounter with Joseph Matheny, an adept who has not only had similar experiences to Peter, but has his own version of a space-time project known as Ong's Hat. Matheny has not only had incredible synchronicities himself, he created one of the highest forms of artificial intelligence known to man, a computer known as the Metamachine which is designed to precipitate and generate synchronicities. These many synchronicities lead to the books climax, a revelation of the true Seventh Seal. The proof is delivered. No theologian nor anyone has even tried to counter the claim.

455 pages, $29.95, ISBN 0-9678162-7-0

After "Synchronicity and the Seventh Seal" was finished, Peter Moon wanted to complete a trail of investigation that he had pursued for many years and this had to do with occult phenomena surrounding a "quantum relic" he had been mysteriously handed when writing about the Montauk Pharoahs in "Pyramids of Montauk". This "quantum relic" was so interwoven into the fabric of his life that he realized that, in order to present a complete picture, he would have to write two books instead of one. The first book was autiobiographical and includes an in depth look at Peter

Moon's personal association with L. Ron Hubbard. It was deemed necessary to write this book before he could address the topic of the "quantum relic."

THE MONTAUK BOOK OF THE DEAD
by Peter Moon

THE MORTAUK BOOK OF THE DEAD

PETER MOON

The Montauk Book of the Dead

A tale of the intrigue and power which hovers over the most sacred kernel of our existence: the secrets of life and death. Beginning with his early years, Peter Moon reveals fascinating details of exactly how he became involved with Scientology and serendipitously ended up working in the personal employ of L. Ron Hubbard aboard the latter's famous "mystery ship" which was called the Apollo. Included in this riveting account is the story of how L. Ron Hubbard, at the age of twenty-seven, clinically "died" only to discover that he could "remote view." From this state of consciousness, which would later be called "exterior," he was able to access what he termed the answers to all of the questions that had ever puzzled philosophers or the minds of men. Transcribing this information into a work entitled "Excalibur," which is still under lock and key to this day, he developed one of the most controversial movements in history: Dianetics and Scientology. The truth and import of the above can only be evaluated by the all out war which was waged by governmental forces and spy agencies to obtain the legally construed rights to the above mentioned work and all of the developments and techniques that ensued from it. This is the personal story of Peter Moon which not only pierces the mystery of death and reveals fascinating details of his years aboard L. Ron Hubbard's mystery ship but gives the most candid and inside look ever at one of the most controversial figures in recent history.

451 pages, $29.95, ISBN 978-0-9678162-3-4

When "The Montauk Book of the Dead" was completed, Peter Moon would finally correlate information and experiences he had accumulated for twelve years, all of which surrounded a mysterious "quantum relic" which was, in fact, a 1909 playbill from the New Montauk Theatre that contained cryptic occult messages which are expounded upon in full in:

THE MONTAUK BOOK OF THE LIVING
by Peter Moon

The Montauk Book of the Living

PETER MOON

The Montauk Book of the Living

A stunning new book by Peter Moon that tells how his research into the Montauk Pyramids led to the discovery of a mysterious quantum relic. This relic not only led to the Matriarch of the Montauk Pharoahs but has opened the door to understanding the greatest mysteries of history. These include the occult biochemistry of an Amazonian Blue Race which founded the Egyptian culture and honored the feminine principle through the star Sirius. These truths lead to the unveiling of the biological truth behind the Virgin Birth and how this theme intertwines with the descendants of these Amazons who live today and are known as the Blue People of the Saha ra. Other occult surprises include new revelations concerning Aleister Crowley's The Book of the Law that demonstrably reveals that the ancients who built the pyramids of Cairo and Mars knew deeper secrets concerning DNA that our scientists of tod ay. The pursuit of these various threads leads to Peter Moon's encounter with Red Medicine, the Medicine Man of the Montauks who is destined to fulfill the Second Coming of the Pharoahs, a time prophesied by native elders which signals the return of ancient wisdom, universal brotherhood and healing . This is also the riveting personal story of Peter Moon which includes new streams of synchronicity that include the mystical background behind the events which led to the revelation of the Montauk Project. Old themes are revisited and more deeply explored, but there are more new twists and turns than ever. The legacy of the Montauk Pharoahs is explored as never before and leads to more truth than can be readily believe which is designed to launch a new era once prophesied by Native Elders as the Second Coming of the Pharaohs, said to signal the return of ancient wisdom, universal brotherhood and healing.

384 pages, $29.95, ISBN 978-0-9678162-6-5

Although intriguing follow-ups had been done with the data uncovered in "Montauk Revisited" and "Pyramids of Montauk", there was also an equally fascinating trail of data with regard to the Nazi-Tibetan connection researched in "The Black Sun". This research is so controversial and so proprietary to the Government that it is virtually impossible to pursue beyond a certain point if one is going to use routine journalism. Taking solid threads that are based upon hard facts of journalism, Peter Moon opted to penetrate the unknown or occult aspects of the Nazi-Tibetan story through an intuitive stream of consciousness in:

SPANDAU MYSTERY

by Peter Moon

SPANDAU MYSTERY

PETER MOON

Spandau Mystery

A historical novel by Peter Moon which reveals how the mysterious deaths of General George Patton and Deputy Fuhrer Rudolph Hess were intertwined through the Nazi's secret flying saucer technology. Directed by Tibetan elders, the Germans sought to harness the Vril, an energy so powerful that it can change the very nature of the elements themselves. To succeed, however, a major change was required in the evolutionary development of the human species. A dramatic scenario of events unfolded, however, which not only ensured that this endeavor was sabotaged but included an undertaking designed to prevent humanity from ever discovering its ancient heritage and the secrets of the Vril. It was against this backdrop that two of the most colorful characters of World War II, Rudolph Hess and George S. Patton, became immersed in an age old battle involving the legions of light and darkness. The end of World War Two precipitated more intrigue and struggle for power than the war itself. Much of this centered around the secret projects sponsored by Rudolph Hess which included not only the Antarctic project but the construction of Vril flying saucers. Patton's job, as the war came to a close, was to recover the secret technology of the Germans and safeguard it for American use. After accomplishing his mission and compiling a German history of the war, General Patton was killed in a dubious accident, the mystery of which has never been solved and has been magnified by government refusal to declassify the file on the investigation of his death. Far more conspicuous and powerful than Patton was Rudolph Hess, the Deputy Fuhrer of Germany, who flew to England in 1941 as an envoy of peace and was imprisoned for life and suspiciously killed just before his imminent release. The current of intrigue and power which permeated these two individuals and led to their downfall was the same current which led to a repatriation of the U.S. Government and an undermining of a constitutional government that is run by and for the people. Besides technology, much of this intrigue centered around the banking files the Nazis confiscated from the Freemasons. The effort to keep this secret is still a factor in today's politics. It was thus that Patton and Hess wore different uniforms but shared common interests and held within their grasp a force so powerful that, if harnessed, it might raise the ancient civilization of Atlantis itself. It was for this power that both were killed and so begins our mystery. "Spandau Mystery" is an historical novel and murder mystery featuring 350 pages of fast and easy reading which penetrates one of the greatest intrigues surrounding the Nazis and their occult interests in Tibet: the ancient Dropa civilization, a group of “little people” who claim to descend from the stars and whose corroborating artifacts have been studied by scientists for over half a century. If you would like a new view of world history, order and read this book today.

As all of the aforementioned books were written and Peter Moon continued to report on various aspects of the Montauk phenomena, he met a very unusual and intriguing scientist, Dr. David Anderson, an engineer and physicist who had his own Time Travel Research Center on Long Island. This was a serious laboratory where time could be slowed down or speeded up in a self-contained field. Dr. Anderson also had a research center in Romania and eventually invited Peter to that country to lecture at a United Nations camp for youth. During this time, “The Montauk Project” was translated into the Romanian language and was ultimately responsible for creating a brand new publishing company in Romania, Daksha Publishing, which subsequently published what is arguably the most amazing story in the history of Mankind. It is intertwined with Peter Moon’s adventures with Dr. David Anderson in:

TRANSYLVANIAN SUNRISE

Transylvanian SUNRISE

Transylvanian Sunrise

A mysterious scientist by the name of David Anderson made an eventful trip to Romania in 1999. Dr. Anderson, who is credited by the U.S. government as having developed advanced time-warp field technology, established diplomatic connections on this trip to Romania where he also set up an advanced research facility dedicated to studying the mathematics of time travel. Upon his return to the United States, Dr. Anderson visited Preston Nichols and Peter Moon, internationally known authors of "The Montauk Project: Experiments in Time," and introduced himself. At Dr. Anderson's suggestion, a collaboration with Peter Moon began which was brief, tenuous and eventually aborted due to security considerations as a result of a logistical attack on a similar time research center that had been set up on Long Island. Dr. Anderson's continued journeys to Romania eventually resulted in connecting Peter Moon with a Romanian publisher and Radu Cinamar, a member of the Romanian Intelligence Service's occult department. The purpose of this collaboration has to do with what is arguably the most significant archaeological discovery in the history of Mankind: a mysterious holographic hall of records that utilizes technology far beyond the concepts of modern science. "Transylvanian Sunrise" is the story of this mysterious discovery and the political intrigue surrounding it, all capably told by Radu Cinamar. After Peter Moon secured the publishing rights to this remarkable story, Dr. Anderson invited him to Romania where he has pursued these mysteries one step further. The story is inside this book and waiting to be read.

288 pages, $22.00, ISBN 978-0-9678162-5-8

The remarkable story told in Transylvania Sunrise is exceeded in its sequel as it concerns the mysterious factors and actual characters that precipitated the most amazing discovery in the history of Mankind. Peter Moon also contributes with reports on his continued adventures with Dr. David Anderson and a journey to the ruins of an ancient culture in the heart of Transylvania in:

Transylvanian Moonrise: A Secret Initiation in the Mysterious Land of the Gods

Radu Cinamar rose to prominence for his role in exposing the most remarkable archaeological discovery in the history of Mankind: a secret chamber beneath the Romanian Sphinx containing holographic records of Earth's history, bio-resonance imaging technology, and three mysterious tunnels leading to the deepest secrets of the Inner Earth. Despite the political intrigue, turmoil and restriction around this great discovery, the leader of the expedition enabled Radu Cinamar to visit and explore these artifacts. Ever since, Radu's life has been a labyrinthine adventure of strange events, clandestine liaisons and extraordinary people and circumstances. In "Transylvanian Moonrise", Radu is sought out by the mysterious Tibetan lama who orchestrated this discovery while working under an alias as Dr. Xien, a secret agent for the Chinese government. The enigmatic lama introduces Radu to a creature known as a yidam, an energetic and physical being who is created by a sand mandala ritual and can literally warp the space-time continuum and takes Radu on a mystical journey from Transylvania to the mysterious Land of the Gods in Tibet where he receives a secret initiation from the blue goddess Machandi. This is not only a remarkable story, but it is an initiation of the highest order that will benefit anyone reading it."Transylvanian Moonrise: A Secret Initiation in the Mysterious Land of the Gods" will take you far beyond your ordinary imagination in order to describe events that have molded the past and will influence the future in the decades ahead.

THE MONTAUK PULSE: A CHRONICLE OF TIME

Issued quarterly, every Winter, Spring, Summer and Fall

by Peter Moon

A newsletter by the name of the Montauk Pulse went into print in the winter of 1993 to chronicle the events and discoveries regarding the ongoing investigation of the Montauk Project by Preston Nichols and Peter Moon. It has remained in print and been issued quarterly ever since. With a minimum of six pages and a distinct identity of its own, The Pulse will often comment on details and history that do not necessarily find their way into books. Through 1995, the Montauk Pulse has included exciting new breakthroughs on the Montauk story as well as similarly related phenomena like the Philadelphia Experiment and other space-time projects. Consequently, the scope of the Pulse was expanded to embrace any new phenomena concerning time travel or related events. It has been the leading publication when it comes to covering the work of Dr. David Anderson and his time travel research. The cost for a subscription to the Montauk Pulse is $20.00. Do not add a shipping/handling charge, however, unless you are outside the USA. In such a case, please add $12.00. Back issues are available in three volumes of 24 issues each (spanning six years). Each individual volume is $30.00 each. See order form.

THE SECRET PARCHMENT

FIVE TIBETAN INITIATION TECHNIQUES

RADU CINAMAR WITH PETER MOON

In 2003, when a mysterious ancient chamber was unearthed beneath the Romanian Sphinx in the Bucegi Mountains, it became a state secret of the highest level for Romania and their new partner, the United States, whose advanced technology enabled the discovery to take place. The primary custodial agency of this remarkable chamber full of holographic technology is Department Zero, a secret service unit that answers only to the Romanian president. Ever since, there has been a continuous and persistent effort by certain Romanian and American factions to undermine the authority of Department Zero in order to gain access to and control this technology.

The Secret Parchment — Five Tibetan Initiation Techniques tells the story of the detailed political intrigues behind this remarkable find and also how these matters have been subject to intervention by superior spiritual forces, one of which concerns the arranged discovery of an ancient Tibetan manuscript which is revealed and explained in this book.

After the ancient manuscript is translated, mysterious antenna-like structure reveals itself as a result of melting ice near a secret American base in Antarctica. Acting as some sort of cosmic buoy, it has an energy signature connecting both to Jupiter's moon, Europa, and an area of Transylvania where the remains of an ancient civilization were uncovered in 1990 amidst vast tunnels of solid gold. Long ago classified as the top state secret of Romania, this location becomes the center of intrigue in and around Department Zero. Although not actually penetrating the underground area itself, Peter Moon visits the general area and determines that this ancient civilization is still very much alive and active.

Introduction — by Peter Moon

The publication of this book is a major milestone for the progenitors of the remarkable series of volumes by Radu Cinamar which we can now call the Transylvania Series. I use the word progenitors in conjunction with the name of the author because the events, circumstances, and agendas that he describes in his written work reach far beyond the personal or microcosmic view of Radu Cinamar.

In the larger macrocosmic aspects of existence, Radu was a chosen vehicle to set in motion certain agendas for forces that extend into the realms of infinity.

So, where do you fit in?

I cannot answer that last question save for the fact that you have opened this book and have read it thus far. I can tell you, however, that you have accessed a report of information that is not only astonishing in its very nature but is also unprecedented in human history. And this last statement applies whether the information is true or not. It is completely unique, and it will send your mind into unexpected directions and into recesses of mental consciousness that have been dormant or inaccessible until now.

While I cannot tell you exactly how you fit into any of this, you have come across this information for some reason under the sun. I can, however, tell you something of how I came to be responsible for assisting and fulfilling the will of the progenitors of this remarkable series of books; but first, I will give you a description of those who have made these stories possible and how their agendas dovetail with mine.

This will include a concise summary of the three previous books in this series.

During the Cold War, there was a natural alliance between the two communist nations of Romania and the People's Republic of China. Trying to keep up with the West in regards to the most advanced and esoteric methods of reconnaissance and espionage, the Romanians sought out the help of the Chinese as they did not really trust the Russians. As part of a cultural exchange program whereby Chinese students were able to participate in educational programs in Romania, the Chinese government sent the Romanians an expert in parapsychology who would set up a secret department that would deal with all abnormal occurrences. There were referred to as “K events,” but in pop culture terms of today, these might now be termed as “X-File” events. Known as Department Zero, this special unit was only known to the head of state and the head of security.

Besides housing and caring for paranormal subjects, Department Zero also trained them. The expert in parapsychology who set up this unique department is known to us as Dr. Xien, and he was introduced to us in the first book of this series, Transylvanian Sunrise. Although Dr. Xien is an intriguing character, we do not learn too much about him in that book. We do know that he was called in after the birth of another very interesting character who also turns out to be one of the progenitors of the Transylvania Series. His name is Cezar Brad, and he is born with an umbilical cord that is so thick, the doctors have to use an ordinary saw to sever it. As this is an anomaly, Cezar comes under the scrutiny and eventual tutelage of Department Zero and forms a close personal relationship with Dr. Xien from a very young age. Cezar is trained in a host of spiritual and psychic disciplines that would rival the best your imagination might offer.

As fate would clearly demonstrate, Dr. Xien was grooming Cezar to serve as a steward and guardian for what is arguably considered the greatest archeological discovery in the history of Mankind: a secret and previously inaccessible chamber beneath the Romanian Sphinx containing futuristic holographic technology that was put together some 50,000 years ago.

In what could be termed a virtual Noah’s Ark that far exceeds the thinking and experiential capacity of those who lived in biblical times (or even in our own times for that matter), this chamber includes technology whereby one can place their hand on a table and see their own DNA rendered in three-dimensional holograms. Other devices on the table enable one to see the DNA of alien species from other planets with accompanying star renderings so that one can see where they actually originate from. By placing two hands on different parts of the table, one can also “mix” the DNA of two species so as to see how they might look if hybridized. As the tables themselves are six feet high, the creatures who built them were gigantic compared to humans of today.

This remarkable chamber also includes a “projection hall” whereby one can see a holographic rendition of the history of Earth that is particularly tailored to the individuality of whomever might be viewing it. This history, however, abruptly cuts off in about the Fifth Century A.D., perhaps because it requires some sort of software update. One of the more intriguing aspects of the Projection Hall is that it also contains three mysterious tunnels that lead into the bowels of the Earth and similar facilities in Iraq, Mongolia, Tibet and also beneath the Giza Plateau in Egypt. One of the tunnels leads into the Inner Earth itself.

Although Cezar was set up by fate through the tutelage of Dr. Xien to be the overseer of this remarkable archeological discovery, it was not his role to write the story of what was found and its implications. As these events were unfolding, Cezar handpicked Radu Cinamar to write these volumes. Serving as a mentor to Radu, Cezar gave him a rapid fire education in all of the political machinations going on behind this discovery while also introducing him to the world of psychic phenomena and esoteric studies.

We learn about this in the first volume, Transylvanian Sunrise, but we are not told exactly why Cezar picked Radu. What I can tell you from what I have learned thus far is that Cezar is a remarkably adept individual, and he knew precisely what he was doing. His psychic sensibilities are quite formidable and proved to be accurate in this case. Radu got the job done, and with the release of this book, the entire series of all four volumes are now in English as well.

You might think that this discovery was a wonderful opportunity to enlighten Mankind and take advantage of all that this newly discovered technology has to offer for the benefit of humanity at large. Many, if not most, of the Romanians in the government who were privy to the discovery viewed it that way. Circumstances, however, dictated otherwise.

Cezar informed Radu that the actual discovery of this secret and previously unknown chamber took place when the Pentagon discovered it via the use of ground penetrating radar that operated through satellites. It is understandable that the Americans would use all technology at their disposal for reconnaissance purposes as well as to scrutinize all geographical anomalies and resources on the planet. Right or wrong, this is the purpose of the Department of Defense. What was most challenging about this intelligence, however, was that Masonic interests in the Pentagon funneled this information to a leader in Italian Freemasonry, a Signore Massini, who represents a hidden global elite that wanted access to and control of this chamber for themselves. Accordingly, Massini approached Cezar who was then the head of Department Zero and sought his cooperation. Cezar, who did not trust Massini, was forced to cooperate to a certain extent due to political circumstances. Thus, the evil interests of an Italian Freemason forged an unprecedented alliance between Romania and America with the former suddenly being admitted to NATO. The specifics of these political intrigues are detailed in the book Transylvanian Sunrise which is primarily the story of Cezar's life and his involvement with the uncovering of these amazing artifacts.

While the enigmatic and mysterious Dr. Xien set the stage for Cezar to uncover this secret chamber through rigorous training and education, he is a distant memory when the discovery is made and seemingly completely uninvolved in any tangible way with the political machinations and evil intrigues which allowed it to even take place. He is, however, an interested party and a definite progenitor of the information revealed in these books, and this comes into clear view in the second book of the series, Transylvanian Moonrise — A Secret Initiation in the Mysterious Land of the Gods.

Transylvanian Moonrise begins with an editor's note from the Romanian editor, Sorin Hurmuz, who includes numerous excerpts from the Romanian press that not only corroborate Cezar's story as told by Radu but give insights into why it is credible. Above and beyond these facts, it might interest you to know that a key area near the Romanian Sphinx is blacked out on Google Earth. Besides that, Americans were seen en masse during the time of the excavations that were taking place near the Romanian Sphinx in 2003. I have also spoken to several well-placed people in Romania who believe the general story to have merit. Exactly what has taken place and all of the details are still largely a mystery, but Radu's books offer us the only clues. In addition to that, they are remarkable stories and teaching devices which integrate the mundane aspects of politics with some of the most esoteric concepts of occultism as well as the cutting edge of technology.

Radu's narrative in Transylvanian Moonrise begins with a mysterious man named Elinor trying to contact the enigmatic author through his publisher, Sorin Hurmuz, who has generally been instructed to stonewall any people wishing to meet with Radu. In fact, Sorin has never met with Radu and only communicates with him by special courier or with a prearranged phone card. When it is eventually discovered that Elinor is speaking on behalf of a Tibetan lama, both Sorin and Radu change their tune and a meeting is eventually arranged. This meeting is filled with a panoply of metaphysical revelations which present an entirely new paradigm by which to view the events described in Transylvanian Sunrise. After an amazing indoctrination into the ancient art of alchemy and the prospects of immortality, Radu meets the lama who reveals himself to be none other than Dr. Xien and explains that he once served in the royal court at Lhasa under the name of Repa Sundhi at the time of the Chinese invasion of Tibet. Escaping that purge, he somehow ended up in the employ of the Chinese government and adopted a different identity as Dr. Xien.

Repa Sundhi has a very specific agenda for this meeting with Radu and it has to do with what is the focal point of the book you are now reading: an ancient parchment that reveals five Tibetan initiation techniques. In Transylvanian Moonrise, Radu learns that the lama wants to take him to the Apuseni Mountains of Transylvania. Once there, a mysterious but well-described space-translation takes place that literally transports them (as well as Elinor who remains in their company) to certain rarefied high peaks of Tibet which are inaccessible to humans by normal transportation means.

Radu is escorted into a cave where he meets another progenitor of the Transylvania Series. Her name is Machandi and she is a blue goddess and tantric dakini who not only educates and initiates Radu but gives him an ancient manuscript which is to be translated from ancient Tibetan and published, first in the Romanian language. Having finally been translated into English, it is now the centerpiece of the volume you are now reading.

While Transylvanian Moonrise refers to the characters in Transylvanian Sunrise and the lama is included in the dramatic events that take place, the two books are astonishingly different and offer complimentary views of the overall scenario from completely different perspectives.

The third book in the series, Mystery of Egypt — The First Tunnel, is no exception. Radu is recruited to join Department Zero on a journey with Cezar into the mysterious “first tunnel” in the Projection Hall of the Bucegi complex. This leads to a hidden chamber beneath the Giza Plateau in Egypt. What they find there is no less astonishing than what has already been offered in the first two books. The purpose of the mission is to recover neatly organized slate-like tablets that are in fact a type of ancient “DVD” that project holographic “memories” of the history of the world.

The tablets do not require a projector and are so numerous that they can only hope to return a portion of them to their home base, after which they will be sent to America for detailed study. Even though they cannot recover everything in one mission, what they do retrieve would take a team of viewers a considerable amount of time to view.

There is also an occult chamber containing a device consisting primarily of huge crystals that facilitates the projection of one’s consciousness back into time. It is not a physical time travel device. It should be noted that it requires a certain amount of psychic and esoteric development to be able to withstand the rigors of projecting oneself into time, even if the physical body is not being utilized. We also learn that this device is bioresonant in that it is tuned to the physiological, mental and emotional conditions of the subject as well as their own past experiences. In other words, you would have different experiences than would I and so on.

Another intriguing aspect of the time device is that there is a certain amount of censorship present. When Cezar attempts to project his consciousness into time in order to see who created the device, he encounters blockages.

While it is informative and useful in certain respects, it contains mysteries which it does not want penetrated, at least at this particular time. All of this gives rise to interesting speculation.

These censorship issues further fuel the controversy Cezar ignites by relaying his initial experience in the time device whereupon he returns to the time of Jesus in the First Century. Radu also recounts what he saw in his original experiences in the Projection Hall (beneath the Romanian Sphinx) when he witnessed events surrounding the crucifixion of Christ.

This account contains UFOs wreaking havoc amidst a virtually insurmountable thunder storm while a fearing populace scrambles to save their own lives. It leaves us with a hornets nest of information, the result of which has been more than a few questioning the veracity of the authors. I should add, however, that most of the reading audience thus far has not blinked at the accounts given. They have enjoyed the book and are not judgmental about the authors. While this surprised me, I am happy that the book is being well received. More importantly, these controversial issues about Christ explain, at least to some extent, how I fit into this rather ornate tapestry that has been woven by my mysterious Romanian friend, Radu Cinamar.

While I do not have any personal passion nor indoctrination towards the Christian religion, there are some bizarre experiences in synchronicity which have given me cause to take note of interesting phenomena that is worthy of further consideration. I have written several books about all of this so will only summarize these right now but from a new perspective.

In 1982, after reaching the most exalted spiritual state of my life, I was summoned to a council of jinn, angels, or whatever you want to call them.

As I had successfully cast off my karmic baggage, I had either earned the right or was being allowed to change and/or redirect the entire course that my life would now take. I did not actually see jinn or angels in the conventional sense as if this were a cinematic drama, but they were most definitely present. I could definitely feel them. What was most important to me was that I had reached a certain point in my evolution where I was reaching out to a new and higher calling. In the schematic of the Tarot, this is representative of the card entitled the World. Although I did not know it at the time, I was following the path of this Tarot card to the letter. I do remember thinking of the card in deference to my situation but not so specifically.

All that I knew at the time was that I had put myself in a position to choose my destiny and that I could manifest whatever I wanted. There were no limitations. If the odds were stacked against me due to a particular challenging choice, I would have been able to overcome them. Without even weighing too many different options, I chose to dismantle or rearrange all hurtful conditions of physical existence. Although I did not realize it at the time, I had taken on the challenge of a Bodhisattva, or at least one definition of that multi-used term. I am referring to one who has achieved relief from suffering and chooses the path of relieving others from their torment. There was nothing romantic or theatrical in my decision. It was very matter of fact and with no thought of aggrandizement. I was, however, a Bodhisattva on my own terms that was fashioned after my own design.

There was no pandering to the approval of a higher authority. The angels or jinn, however, saw to other elemental issues that would give my path a significant degree of actualization.

In terms of the Tarot or Cabalistic Tree of Life, it is said that any occult operations begin in the realm of Chesod, the sephiroth ruled by Jupiter and the number 4. One of its main attributes is infinite mercy or compassion which I had unreservedly embraced. Even so, my life was not exemplary or a show-case in terms of reaching out to quell troubled souls, etc. I was primarily concerned with my own survival in a rather crazy world. The jinn would take care of or feed my higher aspirations in due course. Assisting others can usually only best be done once one has secured a strong position for themselves. This is why mothers are alerted on airplanes to secure their own oxygen mask first. Then they can tend to their little ones.

In any event, I was embracing the World. With decades of hindsight, I can see such rich symbolism in that card that I am inclined to share it as it also explains my collaboration with Radu and his friends on a very deep level. Part of the interpretation of this card reads as follows.

“The World represents an ending to a cycle of life, a pause in life before the next big cycle beginning with the Fool. It is completeness. It is also said to represent cosmic consciousness; the potential of perfect union with the One Power of the universe. It tells us full happiness is also to give back to the world, sharing what we have learned or gained.”

The card itself contains a naked woman surrounded by a green wreath rendered like an ouroboros (a snake eating its tail). She is holding a staff in each hand while being watched by four creatures in each corner which are a human face or head, a lion, an ox and an eagle. In astrology, these represent the four fixed signs of Leo, Scorpio, Aquarius, and Taurus which also signify the four elements of Tetragrammaton, represented as the name of God in Hebrew: Yod He Vau He. This card not only represents the fourfold elemental nature of the physical world, but the Goddess is in the center as Sophia, the spiritual or sacred center that is the goal of all mystical seekers.

She represents the secret and sacred letter Shin, the Fifth Element which becomes Pentagrammaton evolving out of Tetramgrammaton which, in Christian Cabala, is represented by Christ as Yod He Shin Vau He which is Yeshua.

In between the time of my great awakening and my involvement with Preston Nichols and the writing of The Montauk Project: Experiments in Time, I invoked positive beings that would help in my mission. I was non-specific as to whom they might be. My work with Preston would take me to the cutting edge of quantum physics, and publishing his theories and stories literally changed the way scientists have looked at the subject of time. Trying to verify his stories resulted in me having unprecedented experiences with the principle of synchronicity.

Carl Jung, who coined the word synchronicity, worked closely with Albert Einstein and Wolfgang Pauli, the pioneers of relativity and quantum physics. He believed there were serious and significant parallels between synchronicity and aspects of relativity theory and quantum mechanics.

Both Jung and Pauli postulated that life was not a series of random events but rather an expression of a deeper order which they referred to as Unus mundus. This deeper order refers to a cohesive connection of “super strings” of consciousness that follow an orderly pattern that the person himself is embedded in. The realization of such a pattern results in a spiritual awakening. In ordinary religious terms, Jung stated that synchronicity shares similar characteristics of an “intervention of Grace.” Jung also believed that synchronicity in a person’s life serves a role similar to that of dreams but with the purpose of shifting a person’s egocentric conscious thinking to a greater wholeness.

Essentially, my own awakening led to my own discovery and exploration of these various “super strings.” As these are the subject of many previous books, I will not elaborate on them. Most of you are already familiar.

What I will add at this point is the subject of markers in time. Across the various streams of time, there are certain events which stand out for one reason or another. This is the perspective from which I believe Repa Sundhi, the Tibetan lama who is also known as Dr. Xien, operates.

Although not involved in the day-to-day operations which made the discovery in the Bucegi Mountains possible, he came in at certain points on the time line to efficiently expedite certain matters which made this possible. He also was very much involved with key events that took place in the other books and personally saw to it that Radu would receive the manuscript that is translated and presented in this book. We also learn in this book that the lama is keenly mindful about exactly when the secret parchment should be released to the world. There is no question that he views it as a marker in time. If we once again consider the Tarot card known as the World, we see that the card itself also represents a very important marker in time.

With the advent of the Age of Pisces, the wisdom of the Tarot was converted into Christian terms by Gypsies where the four fixed signs were transmuted into the four beasts of Revelation. This was seen in Medieval decks where the four fixed signs were also converted into the four evangelists who wrote the Gospels with Christ who, as the ultimate expression of Divine Mercy, was placed in the center. What is more important than whether the Christians or Magi were correct is that this card points to an outpouring of compassion. In the Orient, this is recognized as Quan Yin. The manuscript you are about to read relies on compassion as the impetus for all it represents.

The publishing of this book, which is coincidentally being released as the traditional Mayan calendar comes to an end, would therefore represent a marker in time where a shift is taking place from a universe that appears ruthless and predatory to one that is compassionate. By a shift, I am not referring to something that is quaint, cute or trite. I am talking about a fire hydrant that has been opened up in comparison to a tiny leak.

Thus it is that I have become involved in the English language publishing of this unique manuscript as well as the entirety of the Transylvania Series. How this interrelates with all of the other fascinating information presented in these books is interesting and invites much intriguing speculation. While I will not indulge in this for the moment, I can tell you that time travel scientist Dr. David Anderson was dead-set on getting me to Romania from the day I met him. There is no doubt that he viewed my presence there as an important marker in time and he went out of his way to get me there. I have now visited Romania each summer for the last five years and have built considerable friendships and relationships in that mysterious and beautiful country. As an ancient crossroads between East and West, it is viewed as a strategic point with regard to future politics and economics on the world stage. As you will read in this book, it is also the ancient homeland of all of our ancestors. It does not matter what color you are.

That is all I have to say for now. I will make further comments in Part Two of this book.

You are now about to read the adventures of Radu Cinamar that took place immediately after he returned from his journey to the Occult Chamber beneath the Giza Plateau as was described in Mystery of Egypt — The First Tunnel.

As is the case with his previous books, it takes us in a completely different and unique direction. Personally, I find this one of the most delightful aspects of his books. They are always full of unexpected surprises that reveal new twists and turns to already fascinating subjects.

I would also like to add one word of warning. When you read the manuscript and Radu's accompanying comments, do not underestimate what has been offered. It is very easy to dismiss words you read on paper just as you might do with any other text, sacred or not. These principles are potent, but they have no meaning or impact unless they are absorbed, contemplated, and applied by the reader. There is no limit to what you can accomplish with them. I hope that you can awaken to the point where you can see all the "super strings" that make up your existence.

Enjoy the book.

Part One — by Radu Cinamar

Chapter One — REMOTE VIEWING — EVOLUTION IN THE USA

After a considerable break from writing Mystery of Egypt, the third volume in this series, I have returned to present some new aspects that involve both the spectacular modification of my professional status and also some unexpected features of man's knowledge and existence. While they seem to be two different things, they are both integrated into the natural flow of events that took place after the return from the expedition through the tunnel to Egypt. I can even say that the experiences I had then, as well as the precious knowledge I gained through Cezar Brad's kindness, particular have contributed to both my spiritual evolution and to the surprising integration into an area which had been relatively unfamiliar to me up to that point.

I know that I have kept silent for almost two years, but I am asking the reader to understand that things took a completely different turn regarding myself and that unforeseen elements intervened whose development I hope will compensate, at least up to a point, for all the waiting. I will only narrate the chain of events as I lived them during this period of time. This is the easy part. The difficult part, however, will be to manage to explain as well and correctly as possible the elements included in the parchment I received from the goddess Machandi as was mentioned in the book Transylvanian Moonrise. It is true that I shall be guiding myself by the important indications and observations that I received from Repa Sundhi, meaning Doctor Xien, when he translated the secret text, revealing to me some of its occult aspects. Still, given my responsibility to present the above-mentioned translation and comments, I think this is the most difficult part of the book. Depending upon everyone's power of understanding and affinities, the concepts revealed in the text of the parchment can open for attentive readers a completely different way of perceiving life and life's goals.

"You should neither tell everything nor leave things unclear," Cezar advised me. "Anyway, to understand the specific elements of the text, the person who reads these explanations must show good intentions, reason and an ability not to be proud. Do you think you will find this in many people?"

“I’m thinking that, this way, the young people will be especially receptive and will perceive the profound meaning of the teachings in the parchment given by the goddess,” I replied.

“And I’m telling you that you might have great surprises in store for you from this perspective. Most of these people are narrow-minded and are even half-learned. They look only towards ideas that lack spiritual support, and they mistake everything with science and its ‘evidence.’”

“How do you know this?” I asked.

In his own special way, Cezar smiled slightly.

“We have certain programs for research and selection from this age group. There are special tests that show their true capacities, but you can also search the internet, especially the forums. That’s enough to get the main idea. Each one of them wants to look smarter than the others, each one wants to astound with his knowledge, but when it comes to reason or spiritual and occult aspects, the majority of them show their helplessness, pride or arrogance.”

“Aren’t you being a little harsh?” I asked, shyly.

“Would you like me to say something else? Sure, they’re not all the same, but there are statistics on this matter which cannot be ignored. The social system is simply embarrassing and it baffles them. I feel that you want to ask me what should be done about this now, but we will not discuss that for the time being. Let’s hope, however, that the text of the parchment will have an effect upon them and show them that, in a way, not all that glitters is gold.”

After I received the text from the goddess Machandi and after it was translated, I wanted it to be published as soon as possible; but Repa Sundhi said that it was not the right time yet and that I had to wait a little longer.

Suddenly, by an astonishing chain of events, the urge came to make this secret text known to everyone interested. This was preceded and facilitated by a major change that took place in my life which changed the very orientation of my existence. While this change opened great opportunities, it also created special responsibilities.

It all started a few days after I returned from the expedition to the underground Occult Chamber in the Egyptian underground beneath the Giza Plateau and very near the Great Pyramid. I was still pretty shaken by the time travelling experiences that had been accomplished with the help of an ancient device, and I could still feel the energetic effects. Unexpectedly, Cezar insisted that I remain a few more days at Alpha Base and stay in the chamber that was assigned to me in order to rest and relax. I gladly accepted his proposal, particularly because this meant that I was going to be spending more time around him. The second day after we returned to the base, General Obadea arrived to receive the report directly from Cezar. It soon turned out that this was not the only reason for his arrival.

The next day went normally. Cezar and the General remained in the office most of the time while I relaxed on the sport grounds of the base, breathing the clean mountain air and thinking about what I had just seen and felt throughout the expedition. I was so caught up in these thoughts that I lost track of time and did not notice that it had gotten dark until the cold numbed my body. I was just preparing to return to my chamber when I saw a courier on duty approaching me. He respectfully halted at about two meters and let me know that I was requested in the protocol chamber.

“Cezar relayed this through you?” I asked.

“Colonel Brad and General Obadea,” he answered without a blink.

I nodded my head affirmatively. I had forgotten that I was in a secret facility with a special status which had its special action and speech rules.

“The General?” I asked, surprised. “Do you know by any chance what the reason is?”

“I have no idea, Sir.”

Accompanied by the courier, I left towards the building in which the protocol chamber was situated. As I was getting nearer to that place, I felt more and more that I was being taken over by an inexplicable feeling of excitement. It was almost as if my thoughts were no longer taking a definite shape in my mind anymore.

When I entered into the elegant hall, I was greeted by Cezar who, smiling, asked if I was feeling well. Mumbling an affirmative answer, I headed for the table in the center of the room where General Obadea was going through a file. Feeling like a small, timid and fearful child who was in front of people older than him and did not know what was going on, I shook hands with the General who invited me to sit. Massive, forceful, serious and rough, General Obadea had a great impact on people. If it were not for Cezar's calming influence, I would have fled that place in a hurry. Although I knew that the General was a righteous person and devoted to the good of this country and full of dedication, I still felt sort of timid in his presence.

He spoke to me directly and without further ado.

"Radu, I gather that the expedition was of good use to you and that you successfully passed its physical and psychological rigors well. Cezar has informed me in detail, and I want you to know that what you saw in your time travel is of great interest to us. It is not a novelty to us, but any extra information is welcomed. We will be discussing this further."

General Obadea stopped for a few moments, letting his eyes down as if he were searching for the right words. I looked respectfully at his shortly cut grey hair, bushy eyebrows, strongly lined face, and pronounced chin which showed a great strength of character. In all his being, one could feel the experience of many years of hard trials, battles and sustained efforts, part of which I already knew. All of this did not knock him down but made him even stronger. His relations and connections were now stronger than ever and were directly linked to the political sphere as well.

I was startled at the sound of his powerful voice.

"In the current situation, Cezar has made a proposition that, frankly, I accepted with some reserves. But the fact that you have been with us all these years and respected our conditions in the books that you published, as well as the existence of certain abilities which Cezar seems to have noticed within you, have convinced me to agree. Anyhow, this is a unique case, an exception concerning which I take full responsibility."

I still had no idea about what this was about, although an idea started to take shape in my mind.

“The proposal that we are making is for you to enter into the ranks of Department Zero. It stands from this point on, if you agree. Exceptionally, your incorporation will be as a civilian, but your position will come first.”

I had been on the right track. My intuition, corroborated with an old and unspoken desire, came true. The moment seemed unreal and yet full of content. Hardly managing to hide my joy so that it would not get out of the somewhat solemn frame that the presence of General Obadea imposed, I immediately accepted and also asked about my future activity. Cezar gave me a few details.

“There are some areas that our department wishes to initiate and develop. We are thus taking advantage of the cooperation with the Americans, and your task will be, in principle, to coordinate the section whose area of activity will be concerning ‘borderline’ or that which is on the line between the real and the unreal. Our people need this because we have recently been orienting ourselves more towards tactical and administrative events. The pace was imposed by the discoveries we made.”

I suddenly became worried because I thought I might not be ready for such an activity. I understood the importance of this role in the department, but it was more difficult to get used to the idea that I was the one that was going to coordinate it. Seeing my inner agitation, General Obadea spoke to me with kindness.

“I told you I was also skeptical with regard to Cezar’s proposal in the beginning. In such a position, however, we cannot afford an outside person, regardless if that person is competent in the field. The situation is too delicate and we have to be cautious. The agency personnel are one thing, but the coordination of a ‘twilight’ section involves access to a great deal of secret elements. Given his current position, Cezar can no longer take care of this particular activity.”

The General took a short pause, looking at me inquisitively.

“I gather that you have found out a lot about this domain and have a special interest in it. Then, there are the special connections that you have with Doctor Xien and the Goddess Machandi. In a way that is not too clear, even for me, you have been constantly pushed towards us. Cezar has an important contribution here, too.”

I was already feeling more relaxed and more confident in the future that was revealing itself in front of me. After all, there must be a beginning for everything.

“Don’t worry. You will take certain specialized courses,” the General continued. “I have analyzed the situation together with Cezar and he will train you in connection to the tasks that you will have to fulfill here. Still, you have to understand that from now on you have certain obligations that are specific to the secret services and, even more, to our special department. Think well for there is still time to refuse.”

I nodded my head, determined to accept the position. I had seen too many things of an exceptional significance to feel restrained by some inherent rules of such an activity. Apart from this, as I later learned from Cezar, the fact that my social situation did not bind me had weighed a lot in the General’s decision. As I wasn’t married and had no other family obligations, I started with an important admittance asset from the very beginning.

A few specific procedures then followed. I signed a maximum confidentiality contract and was initiated into the less known to me directorates of Department Zero. Usually, candidates take a series of very difficult physical and psychological tests. The selected ones then undergo three months of special training after which the final evaluation takes place in the field.

“There have been situations when, in the end, none of the candidates were eligible,” Cezar confessed to me. “There are generally a few hundred who subscribe. After the tests, only about forty remain; and at the evaluation, only two or three pass at the most. Many times, there is only one left; and at some selections, like I said, not one was left.”

The technical department agents must be very well trained. After the discovery made in the Bucegi Mountains, Cezar made the admission conditions a lot harsher. This was not necessarily in order to be at the same level of training as the American soldiers, who were detached here from the special forces, but mostly to cope with the problems and unpredictable conditions of the expeditions that could take place in the three tunnels. This intense professional training was also for other types of operations on Romania's soil. The candidates who were finally admitted, however, learned only after their admission that they would be part of Department Zero, later fulfilling separate formalities.

For a few weeks, I got use to the rhythm of the base and it was pretty intense. It goes without saying that I am not granted permission to describe the main activities that happened there or within the internal structure of the location. I will only say that I was shown the study hall in which I was going to form different specialized groups. In fact, there were two such halls. One of them, however, had a different compartment arrangement. At first, I did not understand what it was all about, but Cezar explained it to me quite quickly.

"I have agreed with General Obadea to set up a group specialized in remote-viewing which is the ability 'to see' at a distance. We have to create our own team of experts in this field, and you will start and lead the specific activity. It is important to achieve this objective."

It looked like my hiring in Department Zero was starting to take shape. I had only read a few references about remote-viewing thus far and without going more deeply into the matter.

"I don't know. I need knowledge. I need time," I said. "From what I gather, I am the only one that will be in charge of this in the department."

"Yes," Cezar answered with determination. "You will, however, go to an intensive specialization course in the United States. There is a proposition from the Americans that was sent to a few secret services of certain countries, ours among them, to ensure an elaborate training in the field of remote viewing. We are not so sure what their kindness is hiding, but we can use the opportunity. If it had not been for the Projection Chamber, I don't think they would have called us at all."

Things went ahead at a rapid rate and, after approximately a month and a half from signing the contract, Cezar announced to me that I was going to depart in a matter of days for an intensive preparation course. In the meantime, I seriously sought out documentation for myself on the matter at hand. Sadly, what I found on the internet on remote-viewing only touched the surface of the domain. I soon realized the fact that, to go deeper into the mysteries of this extrasensory ability, the elements presented in different courses or dedicated papers are not enough as there is need of highly competent practical guidance. Maybe this was the exact purpose of the intensive training proposed by the Americans. Simple logic stated that, if this initiative was to involve the secret and national security services of eight countries, it can be safely assumed that this training would be far more than the generally circulated notions on remote-viewing to which anyone has access.

Secondly, this course was to enrich my connections and my knowledge in a world of special agencies where I still had many gaps that needed to be filled. I found myself to be a completely unusual case in this field because my situation made Cezar break out with amusement.

“I do not think that there is any other secret service agent with so little experience who can still take part in this course! There you will meet with several famous military figures; and most probably, you will have some discussions, but the subject related to the discovery in the Bucegi Mountains must remain a closed one.”

Initially, the department wanted to send Lieutenant Nicoară, but he was in charge of tactical operations on the country’s territory, and his presence at the base was indispensable from this point of view. Although I was somewhat nervous and was thinking that, in a way, I was entering the lion’s den, I still felt self-assured and that I was master of myself enough so as to withstand the probable contextual “pressures” I could expect. The advantage of this opportunity opened by the Americans was that the secret services could send the agents that they wanted. Despite this, Cezar told me that there were some question marks and raised eyebrows arising from the Americans with regard to me being sent because they did not understand this choice and suspected an infiltration of a different nature. General Obadea intervened here because he was a good friend with the American program director, General Roddey. In 2004, after the first months following the discovery in the Bucegi Mountains, he had been one of the American collaborators with the Romanian side and proved to be a righteous and reasonable man. In the panic that marked that period, any hasty decision could have unleashed actions with irreversible effects which could have thrown the situation of both countries into chaos. After questions arose with regard to myself, General Obadea had a short telephone conversation with his counterpart, and the result was that I received the clearance to take part in this special training.

Before leaving, in parallel with my training in the activity at the department, I also received special training from Cezar and General Obadea. This concerned some state secrets and aspects related to the interaction of counterintelligence agencies as well as some communication directives which, for obvious reasons, I cannot reveal here. The reader should not feel frustrated because of this. As time has gone by, I have been informed about accusations lodged against me with regard to the fact that I cannot disclose the exact location of the discovery in the Bucegi Mountains.

After everything stated in the first volume, I think such accusations seem even childish. In such a case, the reader might think that our society no longer needs secret services, that there is no need for barriers in the collaboration with the great powers, that people can receive members of other civilizations from the cosmos with open arms, and that such discoveries should become sort of a museum which is opened to anyone at any time.

I have explained that, besides the resistance shown on the fulminating developments for Mankind – and I am not referring here only to the Projection Chamber but also to the three underground tunnels – there is also a strong faction that sustains the opposite current, that of the good and of informing the population; but this information must be made in a just manner which is suitable for the situation of the respective moment. To judge such complicated situations with simplicity brings no benefit for intelligence and deprives the impatient and arrogant of a more profound knowledge. Still, I am sure that the careful reader will correctly understand the reasons that do not allow me to reveal extremely important information and that they will not fall into the net of cheap observations and extraordinary conclusions on this subject. Some things can be told and others cannot, at least not for now; but even those that can be revealed are only partially mentioned due to government interests and because of the unforeseen impact on society. Based upon decision making factors, I understand that these are very delicate aspects which cannot and must not be treated lightly.

My growing up in the secret services was quite quick because I was already familiar with the said problems from what Cezar told me and from the incursions that I was a part of. My “take-over” in the relatively small framework of this secret activity was done without any problem and, after a short period of time, I already felt perfectly integrated into the work chart of Department Zero. Thus, being enthusiastic with the importance and novelty of my mission, I wasted no time in making an intense documentation of remote-viewing extrasensory capacity in order to be as well prepared as possible for that start of my training in the USA.

Until I was integrated into the Department Zero structure, I only generally knew that remote-viewing meant the process of “seeing at a distance,” meaning in places that our regular senses cannot comprehend. After I started to study the matter, I realized that, even from the beginning, this paranormal capacity does not refer only to “seeing in space” but also to “seeing in time.” Being somewhat initiated and familiarized with many esoteric notions, it was relatively easy to understand what this phenomenon was based on and how it is possible to overcome the limits of our normal senses. At the same time, I quickly understood that this field is vital in military operations and also within the secret services. It is useful to know where a top-secret base of the enemy is located, and it is comforting to know ahead of time the secret weaponry of the opponent. These techniques are also necessary to find out the location of certain people who possess secret plans. The range of operations can, of course, be greatly extended.

“The Americans have intensively developed this field and, from what I know from General Obadea, they have achieved extraordinary results,” Cezar explained to me. “Initially, the Russians had reached a high level in this research in the seventies. It was during those times that the USA was completely taken by surprise in the case of a particular incident where they thought that their security network had been breached by Russian espionage. In fact, things were totally different. Counterintelligence provided proof that what the Russians had found out was not a direct result of active espionage, but had a paranormal nature; thus, they realized that the studies by the Russian ‘comrades’ were already quite advanced in this field.

They became very scared because they were not only unable to control the process by which the Russians could learn of their greatest secrets but also by reason of the fact they had no idea of where to begin fighting back.”

Still, the Americans mobilized quickly. Cezar told me that a training facility was set up and the first protocols or stages in connection to what they referred to as “remote-viewing” were conceived. I found it most interesting that the people from the team that started the research made hundreds and even thousands of experiments with human subjects in order to gradually understand the basis of the process of perception that occurs in remote-viewing. They realized that rigorous training is needed in order to enter a modified state of consciousness in which relevant intelligence can be detected on a proposed target which is at a great distance in space and even time.

This perception actually refers to the correct interpretation of a type of energetic information that has no connection to our three-dimensional space. It is transmitted by what we can assess as types of energetic information “waves” that exist in a space or level that is superior to the physical one we live in, a level with more spatial dimensions than the three we are accustomed to. When the Americans reached this conclusion, it was relatively simple for them to understand the process through which information gathered in such a manner can be used. The difficulty stands only in the correct decoding of any state or form of information coming from a level superior to the physical one but to which we are nevertheless connected every second, even if we are not aware of this. I confess that I did not understand very well how this was possible, but I hoped Cezar would clarify this. The opportunity came very quickly because, during that period, we met daily at the base.

“You already know that man is more than the physical material body,” he said, “but what man is besides that is hard to say for the common man. If we were only flesh and blood, we would not have very great expectations in life nor a well defined goal, but our being is much more complex and exists simultaneously on several levels of its universe or, better said, in Creation.”

“I did some research and learned about the three main levels of existence in the order of their increasing vibrational frequency: the physical level, the astral level, and the causal level," I mentioned, "but you've also told me about this."

Nodding his head approvingly, Cezar continued.

"Yes, the three fundamental dimensions of Creation each have a general vibrational frequency which is typical for them. Better said, an array of vibrational frequency like a kind of radio scale. Together, the physical, astral and causal dimensions form what occultists call the Macrocosm, meaning Creation itself."

"An interesting comparison with the radio scale," I noticed. "It gives me a clearer image on the Macrocosmic structure."

"If he develops the respective frequencies in himself, one can access any of these vibrational frequencies. It's like trying to listen to a certain radio station from the many that you have at your disposal on the frequency band of your radio. So, there is a precise correspondence between what man has inside and what is outside him."

Thanks to the books in Elinor's library, I was in relatively familiar territory because I had knowledge in this field.

"I know," I said. "The correspondence is synthesized in the famous Emerald Tablet assigned to Hermes Trismegistus. What is above, on a Macrocosmic level, must also be found below, at a microcosmic level, which is the level of the human being."

"When I speak of the microcosm, I am not referring only to the physical body but also to the other structures of a subtle nature that exist simultaneously with this one, and this means I am also taking the astral and the causal body into consideration. I think you understand this well."

I nodded my head in approval.

"Just the same, when I speak about the Macrocosm, I am referring both to the physical universe or cosmos as scientists define it but also to the astral and causal universe. I see you are already familiar with the relations between the Macrocosm and the microcosm. This is very good. Some think that it is a metaphor when it is stated that the whole of Creation is found in man as a microcosm, but this metaphor expresses a great truth because you now know that the microcosm of the human being that includes its three bodies, the physical, astral and causal, is the Macrocosm in miniature. This is about a very precise correspondence in the sense that all that is in the Macrocosm is also in the microcosm of the human being.”

“I understand; but, is this correspondence also valid regarding the spiritual essence of man that you spoke to me about in the past? If man has a self and if there is such a correspondence, does it mean that there are two kinds of self, a smaller one and a larger one for the Macrocosm?”

Cezar laughed loudly.

“No, of course not. But you must know that the essence of the Macrocosmos is, in fact, God’s self. Occultists call it the omniscient, omnipotent and eternal spirit which is, in fact, God’s ultimate essence. This essence also exists like a ‘divine spark’ in every human being. And, even if man cannot tell and does not believe that this is possible, he still has a divine nature which is eternal.”

Although I now had that matter sorted out, there were others left to be cleared. I thought a little before speaking.

“I cannot quite understand how the three dimensions are differentiated in the Macrocosm. Is there a border between them? My idea, as a representation, is that they are like overlapping layers of different thickness.

First, there is the physical one at the base; then, the astral one in the middle; and then there is the causal one which is the most refined one. I can tell, however, that this is not just a mere representation of the mind. How are things really in this respect?”

“First of all, you have to accept for a fact that the three universes that together form the Macrocosm (the physical, astral and causal) exist simultaneously and are intimately related to their correspondence in the microcosm that is the human being. We cannot speak of a manifestation at the human being’s level that does not correspond at a certain level in the Macrocosm, too. For example, emotions connect the man to the astral universe whether he knows this or not. His physical aspect connects him to the physical universe that we can notice around us or by looking through a telescope. Likewise, the causal universe is in close relation with the world of ideas. Even if this universe is more difficult to understand and to perceive around us because of the fact that it is very subtle, it is present in every man through the ‘causal body’ which is an esoteric term.”

“Most people, however, have no idea about the existence of the astral and the causal body,” I said. “Almost all of us concentrate on our physical bodies which we see and feel.”

“It is true because man’s action with the other two invisible bodies, the astral and the causal, is closely related to the extent to which he has awakened his consciousness in these fundamental worlds. Usually, the human being is satisfied to live almost on instinct, only at the level of the physical body. If man, however, becomes conscious enough of the astral world, he can then manifest more in that dimension and will act in full awareness, just as he does in the physical world.”

I was still a bit puzzled.

“If we have everything in us, if we have these energetic structures or fundamental bodies in our being, then why are we not aware of them just as we are aware of our physical body?” I asked.

“Be assured that, when your consciousness is in one of those two subtle bodies, in the astral or the causal one, you are fully aware of the existence of that body.”

Cezar took a small pause, staring right at me.

“Tell me, when you sleep or dream, are you aware that you have a physical body?”

“No,” I replied, imagining what was going to come next.

The explanation came immediately.

“In those moments when you are asleep, you can say that you are living and acting with your astral body while your physical body is resting in bed. You are not then aware of it although it is clear that it exists. It is the same when you wake up. You become aware of your physical body but you are no longer conscious of your astral body. This shows that, next, adequate purification training of the consciousness is needed in order for it to engulf a larger area of knowledge that is, in a way, somewhat like expanding. If there are no difficulties in being aware of your body and of the manner in which you can act in the physical world in which you live, things are different in the astral and causal world. In order to manage to perceive and understand them, you must make efforts so that you can afterwards act in full awareness of them. Their vehicles, which are invisible to normal perception, must be elevated and purified as much as possible.”

“What ‘vehicles’ are you talking about?” I asked, puzzled.

“It is a specific terminology in esoteric and spiritual literature. Your physical body is the ‘vehicle’ that your consciousness has at its disposal in order to act in the physical world that you are in. In the same manner, your astral body is the ‘vehicle’ which helps you act in the astral world. Of course, the causal body is the very special ‘vehicle’ that helps you to know the causal world and to act in it. I have already told you about this.”

I continued to ponder a little. Things seemed pretty clear to me, yet I still wondered where and how man’s evolution appeared since he is born with the three above-mentioned bodies in his every existence. I asked Cezar about this, and he replied, smiling slightly as he was happy about where this discussion was going.

“Structurally speaking, the physical body remains the same from one existence to the other, meaning it cannot modify itself fundamentally. What I mean is, if you now have the well-known look of a human being, you will not be born in the next life with a totally different shape. That is to say, you will not be an oddity in relationship to the form of the human body. Personal karma and genetic information will guide you towards the same structure of the human form in the physical level. What is modified, however, are the being’s subtle structures, meaning the astral vehicle and the causal one. They are, in fact, the ones that evolve more or less from one life to the other, and it is within them, in essence, that the main vectors that will define the features of your following existences are encrypted. As you know, of course, these vectors rely on how you acted in the respective previous existence.”

The discussion clarified a fundamental element: nothing that resides in the Macrocosm, which is all that visibly or invisibly surrounds us, is not lacking from the microcosm that is our being. But, although the Macrocosm is always active, we are confronted with a “dormant” state of these elements. That is why it is very important to awaken what is in a latent state in our microcosm, for it is in this manner that we can fully understand the Macrocosm. As every man contains a proportion of what exists in the Macrocosm and in God, this allows us to achieve, to a certain extent, what God achieves in His Creation. Cezar clarified this aspect for me in an admirable way.

“The fact that man can achieve proportionally what God achieves in His Creation, which is the Macrocosm, is correlated to what is written in the Bible: namely, that the human being is made in God’s own image and likeness. The profound significance of this aspect is tied to the fact that all that resides in the Macrocosm is also in the microcosm of the human being.

I’m telling you all of this because you must be aware that in your being there is everything, but this everything has not been awakened yet. Be sure, however, that your consistent efforts will gradually lead to this enabling of what is latent in your being and then you will understand that the differences that exist between men are in fact determined by the extent to which they have awakened what exists in each man’s microcosm.”

I listened carefully to what Cezar said and, in the end, I synthesized a few main ideas. First of all, we are a complex whole, a real miniature cosmos which is what the word microcosm signifies. I also understood that the microcosm that we all are is, at the same time, a miniature replica of the Macrocosm, that is, of Creation, the Great Whole of which we are an integrated part. It is out of the question to be outside this whole; or better said, to separate us from the Macrocosm. It is an incomprehensible mystery that we are embraced and comprised in the whole, the Macrocosm, and that this is simultaneously reflected in the microcosm of every being that exists in the physical level or in any other of the subtle levels of Creation. It would be strange to imagine, for instance, that angels or any other deities do not have Everything in them. What separates one being from the other is, as Cezar specified, the preponderance of one type of energy or another which makes that being possess a certain “affinity” or inclination towards something in the Creation that is specifically for himself.

Meditating thus on what my good friend revealed to me, I understood even more profoundly the fact that the Macrocosm is reflected proportionally in the microcosm of our being. Almost all the esoteric texts leave this to be understood but do not precisely state it. The main idea is that, through spiritual evolution, man can access the energetic sources that reside in a latent state within the microcosm of his being by using certain initiating methods or techniques. This determines, in time, the possibility of gaining colossal powers through affinity with the great Macrocosmic energies. This fact itself is thus a direct result of awakening the force and energy sources that are correspondent in the microcosmos of our being. And still, if this process is not fully understood, it can lead to utterly erroneous ideas. With his remarkable tact, Cezar exemplarily revealed this aspect:

“Some might imagine that by evolving and awakening the corresponding force sources from the Macrocosm, they could even become masters of it, meaning God. The truth is that, no matter how much we evolve and amplify these energies, even if we reach the maximum, we can never say that we are equal to God. This is a dementia that only Lucifer, in his immense stupidity, could think of. It is therefore very important to keep in mind that this analogy between the Macrocosm and the microcosm of the human being, or any other being in the Macrocosm, indicates not equality but proportion. Sure, to quote the metaphor known in spiritual texts, the drop may unite with the ocean; but it would be insane for the drop to imagine that it is the ocean and that it can do what it wishes. In reality, there are forces that make the ocean manifest the way it does and cannot be controlled by it because it is just a drop. I hope you understand the analogy. Any part in the microcosm of a being is like a cell in an immense organism and surely, through the actions that it does, it can contribute by its specificity to the harmony of some plans of Creation.”

“So, that is how I can explain the actions of saints or some of Mankind’s great spiritual teachers,” I said, captured by the explanations I was getting.

“Exactly! A being that aspires for its divine manifestation will be in full agreement and in harmony with that divine reality. It will be a part of that unity. The Whole of that reality will then be reflected in it, and it will be in solidarity with the Whole. In this manner, you can understand how miracles work. You can understand the holiness, purity and sacredness of some extraordinary beings and you can understand how states of mystical ecstasy and some people's paranormal powers appear. In such a being, evil will never appear, and that is exactly why I told you some time ago that the absence of evil means good. The same can be said in the case of a being that brings evil in his deeds. That being will then represent evil and show it in the surrounding world accordingly. Through personal choice, every being can contribute either to the building of good or evil. Of course, however, the consequences of those actions will differ radically as well."

"Yes, that is clear," I said. "Still, it is quite difficult to grasp how something virtually infinite, like the Macrocosm, can fit into something finite like the microcosm."

With patience, Cezar explained this misunderstanding, too.

"You can now better picture why it is said that the human being is, in fact, a microcosm made in the image and likeness of the Macrocosm but in a metaphorical way. This is the key. Without understanding this aspect deeply, it is virtually impossible to know how it is possible to discover God and His Creation within yourself or how it is possible that inferno and demonic lights but also paradise exist in man. If you do not understand this fundamental truth fully: namely, that all that exists in God's Creation is also proportionally and similarly within yourself, you'll not be able to find the answer to some paradoxes. You'll not understand, for example, how it is possible for some people to say that God does not exist while others say that He exists. Some say that love does not exist while others say that it is endless. Just like God has created the Macrocosm, man is also a miniature universe like a microcosm, similar to the Macrocosm but by analogy. Because God exists and He is omnipresent, He is also in man; and this divine presence in our being is like a spark from God, eternal and indestructible. The saints and the enlightened men of past times strongly state this because they got to experience this divine presence in themselves in a profound way."

These clarifications that Cezar provided to me have been a revelation for my understanding because he has mentioned certain nuanced aspects. I am a microcosm after the metaphorical pattern of the Macrocosm, and everything exists inside of me in a latent and proportional form. In order to get all that I want, I only have to bring these latent features up to date.

The process that involves remote-viewing is also a latent capacity which waits to be awakened in me. I now understood why decoding information through remote-viewing, which comes from a level superior to the physical plane by means of energetic waves, is so difficult. Even if all of the dimensions and realities of Creation in the microcosm of my being reside there, I am still not aware of many of them. This is also true for most people, and this aspect itself is the very basis of our current civilization's ignorance. In remote-viewing, pieces of information which already exist in the structure of my microcosm, or that of any other human being, are waiting to be brought up to date. No matter what the target of my research already is through this procedure, I already have the right answer in me.

Finally, it all consists of giving enough stimulation to the access path to this piece of information which can be found on a more complex subtle level than the physical one. In fact, the informational range of the remote-viewing process is actually the collective subconscious.

As in any other field, anyone can learn to successfully practice remote-viewing. Every person who decides to do this will have accomplishments and successes depending upon how much effort they make and based upon their experience. If you listen to the ones that will tell you that you cannot do this because you must have certain capabilities you were born with in order to perform remote-viewing, I can assure you that you will only be allowing that person to limit your possibilities and potential. You will thus allow someone to say what is and what is not possible for you and that means human conditioning. Fortunately, I was not only proposed and encouraged to develop my remote-viewing abilities, but I also received precious esoteric knowledge from Cezar which permitted me to understand the phenomena more profoundly. I offer all this information to my readers with openness in the hope that it will represent a turning point in the conception of life and the world to many of them.

Remote-viewing means a step further beyond the common and the routine, even a dive into the ocean of collective knowledge. The people that have the necessary faith, will and urge to convince themselves that something else exists beyond our physical universe all have what they need to perform remote-viewing. It is necessary, however, to mention that the final stages of the accomplishment protocol are subject to special military and secret service intelligence and research; but even without these superior phases, there are enough ways and means to transcend the human condition and sensory limitations successfully.

I wish to mention again that every man who has a normal state of physical, psychical and mental health can achieve the ability to remote-view.

Through such perception, we develop our ability to travel in time and space in a practical manner in order to see different people, places or things and to gather information about them. Many readers may imagine that this is similar to watching a movie on the television or at the cinema, but they are seriously mistaken. Except for the superior secret phases mentioned earlier, remote-viewing precisely refers to only two actions that every man manifests almost all the time: to detect and to decode. We will thus detect information and data from a level of vibration which is superior to the physical level; then we will decode this into coherent three-dimensional thought-forms; and in the end, we will objectify these three-dimensional thoughts into bi-dimensional information. The latter we will record using dimensional contours, meaning sketches. It is also possible to write words that describe color, texture, temperature, taste, smell, and sound. In conclusion, remote-viewing is the detection of some data and information from another dimension of manifestation in which Mankind's collective subconscious ocean is integrated. After that comes the decoding of this data into coherent tri-dimensional thought-forms. In the end, we objectify and capture this data in bi-dimensional information in the form of sketches and sensory verbal data.

If we think about it a little deeper, this is a process that repeats itself every day in our life. Let's say we are listening to something on the headphones.

What we say that we are hearing is, in fact, energetic information waves that are in motion, heading towards us. Our ears hear this, and our brain electrochemically decodes the data which is in the form of waves. Thus, we get tri-dimensional coherent thought-forms that have a meaning or significance. We call these new thought-forms sounds. Afterwards, we can reproduce the impressions caused by the sounds we hear in words or even images.

It is the same thing when someone speaks to us in a language that we do not understand. We cannot decode the information and we will thus have to rely on something else to understand what the other person is telling us. We will have to use another capacity that each of us has, like significant gestures. Initially, my idea was that images received through remote-viewing have a direct nature, like when we look at a painting or a screen where a film is projected. In reality, when a person justly applies the steps in remote-viewing to learn information about a distant place or time, the visual images are in fact perceptive images. It is like that person is dreaming. Although the visual images in a dream can seem to be completely real at the respective moment for the dreamer, they still do not imply visual processes inside the eye. What is then happening is that the product of the eye is connecting to the universal capability of the “eye” within the mind to visualize, meaning to imagine. Anyone can and has the capacity to imagine. When we dream, we are, in fact, visualizing by using our own imagination. In a way, the same thing happens when we read a book or imagine a landscape.

I feel indebted, however, to mention once again that the visualization that I am referring to is an inherent quality of thought and not a biological process that implies the sense of sight at eye level. Everyone does that constantly during the day when, for example, they are day-dreaming in the car or when they imagine things. In the case of the remote-viewing process, all that is asked is to modify the quality of visualization. This implies the modification of perception (from the external stimuli which are decoded by our brain into tri-dimensional thought-forms being interpreted as our outer reality) by concentrating towards inner mental stimuli which are always present in our thinking processes but to which we usually do not give conscious attention. The main focus of our attention is usually towards the so called outer world, but the perception that lies at the basis of remote-viewing is connected with the deeper levels of our mind and especially the subconscious.

As we achieve more and more remote-viewing experiences, there is a tendency to change the focus of our attention from the symbolic tasks and activities which we perform in the exterior world and to concentrate more and more on the messages that we receive through the subconscious mind.

This originates in the Universal Mind that operates outside the limits of space and time. Certain esoteric societies have the purpose a obtaining a single-directional focus towards the most profound levels of the subconscious mind which has direct and immediate access to infinite knowledge which can be accessed from the Universal Mind.

It seems difficult; but in reality, it is not. When we perform the remote-viewing process, all we need to do is to ask correctly and observe the answers appearing in a form which is compatible with our cultural and religious programming. In the web of life's infinite connections, knowledge is the key and it comes to us in a more and more exact form as we amplify our capacity to focus ourselves towards the profound levels of the mind. It is all in there in the mind.

One of the officers who trained us at the Maryland base used to tell us: "The whole of life is like a safari through the mind. You are exposed to dangers, but you can also defend yourself from them efficiently if you get to the depths of the causes."

When you go deeper into the remote-viewing process technique, you realize more and more how complex and vast the mind is. In the meantime, you realize that the dangers of this jungle are as real as we want to perceive that they are. It is our choice to consider ourselves threatened or surrounded by all sorts of dangers or to impose a calm, relaxed and profound attitude of the mind which automatically changes the universe in which we live and act.

Of course, the intensive remote-viewing training which I followed at the American base involved certain mental abilities that had to already have been stimulated in the subject. There were numerous tests and scores; and in the end, there were only five of us left. I do not know exactly what contributed to my promotion to the upper phases of the training. Perhaps it was the long talks with Cezar or the explanations that I had gotten from him, Elinor and Repa Sundhi over the years. Perhaps it had to do with my individual studies of the occult and spirituality or perhaps my timid attempts of meditation practice under Cezar's guidance. Or maybe it was all of that together. The fact is that out of fourteen agents, only five remained: two Americans, a Canadian, a Brazilian, and me.

Western secret services used and still use many protocols to achieve remote-viewing. The preferred protocol in the USA involves distracting the mind. If we keep our conscious mind completely distracted from some tasks that modify rapidly or are irregular, we can concentrate on the messages of the subconscious mind since this is the source of the “instrument” tied to the information flux which is remote viewing.

Some countries use techniques for a quick transformation of the state of consciousness of the mind in order to have access to the level or state of mind known as theta. Here, the remote-viewing ability becomes a natural state for anyone who operates on these very profound levels of the subconscious. The results obtained are truly impressive. Theta is the ideal state of mind to achieve remote-viewing because, when the specific theta waves are predominant in the brain, anyone can easily achieve remote-viewing. Experience has shown me that to be successful in remote-viewing, it is not strictly necessary to have an intense visualizing training but rather an adequate training to obtain the theta state of the brain where visualization becomes a natural ability.

Even from the beginning, we were told that in order to achieve serious progress in this respect, faith is the basic key to success. On the contrary, skepticism is the key to failure and restriction. We were also warned that although all of us who were present there had faith in this process, which was somewhat at the edge of scientific knowledge, our individual faith was still structured on different levels for each and every one of us. That became visible as we went along as more difficult tests started to show the blockages that some agents had on some levels of their subconscious. Not managing to get over those steps, they did not have access to the superior levels of the training, and they left the base immediately.

The problems regarding faith and skepticism act as a universal law. Just as faith can move the mountains of doubt, skepticism or excessive reason block transformation and restrict the person in a cage of doubts. This, in time, generates fear, paranoia and a false state of comfort. The essence of success in remote-viewing is somewhat the same as in any other field. It does not refer to efforts but rather to faith and enthusiasm. I had a strong dose of both. On one hand, I was experiencing the spiritual formation that Cezar had provided me; and on the other hand, the joy of being part of Department Zero and having access to great secrets of state. Even without these particular “ingredients,” any person who has enough faith in his or her capacity to reach his goal and wishes it strongly has automatically opened the door to success. I feel, however, that I must specify that the remote-viewing process is not easy. The protocol to accomplish this involves many stages, and lacking one of them or a blocking on one of the intermediate levels results in missing the proposed space-time target. The training gradually opens the way towards the Universal Mind which represents a “warehouse” of pure information that can be accessed instantaneously at will. Only through transcending the other levels of the mind and by direct connection to the more profound levels of the subconscious, which operates as an interface with the Universal Mind, can we transcend the physical reality of our perception. This is how we can explain the fact that, by entering into communion with the Universal Mind, we virtually have access to any kind of information. At this level, all is simultaneous. We have the feeling of omnipresence, and the past and future are reunited in the present.

The Universal Mind is like a common background for all life forms; and it can give any kind of information about space and time which is exactly what the one performing the remote-viewing process is searching for. Here, imaginative visualization and sensory perception are more intensified.

Senses are then particularly perceptive and less biological. You feel like you are in an ocean, having everything at your disposal, instantaneously.

It was clear to me from the first days that the Americans wanted to train us in order to see which ones of us would reach the very high level that goes beyond even the brain's theta waves. As in Cezar's stance, it was not clear to me why they were doing this. I am sure there was a reason but that remained hidden. Naturally, the most apparent reason at hand was that they were planning to use the abilities of such a person for their own personal purposes.

The ones that achieve remote-viewing — and here I am referring particularly to the military domain — train intensely to obtain this state of hyper-concentrated and consciously receptive creativity that is available to them at their will and even when they have their eyes open. The secret to operating in this manner at the profound theta level with your eyes remaining open is to stay very centered and focused towards the interior of our being and especially on the flow of thoughts while simultaneously achieving exterior perception by applying the process of remote-viewing.

Presently, I only know one person capable of such a thing. He is the Canadian who was finally selected from the group of five that I was a part of as well. He had a phenomenal ability to interiorize and a great sensibility. To my knowledge, he only made one mistake on the targets proposed during the tests.

I had prepared myself theoretically as well as I could before I left for the USA. The protocol imposed a certain level of security and a well designed contact system. Still, even as things went into the home stretch, there were certain interferences from Bucharest which seemed political to me. I have no pleasure in speaking about these things, but I do so now by virtue of the fact that I was directly involved. As I later found out, it was, in fact, an intervention from above due to the other faction in the Romanian Intelligence Service which cannot stand the independence of Department Zero or its leadership. Unfortunately, I have to admit that there are a lot of treacheries and complications at this level. Things do not always run smoothly by reason of the fact that, many times, responsible parties interact with the missions that they have to fulfill with regard to their own personal interests. State secrets of the highest level that exist in the archives of Department Zero considerably incite the imagination of some people who would like to obtain certain advantages from it. As they cannot do this directly and in such a way that there will be no traces left, they resort to pulling strings. Bit by bit, a chain of dependencies is created which sometimes reaches very high political levels. This was exactly the case with regard to my situation.

A member of an important Senate committee started exuding pressure in order to visit the Alpha Base. We already had signals about this, and we tried to invoke legal aspects which forbid such a request save for force majeure cases such as treason or important leadership changes that might occur. In fact, the real purpose of this pressure was to create tension in the relations between the committee and Department Zero, especially with General Obadea, so that our refusal, even if justified, would be interpreted as unnatural. An investigation would then follow that would permit the committee to access the subtleties of the department. With regard to me, their pretext was that a fresh employee could not be sent on a mission like this and that someone with more experience in the field was required in order to cope with the proposed theme. In reality, they wanted to break the monopoly that we held over a certain segment of state secrets and to affect the centralization of intelligence into a new command structure.

Both General Obadea and Cezar knew very well how much trouble would come from such a modification if it were to take place. First of all, the horizontal expansion of the chain of command meant that more people would know the sensitive points of national importance concerning certain locations or highly important areas regarding our country. This would have created confusion and become a source of security leakage. Regarding the underground complex in the Bucegi Mountains, the sharing of this information would have blown up all the cooperation with the American faction. We believe that this was actually the direct target for the action coming from “above,” and I did not doubt for a second that there were a few “honorable” persons behind it who were willing to do everything in their power to get there as quickly as they could.

General Obadea and Cezar had to cope with a situation that, without being too complicated at the time, was nevertheless annoying. If it was not treated seriously, it risked unleashing something on a greater scale that would endanger the well-defined and very secret status of Department Zero.

Cezar told me that there were three rounds of discussions between the respective members of the committee and General Obadea. At two of them, he was present as well. Almost directly, this politician threatened to alert the committee and initiate the analysis procedure if his requested security modifications were not done. By this, he was referring to my trip to the USA, but that was only a pretext. He did not even hide the fact that he was speaking on behalf of a group of hidden interests. Such aspects are common at a certain level of government. Things were even more complicated due to the fact that one of the reasons on which the attack was based was that I was writing about certain secret subjects and even published them. This was a delicate aspect which had already appeared a few months earlier but had been put to rest at a secret meeting of the RIS (Romanian Intelligence Service) directors. I was never informed too much about that issue, but both Cezar and General Obadea assured me that I could continue to write within certain boundaries which I have followed completely.

Now, however, this problem was being raised again and was a sign that the “trouble” was not only not forgotten, it was being amplified. Besides being an effort to obstruct my books and future writing , the parallel intention was to create a small breach in the current RIS system by using this little “scandal” in order to take control over Department Zero. In these conditions, it is obvious that I could not have added fuel to the fire by publishing the fourth volume of the series immediately after these events transpired. I therefore had to wait, hoping at certain moments that all would cool down and I could keep on making known the main aspects that I was having to deal with at Department Zero. My waiting was prolonged long enough; and only now, two years after publishing the third volume, have I gotten the clearance from Cezar to continue writing.

I am asking the reader to understand this complicated situation in which I, metaphorically speaking, had my arms and legs tied. If it were not for a certain group of strong people with financial and political power who favored me, there would have been no chance at all for this book to be published. Of course, I cannot expose here all of the backstage aspects that exist and of which I am aware. Besides these, there are elements which Cezar said it was best I did not know as they are part of the incredible web of interests and goals which have taken over a large part of the powerful men in this country. I was only permitted to underline certain issues in order to keep a relative balance in a situation where waters “boil” virtually all of the time.

When General Obadea considered that the group behind this Senate committee was applying too much pressure by touching on some very sensitive and dangerous points, he acted in a special manner. By means of some highly placed connections that he had, he nipped the destructive initiative of some of the committee members in the bud. As I would later learn, the General had been very surprised when certain aspects regarding terrible secrets of state were presented to him that only his department and a section of the army could have known. Hilariously, those problems were used to blackmail him. This is why he had to call upon the high connections he had.

At least for that moment, his decision to counterattack the committee’s very virulent and subversive attack was salutary. The aspects put on the table by the committee were extremely serious with regard to national safety. In consequence, and in order for things not to become even more twisted and to have more time to gather information that might help, General Obadea sought out political aid. Even so, the pressure still continued and went overboard more than a few times.

At that level, the tone of those discussions were unofficial. The committee was represented by one of its members who was also a high dignitary. His intentions were obviously hostile to Department Zero. For instance, one of the critical points of the discussion referred to an incredible discovery that took place in the Orăştie Mountains in the '90s which was very quickly and finally blocked but involved important state interests. The approach of the committee was unorthodox, and although Department Zero was not involved with this discovery from the beginning, their purpose was to give credibility to the idea that this was just a cover-up and that, in reality, many things were hidden from the entitled state bodies which was a very serious crime. Being curious about this subject, I asked Cezar about it. He mentioned only one aspect related to those events, adding that we would discuss it further after my return from the United States. I have to indeed admit that what I found out afterwards not only dazzled me but also made me very eager to learn what happened at that time. I thought this would come in somewhat handy to me given the abilities I had acquired through the remote-viewing process. It turned out, however, that these abilities were of no use to me in this case. Still, I do not want to anticipate with regard to these matters because I will address the subject widely in the last chapter of this book. If I am to express my personal opinion, I would say that the discovery in the Orăştie Mountains represents the quintessence of the nature and origin of the Romanian people and the undoubtable and inalterable proof of what it truly was and is. In their ignorance, maybe some will hurry to accuse me of exaltation and exaggerated patriotism. In their place, I would first suggest they be patient to get to the presentation of those events and afterwards make a general opinion. On the other hand, it is known that we can never please everyone. I hope, however, that the respective information will raise many questions in skeptics; and for those who feel the thrill of ancestral times, it will bring to their hearts the certainty of the true origins of our people.

These matters were not settled as fast as I had hoped. The intervention of the politicians calmed the spirits to some extent and helped me to leave for the military base in Maryland, USA. There remained, however, certain obscure aspects that the General and Cezar had to take care of. As a result of this, we decided together that it would be inappropriate for me to write and publish the circumstances surrounding these events after I returned to Romania. Once again, I had to postpone the publishing of this book during that period with regard to the background of those discussions and tensions.

Two years following those events, however, things seem to have fallen into place and the political situation tended to take another turn so I got the green light for publishing. I have told all of this so that the reader may form, even approximately, a general idea of the context and reasons that existed in relation to my previous silence which many do not understand.

Let me now return to the period before my departure for the USA. Even after the political intervention requested by General Obadea, harassment from the Senate committee continued under different forms and this disturbed our daily activity to some degree. The idea that we followed was to avoid a decisional or legislative act from superior structures of the government, at least until I left. The apparent reason for starting this mess would therefore have been overcome and the situation could have been settled more easily. The events, however, did not happen as we wanted.

Five days before my departure, General Obadea announced to Cezar that they were invited to a new discussion on the matter. As you all know, such meetings always assume equally beneficial negotiations and settlements. In our case, however, there could be no advantage as the matter at hand was itself fraudulent. Still, the meeting was not to be avoided even if it had a semi-official nature. Once they arrived, Cezar knew that the pressure would be great. Therefore, in order to undermine these backstage maneuvers, he proposed to the General for me to be present at the meeting as well, especially because I was involved in the problem. He immediately saw the advantage and agreed on the spot. Not only would this be an uncomfortable surprise for the representative of the committee, it would also stop the representative from acting with dangerous freedom with respect to certain threats or decisions. There was also the possibility that, faced with this fait accompli, he would back down and ask for a new meeting with more precise discussion terms. I knew the person in question since I worked in the Ministry and knew that, when he hung on to a problem, he badly wanted to obtain an immediate result. He lacked diplomatic reason and patience in action. Choleric and selfish in nature, he persistently tried to solve all problems of personal interest in a harsh and authoritarian way. I could thus sketch a viable psychological profile for the scheduled meeting and agreed on a certain strategy with Cezar and General Obadea.

The meeting took place in one of Bucharest's fancy restaurants that is considered to be a main hub for political affairs. We arrived there first, and after a quarter of an hour, the representative of the Senate committee also arrived. Shaking the hands of Cezar and the General with nonchalance and sitting down, he spoke to them without looking at me, cold and distant.

“Who’s this?”

The General introduced me and specified that I was going to depart in a few days.

“He already has all the credentials for Maryland,” he added.

“I don’t like this business, gentlemen,” the character said, indisposed. “We have things to talk about and you knew very well that I can’t do it in front of someone else.”

General Obadea suddenly became harsh.

“Mr. Domotei, things have been settled clearly and there is no need to apply any more pressures. If it is necessary, we will go to the President.”

The discussion got fired up between the two. Cezar and I kept quiet because it was all part of our anticipated plan. The man would get nervous and his blood sugar level would drop. Because we already knew he had problems with his stomach, he would have to eat at once, and that is why we arranged for the plates to be already prepared. Domotei had to be convinced to delay any decision until after my departure. What he did not know is that once I entered this American training program, there were certain external cooperation protocols which individualized Department Zero whereby it could not be absorbed into larger structures without notable repercussions with regard to the relations between the two countries at the level of the secret services. That would have meant solving our problems.

That evening was long and tiresome. Domotei had that type of street intelligence that is fast, slick-like, and highly adaptable. Even if he did not see the nuances and did not have a general view of the matter, he still could not be fooled easily. It took several hours to slow down his vigilance and to persuade him that there were chances of solving this problem in the future in the way he and the group which he represented wanted. We knew that, later on, when they would learn of the Romanian-American normative act, there would be nothing left for them to do and a great scandal would emerge; but in this manner, Department Zero remained on its own feet and would not depend upon political or any other kind of interests.

I left for the USA at the beginning of December 2005 with a special RIS (Romanian Intelligence Service) flight. The plane was also carrying a few American officers which included three colonels. They were the special envoys in regard to the Bucegi ensemble. After a short stop in Spain, we safely arrived in Maryland and started the training the very next day. The Americans were very serious and punctual. After all, they were spending their own money. The equipment was interesting but not spectacular.

There were several Marines and USAF officers moving around, peeking and trying to figure out which one of us was the most promising. Surely, they wanted to claim the respective agent for the service that they were working in and which they led, after an agreement with the secret service that he was a part of.

Knowing that the stakes were high, I concentrated as much as I could, remaining almost all the time in a relaxed and receptive state that would be good for any remote-viewing (RV) investigation at any time. Still, from the array of colonels and generals that came and went, one seemed not to like me and that was Colonel Foreeth. Every time he passed near me, he would never lose the opportunity to mock me or even to scold me, more or less seriously, which did not look good for the general picture nor for the final report that was going to be made on me. I admit he was getting on my nerves because it was obvious that it was mere dislike and nothing more, but it could cost me. I had been sent by Department Zero as a kind of “insurance” with regard to the value of the RIS so I could not afford to make a bad image there. I do not know the thinking of the secret services of other countries that sent their representatives, but already there were only five of us left, the others being sent home. The matter was ruthlessly and directly clear: you go or you stay. The ones who stayed had to take some more tests.

I had a special respect for the Canadian, a very sensitive guy with certain extra sensory abilities. He was by far in the lead, but at least I recognized his value for what it was. If Foreeth had not stressed me with his idiot jokes, perhaps I could have improved my abilities even more. Fate, however, solved this problem admirably.

I had already spent two months in Maryland practicing hard. I have also said that the Americans took things very seriously, the military base being an important one that was almost always being visited by different important military personalities. Among these was the Chief of the Pentagon, who at that time was General Inossanto, and he came a couple of times. Although severe and cunning in everything, the General kept a joyful tone that he did not fear to share with his subordinates whenever he felt it was right. I even had the impression that, to a certain extent, he liked me and was somewhat interested in my situation. I could not say if this was a direct consequence of the American Counterintelligence Service in relation with the Bucegi discovery, but the first impression that he made on me was a favorable one. Besides, he had an exceptional stateliness which had the effect that, when he entered a room, not only did everyone rise — a natural element of rank — but they also stayed silent a long time after that until he brought up or said something.

On that day, Foreeth's misfortune was not to see the General who was bent and discussing something with one of his aides at a table in the back of the room. We were in the middle of a small break preparing for a secret and important test which had to be taken in the Chief of the Pentagon's presence. As usual, Foreeth entered carelessly and started to pick on me with no reason whatsoever. With the corner of my eye, I noticed how General Inossanto turned his attention to me and Foreeth, the latter continuing to remain unaware of the presence of the Chief of the Pentagon in the room. A few of the other officers responsible for the test tried to warn Foreeth, but the General signaled them to stop. The situation became somewhat embarrassing until, with a subconscious intuitive reflex, I told the Colonel rapidly what he did between 9:00 o'clock and 10 o'clock in the morning, underlining that his wife would perhaps not be so pleased to find out.

A grave-like silence settled. I was as red as a crab and had already started to collect my things, considering I had no longer any reason to be there.

Then, the sound of the vigorous laugh of General Inossanto was heard, filling the silence in cascades. Still, no one dared to take any position as Foreeth's vengeful nature was known as was the importance of his rank.

He remained with his eyes gouged out, red with fury and incapable of saying a single word.

"Ha-ha-ha, Foreeth," said General Inossanto, who did not stop laughing.
"You've been keeping that hidden away from us!"

Only then did the Colonel see the General. He saluted, and taking the Chief of the Pentagons's reaction as favorable to him, he was preparing to give the order to send me back to my country.

Then, an amazing thing happened. From the laughter and joyful tone he had, General Inossanto suddenly changed his attitude, speaking in a cold loud voice.

"Do you want to do something I do not know, Foreeth?"

His tone also took a vaguely threatening tone.

The colonel stumbled, stuttered and excused himself.

"Sir, no, Sir...I...just...Sir...an offence..."

The general looked at him with cold eyes.

"Tomorrow you are transferred from Airborne to Marines."

"But...Sir...I..."

"That is an order, Foreeth!" the General raised his voice. "You will find it signed on your desk first thing tomorrow. You have no reason to be here."

Saying this, General Inossanto came next to me and was very friendly as he made several slightly ironic remarks about Foreeth whom he now ignored completely. He went out with his tail between his legs; and from that moment on, I never saw him there again.

It is easy to understand what a boost this intervention of the Chief of the Pentagon was to me. In a certain way, things in America are as they are in our own home. Immediately afterwards, I recorded a significant “stock” increase and was given more attention and shown more respect. I am sure that all of this did not come from a real appreciation or judgment but more because of conjuncture aspects like the ones listed above. Anyway, I finished in fourth place which was considered a real victory. It was not clear to me what use this would be for me, but the fact that I finished among the first gave me a certain self confidence.

We were just getting ready to move to a new and more advanced round of RV studying when I got a telephone call on a secured line from Cezar. He was calling me home in haste without telling me the reason why. I did not ask another question either. I reported directly to the chief, General Roddey, who expressed his regret that I had to leave unexpectedly but told me I could continue my training in a year but only with the selected ones.

He left me to believe without any ambiguity that I was one of them. Happily, I rushed to catch the jeep which was waiting for me in the yard. American efficiency was worthy of envy.

When I got to the airfield, I properly saluted two officers whom I knew from Romania as being attaches to the Bucegi mission. I was glad to see that they also responded with responsibility, as if they knew too well who I was and what I was doing there. Without losing any more time, I embarked on a B-52 and followed the same line as before: a short stop in Spain and then finally to Bucharest on a secluded runway. The snow mixed with mud and rain gave me a small feeling of discomfort. It was something totally different than Maryland. From the runway, I directly embarked on a helicopter belonging to Department Zero which rose immediately, heading for the Alpha Base. I could not suspect the grand surprise that awaited me there.

Chapter Two — IMPORTANT MISSION

At the base, Cezar was smiling as he met me. Having heard about the Maryland “incident,” he had reported it to General Obadea who laughed in satisfaction.

“Did you see? Did you see how the General ‘fixed’ Foreeth?” he repeated to Cezar. “Even if we haven’t met for a while, I always got along well with Inossanto.”

Then, turning towards me, Cezar spoke.

“You did a fine job there, Radu! But now things are going on a different path.”

I raised my eyes, expecting that there would once again be problems with the Senate committee.

“Aaa, it is not about Domotei,” the General rushed to comfort me. “For now, we have managed to keep that situation under control; but the man is always watching and we have to be on guard all the time. Please step into my office.”

I followed the General, curious about what my next assignment was going to be. I, however, remained still in the doorway. Doctor Xien was sitting at the elegant chrome and nickel table.

“Repa Sundhi!” I almost involuntarily shouted with great surprise and joy in my voice.

Doctor Xien looked exactly as I knew him: small with a spot of baldness and dressed in one of those well known Chinese uniforms except that it was now dark blue with white sleeves. He slowly bowed in front of me and smiled. I rushed, taking and shaking his feeble hands strongly. I had not seen him for some time, and I knew this was a matter of great importance if the government of Romania was seeking his advice. I did not have the time to express these thoughts, however, because he intervened directly.

“That matter has been settled. All is well now; but here, meet Shin Li.”

Out of emotion, I did not get to analyze the situation in the chamber very well. Doctor Xien was sitting at the table next to a very young and superb woman while Cezar and General Obadea sat on either side of her. She was the assistant who had accompanied Repa Sundhi in the '80s when Department Zero was founded. I could not help but thinking: "Don't these people ever grow old?" According to Cezar's description, it seemed that they remained untouched by the rigors of old age.

"I've told you before that time doesn't pass for us as it does for you," Doctor Xien continued my thought verbally. "But, let us leave that aside. There is something important that you must do, but it is all up to your decision. Shin Li will help you to understand this better."

I was still pretty confused. What was I suppose to do, who exactly was this woman, and how did these two manage not to age? There were many questions that were colliding in my head and agitating my mind. Slowly, however, and thanks to the training gained in Maryland, certain mind functions started to put themselves in order and offered competent answers.

I realized that the arrival of Doctor Xien was something important and without a doubt was not related to just me. I understood that this extraordinarily beautiful woman with Malayan features was going to guide me through the thicket that I had to pass; and I also thought that I could use RV to understand more about Doctor Xien and his companion.

"Do not even think that the Americans' method will give any results in our case," he immediately comforted me, reading my mind as usual. "I advise you not to waste any time and begin studying as soon as possible together with Shin Li."

Intuitively, I realized that before this meeting there was another important one between Doctor Xien, General Obadea and Cezar which referred to the secret parchment received not so long ago from the Goddess Machandi. It seemed, therefore, that the time had come for the information it contained to be made public. Doctor Xien had already assisted me in translating this text from the old Tibetan dialect, but he specified that it was not to be published yet. Now, the situation had changed radically. I was told that I had to act without any further delay in order to publish it. Still, Repa Sundhi told me that it would be useful to add some short comments to the five stanzas of the parchment in order to enhance the enlightenment and understanding of interested readers. The nature of these comments was to be revealed by Shin Li, and that is exactly what her decisive role in my mission was to be.

“But, Cezar cannot explain this?” I asked.

Doctor Xien stopped, slightly smiling.

“No, this time someone else must provide the necessary explanations,” he said.

I looked upon Shin Li. She was truly perfect in her body’s features, and her smile fascinated me. I found myself opposing her smile with some small resistance because I felt defenseless. I gave one last effort towards this end.

“How long will I need to learn of the mysteries of the parchment? I have many other duties to perform here.”

“Exactly as long as it will take,” Repa Sundhi comforted me as he patted me on the shoulder. “Not a moment more.”

Cezar told me that Doctor Xien was going to remain at the base for a while longer due to some supplementary national security aspects that the government had raised. They were asking for his help once again. During this period, Shin Li was going to be around me almost all of the time. I confess that I did not understand the “tactical maneuver” coming from Doctor Xien and Cezar; but at the same time, I felt a shiver that engulfed my heart when I looked at Shin Li, being glad of her presence. That woman far exceeded any beauty standards that I was accustomed to. The features specific to the Malayan land gave her that inexplicable Asian sweetness of the face without straying too much from Western features. At the team’s meetings, she barely spoke; but when she did, her voice was strong and expressed precisely all that she wanted, sometimes with a slight accent which made her even more charming. My speculation regarding her space-time “consistency” and her youthful mystery found no solution for I did not have enough data. With regard to Elinor, the matter was clear: his organism’s functions were influenced by that metallic object which gave him phenomenal longevity. In Shin Li’s case, I could not find a single support to explain her time “suspension.” Later, I tried to find out something from Cezar, but it seems that the subject was taboo.

“You don’t need this knowledge for now. It will only get you lost in a jungle which you will not know how to get out of.”

“But how can I speak to someone about such important subjects without having any information about her person?”

“Sometimes it is best to leave things like this,” Cezar concluded.

Obviously, Repa Sundhi and Shin Li were two highly spiritually evolved beings who had to accomplish certain specific duties and missions and thus gave their help voluntarily. Compared to what I did in Maryland, the current job seemed tens of times more difficult. Lately, I noticed a sort of rational and spiritual “laziness” regarding myself that was especially prompted by the ordered and precise schedule from the American base where I had trained. Somewhat drunk by some successes gained through RV, I started to lose sight of the true teaching which was the spiritual one. I realized that remote-viewing was not the main piece of my “education” but rather the correct understanding of the mysteries of spirituality, especially with regard to the fact that Doctor Xien had called on Shin Li for this.

Despite these appearances, the “lessons” did not begin immediately. For two months afterwards, I continued my daily routine, selecting staff and taking part in several tactical actions together with Lieutenant Nicoără. I had so much to do and my attention was so clenched that, rightfully, I do not think that I would have been able to assimilate any of Shin Li’s explanations. Besides, during this period, she was gone most of the time with Doctor Xien in the capital regarding the same delicate problems of national security that I did not have access to.

In May 2006, our department received a visit from General Roddey. As I said before, he was a pleasant and wonderful presence; a very intelligent, serious and righteous man. To my surprise, Cezar gave me the task of receiving him until the discussions that were soon to take place. He was probably counting on a certain mutual sympathy and respect that he had felt between me and the General which had been indicated by the excellent references which he sent after my departure from Maryland.

I felt honored to take the role of the host and to be able to engage into discussions with the General which were actually quite dangerous for me as I had not fully mastered the subject. The old officer was a man of vast military experience; and without a doubt, he thought of me as “easy game” as if this was a pause or a break in his busy affairs. He was a very good friend of Cezar, but in this very fine field of national security and counterintelligence, things are always like quicksand. Later on, even Cezar asked himself if the General’s attack was not, amongst others, also an arrow sent over Department Zero which had sent me to the protocol offices to receive him. No matter how great was the sympathy and friendship between him and Cezar, it seemed that there were certain limits which made the General think that being received by a new employee was somehow beneath his dignity.

Later, however, while analyzing the matter with Cezar, we realized that things weren’t that simple. General Roddey had made a reference to the Orăştie Mountains in the western part of our country, asking me if I knew anything about this undoubtedly exceptional case. As I said before, I was surprised because Cezar never did clarify this subject with me which had been approached by an American official.

“In this regard, things are more complicated,” Cezar explained to me. “Believe me, even for us it represents a great mystery. We will talk about it but not right now.”

If everything had stopped here, the matter would not have been significant, but what got the attention of and worried General Obadea and Cezar was that the American officer left it to be understood that there was data which proved a connection between those mountains and one of the Americans’ most secret bases.

“If Roddey let this escape him, it means that it is indeed something serious,” Cezar commented. “I know the General and he has always been sure of the intelligence he has. This shows that there are important things going on which we do not know about yet.”

“But it seems that he is feeling the ground, too,” I noticed. “Otherwise, he would have approached you with this piece of information directly.”

Cezar stood silent for a moment.

"He did come," he said, "but this is what worries me. It was not the Roddey whom I know. The impression he left me with was that fear was taking him over and that he is no longer sure of the intelligence flow."

"There hasn't been any official discussion?"

"Official discussions begin when both sides know that they can rely on something. This was not the case for either of us."

I stood in perplexity. I looked at General Obadea as he was holding his head on his hands. Cezar was also quite gloomy.

"Okay, but this means that we don't know what is going on in our own backyard," I mumbled in astonishment.

The two remained silent. At last, Cezar spoke.

"That would not be the problem, but the fact is that General Roddey thinks we know but that we don't want to tell him when, in fact, it is not true at all. This creates tension in our relations."

"General," he spoke to Obadea, "not even the last round of discussion were efficient?"

The General raised his head slowly. His eyes were tired and an expression close to helplessness was installed on his face. He spoke, heavily, with long pauses between words.

"You know to what a standstill we came in this case. He didn't believe me, and I'm really sorry because I feel that here something is being ruined for nothing. It is as if all is piling up just now."

I then asked the General if Doctor Xien could assist us in solving this crisis. Americans knew about him, but the subject was always diplomatically avoided.

"Doctor Xien told me that there is a certain limit to his interventions and that some things must be solved by us alone. Cezar knows this better. He spoke to him in person."

"In this case, the solution must come from the involvement of both sides," Cezar explained to me. "It is necessary for it to be so for now. The officers on the American staff are very good men, but they still have a certain degree of understanding. To begin to explain the subtle nuances of this matter and why it has to be like this and not any other way seems, however, a bit too much for them."

General Roddey left and nothing had been settled. The spiky problem was that the relations between the Romanian secret services and the Pentagon were beginning to deteriorate due to a lack of confidence. When I am speaking about the Romanian secret services, I am referring to Department Zero, which was the link to the Great Discovery in the Bucegi Mountains.

The background of these events became even more complicated after a very short visit of the American Secretary of Defense which followed only a few days after General Roddey's departure and had a very well stated purpose.

A government meeting behind closed doors was held and attended only by the Prime Minister, the Ministers of State, General Obadea and the American dignitary. I have never seen Obadea as troubled as after that meeting. Even Cezar was worried. It seems that, right then and there, disclosures were made revealing that the Pentagon and the CIA had been financing for many years, with funds amounting to tens of million of dollars, vast research programs in the field of parapsychology and that contracts for such were with both state universities and with private institutions. The American side stated that they were doing this "because, in this field, it is better to keep our eyes open than to pretend that we don't know." In the center of these preoccupations were clairvoyance and telepathy; but in practice, there is no area of these phenomena that was not studied by the military or secret services of the USA. In the minutes of the meeting, which were sent to our Department two hours after the meeting, it was stated that the Americans underlined the fact that several experiments were being conducted in order to establish how extrasensory groups can decipher documents closed in safes or can precisely see objects or people with the focus being on atomic submarines. As the most complex and expensive machines built on Earth, they are of key interest, especially because of the multiple warhead torpedoes and their secret double-encrypted launching codes. I felt like laughing at the content of the minutes.

“What is here is mere rain water,” I said, detached. “We have done all of this a long time ago with remote-viewing, and as the minutes state, it is clear that it is just more money drained from the American state budget for clandestine operations.”

Indeed, I knew what it was all about with these secret programs because I had just taken part in one of them, and I understood too well that what the Americans were saying was mere sand in the eyes of officials in order to better hide the progress that had been achieved. But, as always in these cases, the best defense was offense.

In the room with me were also Cezar, General Obadea and Shin Li who had returned with him from Bucharest after the secret meeting held with the government. I did not understand why they all remained silent although the situation was clear for all.

“It’s complicated because the Secretary of Defense made a numb threat,” Shin Li spoke unexpectedly.

General Obadea suddenly became attentive because Shin Li had not been present at the meeting. I quickly went over the sheets of the minutes but noticed no threat.

“And still it exists,” Shin Lin continued. “The Americans did not say: ‘We are asking you for the complete protocols regarding the Orăştie Mountains,’ but coldly mentioned, ‘We will take the complete protocols.’ This means that there was a prior agreement at governmental level.”

I looked at the General, wanting him to save the situation and to deny this diplomatic deal because I did not like the way the Americans had raised the issue. The old man looked overwhelmed by the concerns and pressures which he had been always subjected to, but this lasted only for a few moments. He then stood straight in his chair and passed his hands through his grizzled hair and over his harsh face. Then, looking with admiration at Shin Li, who had silently remained standing and looking down, he spoke.

“Shin Li is right. There have been backstage fires. All this has been happening since ’94 — Cezar knows. They will not believe us that we don’t have any intelligence and that the dossier is very thin. They put me to the wall; they said that this was incompetence. The Prime Minister drew my attention to the fact that if I did not have this matter sorted out in three months, he cannot help me and would intervene to the President to remove me from the department. It seems that there was an agreement with the American secretary. But, if this happened, it would be hard for me to impose Cezar as leader since they will zero in like vultures.”

We all stood, perplexed. I at least did not fully understand what this was all about. The General then continued.

“Still, I managed to obtain from the Prime Minister the promise that this piece of information will not be revealed outside. This may give us some time to arrange things around here.”

He then turned towards Cezar.

“Tomorrow I am leaving for the Pentagon to speak to Inossanto. I might still have a chance to achieve something. Call for Nicoară and tell him to prepare the departure. While I am gone, I will give you the codes.”

I saw the old man rising from his own ashes. As ideas came to him, he became more exact and more precise in his actions, hoping to be able to save something. Nevertheless, the situation seemed quite serious because an order of the Prime Minister or the President could not be ignored, and if this order were actually enforced, then no one would have a precise answer about what would happen with regard to management and security of the Projection Chamber. Most probably, USAP agents would infiltrate it immediately, and military competence would combine with the civilian, or better said, political faction. Everyone knew what this meant: the certain penetration of Masonry’s representatives into the command and control levers of the Bucegi Mountains complex with unprecedented consequences.

Amidst all the fuss that had been created, only Shin Li remained idle. When the General said good bye, wanting to leave the base, she spoke to him naturally.

“General, the chief of the Pentagon will not see you. You are making this journey without a precise end. I just want you to save time and energy.”

The General said nothing but could not hide a displeased gesture. I do not think that anyone present there, except Cezar, did not think that this was possible. Obadea left for the capital to take the plane bound for the United States, but the second day following, at noon, Cezar told me that the Oval Office knew about the General's visit to the Pentagon. After the secret discussion with the Government, this might look even worse as it could be interpreted as defiance. In the elegant halls of Washington D.C., old friendships or connections were not taken into consideration but only the pragmatic and immediate aspects of a certain matter.

"Our service received a confirmation from the White House that the Secretary of State has ordered that General Inossanto should not meet with General Obadea," Cezar told me after a few hours. "This will be a hard blow for the old man," he silently added, clearly preoccupied by the dangerous turn that things were taking.

After a couple of days, Obadea returned to the country without having met his friend, General Inossanto. I could make out the traces of a beginning of resignation on his face. Without a doubt, he knew very well the dangerous implications of his removal from the leadership of the department, but perhaps fatigue and the repeated "attacks" on his person were starting to take their toll. From my point of view, Department Zero was now very well equipped, both tactically and theoretically. The last months had meant an almost continuous work schedule for the remaking of protocols, secret codes, tactical schemes and, most of all, personnel. A new leadership, however, would have destabilized the entire activity because of political interference. This was, in fact, the great difference. For over 20 years, General Obadea had managed to keep a certain balance in this sense, not letting others enter into the department's "backyard." But, the latest repeated pressures and threats had managed to heat up the atmosphere surrounding this problem, and it seemed that this was bringing matters to the very edge of an inevitable outcome.

It was then for the first time that I heard the General saying that he wanted to retire. I felt a thorn in my heart. The whole of Department Zero was virtually equal to his work of a lifetime. It was a long career that was threatened with being blown away. But, as I said, beyond General Obadea's career, name, and prestige, there was the country's interest to consider as well as not permitting certain hostile forces to take control over the complex in the Bucegi Mountains.

Although I had learned a great deal up to that point and knew enough subtleties in the field of spirituality, I confess that I felt a panic, anger and helplessness engulfing me as I faced an injustice which I, at the very least, considered totally inappropriate in this context.

I then felt Shin Li's light hand on my arm.

"Let us go. Time has finally arrived," she said. "We have nothing to do here anymore."

We were in the protocol chamber after a short briefing with Cezar, Lieutenant Nicoară, two other officers of the department, and General Obadea who had remained silent and absorbed by thoughts. I saw how Cezar exchanged a look full of implications with Shin Li. I do not know why, but this made me feel a bit more relaxed. The woman slightly bowed her head and followed me into my office. She maintained that same unaffected air, that impeccable posture and that same naturalness in her gestures. I, however, was pretty confused about what was going on in the department. Up to the last moment, I had hoped that things would change and that all would be repaired, just as it had happened countless times before. It is fair to say that no major decision had been taken yet, but I had a feeling about it. Feeling down, I was upset and searched for an explanation.

"A short while ago, I received an intelligence note. The Duchess of Halberg is coming on a visit to Bucharest. Right now, in these tense moments, it is like something is up."

And, wanting to make sure I was not talking to the walls, I asked Shin Li a direct question.

"I think you know she is a standing member of the Black Nobility?"

She bowed her head affirmatively.

"Sure, and that she is also part of the Club of Rome, but these organizations are not of too great importance as their names tend to show it. Others are more dangerous. It is, however, strange that they mobilized so quickly. This means that they have been waiting for this signal for a long time.”

I sat powerless in the armchair, looking downwards and frowning. If things kept going this way, my contract would probably be canceled in a short while, leaving me only with the provisions related to security. Sadly, I made the observation that it seemed we had been overwhelmed by political pressure and that I did not understand how it was possible for God to allow this.

Shin Li suddenly became cold.

“If I hadn’t known about you from Doctor Xien and if Cezar hadn’t made a resume of some features of your character, I would have said that you are as dumb as the dark night after hearing you speak like this. In this case, however, there are still some hopes of recovery.”

I stood as if stricken. I could not believe my ears and, in the end, I told myself that the woman was full of surprises. Even so, I would not have imagined that the beautiful Shin Li would ever be capable of such daring. In my inner forum, however, I admitted that I fully deserved the name I had been called.

As if nothing had happened, she continued to speak in the same natural manner.

“You should be more careful and meditate more deeply on these aspects.”

“And what do you think, I pray, should I meditate upon?” I asked, still baffled by her responses.

I didn’t expect any answer however. In the end, who was this woman to judge me so sharply? I was being consumed on the inside, being highly concerned about the faith in Department Zero and the General, and here she was whipping my character out of itself.

“Now is not the time for you to play the victim because you will not solve anything. This will lead you to panic and discouragement and you will never fix things with these. In fact, it is not about you fixing anything. Forget about the concern regarding the department. There is someone to take care of it. What you cannot yet understand is that what seems to be very bad now is, in fact, a way towards the good.”

“Phooey! What are you talking about? Is it better that General Obadea will no longer be in command of Department Zero? What bad thing is, in fact, good?” I insidiously asked, hoping to catch her stumbling in her own statements.

Shin Li looked at me with her superb eyes and with a radiant smile.

“I am looking at you; and I realize how, in your great lack of reason, you really manage to be as sincere and pure as a child. Somewhat not knowing but pure and innocent. And, it is very well that it is so because, if you tried to use this gift and to obtain purity and innocence ‘on demand,’ then you would become pragmatic and everything would go to waste. Purity and innocence are your very freedom. They are even that which exceeds you as an individual being, as a person, except that, as I have said, being somewhat stupid, you yet fail to see this.”

“Please stop using words of this sort!” I strongly said.

“Forget that. Concentrate on what surpasses you. Don’t become petty. I once knew a human being who, when he was a child, used to play with some spirits of nature. Everyone, including his parents, thought he was retarded; but he actually played with those wonderful beings of nature whom only he was able to see. If you allow this childlike frankness, purity and innocence to surround you more and more, but in an unprogrammed manner as you did now, you should know that you still have a chance not to be stupid. But, if you abandon yourself to petty and pragmatic calculations in order to obtain something only for yourself, then that will be your doom.”

I was beginning to be immune to her appeals because I realized more and more that the force and energy involved in those expressions did not put the accent on the bothersome words but had a totally different meaning that for now escaped me.

“But, let’s return to bad and good because this is where the discussion started,” Shin Li said, undisturbed.

“Aaa, you haven’t forgotten,” I noticed, half-mouthing.

“How can such ‘wit’ like you expressed earlier be forgotten? Of course, in many cases, what is bad is actually good. But it is also true that this analysis can shock some people who have made a unilateral idea about God because people associate God only with what is good and beautiful without being capable of understanding the hidden significance of the fact that great divinities also love obscurity.

“And what is the hidden significance?” I asked.

“Have patience. The statement is paradoxical; and it implies the fact some divinities are highly above the domain of good and evil and that is why they are detached from these dual aspects.”

“You go and convince someone who suffers great losses or hardships in life of this fact,” I said, upset although in essence I knew the subject of the discussion.

“The problem is rather delicate here. Of course, we cannot state under any circumstances that God is evil, but for us it is wise to understand that we can discover God even in the existence of evil. This truth represents a great conceptual barrier for most people and this is why they fail in life so many times.”

“And how would this be better understood?” I asked, becoming more conciliatory.

“It is very important not to forget for a single moment that God always, in every second, is everything. This will help you quickly get rid of the dualist idea that both good and evil are absolute.”

Yes, I had read about the aspects of absolute dualism and that brought into my mind, for example, the eternal problem of Christian Puritanism: original sin, presented in the Eastern Liturgy as Felix Culpa (a happy blame). I knew that, to solve this dilemma, Christianity had to justify the “original sin” by the fact that it represented the very way in which man could reach his spiritual salvation. I only wondered if the acceptance of this obvious thesis can overcome the narrow prejudices of Puritan Christianity which have lasted for almost 2000 years. But, since my purpose was not to see how many parishioners could understand this, I listened further to the explanation provided by Shin Li who seemed not just very elegant but also full of wisdom.

“The statement that God, in reality, can be discovered and felt like supreme goodness, even in what is evil, expresses in its essence the idea that the evil which appears is not absolute evil and that, as a consequence, it does not oppose good absolutely.”

“If things are like this, then why do we confront ourselves with evil and good?” I asked for good reason.

“Because the experience of evil confronts us, in fact, with our own weakness, with our own sin. That is why — because what you do badly now most times has a justified trace in your past actions. Of course, we cannot say that the evil is not real; but even so, we know that if we sincerely admit something bad we did, it then becomes, in a certain way, a sort of bad thing that is a bit more ‘good.’”

Here she was right. In fact, not only here but all of the time. I was thinking that the experience of daily life many times gives us occasion to notice that the ones who have never known anything bad are, generally speaking, lacking love or are behaving inhumanely towards others. There are a number of cosmogonies in which evil is regarded as the original sin, a sin that also determines the actual condition of the Creation or the Macrocosmos. One can talk about such a mystery as evil because it cannot be understood by regular means of the mind, logic or reason respectively and an explanation cannot too often be found by the common man. This is why, for an ignorant human being, evil appears to be almost impossible to understand. If man was truly able to explain it properly, evil would look more like a bomb whose detonator has been removed; and once its mystery would be fully discovered, evil will cease to exist.

My Oriental and esoteric oriented readings came to good use at that point. I remembered a significant quote from the great Hindi epic, The Mahabharata, which made me deduce the wise way to act in this matter. I searched for that quote for a long time until I found it again and I'll include it here completely. A great wise man, who had realized the Supreme Truth, gives the following advice: “Renounce good and evil now, renounce truth and lie; and after that, renouncing all of these completely, finally renounce the act of renouncing itself.”

This idea is expressed in the Kata-Upanishad when the hero, Nashiketas, asks Yama, who is the deity of the realm of the dead, “O Yama, tell me, I beg of you, what is in reality beyond good and evil?”

Still, I do not want to prolong these philosophical considerations which had Shin Li’s subtle explanations as a basis. It is enough to observe from the careful reading of these quotes that we cannot be above good if we cannot be, at the same time, above evil. In connection to this, however, I allow myself to observe the need for a metaphysical analysis without which we cannot even hope to understand the matter of good and evil in a superior manner.

Shin Li made the observation that evil is still an unquestionable fact, a reality that we can neither deny nor avoid, at least while we are still confronted with a state of ignorance. She has also shown me that there was a sort of mystery of evil, the reality of which cannot be the focus of reason or logic. Thus, this metaphysical dimension appears which causes us to notice that evil is almost incomprehensible to human intelligence, but this statement is not valid with regard to divine omniscience.

“Think a little,” Shin Li urged me. “If God would do harm, then He would not be that God. So for God, evil simply does not exist. Torture, hatred, injustice, and sadism are only man’s ‘short-sightedness’ towards some aspects of life, and they are interpreted as being evil. However, if God allows their existence, this surely happens for reasons that He knows for certain; but for the time being, man cannot know them because of the state of ignorance which he is in. All that he can do is to hope that sometime later, even in a future life by spiritually evolving, he would learn the answer to this enigma.”

I remained pondering. The arguments were valid but human nature is too strong to let these principles manifest freely. Our tendency to search for an immediate solution when we are harmed, even vengeance, is too strong in most of us to make us lucid and wise. Even if rational thinking shows us very clearly every time that it cannot even explain evil and cannot succeed in eliminating it, this habit repeats because the mysterious action of evil can only be transformed and “alchemized” in the heart; that is, through the formidable power of love and innocence which always spring from a pure heart.

“Other problems might arise here, however,” I said, “because, for example, if a person goes even deeper into evil deeds, the accrued suffering and pain can become unbearable for him or her and push that person to even more reckless deeds that are also evil. It seems like there is no exit.”

“Only at first glance,” Shin Li underlined. “Most of the time, man is at first confronted with suffering and what is evil so that afterwards, having these two experiences, he or she can spiritually evolve to a state of spiritual maturity. When he or she willingly breaks rules and principles that he or she considers compulsory, suffering is generated in his or her own being by the strange and dangerous world that he or she entered into and becomes so great that forgiveness or desperation seem the only alternative to the mistakes made because for him or her there is no turning back. Due to this necessity to overcome this terrible fear and to go beyond the evil that was done, the human being can then find, as a ray of light, the divine transcendental experience. This is how we can explain the fact that when faced with great suffering or soul trials, man almost always seeks his escape in God. Of course, this passing over must come after a fully conscious and responsible deed because, if this aspect is treated as petty, one can then no longer speak about a severe mistake but rather a simple wrong step. The severe breaking of certain principles or rules then confronts us with our own liberty and, through this, with the responsibility that we hold.”

Shin Li touched a sensitive subject here, the one of fully conscious freedom and acting. This matter was considered very dangerous by the Church who regarded with great concern the possibility of man manifesting his individual freedom fully and breaking the laws and regulations which the Church had pre-established. This is why the Church rushed to forgive ignorance in regard to a certain deed or action which is wrong, stating that ignorance is enough to release us fully from the respective sin. In other words, you were forgiven at the holy confession if you said that you did not know that what you did was in fact bad. Let us not forget the biblical texts which show the meeting between Jesus and the man who was working on the holy day of the Sabbath and to whom the Savior said: “Man, you are happy if you truly know what you are doing now by breaking the strict rule of the Sabbath which is the day when nobody works. But remember this, for if you do not truly know this, then you are doomed for you are breaking sacred law!"

Jesus' statement therefore takes into consideration man in relation to the Sabbath and not the Sabbath in relation to man as the Church does. For this reason, the text has been considered very dangerous and destabilizing, especially for the conception and interests of the clergy because it subtly underlines the necessity of freedom of choice and makes us deduce the power which freedom – when it is assumed consciously, responsibly and wisely – gives to a man. In the opinion of the Christian Church, however, it is dangerous to offer man freedom. This doesn't mean that the necessity of being free is an apology for sin and anarchy which, over time, is a reason that has been invoked by most representatives of the Church in order to justify the rules which they imposed.

Assuming the prototype of a perfect human being who has never sinned up to now, has never "fallen" and has never done any harm, we will notice immediately that the respective person lacks that experience of weakness, mistake, sin or pain that is often felt both in body and soul. In my opinion, which is shared also by Shin Li, without the experience of these weaknesses and mistakes, it is difficult if not impossible to achieve a just understanding of some fundamental realities that exist in Creation. If it were not so, it would be difficult to accept the human condition, human society, meeting another human being, and relations of all sorts that intervene. Most of the time, these kinds of experiences give birth to the purest and most uplifting love which is full of compassion at the same time. It cannot be claimed that we can fully love only from heights because we also have to be below, among the ones we love, thus getting to know their sufferings, sins and troubles through a profound, intense and alive experience. Therefore, if we think about it deeply, we can immediately realize that the matter of evil has crushed in advance once and for all many of the schemes that some men make for themselves regarding God, making us become more humble and more realistic about the different complex aspects of God's creation.

That was a memorable day when Shin Li demonstrated her extraordinary psychological finesse and dexterity of argumentation. I would say even more that she was the one who caused me to go a bit beyond and to see over the barriers of my own ego. It was a journey inside of me which prepared the explanation of the text of the parchment that I had received from the Goddess Machandi. Still, four more months were to pass before the situation arranged itself in such a manner that would permit its complete drafting.

In the meantime, my hopes for the continuity of General Obadea's activity proved to be in vain. It seemed that the old man had indeed reached the end of his patience, but surprises did not stop even then. With countless relations and connections in the obscure field of the secret services as well as in the political arena, the General was still a very powerful man.

Although he filed his resignation from command, he remained on active duty and did not choose to become a reserve officer. This was an act of resistance that opposed the prime-minister's political decision, also under diplomatic pressure, that shook Department Zero like a lightning bolt. If anyone thought up to that point that the General's removal from command of this unit was highly improbable, it did happen and amazingly fast, too.

Still, things worked out better than we had hoped which encouraged all of us who were left at Alpha Base to clap our hands under the table in a frenzy.

As I said before, General Obadea was not a man to give up that easily, but in this case, he just did not have enough control levers anymore and, as the intention of removing him from the head of the department came from the highest political spheres, he had to give up the command of the department which he had taken care of for over twenty-five years. He did, however, have enough high level connections and relations to pull some strings that would leave us at least partially covered. Personally, I am absolutely certain that the Duchess of Halberg's visit had speeded up the outcome in the General's case. As there are unwritten laws in diplomacy and politics, we were left alone without much of a fuss after Obadea's departure from command. I did not doubt that this was only the calm before the storm, but at least we had a little time to recover from the "quake."

It is very interesting, however, how things fell into place in regard to the spirit of Shin Li's explanations, even when you think that it could not get any worse. I always suspected that the General could not get over the refusal of his visit to the Pentagon. This was either because of the personal relationship he had enjoyed with General Inossanto or simply because he did not have access to all the intelligence elements in this case; or maybe he did not want to find out about them. Several times, we tried to clarify the situation and present it to the General as it really was with the order from the White House; but every time, he refused to receive any details without providing any explanations.

The interim transfer of power lasted quite some time. As it was natural, Cezar took over the lead of the department while Lieutenant Nicoară took over Cezar's tasks, especially the tactical ones. I kept my office with a small improvement in the sense that I became responsible for administering the main protocol for the Bucegi complex. That meant, of course, a higher position but also more bureaucracy in the relationship with the Americans.

Nevertheless, because I had developed excellent relations with the Pentagon officials, things were going smoothly and everyone was happy.

As we had the habit of evening discussions around the table in the Alpha Base's protocol chamber, we all agreed that this was, most likely, a temporary situation created by the apparent "void of power" left by General Obadea's departure. Cezar was known as a close confidant to the General and was respected in the occult area of the RIS; but in the end, the command of the department was going to be political. His interim stewardship of the department could last only a few months, let's say a year at best, but after that, the state of things would change. Nobody in the occult management of the government had an interest in keeping Cezar as head of Department Zero when it was known too well that he followed the same agenda and the same vision as the old General who had freshly resigned. Then, that element of surprise I was talking about came, and it was like a bubble of oxygen that made us feel not so completely isolated anymore.

In my opinion, General Obadea never did manage to get over what happened a few months before at the Pentagon. I do not know if this assumption is true, but things suddenly took another turn. By November 2006, shortly after the General signed his resignation, the tempestuous visit of the Chief of the Pentagon was announced, but not in Bucharest but at the Alpha Base. This was an event that got us going even if we were told that the visit did not have an official character but rather a niche-like one. General Inossanto's specification was to meet General Obadea on the base grounds for half an hour. As the visit was going to be a detour from a scheduled flight towards Pakistan, it looked more like a courtesy being extended towards an old friend, a “sweetening” of the situation created a few months before.

Although he had just relieved himself of the command of Department Zero, the General was in neither the posture nor the position to refuse such a visit.

Beyond the personal aspects involved, which did not suit him, there was still the matter of good relations at the level of the secret and military services between Romania and the USA, and these were not worth ruining.

I was present when the helicopter landed inside the base, and I only could catch a quick exchange of sentences between the two generals.

“I’m glad to see you, Bill, even after you didn’t receive me at the Pentagon,” Obadea said, meeting the General with a sharp remark.

“Do you have a secluded place? We have to talk,” General Inossanto replied seriously.

They went inside the building, but instead of meeting in the Protocol Chamber, they went into the office that had belonged to Obadea. They stayed there about twenty-five minutes, the General’s order being that they were not to be disturbed by anyone and that nobody was to have access to that section of the building. During that entire time, the helicopter did not even stop its engines. After almost a half an hour, the two got out and I could notice that the discussion was not only fruitful but surprisingly good for our General. He was now much more relaxed; even serene and in a good mood. He said his goodbye to the Chief of the Pentagon who hastily boarded the helicopter accompanied by his personal guard.

The General entered the Protocol Chamber where I, accompanied by Cezar and Lieutenant Nicoară, was waiting impatiently for him.

“Even as the helicopter is heading towards Bucharest, the necessary papers are being drafted,” he said without any introduction.

Then, after making a short pause which had its own definite effect, Obadea spoke.

“Hmm... The ‘Wolf’ hasn’t disappointed me. I am leaving the office I had here, but I will remain close! Bill told me that he regretted the diplomatic element from back then, but he couldn’t help it. The order came on a direct line from the Secretary of State. But now that the waters have settled a little, he needs a permanent ‘connecting bridge’ with the Bucegi complex.

He knew about my resignation so he stopped here to propose me for the position. I will be working directly in the Pentagon with my office in the same aisle as his.”

That was some news indeed! Besides, this stronger backing would prevent a divide and conquer strategy being used against us.

“It will be difficult with the cooperation protocol,” Cezar mentioned, also happy with the outcome of the meeting but keeping an objective view.

“The American part will want bureaucracy.”

“We have already discussed this aspect in general. It will be an adaptation, within certain limits, of tactical operations. For the rest, I hope that there will not be a great deal of changes.”

“It will make waves,” I said, also quite excited. “It will be a certain blow to some ‘customers’!”

“Yes, it’s true, but they will not be able to help it. I asked Bill twice if he is willing to risk this, but he told me that, in the general picture, no one has anything to say about it because he is covered.”

At last, after almost a year of sustained tension and hard labor, we began to see a calmer horizon. In the end, the change of the situation in Department Zero did not seem so bad. Maybe this modification of the levels of influence was even necessary inside the department. Doctor Xien and Shin Li had been absent for almost two months, but it was obviously not my business where they were and what they were doing. I only felt that the final deadline of editing the parchment was approaching and that this was a special mission which was entrusted to me. I had a few general discussions with Shin Li on the matter in which we had generally revised the text of the translation and drew a few guidelines upon which I had insisted along with some comments.

“It is not important how much you write,” Shin Li told me. “On the contrary, the text must be as concise as possible, but very explicit. Here, quality comes first. Some will understand while others will lose themselves quickly in their mental thicket and will no longer know how to get out of it.

My role is to guide you so that you are able to present as clearly and adequately as possible the ideas of the five stanzas of the parchment.”

When it came time to refer to this secret text, all faded in importance in comparison to it.

“Then what is my role?”

Shin Li gazed at me intensely for a few moments and then answered with a voice that seemed to come from another world.

“Your mission is to make it known everywhere. Nobody with bad intentions can stop this anymore. There have been countless obstacles, but now all is arranged. Your time has come.”

Chapter Three — THE SECRET PARCHMENT – FIVE SECRET TIBETAN INITIATION TECHNIQUES

At the beginning of 2006, I was already in the middle of the process of drafting the text of the parchment under the strict supervision of Shin Li. A series of factors had almost miraculously led to a “breach” in what had been our regular activity and enabled this work to take place. Things were calmer after General Obadea left for the Pentagon. Cezar had easily taken over the management of the activity of Department Zero, and I had performed my tasks very well and often had constructive initiatives, especially with regard to the Romanian-American collaboration concerning the Bucegi base. Shin Li and Doctor Xien had returned to Alpha Base and the “octopus” of backstage settlements had withdrawn a bit, everyone being amazed by the sudden change of the top-level situation concerning General Obadea, High Representative of the Romanian-American Commission concerning the Bucegi base. Since it was considered a highly important strategic point and also an invaluable source of technological information, the origins of which were unknown, the base in Bucegi represented a top concern at the Pentagon, and this led to General Obadea’s office being very close to General Inossanto’s.

To all of this, I have to add the mysterious and troubling presence of Shin Li, who always spoke with carefully chosen words and a lot of consideration. I had been silly enough to consider her expressions from the previous months as a personal problem, believing that she had something against me. In reality, as she later explained, her tough behavior was necessary in order to eliminate a great part of the “residues” of my identity which was absolutely necessary with regard to the important context of me drafting the comments to the text of the parchment. With some help, yet still on my own, I had to come to the fully conscious realization that the often unpleasant aspects I was confronted with in my daily life, especially given my job, were practically meaningless in comparison with the light fullness of charming love given by the deep knowledge revealed in the text and the understanding of its subtleties.

This endeavor was supposed to bring the peace and quietness which cannot be troubled to both my heart and the hearts of careful readers, no matter how big and important we think our daily activities are. As I was right in the middle of this reality through Shin Li's "corrections" and explanations, I fully enjoyed this "fine tuning" of my personality and knowledge. Shin Li explained to me that it was absolutely necessary to maintain that refined level of consciousness in order to be able to present and better understand the hidden meaning of the text. With this training, I realized that I had almost no states of mind where there was a lack of attention nor the evil thinking which is unfortunately common to so many people who have states of mental disorder or inner violence.

"You have achieved a state of relative inner balance, harmony and coherence which now stops you from reacting with pride," said Shin Li, "but don't think that you'll remain like this for a long time. You have to conquer this state forever in order to really move on. Most people fail this test. This is where groups, societies, great wishes and ideas fail. It's a very difficult test."

"I'm thinking of our department. Do you think this also applies here? As you can see here, we also have a fight of wishes and ideas against a certain segment of those who don't want the good of this country."

"This is a totally different situation," Shin Li answered. "Consider that there are many variables which are based upon physical conditions and these include hierarchies, order, and interests. But, we can still say that what goes on in this department is a reflection of certain hidden intentions manifested by a certain category of people. This can ultimately be repaired from bottom to top as well, meaning that Department Zero can act so as to obtain effects in the groups that want to control Department Zero, but this needs a lot of energy and is also very complicated."

"I understand," I said, "but the 'rule of the group' is still universally valid, isn't it? I am referring to the way it works. Does it not matter, for example, that the main members are at a great distance apart from each other?"

I was, of course, referring especially to General Obadea. No matter how present the General was in our thoughts and intentions, the huge distance was still an impediment. Even so, I wanted to convince myself of the contrary. I wanted to believe that almost nothing had changed. In the current situation, the General had limited power of action, especially at executive level, but his strong influence was still felt through his relationships and the “strings” he pulled, both in Bucharest and at the top of American military diplomacy. With his resources, the General tried his best to help us so that we would not abandon the fight.

“This does matter,” answered Shin Li. “It matters a lot. First of all, it’s the group coherence and then the way it can be torn apart. When I say coherence, I mean the state of harmony which is fundamental in any strong group that wants to accomplish an important goal. This state is like an indestructible monolith in the face of evil forces that want to destroy it, and this is the very reason why the standard of evil actions is reduced to “divide and conquer.” When evil imposes itself, alliances are born and die before opening their eyes. They were torn apart without being able to manifest the force of their union and harmonious cooperation. Usually, the evil forces act through persons or organizations against the good. They first of all try to destroy this coherence and harmony. Let us say that, until then, the group was coherent in ideas and actions. By destroying its harmony, the state of coherence disappears and thus the efficiency of the group is dramatically decreased.”

I understood these aspects very well because I had discussed them with Cezar many times, and they were an essential way of understanding what the fight should be based upon, especially the fight against Masonic interests.

“I know,” I said, “and a classic way of manifestation of such disharmony is the exaggeration of pride which appears and sometimes increases like a monster in some of the group members. Then, the tendency to act separately and without harmony occurs. Yes, I think I’ve understood this mechanism correctly.”

“It’s okay; we’ll discuss it again,” Shin Li said without backing off. “What you said is correct. This is why such members, when they exist, must be eliminated from the group because they are like a ‘microbe’ which tends to severely sicken the group. But, what happens if, for example, harmony is created between the members of the group?”

I was amused.

“Well now!” I said. “As if we were in kindergarten! Of course, the power of the group, be it spiritual, esoteric, political or of another nature, can greatly increase.”

“Don’t rush,” she tempered me, “because there is a very good reason why I wanted to talk about this. Remember that, in such cases, when a group displays harmony and coherence, its power greatly increases; but this is not about transmitting the state of harmony to each group member but rather about an exponential increase of their capacity. This is a very important aspect if you understand it correctly. You’ll thus be able to see that, even though some persons know many fundamental spiritual and esoteric concepts, what leads to the decrease of efficiency or even its total destruction is the increase and exaggeration of ego which leads to disharmony and lack of coherence of the group members.”

Inspired, I immediately made an extrapolation to the microcosmos of our being, to the universe we create through our personality and identity. As far as I could tell, the troubling factor is the individual ego which manifests a whole series of disharmonious features such as pride, selfishness, and wishes of grandeur. All of this separates us from a unitary and holistic view of reality and make us see only fragments of reality which are often meaningless. If we manage to “conquer” our pride and manage to show humbleness and true love, then we understand that the state of harmony and energetic coherence is produced at the core of our being. We are then able to vibrate in harmony with other coherent harmonious fields of the Macrocosmos which will make us stronger, inspired and efficient because subtle connections are established between us and those harmonious force spheres which also favor the occurrence in our being of amplified states of harmony, force and coherence.

Shin Li especially appreciated my comment and sincerely congratulated me.

“However,” she specified, “you should never forget that, in order to achieve this state and to exceed man’s mediocre condition, man must first of all show will. And understand that, without will, almost nothing can be done.

I am not referring to the common automatic will but to an effort of conscious significant will which causes changes in man’s existence.”

“Of course, one can’t exceed oneself without the manifestation of will,” I said.

Shin Li immediately corrected me.

“You speak, but you don’t yet understand. Try to grasp the deeper meaning of will. You express your will to move but also to write about this secret text. In both cases, we are talking about will and yet it does not manifest itself identically. What makes it differ? What is will after all?”

I looked at her with amazement.

“I thought you are the one who explains to me,” I said, a bit discouraged.

“Don’t worry. I was not expecting an answer. I only wanted to bring you closer to the subject. There is a great difference between unconsciously exercised will and fully responsible conscious will. This is due to the fact that will is a fundamental energy which makes possible all manifestations as well as the maintaining of these manifestations as we see them every moment. For example, cosmic laws are an expression of God’s will. It’s a subtle and even hidden energy. Of course, the ideal situation is when our will is in harmony with God’s will because then we know that we are not wrong and that our will is benefic and harmonious. But, if our will is opposed to the divine laws, then it is an evil will and can be generally defined as stubbornness. It’s true that man also has an inferior and subconscious animal will which is integrated into the unity of the being and also has its role. What is more important, however, is that men have a fully aware will which involves refining its specific energy.”

“Am I to understand that, in every person, the energy of will is nuanced: there is an automatic or subconscious will and a conscious will — in other words, a low or inferior manifestation and a high or superior manifestation of will?”

“Yes, with the mention that I still see that you don’t understand. You imagine that this inferior subconscious will is just an accessory to accomplish certain body functions, especially movement and automatic actions. But, I am telling you not to ignore the force and importance of inferior will because, in some cases, this aspect can be dramatic in a man’s life. Low instinctual aspects often tend to grasp the whole being in their manifestation and even to subdue it. In the case of vices or passions, these inferior aspirations of will are strongly manifested and can lead man to regression and even dramatic decadence. Here is the problem. Precisely stated, this automatic subconscious will tends to put the human being in chains, makes man give in to inferior impulses, and pushes man gradually on a descending path. It's also the energy of will, but it is an inferior energy. But, if you awaken the superior will energy enough, this can efficiently oppose such impulses and inferior tendencies and can dominate and annihilate them. In such situations, the role of superior will is essential."

"Okay, but I believe you know that there will always be fluctuations," I said.

"They will only exist as long as the inferior will is not overcome by man's superior will. But, as inferior tendencies are controlled, we witness a process of "training" the being and refining it. Therefore, it is essential for the superior energy of will to be awakened and amplified in the human being. For example, with its help other beings can be exorcized and given an impulse when they request our help. Sometimes there is a true battle between the two types of will."

I still had to clarify one aspect.

"What if someone thinks they possess that superior will and imagines that they heal, exorcize or help others? What kind of will is that?"

"In such cases, it's the manifestation of a certain lack of common sense and spiritual maturity without which one can't evolve. Indeed, I have personally known many poor fellows who imagined having certain capacities or powers and, talking about some occult concepts, they managed to twist the minds of weaker persons. The interesting part is that these human beings were actually convinced of their mission; but of course, this conviction was based on the common man's naiveness and ignorance.

No matter what we say, we can't delude ourselves or others forever if we don't have a real basis for what we claim, if we don't demonstrate a force and a high energy which truly proves — if only through common sense — that our respective speech and actions have true value. Words or pathetic gestures will not be enough for long because, after all, everything is measured by the effects produced. In order to have a true effect, this higher energy of will is necessary. In its turn, in order to be amplified, the superior energy of will needs an adequate and fully conscious effort. That which ends in failure by a person without this superior energy, even if he or she desires success, will surely be accomplished by one who has awakened and amplified this superior energy inside of themselves.”

Here Shin Li had touched on an essential aspect.

“You must understand a fundamental aspect. It is not enough to want. It is also very important to sustain this wish with the energy of conscious will.

Once again, it’s not enough to want. It is very important that when you want something, you also have the energy that later facilitates what you want. This will allow you to test how much energy of will you have, by measuring the time that passes between your wish and its realization. The shorter the time, the greater is the energy of conscious will in you — because, from an outside perspective, man can’t know if he or she has this subtle energy of conscious will; however, these “signs” I told you about can show his or her force of conscious will. Let’s say that you are hungry, but you don’t have anything to eat. If you have this energy of will, you’ll see that, in a certain way, someone will bring you food. You don’t know how that person came to bring you food, but the action takes place. This is why I’m telling you that this superior energy of will can lead to many achievements.”

I was delighted with the clear example and I understood the issue; however, I wanted to clarify some aspects from the experience of some friends of mine who had taken a dangerous road many years ago.

“There are, however, still some ‘chains’ that can hold one back in the case of subconscious will energy,” I said. “For example, if someone wants to quit smoking or drinking — I don’t know how it happens — but precisely then, someone appears and invites that person to a party or offers a cigarette. How should I interpret this? Is it a test for those persons?”

“It’s a kind of game correlated with a certain manifestation of the inferior will. This sets a trap for that person, but what should be noted is that the energy of superior will must exist so that we can easily accomplish our goals.”

“As far as I can see, most people do not feel and probably do not want to amplify conscious will inside of themselves,” I said with disappointment.

“In a way, it’s natural,” Shin Li answered. “People run from the effort that is involved in gaining this superior will. But, if that person is well oriented and selfishness or pride are not too developed within, then it is possible.”

“I don’t really understand what I must do for this purpose.”

Shin Li then shared with me the only advice that could solve man’s existential dilemma.

“No matter how strange it might seem in this consumer society, being able to live without error involves the highest degree of exceeding the so-called ‘essential’ needs: the need for more and the need for competitiveness.

“For this purpose, it is essential to open humbly to God’s almighty will and, at the same time, to show that you want to be perfect. For us humans, it is very important to realize when we are doing God’s will because we are then sure that we are acting in harmony with God’s infinite wisdom and with all that God wants to achieve through us and with us. Take yourself for an example. Had you manifested your will in an inferior and destructive way, then you would have been able to refuse the mission to publish the secret text and the short comments accompanying this ancient parchment.

However, even if it is quite hard, you have accepted your mission, have acted according to your free will and have expressed your conscious and fully responsible will for this purpose. Someone else might have refused for some obscure reasons. God will never force us to act in one way or another, but we have in ourselves that special energy of will which can make us be or not be in harmony with His almighty will. To seek to do only what we want or to imagine that such behavior would serve us, in time, might lead to an exaggeration of the inferior selfish will and even to an amplified ego. This can even condemn man to demonism and the amplification of very low aspects of man’s being.”

I thought about how even Jesus, in one of the most dramatic moments of His divine existence on Earth, wanted to accomplish God’s will when He prayed: “Father, if possible, take this cup away from me; if not, then be it as You wish.”

Shin Li's voice then brought me back to the present.

"It's one of the most important aspects of spiritual evolution. You can't talk about true spiritual progress of the human being as long as man doesn't understand the roots of failure during man's many lives. But, once man's will is more in harmony with God's will, he or she will know for sure that the road is right."

"But how can we be so sure? How can I know this?" I asked with good justification.

"The method may seem strange for many people, especially for atheists who, in a way, are the unhappiest people. It is very important to want to humbly relate to God and ask Him to inspire you and help you do His will in everything you do. Only then will you know for sure that what you're doing is truly wise because — you know what they say — God's ways are often mysterious. This is why I'm telling you that this inspiration to do God's will and not our own is essential because then we can be sure that God is with us and this will save us many sufferings and temptations. Most people are perpetually confronted with problems, sufferings, fears, and temptations and do not understand why this happens. Their lives are tense, clenched and full of suffering. But, by doing God's will, we more easily overcome tests and problems that might otherwise lead us to collapse and regression."

"I understand that this is a fundamental aspect of individual spiritual evolution."

"It can't be any other way. The one who truly wants to evolve spiritually must do God's will. I think it's the most important aspect of a man's life."

"But, I know people who consider this an 'attempt' upon their own free will. They believe it's a lowering and this makes them even more quarreling."

Shin Li slowly nodded her head and led me to understand that she knew the situation.

"This is due to the dominance of their inferior nature and to a terrible 'rupture' between the mind and the heart. Those people don't consider that God's answers are always in the heart. The mind is a kind of 'headquarters' of manifestation of the ego's individualism."

"Man wants and even strongly believes that he has the utter need to be the 'center' that governs everything and decides everything. At this level, he is in reality playing the game of dark forces that are amplifying his ego without him even knowing it. Without a remedy, man will end up falling and the suffering will be even greater."

I remembered that history is full of such examples. Great leaders or political men fell like lightning even when they felt more than ever that they were untouchable. I then realized how ephemeral the temptation of power is if it is not mastered by a higher will that is superior to the selfish will which is limited and inferior.

Shin Li continued to explain.

"By abandoning himself to God's will, man seems to lower himself; but in reality, he is elevated because, when doing God's will, he is aligning himself with the divinity in creation. Then, he is sure he is not doing wrong because God can never be wrong. Profound ignorance, however, makes man think that God also fails. An example occurs when God appears to be unjust regarding men's fates or at least towards some men. But, if this were truly so, then what would be the difference between the Creator and the creation? It would mean that both would compete in their errors and this would surely create a chaos out of which nothing would be understood.

The universe, however, has functioned for eons with unequal perfection and its laws are forever. This is why, when you do God's will, it gives you true invincibility.

Man is thus free, as you well know, but he is still predisposed to error. If he says he can do everything he wants and even does so, he truly expresses his freedom; but he can, at the same time, slip into evilness. The reason for this is that the difference between demonic orientation and divine orientation is the fact that the demon does as he pleases. On the other hand, the being who is in harmony with the universal harmony and has a tight relationship with God does not do as he pleases but what God wants. Please note that this is a fundamental element."

When Shin Li wanted to stress something very important, the atmosphere around her seemed to change and caused me slight chills that was like an electric discharge throughout my body.

“But,” I said, “there are many people who make it a debt of honor to announce with emphasis that they are their own masters who do as they please and when they please. I myself have heard this many times and must say that those men have confidence in what they say; and they have a certain kind of proof and have even done good deeds.”

“I know exactly what you mean,” answered Shin Li, “but what fools many in regards to the case of evil men is that those men can do both good and evil but always do as they please. This is why they fool many, but by doing their own will, they actually act chaotically and are torn apart from unity with God. Of course, God doesn’t force anyone, but in these conditions, those men will have to bear the consequences of their actions. They can be good as well, but they are definitely also evil or even very evil. By comparison, those who do God’s will actually rise above what seems to be their lower being which includes the twisted and impure perception of the selfish and the proud, even if they do not realize this. In this way, it’s clear that we can never be wrong.”

“Indeed. It seems like a way to perfection,” I stated with enthusiasm.

“Of course it is. In the end, you’ll never say, ‘Look, I did God’s will and it’s awful, terrible! I fell, crashed, and my life is a failure!’ No, there is no such thing because God is only good. But, by choosing the other way, when man does as he pleases, there is a great possibility of falling. So, you have two fundamental options. Man can rise by pride and by considering that men may do as they please; but they will then lower themselves. And there is the second option, for man to give his life to God, have solidarity with God and let God do His work through him. Thus, men truly make important steps towards being gods, and don’t forget that those who lower themselves like this can actually rise.”

I reflected a lot about whether or not to reproduce this discussion with Shin Li in my book and even asked for her advice in this regard. We both agreed that, in the context of presenting the text of the parchment and due to the capital importance of understanding such concepts for daily life, it had to be done. I only allowed myself to adjust the somewhat strange word order of Shin Li's sentences and some expressions which would need many esoteric books to clarify. Once again, my archives — I now use a digital recorder — turned out very useful.

By writing about these moments and trying to adapt them the best that I could for the purpose at hand, I found a recording which was several months old where Shin Li explained to me the reason for the general lack of integration and success in modern man's life. Since I believe that this subject is also related to the harmony and general balance of our lives, as well as to the manifestation of constructive will, I think it is useful to present Shin Li's considerations here.

The recording has some parasites in it at a certain point, the origins of which I do not know; then it stops suddenly. I remember that the discussion lasted about half an hour, but its summary is presented below. I do not, however, remember what started this dialogue.

"Many people complain that they have no success in life and that they don't get what they want but don't understand why," I said.

"Such persons have not yet achieved harmony; and within them, there is a battle between two opposing forces. In a certain moment, they decide to do something; but at the same time, a kind of inner demon tells them that they would not succeed, that the success of that action would be impossible. An inner struggle starts within them and consumes their forces in this sterile confrontation. In some situations, this struggle will eventually lead to a victory of destructive, pessimistic and negative forces which will make those persons lose before truly starting the action they wanted to perform."

"And how do they fight to eliminate these unpleasant effects?" I asked.
"There must be a reaction, or is that not the case?"

"An evil cause always triggers bad effects. To change their being and personality, these men must adopt positive habits and replace bad ones. But, if the replacement is not complete, evolution will be blocked. The problem will remain and make them suffer in life more and more."

I must admit that my discussion with Shin Li had a special charm. She was not only a mysterious presence, but the way she expressed her ideas and the inspiration and value of her arguments seemed to create a spell in the room and I abandoned myself to this spell like a voyage to another realm. Shin Li had a sense of the proportion of the discussions we had and knew when and how long to insist on a certain subject. She sensed even my slightest lack of understanding and guided me with great precision through the complicated threads of personality and esoteric notions. I longed for my meetings and discussions with her, but the nature of the activity surely stopped us from meeting more often. She was absent for long or short periods of time because she left with Doctor Xien and returned to the base, sometimes after a period of several weeks. Nobody knew where they had been and what they had done; but through a special government order, the two had absolute freedom to come to and leave our base as they pleased. I did not know the exact nature of their contribution to the activity of our secret services, and Cezar had never wanted to tell me more on this subject.

As for me, I was quickly coming to the drafting of the text of the parchment. Finally, after many months of preparation and clarifying discussions, I managed to give it a final and quite concise form. No matter how strange it might seem, the text only has five closed verses. They had to be translated and arranged in an adequate and intelligible manner for the knowledge of modern man and are accompanied by some short comments representing my modest contribution in accordance with my mission. Even so, I was not convinced that the spiritual message of the text could be adequately understood by all readers. At the beginning, after I received the parchment from the goddess Machandi, I insisted on publishing it as soon as possible, but Repa Sundhi did not agree, arguing that for the time being, "the fruit was not ripe." Later, as would usually happen, I started to lose interest as my life turned to a new track, but the moment came when the old wise man reminded me of my mission.

If I observe things accurately, however, I can see that everything was arranged for the highest benefit of myself as well as those who are interested in spirituality. The text appears exactly in the right form; and if it is correctly understood, it will come at the right time to be assimilated accordingly by the reader. On the other hand, this period has not only allowed me to achieve spiritual maturity but has also given me the necessary occasion to orient my life most efficiently so that I could be at peace with myself and the content of my work. During this period of time,

I had several occasions to share some of the content of the text and its meanings to other persons; but I noticed that while I was trying to give these explanations, I mysteriously could not find the right words and stopped at words all the time without expressing what I wanted. With time, I realized that it is not good to tell unexperienced persons about our own experiences which are not yet exactly clear for us. In such situations, we hold onto ideas and involve our ego by emitting false thoughts which are not correct in relation to the phenomena we describe. We will also state errors. In those moments, the errors will not seem so big, but they will remain in our aura and somehow harm the processes which naturally and spontaneously take place.

What I am trying to say is that it is harmful to try to explain to others what we ourselves do not know if we do not know exactly how it happens. But, once this knowledge begins to be assimilated gradually and becomes mature in our consciousness, we can know when the time comes to make it known to others. From this position, I understood the complicated process of editing the secret text according to the wishes of Repa Sundhi who has expressed a superior understanding of things. In a short meeting on this subject at which Cezar and Shin Li also took part, he said the following.

“If we wish to share something important with a person whom we trust, we must choose that person carefully because, if that person can’t grasp intellectually or with the intuition the aspects we are telling, then our initiative is useless. What would be the point to reveal certain mysteries and extraordinary facts to a person who, being incapable of understanding with both the heart and with the mind, begins almost immediately to be accusative with a mocking attitude?! The choice to confess to such a person would not be an inspired one. This is why it is much better to write about your experiences as clearly as possible — because there will always be persons who are receptive and open to this information who will understand the hidden meaning and then be able to share it with others. I hope you’ve understood what I mean,” Dr. Xien said to me.

I had understood very well. The secret text of the parchment containing the five techniques of fundamental initiation knowledge, revealed by the great wise man Padmashambhava, was now ready for publication. A last tentative delay to reveal this knowledge postponed this moment for almost two years, by reason of evil forces that have no interest in light, good and freedom reaching the ignorant consciousness of men. Evil forces thus do all they can to at least delay, if not to destroy, this beneficial manifestation as much as possible. And because their preferred area of manifestation is the physical world in which we live, many obstacles and manifestations occur which tend to remove the good. The situation I explained in the beginning of this book is a good example of this.

But now, because all seems quieter and because divine patience always gives the wanted results, I am ready to present the text of the secret parchment I received from the goddess Machandi. I only want to add that it should not be read as a poem or story. In fact, we are dealing with five different statements, five universal cosmic laws of creation which, if correctly understood, fundamentally transform the understanding and even the very existence of the human being. I suggest a profound meditation about the hidden mystery of each of these five statements. To make it more understandable, I have included some clarifying comments. Together with Shin Li's explanations and my discussions with her about spiritual subjects, I hope this will clarify even more the obscure and hidden meaning of the text. In order to facilitate the reading of the main text, I have sometimes included in brackets the immediate explanation of some expressions which are typical to Tibetan spirituality.

Here is the whole text of the secret parchment accompanied by my own clarifying comments.

THE WISDOM OF THE HIGHEST PEAK FROM THE KINGDOM WITHOUT NAME

The One who, Unborn, has still appeared free in the pure lotus of the Deceiving Sea,
Is now enlightening our consciousness and the nineteen aggregates of knowledge,
In order to pass beyond the Terrible Wall of the Silence of the World.
We are begging him to always spread his Grace and Endless Compassion over us!

As there is no written reference to this parchment and there are only legends lost in Tibetan spirituality, we can only assume some things about its content. Repa Sundhi, however, believes that this introductory stanza is a late interpolation written by Yeshe Tsogyel, a disciple of the great guru Padmashambhava, from whom she personally received the text of the parchment by dictation. Such verses represent a relatively usual form of expressing gratitude and praise to a wise lama, even more since the lama was Padmashambhava, the religious reformer of the whole Tibetan region.

Tradition shows him as “unborn” because he is considered to be an avatar, a being who has already achieved the supreme spiritual liberation in another existence and is only incarnated for the good and evolution of other people.

“The Deceiving Sea” is an expression from Tibetan tradition which refers to the illusion of the world we live in and the fact that we live in a dream where our actions are hollow as long as they are not directed at the essence of our being but rather outside of it.

The nineteen aggregates of knowledge are nineteen states of consciousness, starting from the basic elements up to the most refined nuances of metal. At this point, the text should be understood as follows: the nineteen aggregates of knowledge are enlightened by consciousness, and individual consciousness, in its turn, is enlightened by the higher consciousness which is comparable to its essence.

The “Terrible Wall of the Silence of the World” is a very beautiful expression with which Yeshe Tsogyel has managed to express both the highest purpose of the human being and his very limited condition in this world. The “Silence of the World” is associated with the same colossal illusion which man is prey to during his lives. Tibetan tradition sees this illusion as a dream or a veil over the eyes of the onlooker that stops him from seeing the truth. For this reason, this veil is also compared with a “silence” which means that, even though the world is agitated and noisy, this illusion makes it silent in relation to the truth which stays hidden.

Tibetans especially emphasize this aspect of the formidable illusion of man which tempts and “puts man to sleep” because this always leads to man’s suffering. This sometimes causes such great pain that the human being is “silent” in the face of these disappointments and unable to confess or seek happiness “beyond” the illusion. This is where the expression “dumb with suffering” comes from. Tibetans add that this “silence,” caused by great ignorance, is helplessly laid before “the terrible wall” of the world. They associate this blocking of man’s evolution with a terrible and frightening “wall” which makes them turn away from the wall and dizzily turn back to the world of the illusion from which they were trying to escape. This is the spiritual “obstacle” that man must overcome to find true happiness.

The last verse is a blessing and at the same time an invocation of the great wise man, Padmashambhava, whose divine help is requested for those in suffering or in search of spiritual truth.

1. Oh, Tsogyelma, my valuable disciple who has already realized the truth of the first two worlds, listen to me!

The most important energy coming from the Realm Without Name (God the Father) is love; it is Infinite,

It represents the unifying element and at the same time shows us the highest Peak that governs the worlds.

Yeshe Tsogyel was one of the main disciples of the great Tibetan wise man Padmashambhava, and he especially appreciated her. The legend says that she had gained extraordinary paranormal powers and had even conquered death. These stories refer to the period after which her spiritual master had left the physical world and when Yeshe had achieved spiritual perfection. Because the text was dictated when Padmashambhava was alive rather than after his death, we can assume that Yeshe Tsogyel had only reached a certain degree of spiritual achievement at that time as her master precisely indicates this by saying she had “already realized the truth of the first two worlds.”

The “worlds” are actually the main dimensions of God’s creation, meaning the physical, the subtle (astral) and the causal dimension. Since Padmashambhava mentions only two “worlds” conquered by Yeshe Tsogyel, it is natural to assume that he was referring to the first two in increasing order of their vibrational frequency, namely the physical and the subtle (astral) dimensions. In other worlds, even back then, Yeshe had somehow conquered death since she had acquired perfect control of the laws and mechanisms of the “physical” world; but it seems that she had also greatly amplified her powers in the subtle dimension as well, just as the text of the parchment says. Indeed, tradition says that Yeshe Tsogyel had the power to resurrect the dead, master the laws of matter, and travel wherever she wanted by the power of her will. The great guru, however, does not give great importance to these certainly great achievements. He only mentions them briefly; and even then, indirectly.

What seems to truly interest him is the very essence of this stanza, referring to the energy of love. In a few words, he indicates the original source of this energy: it represents the essence of God. It is endless and inexhaustible and can “feed” everything forever; it is the unifying element of all other types of energy; and there is nothing superior to love in manifestation and that which is beyond it.

The fact that he speaks from the very beginning about the supremacy of love and its importance shows us that this indeed seems to be the “Gordian knot” of Mankind, valid in those times and even more so in the present. We have gone so far from this primeval energy that we often do not even recognize it when it manifests itself with power. All dramas of daily life start here, from the lack of love in our own universe. In its turn, this lack causes evil and a vicious circle appears, and modern man cannot solve it.

The problems increase when most people have an acute feeling of guilt after harming a person. This causes moral suffering and strengthens the feeling of guilt because they no longer hope to be forgiven. This is where the energy of love intervenes; but even if love permanently surrounds us and is at our disposal, we refuse to see it, as if it did not exist.

When I discussed this with Shin Li, she clarified some very important aspects which involve suffering, compassion, and especially the energy of love, an energy which includes everything. Some of these aspects were familiar to me from my previous discussions with Cezar; but in the context of understanding the stanza of the parchment better, the new explanations offered greater clarity.

Shin Li referred exactly to suffering being the “illness” of modern society, but she also mentioned the way to overcome it, if not to avoid it completely.

The primary problem is that men tend to treat suffering and guilt as something outside of themselves, as a mechanism that should repair itself at a certain moment. In reality, guilt and suffering happen within ourselves.

They are our responsibility, and we cannot and should not exclude them as something harmful since, in the end, we generated them. The way we can solve this seems simple as Shin Li presents it. The true test is the test of our ego.

“If one truly understands that they were wrong and asks for forgiveness, it’s very good,” she said, “because there are also many who don’t even realize when they are wrong towards their fellows and, what is even worse, there are those who are happy when people suffer because of their actions.”

“But what happens with those who really and painfully feel the shock of the bad deed they did?” I insisted

“In such cases, we are confronted with more subtle aspects,” Shin Li explained. “When people realize that they were wrong, due to their own ignorance, they don’t understand that there is the possibility to forgive oneself through God’s compassion. I think you understand very well that this compassion can be felt even more if we also show compassion towards others in our turn.”

I then suddenly realized the truth of the prayer “Our Father”...“and forgive us our trespasses as we forgive those who trespass against us.”

“When this forgiveness, begged from God, is called upon, it is actually nothing but a call from the heart to His infinite compassion, meaning God’s mercy,” Shin Li confirmed. “With the help of compassion, which is actually a reflection of the energy of God’s infinite love, people have the possibility to forgive themselves.”

“And how can we know that God has given us His compassion?” I asked with high interest.

Shin Li answered, untroubled.

“People realize this when they overcome the state of inner torment that was troubling them. For those who don’t know that there is the possibility to forgive themselves, however, this state of suffering can be endless because they will not have access to this energy of compassion which comes from God. Instead, they will adopt very difficult procedures, as some religions do. This is why it is very important for people to understand that they must be able to forgive themselves...when, of course, they realize their mistakes. Obviously, however, this does not involve starting to make other mistakes afterwards.”

“It should be so because otherwise we would be confronted with Sisyphean labor. It’s clear,” I said

“Very good. It is therefore fundamental for those who understand their mistakes to be able to eliminate the guilt they feel with the help of this energy of compassion which comes from God. If they don’t, they will always carry a useless weight with them. Think about a chicken that has hatched. If it continues to hold on to the egg shell in which it developed and tries to fly with it, it will seem handicapped.”

“However, I know some people who never stop blaming themselves for their deeds,” I said. “I do not think that this is constructive.”

“When someone is aware of his mistakes, he can realize that he doesn’t want to be wrong again and then, with the help of God’s compassion, he can return to harmony. But to continue endlessly to blame oneself will not generate anything beneficial because it will only produce a state of continuous guilt, and thus the respective person will continuously come into contact with their past mistakes. It is very important for you to understand this subtle mechanism because it is a fundamental key to individual transformation. We cannot evolve through torment but rather through love.”

I became thoughtful for a while. I wanted to clarify something.

“Some people might imagine that they were seriously wrong and that they will be damned for their mistakes. They might imagine that what you said is only valid for some mistakes but not for all mistakes.”

“Here, you must understand that God’s goodness is unlimited,” Shin Li immediately explained. “Any mistake can be forgiven when man consciously calls upon God, asking Him humbly for His help. When a human being thus pleads, God can bring His endless mercy upon that person and forgive his or her mistakes.”

All this is possible because the energy of God’s love, which can penetrate everything, is infinite. Padmashambhava clearly hints at the fact that there is nothing above it and that through it, anything can be achieved. Its multiple forms of manifestation, such as compassion and forgiveness, are corollaries of the same main motif: the energy of love is supreme and can always be found in all other types of energy which exist. And, the fact that God offers us this love unconditionally and infinitely is an extra proof that we can and should do the same. This is the most direct and sure way of revealing God to us, as the last words of the stanza show.

2. Oh, my beautiful Tsogyel! Always be careful that any aspect of reality, just as we look upon it, will be revealed to us exactly in the same manner afterwards.

The main aspect pointed out in this stanza is that we create our own universe we live in, our own world. No matter how unlikely it might seem, we directly influence the world we live in and particularize it after our own thoughts and intentions. This is why they say that “beauty is in the eyes of the beholder.” If we have this inner force, then we can discover infinitely more beauty around us, infinitely more love, and we can receive infinitely more than before. But, if we remain closed, mean, and suspicious, then beauty, kindness and love cannot penetrate this shell we have created, and then we must conclude that these do not exist. It’s like a leitmotif which, unfortunately, more and more people are following: “everyone is bad, they are all evil; and this is why I must be the same, in order to survive in this unholy world.” This is a perverted way of orienting our existence. When the inner transformation is truly achieved, everything surrounding us changes due to this inner transformation of our being. What changes is actually our perception of the surrounding reality. The happiness we feel in those moments makes us discover divine attributes and wonderful qualities in beings who, until then, seemed dull, bad and lonely. It’s a real miracle which only depends on ourselves.

In general, man resonates with aspects from the world surrounding him... with stress, tension, closedness, evil behavior, intolerance...and, given this background, even if outside of it, there is beauty and kindness, joy or love, he becomes opaque to them and says that they do not exist. Our points of view are different from those of others, and our way of resolving a situation is different from that of others. We must conclude that men are confronted almost all the time with all kinds of problems or existential crises. What really leads to this often dramatic situation? The answer is simple and it is the very essence of this stanza: man forges his own universe according to his own perception of this universe and then interprets it, respects it, and gives it attention.

If our view of the surrounding world is mostly based on a selfish vibration — in other words, if we regard things only through a small window — everything around us will be much darker and colder, and our universe will be very limited and full of suffering. After all, even happiness is good for something. If we analyze things more, we will see that, in any situation, ignorance led to the occurrence of a problem in our lives. Afterwards, however, all of our troubles have allowed us to transform because, after all, each problem can be seen as a trial. If we pass it successfully, then we will evolve spiritually because we will become more mature and acquire more experience. If the problem is not solved, nobody can force us to solve it or to overcome it because it is our own problem. This means, however, that whether we like it or not, we must, after all, evolve.

I found these considerations very interesting and discussed them with Shin Li when I dealt with the respective stanza of the parchment. Actually, the entire stanza expresses, in its essence, the need for man to evolve and the fact that man evolves depending upon his own perception of the surrounding reality. This truth is valid all the time.

“Either he is interested or not. Either he wants it or not. Man must evolve after all, even if this happens very slowly for some people,” Shin Li explained., “but man can’t stop evolving. The sense of evolution can’t be avoided. A person will be tortured by the tension imposed by his or her problems until that person finds the just solution because there is always a solution for every problem. And, if man continues to suffer, choosing to have a negative perception of the surrounding reality, then his existential crisis will be more profound, his suffering will be greater, until finally, he will be forced to do something; and not just anything, but rather only what is right and necessary in order to solve that problem.”

In the context of that stanza of the parchment, the “right and necessary” means changing our view of reality. This means that a certain transformation is necessary, a higher perception of the reality we come into contact with because every aspect, being or thing will appear to us just as we look upon it. For example, if an architect designs a bridge, we cannot expect to have a car as a result, but that bridge might be broken, thus leading to the deaths of many people; or it might be a superb bridge that remains in history for its beauty and long duration.

Even an unpleasant aspect, if looked upon with kindness and transformation, begins to look less unpleasant, both for us and for the others; and in the end, it can even be completely transformed.

At an individual level, these things have clear repercussions with direct consequences on one's personal life because everything we think about intensely now is what we will become sooner or later. This is probably the best practical example for the second stanza of the text.

3. Oh, you, who have bloomed like a lotus in the world of the Dakini! You should know that there is no coincidence!

Everything is in reality a mysterious need for The One who has touched The Kingdom Without Name (the state of spiritual freedom).

Everything appears as a giant woven cloth in which every thread (aspect) is permanently interwoven and is in tight connection with the other threads (aspects) which make up reality.

This stanza can be best described in modern scientific terms as the holographic reality of the universe. The message transmitted over thousands of years is as clear now as it was then: the part is in Everything and Everything is in the part. Without going into scientific details, some of which are quite avant-garde, it is enough to grasp the essence of this statement. In plastic terms, if we press with our fingers on one part of the universe, then something will definitely rise in another part of the universe, apparently with no connection to the first part. A good example of this fundamental characteristic of the universe, which Cezar explained to me some time ago, would be significant synchronicities. In such situations, aspects which seem distinct are brought together and made to "function" in a mysterious yet coherent and meaningful way for the one who understands their meaning.

The importance of understanding the holographic structure of the universe means especially that we start to feel less isolated from the rest and thus become better integrated into the surrounding world. In this case, individual problems become significantly smaller, existential crises have no meaning, and the purpose of the human life is better defined. The direct result is that man's evolution is greatly amplified. The aforesaid stanza is closely connected with the following one.

4. In the entire Kingdom Without Name (God), the vibration is present everywhere. Nothing is static.

Stanzas 3 and 4 complete each other because the Manifestation is practically an infinite ocean of energetic vibrations, and the holographic reality of the universe can be explained precisely through the "intertwining" of vibrations because they are never separate and all contain potential.

Since the physical, subtle or causal matter is energy vibrating on different frequency levels and since each level contains the other one in an implicit and yet mysterious manner, the result is that, in any time and space, we can access any other dimension of the Manifestation provided that we are in resonance with it or can create a state of resonance between us and that dimension. Thus, we can travel anywhere and anytime. We can have anything we want and in whatever quantity we want, but this all happens based on cosmic necessities because the consciousness of the one who acts in such a manner is so vast that it is a determining factor for the good functioning of the universe.

"The Kingdom Without Name" is presented here from two perspectives. On the one hand, it represents God's infinite consciousness which is the highest peak of man's spiritual realization; and on the other hand, it is the Manifestation itself which involves duality. This suggests that vibration is indeed present everywhere: both here in the dual world and beyond, in transcendence.

Under these conditions, the fact that "nothing is static" seems to be supplementary. Padmashambhava, the great wise man, however, has included this statement on purpose in order to underline the nature of the eternal transformation. This means that nothing stays the same; but everything changes in Manifestation, depending on its "holographic requirements."

5. You, who delight the spirits of the three worlds!

Listen to what I'm telling you now: project your consciousness onto the Highest Peak of the Kingdom and you will (thus) obtain the light of eternal Happiness.

These five methods are meant for the evolution of every soul in the Kingdom, oh, Tsogyelma! May you be their guiding shield!

This last stanza of the Parchment practically gives the instantaneous method for spiritual freedom. Considered the top of the yoga and tantric practice of Tibet, the technique is known as Phowa. In principle, it refers to a complex projection of the higher consciousness of the man who practices the technique, using a very secret initiation method which is not mentioned by Padmashambhava in the text. This makes us understand either that the method should not be known in any other way except through direct initiation by a guru or that it was already familiar to Yeshe Tsogyel as a practical method.

Padmashambhava makes and encrypts a reference to “the Highest Peak of the Kingdom Without Name.” The basis for this method is that, through it, the man who practices it becomes capable of automatically assimilating the state and condition of the being or aspect onto which his or her consciousness is projected, even if his or her initial level of consciousness before the projection was inferior to the one onto which the projection was made. This allows the achievement of giant leaps of evolution and culminates in the supreme spiritual freedom which can be thus obtained by projection onto “the Highest Peak of the Kingdom” which is considered “the heart of God.” We can understand this unique reference made by the great wise man in the sense that any other projection of the consciousness is subordinated to it and derives from it. He makes us understand this by saying that we can thus obtain “the light of eternal Happiness,” meaning that there is nothing else above it.

In the end, Padmashambhava specifies that the five techniques are actually five efficient ways for spiritual evolution and that they should be made known to anyone interested in deciphering them.

The text of the parchment, as stated above, is a spiritual treasure revealed in a very synthetic and hidden manner. In my opinion, a book of commentary on the five stanzas, done with details and competence, would not be enough for an exhaustive presentation of this subject. I have gradually reached the conclusion, however, that one's own learning and personal experience that is acquired through thinking and meditation on these aspects represents the best way of understanding their occult and vast meaning. This is why, taking Repa Sundhi's advice and being guided by Shin Li, I chose to present the main ideas briefly which would act as a trampoline of inspiration for the reader's analysis. Anyway, knowing this ancient spiritual text, which is a true jewel of wisdom, can guide our steps towards a wider and more mature vision of our lives.

Chapter Four — “HOT SPOT” IN ANTARCTICA

Just as if the sequence of events had been pre-ordained, there was a rush of activity in Department Zero almost immediately after the conclusion of the final drafting of the text of the Secret Parchment. As I said before, the last couple of months had been relatively calm which allowed me to put my thoughts in order and to analyze certain spiritual subjects together with Shin Li. It was also a “cool down” after the stormy events which had taken place during the past year. With his new obligations, Cezar was away most of the time. The General had been detached to the Pentagon where he served as military mediator on national security matters between Romania and the USA. All in all, the changes in the internal structure of Department Zero had settled quite well.

At the end of the year 2006, I was in a meditative mood, preoccupied by the text of the parchment, the discussions with Shin Li and the charm of the quite rare meetings with Cezar and Doctor Xien. At first, this obvious lack of activity seemed a bit strange to me but because it gave me a well-deserved break to fulfill my spiritual mission, I took things just as they were. Between October 2006 and January 2007, no incidents happened. Protocol took place without issues and political pressures were practically absent. This, however, was in fact only the “calm before the storm”.

Towards the end of January 2007, the situation took a sudden turn. Matters again returned to the Orăştie Mountains and the Americans’ suspicion that we were hiding something from them. Since they did not share further details themselves, the whole situation seemed somewhat hilarious. Both sides had mutual suspicions of each other, but neither of them knew for sure what the other was thinking.

As for me, this subject was a big question mark. I knew almost nothing about the involvement of Department Zero in the Orăştie Mountains, but what was even stranger was that Cezar continuously postponed talking about this. I was intrigued by the fact that this subject seemed very special, even for the RIS. Normally, I would have imagined the great discovery in the Bucegi Mountains to be the headline of the state secrets and collaboration with the Americans. The realities I saw there and which I later described in the previous books — although I could only describe part of them in accordance with the limits imposed upon me — and the implications created for the Romanian-American relations made this a reality that seemed hard to top. After all, this was about a technology which man had not imagined before, about a mysterious civilization which refused to reveal itself and about finding out very uncomfortable truths about man's existence on this planet. Besides, I could not find anything in the archives of Department Zero on the Orăştie Mountains, and neither Cezar nor General Obadea had mentioned anything in particular about this subject until then. The only mention was that the Romanian side did not have much information about this subject either.

When the “bomb” arrived, I had been just as much in the dark as I was a year before. I was at the Alpha Base and was working with the tactical teams on a preparation test for psychological evaluations in maximum risk situations. Cezar was in Bucharest at a meeting of the RIS department leaders and Lieutenant Nicoară was in the Projection Chamber, accompanied by an American team of specialists sent by the Pentagon. In such situations, the base was run (from an administrative perspective) by two other lieutenants, Peris and Matu.

I got a phone call from Cezar while I was doing the psychological evaluations. He told me briefly that I was to leave Alpha Base in half an hour and head for the military airfield at T, then head on from that point.

He did not tell me where I was going but left me precise instructions for the emergency code of the base. He told me that he would give me an explanation when we met, in a couple of hours. Up to this point, nothing was unusual, except perhaps the degree of alert he imposed on our unit. I had no information which could justify that action, but orders were orders.

The truly interesting part was that, at the end of our conversation, he asked me to bring him, while keeping the utmost secrecy and security, a file placed near his desk at the Alpha Base. For the first time, he gave me the key-codes for his personal safe and told me what I was supposed to pick up from that safe. It was the file, but it was sealed in a transparent box that looked like Plexiglas which was in fact made of glass fiber. It had the size of a ring binder but it was thicker. This was obviously a maximum security holder for classified information. The box was very elegant. It had metal edges, which I later found out were made of titanium, as well as a very sophisticated computerized closing system which had an iris print reader. Inside of it, I could see a normal file that was quite thin, on the cover of which was written in big black print: CRONOS. Underneath that , there was a “top secret” stamp. Cezar’s method of action had been atypical. To the extent that I knew him, I realized that things were truly serious if he had chosen to act in this manner.

I did as he asked me, imposing the emergency code at the base and took off in the helicopter heading for T. For more security, apart from the pilot, I also took Lieutenant Matu with me on the mission. He was carrying active equipment and accompanied me together with one of the agents from the base up to the military airfield in T. The flight went smoothly and, upon my arrival, Cezar was waiting for me on the runway. I immediately handed him the special briefcase holding the box with the file.

“Generals Obadea and Roddey are also here,” he quickly told me. “They are in Bucharest for an emergency meeting taking place at the government together with some members of the Supreme National Defense Council (SNDC). Something very important is going on. Here is the briefing.”

Cezar handed me a file with red covers upon which I could read: MACOR FACILITY — ANTARCTICA. EYES ONLY. In the noise from the airfield, Cezar shouted in my ear:

“General Inossanto has asked for the best technical team for a mission in Antarctica. It’s made up of the men with RV (Remote Viewing) ESP. You’ve also been included in this team gathered by General Roddey. You’ll embark immediately and take off in a couple of minutes. Good luck!”

He looked at me in his own special way, full of kindness and understanding; and, for the first time, he gave me a hug full of affection. Even though I was older than him, I still had the wonderful feeling of a parent’s protection, a safety which would accompany me from that moment on. I thanked him with gratitude, took my small luggage in one hand and the mission briefing file in the other, and got into the car which was waiting for me a few meters away. We drove quickly on the airfield up to the plane which was ready for departure. It had only a few seats and a special interior design. I realized that it was a diplomatic flight because, inside of the plane, I could recognize a few American officials and a British officer whom I had met at a protocol meeting in Bucharest. Almost all of them were busy reading briefing notes or working on computers. I took a seat in my place and, in less than 10 minutes, the plane took off.

The sun was setting on the horizon in a perfectly clear sky which had gorgeous colors. The cold outside made the pure view even more beautiful, especially because it was accentuated by the quiet beauty of a calm winter with not too much snow. The discreet atmosphere in the plane was wonderful and the services great. I relaxed happily in the comfortable chair, allowing myself a few minutes of meditation and synthesis.

Only three hours before, I had been quietly performing my activity at the Alpha Base, and now I was in a plane heading for the USA and then towards a secret destination. I had carried a box with me as well as a very important file, about the meaning of which I had no idea. Additionally, I had been given access to the emergency codes, received a mission briefing file and been included in a special technical team with a top secret mission in Antarctica. These were all important events that took place successively during a very short period of time. Just like other top moments of my life, when I was confronted with exceptional situations and conditions, I could only rejoice from all my heart that I had been given these extraordinary opportunities. I felt sure of myself, at peace within, master of what I already knew, and in balance with the flow of events which were taking place. I was happy with my activity at Department Zero, with the relations I had made, with the fact that I had completed my spiritual mission concerning the text of the parchment, and with the fact that I had the chance to meet Dr. Xien and Shin Li, whose presence and spiritual teachings could not be removed from my memory. Relaxed and at peace with the thought that my actions were in accordance with a superior integration and understanding, thus preventing me from committing too many mistakes, I ate my dinner and then opened the mission briefing file.

The file was individualized for my name, bore the mark of origin of the Pentagon, and was signed on the bottom of the pages by General Roddey, who had been assigned as leader of the technical operation for that mission.

I was informed that the final destination was a place near the Macor American base in the southwestern part of Antarctica, where a cosmic phenomenon involving extraterrestrial technology had occurred. I was given the list of team members, hierarchical relations, level of access to information — I noticed that this level was maximum for everyone in the team, of which I was also a part — and some more specifications which I am not allowed to reveal. On two of the pages, I read a presentation on the Macor American base, the activity taking place there, and the main events which took place in the area during the last decades.

The report then continued with the actual presentation of the problem: on January 22nd 2007, the technical equipment of the base recorded an unusual activity on one of the lower mountain peaks which are a maximum of twenty kilometers away from the base. Similar odd “signals” had also been recorded in two other locations the previous year which showed a special triangulation with the Macor location: the Orăştie Mountains in Romania and Mount McKinley in Alaska. The Counterintelligence Service of the U.S. Army had no information about strange activities in either region. They told me that this was the explanation for the diplomatic pressures exerted a while back by U.S. diplomacy; however, nothing was unusual so far except for the mystery that nobody could understand the real meaning of the indicated areas.

The surprise came in January when the three points were connected in their turn by the indication of a resultant* in cosmic space having Europa, a moon of Jupiter, as its target. I anxiously read the rest of the material. It said that a precise area of the ice cap covering that mountainous area of Antarctica near Macor Base had melted down in two hours and had revealed an extraordinarily complex technological device on one of the mountain slopes. Four pictures were shown from different angles with certain topometric references.

*The word resultant has a specific definition in mathematics: a single vector that is the equivalent of a set of vectors.

The object had the shape of the frustum of a cone with an elliptical base. It obviously worked as a kind of “cosmic buoy.” It had the approximate size of a three story building; and near the top, at about two thirds from the base, it had a kind of “collar” like a wide fan, possibly a kind of antenna. In the pictures, this particularity of its construction looked like giant panels, very bright, with red and white lines that looked like lasers. There were many other elements there which I could not distinguish clearly from the pictures.

The report further stated that it was impossible to identify the exceptional source of energy which could melt that huge mass of ice in two hours because the buoy was covered in a 210 meter thick layer of ice, but it was obvious that the source came from inside the device. The last element specified in the report was that after the ice had melted, the buoy started to emit light signals of colossal intensity at a very high rate, like pulsars. On the morning of the third day, on January 24th 2007, any manifestation of this kind had ceased. We were informed, however, that the device continued to work, emitting energy and maintaining the surrounding area with perfect cleanliness. The buoy was lit and there was obviously some activity inside of it, but the powerful energy emissions had stopped.

Closing the file, I remained thoughtful. I was amazed by the direct and obvious manner in which the device had “revealed” itself. If things really happened like this, then this was obviously something very serious and one could draw the conclusion that the phenomenon did not only involve Earth but also our solar system. The most interesting part was, however, the connection with our country. It seems that this area was of great interest in the remote past: first, the extraordinary complex in the Bucegi Mountains; and then the mysterious connection with the Orăştie Mountains, about which I practically had no data whatsoever. Something was known, however, if I make a connection with the special file I had brought to Cezar.

The formidable secrecy under which the respective file was kept, as well as the fact that Cezar had never given me any information about it until then, made me think seriously about this. The mystery was even greater because the Romanian side did not have much information in this respect either.

There were therefore many questions to which I, at least at that time, had no answer. I decided to rest a while because the trip would be very long. As usual, we stopped in Spain where I boarded another plane, this time a military one. The second stop was made at a secret American base in the Mojave Desert where we stayed for a day. That was the gathering point for everyone involved in the operation. There were two main teams, and this included the technical team, of which I was a part, along with two colleagues from the final selection from the RV training, the Canadian and an American. I was also happy to meet Aiden who joined us with his exceptional technical support. A computer genius like him was indispensable for such operations. There was also an operational team made up of six men who held a technology I had never seen before. I recognized two of them from the operations in the Bucegi complex, and we said hello and exchanged a few pleasant words. There were also administrative personnel who had been especially selected for that mission.

We then took part in a short briefing session where the parameters of the action and our own roles were set. We were also told that we had a much enhanced secondary support team which was meant to ensure the mission which had been stationed around the wide perimeter surrounding the cosmic buoy. The coordinator of the action was Colonel Trescott, a man with a lot of experience in the “extraction” of relics or mysterious objects, all performed under perfect cover. He was going to lead the operation up to the time of the meeting with General Roddey because we were to travel to Antarctica after that. The mission also included several other colonels and generals, including General Obadea. The Chief of the Pentagon, General Inossanto, would supervise the entire action in person and was going to arrive directly at Macor Base. I was happy to meet General Obadea again.

With him there, I felt more “at home” and hoped to learn more information from him since he was directly involved as a representative of our country which had become a complex part of this mission.

The logistics equipment was impressive, and I must confess I had never imagined that we had such technology on Earth. Everything was boarded on two huge military airplanes, and we took off the following day and made a stop in Chile, near Santiago. After a couple of hours, we headed for the southern tip of South America, where we landed at an American military base on Chilean territory, somewhere near the Drake Passage. Here, we met with General Roddey who reorganized some of the points of the operation. General Obadea was also present, but I did not get the chance to speak to him at that time. I noticed that the entirety of the personnel became increasingly preoccupied and withdrawn as we were approaching the end point of the action. The diplomatic and military channels were permanently open because the phenomenon had obviously been observed and recorded by other powers that had also become involved.

In such situations, American diplomacy enters a state of alert similar to “code red” when only a small segment of staff is kept for current operations with other states while the rest of the resources are concentrated on the respective issue that generated “the code.” Thus, the general perception is that Washington had taken a small “vacation” when, in reality, almost all of the presidential staff is in a state of maximum alert. This occurs because the Americans have established a kind of “subsystem” which allows them to work efficiently at two levels in such cases: the regular open one on the surface and the secret one which is then like a “throng” even though it seems non-existent.

In our country, things happen in a different manner because there is also a difference in native personality. Through their inner structure, the Romanian people tend to be more free and open. In critical cases, this translates to their preference to go “all at once” by adapting the situation to each moment. This organization is far from perfect, but we win through spontaneity and freedom of decision. Personally, I prefer this option because it gives a wider range of action. In our country, even when things become precipitated and everyone is very agitated, most of the decisions taken are correct. There is, of course, the disadvantage of a breach in secrecy but, after all, it is a risk that is assumed everywhere. On the other hand, Americans have a different style: subversive, hidden, bureaucratic and quite rigid. I assumed that the combination of these somewhat different ways of action would lead to good results in Antarctica as well as it has proven itself in the case of the complex in the Bucegi Mountains.

As I was involved in the operation and had some experience working at Department Zero and with the Romanian-American relations concerning the Projection Hall, I was able to notice a certain mood which had begun to take shape at the American military and political management level. I had an intuition in this respect more than a year before; and for this mission, I realized that my perceptions had become deeper and were actually correct.

The situation did not prove to be an obstacle, but it expressed a certain point of view in the American mentality; and more precisely, the fact that such elements or events of crucial importance at planetary level involved Romania, a relatively small country without big pretensions in the “world architecture.” It was that bad mood created by the situation when great oaks should fear little strokes which could make them fall. The American diplomatic corps probably wanted to lead and control from better positions the situations which involved the Bucegi Mountains Complex or the connection between the Orăştie Mountains and the Macor Base in Antarctica, but they obviously didn't find in Romania the obedience which other European states had shown them. The Americans' vexation was also caused by the fact that they couldn't understand the phenomenon: why have such crucial points and such phenomenal discoveries — in terms of their geopolitical importance — been found precisely in Romania and not in other more "serious" and more "accessible" areas of the world? Somehow, by assuming the arrogant position of the almighty "parent" one should listen to, Americans have unconsciously associated this attitude with the right to own the most important discoveries and crucial elements on Earth. In my opinion, this mentality is based on a "quantitative" standpoint which means that the "biggest" is necessarily the "smartest" as well.

Of course, if these discoveries had been made on their territory or in areas which are under their direct and overwhelming influence, the Americans would have been very happy and their pride would have probably been infinite. In this situation, however, the American government had to bear having only a partial influence which was, most of the time, fragile; whereby they had to make compromises, grant certain facilities and, generally speaking, lacked direct control over what they considered strategic points of utmost importance for our world.

As I have said before, the issue did not create any altercation in diplomatic relations, especially because Romanians are very tolerant, but it could nevertheless sharpen the relations when it came to certain disputes. I brought up this subject in the airplane during a discussion with General Obadea after we had taken off and headed for the Bellinghausen Sea. Part of the logistics equipment had to be taken from two nuclear ice breakers which were already present in the area. General Obadea gave me the impression that he knew very well what I was referring to.

"I am confronted with this aspect quite often at the Pentagon," he said. "It is fortuitous that General Inossanto is a good friend of mine."

He then told me that the situation in Antarctica was actually much more serious than the presentation in our briefing report, but that everything was under control.

"The Americans would have liked to cover up everything; but through its nature, the phenomenon has puzzled all the great powers that have noticed it. It's considered a planetary incident. As we're speaking, an International Military Protection and Intervention Force is being set up which makes things even more complicated. This could give rise to pretensions of cancelling 'territorial limits' in Antarctica even though they officially don't exist, but we'll see what happens."

We landed at Macor Base towards "evening" European time and settled there. It was very cold and there was a snowstorm which made the unpacking operations more difficult. Due to the unfavorable conditions, not even very powerful transporters could operate properly in order to bring the rest of the equipment from the two anchored ships to a certain distance.

Accordingly, General Roddey decided to postpone everything for the following day. We therefore had the necessary time to rest after the long trip.

I expected the base in Antarctica to be very restrictive in comparison with other American bases, especially from the point of view of space. I was deeply wrong. From a certain point of view, I could even say it was larger than necessary in some areas. It was very nice inside and there was even an impressive greenhouse. It is true that there were very few personnel, but the living conditions surprised me with the available facilities. As far as I understood, the great problem was psychological and this is why the personnel were refreshed every three months, especially in the case of weather stations. I am not allowed to talk about the purpose of this American military base, but I can tell you that it was involved in a very serious accident in the late 1950s.

I slept well even if it was day-time, and when we woke up, we had the chance to enjoy a clear sky and atmosphere without wind. The temperature outside was about -45 degrees Celsius so we were all moving quickly, arranging what was necessary for our trip to the cosmic buoy. Part of the equipment had already been transported there during the first hours of the so-called morning. We travelled comfortably in very modern transporters; and around noon, we could already see the first signs of the existence of the buoy. The landscape seemed to become torn, trapped in the ice around it.

The rocky and dry slope of the small mountain was empty and perfectly dry. I could see the gravel, the rocks, and even a very dry kind of sand which delineated a circular area in the middle of which, from far away, the mysterious device rose. Seeing it caused me great emotion, the source of which I could not clearly identify. Maybe it was due to the fact that the device certainly came from another world or maybe it was because of the mystery surrounding it. Alone, unaffected and even mighty in that area, it gave the impression of a formidable redoubt which could withstand any assault. I was sensitive to such things and remembered very well the emotional impact I had felt when I explored the Projection Hall. To a certain extent, the situation was the same here, but the feeling was somewhat different. I could see that tronconical shape with a kind of giant collar near the top. It was massive, imposing, and deeply rooted in the mountain. At the same time, it was very lonely, aiming for cosmic space, hidden under the ice for maybe tens or even hundreds of thousands of years; and yet, it gave the impression that it was untouched by time.

It possessed a kind of greatness, sovereignty, independence and safety in the way it was built and placed there, imposing respect and a lot of attention. I was looking at the groups of forces which were more and more active around it as they were placing the equipment and delimiting the perimeter. It all had the feeling of a kind of assault on and conquest of the buoy. And yet, lonely and imposing, the cosmic buoy seemed to be way beyond the petty preoccupations surrounding it.

At the edge of the perimeter delimited by the melted ice, there was an unstable area out of which steam continuously came out and the water drained towards the valley, freezing very quickly afterwards. The ice had melted on a slope which made our access to the top easier. In the valley, things were even easier to handle because the ice had the natural tendency to “flow.” There was a strange phenomenon there. Apart from the fact that the surface of the ground was completely dry, the perimeter underwent a continuous process of melting and freezing, thus drawing a kind of energetic “contour” of the area. Nobody knew yet what determined the maintenance of that phenomenon, which obviously helped us a lot in our work, but it was clear that it came from underground where the buoy was rooted.

Our RV team already had a small hall mounted near the buoy, on its upper side at a distance of approximately 50 meters from it. There were also other small constructions for the other needs of the mission and for the personnel who were to remain there, taking turns. Going near the modular construction and climbing the easy slope of the mountain, I could see the cosmic buoy for the first time, clearly and closely.

It is important to convey the impression of massiveness inherent in the buoy which was made of platinum-like material that shone in the waters. From the top towards the base, its surface had something similar to veins, but they were not of a typical material but were made from a kind of light similar to laser light. Other than the massive metal body of the buoy, all elements and details were representations of this very special light which was sometimes phosphorescent and other times very clear, combining dark red and white color. From this vantage point, I noticed that the “collar” of the device was actually not material but was made of a very dense and orderly arranged light structure which manifested in a continuous and soft movement. In this dense and complicated light structure, I could distinguish some main patterns of direction which were from time to time underlined through a certain rhythm. A preliminary analysis of those signals had already been performed, and a kind of complicated code was established as an initial “trace” which was to be used as the starting point for a detailed study.

All of these technical elements, however, were not an impediment for the Americans. If it had been only that, it would have made a remarkable scientific discovery which they would surely have tried to understand in its every detail. The problem that had made them agitated was the fact that, following the first analysis of the light codes, they realized that something was about to happen in direct connection with the locations in Romania and Alaska. The matter became even more complicated when they analyzed the resultant to Jupiter’s moon, Europa.

For the time being, nobody could understand the nature of the “threat,” but they all agreed that something was going to happen. During a short informal analysis that was made to update the information for working teams, evidence was presented of a calculation that the complicated light symmetry represented some kind of “countdown.” While I appreciated the lucidity of the team of scientists, and even though this option was easy to accept and could cause diverse reactions with unpredictable consequences at planetary level, the situation had also been analyzed from the perspective of another “logic.” There were thus several objectives tied to the information light pulse of the buoy other than the one related to cataclysms and mass destruction. The analysis team presented the fact that this possibility of destruction did not fit into the profile of events which had taken place until then.

The difficulty in presenting such a situation resides in the fact that I am not allowed to talk about almost anything that happened there. Even the few mentions I have made here are due to the fact that the matter was a planetary incident and was observed by several states and therefore cannot be denied, at least not at the level of secret services. My story is therefore rather informative only in a general sense because security barriers do not allow me to even hint at what was found there and the final conclusions reached. As this implies an international involvement and some interstate agreements at a secret military level, I cannot reveal practically anything of these aspects, even more since I was part of the “front line” from the very first days of the incident.

Things are different, however, when I am referring to certain discoveries made on the territory of our country. Even though the conditions are almost the same, there is a significant degree of larger freedom to the degree that we are in “our own yard” so to speak. In the previous books, I have exploited this small advantage to the extent to which it was allowed.

The third day after our arrival at Macor Base, General Inossanto also arrived and was briefed on the first conclusions and personally analyzed the on-site situation. A secret meeting of the military chiefs then took place, and General Obadea was also present there. The advantage of working in such remote locations was that, from a political point of view, the diplomatic pressure was somewhat delayed, thus leaving our nerves a bit more relaxed. In this case, however, things were more complicated because several states claimed different interventions.

In the “evening,” I would talk with General Obadea about the discoveries in the Orăştie Mountains as this subject was directly involved in our work there. The General knew that the respective area unexpectedly “resisted” any RV attempt to find out more about it which made the Americans even more reluctant. He preferred, however, not to talk about this. General Obadea was a direct man, a man of action who preferred facts to words. He was not comfortable in long discussions and tended to close them quickly and suddenly, without details. This is why I did not manage to find out too much from him, but mostly also because he did not have the necessary information either. It was the second time that I heard about this, but I thought it was not possible.

“But it is perfectly true,” the General had assured me one evening when he was in a better mood. “Trust me, I don’t like this situation either because it has created many problems. It’s the only case where our department hasn’t controlled the situation, and not because of our negligence but due to a succession of elements which have inevitably led to this. When we found out what was going on there and wanted to do something, it was already too late. This wouldn’t have been a problem if there had been more information, especially in the archives. But, through various circumstances, this essential information has been lost and now there are only secondary elements connected to it which are of no real help to us. The Americans couldn’t understand this, and this is why they suspected we were lying. In reality, it’s the plain truth.”

I then learned from General Obadea that, in 1994, several archeological sites were opened in the area of the Orăştie Mountains in order to better understand the military and administrative organizational structure of the old Dacians who lived in those areas. The idea seemed promising because digs had revealed relics of a much more complex life than had been suspected until then. At the end of a day, in one of the archeological sites, an event took place which has “frozen” our secret services ever since. One of the workers accidentally slipped into an underground chamber, and then, searching more closely, they reached an ensemble which was buried much deeper. What was discovered there has puzzled the leadership of the country to the highest degree, and they reunited for an emergency Supreme National Defense Council (SNDC) meeting. An RIS and an on-site investigation then followed.

“But, you’ll learn all of this from Cezar,” the General told me. “I delegated him to study the matter thoroughly, even if, in a way, we’ve lost ‘the key’ to it. He’ll explain in more detail because he handled this case for several years. The attention of our secret services was not only drawn by the fact that the location represents an essential strategic point of this country but also by the fact that the discovery explains a lot about our people. It especially clarifies everything in our relations with the Hungarians and not just with them.”

It was the first time I heard the General talking about this. In the beginning, the essence of the problem between the Romanian and Hungarian people was not a territorial claim but rather an ideological factor concerning the origins of the two peoples. There was once a time when the territorial claim prevailed. Now, there is once again a tendency to clarify the matter on historical grounds. In any of these stages that lasted several decades, the relations between the secret services of the two countries were very tense and had a direct impact on the masses which were manipulated by the Counterintelligence Services.

I remained in Antarctica for three weeks, working almost 24/7 on solving the situation there. Our efforts were intense but did not change the situation at all. Even if I cannot provide any details, I will mention that one of the work discussions involved the area of the Earth's magnetic South Pole where new and amazing elements have been found. Paradoxically, what was believed would escalate matters to an interstate conflict actually tempered the situation almost instantaneously. There have been such beneficial influences for this purpose that the solution was found almost immediately and everyone seemed satisfied. Of course, there was still the unsolved problem of the cosmic buoy and especially its interference with Jupiter's moon Europa, but later analysis has shown that it was not really a threat but rather an update of an inner structure condition of the buoy which had only been potential until then. Until my departure, neither the cause of that update nor its nature could be established.

Upon my return, my presence was requested in the RV group in Maryland for a superior stage in the study and training of this ability. I remained there until the end of April 2007, developing my technique as well as valuable friendly relationships with some American officers. I returned to our country after a short stop in Germany; and in May, I was back at the Base continuing my tasks.

Meanwhile, Cezar had managed to settle things in the activity of the department. He had proven to be a good mediator between the interests of the department and the government and, with General Obadea's help, he had strengthened the cooperative relationship with the Americans which had become quite fragile following the incident in Antarctica.

During one of those quiet and splendid May evenings, after a long time, I once again had the opportunity to take a walk around the base with Cezar. I had taken advantage of a pause in his activity and had invited him to that relaxing walk, reminding him that he sometimes needed this too. He smiled, knowing that this was an expression of my wish to find out more from him. Amused, and in order to save me the trouble, he spoke.

“The General has told me that you talked about what happened in the Orăştie Mountains. Very well. Anyway, you’ve been directly involved in this matter through the incident in Antarctica so it is now natural for you to know what this is all about. But, as you already know, not even we have much information regarding this.”

I briefly told him about my discussion with the General and asked him to give me more details about this matter in order to get a clear picture of it. Obadea was not a good story teller; and besides, Cezar knew all the details. Personally, I felt that the file was drawing me in particular, both through its deep mystery and because the subject had been avoided so many times until then. It was a very special matter even for Department Zero.

This was the beginning of a story which has dazzled me and gave me a completely different view of our Romanian people. I already knew some elements about our past from the Projection Hall, but what I learned from Cezar that evening has given me the creeps and made me become more responsible and receptive to the origins and history of our people. Only then could I understand the true value of the fight against our people and the occulted reasons behind it. I promised myself to present all of these elements in detail in order for them to be judged by readers as well as possible. Beyond any speculation or more or less subjective interpretation, there is the truth discovered in the Orăştie Mountains and partially reproduced in the only existing file on this subject: the CRONOS file.

Chapter Five — THE ȘUREANU MASSIF

Cezar explained again, with more details, what I already knew from General Obadea. In the Nineties, there was a vast archeological program in the Orăștie Mountains, the purpose of which was to more precisely establish the identity of our people in the area of the Carpathians but also to better understand the fortifications and living system of the population of that time. After the revolution in 1989, the authorities made certain allowances for these purposes until censorship was instituted by hidden interests and political orders. During those days, archeologists were intensely active and many amazing results started to appear. Some works have been published on the discoveries made, but it seems that there was a time when everything stopped, almost all of a sudden. As usual, a lack of funds and necessary conditions for digging has been invoked.

“Actually, that’s when that amazing discovery was made; and since it was a top-level state secret, everything stopped,” Cezar explained. “There was, however, another aspect about which not even our secret services are informed: the discovery frightened them and they felt terror. As usually happens in such situations, they’ve acted blindly. Fear was so strong that they managed to do a better job than usual: they’ve hidden the place so well that it cannot be found again! A series of factors have contributed to this which explains the situation to a certain extent. At that time, however, it was crazy. Just think about the fact that something is discovered which cannot only alter this country but even the social, political and economic balance of the world. It’s not about relics or artifacts nor even impressive structures such as the one in the Bucegi Mountains. There, something has been discovered which reduces everything, something like a singularity.

They were not able to understand what they had seen on site, let alone study the matter. It’s most ironic that, even if this was the greatest discovery ever made, it was the one to be closed the most quickly. And it was so well closed, that it has vanished again, completely. It’s such a pity....”

“There hasn’t been a similar proceeding to the one that took place in Bucegi?” I asked, amazed. “Haven’t the same forces been mobilized?”

Cezar denied, shaking his head. As for me, I could imagine the turmoil and the activity taken during that time in order to fix the huge error made. But it seems that all efforts have been in vain, and now my good friend displayed quiet resignation in front of a closed matter.

“Not only was the usual protocol for such situations not followed, but the so-called preliminary investigation, reduced to some questions, was done only by the local police station. Then, three RIS agents came and called Bucharest immediately. The representative sent from Bucharest immediately collapsed from the point of view of decision making. They were so scared that they believed that, for greater safety, the place had to be filled up and concealed until teams of specialists arrived. A concrete mixer was immediately brought in and they sealed the entrance themselves, laying soil with vegetation over it. They barely had time to make some photos.

The rest of the file, which is very thin, represents the statement of the professor.”

“They can’t have forgotten the place,” I said. “At least they came back quickly.”

“This hasn’t been possible,” Cezar answered, looking afar. “This is the mystery of the whole matter, in its own special destiny. On the way back to Bucharest, the car transporting the three men had a terrible accident. They could barely save the few materials gathered in the file, but they also had problems there. Otherwise, we wouldn’t have known almost anything except from the professor’s statement. I was dazzled by the turn events had taken.

“But, weren’t there any witnesses? Has nobody else known? Has nobody else seen that place?”

“Unbelievably, no. It has all happened so fast and the panic was probably so high that they left nobody near the place. The place is quite isolated anyway.”

“What about the representative from Bucharest? There were four people after all. Did he come separately?”

“No, he died in the accident. But, one of the agents had already died at the site of the discovery. Or, better said, disappeared. The only intelligent thing they did after all was to write a brief protocol, until the concrete mixer arrived. Otherwise, nobody would have ever known what truly happened there. Even so, many questions remained.”

I was dazzled. I had never heard of such a “matching” of events, but a small ray of hope appeared.

“What about the driver of the concrete mixer?”

“Obviously, this was the first lead we followed,” Cezar answered. “He was a simple, poor man. He went crazy right there on the site of the discovery, and we couldn’t get along with him. The agents had left the concrete mixer at a certain distance and had brought the concrete with them with which they filled the hole with a barrow. It seems that a small quantity was needed. Working barely for a couple of hours, they managed to conceal the place so well that it hasn’t been found afterwards.”

“I’ve never heard of anything like this! But, they could have searched the area systematically because they knew the general area, especially since you said that it was in the archeological site.”

“Here’s where the problems truly started. No, the place wasn’t in the site. It was outside of it, not too far. But, let’s say that wasn’t the difficulty. After the incident, a special SNDC order was issued forbidding any research. It was a supreme order for top-level state secrets. From a certain point of view, they worked much more efficiently than in comparison with the case of the Bucegi Mountains discovery. They have been very discreet and have acted quickly, without hesitation.”

“What do you think about this?” I asked, curious to see Cezar’s reaction.

He was silent for a while, reflecting upon his answer.

“Honestly speaking, I think they’ve taken the only correct decision. If it hadn’t been so, I am not sure that we would have talked so relaxed here today because it is highly probable that the political, economic and military situation of our country and of other countries would have changed radically. Or, it would have been highly probable for that to happen. Trust me, I am not exaggerating when I’m telling you this.”

“An order can be overcome in time, especially if there are enough interests,” I said, looking for a breach.

“But not this order. And it wasn’t only the decision itself, but a series of collateral measures they’ve taken in order to prevent the event you’re referring to. They’ve moved very well and, at least from this point of view, things were done impeccably. The chance was, if I can say so, that there were very few witnesses and this is what enabled things to happen like this.

“There have also been speculations concerning the car accident, but thorough research has been done and they’ve reached the conclusion that it hadn’t been provoked. The ones interested wouldn’t have had time for this even if they wanted to because it all happened very quickly and nobody from the other state structures had clearly found out what was there. Furthermore, if there had been an intention to eliminate witnesses, how can it be explained that the file, small as it was, was found in the crashed car?

Normally, it was the evidence that should have also disappeared immediately, but this hasn’t happened. But, there have been some attempts to do this afterwards, and this is why special measures to protect the information in this file have been taken.”

“So, you’re saying that they’ve forbidden any research in the area; but they could have done the same in Bucegi, and you can see the current situation.

It’s still a top state secret. You can have an idea of its existence but no concrete information. You know very well that this, together with hiding the area, is what makes the value of the secret.”

“I’ve told you, in this case, things were different. No diplomatic agreement or negotiation would have been possible. It would have simply been a matter of immediate military attack with international escalation in less than 24 hours. Scenarios have shown that there would have been no possibility of control. The inevitable leak of information would have almost immediately blinded any reasoning on the subject. Fortunately, even if the problem was very serious, this seriousness is what has offered the simple and efficient solution. Even if I am very sorry that our department hasn’t received access there, I must admit that things couldn’t have happened any other way. It’s hard to get used to the idea but only until you get to know the situation in detail. You then understand very well why it had to be so.”

It was dark and I noticed that Cezar had hinted at returning to the Base. As I was very interested in this subject, I insisted with one more question.

“But, you haven’t told me anything about the professor. After all, it seems that he is the only remaining link to the discovery.”

Cezar looked at me somewhat sadly.

“Professor Constantin was our only chance to find out something. He was a special man, very cultivated and serious. Unfortunately, I only had access to him for a couple of hours. He seemed to come from another world, almost completely withdrawn from the reality around him. He was immediately taken over, and we’ve lost any trace of him. They said it was a top state secret. Nobody has ever heard of him since. I myself was very anxious to find out what had happened there because I had received an order from General Obadea to handle this case exclusively right after the deadly accident of the three. It was the hand of Providence that the professor wasn’t also taken in the car but remained at the village police station until the following day. I think this was the only “mistake” of the agents, but it was a fortunate mistake for us, if I can say so. Anyway, I didn’t find out too much, or at least not in detail as I had hoped because they came after him at five o’clock in the morning. I couldn’t do anything, but I knew I would never see him again.”

“Why couldn’t you find out all that you wanted?”

“He either didn’t talk or spoke seldom with long pauses. He would stare at the emptiness and I could notice that, in some moments, he felt a certain panic. The poor man made efforts to work with me, but it seems that the psychical tension was overwhelming for him. It is from him that we have practically all of the content of the file related to this case.”

I then expressed a hunch I had for a couple of months.

“Isn’t that the file from the special box which you asked me to bring you?”

Cezar immediately confirmed my suspicion.

“The professor is the one who had the inspiration to take the most photos. There were nine photos totally. The agents made only four, with a Polaroid camera, out of which two have been completely destroyed in the accident.

And, of course, we also had the professor's statement which I did manage to obtain. It was very difficult, but I succeeded. I made the transcription on the same morning when they came for him, prior to their arrival. Because I didn't have enough time, I made a summary of the statement given by the professor a few minutes before. There are only a couple of pages, but I gave the agents the recorded tape only. I then announced to the General that the recording could become a serious problem in the future. In the afternoon of the same day, he called me to tell me that he had personally received the tape and had it destroyed in his presence and in the presence of the SNDC who had organized an emergency meeting. This is when they decided to stop everything from the very beginning."

"Do you think that you would have discovered the place eventually?" I asked.

"We had jurisdiction over the case. Others would probably have intervened quite soon because, at that time, the General's influence was not that high and our department still had a lot of things to settle. But, given the interest I had for the case, especially after I found out from professor Constantin what it was all about and saw the photos, I can say that yes we would have found the place even if it would have involved a lot of work. In the beginning, it seemed like looking for a needle in a haystack, but we would have eventually managed to start a wider action of digging the area around the site. It would have been a lot of work, but we would have had many chances to discover the location. It's much better for our country and people, however, that it has all been stopped."

"The General told me that you did intensive research afterwards. If you said that the action in the area had stopped, what did you want to find out?"

Cezar smiled, getting up and making a few movements to warm up his body.

"It was a rather individual study which has helped me structure a certain opinion in our department. It's also useful to me now when I am handling certain matters of ethnicity and national security within our secret and counterintelligence services. Professor Constantin was a good historian and linguist. He had intensely studied the history of Dacia even if, to be correct, there has never been a country with that name. This is the name given to the area by the Romans after its conquest: Dacia Felix. Obviously, the word felix or happy refers to the actual Roman robbers, but we have no proof that our ancestors had named it Dacia. I was telling you that professor Constantin had studied those aspects and had some important theories concerning the prehistory of this region. He had done specific archeological digs and was considered an archeologist specialized in Neolithic cultures. I've corroborated his statement with the research done in the area of ancient cultures from the Carpathians area because his main idea was that these people were the origin of any existing cultural development, at least in Europe, and that the Romanian language is actually the primary language or, better said, the Indo-European language. It wasn't his own idea, but he had set for himself the objective of making it well known in all national and international media, based on sources and competent research previously done. He was a good man but a little naive, especially in the current complicated context where the fight to destroy any idea or evidence of this is very passionate."

As he had many times in the past, Cezar had managed to completely surprise me. I only had a general knowledge about this subject, like the kind taught in school; but suddenly, my heart was filled with great joy as I could feel that this was a permanent source of valuable information.

"I've become more and more interested in this matter and have even studied it in detail," Cezar continued. "There are some people in our country whose erudition and analytical talent in this sense is brilliant. Honestly, people should read at least a summary of their works, but the problem is still obscure interests and their manipulation of information, especially the intervention of international bodies which knowingly ignore the valuable documentation and information. We will continue to talk about this."

We returned to the base and spent a lovely evening. The atmosphere was so pleasant that Cezar agreed to continue our interrupted discussion. He then gave me more details of the events that took place after the discovery in the Orăştie Mountains.

Cezar told me that the entire matter got started when one of the archeological sites in that area had just been found and the digging was only at the beginning. To do the work, locals were usually hired and paid by the day. They were unqualified workers or unemployed people. The problem was that they would not come to work every day or they would stay only a small period of time so that, for many such sites, works progressed with difficulty. Furthermore, archeological sites were spread over a wide area in the Orăştie Mountains, the Deva area and the Sarmizegetusa Regia area.

The site managers had to handle two or even three sites at the same time, moving from one to another and their presence in a place would slow down the work rhythm in another. An interesting area for digging also included the Şureanu Mountain which is part of the Orăştie group of mountains. On one of its slopes, in a kind of gully, an archeological site had been opened for a couple of days. They had drawn up a plan to divide the sections with a lot of interest and had set the work parameters. Digging had only started for a couple of days when it all began.

One afternoon, the workers left early due to the excessive heat that was making their work a lot more arduous. That site was under the direct supervision of professor Constantin who, as was natural, remained to the very end in order to write the field notes and prepare what was necessary for the following day. Apart from him, there was another worker on the site who was the son of the host in the nearby village where the professor lived during the archeological digging. From the professor's statement, we learned that the young man had gathered the digging tools and had taken them about 100 meters away from the site and towards the west where they had improvised a sort of rudimentary storage area with a "hood" for night time. Although it was in the middle of the forest, the storage area was in a rocky environment. There was no clear clue beyond that statement.

Furthermore, nobody knows for sure what made the boy hit that "hood" with a pickaxe. Maybe it was the desire to make a great show of zeal by levelling the surface where the cover was placed. The professor told me only that he had heard the pickaxe sounds and had seen the boy digging but continued his own work.

At a certain moment, he heard a short cry and a stifled sound as if someone was falling. Worried about the boy, whom he could no longer see, the professor quickly went to the place. He got there after approximately one minute and found the young man laughing gladly at the discovery he had just made. His strong hits with the pickaxe had moved part of the rock and the ground on which the hood was placed. He probably hit a niche in the rocks with the pickaxe and its strength led to their falling. The fact is that the rock broke and crashed about a meter and a half into the ground, thus uncovering a hollow place under the surface of the ground. The boy was unharmed except for minor scratches. When the professor got there, he immediately realized that it was a kind of underground chamber with an almost regular shape about five meters long and about four meters wide.

He also went down into that hole and examined it carefully, but his initial hopes of making a great discovery seemed to shatter very quickly. Even if he could observe a certain regularity in the shape of the chamber, he realized that it was a purely natural formation that was the result of a normal geological process. The structure of the rocks on the walls and the agglomerations at the edges of the chamber clearly showed that there had been no human intervention. Furthermore, the place was completely empty with no trace of previous human presence there. Disappointed, the professor was examining the place out of professional routine when he noticed a narrow slit in one of the corners of the small cave through which he could feel a strong air draught. With his hopes a bit higher, he instructed the boy to try and enlarge the air hatch.

After a few strong blows, the limestone rock cracked and a new opening was visible, this time a narrower one. While checking that small passageway, the professor sent the boy to bring the protection equipment and the flashlights. Through the newly created slit, no man could pass so they had to enlarge it more and the professor worked along with the young man. After a couple of minutes, they managed to break a larger rock and lit the area beneath it which proved to be a smooth slope going under the dome formed by the ground of the cavern where they were. This slope led further west at a distance from the archeological site. Delighted with the new discovery, Professor Constantin decided to explore what seemed to be an original limestone system. Even though it was something unusual for that place and because it did not seem too difficult, the archeologist decided to begin the exploration immediately and planned to perform more thorough research the following day. Accompanied by the boy, he carefully went down through the slit they had created and, bending as much as he could, he went forwards down the slope. The soil was almost smooth and the first thing that raised questions was that it was covered in a kind of gravel. At first, the place was quite claustrophobic; but after approximately twenty meters, it became considerably larger. Fifty meters after entering the second slit in the ground, Professor Constantin and the boy could easily walk standing up and the slope went even lower. The sides of the cavern could not be observed, but the professor suspected they were quite far away by the sound of his voice inside the cavern. He then stated that he had begun to feel a bit unsafe and slightly fearful, but he quickly encouraged himself and moved on. At a certain point, he noticed that the nature of the rocks on the ceiling had suddenly changed and in front of him, at a distance of approximately eight meters, there was a vertical wall. The professor also noticed some very beautiful glitter had appeared on the ceiling in the strange shadows made by the light beam on the wall rocks and he interpreted them as Basalt reflections. When they reached the furthest wall of the cavern with the downward sloping ground, the professor experienced a sudden powerful emotion. On the clean ground, right near the vertical wall, there was a large opening in the shape of a demi-circle through which he could hear a deep thunder-like roar sounding like it was coming from far away. The impression of force and energy coming through the dark opening was so strong that the archeologist stopped, undecided whether to continue the investigation or not. He was also thinking about the young man accompanying him towards whom he had a responsibility as his employer. That was probably the crucial moment of the entire discovery.

Its destiny would have been completely different if the two would have returned to the village and resumed research the following day together with a team which would have included archeologists and RIS personnel.

But, as Cezar said, some things are ordered by reasons exceeding human understanding. In such situations, man is nearly powerless and follows a preestablished path to an overwhelming extent. There is, however, that small point of inflexion when one can choose, when all possibilities are fully available. But, after the choice is made, things develop rapidly.

“However, the professor decided to continue the investigation in spite of the bad feeling he had,” Cezar continued describing the chain of those dramatic events. “He told me that he hesitated for a few moments, but after the irresistible impulse of the discovery, he overcame his conservative spirit.

He was thinking that after his descent to the next level, which announced itself as more grandiose, he would have a better idea how he was supposed to organize the search for the following day. He still had doubts when, directing the flashlight to the opening, he became astounded because it descended underground at a very steep angle; but this time the ground bore the traces of a step. His heart racing, Professor Constantin bent down to study that structure better. He saw that the ground descended at an angle of approximately 60 degrees but in a manner that was sort of like waves. At the beginning, he imagined that the soil had formed steps due to the inclination, but he immediately noticed that there was only rock over which the same kind of weird gravel had been laid and the rock had been carved in the shape of steps. This had probably happened a long time ago because the so-called steps had crumbled and had many cracks, but this was clearly an artificial invention because he could still observe the rock carvings in certain parts.”

Cezar then said that the professor suddenly remembered the camera he had brought along and quickly made a few photos. It was quite an old camera with a built-in flash, but some photos were good while the others were fogged. For example, out of the photos he made there, none were usable.

Trembling with emotion, the two started to descend the steps into the abyss which seemed to stretch beneath them, but they soon realized that, in reality, the place where they had entered was much smaller than they had initially thought. The descent of those ancient steps did not exceed seven to eight meters vertically.

Professor Constantin was intrigued by two aspects: first of all, when entering that underground structure, he noticed that the ground was very clean and regular. Furthermore, the underground areas were completely empty and, in a certain way, even clean. The researcher has declared that he had the impression of “smoothness” as if somebody maintained that cleanliness all the time. There was no trace or unevenness on the ground.

This experience resulted in an odd sensation, but maybe it had to do with the discovery they were about to make. After they entered the opening, the professor and the boy understood that the terrible roar, like a distant thunder, was coming from the passageway which was becoming larger in front of them. They were already about 200 meters away from the site, inside the mountain and at a probable depth of 30 meters. If it had not been for that sensation of “cleanliness” and even emptiness in the caverns they had come through, the professor would have probably given up and decided to continue research the following day. But, driven by the irresistible impulse of discovering the unknown and because the way forward was so easy and natural, he continued researching that passageway which had a slight downward slope. He told me that they descended like that for about half a kilometer. The passage became larger and larger but the ceiling remained relatively low, approximately three to four meters above ground.

Even if the darkness surrounding them was frightening and the sensation was even more amplified by the stifled roar, the fact that the environment was so clean and perfectly dry with no unevenness or other obstacles encouraged the two to go forward while maintaining a sustained rhythm.

While walking, the professor — amazed by that symmetrical inner structure of the mountain — briefly lit the almost smooth rock ceiling which only had a few deep slits encrusted in it. He could guess that the passage might have been the bed of a tumultuous underground river, but in order to be sure of this, he had to do more research, including a study of the side walls. The walls, however, were very distant and he could not see anything in the light made by the flashlight. The ceiling then started to rise, making the space inside even larger. After almost 500 meters of free descent, Professor Constantin noticed the first changes in the structure of the rocks which were beginning to have a pale shine in the light made by the flashlight. As the ceiling was already too high to perform a better check, he continued to walk, accompanied by the boy. As they went forward, that shine, somehow dull and full of mystery, was becoming more intense, meaning that it occupied a larger space on the ceiling. The passage through which they came then became flat, and they noticed that it took a left turn. After several such “serpentines,” a kind of crossroads suddenly appeared in front of them. The passageway was split in two by a vertical wall. The left turn was recognized as being narrower because the professor could see its side walls with a strange shine that was sometimes sparkly.

The right passage seemed larger; and logically, he thought that it might lead to a larger cavern. The ceiling and walls reflected the light even more with yellow nuances which helped them better orient themselves. As the right passage seemed much larger, brighter and more welcoming, they decided to continue their investigation through it.

“From the professor’s statement, I drew the conclusion that this was the point from which the true discovery began,” Cezar told me. “He went closer to the side wall and lit it better with the flashlight in order to see the cause of that dull shine. He was very troubled because he recognized massive gold ore which filled the rock wall. The same was valid for the ceiling and the dividing wall.”

I was astonished.

“What? The walls of the corridor were covered in gold? That’s fantastic! It seems almost unreal.”

I imagined how I would have felt if I had been in the professor’s shoes.

“It must have been very beautiful,” I observed. “And what did they do? Did they move on?”

“Yes, the corridor took a smooth turn to the left and continued straight for approximately 150 meters. Then it rose a lot, up to 20-25 meters but maintained the approximately ten meters in width. At its end, they saw a blue light which seemed to come from the ground. He told me that it gave the feeling of waves and that it discreetly lit almost the entire final part of the corridor. The boy started to tremble and panicked.”

“And they stopped there?” I asked, impatiently.

“No,” replied Cezar. “The professor had discovered something magnificent. He stated that the gold ore covering the side walls and the ceiling which had that mysterious shine had ‘gathered’ on the right wall in a sort of ‘vein’ which was approximately ten meters thick and then became larger, like a funnel, gradually covering the entire wall. It was not gold ore however. It was pure gold.”

Being unfamiliar with this subject, I was not very impressed.

“You don’t understand the importance of the situation,” Cezar observed.

“There is no such thing in this world. No mine on this planet had ever contained such a seam. Generally, gold mines have a more or less pure gold ore which is later processed, by using quite difficult methods, in order to extract relatively small quantities of gold from a few tens or hundreds of kilograms and even up to tons of earth. This happens, however, after a long exploitation of the respective mine and only if it is rich in ore. Anyway, there are rules of national security concerning such mines. All the gold in the mine is never completely extracted and they must be closed before the ore is exhausted. Just think that gold represents safety, stability, and prosperity anywhere on this planet. Any economy longs for it; any country fights for it. The advantage in this respect is that it only appears in small quantities in comparison with other inferior metals. Or, maybe this is actually the great disadvantage which makes it so wanted. Many interests occur in this case.”

I knew this very well but only from the point of view of counterintelligence.

“I’ve read the ROŞIA MONTANA file. I know it’s very complicated, but I haven’t studied its economic implications in depth,” I said.

“It would have been a good idea because you would now have a clearer view of the situation. It’s notorious that the Romans took about 200 tons of gold and 300 tons of silver after winning the war with the Dacians almost 2000 years ago. In Rome, there were continuous feasts for four months together with tax exemption for a year as well as donations to the population. There was also the building of that architectural complex which included the column for which Trajan ordered moving an entire hill.”

“So, they had about 120 Sundays successively,” I calculated, astonished.

“Yes, and they celebrated every day in Roman style. Doing that to a people means destroying them, diminishing them, and wearing them away through annihilation of their moral and inner values. Maybe that was a major cause for the fall of the Roman Empire as such actions leave serious traces. And, consider the fact that I was only speaking about the gold which the Dacians already had, not to mention what the Romans extracted from Roşia Montana for approximately 150 years afterwards. But, even so, this wasn’t ‘Decebal’s treasure’ which history mentions as a legend.” *

* Decebalus was a king of the Dacians whose capital was Sarmisegetusa in Transylvania. He ruled from 87-106 A.D. as a great warrior and irritant to the Romans. With Roman captives, he diverted the river Sargetia which ran past his palace. Having created a cavity, he deposited a vast amount of treasure which included gold and silver. Covering it with his stones and earth, he returned the river to its natural course. He deposited other treasure in nearby caves. Bacilis was a companion of Decebalus who was eventually captured by the Romans who persuaded him to reveal some secrets of the buried treasure in order to recover it for themselves.

“But, it has never been found. You know that there are implications here,” I said.

“Back then, only part of it was found due to Bicilis’s treason. This is the origin for the Romanian word bicisnic* which means cursed man, a very evil man who causes much suffering.”

* In Romanian, the word bicisnic also translates as rascal.

“He has practically betrayed his people,” I said, shaken.

“Yes, it was an important turn in our history. But, you should consider the fact that the same quantity of gold was later taken by the Austrian-Hungarian Empire for a long period of time, for a few hundred years, also through mining. Don’t forget how much gold was taken by the Turkish people during the Middle Ages and during the rule of the Phanariots; and, of course, the difficult problem with our country’s treasure that was taken by the Russians; and not once, but twice, at the end of the First and Second World War.”

I felt a feeling of partial frustration; but on the other hand, I felt admiration and joy that this country has had so much of this precious metal.

“Romania’s national gold reserve for economic stability is now a bit more than 100 tons. The Romans, however, have taken twice as much, not to mention the ones who followed. These are proven facts. Nobody can say it never happened. These are historical realities. But, what I’m trying to underline is that all of this cannot compare to Professor Constantin’s discovery in the Șureanu Massif. It’s like comparing the Earth with the Sun. What is there is beyond any imagination.”

“But, I understand that, after all, it was only a seam of pure gold of impressive dimensions.”

“Even if it had been only that, it would have dazzled any geologist and solved almost every economic problem of this country for a very long period of time. A gold sea, in the very rare cases when it occurs, is an incrustation of small variable-size pieces ranging between a few centimeters up to a few tens of centimeters. It seldom exceeds one meter. The reason for this is that gold is rarely found in its natural compact state in one place; and in 99% of the cases, it is found as ore with either a bigger or smaller concentration of this noble metal. But, what the professor saw there is practically a geological impossibility; and if he hadn't had the inspiration to take some photos which are attached to the file — to be honest — I would have doubted the truth of his statement."

Cezar then invited me to go to his office. He opened his personal safe and took out the special glass fiber box containing the CRONOS file.

"It's a very special box. It has been designed by the English, by a company that designs for the aeronautics industry. It has a special iris reader which opens it. The built-in chip analyzes the condition of the iris and, if it doesn't fit into certain parameters of body relaxation, the box doesn't open.

This was meant to prevent situations of stress when hasty decisions might be taken or threatening instances. It also has a double safety system on opening. After accepting the iris print, it requests the vocal print of the authorized person."

"So, it can't be forced or manipulated when opening."

"Theoretically, there is a chance, but the possibility is minimal. At any attempt which differs from the established protocol, it has an instantaneous self-destruct mechanism. There is practically no time or chance to save anything."

Cezar placed his iris near the digital reader and uttered a password. I could hear a brief click sound before he removed the lid. He took the thin file and opened it. Astonished, I looked inside and saw that there was only a magnetic card and a small parallelepipedal device, a bit bigger than the card. I looked at Cezar, questioning him with my eyes wide open in astonishment.

"It's a unique reader designed especially for this card. In its turn, the card can only be read with this device which can only interpret this card. Besides that, it can only be connected to a single computer which has special software installed."

Cezar connected the reader to his laptop and introduced the card. On the screen, I saw several encoded instructions. He wrote something, and I could see for the first time the contents of the CRONOS file, in electronic format.

“It’s a random derived function which allows tracking the material in real time but only if the password mechanism is known,” Cezar explained. “It’s not enough to introduce the primary code in order to see the file information on the screen. At certain intervals, when the program requests me to do so, I must introduce a new variable which allows it to continue the presentation of the file. If I don’t introduce this key in due time, the program is blocked and doesn’t allow the presentation of the material. Thus, you can only have access to bits and pieces of the information and never to everything at the same time. These are maximum security systems that were designed when the whole device was ordered.”

“I expected to see the file with the original information,” I said, amazed at the extraordinary security.

Cezar laughed, teasing me.

“And why not a few presentation samples? Seriously now, I can see that you haven’t understood the importance of that discovery or of its possible consequences if its location had been accessible. How could you imagine that we would have kept the original file here? At that time, after the SNDC order, there was even a proposal to destroy the unique record and all the information it contained. It was a border-line decision, but it was decided that it was a good idea to keep the information under the reserve of exceptional security measures.”

“Who has jurisdiction over this case now?” I asked. “Considering your explanation, I’m amazed that the file is here, even in this highly secured form.”

“At that moment, nobody knew about the case. It wasn’t just a case, it was a matter of state, the highest matter of national security. It was the exclusive task of the Supreme National Defense Council to immediately establish a set of drastic measures: the file would have only one original and no copy; it had to be secured accordingly; it had to remain closed in the safe of the Treasure Chamber of the National Bank; and access to its content was possible only in a joint session of the SNDC. Of these, only the matter of its special security had to be solved. There was an original project and a preliminary solution with a heavier device than the one you see here but which was also efficient in securing the file. Even so, it continued to be stored at the National Bank. In 2003, after the discovery in the Bucegi Mountains, there have been certain reasons which caused it to be moved to another secure location. It was also then that the current protection system of the box you're looking at was ordered."

"But, you said that there was only one original counterpart," I said, puzzled.

"It was believed that it was better to have a copy of the file, which we hold here, but one that is encrypted with special algorithms. General Obadea has argued that it was best for our department to hold this copy. The way he managed the crisis in Bucegi, which was critical at that time, has greatly contributed to his success in this respect. There have subsequently been several circumstances which have favored the partial passing of this file into our jurisdiction. As I said, there are good reasons for this, but I can't give you any details.

Right now, there are two such special deposit boxes. One contains the original file in a secret location; and the one stored here, which is the only copy of the file and is encoded as you could see. Anyway, even the storage of this box is random. There is a team from another RIS department that handles this by transporting the briefcase containing this special box to certain locations, at certain intervals of time, without knowing what they carry. Only the SNDC and our department know all the details about this.

The box is now held at the base due to the link with the incident in Antarctica. There was even the special situation when I had to ask you to bring me the box to that place personally because there was an emergency of communication with American units. I had no choice. The special team for this intervention wasn't available in that precise moment, and it would have been too long before they could have mobilized anyway because they would have come from Bucharest."

I now had a clearer view of the situation. Cezar showed me the copy of the file. I saw on the screen the protocol written by the agents, Professor Constantin's statement, and especially the photos, which were indubitable proof of the discovery. Some of the photos made by Professor Constantin were very clear, especially the two showing the massive seam of pure gold on the rock wall and then its sudden expansion to the whole cavern. I was perplexed.

"Here you can see that the seam covers the whole mountain," I said with a certain reluctance.

"You can see for yourself — there is no doubt. It's truly unbelievable, but proof can't be denied."

I looked at the two photos for a long time. Even though there was a certain obscurity, especially on the edges, the rock wall of the passage could be clearly distinguished with the intrusions of nuggets of shining gold. Then, they quickly converged to the middle of the wall where they gathered to the mouth of a seam of pure gold, almost two meters thick, that stretched irregularly towards what looked like the continuation of the passage, to the left. Or, maybe it was the other way around, whereby intrusions of gold ore started to form from that seam and then dissipated more and more as they were farther away from the seam. The gold "vein" was perfectly pure, with no intrusion of rock or any other metal. I could notice some massive irregularities in its thickness, as if it had been roughly carved with a powerful tool; thus removing massive pieces of pure gold, true lumps of that precious metal. This was, however, only an impression caused by the shadows of the indentations and elevations of the seam. If somebody had truly intervened and removed gold pieces in such a rough manner, it would have surely left much rougher traces. In the photo, however, the "relief" of the seam was irregular but smooth and in soft curves, all of which made me believe that it was in its natural state, just as it had formed. The second photo was dazzling because it showed the gold seam becoming larger and suddenly enclosing almost the entire wall, stretching towards the ceiling. It was practically a mountain of gold. I looked at Cezar silently, unable to say anything.

"I think you now realize what is involved here," he told me very seriously.

I than looked at the next two photos which showed the passageway in depth. The first one showed the ground and part of the side wall. It had all become solely yellow metal: the floor, the side wall and also, as I could see from the previous photo, the ceiling. In the part shown in this new photo, near the wall, at a distance of approximately half a meter, I saw something like an elevation, also made of gold and solid with the floor, that was shaped like a parallelepipedon but somehow rounded on the edges. It had a slight irregular indentation; and in parallel with the long side, I could see delimited in the ground something that might have looked like an Egyptian ancient scroll full of hieroglyphics. But, the encrustations were not hieroglyphics but clear signs of some sort of writing with lines and precise geometrical shapes. In practical terms, it was a rectangle inside of which these signs were scribbled. Almost refusing to believe it, I spoke with amazement.

“This exceeds any expectation! There are clear traces of someone’s presence there! What does it represent? A tomb?”

“We also thought so at first and gave the formal scheme of this elevation to a specialized laboratory. They told us that, following an interactive analysis, their final conclusion was that the distortion in the ground of the passageway was actually a kind of bed. Anyway, it was something on which someone had obviously sat down repeatedly. Just imagine our surprise when we heard this. I couldn’t find out any more information from the professor because he hadn’t paid too much attention to that place. So, we had to analyze the situation for ourselves, using the image in the photo as our only guide. But, we couldn’t guess too much. The complex analysis sent in by that laboratory justified every indentation in the metal and apparently left no room for doubts of the final conclusion. The only question was how it had been possible for that indentation which, in a way, vaguely took the shape of a human body to form; and the only plausible answer was that, because the metal was pure, it was also quite soft. In time, due to repeated friction, that weak erosion took place and the metal took the shape of the human body. But, even if it were so, this must have happened over a long period of time, maybe even a few hundreds of years. Another alternative theory was that the parallelepipedon had been artificially deepened a bit by carving, but this couldn’t explain the soft shapes of the indentation. One way or another, they had probably somehow finished before that place was used as a place to sleep. A bed made of pure gold.”

“Have the signs been studied? Has their meaning been understood?” I asked with curiosity.

“Yes and it’s been troubling. We’ve ordered this study both in Romania and in three other famous world universities in order to have multiple references. The convergence of the results has convinced us of the authenticity of the interpretation. They said that part of the text might be deciphered, but another part, which seemed much older, was unknown. The respective writing couldn’t be identified, not even approximately. This raised a new set of assumptions because it proved that several persons had passed through that place during different periods of time. I don’t know what could be the cause of living in that place and under those conditions.

Personally, I think it could only have been about highly spiritual actions, possibly by priests who withdrew from the world; but even that hypothesis is somehow frail. After all, if they wanted to withdraw for prayer and meditation, they could have done so in many other places above ground.

It’s true that there is very important occult symbolism involved, that of descending into the cave, but it’s clear that the respective place was so privileged that very few people have had access to it. Otherwise, the traces left would have been more numerous and of a different nature. And, if they weren’t priests, then who were those beings and with what purpose did they remain in that place? It’s a mystery we haven’t deciphered.”

We both remained silent for a while. I then asked a question.

“What is the translation of the text? I mean, that which was understood.”

Cezar displayed that information from the file on the screen. There were actually several documents attested by the institutions that had performed the study as well as a final document which presented the comparative analysis. There were slight differences or nuances in the text, but they were not significant. The text was very short and cryptic:

KR – IO; SAL-MOŞ, HERE IS FOREVER,
THE WORLDS UNITE

An explanatory document was also attached to the file.

“A lot of work has been done for this analysis, and I was also interested to study the subject. Actually, it can’t be regarded by itself because it is intrinsically related to everything which represents and signifies the ancient origins of the Romanian people.”

I looked a bit at the analysis, but it was too complicated for my knowledge at that time so I asked Cezar to make a summary of it for me and he agreed.

“Here, elements of linguistics are combined with the study of civilizations and cultures because they explain each other,” he said. “The main idea, underlined in very competent studies performed by Romanian linguists, out of which one is very special, is that the Romanian language is the primordial language, practically the only language in Europe. And, I am not talking out of a cheap or unjustified spirit but from a perspective based upon references and studies performed by eminent researchers which can only be contradicted out of bad will or ignorance.”

“Okay, but anyone can consider this statement about the Romanian language as blasphemy or can at least ‘ironize’ and mock it,” I said.

“Of course they can, but what do you prefer: a worthless attitude of this kind or evidence and comparative studies which leave no room for interpretation? On the one hand, there are aspects here which involve the ignorance of many foreign and Romanian ‘researchers.’ On the other hand, there are state and geopolitical interests which refer to complex influences.

Who could think that the Romanian language is the original language for all Indo-Europeans? The university “conceptions,” which in reality are dogmas, have quickly imposed and formed a sort of obstacle to the correct information with regard to getting information to the public. A few ‘historians’ and career ‘linguists’ have imposed a line of thinking and knowledge which is now like a seal over the truth and must be removed.

Then, it’s also about the superiority displayed by the great European states or cultures which don’t even consider the possibility that the primordial civilization was in the area of the Carpathians and, more precisely, on Romanian territory. Apart from being a matter of snobbery, it also shows a certain hidden fear of the consequences of admitting this. Just think what it would mean for the pride and ‘greatness’ of great empires or cultural traditions. How could the governments of the respective nations explain their history and national ‘pride’ which has, at many times, been the basis for obtaining economic advantages as well as diplomatic and even territorial influence? For these nations in particular, acknowledging such a fact would be a disaster with a collapse of their state ‘dignity’ as an unacceptable fact. In most cases, but especially in sensitive cases, this is why history takes a fake and fabricated turn. It is done in order to serve much higher interests.”

“But, this would require a sustained and correlated effort,” I said. “I am referring especially to the mystification of the problem of the spoken language, not to mention the cradle of civilization.”

“It’s easier than you can imagine. It’s enough to have just two or three ‘competent’ opinions of prestigious university professors which then results in an infiltration of the respective theory into the general academic environment. This is a quick take over and then, with small steps, it is spread through schools to the lower environments, even to the rural ones. It is a known fact that a child’s way of thinking is shaped in school, and what they learn there is considered to be true. Generally speaking, the population absorbs what is served as a result to their daily concerns. The idea is something like, ‘leave it, specialists know better; we shouldn’t be concerned with that.’ In other words, if ‘experts’ say it is so, then it must be true.

“I do not want to generalize, but I am telling you almost for sure that what I have said concerning the culture, language, and origin of our people is the truth. We have colleagues from another department who handle these aspects because, after all, things have turned into a matter of national security. But, you know the situation here. We have certain references at our base here and have analyzed the matter for a long time and know its implications. You’d be amazed to find out the struggle that is taking place at this level and the interests that are involved. But, that’s not what I was talking about. I was referring to the fact that the Romanian language is regarded as a ‘surrogate’ result of Latin, Greek, Slavic, Hungarian, Turkish and many other influences. If you search any Romanian dictionary, you’ll see that every word is considered to have an ‘influence’ or a ‘derivation’ from another language which is considered older and with more authority. This inversion of values is unbelievable. Besides proving the dogma I was referring to, it also demonstrates a shallow analysis of the matter.”

“Yes, it’s frustrating, but not because it bothers me but because the truth is mystified; and I understand that this has been done willingly, many times,”

I said. “I keep wondering how this linguistic ‘transformation’ has been permitted.”
